House of Commons Debates

SECOND SESSION—EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 25th March, 1897.

The Parliament which had been prorogued from time to time, was now commanded to assemble on the 25th day of March, 1897, for the despatch of business.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

A Message was delivered by René Edouard Kimber, Esquire, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod :

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this Honourable House in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly, the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And the House being returned,

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

MR. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that I have received from the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions pursuant to "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act," certificates and reports relating to the elections :

For the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Brant ;

For the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario ;

For the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Simcoe ;

For the Electoral District of Champlain ; and

For the Electoral District of Colchester.

In all of which electoral districts the elections were declared void.

MR. SPEAKER also informed the House that in conformity with chapter 9, section 46 of the Revised Statutes he had issued his several warrants to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out new writs of election for the said electoral districts respectively.

MR. SPEAKER also informed the House that he had received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada a certified copy of the judgment of the said court in the Election Appeal for the Electoral District of Prince (West) P.E.I., confirming the report of the trial judges in the court below, declaring the election void.

MR. SPEAKER also informed the House that in conformity with chapter 9, section 46 of the Revised Statutes, he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ELECTION PETITIONS.

MR. SPEAKER further informed the House that he had received from the Judges selected for the trial of Election Petitions, pursuant to "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act," certificates and reports relating to the elections :

For the Electoral District of Terrebonne ;

For the Electoral District of Two Mountains ;

For the Electoral District of Nicolet ;

For the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Bruce ;

For the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Grey ;

For the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Northumberland, O. ;

For the Electoral District of Maskinongé ;

For the Electoral District of Three Rivers and St. Maurice ;

For the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Perth ;

For the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Durham ;

For the Electoral District of West Toronto ;

For the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of York, O. ;

For the Electoral District of Pontiac ;

For the Electoral District of St. Antoine, Montreal ;

For the Electoral District of St. Lawrence, Montreal ; and

For the Electoral District of West Toronto.

By which the said election petitions were severally dismissed, and the sitting members declared duly elected.

VACANCIES.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House, that during the recess, he received communications from several members notifying him that the following vacancies had occurred in the representation, viz. :—

Of Darby Bergin, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Cornwall and Stormont, by decease ;

Of William LeBouthillier Fauvel, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Bonaventure, by decease ; and

Of Charles Ramsay Devlin, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Wright, by the acceptance of an office of emolument under the Crown.

CERTIFICATE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER further informed the House, that during the recess, the Clerk of the House had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, certificates of the elections and return of the following members, viz. :—

Of Thomas Osborne Davis, Esq., for the Electoral District of Saskatchewan ;

Of the Hon. Clifford Sifton, for the Electoral District of Brandon ;

Of John Goodall Snetsinger, Esq., for the Electoral District of Cornwall and Stormont ;

Of Charles Bernhard Heyd, Esq., for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Brant ;

Of Duncan Graham, Esq., for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario ; and

Of William H. Bennett, Esq., for the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Simcoe.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

Hon. Clifford Sifton, Member for the Electoral District of Brandon, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Sutherland.

William H. Bennett, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the East Riding of the County of Simcoe, introduced by Sir Charles Tupper and Mr. Haggart.

John Goodall Snetsinger, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Cornwall and Stormont, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Sutherland.

Duncan Graham, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the North Riding of the County of Ontario, introduced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and Mr. Douglas.

Charles Bernhard Heyd, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of the South Riding of the County of Brant, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson).

Thomas Osborne Davis, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Saskatchewan, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Sutherland.

Mr. SPEAKER.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(The Prime Minister, Mr. Laurier.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows :—

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate :

Gentlemen of the House of Commons .

In welcoming you on your attendance at the Second session of the present Parliament, I desire to express the gratification I feel at the evidences which prevail throughout the Dominion, of the loyalty and affection entertained by the Canadian people for Her Majesty the Queen and of the desire to join with their fellow-subjects in all parts of the Empire in celebrating the Diamond Jubilee in a manner worthy the joyous event. And I am pleased to be able also to announce that in accordance with an invitation from the Imperial Government, arrangements are being made for an effective representation of the Dominion in connection with the commemoration of this historic occasion at the Capital of the Empire.

Immediately after the last session, the Government of Manitoba was invited to hold a Conference with my Ministers on the subject of the grievances arising out of the Act of that Province relating to Education passed in the year 1890. In response to that invitation, three members of the Manitoba Government came to Ottawa, and after many and protracted discussions, a settlement was reached between the two Governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question. I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will.

A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and, while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

You will be asked to give your support to a Bill abolishing the present expensive and unsatisfactory Franchise Act and adopting, for the election of Members of the House of Commons, the Franchises of the several Provinces.

My Government has determined that the advantages to accrue, both to our Western producers and the business interests of the whole Dominion from the completion of the works for the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals, should no longer be deferred, and has, subject to the approval of Parliament, taken the initial steps for a vigorous prosecution of those works and for the perfecting of the Canal system by the close of the year 1898.

I have much satisfaction in informing you that arrangements have been concluded which, if you approve, will enable the Intercolonial Railway system to reach Montreal, and thus share in the large traffic centering in that city. The many advantages which will flow from this extension of that railway are apparent, and I have no doubt you will gladly approve of the proposal.

Appreciating the difficulties encountered by our farmers in placing their perishable food products on the English markets in good condition, my Government has arranged a complete system of cold storage accommodation at creameries, on railways, at ports and on steamers, by which these products can be preserved at the desired temperature during the whole journey from the point of production to Great Britain. The contracts made for this purpose will be laid before you.

It is desirable that the mind of the people of Canada should be clearly ascertained on the subject of prohibition, and a measure enabling the electors to vote upon the question will be submitted for your approval.

The Behring Sea Claims Convention constituted during the past year to adjust the damages payable to the owners of the British Sealing vessels, seized by the cruisers of the United States on the high seas, has completed taking the evidence submitted to it by the respective Governments of Her Majesty and the United States, and has adjourned for a time to hear the arguments thereon on behalf of both Governments. I indulge the hope that a final and satisfactory adjudication of those long delayed claims will now speedily be reached.

The calamity which has befallen our fellow-subjects in India has evoked a widespread sympathy in this country. The generous manner in which the appeal for practical tokens of this feeling has been responded to, has elicited warm assurances of grateful acknowledgment from the Government of India which have also been specially and heartily endorsed by the Imperial authorities.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the past year will be laid before you.

The Estimates for the coming year will be presented at an early day. They have been framed with every regard for economy consistent with the efficiency of the public service. I regret that the receipts from ordinary sources continue to be inadequate to meet the charges against the Consolidated Revenue. The proposed revision of the Tariff and the application of strict economy in the administration of the Government will, I trust, restore the equilibrium between income and expenditure.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Among the Bills which have been prepared and will be submitted for your approval, are Bills amending the Superannuation Act and the Civil Service Act.

These and other measures, I commend to your earnest consideration and express the hope that your deliberations under the Divine guidance will tend to increase the happiness and prosperity of every class in the Dominion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That the Address with which His Excellency has been pleased to open the session be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House for the present session be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Agriculture and Colonization;—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and inquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House; and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS.

Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament for 1897.—(Mr. Speaker.)

Report of the Department of Trade and Commerce for 1896.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 26th March, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech delivered at the opening of the session.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if any difficulty presents itself in attempting to move a reply to the Address with which His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to open the present session, it certainly does not arise from any want of material to form the basis of discussion. Perhaps I might be allowed at the very outset, to dispel any fear which any hon. gentleman may entertain of a too long discussion on my own part, by assuring the House in advance that I shall not feel obliged to deal with more than one in three of the numerous subjects which are treated in the Speech from the Throne. Those subjects are so numerous, Mr. Speaker, and so diverse, that we might very well be alarmed by the fear of a long and protracted session, if it were not for the fact that as to most of the questions at issue, I think I may fairly anticipate that there will not be any very serious differences of opinion between the two sides of this House. I may perhaps be a little sanguine, but I do think that it is quite possible that on most of the subjects which are presented for our consideration in this Speech, we shall be troubled with very little discussion of debatable principles, and that our attention will for the most part be confined to matters of detail. Whatever little opportunity I have had of observing the trend of public feeling in this country, whatever little skill I may have in discerning the spirit of the people throughout this Dominion, or rather in gathering the impressions of those who are wiser and have more experience than I have myself, has convinced me that the people of Canada are tired for the moment of political agitation, that the very violence and acrimony of the discussions in which we have been engaged during the immediately past few years have produced a feeling, perhaps not exactly of exhaustion, but at all events a disposition which longs for calmness and repose. Speaking for the great mass of the people of Canada in general—leaving out the extremists of whatever kind or description they may be—I think, Sir, that there is no one desire that is more widely entertained by our people, no one aspiration that is more fervently breathed by the people of this country, no one prayer that meets with a more profound response in the breasts of the people of this country, than that we may be allowed a short breathing space during which to forget the angry and bitter controversies in which we have been engaged, and which during the last few years have made so great and so inordinate a draught upon the public energy of this country.

I forbear to dwell upon those unhappy differences. The remembrance of them is grievous. It was a great comfort to me to know that even in the estimation of the distinguished and hon. gentleman who holds a position in this House, perhaps second only in importance, and hardly second in dignity to that of the leader of the House, the time had come when these angry controversies might be allowed to cease. It was, Sir, a great comfort to gentlemen on both sides of the House; it must have been peculiarly gratifying to hon. gentlemen on his own side, to hear his frank and unequivocal declaration, as I understood it, that he proposed for the future to confine himself to those subjects that come legitimately within the sphere of the political activity of Parliament, and to abandon the agitation of those exciting questions, which cannot be flung down, and which never yet have been flung down into the political arena without exciting the wildest and fiercest passions of which our human nature is susceptible. And, Sir, I think it would not at all be improper, for me to say further, that I have observed an interesting change in the hon. gentleman's manner in this House since those exciting controversies have been abandoned. I believe I have observed in the hon. gentleman, a spirit of mildness and sweet reasonableness, which well befits the unique position which he holds in this House; a spirit of fairness and equity which he has brought to the discussion of most of the questions, with which he has been called to deal, a spirit, I say, which is very engaging to many of us, especially the younger members of this House, who, while we cannot agree with that hon. gentleman, and while we cannot approve or endorse all that hon. gentleman has said and done throughout a very long and very distinguished public career, nevertheless entertain a high admiration for the Titanic force which has characterized his public life, an admiration which has led us to entertain with virtual and probably with absolute unanimity the desire that he may be spared for many long years and for many Parliaments if that were possible, to adorn the distinguished and honourable position which he now holds as leader of the Opposition.

I have said, Sir, that the public mind in respect to that exciting and once disturbing question is at rest. Thanks to the admirable spirit in which the question has been approached by the distinguished leader of this House, to the remarkable calmness and evenness of temper which has been proof against every temptation to return blow for blow, to the Christian character which has enabled him to bear with equanimity, attacks which a smaller and meaner spirit would have angrily and bitterly resented; thanks to the wisdom that has inspired the soft answer that turneth away wrath, to the charity which has not been easily provoked, which beareth all things, hopeth all things, believeth all things, endureth all things; to that calm and restful and inexhaustible patience, which we have very high authority for saying is of the essence of genius, and which in every grave crisis of national affairs is the indispensable condition, if it is not the very basis of the highest statesmanship, we have been borne in safety through a crisis which was of a serious and alarming character; I will not say a crisis which threatened the national life of this country, because I think that none but pessimists and alarmists would concede so much to their fears as that, but a crisis which threatened to bring about in this country a condition of things similar to that of the United States in "the times that tried men's souls" before the federal constitution was adopted; a state of things presenting the kind of obstacles to stable and successful constitutional government which were encountered in the old province of Canada during the few years that preceded the union of the provinces. Local agitations there will be, of course, a recrudescence here and there of the furious spirit which was imported into our discussions and controversies of a twelve month ago, eddying circles of sectarian bitterness and rancour, but only such as to direct attention more conspicuously to the central current of peace and harmony that flows through this land for its enrichment in every branch of our national life. But in spite of these local and temporary agitations, I believe, that for the great mass of the people of Canada, the halcyon days have come. An epoch has been brought in not unworthy to be celebrated in the organ tones of Milton:

The ocean now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

There is one subject, Mr. Speaker, and one subject only, which I think will occasion any sharp divergencies of opinion in this House; and even as to that subject, I think our differences will be in the main of a theoretical rather than of a practical character. So far as our differences may be of a practical character, I believe they will largely concern mere matters of detail. Of course, there are differences of principle among the members of this House with respect to the kind of tariff that should be imposed upon the people of this country—differences of principle which might occupy volumes, which have occupied volumes in their discussion. It was not always so, Mr. Speaker. Twenty or twenty-five years ago the people of this country were all of one mind on this subject. There was then a universal and unquestioned concurrence among public men of all shades of politics throughout this country in the principle that a tariff was a tax—that it was at the very best a necessary evil, something to be endured only so long as it had to be endured, and to be got rid of if by any possible means it could be,—in the meantime, to be endured with what measure of patience we could command, to be kept within the narrowest possible limits, to be curtailed and hemmed in at every point and to be made to press as lightly as possible upon the incomes and resources of the people of this country. There is even a tradition floating in the minds of many people—I thought at one time that it was a historical fact, though I have heard its historical accuracy questioned—that when the mild and reasonable proposition was made in this House to advance our tariff from 15 to 17½ per cent, it was assailed here as the thin edge of the protectionist wedge. From that point to the present how great the distance that has been traversed. Now, I believe it is the received doctrine of Conservative orthodoxy that a tariff tax is not a necessary evil at all, but a thing intrinsically and essentially good.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. But from the beginning it was not so, as the hon. gentleman who says "hear, hear," will remember, that when we took our leap in the dark in 1878, the leader of the Conservative party in this country did not defend his position upon economic so much as on strategic grounds. We were to have trade restriction, not because it was a thing intrinsically good and excellent, but because it was to lead to the opening up of a still larger field of commercial freedom. It was the commercial freedom that was the good and excellent thing in itself, and we were to have only a temporary restriction of our commercial freedom as a means to an end, that end being the untrammelled freedom of our commerce which it is now the quintessence of Conservative protectionist orthodoxy, the "articulus stantis aut cadentis ecclesiæ" of the Conservative faith to consider one of the greatest evils with which any country can be afflicted. According to the present lights of Conservative orthodoxy in this House, a tariff tax is not a necessary evil, only to be endured for as short a time as possible, but a thing intrinsically good and excellent,—so good and excellent that even if it were not required for the purposes for which all tariffs are primarily devised it would nevertheless be desirable to have it for the sake of the collateral benefits it can be made to confer. It is a necessary and logical deduction from that proposition that even if by some interposition of Providence, by some miracle of modern science, we were able to dispense with every dollar of taxation altogether, if we were able to provide for all the want and public services of the country—our railroads and waterways, our lighthouses, our fisheries protection, and all the thousand and one demands that wear upon the patience and good nature of the Minister of Finance, and of every Minister of Finance, it would nevertheless be necessary to levy an import tax for the purpose of preventing our domestic industries from going to destruction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. That irresistible logical deduction which seems to commend itself to the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, appears on the contrary to us on this side of the House, and I would have said, but for the appearances to the contrary on the other side of the House—to the mind of every intelligent man in this country, to be the "reductio ad absurdum" of the principle that underlies the policy of protection. I, for one, believe that if it were possible for us to strike down all restrictions, to abolish all custom-houses, and to leave all men as free and untrammelled in the matter of buying where they choose and selling where they can get a market, as we leave them in regard to their conduct in every other respect, the fruits of freedom in this field would be just as beneficent as in every other field in which the bounds of human freedom have been enlarged.

We go still further, Mr. Speaker. We think there are evils attending the protective system in this country to-day which could not have been foreseen, or which, at all events as a matter of fact, were not foreseen eighteen years ago when that policy was first introduced. The odious system of trusts and combines which, I am frank enough to say, are in some cases more offensive to the feelings and sentiments of our people than they are actually injurious to their material interests, was not anticipated eighteen years ago. Hon. members of this House, one hon. gentleman in particular whom I have in mind, when they were ransacking the tombs and dissecting rooms to find the materials for the monstrous creation of 1878, never dreamed of the kind of merciless Frankenstein that they were bringing into life. Why, before ever I had any dream of entering this House I read with tears in my eyes almost—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. RUSSELL. I only said "almost." I read, at all events, with very deep emotion, I am bound to say, the very pathetic appeal that was made to this Parliament for the release of the North-west from the grinding monopoly caused by the operation of the tariff on agricultural machinery.

Mr. RUSSELL.

That pathetic appeal might be paralleled by references to one item after another in the tariff which was imposed on this country in 1878.

We believe, further, that experience has proved that we were right in respect of most of the contentions that were made when that system was set up; but I do not intend to enter into the discussion of that experience or to discuss at great length those differences of principle that exist between this and the other side of the House with reference to this question. Those differences are vital, they are immense, they would take volumes to discuss; and if we did not think we could employ our time to better advantage, we might take up what remains of this winter and the bulk of the coming summer in discussing them. But the discussion would be largely of an academic nature. In the pregnant words of Mr. Cleveland, we are not dealing with a theory, we are facing a condition. The condition which Mr. Cleveland had to face was the condition of an overflowing treasury. The condition we have to face is the fact that, in spite of all the heavy imposts that have been placed upon our people, under the policy of the late Government, we have, nevertheless, a deficit to face, left to us, as a legacy by the Government which has just gone out. We have public obligations to fulfil, we have our public credit to maintain, and public works to provide for, and there is no conceivable way that I know of in which a revenue can be raised in this country, short of direct taxation, which will not incidentally afford all the protection that any honest industry has a right to claim, even supposing we were to concede the validity of the protectionist idea, a doctrine which I, for one, do not for a single moment propose to concede. Speaking for myself, if this matter were "res integra," if we could cultivate our national inheritance as if we were cultivating on virgin soil, if there were no vested interests which have been created—most of them artificially created under that policy, and which have a right to claim that they ought not to be ruthlessly struck down, if there were no delicate fabric of national, corporate and individual finance, which may very fairly claim that it ought not to be too rudely shaken, then I believe the proper tariff for this, as for any, country should be that no articles whatever should be taxed, except such as we were bound to import, so that we could have, in its integrity, the good sound English principle that not a dollar should be taken out of the pockets of the people, under the operation of the tariff, which did not go directly into the treasury of the country. But no country can ignore its past history, and we cannot ignore our past history. We have been for eighteen years upon the wrong track. For eighteen years we have been pursuing the wrong policy, and we must get back to the right policy by gradual and not by revolutionary processes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. RUSSELL. Did I not say, at the outset, that I thought we would not be very much divided in opinion? I trust, however, that in the tariff which is to be introduced by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), he will be able to do what his predecessors in office attempted and endeavoured to do, but were never able to accomplish. I hope he will in reality be able to lop off the mouldering branches, to simplify, in many respects, the methods by which taxes are to be collected. I hope he will be able to eliminate the features of that tariff which make for monopoly, and to render its pressure upon the great and staple industries of the people, upon the farming, the mining and the fishing population of the Dominion—less oppressive than it is at present. If he can succeed in accomplishing this, he will fulfil all that can reasonably be expected of him; if he does less, it will be a disappointment to many of us; but, if he should attempt to do more, I am afraid that, in the effort to pursue a thing which is intrinsically good and worthy, by too hasty methods, he will injuriously affect the financial and industrial system of the country. I feel assured that he will do nothing which will injuriously affect the one or the other.

There is one aspect of the question I have not dwelt upon, but which I do not wish to pass over without some observations. We have had suggestions given to us in the press that our conduct in respect of this matter is, to some extent, to be guided by the conduct of our neighbours to the south. Now, we have no reason to suppose, and I think that nobody has any reason to suppose, that the United States Congress, in passing its legislation on the subject of its own tariff, has had any regard to any other than the interests of its own people, as it conceived them. I do not think it would be manly in us to whine over the matter or sensible in us to go into hysterics in applying the remedy by our own legislation. As they have legislated to suit themselves, so we propose to legislate here for the Dominion of Canada. We should not, in my judgment, act in a spirit of jingoism, or with a view to retaliation; but the Government that will in this crisis command the confidence of the people of this country must go forward with its legislation in a manly and self-reliant spirit, with an eye solely to the advancement of the interests of Canada and to its relations as a member of the great British Empire, of which we form a part.

There is one paragraph in the Speech from the Throne which has a peculiar interest for the people of the maritime provinces. It is of peculiar interest and importance to the people of those two sister cities, St. John and Halifax, which are competing in friendly rivalry for the trade of this great Dominion. I refer to the paragraph which promises us the extension of the Intercolonial into the city of Montreal. I believe it is the unanimous opinion, or the almost unanimous opinion of the merchants of Halifax, that in that extension of the Intercolonial into the city of Montreal lies their best hope of securing any fair share of the trade of this great country. With the Intercolonial commencing at Halifax and ending at Point Lévis, I think it is impossible for the people of Halifax, and not very easily possible for the people of St. John, to have any very considerable share of the trade of this country. The people of Halifax, I believe, are keenly interested in this matter, and will watch with very great interest the progress of the measure in this House.

The situation of Halifax in some respects is very difficult in regard to this matter of securing trade. The hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition knows very well that much of the trade which Halifax enjoyed in former years, has been parcelled out among the thriving towns throughout the province that have in late years been doing their business for themselves. It was promised to us many years ago that, in lieu of the trade that we were losing and had lost, we were to become the great winter port of the Dominion, the wharf of British America, and secure a continental trade to restore to us the commercial prestige that we formerly enjoyed.

We have watched, with great interest, with great anxiety, and some measure of despondency, the various expedients that have been resorted to to bring back to the port of Halifax the trade of which it has been deprived. The late Government I suppose endeavoured in good faith, but they endeavoured in vain, to do anything substantial in this direction, but though nothing of a substantial character has been accomplished, I do not despair that something substantial yet will be accomplished. I believe, however, that as a condition precedent to the bringing about of the state of affairs that we desire, we must have the extension of the Intercolonial into the city of Montreal, so that we may ignore, as much as possible, differences of distance and disadvantages of position as compared with Portland and Boston, and secure for the city of Halifax its fair and reasonable share of the trade of this country. We in the maritime provinces have borne great burdens for the development of the interior of the Dominion. We do not urge our sacrifices in any sectional spirit, we do not claim to have done anything exceptional in making such sacrifices as were necessary to develop the country, but we do entertain the hope that our friends in the west will remember these sacrifices, and that when the proper time comes they will insist upon our only real national highway being given such connections and administered in such a spirit as will result in bringing to us more than the mere semblance of a traffic, the reality of which goes now and has gone for years and years, under the fostering care of a so-called national policy, to the enrichment of a foreign country.

There is one paragraph in the Speech which I approach, as I have no doubt some hon. gentlemen opposite will approach it, with some degree of trepidation. I refer to the passage which relates to the proposal to test the opinion of the country on the subject of a prohibitory liquor law. The question of a prohibitory law is not a party question in this country; it runs its line of cleavage through both political parties, and I fancy it will have very little respect to either party. It is not bound to have much respect to the lines of political parties as they are drawn in this country. Like an hon. friend whom I see on the other side of the House, I myself, possibly "in a moment of weakness," espoused the cause of prohibition. I found so many good and excellent people going in that direction that it seemed but natural for me to wish to bear them company. I have not yet seen reason to recant, but I cannot honestly say that I am as dead sure about the matter as I would like to be. My sympathies are, as those of all lovers of their country must be, entirely with the objects which these excellent people have in view. I entirely sympathise with them in their desire to do everything possible to mitigate and to remove, if possible, the evils that have been brought upon this country by intemperance, but I am not absolutely convinced that a prohibitory law is the best possible way. My faith has been somewhat shaken by a very important series of investigations that have recently been made, investigations conducted in the most scientific manner, and in the most unbiassed, impartial and altruistic spirit. There is clearer light upon this subject now than there was a few years ago. I do not allude to the labours of the Royal Commission which roamed over the country at very great expense and collected a vast mass not so much of evidence as of miscellaneous opinions bearing upon the liquor traffic. I allude rather to the voluntary commission of gentlemen in the United States of whose investigations a most interesting and instructive account has been published in the "Atlantic Monthly" of February last, under the hand of President Elliot, of Harvard University. I could wish that the results arrived at by that commission were more conclusive and more helpful than they are. So far as they go, I am sorry to say that these investigations do not establish that a prohibitory liquor law has been universally successful in the states in which it has been adopted or that it would, if adopted in this country, be the most effective means of curtailing—I suppose we cannot hope to abolish—the evils of the liquor traffic. I hope that those who are engaged in the agitation will give careful study to the results of that investigation. I believe that anybody who will deliberately close his eyes to the results of that investigation, will show that on this subject he prefers darkness to light. When the matter has been carefully considered by the people of this country, as I believe it will be carefully, soberly and impartially considered, if it should turn out that there is a pronounced majority in favour, a majority so pronounced as to afford reasonable ground for hoping that such an enactment can be enforced in this country, I believe it will be the duty of the Government to introduce such a measure and place it on the statute-book, and from that duty, I believe, the Government will not shrink.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I have hardly kept faith with the House, for I said when I began to discuss the Speech that I would deal with only one in three of the subjects of which it treats. I find that I have reserved to the last that which constitutes the first paragraph of the Speech from the Throne, the paragraph in which His Excellency says:

I desire to express the gratification I feel at the evidences which prevail throughout the Dominion, of the loyalty and affection entertained by the Canadian people for Her Majesty the Queen and of the desire to join with their fellow-subjects in all parts of the Empire in celebrating the Diamond Jubilee in a manner worthy of the joyous event.

I believe there is no part of the Empire in which that glorious occasion will be more cordially celebrated than in the Dominion of Canada, and no people by whom it will be more joyfully welcomed than by ours. Ten years ago, on the occasion of the jubilee of Her Majesty's accession, volume after volume was written to show the wonderful expansion and development of the British Empire during the Victorian era. I would not attempt to pass even in the briefest retrospect, the history of the Empire in the last sixty years. I prefer to confine myself to our own quarter of the world. We have in our own country abundant reasons for thankfulness and congratulation when we review the history of the Victorian age. Sixty years is not a very long period in the history of a great commonwealth, but it requires an effort of the imagination to recall the condition of things that existed in this country sixty years ago, and to contrast it with that which we see about us to-day. At the accession of our gracious Queen, these various colonies in British North America were travelling each in its own individual orbit; they were sundered by dissension of race and creed; some were even in open rebellion against the British sovereign; all of them were poor and sparsely settled, and none of them had even the semblance of parliamentary government.

Mr. RUSSELL.

To enumerate the various steps by which that condition of things has been changed, by which internal improvements have been secured and external commerce has expanded, by which the continent has been spanned with railways, and the oceans bridged with lines of palatial steamers, by which agricultural, fishing, mining and manufacturing industries have been expanded and developed, to show the steps by which our noble educational institutions have been established and endowed, and those still more noble and princely charities have been instituted, which bear witness to what is highest and best in our national life, would be to write the history of the Dominion for the last sixty years.

Time would fail me for even the faintest strokes that would go to compose a picture such as that. But there is one subject to which I will not refrain from referring. It has been said by one of the old New England governors, that the Almighty had sifted a whole nation that he might send choice grain into New England. We have been more highly blessed in this country, because in addition to the three strong races which form the basis of New England society, we have a fourth in this country; we have added the lightness, and brightness, the grace and genius of the French race. Time was in this country when English-speaking and the French-speaking people of Canada looked upon each other with jealousy and distrust, when our people of French descent cultivated deliberately a spirit of isolation from their English-speaking fellow-subjects; and when people of English race and English blood looked upon their French fellow-subjects and fellow-citizens with suspicion, if not hostility. Now such a state of things could not continue if this country was to become one great and united commonwealth. Nothing could be more fatal to the unification of this people of Canada than the continuance of such a spirit, and every true patriot in this country looked forward to the time when these antagonisms should pass away. But they looked in vain for many a long and weary year. It was a toilsome and painful ascent from those conditions to the conditions in which we find ourselves to-day. Within the past year or two, even within the past few months, we have witnessed in this country one of the most striking, one of the most interesting things that ever occurred in the history of any country; because the very question, the very agitation of all others which threatened to intensify and perpetuate those differences of race and creed, has been overruled, in the good providence of God, to weld into a permanent and indissoluble unity of esteem and affection those two races whose mutual antagonism in the estimation of many persons threatened the very foundations of the state. I have been recently reading a poem of Mrs. Browning's which is not perhaps as much read to-day as twenty years ago, in which she says in her own striking manner, "the English have a scornful, insular way of calling the French light." Sir, if that great and good woman could have lived to this day to witness the constancy and devotion of this people to a true ideal, and a trusted leader, she might well have compared their lightness to that of the bullet:

That dashes from the gun mouth while the eye
Winks and the heart beats one * * *
* * * Even so direct,
So sternly undivertible of aim
Is this French people.

"Set your orators
To blow upon them with loud windy mouths."

Array in order the strongest and the most persuasive influences that could be brought to bear to make them swerve from what they believe to be in the best interests of their race and faith—

This light French people will not thus be driven,
They turn indeed but then they turn upon
Some central pivot of their thought and choice,
And veer out by the force of holding fast.

And so, Sir, it has come about that by their constancy, and courage, by their devotion to what they knew to be right and fair and just, they have drawn to them every sound and honest English heart in this country; they have conquered the last fortress of prejudice among the English-speaking people of the Dominion. They have shown to us that this "scornful, insular English way" is in fact, what Hamerton in his essays years ago proved it to be, simply a species of narrow philistinism, and they have brought about an epoch which is eloquently described in the Speech from the Throne as "the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, and by mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will." We are about to hear from one of those hon. gentlemen to-day, who, I believe, is to address us in his own charming tongue, which it is one of my great regrets that I am able to follow so imperfectly. I do not feel justified in detaining the House for a single moment longer from the treat which is in store for those of us who are able to partake of it. Thanking you, Mr. Speaker, and thanking the House for the kind indulgence which has been shown me, I will conclude by moving that an humble Address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it is not without a feeling of fear and of hesitation that I rise to second the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), that an humble address be presented to His Excellency in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I must, at the outset, crave the indulgence of this House in behalf of one of its junior members.

Mr. Speaker, although I fully realize the difficulty of the task I have assumed in rising to address the House under so solemn a circumstance, still I may say that I experience a particular pleasure in discharging this duty, on account of the honour which reflects on the constituency which I represent in this House, and because also of the opportunity it affords me of voicing the feelings of confidence placed by a large majority of the people of this country in the hon. gentlemen whom they have put at the head of affairs, on the 23rd June last, and in the wise and patriotic policy which they have pursued, since their accession to power. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the eloquent words fallen from the hon. member for Halifax, I feel that I could safely content myself with cheering the generous and patriotic words fallen from the hon. member who has so eloquently spoken of and so firmly adhered to the policy enunciated in the Speech from the Throne, and the legitimate hopes which it has evoked in our breasts for the future of our country. That policy, an outline of which we have just heard, shall be defined during the present session; meanwhile, let us, for a moment, divest ourselves of unfair prejudice begotten by party spirit, and examine, from a national standpoint, the official statements embodied in the Speech from the Throne. The Speech from the Throne mentions a fact unparalleled either in the records of the House of Commons of Canada, or in the annals of the legislative bodies of any other country. I mean the sixtieth anniversary of the reign of our august Sovereign, Queen Victoria. I think I am but voicing the feelings of the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House as well as those sitting opposite, when I say that, as loyal subjects of Her Majesty, we are proud of our Sovereign; that we all pray to Heaven that long may she continue to occupy the Throne of Great Britain, the noble woman who is the adornment of the nineteenth century and who, for the last sixty years has worn and still wears with such lustre the British Crown, of which Canada is, unquestionably, the brightest jewel. Complying with the invitation extended to him by the home government, the distinguished leader of this House will, no doubt, cross the Atlantic and go and testify to the devotion of the Canadian people, to their Queen and to their motherland. He will bear witness to the fact that on the banks of the St. Lawrence is found a young nation in which are blended British energy and the chivalrous spirit of France, Irish impetuosity and Scottish tenacity; a nation which, through the union of the English rose, the French fleur-de-lis, the Irish shamrock and the Scotch thistle, has grown and reached manhood, while loving and revering Victoria, Queen of the United Kingdom of England and Ireland.

Allow me now, Mr. Speaker, to say a few words concerning that burning and vexed Manitoba school question, which has been set at rest since last session. As a French-

Mr. ETHIER.

Canadian, and as one of the representatives of the province of Quebec, I deem it my duty to offer a few words on the matter. If I am asked on what ground I shall place myself to deal with this question, I may say, without any hesitation, that I will deal with it from a national standpoint, from the standpoint of a Canadian and of a member of Parliament who has given his oath to follow only the dictates of his own conscience, free alike from fear, violence or undue influence from whatsoever quarter or authority it may come. Political capital has been made out of this unhappy Manitoba school question. And what was the outcome of that agitation? For over six years the country has been disturbed by racial and creed wrangles, and by dissensions which have troubled the harmony which ought to prevail among the various elements of our population. For six years the public affairs have been paralyzed and the regular development of the country brought to a standstill. Now, through the settlement effected by the present Government and by the Manitoba government upon the basis of conciliation, peace and harmony have been restored within six months; a result which could not be attained by six long years of procrastination, provocation, nay more, of broken promises. And thus, to use the very words of the Speech from the Throne, begins a new era. Yes, let us hope that this is the beginning of a new era; let us hope that moderate men, irrespective of party ties, will join hands to promote harmony, peace and good-will among the several races and elements of our population. Ideas of conciliation shall prevail, I doubt not, and from the cliffs of Gaspé to the shores of the Pacific, there will no longer be found any Englishmen, Irishmen, Frenchmen and Scotchmen at war against each other, but only Canadians walking hand in hand, turning to the future with the brightest hope of grandeur and prosperity. It is high time that the country should be placed above political parties; let us render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to Canada what is her due. At all events, the result of the by-elections in Cornwall and Stormont, in Bonaventure and Wright—

Mr. LARIVIERE. (Translation.) The hon. member should not forget the result in St. Boniface.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Those elections bear witness that the policy of conciliation pursued by the present Government is emphatically approved of and endorsed by the voters of the province of Quebec, and Champlain. I venture to say, will likewise express its approbation of the policy enunciated in the Speech from the Throne. Before dismissing this subject, let the hon. Prime Minister allow me to congratulate him on the part he has played in that policy of conciliation which, as I said, will usher in a new era in the history of this country. The third paragraph of the Speech from the Throne is of the highest interest to the people of the Dominion. The reform of the tariff will be the object of a strong, systematic and judicious legislation, likely to prove satisfactory to the country, inasmuch as it will show preferential treatment of the agricultural and working classes, in opposition to monopolies, while fostering our national industries and manufactures. The country is now going through one of those financial crises out of which parties unfortunately try to make political capital, but the hon. gentlemen opposite know very well in what sad condition the country was in when the Government of the day came into power; they are fully aware of the legacy they have bequeathed the Ministry, of the obligations imposed upon them and the grave issues which have to be solved. Immediate steps will, undoubtedly, be taken by the present Government, so as to restore the equilibrium in our budget, bring back prosperity to the country, produce a fiscal system which will prove satisfactory to the masses, and fulfil the legitimate demands of the farming and industrial community. Continuing its policy of economy and retrenchment, the Government announces the abolition of the Franchise Act. While effecting, by that policy, a saving of $250,000 for the revision of the lists, the Government secures to the several provinces of the confederation the respect of their autonomy, by adopting the franchises of the various provinces, for the election of members to the Federal Parliament. The country and this House, irrespective of parties, will, I doubt not, hail with delight this wise and economical measure, so long expected and asked for. It can hardly be expected of me, Sir, that I should enter into the details of all the different measures mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I may, however, point out here the importance for this country of the policy of deepening the St. Lawrence Canals, of extending the Intercolonial from Lévis to Montreal, and of establishing cold storage facilities on railways and on steamers, for the shipment of our farmers' products. The prosperity and progress of a country, says a writer, do not depend only on the wisdom of its statesmen, on the number of its institutions, on its higher education, but also on the facilities of communication whereby its inhabitants are enabled to exchange their products, their commodities and even to exchange their views and their thoughts. Such is the reason why the present Government express in the Speech from the Throne their intention of completing those important public works. Let us rise to the importance of the occasion and show ourselves worthy of a country so full of resources and promises. A great responsibility weighs upon our shoulders, as representatives of the people, entrusted by the country with the duty of watching over its development and prosperity, and, I venture to say, this responsibility assumes, under the circumstances, an exceptional importance, but I have no doubt that with the help of the enlightened and wise advisers of His Excellency and with the equally wise, patriotic and enlightened co-operation of this honourable House, the measures foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne will be successfully carried out, causing trade, industry and agriculture to spring into new life and vigour. Allow me, Sir, to tender you my heartfelt thanks, as also to the hon. gentlemen in this House for the indulgent hearing you have granted me. My remarks have been prompted by the sole love of our common country, of this Canada of ours which, I doubt not, will play a distinguished and honourable part in the jubilee celebration to be held in London in June next. Let me before resuming my seat, repeat with the poet :

Canada Excelsior ! Brille au premier rang !
Un peuple altier prend son essor chez toi, libre et franc,
Il sait, pour ta défense, signaler sa vaillance,
Vive Régina ! Vive Victoria !

I second with pleasure the motion of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure to me to have the opportunity of expressing the satisfaction with which I have listened to the able and eloquent speech delivered by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) in moving the Address, and the interesting speech, which I regret I was not as well able to follow, of the hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), who has just taken his seat. I need not say, Sir, that the hon. mover of the Address had a somewhat difficult task to discharge. An ideal free trader, as I believe that hon. gentleman has always professed himself to be, had to discharge the somewhat difficult task of preparing the House for a protectionist tariff. I do not regret that fact, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that I shall be only too happy to join him heartily in carrying out the policy which he has indicated as the one that the best interests of this country demand at the hands of the Government and of this House. It is a still more agreeable duty on my part to tender to the leader of the House, the First Minister, my most hearty congratulations upon the distinction which has been conferred upon Canada, as well as himself, by the invitation of the Imperial Government to take part in the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee. I need not say, Sir, that there is no person within the wide domain of Canada who will, in my view, not feel it fortunate for Canada that on such an occasion, when so great a compliment has been paid to this country, an hon. gentleman occupies the position of First Minister who is so well able to discharge the duties incident to that

hon. gentleman's position on so important and so august an occasion. I read with some astonishment a telegram from London, published a few days ago in the press here, referring to the fact that Canada was being penalized by having only one representative on this great and important occasion, while Australasia will be represented by no less than five Premiers, and the correspondent felt it was necessary that some suggestion should be offered to Her Majesty's Government in order to overcome that great disparity. I can only say that the person who committed himself to such an opinion knows very little of the position that Canada occupies in the estimation of the Empire. Sir, when Canada became a confederation, a great Dominion, she spoke with authority. She was represented at the heart of the Empire, before the Imperial Government, by a High Commissioner, who was charged with the duty of representing not a province, but the whole of this great Confederation, and I am happy to be able to testify that not only in regard to my predecessor but in regard to the gentleman who has succeeded me in that high office, the High Commissioner has on every occasion obtained the hearty support and co-operation of every one of the representatives in London of the autonomous colonies, which embrace all the colonies of Australasia and South Africa, and that all those representatives fully recognize that the Dominion of Canada is entitled to that precedence which gives its representative the position of leader of the colonial representatives in London. So on this occasion, Sir, although there might be, and I should have been very glad if there could be a representative from every one of the Australian and South African Colonies, the hon. First Minister would find that he would be associated with a body of gentlemen one and all of whom would recognize the precedence that Canada occupies in consequence of her advanced position as a Dominion. There is no ground for apprehension on the part of any person, that we will not be well, worthily and efficiently represented on that great occasion. This Diamond Jubilee is unique in itself. There has been no occasion in the world's history perhaps on which such a celebration has taken place at all corresponding in magnitude to this. It has been the good fortune of this great Empire that Her Majesty the Queen has throughout a longer period than any other ruler in the history of any other country filled the high position of Sovereign of the British Empire. Not only is that the case, but Her Majesty has the satisfaction of having witnessed during that long period a development in Great Britain itself and throughout the Empire that is unparalleled in the history of the world. Great and striking have been the advances made within the United Kingdom itself since Her Majesty ascended the Throne. When I remind hon. gentlemen opposite that 56 years ago, when I had the pleasure of visiting Great Britain for the first time, there was only a horse railway six miles in length in Scotland and a railway running from Liverpool to Manchester in England, and ask them to contrast that situation as regards railway operations with the present position in that country, they will grasp in a moment the tremendous and gigantic advances made in different directions relating to the progress, prosperity and grandeur of the United Kingdom. But great as has been the progress of the United Kingdom, the progress of the colonies has been still greater. Sixty years ago, at the time Her Majesty ascended the Throne, Australia was a terra incognita, a small portion of it only was practically known, and it was a penal settlement, and the site of the great city of Melbourne was occupied at that period by camps of aborigines, and in fact the creation of Australia and New Zealand as great colonies has taken place since Her Majesty ascended the Throne. This has been a revelation to the world. The same remark will apply to South Africa. I need not refer to the satisfactory progress made by the Dominion of Canada, or do more than mention the progress made by India and the extension of that vast Empire, but I desired briefly to call attention to the enormous progress made throughout the Empire during the benign reign of Her Majesty. It has not only been the good fortune of Her Majesty the Queen to witness this enormous development of the Empire under her sway, but it has been the greater good fortune of the people dwelling in every portion of this great Empire to recognize in Her Majesty a Sovereign of whom everyone is justly proud. It has been the good fortune of every subject of Her Majesty even in the most remote portions of the Empire to recognize that the Queen, whether as a woman, wife or sovereign, in fact in every relation of life, possessed all those great charms which endear her to the hearts of every one of her subjects. Sir, I am glad to know that Canada is not only to be represented by the Prime Minister at the Diamond Jubilee, but I also deem it to be a most happy suggestion on the part of the Imperial Government to signalize this great and important event by bringing together from the remote portions of the Empire the Premiers of the great autonomous colonies, and at the same time secure a suitable representation of the militia and military forces of Canada and the other colonies. I believe, Sir, that these matters may by some be regarded from an economical point of view as perhaps attended with some little expenditure and outlay; but I am in a position to say from knowledge gained by many years, residence in England that any expenditure connected with a display of that kind is utterly insignificant compared with the enormous benefits it will confer on Canada by presenting before, not only the people of the United Kingdom, but people from the Continent of Europe and other countries that will be assembled in England on that occasion, an exhibition that is calculated to make a lasting impression on their minds as to the advance Canada has made in that as well as in other respects. I am quite sure that every hon. member will be only too happy to join in giving the Government the most hearty and cordial support in any measure proposed in connection with this great event calculated to give it that due importance to which it is in my judgment entitled.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir, I am obliged to pass rapidly to a less agreeable portion of my duty on the present occasion, and that is to offer some slight criticism in respect to what remains in this Address.

There is much of it to which I am not disposed to take any exception whatever, but I draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to what I think trenches very nearly upon an unconstitutional attitude on the part of the Government of Canada in relation to the school question. I find it stated in the Address that :

A settlement was reached between the two governments which was the best arrangement possible under the existing conditions.

Now, Sir, who authorized, where is the authority for a settlement being effected by this Government? Within the four corners of the constitution of this country I do not think you will find any authority for the action which the Government here declares it has taken. The Manitoba Act lays down, and the Act of Confederation defines what the position of the Parliament of Canada is, and what the position of the Government of Canada is in relation to the question of education. The constitution of our country declares that this Government has nothing whatever to do with the question of education except under particular circumstances. It provides that when any local legislature withdraws from the minority the rights which are guaranteed by the constitution and by the laws of the country, then, and not till then is this Government clothed with power to interfere in the slightest degree. Why, Sir, when the time came that the highest tribunal in the Empire declared that this condition of things existed, when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council gave their judgment that the rights and privileges enjoyed under the law and the constitution of the country by the minority in Manitoba had been invaded, and that a grievance existed, and that the time had come when the appeal justly lay to the Government of Canada to redress that wrong; then, acting under that authority the Government of my predecessor, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, addressed a Remedial Order which was strictly in conformity with the constitution of the country, calling upon the Government of Manitoba to provide by legislation for the restoration of these privileges which they had taken away from the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba by the Act of 1890. And, Sir, when the Government of Manitoba refused to comply with that Remedial Order, then, and not till then, did the case arrive at such a position as that this Parliament was not only justified, but was called upon in the discharge of its duty to pass a Bill for the restoration of the privileges of which the Roman Catholic minority had been deprived. There is nothing else provided for in the constitution. It was the most natural thing that the Government of Canada should adopt and exhaust, (as its predecessors had done), every means in its power for the purpose of obtaining a satisfactory solution of this question; but in my judgment, there is nothing in the law nor in the constitution—on the contrary, I believe it to be an invasion of the principle laid down in the constitution for this Government to assume that it is in a position to make a settlement with anybody. I draw the attention of the hon. the First Minister to that, because although it may be considered a hypercriticism, I believe that a close examination will prove my suggestion to be well founded, and that there is no warrant in the constitution of our country for the course which the Government declares it has taken with regard to this question.

I have another objection to make to a statement in the Address, and I am bold enough to challenge the accuracy of that statement. The hope is expressed that :

It will prove to be the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another.

Sir, upon what grounds are these words put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General? Where is the authority for declaring that the conditions existing in this country were such, that there was room for hope for a new era of peace and happiness between the two great nationalities of this Dominion? I say, Sir, there is not a country on the face of the globe in which the peoples of two great nationalities living side by side, have lived in greater mutual respect and enjoyment of each other's society than has existed between the English and French people of Canada down to the present hour. Whatever question may have arisen to produce a certain amount of feeling, it is nevertheless a fact known and recognized, and it is a fact greatly to the honour and credit of both our French and English people, that cordial and genuine good feeling and friendly intercourse has never been disturbed for a single moment.

I shall now take the opportunity of drawing the attention of the House briefly to the position which in my judgment this question occupies, and I am compelled to do that because the position of myself and my friends, the position of the great party to which I have the honour to belong, has been greatly misrepresented in reference to this matter. I find, in a speech delivered by the hon. the First Minister in the county of Wright a few days ago, the following statement:—

He denied that under the Remedial Bill the minority would have secured their rights, and challenged any Conservative to prove that they would have got as much as under the present settlement.

I will ask the House to pardon me while I draw its attention to what I regard as the historical position of this question so far as regards the efforts made by the late Government and by the present Government. I shall first draw attention to what the Remedial Bill provided as submitted to the House by myself as a member of the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

The Remedial Bill proposed to constitute a separate school board of education for the province, to be composed of a number of persons, not exceeding nine, all Roman Catholics. This board was to have control of the separate schools, and among other things, to select the books, maps and globes, to appoint a Roman Catholic speaking both French and English as superintendent of separate schools.

My hon. friend will admit that no such provisions are to be found in the measure to which he has referred as giving more than the Remedial Bill gave. Section 4, subsection C, after amendment in committee reads as follows:—

To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control; provided, however, that no book, map or globe other than books in history, morals or religion, shall be selected unless such books, map or globe has been authorized for use either in high or public schools of the province of Manitoba, or is now or hereafter shall be in use in any of the public or separate schools of any province of the Dominion, or books published in any country.

I ask my hon. friend if he can find in the measure to which he has referred any provision giving that security to the religious convictions of the minority in Manitoba. The history of this clause is as follows, so far as it provides for bi-lingual teaching. Mr. McCarthy proposed the following amendment:—

That in districts where any large number of the pupils attending separate schools do not understand English, but speak French, or a foreign tongue, the books and maps shall, as far as practicable, be bi-lingual in the English or French or foreign language spoken by the pupils, with the object of teaching the English language in the most effective way.

The clause carried as above was deemed to embrace the scope of Mr. McCarthy's amendment, and when read Mr. Choquette said: "I think that is fair." Clause 4, subsection C, was Mr. Powell's amendment up to the last six words. Mr. Langelier proposed these words: "Or books published in any country." "The object of this I may say," he added, "is to give full power to the board to select any books they think proper." This proposal was accepted. Provision was made by this Bill so that on a petition of at least five heads of families in municipalities representing at least ten Roman Catholic children of school age, a school district could be established. Provision was made also for the establishment of school districts in cities and towns or where there was no municipal organization. The Remedial Bill made further provision for the assessment of Roman Catholic rate-payers and their property who did not prefer the provincial system and exempted the persons and property from taxation for provincial schools of those who contributed to the support of separate schools. The hon. Premier, concerning this measure, said before the last general elections:

God help my poor fellow-countrymen and co-religionists of Manitoba, if all the help they are going to have is what the hon. gentleman and his followers are prepared to give them. I pity my poor fellow-countrymen of Manitoba or anywhere else, if they expect any justice from the hon. gentleman.

And again:

What is before the House? A half-hearted and faint measure.

A measure of compromise, and nothing else.

During the consideration of this measure by the House of Commons, the commissioners appointed by the Dominion Government conferred with the Government of Manitoba. Speaking at the Club National Banquet at the Windsor Hotel, Montreal, in December, 1896, the hon. Premier pretended to state the position of the settlement by way of comparison. Referring to the proposal of Sir Mackenzie Bowell's Government, he said:

Here is the proposition made by the commissioners of the Dominion Government:—"In towns and villages where there are 25 Catholic children in a school, and in cities where there are 50, the school commissioners will be obliged to furnish a separate school or a separate apartment and a Catholic teacher."

The actual terms of the commissioners were very different. They suggested that the Manitoba legislature should provide in towns and villages where there were resident twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age and in cities where there were fifty of such children for the establishment of a school house or school room where they should be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher. Where the majority of the school children were Catholics the requirements for religious exercises should not operate. That the text-books in Catholic schools should not offend the religious views of the Catholics. That Catholics should have representation on the Advisory Board of the province as well as on the Board of Examiners for the examination of teachers. That Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a Normal School. That the existing system of permitting a non-qualified teacher in the Catholic schools should be continued for two years so as to enable them to qualify. The Minute of the Privy Council, 27th March, 1896, which empowered the commissioners, provided that the settlement should be: "On such terms as shall be satisfactory to the said minority." What did Mr. Sifton consider this proposal involved? The reply of the Manitoba Government, signed by him, will tell us. Among their grounds for refusal it was said that the proposal "Would establish a system of state-supported separate schools for the Roman Catholic people, and would compel their support by the school taxes and legislative grants." Not only so, but the whole school organization—text-book regulations, constitution of Advisory Board, Board of Examiners and Normal School—would be modified to bring it in accord with the separation principle. The organization of the separate school would be compulsory. The plan "Would impair the efficiency of the public schools." It was also argued that the legislature would be divested of the control of the schools so far as religious exercises and teaching were concerned. The proposal to assist a separate Normal School, "Would be absolutely unjustifiable." In the future discussion of the answer of the Manitoba Government, the Government of that province claimed that the proposition of the Dominion Commissioners "Aimed at the legal recognition by the legislature of Manitoba of the right of the Roman Catholic people to separate for school purposes." "We regard ourselves as precluded by our declaration of policy preceding our last election from assenting to such statutory recognition." It appears also that any settlement between the Government of the Dominion and that of Manitoba must, by the very terms of your instructions, be subject to the sanction of a third party. "In a word, we are absolutely debarred from conceding a system of Roman Catholic and state-aided separate schools while the representatives of the minority, and, as a consequence, the Federal Government, will accept nothing else." The memorandum containing this statement was signed by Clifford Sifton and J. D. Cameron. The hon. Premier continued:

Yet, after we have accepted from the provincial government of Manitoba much more than the commissioners of the late Government asked last spring, we are none the less denounced, in the name of religion, as traitors to our race and creed.

Will the hon. Minister of the Interior agree to that statement? Will he say that the hon. Premier has obtained more than was proposed by the commissioners sent by the late Government? For the purpose of disposing of that point, I may just draw attention of Mr. Sifton's address as it appears in the "Gazette" of December 3. Mr. Sifton said:

The long-pending dispute between the federal and the provincial authorities over what is popularly known as the school question, has now been happily terminated by a final settlement.

That is not what I understand a number of the friends of the hon. Premier and of his supporters who sit behind him think on that question. I observe that reference has been made by the hon. seconder of this Address to the statement that Bonaventure had given its decision in favour of this settlement, but I think it will be found that the hon. member who has been returned from Bonaventure has stated in the most emphatic terms that he did not regard this question as finally settled but would endeavour to get more justice for his fellow-countrymen.

In the address of Mr. Sifton to his electors of Brandon, which therefore is authentic, he said:

The terms of the settlement will, upon examination, be found to be in strict accord with the principle of national schools. The oft-repeated demand for separate schools has finally been rejected. The conduct, management, regulation and control of the public school system remain substantially unaltered. The settlement amounts simply to a provision for more efficient religious instruction upon the lines of the present proposition formerly made by the government of the province to the federal commissioners at the conference held in the city of Winnipeg early in the present year. In the plan adopted for imparting such instruction, all denominations are placed upon an equal footing.

That is the view which Mr. Sifton held on this matter. I may say that, in introducing this Bill in the Manitoba legislature, Mr. Cameron, the Attorney General, seemed to differ in a very striking manner from the views announced by the hon. First Minister, on various occasions, as to what this settlement had accomplished. Mr. Cameron said:

He wished to deal with a particular charge. It was stated that the government had dealt perfidiously, as the settlement was substantially the same as the offer of the Dominion commissioners a year before. If such were really the case, the provincial government would have been guilty and susceptible of condemnation. But such was not the case. He referred to the offer of the Dominion commissioners to prove this. The first clause of that offer was compulsory: that, without consulting the wishes of anyone, as soon as there were sufficient Roman Catholic children, there must be a separate school which should be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher. The Dominion commissioners further asked for separate text-books, statutory representation on the advisory board and a separate normal school, none of which things were to be found in the settlement. Thus there was no resemblance between the offer of the Dominion Commissioners and the Bill before the House to-day.

I draw the hon. First Minister's attention to the fact that he claims to have done a great deal more than was proposed either by the Remedial Bill or the commissioners who were sent by the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell to Winnipeg, and that he is in direct antagonism with the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), who controverts this view in the strongest possible manner, and also with the Attorney General of Manitoba (Mr. Cameron) who introduced the Bill in the Manitoba legislature.

I pass on as rapidly as I can and am only taking the time I consider absolutely necessary. As this is perhaps the only opportunity that may be presented for discussing the question, I feel it due to its importance and the share which the late Government, of which I was the head, had in it, to put the facts, as I think, more correctly upon record than they would stand if the statement of the hon. First Minister were allowed to go unchallenged.

Comparing the hon. Premier's statement at Montreal with the Bill recently introduced by the Manitoba Government in pursuance of the settlement, I find very striking contradictions. The hon. gentleman said :

Wherever there are ten Catholic children, it will be permitted to priests to enter the school at half-past three o'clock in the afternoon and give religious teaching.

In every municipality where there are 25 children belonging to the Catholic Church, and in every town and municipality where there are 50 children belonging to that church, the commissioners will be obliged, on the petition of the parents, to provide a Catholic teacher, not only to teach religion, but secular matters, such as arithmetic and grammar, as well.

Contrast the Bill itself with the description which the hon. First Minister has given of it, and which I am afraid he must have given after a very careless perusal of that measure. The Bill itself says :

Religious teaching in public schools is to take place between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and is to be conducted "by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher, when so authorized," but this religious teaching may take place only

(a) When authorized by school trustees, or

(b) When the parents of at least ten children attending the school in the case of a rural district, or by parents of at least 25 children attending the school in the case of a city, town or village.

One duly-certificated Roman Catholic teacher is to be employed in any village or rural district where the average attendance in any school of Roman Catholic children is 25, and one duly-certificated Roman Catholic teacher in towns and cities where the average attendance is 40.

The hon. Premier took care not to mention other provisions of the settlement which practically compel the children to study text-books, history, &c., which are objectionable to Roman Catholics, for it is to be enacted that "No separation shall take place during secular work," and no provision is made for meeting the conscientious scruples of Roman Catholics in any other matter than purely religious teaching.

The settlement contained in the Manitoba Bill of 1897, involves therefore the following :—

Roman Catholics to obtain advantage of the right to have either religious exercises or religious teaching must attend the schools as conducted under existing laws obnoxious to their consciences and in derogation of their rights. But when, and only when, an average attendance at a particular school in town or country reaches a certain figure, they may have a Roman Catholic teacher and a Roman Catholic priest to give religious exercises.

The teacher must be fully qualified under the general law, and must teach from the very text-books to which earnest conscientious objections are made by Roman Catholics.

Outside of Winnipeg and large towns, therefore, the "average attendance" renders the Bill practically inoperative. For the children must gather from far and wide and make a record of attendance at the same school, under the existing system before their parents or guardians can obtain for them the right to have the religious teaching between 3.30 and 4 o'clock each day or to have a Roman Catholic teacher teach from Protestant school-books.

Nevertheless the hon. Premier, speaking in Hull on March 16th, said :

Taking up the Remedial Bill, he denied that under it the minority would have secured their rights, and challenged any Conservative to prove that they would have got as much as under the present settlement. In order to have separate schools, three things were necessary : distinct organization, legislative grants and exemption from taxation. The Remedial Bill only gave the first ; the present settlement gave all three.

The Remedial Bill secured separate schools and provided for the creation of a Roman Catholic board of control and the teaching of their own language and their own selection of text-books, &c.

Five Roman Catholic heads of families could have a school district established or allowed so long as there were ten Roman Catholic children of school age living within the district or proposed district not over three miles from the proposed school site.

Yet the hon. Premier says the Remedial Bill gave no organization. Section 28, subsection 2, of the Remedial Bill, provided as follows :—

No Roman Catholic who is assessed for the support of a separate school shall be liable to be assessed, taxed or required in any way to contribute for the erection, maintenance or support of any other school, whether by provincial law or otherwise ; nor shall any of his property in respect of which he shall have been so assessed, be so liable.

Yet the hon. First Minister says the Bill gave no exemption from taxation. The present settlement gave, he says, organization, legislative grants, and exemption from taxation, and, therefore, separate schools. This is a burlesque, I humbly submit, on the Bill of the Manitoba Government. The hon. Premier said in Hull on March 16th :

When he entered office, he entered into negotiations with the Government of Manitoba and obtained from them concessions which gave the French Catholics of Manitoba religious teaching in their schools and the protection of their language. As a result, the French language will now be taught in the schools of Manitoba. Are you satisfied? (Cries of "Yes, yes.") He appealed to the good sense of all reasonable men, if this was not a satisfactory settlement. I want the two languages taught in all the schools. I speak French because it is the language of my mother, of the historic nation from which I have sprung, but I also speak English because it is the language of business. This double teaching will enable the children of Manitoba to earn their living as they could not otherwise do.

It was a misstatement, the hon. gentleman will permit me to say, to say that the French language "will now be taught in all the schools," as intended in the above, when all that the Bill provides, is that when there are ten pupils whose mother tongue is French the bi-lingual system of teaching shall prevail. But, this aside, the pretense that this is a concession obtained by the hon. Premier, is, in my opinion, absurd. It is a proposal of Mr. McCarthy, as a matter of fact, and was accepted by the late Government and made a part of the Remedial Bill. It is in the interests of Protestants as well as of Catholics, and this principle generally obtains the world over to-day. And yet the hon. gentleman, at Hull, took credit for having himself been the author and originator of the idea, and excited a good deal of enthusiasm, and I have no doubt obtained a large amount of support from this very delusive statement. The hon. Premier in addressing the House in August, 1896, said :

I have every reason to hope, every reason to believe, that, when again this Parliament assembles, this question will have been settled satisfactorily to all parties concerned.

And at Quebec in October, 1896, the hon. gentleman said :

I have only one word to say. During the fight I have often declared that, with the aid of Sir Oliver Mowat, I would settle that question in six months. I am not in a position to-night to discuss our recent arrangement. But I am happy to say that now, before six months, it will be settled by giving to the Catholics rights of conscience, and those who believe in religion in schools, will be satisfied. We obtained from the delegates of Manitoba all the concessions which men in honour could make.

I draw the attention of the hon. Minister to this statement that he had obtained all the concessions that men in honour could make. And yet when face to face with the electors of Wright in Hull, the hon. gentleman made the following confession :—

I know I have not got as much as I wanted, but I have got as much as I could.

Does he mean to say that he wanted more than men in honour could give? He would hardly like to take that position, and yet that is the conclusion at which one must inevitably arrive if he takes the hon. gentleman's statements as made. The "Star" continues, in reporting the hon. Premier at Hull :

Amidst loud applause, Mr. Laurier quoted Hon. Edward Blake's opinion that the settlement was far more advantageous to the minority than any Remedial Bill that Parliament could pass.

The whole force of this is in the suggestion that this was the opinion of the counsel for the minority. But Mr. Blake's fee was long since earned, and he is in a position to give either legal or political opinions now irrespective of his old clients. If his opinion is examined, it will be found that Mr. Blake writes as a lawyer on a question not now in dispute, respecting the legal effect of the decision of the Privy Council and the powers of the Governor in Council. He traces the history of this dispute till it becomes (after judgment, Order in Council and Remedial Bill), a political question. The passage relied on from Mr. Blake's opinion is in no sense stronger than language used by other leaders of the Liberal party, nor are they in any sense supported by the Catholic minority of Manitoba, certainly not those congregated in the district of St. Boniface. But it is important to observe that this opinion relates to the political phase of the question. I draw the attention of the First Minister to the fact that the act of the Manitoba legislature does not restore any of the privileges that were taken away. This question arose from the decision of the Privy Council that the rights of the minority in Manitoba had been taken away, and that the duty of restoring them devolved upon the Government of Canada. The hon. the Premier boasts of the settlement he has effected, but I ask him to read the judgment of the Judicial Committee, and, for the purpose of refreshing his memory, I will quote a single clause of it which deals with the subject :

Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by a local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contribution of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the Statutes, fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessments for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

The hon. gentleman boasts of the settlement he has effected, and of the Bill which has been passed. Yet I ask him to state one single privilege, one single right, taken away from the Roman Catholics of Manitoba by the Bill of 1890 which they will enjoy under this Bill. I know of none. I have read the Bill carefully and I have been unable to find one single privilege that was taken away from them that has been restored by the Bill of which the hon. gentleman seems so proud, and which it seems almost a breach of the constitution to mention in the Speech from the Throne as a settlement. The minority did not ask for what is conceded, and declares that it will not accept it. There has been no petition sent in, no application made by the minority or by anybody representing them, even down to this very hour, that asks for one single thing that has been given by the Remedial Bill, as it is called, of Manitoba. Yet the hon. gentleman boasts of it as a very great achievement. I remember the hon. member for St. John and Iberville (Mr. Tarte), when he returned from Manitoba, where, I believe, he had a very conspicuous part in effecting this arrangement, boasted that even under the very shadow of the Palace at St. Boniface, this arrangement, which had been made by his Government would be ratified by the people. He did not expect that the Archbishop would concur, but he said that the French people whose interests were at stake, would be found to concur in it. Well, Sir, there has been an opportunity to test the correctness of that prophecy, and it certainly has not stood the test. You have the unanimous declaration of the electorate of St. Boniface in opposition to this measure. I give you my grounds for that statement. A gentleman was brought forward who stood on the platform of opposition for the legislature of Manitoba, and he was opposed by Mr. Bertrand, a gentleman brought forward by the Government of Manitoba, and supported with all the influence that Government could give him, in opposition to the gentleman so nominated. And, Sir, what happened? Why, not only was the person opposed to the Manitoba Government elected by a large majority, but, during the contest their own candidate came out and placarded the district with declarations that he had never been in favour of this settlement. I have only to add that not only was the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Tarte) a little mistaken in assuming that it was going to be ratified by the people who were interested, but I have given the unanimous declaration that this settlement is entirely opposed to their wishes and feelings. But I wish to draw the attention of the First Minister, and of other hon. gentlemen in this House who have never sympathized with the claim of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, to a very important feature of this measure. While this Bill gives nothing that the Roman Catholic minority were deprived of, while this Bill gives nothing that was asked for by them, it does give them a number of things that were not asked for, and that are outside of anything that the Roman Catholics enjoyed in the province of Manitoba up to the time of the passage of the Act of 1890. I draw the attention of the House to the fact that just as the minority were able to go to the highest tribunal in the Empire and get the legislation of 1890 condemned, and obtain the declaration that it had taken away rights which belonged to the minority, so now the moment this Bill becomes law you are going to have a number of new and additional claims that were not enjoyed by the Roman Catholics previous to 1890; you are going to have those put upon the Statute-book of Manitoba; and as soon as that Bill becomes law the minority can go to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and claim that their rights have been extended to the extent, whatever it may be, of any privileges that may be conceded. The hon. gentleman smiles, because he thinks that one part of my argument somewhat antagonizes the other; but that is taking too superficial a view of the question. What the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba claimed was, that the rights they enjoyed under the law of 1890 were not restored to them, you have not given them anything that they claimed, you have not restored to them a single right that was taken away from them, according to the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But you have created new and additional rights outside of those, so that they are in a position not only to reject any settlement, not only to fall back upon the claim given them under that judgment of the Privy Council as their right, but they are in a position to add to that these new things you have put on the Statute-book, under the Manitoba Act which says that any concession made by the local legislature to a minority can never be withdrawn. They are in a position to press for these in addition to all there was before.

Now, Sir, I have very little more to add upon this question. No person would rejoice more sincerely than myself if this question were settled once and for ever. No person would be more delighted than myself if the First Minister had been able to effect a settlement of this question that would be regarded as a just, fair and honourable settlement of the claim that, under the law and constitution of the country, as declared by the highest tribunal in the Empire, these people were entitled to. But, Sir, that is not the case, as I have shown. A settlement that does not give substantial justice, that does not meet the case, in my judgment ought not to be dignified by the name of a settlement. It may be forced upon the minority, they may be weak, they may be unable to resist, and a variety of causes may be brought into operation that will prevent them from obtaining their rights. But I am now speaking upon the position of the question in the abstract. My predecessor, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, when this judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was given, felt bound to bring forward a measure that was, in his judgment, calculated to carry out what the law and constitution of the country demanded, as declared by the highest tribunal in the Empire. I need not remind the House that, as representing the Government in this branch of the legislature, I submitted a Bill for that purpose. I need not remind the House that there was no effort I could make that was not made, that I put forth the most strenuous efforts possible, not only on the floor of this House, but with members of the party, individually as well as collectively, for the purpose of carrying that measure to a successful conclusion. The First Minister knows that the measure was not defeated for the want of a majority in this House, for we had an overwhelming majority ready to carry it. The hon. gentleman knows that the great body of his supporters left him on that occasion, and again and again their names are found on the Journals in opposition to the hon. gentleman, and are recorded as opposed to the obstruction by which that Bill was prevented from becoming law. As I say, when I was called upon to form an Administration, believing as I did, whether rightly or wrongly, according to the best light and information I possessed, that a wrong had been done to the minority of Manitoba, and that the Government of the country were bound to right that wrong in accordance with the provisions of the constitution, I went boldly to the country and, notwithstanding the great cleavage, that great division, in the party with which I had the honour to be connected, notwithstanding all the clamour, and agitation, and prejudice that were incited throughout the country on this question, in the faithful discharge of what I conceived to be my duty, I went forward and staked the existence of my Government upon that measure. Well, Sir, as the hon. gentleman knows, I failed, and the hon. gentleman knows how I failed. He knows that the language which he held, standing on this side of the House as leader of the Opposition, directed to the Protestant portion of the community of this country, was entirely at variance with the language which he held when he came face to face with his own constituents in St. Rochs at Quebec; and the hon. gentleman knows that he there committed himself to the unqualified declaration that if he obtained power he would go further than I had gone. The hon. gentleman knows that he declared that if he failed in obtaining by conciliation the passage of a measure by the Manitoba legislature that would do full justice to his fellow-countrymen, he would fall back upon the law and the constitution, and give them their rights in their entirety. The language is fresh in the hon. gentleman's mind, as well as in my own, but lest he might think that I am giving, perhaps, a strong colouring to the attitude he assumed on that question, I will give him the opinion and declaration publicly made during the campaign, at a meeting at Brockville, by the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy). Speaking of the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Laurier), he said :

He, too, is a coercionist in the last resort. He has said that the touch should be gentle but the hand firm. He has said, in effect, that if separate schools are not restored by provincial action, they must be re-established by federal coercion. And I am more alarmed for Mr. Laurier's position because of the Mowat alliance. That alliance, the speech of Mr. Ross at Orangeville, the speeches of Mr. Laurier himself, all point in one direction—if the Liberals come into power an attempt is to be made to conciliate Manitoba in the first instance, and if that effort fails, as fail it must, then the firm hand of coercion is to be applied.

That is the declaration of one of the hon. gentleman's allies, one of his supporters, a gentleman who has contributed very largely to bringing him into power, and I therefore take it that his opinion will not be questioned. But whatever means were taken, the hon. gentleman knows that the support for which I had a right to look, both from a public standpoint and upon the question of principle, from the province of Quebec, I did not receive. The hon. gentleman is perfectly well aware that the question of race, if nothing else, proved stronger than the question of religion. But whatever the cause may be, the fact remains, that the efforts made by the Government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and the efforts made by myself, and by those of the Liberal-Conservative party who sustained me on that occasion, to restore the rights which had been taken away from the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba, were defeated by the votes of the French Roman Catholics in the province of Quebec.

I do not want to raise any unpleasant controversy on this matter, but, without going into particulars, I draw attention to the fact that a large number of the hon. gentleman's supporters made distinct pledges in order to place themselves in a position to bring the hon. gentleman into power. I ask the hon. gentleman if those pledges have been redeemed. Has the pledge made by the hon. Solicitor General, made in the most solemn manner that a man could make a pledge and on a most solemn and important question, been redeemed by this settlement, which the hon. gentleman boasts through the Speech from the Throne has been made on this question? The hon. gentleman will not say that the pledge given by the hon. member for Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion), or by other hon. gentlemen to whom it is not necessary more particularly to refer, made to the people of Quebec, in the most clear, strong and unqualified manner, that if the hon. gentleman was brought into power, they would withdraw their support from him if he did not carry out faithfully the pledge which the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) declared the hon. gentleman had made in order to obtain the support of the province of Quebec has been fulfilled. I am not now concerned as to how that support was obtained, but only as to the result of that action. The position now is this. In the discharge of what I felt to be a solemn duty that I owed to my country, in the discharge of what I believed to be a duty I owed to maintain the constitution of the country so far as I was able, I, in the most open manner, notwithstanding the antagonism of a large number of my hon. friends, for whose views I entertained the greatest regard, and whose opposition I knew was as conscientious as was my view in maintaining the opinions I did—I at very great risk as a public man, went forward to vindicate what I believed to be demanded in common justice by the minority under the constitution, and I was defeated, and defeated by the votes of the Roman Catholic electors of the province of Quebec. Under these circumstances I do not for a single moment hesitate to say that while my views remain unchanged, the responsibility which rested on the shoulders of Sir Mackenzie Bowell as leader of the Government, and which subsequently rested on my shoulders of dealing with this question as properly became the Government of Canada, now I am happy to say rests on the shoulders of the hon. gentleman opposite. I say more, if the hon. gentleman and his friends can reconcile those most interested in this question to their position and secure their consent to the manner in which they have disposed of the question, then I have not a word to say. No person will be more delighted to find it removed from Parliament once and for ever. I am glad that the responsibility no longer rests on my shoulders, and freed from the responsibility of Government, while my views remain unchanged and my personal opinions will be always maintained, I shall not feel it in the future as in the past incumbent on me to make those exertions that I did make in defending rights, the protection of which under the constitution now rests upon the shoulders of the hon. gentleman who sits opposite. I regret, Mr. Speaker, having been obliged to occupy so much of the time of the House in dealing with a question with which hon. gentlemen are so familiar, but I felt it incumbent upon me to do so, under the circumstances, and as this perhaps might be the only opportunity that might offer of correcting some misapprehensions under which hon. gentlemen opposite seem to labour as to what is the real position of this question.

Sir, I have now great pleasure in passing on to the question of the tariff, which is one of very great interest to the people of Canada, and about which expectation is rife at the present moment. I was a little surprised to find the statement made in the Speech that:

A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and, while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

Sir, I feel as one of those who took an active part in the promulgation of the National Policy, as one who has been a firm supporter of it from that time until now, that it never occupied a prouder or more triumphant position than it occupies to-day. The hon. gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. Russell) referred to the deficit of $300,000 on 1st July, 1896. But I call the attention of the House to the fact that the general election was quite sufficient to account for that deficiency, that the very uncertainty created in the minds of the commercial men of the country as to what might be the result of the election was sufficient to account for the deficit. Every person knows that the bare possibility of a party coming into power which was pledged in the most solemn manner to uproot every vestige of protection and adopt a policy of free trade in this country, was enough to create sufficient commercial disturbance to account for that deficit. But I have no hesitation in saying that the year 1896, when the National Policy had been eighteen years in existence, was the most successful year that Canada has experienced, the fact that the exports, that valuable indication as to what this country is able to export, reached a figure never previously attained was in itself sufficient tribute as to what the National Policy had done for this country and what has been achieved under it. Not only so, but the volume of trade increased in that year by no less than $15,000,000. So if there was ever a time when a satisfactory financial and commercial condition of the country was shown, it was during that year, as established by statistics in relation to the operation of the tariff and the fiscal policy of Canada.

But, from that time, it will be seen that a very unfortunate change has been taking place. Everything has been in favour of the progress of the country, and everything has been in favour of the Government so far as it represents the country. We know that owing to an unhappy visitation of Providence in India, the price of wheat has greatly increased and the farmers of Manitoba and the North-west have been placed in a position of prosperity that they have not enjoyed for many years. Every person knows that the European lumber trade has not been for many years in such a prosperous condition as during the past season. I need not tell what the mineral development of Canada has accomplished. I dare say some of you remember that when on the floor of this House, I was advocating the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, I ventured to predict that the advent of that road in piercing the Rocky Mountains and giving our Pacific province communication with the rest of Canada, would develop a mineral wealth which in a few years would render comparatively insignificant any expenditure that the Government undertook in constructing that road. That development has perhaps come more slowly than many of us hoped, but it has come at last, and now we find the mineral resources of British Columbia attracting the attention of the civilized world. Every country on the globe is now directing its attention, with the keenest interest, to the development of the boundless mineral resources of British Columbia. We know that from the Yukon country come marvellous stories of the discovery of gold, and all through that province; in Alberni, through the Kootenay, the Slo-can and the Rossland and Rainy River districts, vast deposits of rich mineral-bearing ore are being developed. Under these circumstances, I have no hesitation in saying that the commercial condition of Canada to-day should be the most prosperous in the history of our country. But what has prevented us reaping the benefit of all those great advantages which I have enumerated? What has deprived us of the advantages of these great sources of wealth and of the circulation of the money thus brought into this country? Why, Sir, if the First Minister will turn to the columns of the "Globe" he will find there a doleful communication from its Montreal correspondent saying that 400 men are turned out of employment because the rolling mills have been shut down until they know what the tariff it to be. This is only a single instance of what is taking place throughout Canada, and of what has produced a commercial and financial paralysis that has more than discounted all these marvellous advantages which the country has enjoyed in connection with those other resources to which I have referred.

I do not wish to occupy the time of the House at great length, but I must refer briefly to the proposal with reference to the franchise. I need not say how deeply I regret to learn that the Government of this country promises to pass a law which will place the Parliament of Canada in the most humiliating position that any parliament of a civilized country was ever placed in. Sir, that indefeasible right that the members of a great legislature like that of the Dominion of Canada have, the right to provide an electoral Act which will return to this House men on a uniform franchise; that right is to be swept away, and we are to have it placed in the power of half a dozen local legislatures to tamper with the franchise of the Dominion. Is the word "tampered" too strong? Why, Sir, I have in my mind's eye a fact that is known to the Minister of Finance (Mr Fielding), with reference to the manner in which the Nova Scotia legislature acted in connection with the franchise. Why, Sir, before we had a Dominion Franchise avowedly and ostensibly a change was made in the local franchise so as to affect the representation of this Dominion Parliament, and the law embodying that change was repealed before the local elections came on. You propose to adopt the franchises of the various provinces, and under such a system what may occur? Suppose that this Parliament is nearing the end of its term and elections are about to take place, you put it in the power of the provincial legislatures throughout this country to sit down and manufacture a law that will be in the interest of the party to which they belong, and without having any guarantee that that franchise will be one that they will use for elections to their own House. It is possible that such a thing may occur as did occur in the province of Nova Scotia, when they passed an Act for the Dominion elections, and when the Dominion elections were over, they repealed that franchise Act and let the franchise remain as it was previously. I need not waste the time of hon. gentleman in showing that a measure of that kind must, in the nature of things, lower the dignity of this Parliament. Instead of each member of this House feeling as he now feels, that he sits here under the same rights as his brother member, one representative of the people will take a seat in this Parliament under one franchise, and another member of this House will sit under a franchise entirely different. While I would be glad to see some means provided to avoid the large expense that is necessarily attendant upon the Franchise Act as it exists, I feel that it is a very retrograde position for this Parliament to abandon the control of its own franchise, and delegate it to people who may be sitting thousands of miles away, the power to control the franchise under which members to this Parliament should be elected.

Now, Sir, it gives me immense satisfaction to have an opportunity of approving of any proposal of my hon. friend. I express the pleasure with which I find that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) has, I have no hesitation in saying, devoted a great deal of time and a great deal of ability, and a great deal of energy, in the most effective manner to carry out one of the greatest industries that this country possesses. I feel, Sir, that I am only doing justice to that hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) in saying that in doing this he has simply been closely following the course pursued by his predecessors in office, of the late Government. I am quite certain that the Minister of Agriculture will admit on the floor of this House that he finds in Mr. Robertson, a gentleman who was appointed under the late Government, a zealous and efficient officer, who is devoting his great abilities in the most unwearied manner to developing our agricultural industries.

I am delighted to find that the hon. gentleman has grappled with this question of cold storage and other matters connected with his department, with such vigour, and that the Government are making such successful efforts to carry forward the policy of their predecessors. The hon. mover of the Address complained that Halifax had not been made a winter port for ocean steamers. If the hon. gentleman will read the few remarks I addressed to the House last session on the subject of the Fast Atlantic Service, he will find that nothing was left undone which the late Government could do to accomplish that object; and when we went out of office, we had already agreed upon a contract with the Messrs. Allan under which the ships would have been so constructed as to provide ample cold storage, so that the perishable products of this country might be carried to the markets of England in the best possible condition, as well as in the shortest possible time.

There is another point to which I wish to make a single reference—a subject which is a source of just pride and satisfaction to every Canadian; that is, the contribution that Canada has made to the Indian Famine Fund. In this connection, I think the thanks of this House and the thanks of every person in this country are due to the "Star" newspaper, of Montreal, for the enthusiastic manner in which it took that matter up and pressed it from day to day, until to-day it is able to announce that the "Star" fund alone has totalled no less than $50,000. I say that the proprietor of any newspaper who will devote his ability and resources in the manner in which the proprietor of the "Star" has done, in pushing this important work forward, is deserving of, as he will receive, the thanks of this House and the thanks of every patriotic person in Canada.

Now, Sir, reference is made here to the Superannuation Act, and the Civil Service

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Act, and I think it is quite time that we had a reference made to those Acts. I have no hesitation in saying, as I have said on former occasions, that Canada has just reason to be proud of her civil service. I do not believe there is any other country just in the position of Canada—we cannot of course compare our position with that of England—I do not believe there is any other country with a civil service composed of gentlemen of greater ability, industry or devotion to their duties. There may possibly be exceptions here and there; but, as a whole, my experience of the civil service of Canada—and it has been considerable, because I have held office in a good many of the departments here—has increased my respect for its ability, industry and high integrity; and that service has received at the hands of the present Government a most serious, discouraging and damaging blow. If anything could be done to lower the tone of the civil service of this country and to discourage the persons who are discharging the important duties of the service from devoting their best energy and ability to those duties, it is the course which has been pursued by this Government. Why, Sir, talk of superannuation. While superannuation has been attacked and reviled by hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not mean to say that it has not had its weak points—what do we see? We see what has never been seen in this country before—men in the prime of life, of high character and of first-class ability, who occupy the very highest positions in the civil service of the country, obliged to choose between dismissal and being degraded to subordinate positions. Nothing that this Government could do has been left undone to lower the tone of the civil service of Canada. You have had wholesale dismissals without rhyme or reason, from the humblest artisan to persons occupying the highest offices. You have had the nauseating spectacle of the Government of Canada sending out emissaries to search and endeavour to find cause of complaint against civil servants all over this country—in fact, degrading every civil servant, whether he was maintained in his office or dismissed—degrading him in the estimation of the people where he was situated, by the very fact that a man of no position and no authority, neither a Minister nor the representative of a Minister, was sent there as a political spy, to find, if possible, cause for his dismissal. That, in my judgment, is no way to raise the tone of the civil service of Canada or to deal with the important question of superannuation, and I am sure the House will give very careful attention to these questions when they come before us.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope not to be obliged to trouble the House much longer, but I thought I should be consulting the convenience of the House and expediting public business by making a few references to matters that seemed to require a certain amount of notice in the debate on the Address, in order that they might be disposed of. I am sorry not to see the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) in his place as I wanted to call the attention of that hon. gentleman to a statement which he made in a meeting a few evenings ago at Aylmer, in the county of Wright. The hon. gentleman said there that one of the greatest surprises which Sir Charles Tupper and his lieutenant, Mr. Foster, would meet with would be the sight of a band of politicians loyally carrying out their promises. I perfectly agree with the hon. gentleman, for there is nothing that would give me such a tremendous surprise as to see hon. gentlemen opposite carrying out their promises. Adding to the hon. gentleman's statement what no doubt he intended, the word "Liberal," I must say that it is one which I thoroughly endorse. I go further, and I say that the record of the Liberal party in this country is one of violated promises. I have a tolerably good memory, and I am not at this moment able to recollect one single instance in which they have carried out their promises.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The hon. gentleman has a lively imagination.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, that is where I fail. The hon. gentleman entirely surpasses me in that respect. He has a brilliant imagination while I am obliged to keep down to the dry level of matter of fact. As reported in the "Citizen," the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that the charge was made that the Liberals had no policy and no intentions. That statement I also endorse. I plead guilty to having made that charge myself, and I now repeat that, so far as my experience goes, the Liberal party have no policy and have no intentions except to keep themselves in office by changing their policy as often as is necessary for that purpose. The hon. gentleman said:

I can tell you that within a week of the opening of Parliament we shall produce our Budget and our tariff, and we shall give Sir Charles Tupper one of the surprises of his life.

As I have just said, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing that could give me a more complete surprise than anything in the shape of an accord between Liberal principles, Liberal professions and Liberal practices.

I now draw the attention of the House to a very important matter, concerning which the Liberal party put themselves on record in the Journals of this House, and that is a specific denunciation by them of Governor General's warrants. They tabled a resolution and recorded their names in support of the declaration that one of the most unjustifiable things that any Government could be guilty of was to use the warrant of the Governor General for any purpose except to meet unforeseen and unprovided expenditures. Yet these gentlemen were not warm in their seats—I do not know that they had even entered this House—when they asked the Governor General to sign his name to an authority to draw between one million and two million dollars out of the public revenue for services which His Excellency himself had declared, over his own signature, were perfectly foreseen. If that is carrying out in practice the principles they professed in Opposition, I am at a loss to see it.

I shall not further detain the House on that point, but shall take up the question of economy. For eighteen long years the Liberal party had denounced the Liberal-Conservative Government and party for wild extravagance, and declared to the people that in order to have an economical administration of affairs in Canada the people should clothe them with authority to deal with the public business of the country. Well, the country at last took them at their word. With what result? Why, before last session rose the House was startled by finding that this economical Administration, this party which had come into office pledged to the most rigid economy, actually demanded and obtained from their confiding supporters a vote of nearly three million dollars more than had ever been asked for by any Government in this country. What more? Why, they have been in power eight months, and the House will be startled, if hon. members have not already seen it, to learn what the condition of public affairs is already, so far as economy is concerned. I have already said that the small deficit at the close of last year, was due to the paralysis of business caused by the uncertainty attending a general election, when it was possible that the Liberal party, would come into power and sweep away the fiscal policy of the country. But that small deficit was about offset by the increase in the revenue from the 1st of July, 1896, to the 30th September, 1896. The revenue of the previous year amounted to $8,610,564, and from the 1st of July, 1896, to the 1st of September, 1896, it was $8,846,208, showing an increase of $235,644, or nearly sufficient to offset deficit at the end of the year. Hon. gentlemen opposite may say: Yes, but we were in power. So they were, but the effect of their being in power had not yet come into operation, because the revenue is derived from the customs tariff, and the purchases of goods had been previously made, so that this increase of revenue was due to the business transacted before these hon. gentlemen came into power. Let me now take the commencement of the period from which their advent to office would operate on the revenue of the country, and what do I find? In the five months from October, 1895, to the 28th of February, 1896, the revenue was $15,260,598. The revenue for the same period, after they came into power, fell to $14,225,340, or a decrease of $1,035,258, a marked and striking decline down to the latest period for which we have the calculations of revenue. Well, Mr. Speaker, what about the expenditure? What did this economical Government do with regard to the expenditure for the corresponding period, during which the decrease in revenue was assuming rather alarming proportions? The expenditure from the 1st of July, 1895, to the 1st of September, 1895, was $5,537,627. The expenditure for the same period in 1896 was $4,662,321, or a decrease of expenditure in 1896, during that period, as compared with 1895, of $875,276. Then the expenditure from October, 1895, to the 20th of February, 1896, was $15,840,246. The expenditure for the same period from October, 1896, to February, 1897, the five months from which the present Government are directly responsible, was $17,600,495, or an increase of $1,760,249. In other words, during the first three months of the fiscal year the revenue increased $235,644, and the expenditure decreased $875,276, while for the last five months of the fiscal year the revenue decreased $1,035,258, and the expenditure increased $1,760,249. So that, making a moderate calculation, this House is face to face with a deficit, in the first years of the administration of this Government, of not less than something like three million dollars. That is the evidence which these hon. gentlemen have given of their readiness to carry out in office the pledges they made to the country when in Opposition. I could not give a more striking evidence of the contrast between Liberal professions and Liberal practice than the manner in which the moment they have obtained power, they have thrown to the winds everything like pledges of economy and adopted a course completely at variance with those pledges. Then, I would like to ask the House whether they do not remember that for a long series of years the late Government were charged with doing public works by private tender. I would ask you if there is any subject in which the members of the Liberal party have been more often or more plainly put on record than with reference to this. You will search in vain the records of past Liberal-Conservative Administrations in this country for anything like the violation of the principle of public tender that has marked the administration of the present Government, and when the papers are laid upon the Table I think that that will be abundantly shown.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Again, this country has rung with their denunciations of dismissals from office. The journals of the House show that the hon. Prime Minister, when sitting on this side, asked his followers to support him in denouncing the dismissal from office of an officer of this House who had grossly and on a public platform insulted a member of the Administration, the present Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec (Sir Adolphe Chapleau). But to-day dismissals from office are so numerous that the country rings with the clamour arising from them. Officers are dismissed, whether high or low, and whatever their past service may have been. All that is necessary is the clamorous demand of a hungry office-seeker to induce the Government to drive out the best, the most devoted, the most intelligent, and most respectable men in the civil service of the country. The Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) just before the House rose last session and when my mouth was closed upon the subject, read a letter behind which the Government proposed to shield themselves. He had found, during the long period of eighteen years, a single instance in which I had dismissed an officer on the Intercolonial Railway, and this treasure which he had exhumed he brought forward and held up for the admiration of his followers. At last here is a case in which the Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) had actually dismissed a railway official for taking too strong and conspicuous part in an election. I have had an opportunity of investigating that matter, and I am prepared to prove to the House that the person who was dismissed on that occasion was dismissed in consequence of having actually resorted to physical force at a public meeting in support of his political views, and that, I think, will be regarded as about as strong an evidence of what you call "offensive partisanship" as it is possible to find. So I make the hon. gentleman a present of that case; and I wish he was able to say that he had refrained from the dismissal of public officers to the same extent as I did when I held the office that he now holds. But I was referring to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) for he is a very bold man. I say it to his credit. He is always ready to stand up and defend his views in a very forcible and energetic manner. But among all the brave and bold things that the hon. gentleman has ever done during his public career, I think that the throwing down of the challenge contained in that portion of his Aylmer speech which I have just read, is the boldest. I think we might shorten the debate upon the contrast between the promises and practices of the Liberal party if the hon. gentleman would rise and state one case in which the Liberal party has carried out in power the principles they professed while in Opposition. I have sought far and wide, I have examined most diligently into their records, and I am unable to find one single instance in the whole of their career in which their practice has not been in diametrical opposition to their promises. I have instanced the case of dismissals from office. The House will appreciate that when I give an instance in which, according to my judgment, the Government have been guilty of one of the deepest wrongs to Canada. Mr. Speaker, you can imagine my astonishment, when, in London, I took up the morning papers and found the announcement that the gentlemen who had served Canada faithfully for forty years—served both Liberal and Conservative Governments—to the great advantage of the people, had been dismissed from the office of solicitors to the Government, and a young man, comparatively unknown, appointed in their place. I say that this exhibits an utter recklessness of everything that is due to the people of Canada and to the character of its Government, such as I could not have believed possible for them to do, had I not seen it with my own eyes. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) knows these gentlemen well, he has had their services again and again, and I need not say to him that no solicitors are to be found in the great city of London of higher standing, of greater integrity, or more able efficiently to serve the interest of Canada than Messrs. Bompas, Bischoff & Co. Yet when I found it announced broadcast—and a very unprofessional thing, I am told, it is to do—in the morning journals of London that these eminent solicitors, who for forty years had served all the Governments of Canada ably and well, had served Mr. Mackenzie's Government with the same fidelity that they did all the others, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce well knows, when I found this ancient and honourable firm ruthlessly swept aside and a young man, Mr. Russell, put in their place, I was greatly astonished. Whatever Mr. Russell's abilities may be, he can have no standing, no position, from his years, as these gentlemen have; still I have no doubt that for the purpose for which he was appointed to the office, he may be infinitely better calculated to serve this Government than the eminent firm whose services have been dispensed with. No doubt, Sir, that as an emissary to Rome, or as representative of the Government of Canada at the Vatican, Mr. Russell will suit their purposes infinitely better than the well-known firm of Bompas, Bischoff & Co.; and that, Sir, is the only justification that can be given for the wrong done, not to these gentlemen—that is a matter of utter insignificance to them—but the wrong done to Canada, and to the reputation of the Canadian Government everywhere.

Now, Sir, these hon. gentlemen opposite have found great fault with the Superannuation Act, and I see an hon. gentleman before me, one of the most important of whose duties it was to attack the Government in their dealing with this subject, and no doubt occasionally with some good ground, for straining the purpose of the Superannuation Act. But I ask that hon. gentleman, I ask every hon. gentleman in this House, whether it was ever in his power to bring forward instances of young, able and efficient men, men brought into the public service for their high attainments and ability to serve the public, being dismissed from office under a pretense of superannuation, and charging them upon the public revenues of the country. I give that to my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) as another instance in which an utter disregard of principle has been exhibited, and in which promise and performance have been signally different.

There is another very important subject to which I will refer. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have been long in this House, know that the late Government were again and again attacked—and it is possible there may have been occasionally some foundation for it—for violating the cardinal principle embodied in the Statute-book in regard to holding simultaneous elections. The whole object of simultaneous polling in the elections is to prevent an unfair advantage being taken by either party; the object of simultaneous polling is to prevent the Government in power being able to select constituencies in which to run certain elections with the view of influencing them by the result of public sentiment in other constituencies. That principle was swept away, and the principle of simultaneous polling was adopted, that is, having every election in Canada held on the same day so far as possible. That is one of the dearest and most important rights of the people. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman who seconded the Address here to-day, although I regret to say I could not follow him as closely as I could have wished, made a great boast as to the manner in which the policy of the Prime Minister had been sustained in the province of Quebec. Well, I am prepared to challenge that hon. gentleman and his Government with having been afraid to appeal to a fair and honest expression of sentiment in the province of Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, hon. gentlemen may laugh, but they cannot alter the records. I ask them why was Champlain vacant for months, and yet elections were sprung in Bonaventure before the late member was scarcely cold in his grave? I ask, why was an election sprung in the widely extended county of Wright when large bodies of the electors were not at home, and others could not be reached in the brief time that was at their disposal, when the Government had had all the opportunity of carefully preparing their intrenchments and getting everything ready for battle? I want to know why Champlain was left open. Why was Colchester, in Nova Scotia, left open? The county of Colchester is entitled to have its representative on the floor of this House to-day. The seat had been vacant for months, and yet the writ was only issued a few days ago. Why was Champlain and Colchester left vacant for months, when elections were suddenly sprung in Bonaventure and Wright? Sir, I will tell you why. It was because the hon. leader of the Government wished to take an unfair advantage of the public sentiment of the country, because he was afraid to act with even-handed justice between the two parties in this country. That was the reason, and there can be no other. The hon. member boasts of what he has achieved in the county of Bonaventure. Sir, when that matter is investigated, as investigated it will be, no doubt, it will be found that the result is no triumph for the Government, but the very reverse. In the county of Bonaventure the Baie des Chaleurs Railway had been opened. I was applied to to open the Baie des Chaleurs Railway before the elections; I submitted the question to the Minister of Justice as to whether this Government had power to make any arrangements for opening the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I may say that the application came to me from the First Minister of Quebec, who wanted that railway put into operation; and the Minister of Justice stated that without the authority of Parliament it would be illegal for the Intercolonial to operate the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, and consequently we had to forego any advantage that could be gained by giving the people of that section of the country those railway facilities. Well, these gentlemen in office have no such trouble, the law is a matter of secondary consideration to them, and they opened the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. But what more? Why, Sir, the moment that vacancy occurred by the death of our late lamented friend, Mr. Fauvel, the election is sprung upon the county, an extensive county, the inhabitants of which are spread over a great extent of country, and the Government were in a position to say: See what we have done for you, we have opened the Baie des Chaleurs Railway, if you will elect our man we will extend this railway down through your county. But worse than that, the Government, having power to control the fishery licenses there, gave out that the men who opposed this Government should be deprived of their fishery licenses. Then what did you get? I am astonished that the hon. seconder of the motion for the adoption of the Address should have ventured to mention in this House the subject of the Bonaventure election. Talk about a Janus-face or double-face policy! The most scandalous double-faced policy was adopted by the hon. gentleman who carried the county of Bonaventure. What did he do? He issued two addresses. The time was short. There is a large Protestant vote, amounting to something like 1,000, and there is a still large Roman Catholic vote. The hon. gentleman issued an address to the Protestant electors, saying: I call upon you Protestants to stand by me—I am not giving the words, but the substance—because I am flouting the bishops and the priests to their faces; I have refused to take anything but an independent position. I have refused the advice of the bishops as to giving a pledge in regard to the school question, and I am entitled to your support for the manly and independent course I am pursuing. While the hon. gentleman took that position as regards the English voters, this Janus-faced politician turned around to the French electors and issued an address to them, in which he pointed out that he was opposed to the Conservative party because they had not accepted, but had treated with contumely, the advice of the revered episcopacy of Quebec. If hon. gentlemen opposite think they can obtain credit for getting public sentiment behind them by acting in this fashion, I do not agree with them. The intelligent people of this country will feel that, so far as the Bonaventure election is concerned, hon. gentlemen opposite have no reason to plume themselves upon the result.

A word now with regard to the Wright election. What do you find? Mr. Devlin, who, on the floor of this House, delivered one of the most able and eloquent philippics in opposition to the course adopted by the present Prime Minister to which he ever listened, joined issue with the hon. gentleman on the question of the Manitoba schools. Mr. Devlin was able to secure his election because he was able to show the Catholic electors of Wright that his leader had pledged himself in the most solemn manner that, if he could not obtain full rights and justice for the minority in Manitoba by persuasive methods, he would fall back on the law and the constitution to give them their rights in their entirety. But as Mr. Devlin felt himself unable to support his leader on the floor of this House, and as he shrank, as a man would naturally shrink, from meeting Parliament again and going back on the pledge given to his electors to stand fast to his trust, if they would re-elect him—finding he was in a position in which he could not come here to defend his course and support his leader, he placed his resignation in his hands—for a consideration. I wonder whether the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) is within the sound of my voice. I am sorry to disturb his slumbers, but I must recall to that hon. gentleman that I believe he introduced a Bill in this House to make it a penal offence for a member of Parliament to accept an office from the Government which he was supporting; and I call his attention to the fact that, in vulgar parlance, his supporter and friend, Mr. Devlin, sold out, rather than come here and stand in the presence of Parliament, where he had proved himself to be one of the most able defenders of the minority of Manitoba, and support the present leader of the House. What was done then? It appears that the Government had ample knowledge of all these facts. They, however, kept the secret, and suddenly in that constituency, extending over hundreds of miles and embracing points which it is almost impossible to reach, they rushed an election in the very shortest time possible. But that is not the worst feature. In the history of Canada hon. members cannot point to such a scandal as marked the conduct of that election. What was it? The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) let a contract privately for putting a covering upon the Western Block, and, having let this contract to Mr. Bourque, that contractor had electors of Hull brought over here by the hundred and paid out of the public treasury of Canada—because their work has to be paid for by the Government—voters, I say, were brought over here by hundreds—350 in all, I am told—when an Ottawa man could not get a day's work, and they were found smoking and sunning themselves in groups of fifties. If there was work for them to do, why were they dismissed by the hundred the day after the Wright election? That was one of the most daring, one of the most flagrant violations of election law ever witnessed, and one of the most flagrant that, I trust, ever will be witnessed in Canada.

I will not go into the particulars respecting the election in the county of Brant, although the statement made by the late representative are enough to make one's hair stand on end. The statements that are put before me by the late member go to prove this, and I am certain that hon. gentlemen who had the opportunity of meeting the late representative, Mr. Henry, will admit that the House lost in him one of its most able and valuable members. That gentleman reports the means resorted to in order to carry Brant, where the majority had been given at the general election against one of the most able and respected members of this House, the present Controller of Customs, and hon. members know that if there is one man calculated to poll the last vote that could be honestly polled in that constituency, it is the present Controller; and when we find that such devices could be used by the Government to enable them to poll a heavy vote the other way a few months afterwards, the inference is obvious. But it is not on inference I go. Mr. Henry will be able to show, and will show, that no voters of the Liberal party in that constituency had died for many years past who were not polled on that day, that the personation of voters was resorted to to an extent that I would be ashamed almost to mention on the floor of this House, in view of the disrepute into which it would tend to bring Parliament. I am quite certain that public opinion manufactured in that fashion will not be very valuable to hon. gentlemen or to any person who has to resort to such measures.

Sir, there is another subject that hon. gentlemen opposite have been very long and loud in denouncing, that is, the National Policy and retaliation. Where is the question of the National Policy and retaliation now? Why, Sir, I need not tell the House that one of the standing charges of hon. gentlemen opposite was as to the impropriety of and absolute folly of any suggestion of retaliation on our great neighbours to the south. Take up the press of the Liberal party now; take up the interviews of the Ministers now; and what do you find? You find that retaliation is the trump card they are playing. They have stolen our clothes and they are masquerading about in them without a blush upon their faces. I cite that to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) as another instance in which the professions and practices of the Liberal party are entirely at variance. During the last session of Parliament it was my painful duty to offer some strictures upon the action of the First Minister in regard to his interview with the reporter of the Chicago "Record." The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) will remember that I ventured to insinuate that for him to unbosom his mind to a Chicago reporter was not the best mode of diplomacy, and was calculated to lead to the impression that Canada was in a very bad state. What has that action of the Prime Minister been followed up by? It has been followed by a mission to Washington of hon. members of this Government at a time when there was no United States Government for them to meet; and what was the result? Why, before the gentlemen had returned they received their answer. They have got the Dingley Bill, they have got the Alien Bill, and they have got the Republican Club of New York publishing all the arguments used by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves when they were denouncing us; in order to show to the people of the United States that Canada is now in the most deplorable financial position and that all that is necessary is for the United States to jump on us while we are in that prostrate condition, to compel us to bow to their own terms. There is another instance of the profession and practice of the Liberal party being at variance. These gentlemen opposite have told the people of this country that all that was necessary to obtain favourable and friendly relations with the United States was to put the Liberal party in power. There never was anything more unfounded than the insinuation that the Liberal Conservative party were not always disposed to treat the American nation and the American Government with the utmost consideration. The people of Canada have been told time and time again by hon. gentlemen opposite, that if they wanted friendly relations with the United States, and if they wanted a reciprocity treaty, the only way to obtain it was to put the Liberals in power. Well, they are in power now, and they have gone to the Chicago reporter with the interview, and they have gone down to Washington to interview public men, and they have come back, and the evidence is to the fore that instead of friendly relations with the United States we have never had graver cause to complain of our most vital interests being attacked, and formidably attacked, than we have at the present time by reason of the course pursued by the United States.

I would like my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Davies) to tell me how it would be possible to carry out the promises of the Liberal party. He tells me that it is going to be one of the surprises of my life to find the Liberal party, within a week, bring down their budget and their tariff, and exhibiting to the world the magnificent spectacle of a body of Liberal politicians carrying out their promises. Well, Sir, if they do carry out their promises, I can assure the hon. Minister that it will astonish me tremendously and be one of the surprises of my life. If they want to give us one of the greatest possible surprises, they will astound us in the last degree by carrying out their promises. Let me call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to what he said in 1893. These were his remarks then :

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubts or difficulties there may have been about our trade policy in times past, there is none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be won between free trade and protection.

Sir, was the last contest between free trade and protection ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it was not, and the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows it, and he knows too that the promise he made was falsified by his party. He declared that the battle was to be between free trade and protection, but free trade was thrown overboard and the effort was made, and successfully made, to climb on to the protectionist platform. The hon. gentleman spoke on the 4th January, 1896, and the words are hardly cold yet, because all the words come so burning from the lips of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies), that they preserve their warmth for a length of time. He then said :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

A seventeen and a-half or twenty per cent tariff was high enough to give protection to the manufacturer. If it were not the manufacturer should go down.

Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) tell me that he is going to say that next week when the budget comes down. Is he going to say to the manufacturers of this country that they must take a 17½ per cent or a 20 per cent tariff, or go down. The hon. gentleman knows he will not say it, and he knows that it was an idle boast of the most glaring kind to tell the people of Aylmer that such a sight was to be expected on the floor of this House as a body of Liberal politicians carrying out their promises. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) added to the last declaration of his, which I have quoted :

The policy of the Liberal party on the contrary is a reform of the tariff by the elimination from it of every vestige of protection.

Is that to be their policy ? Will this tariff which they will bring down do that ? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davies) need not be so reticent now, because his hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) from whom a few months ago wild horses would not draw a word in reference to the tariff, has unbosomed himself to some gentlemen connected with the coal industry in the city of Montreal, and he has announced what the policy of his Government is going to be. I do not quite understand the mode in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) reached his conclusion, but I would like to know which promise is to be carried out ; whether it is the promise of the Minister of Finance that coal shall be protected or the promise of the First Minister, made and reiterated to the electors of Montreal, that coal should be made free. You cannot carry them both out. The hon. gentleman will find that no legerdemain will reconcile both of these policies. My own belief is that the policy of the First Minister will be carried out. I believe that coal will be made free, and I believe it because the hon. gentleman pointed out, in an elaborate argument to the people of Montreal, that great manufacturing centre, that his object was not to injure the manufacturers, and that whatever he was obliged to reduce, of the protection which the manufacturers had, would be more than made up to them by the free coal and the free iron he would give to them. Therefore, I take it that the only means by which the hon. gentleman can carry out his pledges to the electorate of Canada—pledges given before he obtained his present position—and his assurances to the manufacturers and the great railway interests of this country, that coal would be made free, is by falsifying the declarations made by the Minister of Finance the other day at Montreal, in somewhat equivocal terms, that, while they were very desirous of going in the direction of reducing the tariff on coal, if the United States increased their duty, they would be obliged, not only to maintain the duty on bituminous coal, but to tax anthracite coal as well. Here is the declaration made by the Finance Minister. I will read his words :

If, however, your view is correct, and it turns out that the United States duty is raised to a high figure, then we shall claim and exercise the right to revise our views respecting this Canadian duty, and we shall feel bound to impose a duty not only on bituminous coal but also on anthracite coal, which at present comes into our markets from the States free of duty. We should much prefer, however, to move in the other direction, and we shall still hope that nothing may occur at Washington to prevent us carrying out our desire.

Now, Sir, I want to know if the hon. Finance Minister had the authority of the hon. First Minister to make that declaration. I have a right to know that, when we have public declarations of policy absolutely and completely contradictory from the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance. "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die." I want to know what is to be the fact. My own impression is that this interview in Montreal was manufactured for the Nova Scotia market. The hon. First Minister laughs; but he will, perhaps, permit me to give him my reason for that opinion. The Nova Scotia legislature does not expire by efflux of time until the spring of 1898. It has been dissolved, however, at the most inclement season of the year in the maritime provinces.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no period of the year in which communication throughout the country is so difficult as it is in the present month; and I want to know why the Nova Scotia legislature has been dissolved just on the eve of this new tariff being brought down, if it is not for the purpose of snatching a verdict from the electors while they are blindfolded, and before they know that their interests are to be sacrificed. The hon. Minister of Finance knows well that the party with which he was connected, of which the Hon. Mr. Murray is now the leader, would not have the ghost of a chance to carry the elections in Nova Scotia, if this Government were to repeal the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party of protecting the great coal interests of that province, and he adopts the course of bringing the elections on a year before the end of the term. Did he want to create triennial parliaments? What do you suppose the hon. gentleman's friends down there did? When they were told that their heads were to be cut off ahead of time, they revolted, and a Bill was brought in making the term of the legislature five years instead of four years. That is the way in which matters are carried on by the hon. gentleman's friends in Nova Scotia. Now, I will read the cause assigned for the dissolution of the legislature at that most inopportune time, and this is the most farcical part of the whole proceeding. Here is the manifesto of the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia, putting the whole issue on a Dominion question :

For this reason (and in view of the proposed action of the present United States Congress) the Provincial Government has already distinctly assumed the position that no action ought to be taken by the Federal Government which would in any way imperil this important industry, and I deem it fitting and proper, before any action is taken in regard to fiscal legislation affecting coal, that the voice of the people of Nova Scotia should be heard upon this issue. This is one of the reasons which influenced the electorate at this early period.

What has the hon. gentleman got to say to that? Instead of requiring an opinion of the people, he knows that the people of Nova Scotia are a unit on this question. He knows that there is at the present moment in the province of Nova Scotia no man who is not prepared to stand up and defend the protection of the great coal industry of Nova Scotia; and he knows, too, that if this Government wanted to strengthen the hands of their party in the local elections of Nova Scotia, there is no means by which they could do it so completely as by protecting that industry. Were it intended to carry out the suggestions which the Minister of Finance has thrown out here, I say there would have been no election in Nova Scotia at present. Instead of closing up the House in a great hurry and dissolving it, if they had wanted to give advice to the Parliament of Canada, they would have had a unanimous vote of the legislature; for there has never been in that House, as the hon. gentleman knows, any one who has not been in favour of the protection of coal except his own party. But they have been converted; and I ought to be a very proud man, and the great party to which I belong ought to be very proud, to find this great rush of converts to our arms on the national policy. Why, the hon. gentleman himself was, a short time ago, for free coal. He was an out and out free trader. But he is, I am happy to say, gradually improving, and I fully expect to have the pleasure of giving a hearty and enthusiastic support to a tariff to protect Canadian industries, which we may look for at his hands at a very early day. But so far as the coal industry of Nova Scotia is concerned, I believe that the hon. Finance Minister will prevail, and that the coal interests of Nova Scotia will be sacrificed. The hon. gentleman hopes, however, that before his policy is announced, the elections, which have been so rapidly rushed to a conclusion, will be over, and that the Government will have snatched a verdict from the people of Nova Scotia while these people are blindfolded.

The House will be glad to know that I do not intend to detain them any further. I must apologize for having taken up so much time, but I must say this, and it is the only other remark I shall make before sitting down. Hon. gentlemen opposite will find no obstruction or vexatious opposition on any question from this side of the House. They may rely, with the utmost confidence, on the support of every hon. gentleman on this side in every measure calculated to foster and promote the great industries of this country or the prosperity of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is to me more than an ordinary pleasure to add my own to the congratulations which my hon. friend has most generously and most fairly and deservedly bestowed upon my hon. friends who moved and seconded the Address. My hon. friend who moved the Address (Mr. Russell) comes from a province which has long been acknowledged as the classic ground of oratory in British North America. He showed us last session, and has shown us again to-day, that the soil of Nova Scotia is as classic as it ever was. He has shown us that the fame which that province has acquired it still retains, and that, in this as in other respects, it shows no signs of degeneration. With regard to my hon. friend from Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), those of us who had the privilege of following his remarks can testify to the fact that he acquitted himself in a manner most creditable to himself and most creditable to his electors.

Now, with regard to the speech which has just been delivered by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), the least I can say of it is that it certainly showed that my hon. friend is not in a very happy frame of mind. There were certain portions of it which, I must say, and I say it with very great pleasure, indeed, were certainly commendable. What he said with reference to the fact that the position which I now occupy may compel me to go to the other side of the water in order to take part in the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee this year, was not only courteous but very generous indeed, and I am happy to tender the hon. gentleman this expression of my sincere gratitude.

But there were other parts of the hon. gentleman's speech which were not at all couched in the same style. There were other parts which showed that the hon. gentleman had severely cudgelled his brains in order to find some ground of attack against the present Administration, and the method which he followed is not altogether peculiar to the hon. gentleman. When arguments were deficient, he supplied their place with copious doses of vituperation. When, for instance, he spoke of inquiries into charges against officers of the civil service, he made use of the terms emissaries and spies, and later on, if I remember rightly, spoke of ballot stuffing, or if not exactly of ballot stuffing, of election frauds of some kind or another. And as he spoke in this strain, I was reminded of the language applied by one of the recent American poets to a vituperative orator who was stumping Morgan county:

He held the banner upwards from trailing in the dust,
He cut loose from monopolies, and cussed and cussed and cussed.

My hon. friend devoted a good part of the speech, I am afraid, to cussing and cussing and cussing. When he spoke of superannuations and of the civil service, I listened to him, I must say, with some interest, for he dared to utter the words emissaries and spies. This is, I am afraid, the only reward we may expect at the hands of the Opposition for having been generous in our treatment. We announced on the floor of Parliament last session that no member of the civil service, whether of the inside or outside service, would be dismissed, except for cause. We declared that every man against whom a charge was brought would have an opportunity of defending himself before a court of inquiry. We appointed commissioners, to investigate charges against members of the civil service, and all the reward we have at this moment is that honourable men, discharging their duty faithfully, are called by my hon. friend emissaries and spies. Sir, the temptation might be great not to be generous. The temptation might be great to recall those spies and emissaries, as the hon. gentleman describes those men who are dealing justly and honourably with the members of the civil service, on the charges brought. But we shall not do that. We shall be generous as well as just and fair. What we have done and are doing, we shall continue to do. We shall dismiss no man except for cause. Every charge shall be investigated and justice be done, but no mercy shall be shown to a delinquent officer.

The hon. gentleman, proceeding with his remarks, said that he would be very much astounded indeed if he saw a Liberal Administration carrying their principles into practice. Why, Sir, he has had that spectacle already. At this very moment he has the spectacle of the Liberal party carrying into practice the principles it professed in opposition. In opposition we pledged ourselves to appeal the infamous Franchise Act, and that is the very first thing we are doing. I am very sorry this reform does not commend itself to the judgment of my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman used, in reference to this matter, some very strong language. I do not care to discuss it at this moment, because not later than next Monday the Bill will be introduced, and we shall have it up for its second reading at an early date. But if the Franchise Act is the palladium of our liberties, which the hon. gentleman says it is, if without it the federal system cannot be worked, how is it that hon. gentlemen opposite did not dare to apply that Act as often as it should have been applied? How is it they were ashamed and afraid to apply it? It has been in force during ten long years, and under it there should have been a revision of the lists every year. Nevertheless we had but four revisions, and in this House during the last Parliament, when the then Minister of Justice announced that there would be no revision of the lists, he was greeted with cheers, not only from this side but from his own followers. Well, we are going to revert to the system which was in force during the first twenty years of confederation, a system which worked most admirably, and against which there never was a murmur. We are going to revert to that system, and abolish the one which was never accepted with any sense of security even by those who supported it. From that point my hon. friend passed to the reform of the tariff. Well, I shall follow the example of my hon. friend in this matter by not saying much about it. To that extent I shall follow him. But I shall endeavour to say the little that I have to say in fewer words than my hon. friend employed. My hon. friend is in doubt as to what will be the character of the reform of the tariff, and he says that the country also is in doubt. I take issue with him; the country is not in doubt as to the nature of the reform of the tariff which we are to bring in. True, there are a few doubting Thomases on the other side of the House, and the hon. gentleman himself is the chiefest sinner of all. But he cherishes his doubts: he rolls them as sweet morsels under his tongue. As to the character of the reform of the tariff, there is no business man, there is no consumer or producer who is in doubt as to what it will be. It is well known that we will endeavour to alleviate the burdens which now press upon the people, without, at the same time impairing any of the interests which now exist. As to gratifying my hon. friends curiosity, the hon. gentleman will not be surprised if I tell him, that this is not the moment for such a course. Everything will come in its time, and when my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) introduces his measures the hon. leader of the Opposition will find it exactly on the lines I have stated. From this point my hon. friend launched into a comparison of expenditure. Upon that point I shall not say much, as it is sufficient for me to recall just one expression to show to the House very forcibly how little there is to answer in what he has said upon that point. He stated in so many words that we had asked for estimates last session which were $3,000,000 more than had ever been asked by any previous Parliament. This statement he made deliberately.

As a matter of fact, we took the estimates of the hon. gentleman himself and for the very same amount. We did not ask $3,000,000 more than had been asked by any Government before when we took the very same estimates that he had asked for himself. Does not the hon. gentleman see how little of force and weight are to be attached to such statements as this? They carry their own refutation. We were told that we should be judged by the expenditure of the money that we were asking Parliament to vote. That is all there is to be said upon that point.

Another statement made by the hon. gentleman I was agreeably surprised to hear him make. That statement was to the effect that simultaneous polling is the privilege and the right of the people. Sir, I welcome that; it is a triumph for the Liberal party to hear such a statement from the hon. gentleman. How many years of agitation and strife did it cost the Liberal party to gain from the Conservative party that simultaneous polling which he says is the right of the people? I want to ask the hon. gentleman whether, when he was sitting on this side, he ever put in practice that principle of simultaneous polling which he now says is necessary in order to maintain the people's liberties. Is it not a fact that when there were by-elections to be held, they were held one after the other, so that the same band of wire-pulling could go from one constituency to another. We believe, as the hon. gentleman professes to believe, in the principle of simultaneous polling, and we have fought for that principle for many years. We believe, that where it is practicable, simultaneous polling is the right of the people, and not only do we believe that, but let me tell the hon. gentleman in answer to what he said a moment ago, that in this as in every other respect we put our principles in practice. Several by-elections were to be held some time ago and we had simultaneous polling, in South Brant, North Ontario, and East Simcoe. My hon. friend asked why we did not have an election in Champlain as well as in Bonaventure. I will give him the facts at once. Bonaventure is populated largely by fishermen, and all the electors there are at home and the election was held at the best time for them. But Champlain is largely a county of lumbermen, and at least one quarter of the electors are in the woods. But we have issued the writs at a time when, the operating season being over, the electors will be back home to vote. I do not know what the result will be, I make no boast. But I have reason to believe that the temper of the people in Champlain is the same as it has been shown to be in Bonaventure, in Wright, and everywhere else throughout the length and breadth of the province of Quebec.

In connection with this, the hon. gentleman ventured to make remarks, which, bold as he is—for I pay him the compliment readily, he is a bold man—I did not expect from him on this occasion. He attempted to speak of frauds in these recent elections. He gave us only words without any proof whatever. But why does he not speak of what took place in Manitoba? We know that the majorities gained by his party in Manitoba were obtained by ballot-stuffing, ballot-scratching, ballot-tampering, such as never was known in any country, not even in New York, in the worst days of Boss Tweed and Tammany Hall. Why, Sir, it is a well known fact that the officers in that election, the men who were to take the votes of the people, were, some of them, jail-birds, convicts escaped from penitentiary, men who should have been in jail instead of recording the votes of a free people. It is a well known fact that there are men actually in jail to-day having been put there because the truth, or rather a part of the truth came to light.

But the hon. gentleman devoted by far the greater part of his speech to the Manitoba school question, and it was indeed a characteristic speech. From the first word to the last it exhibited the policy of the hon. gentleman and those who still adhere to him. The hon. gentleman commenced by stating that the settlement that we had made with the Manitoba Government was not constitutional. He said that it was hardly constitutional for us to say in the Speech from the Throne that a settlement had been arrived at between the two governments. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman means by that, especially in view of the history of the case. But the hon. gentleman has occupied so many positions on this question that, perhaps, I should not be surprised at that which he takes to-day. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that it is not constitutional for the Federal Government and the provincial government of Manitoba to come to a settlement upon that question. Well, if it be not constitutional, I want to know why did the hon. gentleman send commissioners to Winnipeg to negotiate a settlement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. I did not say that it was not within the right and the power of the Federal Government to negotiate with the government of Manitoba; but the point I raised, as a constitutional point, was that the Government of this Dominion have no authority, outside the constitution of the country, to warrant them in making a settlement. They can frame a settlement, and they could announce that they had used their good offices, and that a settlement had been effected with the government of Manitoba; but, in my judgment, there is no warrant for placing themselves in the position of claiming that they had made the settlement.

The PRIME MINISTER. I rather thank the hon. gentleman for the explanation that he has given. I always thought that those negotiations were a sham. In the very words of the hon. gentleman, commissioners were sent by the late Government to Manitoba. If they were not sent to effect a settlement, why were they sent at all? Sir, if the conduct of the hon. gentleman, last winter, when he sent commissioners to Manitoba, was not a sham, his present language is nothing else than a sham. This is the condition in which we find ourselves. The verdict of the people upon this question, taken on the 23rd of June, has put a new face upon it. When we came into power, we approached that question in the only way in which it should have been approached, and if it had been approached in that way first, his country would have been spared the years of agitation which have brought it almost to the verge of civil war. We went to the government of Manitoba and said to them: The legislation of 1890 has inflicted a grievance upon the minority of Manitoba. You have the authority of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that such is the case. Repair the grievance yourselves. Sir, they undertook themselves to repair that grievance. We thought, and still think, and upon that issue I am ready at any time to take the verdict of the country—that the smallest measure of conciliation was far preferable to any measure of coercion. The hon. gentleman says that we obtained no concessions for the minority; he argued no less than forty minutes to prove that we obtained no restoration to the minority of the rights which they had enjoyed before. I care not what he says about that, in view of what he said immediately afterwards. He insisted that we had obtained no restoration of any rights which had been enjoyed by the minority, but in the next breath he says that we have obtained new rights for the minority. I care not whether we obtained a restoration of old rights or a concession of new rights; the only thing I care for is that, whereas, under the Act of 1890, they had not the privilege of teaching their own religion in the schools, by the concessions which have been made, whether they are concessions of new rights or a restoration of old rights, they will have the right hereafter of teaching their own religion in the province of Manitoba. Sir, the hon. gentleman said that the population of the province of Quebec were not satisfied with the settlement. First of all, the hon. gentleman attempted to show that my friends and myself were in contradiction with ourselves, when he stated that here, on the floor of Parliament, I had addressed myself to the Protestants, and going afterwards to the province of Quebec, had addressed myself to the Catholics. I repudiate both assertions. Whether on the floor of Parliament or in the province of Quebec, I addressed myself neither to Protestants nor to Catholics, but I addressed myself to Canadians. The position I took upon this question, I took on the floor of this Parliament, I took it in the province of Ontario, I took it in the province of Quebec, I maintained it everywhere, and it was this: That though the constitution of this country gave to this Parliament and to this Government the right and power of interference with the school legislation of Manitoba, it was an extreme right, a reserved power, to be exercised only when all other means had been exhausted. Well, the moment I found that the people of Manitoba were ready to make concessions which practically restored to the Catholics the right of teaching the French language and of teaching their own religion in the schools, I submitted to my fellow-countrymen in the province of Quebec that it was far better to obtain those concessions by negotiation than to endeavour to obtain them by means of coercion. Sir, that question has been submitted to the electors more than once. It was submitted in Wright, and you have the result by an increased majority. It was submitted in Bonaventure, and you have the result by an increased majority. It was submitted in Cornwall and Stormont, and you have the result there also by an increased majority. Sir, that question will be submitted to the people in other constituencies; and I venture at this moment to say that there is not a man in the province of Quebec, there is not a man in this country, who, looking at the settlement, unbiassed and unprejudiced, will not come to the conclusion that it was a happy solution of a very difficult situation indeed. I am perfectly aware—why should I disguise to myself a thing which stares us in the face?—I know very well that the settlement we have effected is not acceptable to certain high dignitaries in the church to which I belong. But I have every reason to believe, nay, as day after day passes, it becomes more evident, that as the facts are better understood, the conviction will take possession of every breast in this country that, if we are ever to make a nation of Canada, if we are ever to solve successfully any of these difficulties that may arise, we can only solve them in the way expressed in the Speech from the Throne, by mutual concession and reciprocal good will. I might say more, I am quite free to say more. I may say that this settlement is not as advantageous as I desired myself; but I have no hesitation in saying, that though it is not as advantageous as I would have desired myself, still, after six long years of agitation, when the passions of men had been aroused to the highest pitch, it was not possible to obtain more, nor for the government of Manitoba to concede more, under present circumstances.

Mr. LAURIER.

My hon. friend has the audacity—yes, I will use that word—to mention the name of the new member for Bonaventure, Mr. Guité, with some opprobrium. Why, Sir, if there is a man to-day who, in my estimation, occupies a proud position in this country, it is the new member for Bonaventure, a man who maintains his civil rights against great odds, a man who, while maintaining his civil rights against great odds, did not hesitate to say: I am a Catholic, and I shall spare no effort to secure for my fellow-countrymen in Manitoba more rights than they now possess. And who can blame the hon. member for so doing? It is open to every man in the province of Manitoba to seek for an amendment to the law. Now, the only thing upon which I take issue with my hon. friend opposite is that, while it is open to my friend, Mr. Guité, to persuade the people of Manitoba, it is not open to the hon. gentleman to coerce that same people. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, after having made that speech, concluded—no, I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, he did not conclude at all—he spoke for an hour, and after having spoken for an hour, did not dare to enunciate a policy. Why, Sir, on the contrary, he told the House, so far as his language would go, that he washed his hands of the whole matter, that he had no more to do with it. Last session he was ready to die, to shed his blood, for he expected there would be votes for him in the province of Quebec. But like many another hero, when there is nothing more to be gained by heroism there is no more heroism whatever. But the hon. gentleman uttered a word a moment ago which he does not suppose I will allow to pass by without having something to say in regard to it. The hon. gentleman, speaking of Mr. Russell, referred to him as the emissary of the Canadian Government to the Court of Rome. I do not understand what the hon. gentleman means. If he will make a charge plain and substantial, that we can understand, I will meet him, but I will have no cowardly insinuations in regard to that matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say to the hon. gentleman that I based my statement that he was an emissary of the Government to Rome on the telegram that was published in the hon. gentleman's own papers, I think, in which it was stated that he had officially communicated to the Government the result of his mission.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman wants to give circulation to a newspaper report. I am surprised that an hon. gentleman of his years, of his reputation and experience on the floor of Parliament, in discussing great questions, as he has been discussing them, should make charges on mere newspaper rumours. Again, I repeat, if the hon. gentleman will make a charge, I will not say make a charge, but put a question even, I will be prepared to give him an answer; but I do not want, and I protest against any such innuendoes being thrown into this discussion.

The hon. gentleman stated before six o'clock, that there was peace and amity among the different races and creeds of this country. Thank God, there is. But if it is so, there is too much reason to fear that if such statements as the hon. gentleman has made, if the policy of the school of the hon. gentleman were to prevail, we would not have peace and harmony, but civil war amongst us. The hon. gentleman spoke this afternoon feelingly, eloquently and well in regard to the jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen. I could not add a word to what he said at that time, except this, that there is not perhaps in the broad dominions of Her Majesty any portion of the Empire where so much can be achieved out of the jubilee year. This is the jubilee year; this is the sixtieth anniversary of Her Majesty the Queen. Throughout the broad Empire all the tribes, all the races and all the nations which acknowledge her supreme authority, will vie with each other to do her honour; all the tribes, all the races, all the nations, divided though they may be in colour, in religion, in education, in blood, still will be unanimous in their endeavours, in their efforts, in emulation among themselves to testify to their devotion to her person. Monuments will be erected in commemoration of the event. The arts will be called on to give expression in marble and in bronze to the loyal devotion of so many millions to one who is so wise and whose reign has been so beneficent. But there are monuments which speak more eloquently, more loudly and more eloquently than even those of sculptured bronze or carved marble. There are monuments which will be more fitting for this occasion than sculptured bronze and carved marble. Let this be a jubilee year, indeed. Let this year be as of old, a year of remission. Let the past be forgotten, let old scores be put into oblivion, let strife and contention be for ever buried, and instead let trust, confidence and good-will spring forth from the ground and rise towards heaven. This is the noblest monument, in my estimation, which the Canadian people could offer as their contribution to the glory of the jubilee year.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, there is one fact which is quite patent to hon. members on both sides of the House, and after to-morrow it will be quite patent to the country at large, and that fact is this, that the nine months of ministerial responsibility which have weighed, we will say, upon the shoulders of my hon. friend who has just taken his seat have not had the effect either of diminishing his verbiage or of adding to the weight or to the logic of his remarks. I may be permitted to remind my hon. friend and the hon. gentlemen who sit behind him that that same light, indefinite and airy method which might well become a gentleman who led the skirmishes of his army on the side of the Opposition, is not quite what we might expect from a gentleman who is now leader of Her Majesty's Government in the Dominion of Canada, and who is expected in a grave, reasonable and dignified manner to answer the objections that are brought against his Government and his party. I leave it to the hon. gentlemen on either side of the House to say if the hon. leader in the course of his fifteen or twenty minutes address even attempted to answer the strong points made by my hon. friend against his Government and party. The hon. gentleman has given us an example to-night of the skirmishing order of debating school reply. He has given an answer which when it comes to be placed side by side with the indictment of his Government and party made here to-night, will not read to his advantage, and will not accrue to the advantage of his party. If he can be serious for a moment, let me call the hon. gentleman's attention to some things that he found it convenient to forget. To take the first point, my hon. friend pointed out a distinct disagreement which prevailed between the hon. gentleman and his Finance Minister with respect to certain matters in regard to the tariff. Is the tariff an unimportant matter to hon. gentlemen opposite? If the hon. leader of the House thinks it an unimportant matter, the commercial interests have not thought it an unimportant matter during the last nine months, and to-morrow, when the business men read the light and flippant answer the hon. gentleman made to the remarks of my hon. friend, they will be no more satisfied and no more set at rest and at peace with respect to the way in which the hon. gentleman treats matters of this kind, which is one that would not be expected from him as leader of his party on this, the gravest question which to-day is before this Parliament for consideration. I ask the leader of the Government: Is it true or not, that his Finance Minister went down to Montreal the other day and took it upon himself to make an announcement with reference to the duty on coal, evidently with the consent of the Government—unless the Prime Minister allows the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) to do what the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) declared before he went into the Ministry he would do, namely, do just as he pleased and have a free hand in everything. But, Sir, if there is to be any solidarity in government, and if the strong grasp in the gloved-hand is to typify my hon. friend as the leader of the Government, let me ask him: if it was under his advisement that his Minister of Finance went down to Montreal a little while before the tariff was to be brought down, and made a public announcement with reference to one industry, while he has for nine months sealed his lips with reference to every other industry in this country. Does my hon.

friend (Mr. Laurier) think that is a practice which is honest or decent? The pork packers of this country, taken in connection with the agricultural interests, are as important an industrial body as any in Canada. They were in the direst quandary of any set of producers in this country, and the farmers were linked with them in that quandary. The pork packer buys in the autumn of the year and does the packing and curing of what he purchases in order to sell in the market ten or twelve months thereafter. Like highwaymen, who when they had not the tools of war in their hands threatened and boasted of what they would do when they got the implements of warfare, the party led by my hon. friend bullied the business interests of this country, and boasted that when they got into power and got the sword, they would cut off the head of protection and trample upon its body. When the sword of power was put into their hands they uplifted it upon the basis of their preceding pledges; the solemn promises of the 1893 convention which was their bible, and their compendium of solemn pledges which they gave to this country for the last eighteen years—a country that they said was being bled white, a fair country that they told us lay helpless and powerless under the shackles of protection. The sword of power was put in their hands, and the pork packers of Canada came before these would be executioners, these professed executioners. The pork packers laid their dire straits before them, and they asked that commission to be kind enough to give them some hint as to their policy, for the sake of the farmers from whom they bought, and to whom they must pay on the basis of what might be the worst possible position they would be put into nine months hence. If to-day they had a protection of 2 or 3 cents per pound and could be sure that that protection would hold in this country when they came to sell their purchases of the nine months previous, they would pay on that basis; but if they thought that the duty was to be taken off, and that when they came to sell they would have to face a competition which would take so much from their price, they must pay the farmer the lessened price for his pork. The pork packers of Canada appeared humbly before this great commission with the uplifted sword in their hands, and laid these facts before them, and prayed them for the sake of the farmers and in their own interests to give them some indication of what they would do so far as the principle of revision was concerned, or at least that their Royal Highnesses would say they would not put into effect any reduction of the tariff which would injure them in the sale of the purchases they had made under differing conditions; but the Finance Minister buttoned up his lips, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce looked wise and said nothing. You could not draw from any of them a hint as to that industry. They were right in that, because, though they might indicate the principle on which they proposed to proceed, they are bound by the law and practice not to announce the details on any given article. Sir, they had no right to give out a detail of one single item of their tariff, until they published all the details. What right has the Minister of Finance, because a certain industry may be a pet of his own, or because he may be "rigging" a political market; what right has he to announce in advance a single item of his tariff rates. If he refused to every other industry in the country an indication of what the Government would do, what right has he, for a political purpose and on the eve of a political election, to state what he is going to do with reference to one single industry? And, Sir, relying upon the Minister of Finance who did that indecent thing, politically speaking, there is to-day a provincial election in the province of Nova Scotia, which is not a contest on provincial policy. The programme of Mr. Murray was read and it is based on a Dominion issue; it is constructed on the promise of the Finance Minister. I arraign the Government of which my hon. friend is the Prime Minister, for no man who is Finance Minister under him would dare to make a statement like that, if this Government is a constitutional government, without having first consulted his colleagues. Did the Prime Minister authorize the Finance Minister to single out one industry and in that indecent fashion make the will of the Government known to that industry, whilst every other industry languished in doubt. Did he or did he not? No answer. If the Finance Minister was authorized to state that, what is the position of the Prime Minister, as his words stand before him to-day and gaze at his face from every paper which published them. Does he remember that he stood before the business men of Montreal—that is before the business men of Canada—and declared, that the policy of his Government would be to make cheap coal and cheap iron, to take off the duty on coal and iron. And, Sir, when the inconsistency of these statements is pointed out, and the Prime Minister is asked to reconcile them, he makes some flippant argument such as a school boy would use in a debating society. He has no dignified, no governmental answer to give such as this House and this country demand. Now, Sir, I put this question strongly, and not one whit more strongly than it deserves: what right has my hon. friend to single out one industry and set that at rest, while every other industry is kept hanging in doubt and uncertainty. I want to ask the Prime Minister one more question. He has come before us with one single unbroken promise. Out of the five hundred promises he has made, when they are flung in his face broken into flinders, he takes up one and he says: Oh, the hon. gentleman says that we did not keep our promises but I will prove that he is not right for here is a promise that we kept, we are going to introduce a Bill to repeal the Franchise Act. Here is one insignificant promise fulfilled amongst the hundreds that have been broken and the scattered fragments of which lie all around my hon. friend. He is going to bring down a Franchise Bill now. After nine months of the flaming sword over the business heads of the country, after the preceding year of threats when they had not the sword; by what right do they meet Parliament to-day and refuse to bring down their Tariff Bill until the election in Nova Scotia is over. In the face of the statement of Mr. Murray—I challenge the Finance Minister to deny it—let me ask: is he going to put that tariff before the House before Mr. Murray's election is over? Mr. Murray knows. Mr. Murray is running his election on that promise and on that rig. Mr. Murray declares to the people of Nova Scotia: you are called upon to vote because through you, this general election in Nova Scotia is to tell the people at Ottawa what you want, before their tariff is brought down, and before their tariff is carried through. Hon. gentlemen may think that I speak warmly. I do. I speak what I feel, and I speak what every honest Liberal will feel, at such a gross manipulation of secrets that should lie locked up in the Finance Minister's breast, until he is prepared to lay them all before Parliament, and at the unblushing and pronounced abuse of his position which he thus prostitutes for the purposes of party politics.

Now, Sir, I am not going to debate the tariff question at this time. I will debate it later when the tariff comes down; but I point out to this House and the country that my hon. friend the Prime Minister has not taken a dignified position here to-night, and I charge him and his Ministry with doing what was never before done in the Dominion of Canada by a Finance Minister on the eve of bringing down a tariff, and I ask again for a justification of this course. Honour and purity in elections sit very nicely on the lips of my hon. friend; but there is not a scheme nor a wrinkle known to the latest resources of political warfare that my hon. friend and his followers are not capable of putting into operation; and this one is the worst and the most indecent one that has taken place in the history of parliamentary government in this country.

There is one other point that I wish to speak of on this same tariff business. In his airy, delightfully airy, nothing but airy way, my hon. friend the leader of the Government says there is not a man nor woman in this country who does not know to-day what the Government is going to do with the tariff. You heard him say that, Mr. Speaker, hon. gentlemen on both sides heard him say that; and then to show how undesirable it was that every man in the Dominion of Canada knew just what they are going to do, he defined, in just so many English words, what their tariff is to be. Here it is:

To alleviate the burdens of the people, and impair no present business interests.

Delightfully definite. The president of the Board of Trade in Toronto knows now exactly what this tariff is to be; the new president of the Board of Trade in Montreal knows now exactly what the tariff is to be; the rolling mill men can now light their furnaces and start their fires, and roll along merrily, for they know exactly what the tariff is to be. The great man has spoken; the wonderful definer of things to be defined has made his definition, and it is definite. Do you want to know what the tariff is to do in all its principles and details? It is "to alleviate the burdens of the people and to impair no present business interests." Delightful! No longer will the commercial papers say that the business of the country is retarded, is languishing and is becoming demoralized on account of prevailing doubt and uncertainty. Dun, Wiman & Co., and Bradstreets will now be delightfully explicit, and will say: "All doubt is removed, and the clink and whirr of the wheels of business goes on right merrily since the 27th day of March, 1897, when the Premier of the Dominion gave this lucid explanation of just what the principle and the details of the tariff are to be." And the bankers, one of whom, by the way, writing to me the other day, said to me at the end of the letter: "Help them to get through the tariff as quickly as possible, for everything is hung up on uncertainty." I am going to send him in the morning the very words of this definition, and ask him if everything cannot now be taken off the pin and allowed to roll along.

As to simultaneous polling, it was a delightful and logical and straightforward answer which the Prime Minister made on that question. Here you have, Mr. Speaker, for eighteen years a virtuous party, a party of purity, a party of principle, thundering at the wrong method and bad practice of a Government at any time holding the by-elections one after another, and arranging them to suit themselves. It is brought to the leader's mind that in four or five cases, after he has got the rule and power, instead of carrying out the principle which he has been advocating for all these years, he has violated his own principle. His answer is ready, and it is just as weighty as it is ready: "What have you to say about it? See how you used to do it." That is a complete absolution for present disregard of principle which he was so strongly in favour of, and which he made a cardinal principle of the Liberal party when in opposition, and even then he said too much, or he did not say enough. The hon. gentleman has a wide knowledge of the county of Bonaventure. He knows exactly where the people were and what they were doing. Why was the election brought on so soon in Bonaventure? Because he says the people there are fishermen, and might go away fishing. Why was it not brought on so soon in Champlain? Because he says the people there are lumbermen and are away lumbering. Does the hon. gentleman not know that Bonaventure is a very large lumbering as well as fishing county? Does he not know that the fishermen do not go out to their fishing for a month yet? Was it so pressing, therefore, that he did not allow the days of honest grace to his opponents to canvass the county and make preparations for the election? What has he to say about the county of Colchester, one of the best counties in the province of Nova Scotia, which for three months and more has been without a representative, and which to-day has no voice in this Parliament? He was asked the reason of that by the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills), and he dodged the question, as he dodges every question which he finds it a little difficult to answer, and forgot to tell us what the reason was. Will he tell us now the reason why the election in Colchester was not brought on?

The PRIME MINISTER. The answer was made to the questions of the hon. leader of the Opposition, who was speaking of the effect of the school question in Quebec. My attention had not been called to Colchester.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend has not answered my question. I asked him if he would give the answer now why he had not brought on the election in Colchester. He has dodged the question again. If my hon. friend goes on in this way as Prime Minister, he will soon be called the artful dodger. I will tell my hon. friend what I think is the reason why he has not brought on the election in Colchester. I think the motive which induced his Finance Minister to make a wrongful declaration with reference to the coal industry before the time, so as to influence the elections in Nova Scotia was about on an even keel with my hon. friend's intention of keeping back the election in Colchester so as to bring it on on the very same day as the provincial elections. For what purpose? For the purpose of overwhelming the Liberal-Conservative candidate in the county of Colchester under what they hoped would be a very great rush, a very great majority in the provincial elections which are now being carried on. My hon. friend forgot the county of Wright. If Champlain could not be called on because lumbermen lived in Champlain, and were absent, is not Wright a lumbering county, and a very large lumbering county? My hon. friend forgot to square all these points, when he thought of that ready, light answer to his opponent. He brought on Bonaventure because he thought he had a catch on the Conservatives, and he did not bring on Champlain because he did not want that election brought on before all the others were decided. He brought on Wright, but in doing so he violated a Liberal principle again. What has been his contention, as Liberal leader? It has always been that, when a county wished to elect a representative, it should not be left to the bosses and leaders to dictate to the county what representative it should choose, but the independent men of the party should be called together and nominate the candidate they desired. In this case that principle was not carried out, but my hon. friend himself was the nominator for the party. It was he who choose the nominee for the party. So anxious was he to smother the real voice of that large electorate, that his writs were issued so late that I doubt very much if the notices could have been posted up within the legal delay of eight days before the day of the election. I believe that, unless they were posted up on Sunday, the required legal notice could not have been given. So determined was he that the county of Wright should not have any time to discuss the question thrust on the electorate all at once, that he rushed this election on within a working period of less than ten days.

There was a charge made against my hon. friend to-night which he cannot let go and maintain his position in this House as a Prime Minister and a public man anxious that his word, when given, should be looked upon as seriously given. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) analysed what the hon. gentleman said in the town of Hull regarding the number of school children required by the Manitoba Bill to compel the carrying out of certain things which were agreed to in the school settlement, and my hon. friend pointed out that there was a very great difference between children of school age in average attendance and the number of children living in the parish or district. My hon. friend the Prime Minister took the latter as the basis of his statement, if he is correctly reported—and he has not denied the report—which is, therefore as incorrect as it could well be. The inaccuracy has been pointed out to him, and he has not noticed it. If it were an inaccuracy, made simply through carelessness or inappreciative reading, it is bad, but if it were intended to deceive the electorate, all the worse for my hon. friend. But I call the attention of the House to the fact that he has not thought it worth while to notice this grave charge made against his veracity.

My hon. friend made another statement. He said that the statement made by the leader of the Opposition that the Estimates brought down last year by the Government were some three million dollars greater than the largest estimate brought down by the Liberal-Conservatives, had no foundation in fact. Well, I have the figures before me, and they bear out the statement of the hon. leader of the Opposition. And, if the First Minister did not know that he was wrong, his hon. colleague the Finance Minister might very easily have set him right. Here are the figures. The Estimates brought down by the late Government were $37,800,000, and the amount which was passed through by hon. gentlemen opposite, as their Estimates, including what should have been passed for expenses of this session but was left over as Supplementaries, was a little over $40,000,000.

But my hon. friend tried to turn the point of the attack by introducing new matter, and he referred to the alleged illegal practices in the province of Manitoba during the elections. It would have been as well for my hon. friend if he had not done this. My hon. friend has followed the example set by the Liberal papers, and some of the Liberal speakers, of taking every charge made as proved, but he has not got their excuse of doing this before the charges were gone into. From one end of this country, to the other, and throughout England as well, the charges were circulated of misdoings by the returning officers and Conservative candidates in the province of Manitoba, and every charge made was heralded as if fully proved. Well, the trials were rushed on by the Liberal government of Manitoba, and constant changes of court were obtained, in order to secure convictions, if possible; but, after the cases had gone through the courts, what was the net result? Out of the whole twenty-seven or more against whom charges were made, but one conviction was obtained. Every other man accused was cleared for want of proof, and the attorneys of the Liberal party, conducting the case against Mr. Hugh John Macdonald, whom we miss here to-night, said in open court that there was not a shadow of proof for the statement made charging him with personal corruption. Although he had been charged with being a personator and a ballot-stuffer and with having been guilty of illegal practices, the attorneys for the party admitted that for these charges there was not a tittle of foundation.

Then, with reference to the civil service, my hon. friend deftly turned the argument against the hon. leader of the Opposition by charging my hon. friend with having called the commissioners spies on the civil service. I listened to my hon. friend and did not take that meaning from what he said. I understood him to say that the civil service, from the top to the bottom, was permeated by spies and emissaries, and that statement is as true as the Gospel. Going into the Department of the Interior to-day or any time since the late election, one could see that the statements made by my hon. friend is true, and that the department had been the haunt of spies and emissaries. Every man who felt that he belonged to the dominant party and wanted promotion to the place of another, was at work trying, if possible, to trump up some charge against a superior officer in order to secure that officer's place for himself. I say that from one end of this country to the other the civil servants of a political faith different from that of the party in power do not feel themselves secure in their position. No man knows but that a chance word that he drops to an acquaintance may be reported to his injury. There is fear and trembling and demoralization and confusion among the civil service such as will always be manifested when the dominant party, not being strong enough to ward off the assaults of its greedy supporters, listens to their demands, and, while giving fair words to the public such as my hon. friend gave here to-night that no man would be dismissed without a charge and an investigation, acts upon a different principle. Did not my hon. friend state to-night that no man would be dismissed without a charge and an investigation? He did. But the time will come when, in this House, I will give him dozens of examples of men who have served their country faithfully for ten, twelve, or perhaps twenty years, without charges against them, were dismissed, the first intimation being a notice from headquarters that their services were not required after a certain time. Take the case of a man appointed under the Liberal-Conservative Administration, who has done his work faithfully and served the Government well for years without a blot upon his record, and has paid into the superannuation fund for the benefit of his wife and family if he should be disabled. The other party comes into power, and this man, merely because he is a Conservative, is dismissed, and the Government retains the money that he paid in. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier), who has just left the House, if he thinks that is an honest and fair thing to do? That has been done, and before the session is many weeks older we shall have the cases before the House. And yet the hon. gentleman has the effrontery, the audacity, to use a word which he used with reference to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), to stand up and, in the face of the country, which has examples of this thing from one end of it to the other, declare upon his word of honour, that no man has been or will be dismissed unless there is a charge and an investigation. And yet behind him sits the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), who, in this House, made public declaration of the policy he would follow—that he might possibly give a chance for a man to repel a charge if he was a high class official and got a good salary, but in the case of a poor labouring man, there were so many of them, that he could not take them into consideration. And do you know what else demoralizes the civil service? If you are doing your work well in a public capacity, you have your own dignity and self-respect, and does it help that to have a political heeler whom you know to be not your equal made a high commissioner to come and scent around your official district, and hale you before him to answer charges against you. As a man of self-respect and good standing you are apt to say: I would rather go out of the service than submit to such an indignity. In New Brunswick, in Manitoba, in other parts of the country, that kind of commissioner is travelling the country to-day. I can give the case of an honest old man who for the last fifteen years has done his duty as caretaker in a public building—inoffensive as ever a man was, respected by the people of both sides of politics, and who, simply because he voted for the Liberal-Conservative candidate, was turned adrift, and his family is without this means of livelihood to-day. Is that honest? Is that a thing for a great party of talents, and brains, and business capacity, to be engaged in? Why is their tariff not ready, why is not some policy upon the fast line matured, why is the Crow's Nest Railway matter not decided? Simply because the great heads have been so busy cutting of the small heads that they have had no time to devote to matters of policy. And we may look for worse because they have capitulated to their followers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend knows it, he knows that they have capitulated to their followers, and that the dismissals that have been made are not a circumstance to the dismissals that will be made. And dismissals, superannuations, appointments—everything goes through with the greatest of facility. Things are not as they used to be.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. FOSTER. From my hon. friend's standpoint he would think that that was hard. But we do not think it so. But I know the gentlemen opposite would find it still worse if they had to go out of office. I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter which has already been before it—the reputed action of the Government with reference to the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I thought it was a tenet of the Liberal party, I thought it was a feature of sound constitutional government in British countries, that Government could not enter into contracts and spend money for purposes for which no appropriation has been made by Parliament. We own the Intercolonial Railway, and we appropriate money for the purpose of carrying on that railway. But have we appropriated any money which would justify the Government in taking twenty or thirty or ninety miles of railway and operating it? They could make an agreement to operate it, to be afterwards presented to the House and the expenses provided for. If they have been operating the Baie des Chaleurs Railway they must certainly have been operating it at an expense to the country; and, if so, what becomes of the principle that the Government is simply the servant of Parliament to expend the moneys appropriated by Parliament. Has my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who got up last year and, in a fit of penitence, declared he had done it, he knew, but would not do it again, has he been at it again? Has my hon. friend been getting a Governor General's warrant to operate the Baie des Chaleurs Railway for political or other purposes? We will have the answer by and by. I draw the attention of the House and of the country to this: It has been stated that this matter has been carried on for some months. If it has, under what warrant, and by what right?

Now, Sir, I come to another question, and that is the Manitoba School Act. I have a few words to say with reference to the Manitoba School Act simply and solely because the question is now a question of record between the two parties; and I do not think that we on this side can sit still and have the record of the Liberal-Conservative party put in a different position from that which it should occupy. There are just some thoughts which come to my mind. In the first place, my hon. friend the leader of the Government, praises Mr. Guité, concerning whom he tries to tell the House that my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, had made insinuations. The leader of the Opposition made no insinuations against Mr. Guité. He did say that there had been a double-headed circular sent out to the electors of Mr. Guité's county, and that these two had been directed to people of two different beliefs. That did not constitute an insinuation against Mr. Guité. But I wish to draw the attention of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to the high encomiums that my hon. friend the leader of the Government, and his leader and colleague in the Government, paid to Mr. Guité—for what? Because Mr. Guité had been brave enough and strong enough to say to the bishop: No, I cannot sign what you want me to sign, I must stand for civil liberty. Was the Solicitor General in his place at that particular time? Did it grate harshly upon his ears? No, I am afraid that even my hon. friend has not that within his bosom which sometimes makes cowards of men. What was the point of the encomium upon Mr. Guité? That he did not bow to the bishop, that when the bishop wanted him to sign a letter, he would not sign it. There was your hero, there was your brave man. And, par conséquent, is my hon. friend the Solicitor General a hero or a brave man? For he bent the knee and he took the pen, and he straightway made his solemn pledge of faith and honour, that he would—stand for civil liberty? No, but do just exactly what the bishops' mandement bade him do. Now, if Mr. Guité was a hero in the estimation of my hon. friend for the reason given, what must be the rather equivocal position of my friend the Solicitor General? My hon. friend the Solicitor General is in a peculiar position. But I will make it a little clearer. We missed to-day the ruddy countenance of the former member for Wright. I was told in the county of Wright when I was conducting a canvass there as best I could against the myrmidons of the Government—

Mr. DOMVILLE. You have not much intelligence.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, there is my hon. friend again. I did not know but that business out in the North-west had rather relieved us of him. Now I was going on to say that I was told in the county of Wright the reason why the former member was not here. Is the Minister of the Interior around? He does not seem to be in his place. But the reason that was given to me in the county of Wright why Mr. Devlin resigned, was that his health was so poor that it would not allow him to do his duties to his constituents, the electors of Wright. Now, I understood my hon. friend last year to declare that the Government was going to launch out into a vigorous immigration policy. They have launched out, and they have commenced by making a sort of national sanitarium for sick politicians on the other side of the water. Well, Mr. Devlin's health was so delicate, so report says, that he cannot stand three months of the year here, and the other eight or nine months in the balmy breezes of Aylmer and the county contiguous; but he is vigorous and strong enough to go to an exigent and large field of labour, and to put in operation that vigorous immigration policy! I think that was not the real reason. Now, I make another illustration for my hon. friend the Solicitor General. Why did Mr. Devlin not face the House? Mr. Devlin, I think, gave the reason why when, last year, he stood in his place in the House and launched that speech of his in favour of the Manitoba minority, the oppressed minority, the humiliated minority, the minority robbed of rights by superior and arrogant power, as he phrased it. On that occasion he uttered this language:

I vote for the principle of this Bill because it declares the right of the minority to separate schools, and God forbid that the day should ever come when, in this House or out of it, holding the belief which I do, I should refuse to vote in favour of the principle of restoring to the Catholic minority its separate schools.

That was Mr. Devlin's principle, that was his stand. Having stated that in this House Mr. Devlin felt that he could not, in consistency with his manhood, come into this House again and vote for my hon. friend opposite. But my hon. friend the Solicitor General is made of different metal. When the bishop asked him to sign the pledge he gets down and signs it—because he wants to be elected. He declares to his bishop that he submits to the bishops' will and mandement, that he is in favour of remedial legislation, that if, at the next session of this House, remedial legislation is not introduced and carried through by his leader, he will resign. He has not resigned. There is the Solicitor General, the representative of justice in the cabinet of the country, making a solemn pledge, which is stronger than an oath to any honest man, violating his pledge; in the first place making a pledge to get into the House, in the second place, violating the pledge to keep in the House, and to keep his position. The former member for Wright would not face a contingency of that kind, and he handed in his resignation—for a consideration. The hon. gentleman opposite, in a piece of casuistry which is anything but commendable in the representative of justice in the cabinet of this country, tries to justify himself, and he justifies himself by saying that after all he did not know that it would do any good if he did keep his word, and that therefore he might just as well break it. But his colleague, the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion—he will pardon me for mentioning him by name—took occasion to read his friend and other such friends as he, a lecture the other night at a club meeting in Montreal. Mr. Geoffrion proceeded to give his definition of a Liberal. "He was a man who had the courage of his convictions, and one who defended the cause he had at heart with firmness." Now, I want to ask the leader of the Government this: Is it true, as he is reported in the papers, after his declaration, and the declaration of Mr. Greenway and his Government, that the settlement given was final and nothing more would be given, that my hon. friend, speaking in Montreal, described this as but the first instalment of the justice that was to be done to the Manitoba minority? If that is true, how comes it that my hon. friend now, in the Speech from the Throne, deliberately declares that this is the best and only arrangement that can be got? How is it that Mr. Greenway, the Premier of Manitoba, when the rumour went up to Winnipeg that he was going to give more concessions to the Catholic minority, came out and said: That is not true, this is the ultimate and all that we will do as a Government. But the hon. the Solicitor General is a member of the hon. gentleman's Government, he is one of his colleagues, he is responsible for the speech that was put in the mouth of the Governor General as well as is my hon. friend; and yet the Solicitor General in explaining that he has not kept his solemn word, makes two important statements. He said that "either Sir Charles Tupper or Mr. Laurier will be returned, the latter of whom promised conciliation first and coercion only in the event of the appeal to obtain a peaceful settlement failing." That disposes pretty effectively, so far as the testimony of the law officer of the Crown goes, of the contention that the leader did hold out to the province of Quebec, that he would secure justice to the minority of Manitoba, that if he could not get it by conciliation he would do it by using the constitutional power. But the Solicitor-General goes further. He says: the settlement might be modified and made more satisfactory. He did not accept the settlement as final—the law officer of the Crown does not accept it as final—nor did Mr. Laurier accept it as final; the Solicitor-General speaks for his Prime Minister, and thereby backs up the assertion of the hon. gentleman that this is only "a first instalment." The duplicity is not yet ended. Commencing six long years back in the party to which the hon. gentleman belongs, and continuing through their own partisans, and none of them stronger and wilder than the present Minister of Public Works on that question in those past days, making one statement in one place and another statement in another after the Governor General's mouth had uttered the words that this is the final settlement, the Solicitor-General and the Premier both saying: I am not satisfied with it, and Mr. Guité saying to the bishops: it is not all I want and I will do my best when I get into Parliament to have full justice done. Now, with respect to the Manitoba schools let me add something further. I am open to the judgment of the country if it is not true that the whole course of the leader of the Government when in Opposition was directed to impress on the minds of all Catholics in this country that he wanted Manitoba separate schools restored. Was the Manitoba minority anywhere simply asking for the privileges of getting a half hour after school was out in which to teach religion? That was not what the minority were after. The discussion did not rage about a proposition of that kind at all; it raged over the proposition raised by the Minister of Public Works—and I have his words under my hands—where he declared that the minority of Manitoba had been deprived of their rights and had been sufficiently humiliated, that they had made concessions when the upper chamber of Manitoba was allowed to go under a promise that their rights would never be taken from them. The hon. gentleman stated at that time that the Catholic minority in Manitoba will make no more concessions, that they will stand on their rights, and turning to the then Government he demanded that justice be done to that minority and that their separate schools be restored. And all the way up they have impressed that lesson on the public mind until it sank deep into the heart of Catholicism from one end of the country to the other. Am I right in that statement or not?

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. DOMVILLE. No.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very high authority, I must, however, appeal from this luminary to Cæsar.

Mr. DOMVILLE. From King's County.

Mr. FOSTER. I will appeal to Cæsar. That was, however, the course pursued throughout; that was the line of argument used. I want to call the hon. gentleman's attention to one point, which he as a responsible Minister cannot afford to treat in silence. He repels the insinuation that he broke faith, that he broke any pledge. He has utterly broken and ignored a pledge he made from his seat on this side of the House to Parliament and to the country. When he moved the six months' hoist to the Remedial Bill, what was the hon. gentleman's position? I will not read the whole of his argument, but I will give the gist of it, and it was this: That this is more than a matter of law, it is a matter of prejudice, a matter of opinion, a matter of feeling; that you cannot drive people by force, but that you can get things by showing the people that they are reasonable. He asserted that the people did not understand this question; he urged that an inquiry be made into the facts, saying that the people did not know the facts. He demanded on the floor of this House that before anything was done a commission should issue and the whole facts of the case should be inquired into. What for? For his information, for my information? No; for the information of the people of this country, for the information of the Protestant people especially, for, said he, I have more influence with the Protestants of Ontario than has the present Government; there is my old friend Sir Oliver Mowat, who is the champion of separate schools in Ontario, I will go to him, and when all the facts are brought out we will place them before the people and show them how reasonable is our proposition that separate schools should be restored. And the hon. gentleman pledged his faith as a man and as a leader of the party that the first thing done should be the appointment of a commission with Sir Oliver Mowat at its head to investigate and obtain full information on the subject and spread it before the people. Did the hon. leader of the Government do so? His solemn pledge was treated as the idle wind. Once the election was over and his pledge had served its purpose, he did not think that the best settlement for this country would be secured by having the whole facts inquired into, that Sir Oliver Mowat should be placed at the head of a commission of inquiry, that when the whole facts were brought out they would produce such an impression on the minds of Protestants they would see the justice of restoring the right of having separate schools for the minority of Manitoba. Not a step was taken in that direction. The hon. gentleman and the Manitoba Government sat down together and settled the question. Settled what question? Settled the question of party advantage between himself and the Greenway government. That is what he settled.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Very successfully anyway.

Mr. FOSTER. Very successfully; the Minister of the Interior is there, and my hon. friend is there.

Mr. FRASER. And you are there.

Mr. FOSTER. And I am happy to say that I am here, and hon. gentlemen opposite will know that I am here.

Mr. DOMVILLE. And you will stay there.

Mr. FOSTER. And perhaps the hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville), if he will just curb the exuberance of his spirits, may know also that I am here. I was going on to say that what this hon. gentleman promised to the country was that he would get the full information and spread it before the people, so as to mould the Protestant mind into an acceptance of separate schools being restored to the Manitoba minority. But the hon. gentleman sat down with the party of one side and without consultation with the party on the other side. A, B and C are three persons. A comes to B and says: There is a contract of twenty years' standing existing between us, under which I have had certain rights and privileges; to-day you have annulled that contract. B says: No, I deny that there is any contract. A says: There was, but if you deny it, I will take it to the courts. They take it to the courts, and the decision comes, and then A goes to B and says: The courts declare that you had an absolute right to cancel the contract, but they declare, as well, that I had certain privileges for twenty years, and which I believed, and which it was believed, were guaranteed to me by the constitution of the contract, under which I made the contract, and that, therefore, I have the right of redress by appeal to a higher power. A comes with his appeal to C. C tells the person who is aggrieved to stand out of the way whilst he and B get together and make a little settlement to suit themselves, ignoring the party which has the primary grievance and which got a verdict in his favour. And my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) calls that a settlement.

Mr. LARIVIERE. A is at (C) sea now.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, A is at (C) sea.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You are all at sea.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. That reminds me that the Liberal party is becoming demoralized all round. They leave off one species of ball work and go to another. For instance, in the county of Wright, the Liberal party left off Devlin and then took strongly to Champagne. But that is an unpardonable pun, Mr. Speaker, and I will never make such a one again.

My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) calls that a final settlement, and yet he says it is only an instalment, and the Solicitor General says that both he and the Premier consider the question is not settled, but that it is open yet. Using the word which the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) applied to my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), he has the audacity to accuse the Liberal-Conservative party of destroying the peace and good-will and harmony of this country during these last five or six years. In the light of records and history, the proposition is too absurd to demand a single minute's refutation. The plain statement of fact that I have made simply shows that the Liberal party commenced it, the Liberal party kept it up, the men who are now prating so strongly for peace and amity, were the men who were strongest in their expressions, two, and three, and four, and five years ago. For every sake, let us have all the amity we can have in this country, but I enter my protest, because we are Frenchmen, and Englishmen, and Scotchmen, and Irishmen, that every time we seem to have a little disagreement on a principle or detail of a question, alarmists shall say that the whole of this Dominion is being set aflame. There is nothing of the kind. Catholics, Irishmen or Frenchmen, are men just the same as Englishmen. They know quite well that there are differences of opinion, and if a Frenchman and an Englishman do not see eye-to-eye upon a question, either public or private, who is to say that they are going to tear at each other's throats because they are discussing a principle or a detail of practice. The history of the last five years is the strongest possible argument that the French and the English are coalescing in this country, that they are uniting together to form one people, not a people which shall have every diversity combed down so that there shall be no points of difference between them, but a people who are stronger and better united because they do differ on some things and because they are strong enough and manly enough to differ, and yet not set the heather afire on account of such differences. Sir, I reiterate the sentiment so well expressed by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and so elaborately expressed by my hon. friend the leader of the Government with regard to the auspicious year through which we are passing now; the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign. Signalized as that sixtieth year is by all the evidences of progress and advancement in the physical sciences, in the mental sciences, in religion and morals, I hope that we shall go out of that sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign strong in our admiration of the history of that great country which for a thousand years has been the synonym for civil and religious liberty, and for progress and advancement; and stronger still in our hope, relying upon that past record of unexampled greatness and progress; stronger I say in the hope, that the future holds no peril in the distant horizon threatening disaster to the Empire, which having progressed through a thousand years in the van of liberty may, united in all its parts, progress in the same van of liberty and enlightenment for a thousand years to come.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to inflict myself at this hour upon the indulgence of the House, but before I move the adjournment of the debate, I might take occasion to make a remark or two. I am inclined to think, and I believe the majority of the House will agree with me, that taking into account the well-known feelings of a large proportion of his own followers, all things considered, I am not going out of the record in saying, that the speech of the hon. leader of the Opposition in respect to the Manitoba school question was about as injudicious as could well have been delivered under any circumstances. At least that was my opinion until I heard the remarks of the ex-Finance Minister on the same subject.

Mr. FOSTER. And then you changed?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And then I am obliged to say, I modified my conviction.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad I modified you.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, there are no depths so profound that there are not a deeper still, and I think my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister has probably attained to the lowest. I would like to put two questions to these hon. gentlemen opposite. They have occupied between them, pretty nearly three hours of actual count by the clock, in discussing the Manitoba settlement; I would like to know whether either or both of these hon. gentlemen are prepared to move a vote of censure upon the settlement as arranged. I should like to know if they have the smallest intention of doing it, and I would like to know how many of their followers would dare to support them in it. I would like to put a second question: If any of their followers move a vote of censure, will either, or both of them, venture to vote for it? As that is a conundrum equal to either of those which the hon. gentleman has proposed, I will give him till Monday to think it over; and, in order that he may have ample time, I propose now to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the certificate of the election and return of Louis Napoleon Champagne, Esquire, for the Electoral District of Wright.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Louis Napoleon Champagne, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Wright, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Sutherland.

REPORTS.

Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1896: Part I. Excise, &c.—(Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

Part II. Inspection of Weights and Measures and Gas, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1896.

Part III. Adulteration of Food, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1896.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.15 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 29th March, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Jean François Guité, Esq., for the electoral district of Bonaventure.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That notices of motion be deferred until after the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the session.

Motion agreed to.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Jean François Guité, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Bonaventure, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and Mr. Talbot.

SAFETY ON RAILWAYS.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 2) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: This is substantially the Bill which I have already introduced twice. It went to its second reading in the last session of the late Parliament, but was done away with by the Railway Committee. On the present occasion I hope for a better fate for the Bill. I have urged before, and I intend to urge again, that a Bill of this nature, being a public Bill, should not be sent to a private bills committee, where there is no opportunity for a careful discussion of its provisions such as there would be in a committee composed of persons knowing something about the particular subject, and interested therein. At the proper stage, therefore, after the second reading of the Bill, I shall try to have it considered by a committee composed of persons favourable to the principle of the Bill and interested in its success. I shall not enter fully into its provisions now, but will merely mention one or two of them, as there are a number of hon. gentlemen present who have never heard of this Bill before. It provides for certain attachments to box cars and to air-brakes on such cars as are fitted therewith, calculated to increase the safety of railway employees and travellers. Accidents frequently occur from the air-brakes failing to work, and this Bill provides that the engineer shall have means of knowing at any time whether the air-brakes are in working order or not. Conveniences are also to be provided for railway men getting on and off cars. Perhaps the most important part of the Bill, however, is a proviso for a minimum compulsory compensation for all employees on railways who may be injured by accidents not caused by their own negligence. The Bill contains rather elaborate provisions for this purpose, which I will further explain on the second reading. I have not included in this Bill all the provisions which I would wish to have in one Bill, for the reason that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has made himself master of one branch of the subject, and has given notice of his intention to introduce a Bill to deal with it. Therefore, I have not included in my Bill anything covered by the Bill introduced by him on a previous occasion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to promote the safety of railway employees. He said: Mr. Speaker,
Mr. LAURIER.

I wish to offer one or two words of explanation. This is the same Bill that was introduced last session, and it seeks to compel railway companies to adopt the automatic coupler and air-brake, and it also contains one or two other provisions on a similar line. The Bill is supported by the entire railway organizations of this country; the trainmen and the engineers, and not only is it in their interest, but it is in the interest of the public as well. I also desire to intimate to the Government that I would prefer that this Bill should be considered by a special committee, much on the same lines as outlined by my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey). We did not make much headway with the Bill a year or two ago, but I propose to push it this session and to ask for a special committee, and also to ask the support of the Government. I believe the First Minister and some of his colleagues have already intimated to the railway men of Canada that they are disposed to be very favourably inclined towards the objects of the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY AMENDMENT ACT.

Mr. MACLEAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to amend the Railway Act.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain.

Mr. MACLEAN. The object of this Bill is to provide, in the first place, that all railroad companies which run sleeping cars on their trains shall keep the upper berth closed whenever a passenger in the lower berth requires it, and when the upper berth is not occupied. This is at present the law in a great many States of the Union, and I think we ought to have a similar law here. The second clause of the Bill is to compel railway companies to make a return to Parliament, under the oath of their chief administrative officer, of the number of passes of all kinds they issue and of all the special rates for passenger travel that they give in the course of the year. I believe we can only reach the solution of the transportation problem by knowing the number of persons that travel free each year and by knowing the number of persons who get what is called preferred rates in regard to passenger travel.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS IN CANADA.

Mr. COWAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) respecting the employment of aliens in the Dominion of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. COWAN. This is a Bill for the prohibition of the employment of labour contracted outside of Canada, and also for the purpose of prohibiting the employment in the Dominion of Canada of persons who reside outside of Canada and earn their living in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN. I would like to ask the hon. member (Mr. Cowan) if there is any provision in his Bill for preventing the Government from giving contracts to contractors who are not subjects of Her Majesty?

Mr. COWAN. No. There is, however, a provision in the Bill forbidding the employment of alien labour on any public works in Canada.

Mr. MACLEAN. That does not cover contractors. You will have to widen it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMPORTATION AND IMMIGRATION OF FOREIGNERS.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Taylor) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

An hon. MEMBER. I do not think it needs any explanation. It has been before the House a good many times.

Mr. BRODEUR. It is the same thing.

Mr. MILLS. Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FRANCHISE ACT.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to repeal the Franchise Act and to make provision in lieu thereof. He said: The heading explains fairly accurately, I may say very accurately, the character and scope of this Bill, and also the changes which, if passed, it will make in the present system. The heading to which I refer to reads: A consolidation of the present law respecting Dominion elections, with some amendments, and with the addition of provisions substituting provincial laws as to franchises, voters' lists, and polling divisions for the present Dominion Franchise Act.

So that the chief object of this Bill is to substitute the provincial lists for those now in use under the Franchise Act. I need not go into details in discussing the Bill at the present time, because I apprehend it will be more convenient to the members on both sides of the House if we take the matter up after the Bill has been distributed and an opportunity has been afforded for considering its provisions. On the second reading there will be opportunity for the regular debate. I understand that this has been the proceeding hitherto in matters of this sort. I may say that the Bill has been very largely drawn upon the lines of the Bill introduced by Sir John Thompson as Premier and Minister of Justice in 1894, when he also undertook to substitute the electoral lists of the provinces for those existing under the Franchise Act. Perhaps it would be proper, at the same time, to draw the attention of the House to the fact that, up to the present time since the electoral Franchise Act has been in force, there has been an expenditure of $1,141,000 under it. And I may say that the chief object that the Government has in view in introducing this legislation is to avoid similar expenditure in the future. I would like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that there is an error in schedule 3 of this Bill. The second paragraph would purport to convey the idea that the whole of chapter 7 of the Revised Statutes of Canada is repealed. This is a printer's error. Chapter 7 is all repealed except sections 2 and 3.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I need not inform the House, after the remarks I made upon this subject Friday, that this is a question upon which the Opposition in this House feels very strongly. I need not recall to the attention of the House a number of the objections that I feel could be pressed against such a measure as is indicated in the Speech from the Throne. I am quite certain that hon. gentlemen opposite cannot expect such a measure as this to pass this House without very full and very elaborate discussion. I do not for a single moment mean to say that it might not be possible to improve the present Franchise Act. I am quite certain that attention could be given to that subject which would result in one of the principal objections to the existing Act, to which the hon. Solicitor General has referred, that of expense, being largely mitigated. But I wish to put the question very seriously to the consideration of the hon. leader of the House as to the propriety of pressing this measure upon this legislature at the present moment. The hon. gentleman knows that in England it is usual, after passing an Act which largely changes the franchise of the country, to appeal to the electors. When such changes are made Parliament no longer represents the electorate as it exists under the law, and, therefore, an opportunity is given to the new electorate to choose their representatives. I believe the hon. gentleman will probably be able to quote a precedent, perhaps in this House, that will bear against that view of the case. I do not wish to refine upon that point, but simply to call attention to the British practice and to say that unless there is an intention—and I do not gather from the hon. gentleman that he has such an intention—of appealing to the country, such a measure should not be passed. I should be very much surprised if the hon. gentleman, situated as he is, should adopt the course of appealing to the country. But, that being the case, I want to put to my hon. friend whether it is well in this, practically the first session of a new Parliament, at any rate in the first year, without any immediate or early prospect of a dissolution of the House, there is any necessity whatever for pressing this measure at the present time. The hon. gentleman will have accomplished largely the object that he has in view. I believe, that of vindicating the position he has taken before the country of his intention to adopt such legislation as this, by bringing down the Bill, having it printed and distributed for the information of the country. I would ask him, whether it is well to take up a measure that, in the very nature of things, as the hon. gentleman knows, must be a very contentious Bill, and must occupy a great deal of time and attention. I need not remind the hon. gentleman of the anxiety I have expressed, a most sincere anxiety, that there should be no failure on the part of the Prime Minister of this country to take part in the great Diamond Jubilee to take place in June which is not very far away. In expressing that view, I think I am expressing the feelings, not only of the members on both sides of this House, but of the people of this country, and I give that as an additional reason to my hon. friend why such a contentious measure as this, with no expectation of its being required at an early date, should not be pressed upon the attention of the House at this session. The hon. gentleman knows that at this moment the country is suffering, most keenly suffering, and has long suffered, from uncertainty in reference to the tariff. I am quite certain there is not a member on either side of the House that will for a moment question that statement. We may differ as to the necessity that has existed of that condition of things, but no person will question the accuracy of the statement I make that at this moment the great commercial classes of this country, the best interest of this country, are deeply interested in a prompt declaration on the part of the Government of their tariff policy. I am inclined to believe, I do not hesitate to say, I am inclined to hope, that the measure will be one that will not necessarily involve a very long and laborious consideration; but at the same time no material alteration, no substantial alteration, of the tariff can be made without a considerable portion of time being devoted to it. I think under these circumstances I am justified in making an appeal to my hon. friend to adopt the course I have suggested, of having this measure introduced and published for the information of the country, and allowed to remain over until a future session, when there will be an opportunity of giving it the fullest possible consideration. Before I sit down I may say that from the little consideration I have been able to give to this question of the franchise, looking at the character of the franchise in the various provinces, it appears to me it is quite possible that, after careful consideration, we might arrive at the conclusion that there is a better and a more effective way of dealing with the franchise of the electors of Canada. I believe that if you look at the franchise as it exists to-day in the various provinces, if it is to be accepted as a model, and if you look at the tendency in all the provinces to extend the franchise, I am inclined to think that we have approached to-day so near, in many of the provinces, if not all of them, to the confines of manhood suffrage, as to render the question worthy of the careful consideration of this House as to whether we might not adopt a franchise that would be unattended with any considerable amount of expense, one that would not materially broaden it, certainly not in many of the provinces, beyond what it is at this moment; and thus come to a general agreement and a final accord upon a franchise that would be found beneficial and acceptable to the whole country. I am speaking now rather of the views I personally entertain than otherwise, as I have not had an opportunity of conferring upon this subject with the gentlemen on this side of the House, so I merely throw that out. I may also add that in my view the adoption of manhood suffrage in Canada to-day would not give to Canada anything like as low a franchise as exists in England. When I say that I am quite aware that manhood suffrage does not exist there; but every person who knows anything of the character of the large body of the electorate in England knows that tens of thousands of those who now enjoy the franchise in England know nothing whatever of the political questions that are agitating the country, and take comparatively no interest in those questions; therefore, so far as an intelligent discharge of the duties of the electors are concerned, manhood suffrage would, in my judgment, be a higher franchise than that which exists in England to-day. I do not intend, after what has fallen from the hon. Solicitor General, to go into this debate at any length; but I rise simply for the purpose of asking my hon. friend opposite if, under all the circumstances, he does not think that it would be a wise and convenient course, looking at the condition of public affairs, to allow this measure to stand over for a time, when we will be able to give it that full and deliberate consideration which, if pressed in its present form, it is absolutely essential should take place before any such measure should be adopted.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not approach a consideration of this matter in the same way as does my hon. friend opposite. The Government are convinced that they can do nothing which will be hailed with greater satisfaction by public opinion at large than to introduce at once and prosecute to a proper solution, a measure for the repeal of the Franchise Act. The hon. gentleman says this is a subject upon which he and his friends feel strongly. I can assure him that he does not feel, that he cannot feel, half as strongly as we feel, and have felt for the last ten years that this Act has been in operation. The hon. gentleman says that he feels strongly upon this question, but when the hon. gentleman and his friends were in power they honoured the law more in the breach than in the observance. They never observed the law. They always proclaimed its want of utility, they proclaimed its deficiency. We are pledged to the country to repeal that Act, and we intend to carry out that pledge. The hon. gentleman said a few days ago that we never fulfilled our pledges. Sir, we are pledged to repeal this Act, and we shall do it, and in that I hope we shall have the assistance of the hon. gentleman, as I think we shall have, judging by the half-hearted manner in which they approved of the Act when they were in office. It is true, we are not likely to have a general election very soon, at least, such is not the intention of the Government, and the Government sees no signs in public opinion which require a general election at present. But, Sir, I wish to give every opportunity to my hon. friend to fulfil his own pledges. If I remember aright, it is not six months ago, it is not four months ago, when he stated that there would be another general election before six months were over. I am glad to see that my hon. friend has changed his views upon that subject. We shall have a new franchise, but there will be no necessity of going to the country upon that question, because the people have already passed upon that question, as well as upon many others, on the 23rd of June last.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to add a word upon a point upon which I do not think my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, has dwelt long enough—probably because he did not altogether take it in—in his desire to make a point against my hon. friend with reference to an election in six months. My hon. friend, in the few remarks he addressed to the House, has stated the best of all reasons why there is no pressing necessity of bringing this Franchise Bill on at the first of the session, and in front of what I think the whole country will acknowledge is the piece of legislation that is looked for and longed for by the business interests of the country. The hon. gentleman has stated that there is not any present necessity for such a Bill on the ground that there is soon to be an appeal to the electorate. Then if there is not soon to be an appeal to the electorate, however strongly this Bill may appeal in principle to the hon. gentleman, there is nothing practically gained by its passage two months, hence, rather than six or more months after. They have made a pledge, my hon. friend says, that they will do so and so. They have made more than one pledge, Mr. Speaker. They have declared that they would reform the tariff the moment they got into power. They have been in power for nine months. They could not reform the tariff at the last session because, they said, it was too early to have the details ready. Now, I want to impress upon my hon. friend that whatever he may think of the views of the country at large with reference to the present necessity of a repeal of the present franchise, that subject is not in it in the public mind with the requisition from the press, from the hon. gentleman's own press, from the boards of trade, from the chambers of commerce, and from the business men and the business interests of this country, from one end of it to the other. The cry is: Let us know what you are going to do with our business.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Oh dear, now.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend does not want to hear that. I am afraid my hon. friend will have to listen to a good many things that he does not like to hear; and I am afraid he will have to hear a great many things that he is not fitted to understand; but he must not rate the intelligence of other hon. gentlemen who sit beside him, so low as his own in supposing that they do not want to hear this question debated, and are not able to understand it. But I was proceeding to say, when interrupted, that there is a cry from the business interests of the country to have the tariff policy of the Government brought down and announced. I think I am right in that, and I think the men who sit on both sides of this House know that. Where, then, is the sense, or rhyme, or reason, in interposing between that demand of the business interests of the country and its answer, a Bill which may be good in itself, according to the views of hon. gentlemen opposite, but which cannot be of any service for months, for years, and for which the country is not crying out? Why interpose this Bill before the demands of the business interests in respect to a reform of the tariff in accordance with the will of the Government? I do not think there can be any ground for this proceeding. What we expected from the Government was that they would bring down their tariff measure. Why is it that the tariff measure is not brought down? Is it on the ground that this Bill supervenes as a matter of greater necessity, and that it must be put through first; or is there some other reason, and is this Bill thrown in in order to fill up a gap between the present time and some future time when it will be more desirable for political reasons to bring down the tariff? The country will ask that question and will await the answer to it. I can tell hon. gentlemen that the Opposition seated on this side of the House has a duty to perform in this matter, and the plain duty from the Opposition at the present time to perform is this, to say to the Government, that we with the country want your tariff measure; bring it down; we will help you to put it through just as fast as it can be put through with any reasonable discussion on its merits. But we would not be performing our duty if we allowed a useless Bill, such as this is, to intervene and take a month of discussion before the tariff measure is brought down. That is the only point I wish to put before the House, and I desire to put it strongly. What we want to do is to assist the Government to get the tariff measure into the House and through the House, not to keep it back a month in order to waste our time in passing a Bill that will not be wanted in this country for years and years, for probably four or five years.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. GIBSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) in further amendment of the Railway Act.

Mr. BERGERON. Explain.

Mr. GIBSON. This is practically the same Bill that I introduced into the House last session. The object of the Bill is to prevent sub-contractors and others doing work on our railways from being defrauded by means of contracts given out by construction companies. So it is, in a word, to cover all wages due and payment for work done and material supplied in the construction of a railway, and to make these charges a first lien on the road. In the west we have had considerable experience regarding this matter. In the construction of a certain railway, which was before the House some time ago, the late Government intervened and caused the railway company to provide no less a sum than $100,000 to pay the wages then due and materials supplied for the construction and operation of that line, on the condition that it should be extended from Hamilton to Welland; and we find the same conditions obtain to-day, namely, that a large sum of money, if not exceeding $100,000, at all events very nearly that sum, is due by the same railway company under a similar mode of operation, that is to say, that the railway company gave the contract to a construction company. The construction company, formed of a number of gentlemen coming from the United States, gave out the work to sub-contractors, and the result has been that the sub-contractors have not been paid and the conditions of the contract fulfilled, for under a provision in the contract to the effect that the construction company should not receive a final certificate until such time as the chief engineer of the company would grant the same, that certificate has not been forthcoming for at least twelve or fifteen months. The result has been that a large number of Canadian contractors are out of pocket in sums varying from $2,000 to $10,000; in other words, the sub-contractors have built this railway with their own money, and now the construction company leave the country and at the same time receive the benefit of the work done at the expense of our own people. This, briefly, is the object of the Bill, and I think no railway company of standing will object to its provisions. I am quite satisfied from discussing the matter with leading railway companies in the Dominion, they are not afraid to pay their honest debt when due, nor to pay for materials supplied for the construction of their railways.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. MACLEAN asked:

Whether it is the intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the abrogation or modification of the following article in the contract and agreement made between Her Majesty and Mr. George Stephen and others, as set out in chapter 1, 44 Victoria:—

"14. The company shall have the right from time to time to lay out, construct, equip, maintain and work branch lines of railway from any point or points along their main line of railway to any points within the territory of the Dominion: Provided always that before commencing any branch they shall first deposit a map and plan of such branch in the Department of Railways, and the Government shall grant to the company the lands required for the road-bed of such branches, and for the stations, station grounds, buildings, workshops, yards and other appurtenances requisite for the efficient construction and working of such branches, in so far as such lands are vested in the Government."

2. Whether it is the intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the modification or abrogation of the following clause of chapter 1, 44 Victoria:—

"20. The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada, provided for by the 11th subsection of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879 respecting tolls is hereby extended so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, instead of not less than fifteen per cent per annum profit as provided by said section, and so also that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the company ascertained as described in such subsection shall have exceeded ten per cent per annum as provided by the said subsection; and the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the company, as provided by the 10th subsection of said section 17, is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the company, and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said subsection 11 as hereby amended."

3. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government to ascertain the capital actually expended in the construction of the said Canadian Pacific Railway as referred to in the above quoted clause ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the subject is under consideration, but no conclusion has yet been arrived at; I refer to the two first questions. As to the third question, we have no intention at present of making the inquiry to which the hon. gentleman refers.

THE DIAMOND JUBILEE.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Is it the intention of the Government that the North-west Mounted Police shall be represented at the Queen's Jubilee ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). This question is now engaging the attention of the Militia Department.

CANADIAN MANUFACTURE OF PIG IRON.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

1. How many tons (2,000 lbs.) of pig iron were manufactured in Canada during the years beginning 1st July, 1873, and ending 30th June, 1878 ?

2. What was the amount and rate of duty paid on pig iron during those years and the rate and amount of bounty paid (if any) during this period ?

3. How many tons (2,000 lbs.) of pig iron were manufactured in Canada during the years beginning 1st July, 1891, and ending 30th June, 1896 ?

4. What was the amount and rate of duty paid on pig iron during those years and the rate and amount of bounty paid ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). In answer to the first question, I have to say that the figures cannot be given, as prior to the time when a bounty on the manufacture of iron was authorized, no returns of quantity were required from our manufacturers, and there are no statistics other than mere estimates available, and those only for a portion of the time. In answer to the second question : There was no duty paid upon pig iron during the years in question, neither was there any bounty paid during the same period. In answer to the third question, the manufacture of pig iron in Canada during the years beginning 1st July, 1891, and ending 30th June, 1896, was as follows :—

	Tons.
1891-92	30,294
1892-93	46,948
1893-94	62,522
1894-95	31,692
1895-96	52,871

The rate of duty paid during the years in question was $4 per ton for the year 1891-92. Pig iron was classified with iron kentledge and cast scrap iron; the amount collected on pig iron cannot be given. For the year

1892-93 the amount was.....	$226,816 15
1893-94 do do	167,207 01
1894-95 do do	125,397 40
1895-96 do do	144,040 49

The rate of bounty payable was for the year 1891-92, $1 per ton. Subsequent to 1892-93, $2 per ton. The amount of duty paid during the year

1891-92 was	$ 30,294 37
1892-93	93,896 48
1893-94	125,044 49
1894-95	63,383 95
1895-96	105,741 24

THE KINGSTON COTTON MILLS—DUTY ON COTTON.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Finance Minister a question, and as a basis for the question I shall read a very short extract from one of the newspapers of Saturday last. The correspondent of the daily "Mail and Empire," writing from Kingston, says :

To-day the welcome announcement was made that the Kingston Cotton Mill, beginning on Monday next, would be run on full time. When the manager of the mill was seen this forenoon, he said he could not account for the present order any more than they could for the one for half-time a few weeks ago. He was asked whether it was possible that an intimation had been received from Ottawa that the cotton industry would not be seriously interfered with by the coming tariff. He said he could not say anything about that, but would not be surprised if it were true.

I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) will be able to assure the House that nothing so unconstitutional as an intimation with reference, either to the principle or details of the tariff, has been made known to the cotton manufacturers.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) said he was about to put a question. I shall be pleased if he will put that question distinctly, because I must confess I did not hear any question at the conclusion of his remarks. What exactly was the question ?

An hon. MEMBER. Let him give notice.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do not want any notice. If the hon. gentleman states what the question is, I shall answer it.

Mr. FOSTER. The question is simply this, and I supposed it was made quite definite in my concluding sentence, when I hoped that my friend the Finance Minister would be able to assure the House that nothing so unconstitutional had been done by the Government as to give an intimation to the cotton manufacturers with reference either to the principle or details of the tariff, before bringing the tariff down.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hopes of my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) are exceedingly interesting, but I do not think they amount to a question. If so, I shall have to give my hon. friend the assurance that he can always comfort himself with the belief that the present Government will do nothing that is unconstitutional.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend is not satisfied—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. I am perfectly in order. The Finance Minister has asked me to put the question, as he cannot see that a question has yet been put. The question is: Is it true, as intimated in the paragraph I have read, that an intimation has been made by the Finance Minister, or by any member of the Government, with reference to either the principle or details of the cotton schedule which will be framed in the coming tariff?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In the first place, in the paragraph as read by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster), I have failed to hear any statement that the Finance Minister gave any intimation on the subject at all; and in the second place, as he has quoted from the Toronto "Mail and Empire," I beg to say that with every respect to that journal I have no desire to be held responsible for its telegrams.

Mr. FOSTER. I commend the hon. gentleman's answer.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Russell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his speech at the opening of the session.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Mr. Speaker, possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will be able now to answer the question of which I gave notice a couple of days ago.

Mr. FOSTER. You are too inquisitive.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Let us have reciprocity in questions now.

Mr. FIELDING.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I asked my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) whether his opinions as to the settlement which was arrived at in the matter of the Manitoba school question are such as to induce him to move or to support a motion of censure on that settlement. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) does not appear to be in any great hurry to reply to that question. I would like to know, because I will take the liberty of saying to him and to his friend beside him (Sir Charles Tupper), that if these gentlemen do not feel themselves called upon to move a censure upon the settlement which was arrived at, and to which they devoted so large a portion of their speeches, all I can say is—and I think not a few of their own supporters will be disposed to agree with me—that they show very small discretion indeed in dwelling on a subject which must recall painfully to the minds of these hon. gentlemen themselves, and also to the minds of a good many of their supporters, how terribly that question was mishandled by them during the preceding year or two. Sir, I have to say to these gentlemen who criticise so severely the action of the Prime Minister; I have to say to them, that I believe it is a pretty general opinion entertained by both sides of the House that whatever their motives may have been, their action was such as greatly to imperil the peace of Canada, and that it resulted to no small extent, and deservedly resulted, in their own political destruction.

Now, Sir, this question was one of those few questions which arise from time to time and which may, I think, be considered as a real test of the capacity of the men who had to deal with it. The Manitoba question was one which required for its settlement no small amount of courage and no small amount of statesmanship. It was not one of that class of questions which could be settled by a faculty for glib phrase-making; higher qualities a good deal were required for it. How did these hon. gentlemen opposite deal with that question? They had had ample time; heaven knows they had ample time to consider their course. It was not sprung upon them hastily. Four or five years at least had elapsed since that matter became a prominent question in Canada and before these hon. gentlemen were called upon to deal with it, and I will venture to say, looking at the matter impartially, that I do not think it would have been possible for any set of men to have committed a greater number of tactical and strategical blunders in a shorter space of time than they did in their dealings with that question. Why, if there ever was a case in which the Federal Government of Canada were called upon to deal both cautiously and courteously with a provincial government with whom they were brought in contact. I say if there ever was a question on which the Federal Government were called upon to deal cautiously and courteously with a provincial government, it was in reference to that same Manitoba school question.

And yet, Sir, the Manitoba Government, whom it was important for them to have conciliated, with whom it was important to have full negotiation, were treated by them, on the occasion of their issuing what was known as the remedial order, in a fashion in which a common county court debtor would not have been treated in the ordinary courts of this country. That, Sir, was their initial blunder; and, Sir, in a tactical point of view, it was followed by another and, perhaps, greater blunder. The only excuse, from a party point of view, for passing that remedial order was that had they followed it up by a dissolution, they might possibly have had a chance of snatching a verdict; they might have confused the public mind on the question; and they might have posed as constitutional martyrs (which I understand is the role of the hon. leader of the Opposition. They might have passed in the province of Ontario as the mere vehicle for conveying Her Majesty's commands to the electors, and in another section they might have come forward as the chosen champions of the church. What they did practically was to conspire against each other. I do not think this House will readily forget the spectacle—a spectacle never, I trust, to be repeated in our annals—when seven Ministers of the Crown, in the interval between bringing down the Address and its consideration by Parliament, came forward on the floor of this House to denounce their late chief as a traitor or an imbecile. Nor do I think we are likely again to see a repetition of the scene of men, after having, in such fashion, caluminated their chief, choosing to slink back into his Cabinet; and I may add that it was a mistake, which the most ordinary tyro in politics would have avoided committing, under these circumstances, to have staked the whole fortunes of their Government on the desperate chance of passing an Act of the complicated character of the Manitoba School Settlement Act, in the sixth session of moribund Parliament.

The hon. gentleman was pleased to allude rather disrespectfully, I thought, to the conduct of my hon. friend on that occasion. What was the hon. gentleman's conduct, I should like to know? What was his policy, what was his recipe for settling that question? Why, Sir, he knows, and we all know, because he has virtually admitted it, that he was simply making a desperate bid for a certain vote, which he failed to get; and I do not wonder that his disappointment was proportionately considerable. Like Lord Salisbury, on a recent occasion, the hon. gentleman has bet on the wrong horse; but, unlike Lord Salisbury, he had not the frankness to admit that he had made a mistake and was very sorry for it.

It is true, he told us he was going to wash his hands of the question from this time forth; and if he had consulted some of his friends, I think he would have added that for the future he intended to hold his tongue about it. But I do not want to be unreasonable, and perhaps neither they nor I should ask for impossibilities.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that comparisons are odious, and they are likely to be particularly odious to my hon. friend. But I desire to ask in all fairness what this present Government have accomplished in and by the settlement they have effected of the Manitoba school question. Sir, the present Government have grappled with that question as they promised to do, and have grappled with it successfully. The present Government, within six weeks after the last session of Parliament had risen, had accomplished what hon. gentlemen opposite in six years had failed to do, except, indeed, to make confusion worse confounded. Sir, it was a difficult, a delicate and a dangerous problem; and I will venture to say that of all impartial and sensible men throughout this country, ninety-nine out of one hundred, whatever their political creed may be, approve on the whole of that settlement, and are very glad it was effected. I believe, Sir, that when the news spread over our various provinces that that settlement had been successfully accomplished, there was a great and general feeling of relief on the part of men of all classes and creeds and ranks. Sir, what Mr. Laurier promised, Mr. Laurier has done. From the first to the last—and hon. gentlemen know it well, and never was it more plainly and distinctly declared than in the course of the speeches made by my hon. friend last session—from the first to the last during the last half dozen years the whole course of my hon. friend was to advise conciliation. Did he not recognize from the beginning that this was not a matter that could be settled according to strict legal conditions and limitations, but that the feelings, and, if you will, the prejudices, of all classes of the community had to be taken into account, if you were to make a stable and lasting settlement? And if that settlement has been effected, it is due in great measure to the courage and the wisdom of my hon. friend, and also to the loyalty and good sense of his supporters from the province of Quebec. I hold and will maintain that the present Administration has rendered a great service to the people of Canada at large by its settlement of that question; and if hon. gentlemen are not able to recognize it, if they do not choose to applaud it, the least they can do is to be silent respecting it. But, Sir, if hon. gentlemen opposite do not recognize it, I think I may say with truth that the country at large has recognized it fully. Since the terms of the Manitoba school settlement were made public, we have had, in various parts of this country, no less than eight by-elections—one in Manitoba, one in the North-west Territories, four in Ontario, and two in Quebec. If I remember rightly, the seats for which those elections were held were evenly divided, four having been held formerly by our supporters, and four by supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite; and, unless my memory fails me, the net results have been: seven to us and one to them—a proportion which I do not object to, because I should be sorry to see the Opposition unduly diminished in this House. Now, Sir, I humbly submit to those hon. gentlemen that if they pay no attention to our representations, at least they might profit by the lesson taught them by the electors of Saskatchewan, by the lesson taught them by the electors of Cornwall—as to which I think my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) indulged in some prophecies which did not come off; by the lesson taught them by the electors of North Ontario, by the lesson taught them by the electors of Brant, which produced an unpleasant effect, I am told, on my hon. friend's mind; and last, though not least, by the lesson taught them by the electors of Wright and Bonaventure.

An hon. MEMBER. There were more prophecies then.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Well, I was not so well acquainted with these. Possibly, the hon. gentleman will offer the explanation which has been advanced by some of his press, that, after all is said and done, this is not to be wondered at, because by-elections do usually go in favour of the Government of the day. Well, if that be the case, all I can say is that it is a doctrine these hon. gentlemen were diligently preaching to their supporters for eighteen years, and as they have sowed so let them reap. Now, what remains for the country? What remains for the House? I say that, in this matter, this remains. I think that parties on both sides of this House will do well to recognize the utter and superlative folly of stirring this question up any more. So far as federal interference goes, it appears to me that no sensible man can dispute that the page is closed, that we must look, if there be need for further improvement and amendment, to such amendments being made by the Government of Manitoba; and if it will relieve the minds of hon. gentlemen, I can tell them that we have had every assurance that men could have from the Government of Manitoba that this Act of settlement will be administered in a generous and liberal spirit, that my hon. friend (Mr. Greenway) will redeem to the full, in the spirit as well as the letter, the pledge which he made on a certain memorable occasion in Montreal, fresh in the memory. I dare say, of many of my hon. friends. Under these circumstances, he is no friend of his country who will stir this question up again, and if any man so does, let him be buried eight hundred fathoms deep, as in Wright and Bonaventure.

Mr. FOSTER. And have a glorious resurrection.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Of the Manitoba question? I hope my hon. friend will be the party to bring it up. Now, as regards the rest of the attacks from the hon. gentleman, they will be dealt with, I can assure him, in the proper time. These hon. gentlemen complain of dismissals. Well, if dismissals have been improperly made, we are here to justify them and explain the causes, and we are not going to shirk our duty. If they want to discuss the tariff, they need not do it on vague rumours of newspapers, because they will have the opportunity very shortly when the tariff is produced, and they will be heartily welcome to do it.

Mr. FOSTER. When?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No one knows better than my hon. friend that I would be grossly violating my official duty if I were to tell him when. As for those iniquities which have occurred at recent elections, and which were of such a character that they have made the very hair on the head of the hon. leader of the Opposition stand on end, I confess that my imagination fails to realize what they can be. I had thought that, if there was a man who, from his age and experience, was likely to know pretty much everything that could be known in the way of corrupt practices in elections, it was that hon. gentleman. Why, it is my private impression that, so far as hon. gentlemen on this side are concerned, in the matter of corrupt practices at elections, the hon. gentleman has forgotten more than we ever knew. All I can suppose, is that his memory has played him false, and that peradventure, some indiscreet persons at Brant may have resorted to certain old tricks which long ago he may have abandoned in favour of more perfect methods.

There was one point, however, which was made by my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, and to a certain extent endorsed by his hon. friend beside him (Mr. Foster), which needs a little attention. As the House knows, I have been ordinarily adverse to engaging in any financial debate on the Address. Usually speaking, it seemed to me that the proper time to indulge in that was on the occasion of the introduction of the Budget. But I intend to depart a little from my practice on this occasion, and for two good reasons. First of all, that the Opposition have challenged it, and in the next place, because I am perfectly well aware, as is everybody here, that when the Budget comes to be brought down, the attention of this House and the country will be wholly concentrated on the changes proposed to be made in the tariff, and that the mere financial side of the question cannot possibly hope to receive any particular attention. Therefore, it is that being a matter of very considerable moment, I desire to spend a short time in calling the attention of the House to the financial position and the unfairness of the criticisms which were levelled at my hon. friend beside me. Sir, an old trick is being repeated, but it is none the less dangerous on that account. To the older members of this House I may venture to recall the circumstances which attended the fall of the Conservative Government from power in 1873. I very well recollect how, within a very few days after I became Finance Minister, my attention was called to the fact that the Government, which we succeeded had gone out of power, having added over four millions of dollars a year to the annual expenditure of Canada, for which it had made no provision, that it had likewise entered into engagements, set forth in the speech of Sir Leonard Tilley, which would require a further addition, for interest alone, according to his estimate, of $3,360,000 a year, for which no provision had been made, making in all a total addition to our annual charges, when these engagements would be fulfilled, of something like seven and a half million dollars in round numbers; and I very well recollect at that time how exceedingly difficult it was to explain to the hon. leader of the Opposition how he and his friends, who had incurred these liabilities, who had made provision for the huge increase of debt and interest, were in any wise responsible for their own acts. They repudiated them like men, and in the elections which succeeded, we found it exceedingly difficult to explain to the public the extent to which those gentlemen had tied our hands, and the extent of the burdens they had inflicted on Canada. Something of the same kind is being attempted now. These gentlemen have raised, whatever they may be pleased to say to the contrary, our annual expenditure largely. They have left behind them various large and formidable liabilities, for which they had made no provision. But there is this difference between them and their predecessors. Sir Leonard Tilley, whatever else may be said about him, certainly stated plainly and definitely what he had done. Sir Leonard Tilley's successor on the Conservative side has not been equally candid. I am afraid that he has kept his cards up his sleeve, and I propose to explain to the House the reasons why I entirely dissent from the position assumed by him and his friends beside him. Now, I do not want to repeat to the hon. gentleman the language which he thought fit to use to my hon. friend beside me. I shall not, therefore, say that his conduct was indecent in the highest degree—I think that was the phrase he used—and utterly unbecoming a Finance Minister; but I would ask him in what words I can describe his conduct, that will be pleasing to him. I say that the hon. gentleman's conduct on the occasion of the delivery of the last Budget, and his conduct since, has been doubly misleading. In the first place, he concealed facts which it was his bounden duty to have stated to the House and the country, and, in the second place, he is now claiming credit for a reduction for which he has no right to claim credit. I propose to call the attention of the House to the facts, so far as we have ascertained them.

The hon. gentleman cannot possibly deny, because it is a matter of public notoriety, that on the occasion of his last Budget speech he brought down estimates amounting to $38,308,548. Estimates for this sum were commended to our attention in a message from His Excellency himself. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman knew, and everybody who knows anything about our finances knew perfectly well, that these main estimates by no manner of means contained all the sums that he was likely to ask Parliament for. It was perfectly notorious that in addition to them he would be obliged to bring down large supplemental estimates. Over and over again, not one, but twenty times, knowing that, I in my place in Parliament demanded of him that he would state to us what these supplemental estimates were, in order that we might know, in order that the country might know, the true amount of money which was required for the services of 1896-97. Not one single particle of information could we extract from the hon. gentleman. But, Sir, after the hon. gentleman went out of office I was able to obtain a copy of the estimates which had been submitted for the consideration of Council, which I now hold in my hand, and I beg to call the attention of the House to the fact that, over and above the $38,308,000 in his main estimates the hon. gentleman had under consideration the trifling sum of $3,180,000, to be added to the consolidated fund expenditure. I say nothing of capital charges, nor would this include all the estimates he would probably have had to produce. So that, if the hon. gentleman were to be judged, as he ought to be judged, by the addition together of his supplemental estimates and his main estimates, the sum that he was expecting to demand for the charges of the year was $41,488,578. I say nothing of the large statutory provisions, I say nothing of the large loan engagements, I say nothing of the proposals he made to us for the construction of railroads in Prince Edward Island and elsewhere. I just give the general results and they are these—that the hon. gentleman, had the opportunity presented itself to him, was, apparently, willing to have raised our expenditure to forty-one and a half millions per annum, with a million and a half or two millions to follow if his engagements were fulfilled and the provisions of statutes involving heavy charges were carried out. Now, the hon. gentlemen come to us and say that they are responsible only for the expenditure of 1895-96 amounting to thirty-seven millions. On that, I will have a word to say hereafter. But at present I desire to say;—and this is a point on which, I have not the slightest doubt, I shall not gain the hon. gentleman's concurrence, but I appeal to the judgment of the country and the House;—that the attempt to disown the responsibility for these supplemental estimates, under the circumstances, is disingenuous and unfair. I will not permit, I trust my hon. friends will not permit, I trust our press will not permit, the hon. gentleman to repudiate his own supplemental estimates. It is a well known principle of law, I believe—my legal friends can correct me if I am wrong—that no man should be allowed to profit by his own wrong doing. I hold that hon. gentleman doubly responsible. First of all I say, and everybody, I think, who considers the constitutional rule, will see the force of my contention, that it was his bounden duty, having brought down his main estimates, to lay his supplemental estimates on the Table. That was his duty to the House, it was doubly and trebly his duty to the country. He and his friends were about to appeal to the country to judge between them and us, and it was very important, in the public interest, that the people should be fully advised of the sum total which these gentlemen required for the services of the coming year. Now, I lay it down as a sound constitutional principle, that honour, justice, and good faith required that the hon. gentleman should take the House and the country into his confidence as to the extent of his supplemental estimates. Heaven knows he had time enough to do it. In the last six or seven weeks of the session what had he to do? He was keeping us here morning, noon, and night, or his leader was, and he himself had nothing to do but to polish and finish and bring down his supplemental estimates, which he should have done. Another thing will commend itself to the House and it is this. All through the last elections, more particularly in the Maritime provinces, we found that these gentlemen were using statements from these very supplemental estimates in various counties for the purpose of promoting the election of their friends. My Nova Scotia friends know how they were met in various counties with the statement that were it not for the Opposition, such and such and such and such items for the benefit of Nova Scotia would have been passed in the supplemental estimates. And, certainly, the former First Minister is not liable to the charge of having forgotten his own, for I see in the supplemental estimates that he proposed to give 106 separate votes in Nova Scotia. So I say the hon. gentleman has no right to repudiate his supplemental estimates now. Mind, I do not pretend to say that he might not possibly have pared them down, but, under the circumstances, and knowing the conditions under which these gentlemen were struggling for existence, knowing the difficulty they had to keep their men in their own ranks, I can tell you, Sir, my private impression is, that very few of these supplemental estimates would have been withdrawn before—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. FOSTER. Private impressions do not count.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We will not call it that. I say that is the inference I draw and that the previous conduct of these hon. gentlemen and the surrounding circumstances warrant that way of putting it.

Now I come to another side of the case. The hon. gentleman places himself on his expenditure for 1896. He declares, and declares with truth, that this showed a very considerable reduction from the expenditure of 1895. In 1895 our charges against consolidated revenue amounted to $38,132,000, and in 1896, they had fallen to $36,949,142. That would have been an important reduction on one condition—that it was an honest and a fair reduction and was likely to be permanent. But how was that reduction produced? I will give the House a sample or two. Take, first, the case of militia. In 1895 these gentlemen expended $1,574,000 on militia, while in 1896 they expended $1,136,000. Now, was that a bona fide saving? Not a bit of it; it was effected simply by declining to drill the militia, simply, I may say, by wasting two-thirds of the vote; because, without the annual drill—as my hon. friend the Minister of Militia pointed out to the House—the great bulk of the expenditure, not all, but a very large portion of the expenditure incurred, was absolutely useless. To claim this $300,000 or $400,000 as a genuine saving is to trifle with the House and the country. We will take another case—the post office. I am aware that my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) has had a special audit made of the transactions in his department, and I am informed that he has discovered that some $500,000 or $600,000 of accounts which ought to have been charged to and paid in 1896 have been thrown over to 1897. Sir, under these circumstances, I am not altogether surprised that the hon. gentleman was able to make a reduction of a million or more; and it is easy to force a balance on those terms.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend vouch for the accuracy of that statement he makes?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I cannot vouch from my personal knowledge of the matter; I can vouch for my hon. friend having made an audit, and I am advised that is the result. No doubt the hon. gentleman will have the most ample opportunity of discussing that matter in detail. Mind you, Sir, these are only selections; because I have strong reason for believing that a closely similar scheme, or practice, was carried out in respect of the public works of this country, and that numerous sums which ought to have been charged to 1896 were thrown improperly into 1897; and I am bound to say that the last three or four years go to show tolerably clearly that this practice existed. In 1896 our public works cost us $1,927,000; in 1894 they cost us $2,033,000; in 1895 they cost us $1,742,000; in 1896 they fell to $1,299,000. Now, that may have been genuine economy, but I am afraid that when my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works comes to explain the details of his department, he will be obliged to point out to the House that the way in which this was effected was by endangering many important public works, by neglecting work that ought to have been done, and, as I said, by deliberately casting forward on 1897, for very obvious reasons, charges and expenditures that ought to have been properly placed to the credit of 1895-96.

Mr. FOSTER. Which cannot be done.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Oh, my hon. friend underrates his own ingenuity.

Mr. FOSTER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. I said that it cannot be done; I meant that it could not be done while I was Finance Minister, and while we had the public works under our management.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Perhaps it was done during the six days you were out.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say it could not be done under the present regime.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. My hon. friend, on consideration, admits the possibility. I do not know whether he accepts my hon. friend's suggestion that a great deal of mischief was done in the interregnum. However, I think my hon. friend beside me will be able to make it very plain and clear to the House that for the sake of producing an apparent saving in 1896, many important public works which ought to have been attended to, were neglected. There is not the slightest doubt that that can be done. There is not the slightest doubt, either, that by neglecting at the proper time legitimate expenditure on important public works which were in danger of being destroyed, for the sake of effecting an apparent and temporary saving of a few thousand dollars, a loss of many hundreds of thousands of dollars may easily be inflicted upon the public. I repeat, it is exceedingly easy to force a balance on those terms; and it is for these reasons that I wholly and utterly repudiate, for myself and for my friends here, any idea of admitting that the actual statement of 1896 can be taken at all as a fair average, or as fairly representing the true actual expenditure of the people of Canada for that period. Now, Sir, let us briefly sum up the situation as we find it. We find here, as I have said, a false and fictitious economy practised in 1896, by which an apparent saving of a million over the preceding year of 1895 was effected at the expense of great loss to the service, and by throwing over on the succeeding year large sums of money which ought to have been properly charged to 1896. We find, also, that the actual engagements for 1897, and the liabilities that they had incurred for various works, some of which were proper enough, such as canals, and for various other works as to which I have my doubts, such as their projected scheme of railways in Prince Edward Island, and certain other works of a similar order—all this would have entailed future liabilities of one million and a half a year. So that we had practically, although not nominally, a real charge against the public revenue under the hon. gentleman, if he had had the candour to bring down the supplementary estimates, if he had had the candour to allow the House to know the position in which we really were—an actual charge of about $41,500,000, supplemented by other charges of the same character, which would have amounted to a million and a half more at least, if not two million. Now, the hon. gentleman is aware that forty-one million and a half, and one million and a half, equal forty-three millions, and that would be a very much more accurate statement of the case than the assumption that all he is entitled to be charged with is the thirty-seven millions which were actually expended in 1896. Now, Sir, it is only common justice to the Government, it is only common justice to my hon. friend, that these facts should be stated and publicly brought forward. I can tell my hon. friends here present that they may rely upon it that this assertion which I have just exposed, will be brought against them on every occasion that they will have to meet the electors, after the actual facts of the case have been forgotten; and I urge upon them to take the earliest opportunity, collectively and individually, of impressing upon the people, so far as in them lies, the real and actual state of the case. It is not correct, it is not true, to say that these hon. gentlemen went out of office with an expenditure of thirty-seven millions; it is correct to say that their main and supplementary estimates together amounted to forty-one millions and a half; and if they object to being charged with the whole of their supplementary estimates, on their own heads be it, because, in defiance of constitutional practice and their clear duty to the country, they concealed the facts from the electors, as they concealed the facts from the House in the session of 1895-96. Now, Sir, for the rest I have simply to say this to the hon. gentlemen: We are perfectly well aware, on this side of the House, that we have got a delicate and very important task to discharge. I am not going into a discussion of the tariff, or any of its conditions, but I will say to the hon. gentlemen, that it is the earnest desire, and will be the endeavour of the Government, so far as in them lies, to do justice to all classes in this community, to do justice to the consumer, to the producer, and to the manufacturer alike, and they hope to be able to produce a tariff at an early date which will show that the Government of Canada have, to say the least of it, made an honest attempt to do their duty by the people who have entrusted them with the responsibility of office.

Mr. DAVIN. I do not rise to take up the time of the House at any length upon the Address. But I think it would be improper that I should allow the debate on the Address to go by without expressing my own opinion, and also the opinions of those whom I represent, on some of the subjects of that Address. But, Sir, before I deal with anything in the Address, I want to deal with what it is not in the Speech. When I heard it read, I was amazed, because when the hon. Prime Minister and several of his colleagues were up west, when they were in Manitoba, when they were in the Territories, and in British Columbia, they held out before the people of the west that certain things were dear to their legislative hearts, and that the moment they got an opportunity they would put them into practice. The Minister of the Interior, whom I do not see in his place just now, spoke at Moosomin. After he had been made Minister of the Interior he spoke at Brandon, full of his blushing honours; he spoke at Winnipeg where he received a banquet, and he there held out before the people of the west that we should have a Land Bill, that we should have a measure enlarging the powers of the Executive of the North-west Territories. But, Sir, I look in vain in this Address for anything whatever for the North-west Territories. But a more important man than the Minister of the Interior dealt with this matter. The Prime Minister himself, when he was up west, promised to do away with tariff monopoly, with land monopoly; and what was of great importance, and what he dwelt on in many places, he would do away with the oppressive freight rates on the railways. Last year, and last session when I put a question on the Paper to the Prime Minister and asked him how he was going to implement the promise that he made at

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Moose Jaw to do away with the oppressive freight rates, his answer to me was that that promise must have been made in connection with the tariff, and that the tariff was to be so regulated that the result would be that freight rates would be greatly modified, and their oppressive incidence upon the travelling public, removed. That was not explained. Nor it seems shall we have relief. I come to that conclusion from the tenor of this speech, and also by what we hear, for instance from the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, that leading organ which for seventeen years expressed the varying opinions of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat and of his colleagues, which for seventeen years was consistent only in opposition to the National Policy. I find that organ in 1882 stated that the moment the Liberal party got into power they would sweep away every vestige of protection. I read to-day a speech delivered by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) not made so long ago as 1882, not made longer ago than three years, in which he described the manufacturers of this country as legalized robbers, and yet to-day he concluded his speech by asserting that when the tariff was brought down it would be found that all interests, including the interests of manufacturers, would be protected. Sir, I greatly admire the mildness, the contentedness of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Why, Sir, I not only admire him, but I admire the cloak—I do not want to use that term harshly—the smiling mask he puts on, in view of the feelings that must rankle in his breast when he looks back to his seventeen years of denunciation of the National Policy, when he recalls the fact that the Liberal party has come into power not by means of free trade, although he often declared that free trade as it is in England was inscribed on their banner, and when he looks back over those seventeen years and finds that now that the party has reached power he is not only degraded from the position of Finance Minister to which he properly looked forward, but is like the captives of old, dragged at the tail of the triumphal chariot of a policy which he utterly abhors. The hon. gentleman has ventured to say something about keeping faith, about carrying out the policy of which the party with which he acts has held out before the public. I cannot speak leniently of the position of hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to their promises on the tariff, or in respect to their promises upon any subject whatever. The leader of the Opposition when speaking the other night excited a good deal of laughter by quoting what the Minister of Fisheries said in Wright County, that he would be very much surprised to see the Liberal Government keep its promises. Coleridge used to say that he did not believe in ghosts, as he had seen too many. On the same principle, I do not believe in Liberal promises, and I never had such doubt in Liberal promises as I have at the present moment. In fact, much as I admire the Prime Minister, and I do sincerely admire him, and I am glad we have such a man to go and represent us at the Queen's jubilee, for we shall be well represented and nobody can say that he will be a man who will require any allowances to be made for him—when I look at the history of the last few years, at the statements made in regard to the tariff especially and made throughout the length and breadth of the country, and compare the position taken then with the position taken by the hon. gentleman now and the position for which we have been prepared by the turning around and swivelling on the part of the "Globe," for which there is no parallel whatever, I must admit that it is very hard indeed to be asked to trust almost any promise made by hon. gentlemen opposite, because it is perfectly clear that even they laugh heartily at the position in which they find themselves. They have sold the people, they have sold to some extent the Conservative party, they have sold the great Liberal party throughout the country. It is true that members on the back benches will cheer them, and that when the House divides those members will stand behind their leaders, and they will have a majority in the House. But what is a political party? It is a body of men in a country who believe in certain principles and aim to carry out these principles. And was there ever a set of politicians who to the same extent as the leaders of the Liberal party abandoned every principle inscribed on its banner in the past, especially every principle of free trade? As to promises: the other day I saw in the "Globe" a cartoon, which was a companion cartoon to one to which I called the attention of the House last session. The cartoon to which I then called attention represented the Prime Minister as bending over a North-west farmer and administering to him the wine of consolation and pouring the oil of comfort into his wounds. The other day we had what was almost a replica of that. It must be admitted that Mr. Bengough, who at one time was thought to be and I suppose is still considered to be a man of genius, has been struck with atrophy. Since he sold his genius for hire and became a mere instrument to represent partisan views, no longer do we find in those cartoons the humour that once characterized them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Not for you.

Mr. DAVIN. My perception is not so keen as that of the hon. gentleman; I do not see humour in them. We had a replica, and what was it? We had a picture of the Premier leaning over a Northwest farmer, who was very much oppressed, and the Prime Minister was giving him, among other things, "freedom from land monopoly," "freedom from tariff monopoly," "freedom from railway monopoly." Where are all those remedial measures set forth in the Speech from the Throne? There is no such remedy mentioned. The only thing the Prime Minister has done for the North-west is this: He has stood sponsor for a bell which is to be sent to Wolseley. I was glad to notice this fact, because I suppose we in the North-west must be thankful for small mercies. We have at the hands of the Premier the blessing of a bell to be sent up to Wolseley, and when the bell is rung and its tones vibrate it will tend to dissipate evil spirits. Not only so, but we are told it will dissipate bad weather; and so I suppose when a blizzard is coming over the North-west the bell will bid us not to grieve because we did not get freedom from railway monopoly from its sponsors; but the magic and brazen tongue will send forth its vibrations over the North-west Territories, and no doubt the result will be that the ticket sellers at the railway stations will charge less, and if there is a blizzard brewing, why it won't dare to make its appearance. So, Sir, we must be thankful that we have got from the sponsor of the bell this brazen present in order to dispel any gloom and make up any difficulties that may attach to us up there.

Now, seriously speaking in regard to this tariff, hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches are in a position that cannot be justified on any moral ground. They have come into power promising to carry out a certain policy, and it is now perfectly clear they are not going to carry out that policy. What is their position? My hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has used very strong language about the Estimates that he alleges were not brought down by the ex-Finance Minister. He has suggested fraudulent action, deceptive action, in not bringing alleged Supplementary Estimates down. But what is the position of his own Government? Are they standing in the same shoes that they stood in up to the date on which the election was won? Are they going to implement one of their promises? Is there a single promise of theirs in regard to the tariff which they are going to carry out? If we are to believe the "Globe," if we are to believe the guarded statement of the hon. gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. Russell), what are we to assume is their position? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) is as eloquent as he is learned, but I believe he is a strong free trader, and although there was the same felicity of language as he used last session, and although there was the same grace of utterance, he was very like (and I do not say it in any uncomplimentary mood), he was like an unwilling school boy brought up by the ear to say an unwelcome lesson. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) did not like the task that had been set him. He had to prepare this House and to prepare the country for one of the most flagrant slops-over that has ever occurred in the history of any political party. Remember, Mr. Speaker, that there is no parallel for the position that the Liberal leaders are in to-day. There is no parallel in the case of Sir Robert Peel. Peel, four years before he took action on the corn laws, had proclaimed a principle that carried within it the kernel of the action that he afterwards took on that question. He had proclaimed himself a free trader, and he said there were two planks on which he would not carry out his free trade views, and he mentioned the corn and sugar laws. Peel was some four years in office and meanwhile important events had taken place. He was not hot from an election where he had professed principles wholly different from those he was about to carry out in practice. There is no parallel for gentlemen coming back fresh from the constituents with a mandate to carry out free trade as they have it in England, a mandate not to leave a vestige of protection in the tariff, a mandate not to leave a single grain of the virus of protection in our fiscal policy; there is no parallel, I say, for a party in the position of the Liberal party of Canada acting as they now propose to do. This was the mandate that they had from the electorate to which they made these professions, and they come here, and they are not warm in their seats when they refuse to carry out these promises. The "Star" newspaper, on July 2nd, commenced an article by saying: Now that it is clear Mr. Laurier is not going in for a revenue tariff, then such and such things have to be considered. They propose to carry out their policy on the lines of protection, although the people were told by the Prime Minister himself, and by others of his supporters, that not an atom of protection was to be allowed to remain in the tariff. The hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright)—who should have been Minister of Finance—denounced all the manufacturers as robbers.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Are you not pleased that he has changed his mind?

Mr. DAVIN. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) will excuse me if I say that I am not discussing now whether I am pleased with the change of mind or not. I may be pleased that gentlemen have adopted views that I have held, but I am not pleased to have men occupying the high position of members of the Government of Canada laughing cynically in the face of the electors they have deceived. I am not pleased with that, and I am not pleased to see a whole lot of gentlemen that have been howling all over the country for seventeen years in favour of a revenue tariff and against protection, and who in this House

Mr. DAVIN.

I have heard for ten years cheering and cheering the sentiments of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); I am not pleased to see them, now that they are wallowing in power, laughing at their own shame. There is no man in Canada who has finer qualities or no man who could occupy the position of Prime Minister in a more distinguished manner than the present Premier of this Dominion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes; but there is no man who has occupied that position, or could ever occupy it, that, in my opinion, has struck or could strike a more deadly blow at public morals. I say that already a deadly blow has been struck at public morals. When I come to deal with the school question, although I probably shall have to say some things that will surprise some of my friends, I will show where I think the Prime Minister was wrong there. I will not discuss the financial question raised by the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright), but as it is now palpable that the Government of Canada is going to turn around to its followers and say to them: We want you to be converted in squadrons and baptized into our new doctrine in platoons; I must say that the spectacle presented to this young country and to the world at large is an immoral spectacle.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Oh.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, I say it is, and I say that it must be attended with a serious Nemesis for the country, and that if the people of this country are what I believe them to be; if the Liberal party of Canada is, as I believe it to be, composed of honest men who hold honestly by their opinions; then, Sir, the first real opportunity that is given them they will undoubtedly avenge their betrayal. Not merely has the Liberal party been, as it were, sold, but look at the position of the Patrons. In the "Sun" of 1894—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Tell us about your majority.

Mr. DAVIN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that any one will suppose I am making an idle boast when I say that I can deal with that gentleman or with the whole crowd. You know, Mr. Speaker, that he has no right to make that kind of interruption. It is the first time I ever appealed to the Chair, but I must mention that last year similar interruptions took place, and I had to turn around and deal with these gentlemen, and when it was found that I was squeezing them pretty tightly, then the Chair came to their rescue, although I was the person over whom your aegis should have been thrown. Sir, I call on you to defend me, although I must say that I do not need your defence, for I can take care of the whole crowd of them any time I like.

There is another body in this country that has reason to complain. I refer to the Patrons. I see a distinguished Patron opposite me, a colleague of mine from the North-west Territories.

Mr. BENNETT. He has his trunk, too.

Mr. DAVIN. Has he his trunk ?

Mr. BENNETT. Yes.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, impossible. However, don't you interrupt me either. I was reading a few days ago a letter addressed to the Patrons by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) in which that gentleman tells them : " My dear friends, why should you think that you and the Liberal party are opposed to each other. I have read the Patron platform, and these are exactly the principles for which the Liberal party has been contending for years." He goes over these principles in the most loving manner, and, in his elephantine way, of course metaphorically, he hugs to his bosom, the Patron correspondent, as a friend and a brother and says: " These are my principles." The principle most dear to the Patron heart is a tariff for revenue, and the hon. member declares it to be a principle most dear to his heart. Where are the Patrons today ? Nothing contributed much more to the success of the Liberal party in the late contest than the support they got, sometimes insidious, sometimes genuine, from the Patron body. The great majority are noble specimens of our yeomanry, thoroughly honest men. Where are the Patrons today ? Where will they be when they find that the party to which they gave their support and in which they trusted has sold them also ?

One subject in which we are much interested in the North-west is the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, and I see nothing about that subject here. It is important, as everybody who knows anything about the mining conditions of Roseland and Slocan knows, that we should have a railway there as soon as possible. What we are doing at the present moment is building up a great American city, when we might be building up a great Canadian city, because we have not the transportation facilities. Why have we not ? Was there or was there not a bargain made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build that railway ? If there was a bargain made with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build it, and proper conditions were imposed, as I gathered from the "Globe" newspaper, which I read very religiously, we should know it. The Government would have had my support if they had chosen to build the railway either in that way or to build it themselves. In fact, I am inclined to think—and we may as well face the question—that in the not distant future we shall have to have Government railways, if we want to retain our freedom in this country. Whether that railway is built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, or by another company, or by the Government directly, built it should be. Why have we no mention here of that railway ? Because, Sir, the practice which characterizes hon. gentlemen on other matters is going to characterize them on this, and they are going to put off to a safe or tactical moment the taking of a definite course.

There is another subject which is dear to the North-west, of which we have no mention here, that is, the Hudson's Bay Railway. The people of the North-west are anxious to have the Hudson's Bay Railway built ; why is it we have no mention of it here ? The Minister of Marine and Fisheries has sent a little twopenny-halfpenny boat up to the Hudson's Bay to see whether it is navigable for four or five months in the year. We did not need to have that fact established, for it is already established. Why did he not accept the offer of an English firm to send out boats of a proper size, and maintain the navigation if he would build the road ? Thus going farther than merely testing the question, instead of sending up a little boat which will be crushed between the icebergs ? The Winnipeg "Free Press," which cannot be said to be other than friendly to the present Government, discussing this question, pointed out that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had never uttered one word on the subject that was not hostile to the Hudson's Bay Railway. It expressed regret that so important a matter was in the charge of that hon. gentleman, and even hinted that he had sent such a boat to the Hudson's Bay to test its navigability, as would force the person commanding it to come back and report that the Bay was not navigable, and that the project should be given up. No government can have the confidence of the North-west, as I know it, which is not ready to build the Hudson's Bay Railway. There is no question so near to the hearts of the people of the Territories, and I am therefore surprised to see no mention of it in this Speech.

There are other things which I miss. We were promised by the hon. Minister of the Interior, in those post-prandial speeches which he made, a Land Bill. One of the hon. members of this House has brought forward certain views in regard to our land laws, both in and out of this House. Some ten years ago the "Call" of Winnipeg was converted to those views, but even before that time, even as far back as 1885, a person in the North-west advocated that the Government should acquire the odd sections. Almost the very words of that person were quoted by the Minister of the Interior on the occasion to which I have referred. He pointed to the great loneliness of the settlers, and other difficulties under the present system; and I am very glad, although it is late in the day, that the same views have commended themselves to another member of the House coming from the North-west Territories. But how is it that we have no mention of that question in this Speech, after the Minister of the Interior announced at those banquets that he intended to deal with the question? How is it, I repeat, that we have no mention here of any amendment to the North-west Territories Act, which also we were promised? In his speech at Moosomin, the Minister of the Interior said that now that he had become Minister of the Interior, the swaddling days of the North-west Territories were over. He said he was surprised at the moderation of the demands of the North-west Executive. I think he had had an interview, a couple of days before that banquet, with my hon. friend Mr. Haultain, the head of the Executive, and Mr. James H. Ross, a colleague of his. He had an interview with those gentlemen, and he said, fresh from that interview, that he was surprised at the moderation of their demands. Those demands were for enlarged powers. They were demands which were made of the late Government when we spoke on this question, and which prominent men in the then Opposition, notably Mr. Mills, who is no longer here, I regret to say, rose up to state should be granted because the Territories were ripe for responsible government. We have not a hint now of anything at all being done in the way of conceding those demands. In fact, if a little bird has told me rightly, it would seem that the Government has sat upon the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The Minister of the Interior, I have no doubt, made his proposals, but the Government sat on them.

Mr. FOSTER. He was going to sit on them.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, in one of his speeches he said he was bound to have a free hand. He intended that things should be changed. He even pointed out that all the blame was not to be attached to Mr. Daly, that if Mr. Daly failed it was not all his fault, that it was the fault of the other members of the Conservative Government, who had sat on Mr. Daly, but that he was not going to be sat upon. He would let the Government understand that he was going to have a free hand. He—an independent man—would not have accepted the position at all unless he were going to have a free hand. Well, Mr. Speaker, I am told that the way he has had a free hand is that he left the Council two or three times in dudgeon, threatening, I suppose, to resign, but the following morning found him in his place again. That is the independent man who was going to do so much for the Territories.

Mr. DAVIN.

An hon. MEMBER. They are not a happy family.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that. But that is one of the reasons why I admire the First Minister so much. I may tell him that, against the opinion of some of his own friends as well as mine, I have never wavered in my estimate of him. I have always maintained that he was not merely a cultivated and refined man, but a strong man as well, and I have been confirmed in that opinion by the way in which he has managed his team. Why, there is the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) who has been a kind of Czar in his section; there is the hon. member for—

Mr. BENNETT. North Lincoln (Mr. Gibson).

Mr. DAVIN. No. I am going higher than that, there is the hon. member for Sunbury and Queen's (Mr. Blair) who has also been in his province, a kind of Czar; then take the hon. member who has lately taken his seat—think of the ponderous eloquence of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when, from that seat where the hon. leader of the Opposition now sits, he used to rise and thunder and swell and fume and roar, and now we find he can do nothing more than smile blandly at his own disruption. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is a wonderful thing. I having been reading some of the speeches of the Finance Minister, and find that he is a great free trader, that he perfectly abhors every vestige of protection just as much as ever my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did, and yet he, too, eats the leek with just as good grace as the hon. member for South Oxford. I have a speech of the member for Sunbury and Queen's (Mr. Blair) to which I wish to call the attention of the House, and I am sorry he is not in his place.

An hon. MEMBER. Wait until after dinner.

Mr. DAVIN. Is it possible that this is getting unpleasant for hon. gentlemen? I grant you it is unpleasant for people to be confronted with the ghosts of their own misdeeds. You all remember that scene in Macbeth, which is one of the most striking in the whole range of dramatic literature. When Macbeth, after having committed a crime, is confronted with the ghost of the murdered Banquo, he exclaims: "Take any shape but that." And I have not the slightest doubt that for hon. gentlemen opposite, who still have some sense of shame left in them, it is cruel to have conjured up before them the ghosts of these broken promises and these dead reputations, because the reputations of some of these gentlemen are pretty well interred now. We had a visit from the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) at Regina, and there he made a speech, and an able speech, as no doubt he could not fail to do. I had not the honour of hearing him, because his speech was addressed only to a select number of the Liberal party in the Liberal room, or I would certainly have been present. The hon. gentleman said :

The Liberal party had strenuously upheld great principles during a very long period in opposition, and it was now their duty to apply these principles.

How are they going to apply them ? I suppose the hon. gentleman will change his tune when he comes to address you in this House. Oh, he will say, the Liberal party had strenuously upheld great principles during a very long period in opposition, and it is now our duty to eat them all.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Are you speaking of your majority of one ?

Mr. DAVIN. That joke, if joke it be, has done its work. There was never anything gaulois about it, and it comes with very bad grace from the representative of a witty race. He makes but a sorry exhibition when he has always to hark back to a poor little joke ; it shows a barrenness of intellect on the part of my hon. friend which one would hardly have expected. But I know that he is suffering, too, and has to be content with very little.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I had a bigger majority than that.

Mr. DAVIN. I know that very well, but I see the pallor that never fails to come on the face of a man that is dying of balked and baffled ambition. These little petulant out-breaks on the part of my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) argue a want of respect for his great leader. Does he not see that I am building a pyramid on which to place his leader ? I want to show how high I place his leader, because I am building a pyramid for him upon the bones of these distributed and degraded statesmen. Let me refer to a statement made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) to which some importance appears to have been attached because the Minister of Railways repeated it at Regina. He says : Every man in the Government had achieved signal success in his own business. If that is intended to have any influence on the electors, I would point out that it is not true. Every member of the Government has not achieved success in his own business. But if the statement is meant to carry weight with the electors, I wish, I repeat to point out that it is untrue. What is the major premise behind it ? It is that the man who achieves success in his private business is likely to prove a good statesman. I say that the converse of this is true. I say that a man capable of taking an interest in public matters has a great weight to carry the moment he attempts to succeed in his own private affairs, and this has been the history of every great statesman, be it in Greece, or Rome, or England, or Canada. What has been the fate of most of the Prime Ministers of Canada ? My late illustrious friend, Sir John Macdonald, told me once that most of the Prime Ministers of Canada had died paupers. Why ? Because a man cannot devote the whole force of his intellect to the affairs of other people and attend to his own. What enables a man to succeed in business ? Narrow concentration upon his own concerns. Take the greatest statesman England ever produced, who, I think, undoubtedly, was the younger Pitt. He could not take care of his own affairs, but left those affairs in a state of the greatest possible confusion. I could give a dozen of such instances and, on the other hand, I could give you the names of men who have risen to the places of statesmen and have been able to take care of their own private affairs, and have bungled the public business, as was done by a celebrated Athenian statesman. I do not wish to elaborate this point, but I may say that the position I take is shown in the very Government we have to-day, because the men in that Government who have the best claims to be considered statesmen are not the men who have paid most attention to their own private affairs. He goes on then to speak about railways :

He believed it was more important to know the people's wishes than to know the wishes of the men who have charters and have already a large railway system.

He is taking a dig here at the Canadian Pacific Railway, though at that very time it is believed an arrangement had been come to by other members of the Government with that railway.

I feel that the time has come for a new departure in the principle of railway building in Canada—or the adoption of a principle founded on the real interests of the people who have to pay for the building. In any case, their interest alone is to be considered in plan and methods of railway construction. He would cast no reflection upon any existing corporation.

You see he is doing what the Prime Minister objected to—he is striking by innuendo at the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Men are alike. They do not do business for their health.

And so on. Then he closes in this way :

He promised that he would propound in Council the railway policy he had outlined, and make secure the approval of his colleagues. He believed that it would be like bread cast upon the waters—the return would surely come with manifold advantage.

And he says earlier that it is sometimes to the advantage of the country to work a Government railway at a loss rather than to give the building to a corporation. Why then is it that we have nothing for the

Crow's Nest Pass? It is absolutely needed at the present time, and it should be built, if necessary, as a Government work. My hon. friend who has just sat down spoke about incompetence. In regard, anyway, to the part of the country I am interested in, the grossest incompetence is shown in relation to this important work, and in having no announcement regarding the Hudson's Bay Railway, and in having nothing concerning legislation to amend the monopoly freight rates. Not one single suggestion have we that we are to be relieved from the freight rates that weighed so heavily upon the souls of hon. gentlemen. I think that we in the North-west Territories have some right to complain of that. Then, Sir, we hear something of another proposed measure. I do not propose to dwell upon this as it is none of my funeral. I refer to a bill of pains and penalties against the bishops in Quebec. If bishops, or priests, or ministers, clergymen of any church, go out of their way to interfere improperly in elections, any man or any government that take steps to prevent such conduct shall have my sympathy and support. But, Sir, the "Mail" smelt a rat months ago in regard to these ecclesiastical philippics in Quebec. The fact is that in the history of politics or in the history of art, there never has been such a sublime comedy, such a sublime piece of melodrama played as that played by the Liberal leaders in regard to this school question. We should have a trilogy. I would fain take as my subject "Not for Joe, or the engineer hoist with his own petard." First, we had Joe Martin, whom I regret not to see in this House. He passed the Manitoba legislation of 1890, and, at the same time, he declared himself to be the greatest enemy in Canada of the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He declared himself, in season and out of season, the enemy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He does all he can to get his party into power. His party gets into power and where is he? The engineer is hoist with his own petard. He passes the School Bill of Manitoba, but he himself reaps nothing of the success of his policy. He denounces the freight rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but we find him pocketing $12,000 a year to further the Canadian Pacific Railway, and doing everything he can for them. That is a good sample of Liberal existency, but he, of course, is only a minor actor. The great actor in this melodrama is the Prime Minister himself. He poses well. He behaved with great skill in regard to the school question. Of course he was in danger with a certain portion of the people in the west especially—there are such things as prejudices in the world—but what is done? A certain number of his clerical friends in Quebec make a feint of fighting him. They issue thunders of a certain sort against him, but when you examine them, they are as harmless as the powder crackers that the boys let off in the streets on a certain day in November. No better course could be taken for the hon. gentleman than that. It enables his supporters in the west to figure him as riding the Protestant horse and as the champion of Protestantism against ecclesiastical and hierarchical tyranny. It is really amusing. But I think he should have put an embargo on that reporter, that enthusiastic reporter, who has now revealed him to us in his true light, because no man who was not heart and soul with the Ultramontane party in Quebec would be able seriously to go through the solemn ceremony of standing spousor to the blessing of the bell. That, I am told, is a cardinal test of a man's devotion to the extreme tenets of the church to which he belongs; and therefore all this supposed fighting with ecclesiastics on the part of my hon. friend, is but a masked fight. The truth is that it is a fine piece of melodrama which enables the hon. gentleman to carry out the Government policy in Quebec as a devoted son of the church, while he rides the Protestant horse out west, wearing the appropriate danger scarf while fighting the ecclesiastics. It is a case of riding two horses. In circuses I have seen these clever acrobats riding two horses when there was not more than a foot or so between the horses, and thought it marvellous enough, but to ride two horses with fifteen hundred miles between them displays an agility on the part of my hon. friend the Prime Minister that even I was unable to give him credit for, until I had witnessed it. Now, having remarked upon the melodramatic character that applies to a good deal of the discussion connected with the school question, let me say what I think of the action of the Manitoba Government in regard to that. Now, Sir, in regard to this settlement I think I speak not only for myself but for a good many others, when I say that the legislation of Mr. Greenway is, to my mind, a final act. I consider that that legislation is very like what I suggested in 1895 should be done. The only government that I held should deal with it, the only power that could deal with it successfully, in my opinion, has dealt with it—the Government of Manitoba and the legislature of Manitoba. I consider that as between those who held that this Parliament could deal fruitfully with the question, and myself, there was always a great gulf. I never could think that any other power could settle that question except the Government and legislature of Manitoba. I may say also that whatever they have done was very like what has been done in the North-west Territories, and I accept that, and have no adverse criticism to make on it. Now, there is a point connected with that which I wish to mention. The Prime Minister, in his speech on that question, very properly, and very honestly, took the responsibility for that settlement as being the outcome of an agreement made between the Government of Canada and the Government of Manitoba. I have no controversy with the settlement, I personally am satisfied with that settlement; but if I had a controversy with it, I would have to point this out, that it is not, of course, a settlement in this sense, that when two parties have a controversy, and an arbitrator comes to settle the matter between them and you bring both of them together, and the two agree, you have a settlement. Here you have the controversy dealt with in a different way and it is not a settlement in that sense. An arrangement has been made between the two governments, and so far as the Government consulted with others, they probably were acting unconstitutionally, although I would not attack them for consulting with others than the Government of Manitoba. But, Sir, what the Prime Minister has done is to take full responsibility for that settlement, and before the country to-day he is as responsible for that settlement, as Mr. Greenway is responsible before the people of Manitoba. In his own language, what has taken place? I have thus far spoken for myself, but now speaking for others, I must say there are a large number, not merely in my own constituency, but in the North-west Territories, who feel that Mr. Greenway has gone too far. They feel that the principle of separate schools has been adopted by Mr. Greenway, and they resent that. On the other hand, there are also in the North-west Territories those who feel that enough has not been done, that a great deal more should have been done. However, I have expressed what my own view is. Now I have also expressed my views on that question on previous occasions. In 1895, from the seat where the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) usually sits, and when the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Sifton) was in the gallery, I stated my views on this question. Also in the course of the debate in the session of 1896, when we were in committee, I rose and declared what my view was, and my speech on that occasion was sent up to the North-west Territories to a paper in which it should have been forthwith published. That speech never appeared till a long time afterwards, and the consequence was that a false view of my position on that question was diffused, until I went up and saw my constituents; but unfortunately I had not an opportunity to see as many of them as I desired in order to do away with the machinations that had been used to misrepresent me upon that question. I see in his place a gentleman who was absent when I was speaking a few minutes ago, the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson). I was greatly edified by an article that appeared in my hon. friend's paper when the commission went up west.

I am harking back for a moment, as I did not wish to refer to him when he was not in his place. But when the commission was up west my hon. friend smelt a rat, he thought the commission was about to abandon its allegiance to the Liberal doctrines that the Government were about to abandon their allegiance to tariff reform, to a revenue tariff. Subsequently his fear became still greater when they went down to Montreal and the leading business men of Montreal, the leading business men of this country who hold the business of the country in their hands, came before them and lectured them as if they were children, when they lectured the Finance Minister and lectured the Minister of Trade and Commerce as if they were children, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce hung his head and the Finance Minister was mute. Then, Sir, what happened? Again, I admire the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister sends a couple of them down to Washington. Now, what happened was this: They came to him and they said: We must bring in a revenue tariff, we must move for free trade as they have it in England, we must carry out our promises. The hon. gentleman smiled on them with that smile which charms gods and men, and said: You are very simple. The best thing you can do is to go down to Washington. But before this, in order to help them, he sent to Washington a turtle dove with an olive branch in his mouth, in the shape of the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton). The result was that those gentlemen came back from Washington, having achieved nothing and the Prime Minister told them: We are not going to have any revenue tariff, we are not going to have free trade as it is in England. Then the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) got sciatica and rheumatism—political rheumatism and revenue-tariff sciatica—and off he went. He came back after some weeks, and he had been here only a couple of days, when we were told the tariff was ready. What it means is this, that the hon. member for South Oxford was scandalously used, and the Finance Minister had to sacrifice his principles; and now I want to know whether the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) will be called upon to sacrifice his principles. He came out strongly—I think he thought he might have an election, but it was put off like my own for three or four months—and in his paper, and he denounced the members of the Government for not standing to their guns in regard to a revenue tariff and in regard to reforming the franchise and taking off duties. I look forward with eagerness to ascertain what he will do when he finds such a tariff submitted as is indicated by the speeches delivered here and by the leading organ in Toronto.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, there is another question to which I desire to refer before I resume my seat, and that is the Manitoba school question. There is a sense in which the arrangement arrived at is not a settlement. In fact it would seem that the Government do not regard it as a final settlement, because a number of them, including the member for Chambly and Verchères, and I believe the Prime Minister himself, sent for the ablegate, and the ablegate, it seems from a telegram published in the "Star" of March 27th, is endowed with extraordinary and plenary powers. We are told that a powerful London churchman said :

I cannot see how the passage of the Act of the Manitoba legislature settles the case. Certainly, Mr. Laurier's future, together with that of his party, depends practically upon Monseigneur Del Val's decision. All the Liberal members from Quebec, except three (of whom Mr. Laurier is one), signed the pledge to settle the Manitoba school question in favour of the rights of the minority.

Of course that is what some of my constituents would say to me : "It is all very fine for you, Mr. Davin, (it is only just to them to say that) to say that you are satisfied with what Mr. Greenway has done, but it does not satisfy us ; you cannot properly call it a settlement unless the minority consents to it." The telegram goes on to say :

These men cannot act otherwise, or they must resign or be defeated at the polls next time. Then, the 45 Catholic members of the Senate and Commons, including Mr. Laurier and all the Catholic members of his Government, of whom there are about 30 in the Commons, just Mr. Laurier's majority, signed a petition to the Pope, asking him that a delegate be sent to settle the question.

We have the statement made to a reporter by the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) to the effect that he signed this document. The telegram continues :

These men, in signing such a petition, practically bound themselves to accept their own arbitrator's decision. Should they refuse, they must, from the church's standpoint, be held to have violated their word to the Pope.

I see the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Tarte) laughs at that. But, Sir, it is only three years ago since the hon. member, who then sat behind me, rose, and in language vehement and excited called attention to the wrongs that had been done to the minority, and so long as he could make it a card to fight with he used it ; but the moment he got into power and found it inconvenient to carry out his pledges and former principles, he turned around—I do not say it offensively—and with shameless effrontery he laughed at his former self and jeered at his inverted consistency. I saw a most respectable picture of the hon. member for Iberville published in the "Globe." I do not know what beneficent act Mr. Bengough attributed to him ; but having before me the record of the hon. member for Iberville, I will say that Mr. Bengough may draw him and paint him ; he may paint him in bright or dark colours, but there is one thing neither he nor any other artist can do, and that is whitewash him. The telegram continues :

It was on this petition, brought by Mr. Charles Fitzpatrick, the Solicitor General of Canada, to Rome, and only on assurances that they meant to abide by the delegate's decision, that the Pope consented to intervene.

Why, of course, it could be only on such a condition as that stated that an ablegate would be sent.

Monseigneur Del Val is given plenary powers to settle the controversy, discipline the recalcitrant bishops, and place Mr. Laurier and his followers, in case of their refusal to abide by his decision, in such a plight as to practically ruin their political prospects or force them to turn renegade to their obligations to His Holiness. As a matter of fact, Monseigneur Del Val is going to see Mr. Greenway at the earliest possible moment and ascertain exactly how much concessions to the Catholics Mr. Greenway is willing to make, while, on his side, Monseigneur Del Val will state to Mr. Greenway the exact irreducible minimum of the church's demands.

This falls in with two things : the opinion expressed to the reporter in London by Monseigneur Merry del Val as to what he thought of the proposals of Mr. Greenway, and the opinion expressed in the west respecting the dilatoriness of Mr. Greenway. We could not help wondering why Mr. Greenway delayed the introduction of his Bill, but we now know he did so because he was waiting the arrival of the ablegate from the Pope in order to consult with him as to what concession would be acceptable at the Vatican. The telegram proceeds :

Monseigneur Del Val hopes the views will be nearly alike, so as to enable prompt settlement. Should this be so, Monseigneur Del Val will not hesitate to beat down all opposition of the bishops' party in Quebec with measures as severe as necessary. He does not intend to combat the bishops ; but he will not permit their opposition to extend beyond the irreducible minimum which the Pope has fixed.

This telegram, and the conduct of the Prime Minister and his colleagues in sending for an ablegate, entirely destroys the character that certain persons in the west have been trying to fasten on the Premier, and that is, the character of a protagonist of Protestants. The position of riding the Protestant horse and fighting the Quebec bishops can no longer be given to the Premier, because there is no difference, except in degree, between submitting to his immediate ecclesiastical superiors and his more remote ecclesiastical superiors. Speaking as a member of this House, and as a citizen of Canada, I say it is an unconstitutional thing to have done. I say, that if the Prime Minister has any controversy with the bishops of Quebec in regard to their civil action, what he should have done was to have used the constitutional powers at his disposal, and not send for an ablegate to Rome, signing a round robin—the member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) told us some time ago he did it—signing a round robin to bring an ablegate from Rome to decide a question that was a purely civil question which should have been decided in accordance with our constitution.

Sir, in regard to the paragraph from the Queen's Speech respecting creameries, I wish to echo the praise that has already been given to the Minister of Agriculture for his energy in this matter. I wish also to point out, however, that when he entered the Department of Agriculture he found the whole machinery in order in regard to creameries, and in regard to cold storage. Some two years and a half ago, my friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) assured me he was going to put $20,000 into the Estimates, and both Professor Robertson and myself were perfectly certain that that would be done, and in consequence I telegraphed that we should have thirty creameries established in the North-west Territories, mentioning some of the places where they would be established. Professor Robertson then told me that about that number would be required, and I find that the present Minister is erecting these creameries in some of the places I then indicated. If we take the interpretation of the prophecies given us by the Apostles and make a comparison of their fulfilment, we shall find that my prophecy as to the carrying out of these creameries has been verified earlier even than those divine prophecies to which I have dared to refer.

There is one subject in the Queen's Speech which I cannot pass without referring to, and that is the Superannuation Bill. I do not know what the Superannuation Bill is like, but I know that already the Government has introduced a most demoralizing element, socially and politically, into this community. From Halifax to Vancouver we have hanging committees in every little centre, and I have been told that a western member has written to one of his constituencies a letter somewhat like this: "I cannot find out causes for the dismissal of people, but I rely on you to supply me with these." Hon. gentlemen opposite have introduced the spoils system into Canada. In defiance of British tradition, in defiance of the constitution of Canada, in defiance of the example of our neighbours below the line who are trying to escape from that vicious system, they have introduced the spoils system. What is that system but paying for support in the vilest of all ways? Talk of bribing a man with money for his vote, talk of offering him an office that is vacant, for his vote; why, Sir, that is a venial thing compared with saying to a man: Find me a reason against this or that man and I will drag him from his position and give it to you. It has introduced espionage; it has introduced false accusers; it has introduced a malignly degrading element into our political and social life, and what is the consequence? In communities out west, and I have no doubt it is the same all over Canada, where there was peace and harmony, where there was confidence between man and man before, now there is suspicion in the atmosphere, every man is afraid of his fellow, and there is espionage and false accusation, and subornation of testimony, and every vice that can possibly be generated by that degrading and sinister system. By and by, when we come to deal with that I shall show that they have gone so low as to drive even poor widows from petty positions in order that some clamorous vulpine supporters should get these positions.

Now, Sir, I shall not be tempted to the immodesty of daring to emulate the example of those who have, with so much grace, risen to the suggestion of that paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in which Her Majesty is in a special manner referred to in language so appropriate and just. Sixty years of unequalled rule over an unparalleled empire. There have been long reigns—but none like this—in which around a domestic hearth, sweet and simple, revolving lustres have crowded victories in every field of science and every walk of art—triumphs of freedom and benevolence—world-wide imperial expansion—renowns outdazzling each other. I can recall no reign, short or long, over which some permanent cloud has not rested—in which there has not been the insistence and the assertion of some defacement. The wedding bells of the parents of men now growing old had not rung when she began to reign; the requiem of many of the men then unborn who have won great honours and illustrated her era, has ceased to echo. Empires have risen and disappeared, while her own Colonial Empire has grown beyond the fondest dreams of the greatest among her earliest advisers. The conditions of life, socially and commercially, have been revolutionized. The map of Europe—of the world—has been transformed, and yet she sits, untouched, a desired and beloved sovereign on a throne as unshaken as it is august. Sixty years since a girl, she rose in virgin innocence to that giddy pinnacle, into that rare and difficult atmosphere, and to-day her Imperial front lifts itself high above all mighty surrounding eminences, but not so high as her character above all past and present regal fames. Sixty years—two generations of men—going on to three-quarters of a century—the sixteenth of a millenium, in the fierce light that beats upon a throne—and there is not a shadow on the woman—not a fleck on the diadem of the Queen. Nor is it hazardous to say that the future, like the past, will fail to present to the world such a combination of exalted grandeur and unsullied purity.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, before this Address is put to the vote, I feel it is my duty, as one of the few representatives of the province of Quebec who sit on this side of the House, one of the very few who represent electoral divisions in which there is a large French Canadian vote, to express my opinion, which I think is in a large measure the opinion of my constituents, on the subject-matter of the Address.

There are in this Address some paragraphs from which it is impossible to dissent. That part of the Address which refers to the jubilee year of Her Majesty, and the common concert of praise and joy participated in by all her subjects throughout the immense, the unprecedented Empire over which she rules, is something upon which, as has already been indicated by the hon. leader of the Opposition and by others, there cannot be a dissenting voice. Indeed, I deem it to be our duty to add what we can to the concert of praise and jubilation which should mark this remarkable epoch, so eloquently and so properly described by the speaker who has just preceded me.

We can all agree, also, in that paragraph which refers to the calamity which has overtaken our fellow-subjects in India. But, Sir, even in this connection I feel bound to call the attention of the hon. leader of this House, as to whose sincerity I do not entertain the slightest doubt, to the position in which we stand. It has been the custom in the province of Quebec, on more than one occasion, among a limited class I am bound to say, to qualify the representatives of that province sitting on this side of the House as supporters and promoters of a theory in favour of more closely binding together the dependencies of the British Empire. In this respect, we have more than once, I think unjustly, been held up to the odium of our fellow-citizens. We have been held up as the supporters of the Bleu-Orange party. Well, Sir, gentlemen who come from my native province know what weight that qualification may possibly have among our electors. But certain it is that on more than one occasion, for having professed, or for having been supposed to profess sentiments which I find contained in this first paragraph of the Address, we have been taken to task, and marked as a set of men who were in favour of binding together the different portions of the Empire. I think it is time that a stop should be put to that and that the sentiments which are expressed in this paragraph should be made known as the sentiments of the whole population of this country. What do I find in a leading French Liberal paper which I received to-day? Precisely the expression of the same animadversion against those who are asked by hon. gentlemen opposite to vote in favour of this paragraph. I find in "Le Signal," a leading Liberal paper published in the city of Montreal, that "a breeze of Imperialism is blowing over this country"—precisely that breeze which I find manifested in this opening paragraph of the Address. It says this:

At the present moment a strong breeze of Imperialism is blowing over this country. Those who have at heart the French cause cannot remain indifferent in the face of what is taking place. Public men of the province of Quebec, Liberal, as well as Conservative, have not for several years taken the slightest trouble to stimulate French sentiment among our population or to rekindle among our compatriots national aspiration.

Then follows a strong attack upon sentiments which are precisely those contained in this opening paragraph of the Address. Further on we find these words:

Let us be Canadians—very well; but let us not be English. Our interests are by no means common with those that are defended and guarded in Downing Street. Moreover, they are absolutely foreign to those which England may have in India, in Egypt, in the Transvaal, in the Mediterranean, in Venezuela, and in other places; and it would be an anti-patriotic move on our part to espouse her quarrels, her difficulties, or even her adventures. We have something else to do.

Further on, in reference to that paragraph which states that we have behaved properly in taking into consideration the suffering of our fellow-subjects in India, this newspaper says:

If the English of Canada subscribe $100,000 to come to the assistance of the famished Hindoos, robbed and ruined by England, that is their business, and it is their way of advertising their devotion to the British Empire. Let the English in Canada sing "God Save the Queen," after having drunk a cup of tea, or having played a lacrosse match, or even before a passing regiment. That is with the object of galvanizing their loyalty, that is to whip up their English blood and cause vibration throughout their English fibre, and stimulate their fanaticism. Do you think that our jingoes of Montreal or Toronto would have given a hundred cents, if the bubonic plague were raging in Indo-China or Algeria, instead of in India?

I will not take up any further the time of this House in quoting from this newspaper. The object I have in view is to point out to the hon. leader of this House that if this paragraph of the address thoroughly represents the sentiments of his party, he should use the powerful influence which he undoubtedly possesses to make those sentiments unanimous among all those who support him. I do not believe, Sir, that this is the only paper in which you will find expressed sentiments of that kind. We have another one in Montreal, which fortunately, I believe, has lately become the property of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), from which fact I gather great hopes for its future loyalty; and in that paper, on more than one occasion, we have had the expression of sentiments exactly similar to these. Why, during the last electoral contest, what was the story which that daily newspaper circulated ad nauseam throughout my county? It was that the hon. leader on this side (Sir Charles Tupper) had entered into a combination with Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and had purchased three million dollars worth of rifles, and brought them out here with the object of arming the young men of the province of Quebec and sending them to Venezuela to fight the battles of England. I have never been able to find out what has become of those rifles, but I think it is fair for me to ask the gentlemen on the Treasury benches if they now intend to arm with them the young men of the province of Quebec to go and fight the battles of Venezuela against England. I believe that the time has come, if the sentiments contained in that paragraph of the Address really represent the sentiments of hon. gentlemen opposite, when there should be unanimity among them, and we should hear no more protestations of this kind from the province of Quebec and no more such insinuations passed against hon. gentlemen on this side, because if what is described in this Address as Imperialism is correct, then I have no hesitation in saying that I am an Imperialist. If by Imperialism you mean a system of gross servility to the British Crown and unintelligent submission, a system of political snobbishness, then I am not an Imperialist, but if you understand by that term, putting into execution the idea which I find expressed to a certain extent in this paragraph, namely, that every commonwealth united under the British flag, should have a more direct action upon the foreign policy of the Imperial Government, upon the commercial and other treaties, upon intercolonial tariffs and trade, upon legislation particularly affecting the general interests of the Empire, and that in order to settle those immense hitherto unsettled tracts of what has been properly termed Greater Britain we should have a judicious and vigorous policy of immigration, then I am an Imperialist, and would condemn any such movement as, in my opinion, would not conform in any degree to the sentiments expressed in the opening paragraph of the Address. Therefore I say that those who give expression to the views contained in that paragraph should convince us of their thorough sincerity by moulding, as far as in their power lies, the opinion of their followers to the adoption and appreciation of this grand conception.

Leaving aside this paragraph and turning to the announcement of the fiscal policy of the Government, as contained in the Address, I find that the pronouncement which we find in the Speech from the Throne and the ideas also expressed in the Address do not contain what we all desire and what the country has desired since over eighteen months, and that is the principle which is to govern this work of revision upon which we are invited to proceed without delay. Is it the principle of protection or of free trade or is it what was advocated in my county during the last election, the principle of the adoption of a tariff for revenue only? It seems to me that upon this point there is a vagueness both in the Speech from the Throne and in the Address, which leaves ungratified a most legitimate desire of the business men of this country. During the last election the principle contended for in my electoral division was squarely this—a complete change in the tariff, the adoption of the tariff of 1875, the adoption of a tariff for revenue only. But, Sir, if we take into consideration what fell from the lips of the hon. gentleman who moved the Address (Mr. Russell) in reply to the Speech from the Throne—and that I think may be considered as an authorized pronouncement of the policy of the Government—what do we find? That hon. gentleman said that for years we have been building up in this country a disastrous fiscal system, a system of protection, and that now that the evils of that system have become apparent, we should proceed, not violently but slowly, to a complete change. There are vested interests, there is a revenue which must be obtained, we must guard those interests, we must provide that revenue, but the ultimate object which the Government should have in view is a gradual return to the system of free trade as that system obtains in England. This then is to be the policy of the Government—not an immediate sacrifice of the great interests which had been built up under the preceding policy but a gradual movement towards a policy of free trade as adopted in England. Now, I have no hesitation in saying that that announcement is, to any constituency which has industrial interests at stake, a very grave announcement indeed. To stand up here and uphold a diametrically opposite theory to maintain that the policy which has been followed by preceding Governments during the last eighteen years is the right and proper system, would, if appears to me, be eminently futile in view of the announcement made. What we are going to do then, if we are to place absolute reliance upon what has been stated by the mover of this Address, is to curtail and abandon the system of the National Policy and to proceed through a system of a tariff for revenue only, to the gradual establishment of the policy of free trade. And this, Sir, we are going to do in the face of what all other countries are doing, in the face of the adoption of an entirely different policy by the United States, in the face of the adoption of an entirely different policy by France, by Belgium, by Germany, where it has contributed to such an extent to build up the great industry and power of that country, in the face of the adoption of a different policy by Russia, Norway and Sweden, Spain, Italy and Portugal. We are going to follow, in other words, absolutely in the wake of England. That is to be our "ultima Thule," but not proceeding as they did in England by beginning with protection until the results of that policy have been to place the country, as it did England upon a pinnacle of industrial supremacy, and then adopt another policy; but now, at the present time, when we are in the very infancy of the development of this country to start out and gradually gravitate towards a policy of free trade, laying open our markets to the industrial rivalries of the foreign countries which I named a moment ago. For my own part, I do not believe, that, in matters of fiscal policy, there can be any absolute principle, any absolute policy. The fiscal policy of any country has to be governed by a variety of considerations, by considerations of its natural resources, of its circumstances, and the industrial capacities of its inhabitants as well as its industrial power and wealth. For instance, Russia is a remarkable example of the policy of adopting an "a priori" policy in regard to fiscal matters, Russia is a country of enormous natural resources and possesses great wealth and a large population. Russia failed, nevertheless, to show that she possessed one of the necessary ingredients for the successful adoption of a protective policy. There is no industrial capacity among its inhabitants. What is the consequence? The adoption of a protective policy in Russia has resulted in the establishment within that Empire of a large number of strangers who alone are qualified to develop the industrial wealth of the country and who are enriching themselves at the expense of the inhabitants. Conditions not precisely similar, but in many respects analogous exist in Turkey. On the other hand, you find in Belgium and in the United States immense natural resources, wealth, and a population industrially inclined; and magnificent results proceed from the adoption of a protective policy. What I contend, is that we possess immense natural resources and a people fitted to develop them, and we are dealing on the right hand and on the left with people who surpass us in industrial power. Under these circumstances, it seems to me, that everything points to the necessity for the adoption of a protective policy, to the necessity of avoiding at the present moment, situated as the country and the population is, everything that will lead us towards the adoption of a tariff for revenue only. Of course it is claimed that the adoption of a tariff for revenue only or of a free trade tariff stimulates foreign commerce. Foreign commerce is undoubtedly a source of wealth. But, Sir, if we consult statistics and other data we find that, having tried both systems, under the system for revenue only we have not had the foreign commerce which has come to us under the system known here as the National Policy. If you turn to the statistics, Sir, you find that under the system that prevailed here from 1874 to 1879 the imports of this country amounted to $609,000,000; whereas, under the system which prevailed from 1879 to 1884, under the protective policy, our imports exceeded that figure by over $77,000,000. Under the protective period, we had imports for home consumption amounting to $687,000,000. That, it seems to me, indicates conclusively, that foreign commerce, for countries such as this is not diminished, but on the contrary, is increased under a protective system. The system which was defended by the mover of the Address, very far from discriminating against the classes and in favour of the masses is a system in exactly the opposite direction. If you look at the statistics you will find that under the revenue policy which existed here previously, a policy which began with an ad valorem duty of 15 per cent, subsequently increased to 17 per cent, we paid during one year of the period during which that policy prevailed, about 43 per cent upon the value of the sugar, 35 per cent upon the value of the importations for rice, 25 per cent upon the value of the importations for molasses, 23 per cent on tea, and 10½ per cent on the total imports of coffee—all articles of the first necessity, articles consumed by the masses and since admitted free to this country.

There is another point to which I wish to draw your attention in regard to the policy which, if we can place reliance on the words which fell from the lips of the mover of the Address, we are going to adopt under this Government. I refer to the enormous increase of our own country's power of consumption since the adoption in this country of a protective policy. The statistics show that in 1881 the value of Canadian manufactured products consumed in Canada was $309,676,068. In the ten years which followed, under the prevalence of that policy this increased to $475,445,705. But there was no diminution on the value of foreign goods imported into Canada. The value of goods brought in 1881 was $91,611,604, and in 1891 we find it to be $113,345,124, showing the increase power of consumption in this country without any decrease in the imports during the prevalence of this tariff which has brought such prosperity of this country. It has been urged, and I think that was one of the arguments of the mover of this Address, that the adoption of this policy amongst its other evil effects, has had as a result the creation of combines and monopolies. The creation of combines and monopolies, if they exist, can be reached by legislation. They afford no valid reason for changing a policy which in other respects has been beneficial to this country. It has also been said that the people of the west desire a change in the tariff, desire a return to a tariff for revenue only. But, Sir, I claim that the interests of the people of the east should also be consulted. If at present there is no great industrial development in the west, and if at present the interests of that portion of the community claim a reduction in the tariff, these people must not forget the sacrifices which the older provinces have imposed upon themselves for the building up of that country. They must not forget that at a future time they themselves may be glad to see their industrial life developed; and, under any circumstances, they should bear in mind that as the interests of the east are certainly larger and more considerable, they deserve, it seems to me, a larger share of consideration. What we want is not the destruction of the National Policy; what we want is a larger market; what we want is an increased population; what we want particularly in this country is an improved system of immigration to settle the country in order to afford a market for the immense products which are the result of the present industrial life of the country. Well, Sir, it being admitted that in the past our immigration system has been defective, as the results have proved, and I must say that I regret it keenly, still neither in the Speech from the Throne nor in the Address in reply to it, do we find any reference whatever to an improved system of immigration. Neither is there in that Address anything about what was much talked of in the province of Quebec during the last election, an improvement in our trade relations with the United States. We were told time and again during the last election, that no sooner would the present Government be in power than they would send missionaries to the United States to interview the American Government as the party then in power was said to be unfavourable to improved trade relations with the Americans; and we were told that as a result of those missions we would unquestionably have increased facility for trade, and better markets for our produce. But, Sir, there is nothing about that in the Speech from the Throne, nor in this Address. It is true we have had missions to the United States, in fact we have had missions almost everywhere, and I think we may claim for this Government that if it has no other quality, it may be qualified as a missionary Government. But from the absolute silence which we find on the Treasury benches in regard to these various missions, I think we may fairly conclude that they have been unsuccessful in every quarter. As regards the repeal of the Franchise Act, I must say that I feel inclined to concur with what is said in the Address. I believe that the time has come for the repeal of that Act, provided that the franchise is not placed under the control of the provinces. Surely, we will not place the franchise which is to command the formation of this House under the control of the provincial legislatures. Any system would be better than that. While reserving a consideration of this point until we have the Bill before us which the Government promises, still I may say now that I will never assent to any system which will place the franchise under the control of the provincial legislatures. Then there is mention made of the Intercolonial Railway being extended to Montreal. Now, Sir, anything which this Government can do to benefit the city of Montreal will receive my support. I believe Montreal has never been fairly treated in the past by any Government; but it remains to be seen whether this particular measure is exactly the one which we require. I find by the papers received to-day that a very important body in the city of Montreal, La Chambre du Commerce, views that measure most unfavourably. There must be some reason for that. In another paper I find a condemnation of what is called the Green-shields deal, whatever that may mean. But it is only fair to wait and see what this proposed improvement is. Certain it is that the city of Montreal, the commercial metropolis of the Dominion, has for many reasons large claims upon this Administration. We require increased port facilities, we require increased dock accommodation, we require a free port and we require a bridge. Now, there is nothing about any of these great projects, so much spoken of during the last election, in the Government's programme, and yet the Government received a large and generous support from that district and from that city. Have the hon. gentlemen who represent the city of Montreal and its vicinity presented the important, the just claims of that great city to the Government, and if they have, has the Government turned a deaf ear to their demands? We will see later on. But I have heard it said time and again by gentlemen on the other side who came from that part of the country, that Montreal requires better treatment, and we will wait and see if the Government intends to deal out justice to that great city. As regards the development of the canals, I have not a word to say. If that work is properly carried out, it will benefit the country at large. I now come, Sir, to the question of the school settlement, a delicate question, a question upon which, although during the last election it was referred to on more than one occasion in my constituency, I remained utterly silent during the last session of this House, and I remained silent from a motive which I indicated to this House, and that motive was that I desired to give the leader of the Government a fair, frank and entirely just opportunity of carrying out those pledges which, on more than one occasion, both he and his followers made in the province of Quebec. I feel now, Sir, it would be unjust to my native province, and unjust to my constituency, which has followed this controversy most carefully, not, at all events, to express an opinion on that part of the Address which refers to the settlement of this question. There is one thing which appears to me perfectly clear, and it is this: that it is impossible to say that the Government has fulfilled its pledges—at least that it has fulfilled those pledges which the leader of the Government, and those who follow him made repeatedly during the last election to the people of the province of Quebec, who were supposed to be particularly interested in the settlement of that question. That I believe the Government admits; it admits that it has not carried out its pledges, but it declares that it has done its best. What were those pledges? There was a most distinct pledge from the leader of the Government in the province of Quebec that full and ample justice would be done the minority in the province of Manitoba. That pledge was distinctly made by the leader of the Government in the city of Quebec and elsewhere. He was in favour of the adoption of a policy of conciliation; but he stated in the clearest possible terms that he was determined that there should be a full and entire restitution to the minority in Manitoba of the rights of which they had been shorn by the School Bill of 1890; and that pledge went to this extent, that although he was not in favour of the Remedial Bill, he was aware that the constitution gave him that ultimate recourse, and that if the method of conciliation to which he intended to devote his attention failed, then, unquestionably, he would use the reserve power which, under the constitution, is centered in the federal Government, and which he was pledged to use, if necessary. That was not only the pledge of the Liberal leader, but the pledge of every one of his supporters, made time and again through the whole of the contest which led up to the election of June, 1896. It is a pledge contained in every one of the speeches, contained in the Liberal press of Quebec in the most clear and unmistakable terms, and it is the pledge which many of those hon. gentlemen were not content with giving on the hustings, but which in the most clear terms they reduced to writing, and they stood pledged and they stated positively that they would see that the grievance complained of by the minority would be absolutely and thoroughly removed, and that if it was not removed by the methods of conciliation, it would be removed under the power which the constitution gave to the federal Parliament. They went further. In the province of Quebec there was most severe and bitter criticism of the methods adopted by the preceding Government for the settlement of this question. The sincerity of every one supporting the Government of the day was impugned. What was stated? It was stated that that Government had purposely neglected to disallow the Act of 1890 complained of. It was stated that this was done with an object. It was stated that during six years the party had been divided on the question; and in my constituency and in other constituencies it was stated in my hearing repeatedly that the Remedial Bill had been abandoned by the Government purposely when they had over forty majority behind them, and it was proof of their insincerity. Much more was said. Was it not said time and again, was it not thrown up to me repeatedly in every meeting that the Remedial Bill did not go far enough, that it was utterly unsatisfactory; that it presented to the minority the shadow while it withdrew from them the substance of their rights; that it contained no grant which would enable the minority to support their schools, that it gave them the right to open their schools, but schools could not be conducted without money, and we had refused them a school grant, without which schools could not be supported? Why, Sir, that Remedial Bill, or rather a facsimile of it, as it had been written over and corrected by the then Deputy Speaker of the House, was exhibited at every meeting. We have as you are aware, Mr. Speaker, what is called in our province during an electoral contest, the sac à flobage. It is what is called in English a punching bag, out of which, at every meeting a facsimile of the Remedial Bill was taken, and the electors were told that this wretched piece of paper, scrawled all over, constituted the charter of the rights of the minority, but that even this Bill had not been passed by the then Government, although it had a majority of forty members; and further, that if the Opposition were put in power they would not give them a shadow of their rights, but the whole of them, without any exception. And to make assurance doubly sure and to show in what manner the policy of conciliation would be carried out, in every constituency, and in my constituency particularly, at every meeting we were told that no sooner would the present leader of the Government be put in power than he would institute a great inquiry, and at the head of the great commission, composed of good and moderate men and just men, there would be Sir Oliver Mowat. And when the electors inquiringly asked who this man was, they were told: this is the man who procured for the Catholics of the province of Ontario the whole of their rights and more than their rights; that he was the man who was going to preside over that great question, who would ascertain all the facts and would see that every single right of which the minority had been deprived would be restored to them. That pledge was made most distinctly, and that certainly is one of the pledges which has not been redeemed, and the consequence of which non-redemption are patent to-day. It was certainly within the power of those gentlemen to redeem their pledges as regards the proposed Mowat inquiry. They could easily have carried out that part of their pledge, and yet they failed utterly, and, in fact, made no attempt to do so. This is a shame, because the result of the inquiry would undoubtedly have been that the minority would, at all events, have had the opportunity of being heard and of showing exactly what their position was; and if we are to believe what we are told, this settlement which we are asked to sanction was made without the minority being even consulted. Well, that part of the pledge which I claim was undoubtedly in the power of this Government to carry out, they have failed in. They have failed also to carry out the pledge made under the serious circumstances which I have indicated; that they would restore to the Manitoba minority the plenitude of their rights. What we have to inquire therefore is this: Does this settlement contain such a restitution of rights as a fair-minded man, having regard to the circumstances, can consider as satisfactory. I am prepared to say this. If this settlement does concede to the minority some valuable rights, if it does concede some of the privileges taken away in 1890, then it deserves at any rate to be weighed, and as at the present moment we are told that this concession is but an instalment of what is going to follow, then most certainly if the concession does contain some valuable restoration of rights it deserves our most serious consideration. In order to appreciate the value of this concession it is necessary to lay down some principle of appreciation, and some criterion upon which to judge its value. To my mind the best criterion, the best means of judging of the value of this concession, having in view the whole circumstances of this case, is the religious belief which led the minority to claim the rights which they possessed during twenty years and of which they have been deprived.

Now, Sir, what is the belief of that minority? That belief so far as I am competent to state it, may be briefly given as this. It is a belief that for the primary education of children it is necessary that the schools should have an essentially religious character. I am not here to defend it or justify it, but I simply say now that is the belief. The primary education of the child, according to the belief of the minority, can only be proper and suitable if during the whole time devoted to instruction the child receives a certain amount of religious instruction, or in other words, that the instruction must have an essentially religious character. After the child has received that primary training which is deemed essential, he may follow a course of instruction in which the religious element plays a less conspicuous part. He may later on, when he becomes a youth, receive a course of instruction from which the religious element is still more absent, but as I understand it, during the term of primary education, during the formation of the child, it is the religious belief entertained by the minority that that instruction should be of a religious character throughout the whole time that it is given. That belief, if I mistake not, is not confined to Catholics; it is shared by another very important Christian denomination, namely, those who belong to the Anglican communion. Now, giving that as the cause of the claim which this minority has made, what do we find to have been the consequences of that belief. These consequences showed themselves at the time of confederation. One of the chief difficulties which those who undertook to carry into execution that great project had to encounter, was to provide constitutional safeguards for those who entertain that belief. And later on, when the province of Manitoba was admitted into confederation, there is no doubt whatever but that the object of section 22 of the Manitoba Act was to safeguard constitutionally the privileges in regard to education of those who entertain that belief. The best proof that that was the understanding of those who took part in the forming of the compact under which that province was admitted into the Dominion, was, that clause 22 was so interpreted for many years. Well, Sir, in 1890, in one single moment the whole of the privileges which were enjoyed up to that date by the minority were taken away. For my own part, and speaking for myself, I have no hesitation in saying that the Bill which in 1890 so ruthlessly and so cruelly took away every one of these privileges should have been disallowed by the Ottawa Government. Of course I know it is claimed, and on very good ground, that disallowance at that time was deemed a most unpopular measure. I have seen quoted time and again the opinion of Archbishop Tache. I believe he expressed it in writing, in a pamphlet which I have not seen, that disallowance was not a proper recourse, that it was an unpopular proceeding, and that the minority having entire confidence in the unconstitutionality of this measure would bring it before the courts to have that law declared unconstitutional once and for all; whereas disallowance might only have led to the re-enactment of the same measure. I shall not discuss the legal fight which followed the passing of that Bill, for it is undoubtedly known to all the members of this House. One thing which is quite sure is, that the decision rendered in the first case of Logan Barrett and others against the city of Winnipeg, brought before the Privy Council, would, in my estimation, undoubtedly have been different had their Lordships had the proof before them that long previous to the entry of the North-western territory into the Dominion these separate schools received a grant from the Hudsons' Bay Company which might fairly be considered as the then government of that new territory.

But the decision rendered later in the case of Brophy was the result of a proper, patient and constitutional course adopted by the minority, and it was productive of the most valuable results for the people who had waited so long and so patiently for justice. What that decision declared clearly was that there was a grievance, that the federal power could interfere, and that it was the duty of the Federal power to remedy that grievance. Well, Sir, it is admitted that upon the efforts made by gentlemen sitting on this side of the House to give execution to that mandate, we were defeated at the general elections, and that defeat, in the province of Quebec, I attribute to the faith which the people of that province placed in the leader of the Opposition at that time, and in those who upheld him, that he would carry out the pledges made by him in unmistakable terms, that he would see to the proper carrying out of the decision of their lordships in the appeal in the case of Brophy.

Now, I have stated that it is impossible for me to approve of this settlement, because the pledges given were not carried out. I find that the minority were not consulted at the time this settlement was made. That is admitted by the Hon. Mr. Greenway himself. Speaking of this reproach—I quote from a report of his speech in the Manitoba "Free Press" of March 18th—Mr. Greenway says :

As to the complaint that the minority had not been consulted, he replied that the only persons who could represent the minority were the party who alone could do anything for them, the Dominion Government.

This is the excuse given for that gross want of consideration for the minority.

Now, Sir, what is the substance of this settlement? Because I notice that the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) speaking of it in an off-hand way, dismissed it after poking a few jokes at members sitting on this side of the House. He expressed no opinion of the intrinsic value of what had been obtained for the minority by that settlement. We have, therefore, to inquire what is the value of the concessions that have been obtained, and can they really be called concessions, having for their object the removal of any of the grievances that existed? In the first place, in certain specified cases there is the right of the parents of a certain number of children to ask by petition that half an hour after the school exercises of the day are over be reserved for religious instruction. Let me speak as a man who has had some experience in the training of children, for I occupied for twelve years the position of school commissioner in the city of Montreal, where we had to look after the education and the welfare of over 18,000 children. Let me speak from that experience, and say, in regard to the boast which is made all over the province of Quebec at the present moment that religious instruction has been resumed in the schools under the conditions stated, that this is an absolutely valueless concession. You will not find that the religious instruction of children can be promoted in any school by detaining them one-half hour after they know the school time is over. Not only is this provision not susceptible of being carried out in practice, but, if it could be carried out, it would have the effect of rendering the teaching of religion absolutely odious to the children. I appeal to any gentleman who has had any experience in the training of children. There is no value whatever in a provision of that kind. But, Sir, there is more. This provision in no degree restores these privileges for their religious belief which the minority claim. It is a conscientious and deep-rooted portion of their religious belief that the primary education of the child should be tinged with religion throughout the day; and this belief was safeguarded by the statutes of Manitoba which preceded the Bill of 1890. How can it be claimed that giving a half hour under the circumstances I have indicated, could operate as a remedy to any extent of the grievance complained of? Besides, if I mistake not, analogous provisions exist in the School Act itself. I believe my non-friend from Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) will be able to point out that on petition—for after all these people must petition, and it is a question whether that petition will be granted—the minority could, by the School Act of 1890, claim the right to give religious instruction under circumstances which would render the action of the advisory board in refusing that privilege utterly opposed to the spirit if not the letter of the Act. That is the way the Attorney General of Manitoba interprets the law. At the time of presenting the Bill, he was asked what should be done in case such a petition were presented, and it was refused. He said :

I suppose, under such circumstances, the petitioners would be able to insist.

This, then, is the provision made for the minority under this settlement. What they are given they could petition for before under the School Act of 1890, and circumstances could exist in which it would be unjust to refuse that petition, and it is absurd to say that the half-hour clause is a valuable concession, or a valuable part of the privileges of which the minority have been deprived by the School Act of 1890. You may ask me, Sir, what I would have considered a concession of some value, tending, in some degree, to the relief of that minority. Well, there is one very simple concession which would have been appreciated, I have no doubt, by the minority, and that is the exemption from taxation for the public schools under certain conditions. If, for instance, the Manitoba Government had agreed with the Federal Government that, provided the minority conformed to certain conditions with regard to public instruction, if they showed that they supported schools in which proper instruction was given, judged sufficient by the provincial government, then they would be exempt from the double taxation to which they are undoubtedly going to be subjected in the future, this Government might have claimed some credit for having obtained a concession in favour of the minority. If the minority were not compelled to contribute to the public schools when they also contributed to the support of their own schools, that would have been a concession of some value and importance. There was another course open to the Government. A grant might have been made to the voluntary schools, which the minority will have to establish, if they intend maintaining schools according to the tenets of their religion. In that respect the great and the wise men who govern Manitoba might have taken a most useful object lesson from what has been done by the Government of England. In England there are over 900 voluntary schools established by members of the Anglican denomination, and there is also a large number of Catholic schools. These schools in the past received a grant from the British Government amounting, if I mistake not, to nine shillings a head on the average attendance. Well, what have the Government done quite recently? Why, by a majority of over 200, they increased that grant by an amount, I think, of five shillings per head. This is a concession of some value, and a similar concession in Manitoba would have shown, at any rate, that something had been done for the support of the schools which the minority undoubtedly will have to establish with their own money. I contend that so-called concessions are of no value. If you will take the trouble to read the speech made by the Attorney General of Manitoba, Mr. Cameron, in presenting the Remedial Bill to the Manitoba legislature, you will find he said that the arrangement is a signal triumph for the province, and that it does not concede any important privileges. You will find that he contradicts what is stated all over the province of Quebec to-day. It is stated everywhere in the province of Quebec that this Remedial Bill has obtained for the minority exactly what the three commissioners sent by the late Government to Manitoba demanded. Mr. Cameron, however, says that that is absolutely untrue, that such a statement could only be made by men ignorant of what these commissioners demanded, that these commissioners demanded privileges which would have amounted to at least a partial restoration to the minority of their schools, whereas he succeeded in obtaining a settlement which is really something infinitesimally less. But we are told there is another aspect to the settlement. It is repeated everywhere in the province of Quebec that, at any rate, the effect of this Remedial Bill has been to introduce, in a most glorious way, the French language into the public schools of Manitoba. That is a matter upon which my hon. friend the member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) will speak with more knowledge than I can, but I find that the Attorney General for Manitoba, in his speech, says something absolutely different. What he says is that it was only reasonable, in the case of Germans, French, Italians, and aliens speaking another language, not the English language, should be instructed in the English language under the bi-lingual system, which is by far the best system of teaching that language. Mr. Cameron thus places a very different aspect upon the vaunted concession that the French language has been introduced into the public schools. And, after all, we must consider what is the interpretation placed upon these concessions by those who, under the recent statute passed in Manitoba, will have to carry them out. I have deemed it necessary to place on record my appreciation of this settlement. I believe that the minority is not satisfied, and I believe that when the full extent of that settlement and the effects it produces are thoroughly known and appreciated in my native province, it will be as unsatisfactory to the people there as it is to-day to the minority in Manitoba. At the present moment the people of the province of Quebec are not fully aware what the terms of the settlement really are, and when they understand them, they will certainly condemn it. I believe that the province of Manitoba could very well have done a little better for the minority. They might very properly have taken example from the people of Quebec. Why, during the whole of this severe controversy in the province of Quebec, where the minority is, to a certain extent, under the legislative control of the Catholic majority—at least to the same extent as is the minority in Manitoba—I deem it to be to the very highest credit of that majority that throughout the controversy, which at times has been fierce, never once has retaliation been spoken of. Not on one single occasion has it even been suggested that it was possible for the majority in the province of Quebec to take away one of the valuable privileges which we are glad to see the minority enjoy in that province. To what can that be ascribed? I ascribe it to the sense of justice of the inhabitants of Quebec. I will go further; I ascribe it to the innate chivalry of the French race in that province. They would never dream of taking such an advantage of the minority. For my part, I consider that the concessions given by the Manitoba Government to the Government of Canada are both illiberal and narrow. They are by no means generous. Why, in the province of Quebec not only, with the keenest sense of respect, has every right and privilege of the minority been preserved since confederation, but time and again have further privileges been granted to them. Let me give you one instance which goes to prove that my statement is correct. In the city of Montreal, at the time of confederation, the school tax paid upon property belonging to Protestants was, under the law existing at the time, distributed according to population, and we, the Catholic school commissioners, derived a very considerable income from that particular tax. It was deemed that every class of the population having a deep interest in the proper education of the population, the tax derived from Catholic as well as Protestant property owners should be divided according to population. Well, Sir, as you know, in 1868 the Protestant property owners of the city of Montreal demanded, or, at least, asked, that the tax which they paid, instead of being distributed according to population should be given entirely to the Protestant school board. This was a right which the constitution did not guarantee. The granting of that right would have the immediate effect of depriving the Catholic school board of a very considerable source of income of which, at that time, we stood in great need. Was there any opposition, was there any difficulty, was there any question? Why, Sir, this right was granted immediately. Numberless other instances might be given. What I say is that the treatment of the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec should have induced the Government of Manitoba to be far more generous towards the minority. I am, therefore, absolutely displeased with this settlement. I believe that it is nothing but the crowning violation of a number of violations of promises which have gone before it. Why, when that province was constituted, the Queen's own representative assured these people, in words which I could quote here, that every right they had had in the past would be respected. But we all know what the position of the Government of Mr. Greenway was. It is proved superabundantly by the affidavits which were filed in the appeal to the Privy Council, these affidavits tell a tale of the most gross duplicity. These men had the courage to go down and promise the Archbishop of St. Boniface that under no circumstances would separate schools be disturbed, and that is proved by the most impartial testimony. And they did not hesitate afterwards in the coolest manner to violate these promises. And what more? It is worth insisting upon these things. In the legislature of Manitoba when the constitution was modified and the Upper Chamber abolished, the most solemn pledges were given. What did the Premier (Mr. Davies) say :

It may be that the Council is a safeguard to the minority. He could assure the minority that their rights would never be trampled upon in this province. There would always be sufficient

Mr. MONK.

English-speaking members in this House who would insist on giving their French-speaking subjects their rights to protect them.

And Mr. Luxton said :

There were some questions of sentiment which lay close to the hearts of the French people, and he could assure them that the English-speaking members would not ruthlessly deal with these, if the French representatives were sufficiently patriotic to support the measure before the House. They would recognize their generosity, and not forget it.

And what did Mr. Royal say :

But there was something else for himself which had not been guaranteed by any Act ; he found it yesterday in the words of Messrs. Davis and Northway, and in the applause given by Mr. Brown to the sentiments of Mr. Luxton and to the expressions of Mr. Cornish.

And Mr. McKay added :

He was very much pleased to hear the generous and just remarks of the hon. Premier, the hon. Provincial Secretary and also that of the hon. member for Rockwood, which gave the minority in the House that confidence which the members of this House, and by their vote on this Bill would express, the security they felt in the hands of that majority.

Sir, every promise has been grossly violated, pledges given have been trampled under foot. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) thinks that he can dismiss a subject of this kind with a few words of joke, which are only a reiteration of what we heard last session. That is a mistake. I believe that is a most serious matter. I believe that the honour of England is concerned. I believe that the respect due to what was promised to a poor and suffering minority by the representative of England is a serious matter for us, and I believe that when the judicial committee of the Privy Council points out what the rights of the minority are, that is a serious matter. For my own part, I do not view it as a joke at all, and I believe hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec, when the people of that province thoroughly understand what is taking place, will not treat it as a joke either. A taunt has been thrown across the floor. We have been asked to propose an amendment to this Address. I can tell you what my personal feeling on that subject is. I am not disposed, from my own part, to push the controversy to that point. There are in this House a number of generous men who, having no special or personal interest in the defence of the minority have risked their political lives upon the defence of those rights, while many others have succumbed in that fight. I feel a delicacy about asking these gentlemen to make further sacrifices. I know what public feeling is at this moment. I suppose that people are tired of this question. A number of the constituents of these gentlemen who have been friendly to the minority are anxious to see this dropped. I have refrained this session from saying one word on this subject to any of these gentlemen who are not of my own religious belief. I wish to place distinctly on record what I believe of the settlement. It is a fraud, a sham, and it will never satisfy anybody.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I do not intend to detain the House long, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will be very glad to hear this announcement. Still, there are certain things in the Address to which I think I should call the attention of the House for a few minutes. There is one sentiment in the Address with which I certainly concur, and that is the sentiment expressed in the paragraph which relates to the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen. I am proud to be here this evening as a French Canadian to testify to the loyalty of my French fellow-subjects in the province of Quebec to Her Majesty the Queen. Certainly there is no part of her wide dominions where there is more respect for her person, more admiration for her virtues, or more devotion to her Crown, than in the province from which I come. These words are not idle words spoken only in the piping times of peace; for I believe the history of this country will show that in time of war, the French Canadian race were always ready to take up arms in defence of the Crown of England. We cannot but remember that under her glorious reign we have obtained as full a degree of political and religious liberty as any people on the face of the earth enjoy to-day. The generals of the English army have conquered our native land by the force of arms, but the just and generous treatment of the Queen of England has won our hearts, in which her memory shall ever live. I hope that nothing will be spared to give this vast Dominion a fitting and worthy representation at the celebration of this joyous event, and I hope that the Premier of the Dominion will see his way clear to attend in person the ceremonies which will then take place. His presence there will be a remarkable evidence, not only of the wonderful expansion of the British Empire, but also of the union and harmony which exists amongst all creeds and all nationalities in the Colonies of that Empire. I must say that I think it could hardly be possible, if the Premier does go to England on this occasion, that we could have there a more pleasant, a more courteous, or a more eloquent representative. I wish, Sir, that I could go on in this strain, complimenting my hon. friend the Premier and his party. It would certainly be a more congenial task to me. I have endeavoured to find further points upon which I could compliment hon. gentlemen opposite. I would, for instance, like to compliment them on their political consistency; but after the Speech we have heard this afternoon from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I find that task beyond my means. Sir, when I take up the Address which is now submitted to the House for consideration, I find that it may be divided into three parts. There are some questions in it which belong to the Liberal party, for instance, the franchise, prohibition plebiscite and extension of the Intercolonial Railway, but there are subjects which, while hon. gentlemen opposite were in opposition, they fought as earnestly as they could. Take, for instance, the enlargement of the canals. Why, Sir, we were always told that the Conservative party spent too much money on the canals, that the Conservative party was extravagant, that the Conservative party was running this country into debt. But one of the first things we see this session when business is before us, is an enormous expenditure put upon the country. "Business is business," as some of our friends opposite would say. I will not say anything about the franchise or the plebiscite just now, reserving my remarks upon these two questions until they come formally before the House. But one word about the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. I am sorry that I do not see my hon. friend from Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) in the House. I suppose that when this paragraph of the Address was drafted in the Council, that hon. gentleman was not present. How is it that we are told now that the Intercolonial Railway is to be extended to Montreal? Only last session we voted $48,000 for a station at Lévis, but if the Intercolonial Railway is extended as far as Montreal, this expenditure will be completely useless, as Quebec and Lévis will only become way-stations on the line of the Intercolonial Railway. But perhaps upon this subject also hon. gentlemen opposite have changed their minds. Now, I will ask the hon. gentlemen who represent the district of Quebec more particularly in the Administration, how is this going to benefit the district of Quebec? Is it not going to take away from us the local trade, or the trade which we have always enjoyed between Quebec and the Lower St. Lawrence, and the Maritime Provinces? And how about the Quebec bridge? That is a subject which is dear to the hearts of all Quebecers, and if the Intercolonial Railway is extended as far as Montreal, one of the best arguments in favour of the Quebec bridge disappears. The bridge was to be built as a national enterprise, because it linked the Intercolonial Railway with the Canadian Pacific Railway, and gave one uninterrupted line of railway from Halifax to Vancouver. Why, Sir, I think the hon. member for Quebec West must have been absent when that subject came up in Council, because it was only the other day that he declared in Quebec before a large audience that he was authorized by the Government to promise one million dollars of public money towards building a bridge at Quebec. It is true, however, that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, if newspaper reports are to be believed, contradicted this statement and said that the hon. gentleman from Quebec West must have been misreported, because the Government had never authorized him to make any such promise. Sir, if it were parliamentary I would ask which of the hon. gentlemen was telling the truth; but as I suppose that would not be parliamentary, I will only ask, Who is right? Was it the hon. Minister of Public Works, or was it the hon. member who represents Quebec West? I pass briefly over these subjects, and now come to the tariff. When I read this paragraph in the Address, I find in its tone a great change as compared with the statements with which we have been met for the last seventeen or eighteen years. Fancy that on the night of the 23rd June last some Grit Rip Van Winkle went to sleep, and awakened on the 25th of March, when this Speech was delivered in the Senate, he must have said that he did not recognize his Grit friends. Why, he went to sleep on the 23rd of June hearing nothing but commercial union with the United States, or unrestricted reciprocity, or tariff for revenue, and all these propositions which were made to the people of Canada for seventeen or eighteen years. Now, however, when he wakes up, he reads in the Address this paragraph which, if it means anything at all, means that the Government have changed their minds upon this subject, and intend, not to do away with every vestige of protection but simply to provide the necessary revenue, and their present intention is to introduce a measure which, "While having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people." Sir, I once saw a play in which a very ingenious actor represented Rip Van Winkle on the stage, I believe, in the city of Detroit. Everybody knows that Rip Van Winkle had a dog, and that before he went to sleep he tied this dog to a tree. In this play which I saw, when Rip Van Winkle awakened from his sleep, he looked around him for his dog. Casting his eyes upon the tree which had grown to a considerable height, he saw the skeleton of the dog dangling from the branches of the tree far above his head. If this Rip Van Winkle, of whom I have spoken, had awakened on the 25th March and heard the Speech from the Throne, he must have looked around for the trade policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and if so, he must have looked for the skeleton in the tree.

Now, I come to another question, an important question, which has been gone into very fully by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Menck), and that is the Manitoba school question. I will not say much in regard to it, reserving to another time more extended remarks. An hon. gentleman who spoke this afternoon from the other side of the House, the Minister of

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), taunted hon. members on this side of the House and asked us if we would propose an amendment on that paragraph of the Speech from the Throne which relates to the school question. I may inform hon. gentlemen opposite that this question is not dead, that it is not buried, that this so-called settlement is not considered by a large portion of the population as a settlement, and we will choose our day and hour to make hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec who sit behind the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce come before the House and redeem the pledges made to their constituents throughout the province of Quebec or eat humble pie, as they have been doing ever since the Liberal party came into power. Sir, I need make no apology to the House for speaking on this question. It has been spoken of by the hon. seconder of the Address, it has been alluded to by the Prime Minister and also by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It may be said, why does this interest in the school question exist in the province of Quebec? It is not a question of sentiment simply, it is a question of business. The minority in the province of Manitoba have, as we deem it, been ill-treated by the majority, and what has happened at the hands of the majority of the province of Manitoba may happen to the minority in the Dominion of Canada. We, therefore, say it is our right, and not only our right but our duty, to tell those who would attack our rights in the Dominion of Canada that we stand here to defend them, and we will defend them to the last. Besides, when Manitoba was taken into the confederation the province of Quebec gave a part of the means by which it was brought into the confederation. Those fertile fields belong to us Catholics and French as well as to the Protestants and English, and we are interested in seeing that no laws are passed in the province of Manitoba, if the constitution gives us the right of redress, which will prevent our people going to there to settle. Besides, as Canadians we are interested in seeing that the written constitution of this country shall not be trodden under foot. We cannot join in the hope expressed by His Excellency that the agitation is at an end. And why? Because the minority in the Dominion, and especially in the province of Manitoba, are not satisfied with the settlement. The evidence of this is found in the result of the St. Boniface election, which took place not long ago. I say even more: that the minority in Canada are not satisfied. The statement may seem strange to a good many members in this House in view of the events which have occurred since the last session of Parliament. Let me allude to some of those events. Hon. gentlemen have said that the country is satisfied, that the minority is satisfied, and they accept as evidence of that satisfaction what happened some time ago in Cornwall, in Bonaventure and in Wright. I know nothing of what took place during the elections in Cornwall and in Wright, but I know very well what occurred in Bonaventure during the election held there not long ago; and if hon. gentlemen who know any thing about that election, about the organization of it, can take any consolation out of it, or find from it evidence that the minority of Quebec are satisfied with the school settlement, they are easily pleased. Why, everybody knows, and it has been told to this House, that a railway running from Metapedia down to Caplin in Bonaventure County, a distance of 90 miles, had been closed for eighteen months. Almost on the eve of the election this railway was run by the Government, and from almost every husting in that county during the election contest, it was declared that if the electors did not vote for the Government candidate, the running of the railway would be immediately stopped. Not only that. The county of Bonaventure, as the House knows, is situated on Baie des Chaleurs, and all those who have lands upon the bay have salmon licenses from the Government. The agents of the Government went down there and told those men that if they did not vote for the Government candidate, their licenses would be taken away. Those people were coerced into voting for the Government and for the Ministerial candidate, and if they failed to do so, they were satisfied that the railway would be shut down again and their salmon licenses would be taken away. Those are only some instances of the way in which that election was conducted by the friends of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The minority were led to believe that the Manitoba settlement is not final; and this is one of the great arguments used not only in Bonaventure and Wright—it is being used in Champlain, where an election is now going on—but throughout the whole province of Quebec. It is within the memory of all that almost immediately after last session a deputation was sent to Rome, I will not say by the Government, but by leading members of the party. The Catholic members of the Government knew full well that the settlement which they were preparing at the time would never be accepted by the minority or by the Catholic hierarchy of Canada. They knew this so well that they sent over Abbé Proulx and M. Drolet to try and convince the Papal authorities that no other settlement was possible, or at least that if this settlement was made for a time it was not final. But the mission sent to Rome by hon. gentlemen opposite, not as a Government but as individuals and for political purposes, was a signal failure, and Abbé Proulx and M. Drolet came back only to tell a tale of woe. That was not enough. The Premier of this Dominion and the hon. Solicitor General made two very important speeches on the subject before the electors, one in December and the other closely following in January. And what did they say? I read a very carefully prepared report of the speech delivered by the hon. Solicitor General in Toronto, and which was printed in "L'Electeur"—a revised edition, an edition prepared not for the hearers of the speech in Toronto, but to be read by the electors in the province of Quebec. What was the principal argument used? It was that the judgment of the Privy Council, forsooth, had not ordered the Governor General or the Parliament of Canada to restore separate schools—thereby inducing hearers and readers to believe that any concession should be accepted by the minority because they never would get anything else. I wish to answer this argument very briefly. In Brophy's case it was declared that the constitutional laws of 1890 created a grievance for the minority, that the minority had a right to appeal to the Governor General in Council for redress, and that the case was one which was a proper case for interference as set out in paragraph 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. This is easily proved. Probably the House does not want any proof of it, but in view of the speeches made by the Premier and the Solicitor General it is perhaps well to refer them to pages 10 and 11 of the Manitoba school case. It is true that the Privy Council did not instruct the Governor General in Council nor the Parliament of Canada in a precise way as to the methods to be employed to redress the grievances which the Privy Council said existed as against the minority. They did not say, you shall re-enact the old school laws of 1871 which gave separate schools to the minority, but in their reasons, their lordships enumerated the grievances which the law of 1896 created. Their lordships say:

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed, has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law, there existed denominational schools of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only toward the support of the Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the Statute, fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer determined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.

In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite sought to make it be believed by the Catholic minority in the province of Quebec and in the Dominion of Canada, that the decision of the Privy Council after all did not amount to much as their lordships did not give the precise way in which the grievances should be redressed, and while the hon. gentlemen to whom I have alluded were making these speeches in Toronto and Quebec, their press was enlarging their arguments, and saying that it was better to accept a half settlement than to get nothing at all. But both the Premier and the Solicitor General have stated that this settlement was not final. The Solicitor General said in Toronto that the Government had obtained assurances that the minority would be represented in the Council of Public Instruction, in the board of inspectors, in the board of examiners, and, taking his words as I translate them from the French report in "L'Electeur," this is what he said :

Thus the minority would be able to have their complaints heard in relation to the programme of the separate schools and the selection of books, if necessary.

These are the words used by my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) in the corrected and revised report of his speech as published in "L'Electeur." The hon. gentleman led the Catholic people of the province of Quebec to believe that the Manitoba minority were really going to have separate schools, and that this was a further concession which Mr. Greenway was prepared to make. But that was not all. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) alluded this afternoon to the occasion upon which Mr. Greenway was invited to come to Montreal. Now, Mr. Greenway's invitation to Montreal was simply done for the purpose of convincing the Catholics in the province of Quebec that this settlement was not final, and that, after all, Mr. Greenway would give to the Manitoba minority all their rights which they had been claiming for so long. And the Premier in a speech which he made in Quebec later on told the people: I insisted upon the presence of Mr. Greenway at the banquet at Montreal so that he could himself tell the province of Quebec that the settlement was not final, but that he would give to the Catholic minority in Manitoba what the Solicitor General at Toronto had promised the Manitoba legislature would give. Notwithstanding these promises and notwithstanding these declarations which he (Mr. Greenway) made in Montreal, the Premier saw that he was losing ground every day, and that the Catholics in the province of Quebec and the Catholic minority in Canada—when I speak of the Catholic minority I speak of the Catholics throughout the entire Dominion of Canada—the Premier saw that, notwithstanding these declarations he could not bring the Catholic minority in Canada to believe that the settlement which he had made with Mr. Greenway was a settlement which commended itself to the good judgment of the Catholic minority in the Dominion. And then another step was taken. My hon. friend the Solicitor General was sent to Rome; my hon. friend the Solicitor General went on a pilgrimage to Rome. Whom was he sent by? Was he sent by the Dominion Government; was he sent by the Ministers, or was he sent by the individuals who compose the Dominion ministry? At all events, he went to Rome, and before he went to Rome he tried to use a weapon which did prove of some effect. I will not accuse the hon. gentleman of having inspired the articles which appeared in the English press at the time, because if I did so, I would be accusing him of treason to the church to which he belongs. But, coincident with his visit to London on his way to Rome, articles appeared simultaneously in the Toronto "Globe" and in the "Pall Mall Gazette," of London, threatening the bishops and the Catholic minority in this country that if they kept up the agitation they would probably lose more by it than if they kept quiet. They were threatened that if they kept up the agitation the rights that had been guaranteed to them by solemn treaties would some day or other be taken away from them. My hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) also obtained an opinion from an eminent gentleman on the other side of the water, the Hon. Mr. Blake, and, armed with this opinion, he went to Rome, or he sent it some time after he got back from Rome. However, I will refer to that opinion of Mr. Blake later on. These articles having appeared in different papers in London, some ecclesiastical authorities in England were probably frightened and pressure was brought to bear upon the papal authorities asking them to send to Canada a delegate, an envoy, to see whether or not a lesson could be read to the bishops of the minority in the Dominion of Canada. The consequence of this is that to-day a papal delegate is on his way to this country. I do not know whether I am speaking by the book when I say that one of the principal reasons for which this delegate is sent here is certainly not, as my hon. friend admitted himself when he spoke at Lorette the other day, to condemn the bishops for their attitude on this school question, or to say that they were wrong in their mandements or their pastoral letters ; but I think I am right in saying that this papal envoy is sent to the Government of the Dominion of Canada on the promise that if he comes he will get a better settlement and better terms from the Government ; and I do not know that I am not right when I say that it was promised to the papal authorities that if this envoy came he would get better terms and a better settlement, and that if he did not get such, the Solicitor General and two of his colleagues in the Cabinet would resign. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works laughing. I do not think he will resign. But, Sir, while this papal envoy is on the scene, and before he is at liberty to speak or to say what his mission is, it is given out in Bonaventure, in Wright and in Champlain, that he is sent here to bring the bishops into line and to make the minority accept the settlement ; and before he is able to open his lips, the work will be done by the gentlemen who are supporting the ministerial candidates in Champlain and in the other elections which may spring up before he has had time to speak. This is the way the so-called approval of the minority has been obtained. I say it has been obtained by false pretenses, as the hon. gentleman obtained power by false pretenses.

Mr. CASGRAIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CASGRAIN. If the hon. gentlemen on the other side will bear with me for a minute, I am going to prove to them that they did obtain power on the 23rd of June by false pretenses. I have alluded to the opinion of the Hon. Edward Blake. I am not going to discuss the minor points of that opinion. Everybody agrees with Mr. Blake that upon the questions put to him by the Solicitor General, no other answer could be given by him than this one, that is to say, that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council never ordered the Governor General or the Parliament of Canada to restore the separate schools of 1871 as they existed prior to 1890. Nobody ever pretended that in this country.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You all did.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASGRAIN. My hon. friend has been asleep ; he is the Grit Rip Van Winkle. But, Sir, Mr. Blake's opinion as to the impracticability of remedial legislation, as to the question of knowing whether it was opportune at the time or whether it is opportune now to introduce remedial legislation into this House, is the opinion of a gentleman who is certainly versed in the political affairs of this country, but who has been for some years absent from Canada, and who probably is not perfectly aware of what has happened here and what is happening at the present time. . But I will call the attention of the hon. Solicitor General to this. When he put this question to Mr. Blake, and when Mr. Blake answered that one of the principal reasons why remedial legislation would not be efficacious was that no grant could be made by the Parliament of Canada, why did not my hon. friend call the attention of Mr. Blake to the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 54, sections 23, 24 and 25, and to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont) at the time the Bill was before this House. Just let me read one of these sections, which relate to the school lands of the province of Manitoba and the Territories and to the paying out of the moneys realized from the sale of these lands. It provides that the sale shall be by public auction, and after speaking of the terms of payment, it goes on to say :

All moneys from time time realized from the sale of school lands, shall be invested in securities of Canada, to form a school fund, and the interest arising therefrom, after deducting the cost of management, shall be paid annually to the government of the province or the territory within which such lands are situated, towards the support of public schools therein ; and the moneys so paid shall be distributed by the government of such province or territory in such a manner as it deems expedient.

Now, Sir, we held, and we still hold, that this Parliament has the right to so amend this section as to demand from Manitoba that a part of these moneys should go towards the maintenance of the schools that would have been created by the remedial legislation had it passed. It is not my intention now to compare the settlement which has been arrived at by the Premier and Mr. Greenway with the legislation which was introduced in this House by the Conservative party, nor with the terms of settlement which were proposed by Sir Donald Smith, Senator Desjardins and the Hon. Mr. Dickey. But if it is any consolation to those who represent the minority on the other side of this House, I will only remark that the Hon. Mr. Cameron, the Attorney General of Manitoba, speaking on the second reading of the Settlement Bill the other evening in the Manitoba legislature, said that there could be no comparison whatever between the settlement arrived at and the remedial legislation proposed by the Conservative party or the settlement proposed by Sir Donald Smith ; that hardly anything contained in the Remedial Bill was contained in the settlement ; and that he considered this settlement the greatest triumph for the Government and legislature of Manitoba. Now, Sir, there is another part of Mr. Blake's opinion to which I wish to refer. Mr. Blake seems to question the obligation or the duty of Parliament to pass remedial legislation. Nobody in this House, and hardly anybody in the country who has studied the question, can pretend for a moment that the Parliament of Canada, after the remedial order had been passed and served on the Government of Manitoba, had not the right to pass remedial legislation, as laid down in the constitution. The judgment of the Privy Council settles that point beyond a doubt, and the hon. Premier of the Dominion, when he was sitting here as leader of the Opposition did not deny it. The only fear which my hon. friend from Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) had was that the Remedial Bill did not go far enough. He said that this being a proceeding in appeal, as it were, if the Bill were passed, then the jurisdiction in appeal would be exhausted, and then the minority in the province of Manitoba could never get their rights. He said :

I oppose this Bill, precisely because I feel that if we were to pass it to-day, it would put an end to all possible chance of re-establishing separate schools in Manitoba.

That was his only fear. But I hold that not only had Parliament the right to pass remedial legislation, but it was his constitutional duty to do so, and I can have no better authority on this point than the utterances of a gentleman who sits in this House, and who is now removed to a higher sphere ; I refer to the Hon. Mr. Mills. I have read his speech and re-read it several times, and I consider it to be an admirable 'exposé' of the constitutional doctrine on this question. What does Mr. Mills say ? I will read what he said for the edification of hon. gentlemen on the opposite side. I have heard that they did not like that speech, because it was in direct contradiction to many of the theories advanced by the hon. Premier and other members on his side of the House at that time. Here is what Mr. Mills says :

Let us for a moment consider the meaning of this.

He refers to a despatch concerning the educational claims of the B.N.A. of Lord Carnarvon :

Is it a mere enabling power ? What does the right of appeal mean ? And what the claim to a remedial law ? A claim means, not a request, but a demand resulting upon a right. Let the House mark the significance of the whole paragraph. This provision was the subject of long and anxious discussion, that Parliament would not alter, if it were susceptible of amendment, because it sets out an agreement at which the parties have arrived. It was to secure to the religious minority of each province certain rights and privileges which it assuredly would not do if the limited power entrusted to Parliament was a mere enabling power imposing no duty whatever. There is a right of appeal admitted, and there is a claim to its enforcement conceded. A claim would be no claim, if it were a mere appeal asking that a discretionary power should be used. It means much more than this. It implies that those who make it have a right, and that they are invoking the aid of the party to whom the law has committed the power of redress. A mere discretion is not consistent with a compact. It is assumed that there is a compact which is, by the law, adequately protected against successful violation by the power conferred and by the constitutional duty imposed.

And again he says :

It is essential to the due execution of the federal system of government that we should recognize the regulative authority of the supreme law. This applies equally to Parliament and to every provincial legislature. Each of them must look to the constitution as the source from which its authority is derived ; and, when a Parliament exercises a power granted under the constitution for the very purpose for which it is given, no legislature, no provincial government, can have any legal or constitutional cause to complain. If the results are not satisfactory, the fault is with the supreme law, and not necessarily with those who are called upon to administer it. It is preposterous to argue that, when special circumstances arise which were contemplated by the framers of the constitution, and which call for the exercise of the power bestowed, that it is not to be employed.

And again :

The Governor General in Council has to ascertain whether the minority has appealed ; whether the rights and privileges of that minority have been impaired or destroyed by any provincial authority, and if so, then there rests on him, not only the power, but the constitutional duty, to urge redress in the way that the constitution itself provides.

Therefore, I take it from their own authority that it was not only in the power of this Parliament to pass remedial legislation, but it was the duty of this Parliament to do so. But I have further authority upon this point, and very decided authority also, coming from the benches on the other side. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was at one time the editor of a newspaper well known to the public in the province of Quebec and throughout the Dominion called "Le Canadien." My hon. friend had then no doubt admitted the right of Parliament to pass this remedial legislation. But that is not all. He had no doubt whatever that it was the constitutional duty and obligation of this Parliament to pass such legislation. Sir, he did not use the calm and dispassionate language which Mr. Mills used in discussing this question. I will read a few extracts from his newspaper, "Le Canadien," and you will see with what fire and enthusiasm he urged the claims of the minority at that time—not when he was enjoying the sweets of office, but when he was in the cold shades of opposition, trying to get to the place he now occupies. The hon. gentleman, in the "Le Canadien" of 8th September, 1892, said :

We know from an authentic source that desperate efforts are now being made to induce the Catholics and French Canadians of Manitoba to make new concessions. Those concessions which were made in the past have all turned against us, and it would hereafter be treason, as well as cowardice, to take one step backward.

The political party which sits at Ottawa, is under the imperative duty to render justice, whatever may happen.

Let Sir John Thompson and his colleagues show themselves energetically determined, and the reasonable elements of the population will rally around them.

This is not a party question. We are in the midst of a national crisis.

Again he says in reply to the request that the minority should make some concessions:

The constitution applies to all. We can make no further concessions in this matter of the Manitoba schools. Let us boldly arm ourselves with our right, and let us see where we stand in Canada.

Let us see if the Queen's signature is worth something when it is at the foot of documents which assure to the Catholics of Manitoba the same prerogatives which the Protestants enjoy in the province of Quebec.

That is not all. Again he said in another article :

There is no tribunal under the sun which has the right to deprive a people of its religious liberty, of its rights of existence, of its nationality. There will be no "peace" so long as we are not restored in the enjoyment of the guarantees stipulated in the constitution. Our moderation consists in the refusal of any compromise. We have the title to separate schools, and we shall have them. * * * It is not to the Catholics and to the French Canadians that moderation must be preached. When did they encroach upon the privileges of their English fellow-citizens? Because they are the minority, they are asked to submit to the religious tyranny let loose by adventurers imported here at the expense of the older provinces. It is not possible for us to give up fighting for our claims in their entirety.

That is the way he spoke in 1893. Here is another article from his pen :

The Federal Executive is the foremost guardian of the constitution, and it is in this capacity that it is called upon to intervene in the school question. The Government and the Parliament of Canada undertook, by the Act of 1870, to see that a system of separate schools was maintained in the province which they were creating. Between the population of Manitoba and the Dominion this is not a question of law; the public faith is at stake. If the authorized organs of the Dominion, that is, the Government and the Parliament of Canada, did not draft a clean and precise law, is the Catholic minority to suffer? Does this circumstance exclude the certain, incontrovertible fact of a distinct stipulation, of a positive agreement, in relation to the Manitoba schools?

The political question rises above and throws far away into the background all the technicalities and all the cunning by which Mr. Greenway intends to render illusive the primordial foundation of confederation, of the Act of 1870.

That this Act is drafted in incorrect terms: it may be, since the Privy Council so decides. But, if this be the case, then, the intervention of the Governor General and of Parliament, if necessary, imposes itself, to remedy this insufficiency.

That was the doctrine which the hon. gentleman preached at that time. No compromise whatever, no settlement to be arrived at between the Government of the Dominion and the Government of the province of Manitoba. His cry then was "No surrender," we should have all our rights or nothing at all. There were no doubts then in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Quebec as to the right and duty of the Government. Let me quote some of their declarations, made during the election of 1896, which will be interesting reading to the House. I cannot quote all the declarations which these hon. gentlemen then made, who have been elected on the strength of them, because a good many of these hon. gentlemen kept these declarations in their pockets or destroyed them, but we have managed to put our hands on some few, which I will read for the edification of the House. I do not know if the hon. gentleman who represents Megantic (Mr. Turcot) is in the House, but I cannot refrain from reading the declaration he signed on the 9th of June, 1896, just before the election :

Considering that, by its judgment, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has definitely decided that, in law and in fact, the Catholic minority of Manitoba have a real grievance, and that they have a right to separate schools; considering the mandement of the bishops of the province of Quebec, which imposes upon the Catholics the obligation to vote for no other candidates but those who expressly bind themselves to pass legislation restoring to the Catholic minority of Manitoba the school rights which have been recognized as belonging to them by the Privy Council in England, I, the undersigned, a candidate at the present elections, expressly and solemnly promise to demand, and to vote for, the passing of remedial legislation which will place the Catholic minority of Manitoba in the fullest enjoyment of their rights. I further promise to do nothing which would place the Government in a position in which it would be impossible for them to introduce such legislation or which might delay its passing.

(Signed) GEORGE TURCOT,
Candidate.

Ste. Julie de Somerset, 9th June, 1896.

That is not all, Sir. I hold in my hand a declaration signed by the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) :

County of Beauce, P.Q., June, 1896.

I, the undersigned, solemnly and expressly promise, agreeably to the mandement of the archbishops and bishops of the province of Quebec, to support in the House any measure which will efficaciously restore to the Catholics of Manitoba their schools, of which they have been deprived for the last six years; to use every effort to obtain for the Catholics their legitimate share of subsidies for the maintenance of these schools, and to obtain from the Government of Manitoba the recognition of the principles that the education given in these schools should be controlled by the clergy.

I further promise to see that the same justice is rendered to the Catholics of the North-west. Whatever Government is in power, if the law which is introduced is accepted by the bishops, I promise to support it.

DR. GODBOUT,
Candidate.

But it will be said that those gentlemen are not lawyers, that they probably do not understand the full meaning of their declaration as to its legal aspect. But, now, I will turn to some of my legal friends, on the other side who also signed declarations to a like effect. But before doing so, I cannot refrain from alluding to the declaration, not a signed declaration, not a written declaration, but a spoken one made by my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot). He did not sign a declaration nor write one. But on one occasion, in a parish in his own county when the discussion was going on and he was hard pressed by his adversaries, being in front of the church, he turned to the church and taking off his hat he took as the evidence of the sincerity of his promises and declarations the temple of Almighty God.

Mr. TALBOT. What declaration?

Mr. CASGRAIN. That you would vote for remedial legislation, for the law approved by the bishops. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Talbot) went as far in this direction as any other candidate in the last Dominion election.

Mr. TALBOT. I beg to deny that statement most formally and I beg further to state that the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) is drawing freely upon his imagination in making the statement he has just made.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I have to take the statement made by the hon. gentleman, but—

Mr. TALBOT. I deny.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I will not take it back, and I say—

Mr. SPEAKER. When an hon. member distinctly charged with something that is within his own knowledge, gives the House his assurance that it is so or is not so, any hon. gentleman must accept that and take back any statements to the contrary. It is not correct of the hon. gentleman to say that he will not take it back.

Mr. CASGRAIN. What I said is that I will accept the statement made by the hon. gentleman. But how can I take it back when I believe it to be true.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not been long a member of the House or he would understand that he must take back such a statement. He may not be convinced, but he must accept the statement of an hon. member upon such a point.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Then, I am not convinced but I accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. I will now refer to some of the legal gentlemen who gave their promises, which, I think, they will not repudiate before this House. I have here declarations not made before the church door, but signed, executed, and duly delivered by the gentlemen who wrote them. Let me, for instance, refer to the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers). Everybody in the province of Quebec knows the submission which he made upon this question to his bishop and the declaration he made. Here is what the member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux) wrote:

I, the undersigned, solemnly promise to vote in the House according to the desires expressed by their lordships in the recent pastoral.

But that is not all. We have a declaration made by another gentleman. This declaration was made by the hon. the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), a declaration signed and delivered by him. This declaration was made out when the archbishop was not in the city of Quebec, but was on a pastoral visit in the county of Beauce, 50 or 60 miles from Quebec. The hon. gentleman, I believe, unsolicited went to the bishop and delivered to him, signed with his own hand, the following statement:—

Being sincerely disposed to put aside all party spirit and all questions of men, in order to secure the triumph of the Catholic cause in Manitoba, I, the undersigned, promise, if elected, to conform myself to the bishops' mandement in all points and to vote for a measure according to the Catholics of Manitoba that justice to which they have a right by virtue of the judgment of the Privy Council, provided that the measure be approved of by my bishop. If Mr. Laurier reaches power, and does not settle the question at the first session, in accordance with the terms of the mandement, I promise either to withdraw my support or resign.

And, Sir, the hon. Solicitor General still sits in his seat, although no remedial legislation has been introduced by the Premier but a kind of settlement, a so-called settlement which settles nothing and sacrifices those rights for which the hon. gentleman was then ready to fight, has been made. I said a moment ago that hon. gentlemen opposite obtained power on the 23rd of June by false promises. Is there any reason since the 23rd of June that they should change their minds? Have they redeemed their pledges? Not one of those who signed these declarations has carried out his pledge, and I say again that before this session is over we will have evidence here of whether or not they are going back on their solemn promises and declarations.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Do it now.

Mr. CASGRAIN. We will do it when the proper time comes. I see my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was disturbed by the reading of the articles which I read a few moments ago. I ask him to keep quiet. I will not read more of these at present, but I will have more for him at another time. Sir, something has been said this afternoon about the bishops seeking to coerce the minority in the Dominion during the last general election. I deny that statement most emphatically. I would ask those who believe it to read the mandement issued by the bishops to the province of Quebec prior to the last election. I would ask them to read the pastoral issued after the election and after the settlement had been arrived at between the Premier of the Dominion and Mr. Greenway, and then show, if he can, one single word in which coercion is even referred to, or anything in these documents that can be taken as a threat by the bishops of Quebec to their people. But it seems to me there cannot be in this circumstance any criticism of the action of the bishops of the province of Quebec. I take it that the Catholic bishops of the province of Quebec and of the other provinces, are citizens of this Dominion, and they have a right to express their opinion upon questions which concern the public welfare of the Dominion. A great deal has been said about civil liberty. Even if the bishops went further than they did in their mandements or pastoral letters, I think they had a right to give to their flocks the directions which, in the performance of their duties, they think they are bound to give. It is not taking away the civil liberty of any citizen of Canada for the bishops to tell him that on a given point which touches religion, he is bound as a Catholic to oppose such and such a measure, or to support such and such legislation. Why, Sir, we see in the papers every day that Protestant clergymen do this.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Yes, Sir, Methodists and Presbyterians do it, and you deny to Roman Catholic bishops the right to give their flocks directions as to how they should vote. When you talk of civil liberty, give the bishops the liberty which every citizen in this country enjoys. Is the party on the other side really and truly a Liberal party? If so, then I say they should not try to gag the bishops and to prevent them from expressing their sentiments upon this question. This question is a politico-religious question, and I maintain that the Roman Catholic bishops in this country have a perfect right to express their sentiments and their opinions upon that question. But if they can be criticised now, they could have been criticised in years gone by. This is not the first time that the Roman Catholic bishops of this country have addressed pastoral letters and mandements to their flocks upon great constitutional or other questions which have divided public opinion in this country. Let me refer briefly to some instances where the bishops did give directions to their flocks as to what they should support or what they should condemn. In 1775 when emissaries were sent over here from the United States asking the French Canadians to join the Americans at the time of the revolution against English authority upon this continent, what was the direction then given by the Catholic bishop of Lower Canada to his flock? Sir, it was only a few years since the fleur-de-lis had left these shores, and it seems to me that if the bishop at that time had listened to his own feelings, they would have prompted him to say: Well, England is our old enemy, England has conquered us. It seems to me that some such feelings might have rankled in his heart and inspired a desire for revenge on their English foes. But at that time the bishop, notwithstanding everything that was held out by the priest, Father Carroll, who was sent over here by the American authorities, notwithstanding all the promises which were made, that bishop then issued a mandement or pastoral letter to his flock, and he said: No, England until now has treated us fairly, let us stand by England. The emissaries of the United States were sent back, and the sole cause of their failure was this mandement issued by the Roman Catholic bishop of Lower Canada at that time. In 1812 when war was declared between the United States and England and Canada, and when England was engaged in war with almost every country in Europe, what did the bishops do? They again issued a mandement and pastoral letter to their flocks asking them to fight for England; and if the French Canadians fought as they did at Chateauguay, it was because they were inspired by their bishops and priests to do so. Then in 1837 when some of our French fellow-citizens rebelled against English authority and against the constitution of this country, what did the Catholic bishops of the province of Quebec do? They again issued mandements and pastoral letters to their flocks, and it was because of these that the fire of rebellion did not spread from one end of Quebec to the other. It was these mandements, these pastoral letters, which checked that fire, which caused almost all the French Catholic population of the province of Quebec to turn against those who had rebelled against English authority. Then in 1867 when a new constitution was given to this country, and when the Government came before the province of Quebec to get this constitution adopted, a constitution under which we have prospered, the confederation of Canada, pastoral letters were again issued by the Roman Catholic bishops to their flocks, asking them to accept this constitution as one giving them not only the enjoyment of the fullest political liberty, but also the fullest religious liberty. And, Sir, in 1885, when, in the province of Quebec, as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works knows well, some persons were trying to raise sympathy with the rebels in the North-west, it was the bishops again who, by giving directions to their flocks, brought them back to a true sense of their duty. Now, Sir, it seems to me that, under the circumstances, in view of what has already passed in Canadian history, the bishops cannot be blamed for taking part in the fight which is going on, and which has been waged until now upon this great Manitoba school question. They have always been on the side of the constitution; they have upheld the constitution of this country, and what they tried to do before the election of 1896, and what they are trying to do now, is simply to get for the Catholic minority of Manitoba the same degree of protection from the constitution as is due to every other citizen in this country.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I move the adjournment of the debate, and in doing so, I may, perhaps, be permitted to say that I do not move it for the purpose of answering the statements made by my hon. friend with reference to the Roman Catholic bishops of Quebec, against whom, or with reference to whom, I have not heard a word uttered during this debate. It seems to me the hon. gentleman has been spending his time in an idle attempt to defend people who have not been attacked. It would have been much more in order for the hon. gentleman to have turned his attention to the Conservative minority in the legislature of Manitoba, to explain their actions on the School Bill when it was before the legislature. I think, also, he might have spoken to much better effect if he had turned his attention to the organs of the Conservative party, and to their course upon this legislation; and also to the utterances of the Conservative organs about the mission to Rome, of which he spoke some time ago, and the mission of the papal ablegate. I move the adjournment of this debate.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to know, without intending discourtesy to the hon. gentleman who has just spoken—

Mr. SPEAKER. Allow me to put the question.

Mr. McNEILL. I was about to say, without intending any discourtesy to the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate, that I should like to have your ruling on this point, because this is the second occasion in which we have had the same thing during this session, a thing which I have never seen before. I should like to have your ruling as to whether a gentleman who has made the remarks my hon. friend has just made, can have the opportunity of speaking again. It was always understood that it was not in order for an hon. gentleman moving the adjournment of a debate, to do more than merely make the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has raised a question of order, but it is not customary, I think, for the Chair to decide a question of that kind before it comes properly before the House. The question may be raised properly no doubt if the hon. gentleman who has moved the adjournment makes a speech again at another time after this debate is adjourned; but that he is perfectly in order so far nobody can deny. The hon. gentleman has moved the adjournment of the debate, and if any question arises hereafter, it will be decided.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to understand your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I hope I have made it clear. The hon. gentleman is perfectly in order to-night at all events. Whether any question of order shall be raised on it at a future time, it will be for hon. members to decide; a decision will be given then if the point is raised.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to know if I can raise a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not if it is on the same point of order. If it is on any other question, the hon. gentleman may do so.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION— PAPERS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I would like to ask the hon. the First Minister if he intends to lay before the House all the papers in connection with negotiations on the Manitoba school question. I have a motion on the Order Paper to that effect, but as the debate is going on, I think it would be proper for the House to be placed in possession of all the documents in connection with the case that were not submitted last session.

The PRIME MINISTER. I was waiting for the motion of my hon. friend to be made and carried. But as the motion may be deferred for some time, if it is agreeable and convenient to my hon. friend to have these papers without delay, I shall be very glad to bring them down. The motion of the hon. gentleman covers all the papers on this question which have not yet been brought down. I can bring them down probably the day after to-morrow.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I made this proposition because I saw in the reported proceedings of the Senate that these papers were to be brought down in the Upper Chamber, and I could see no objection to the papers being brought down to this House.

The PRIME MINISTER. There is not the slightest objection.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.10 p.m.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9) to provide for the abolition of the Civil Service Superannuation Act and for the retirement of members of the civil service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the Postmaster General if he would be good enough to state briefly the character and objects of this Bill.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. In reply to the hon. gentleman I would say that, as its title implies, this Bill provides, in the first place, for the abolition of the present Civil Service Superannuation Act—not its immediate abolition or its abolition in its entirety to-day, but its abolition as regards a certain section of the civil service and as regards all new appointees, so that ultimately the Act will cease to apply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What section of the civil service?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to briefly refer to the scheme offered to the House in substitution of the present system. The present system provides for the superannuation of officials who have been contributing for ten years or more to the superannuation fund. In the event of those officers dying in the service, their heirs get nothing. In the event of their superannuation, these officers receive an annuity during the remainder of their lives. The present scheme provides that there shall be deducted a percentage from each officer's salary, and that the Government shall fund that percentage and allow interest upon it, computed half-yearly, whilst such officer is in the service. When he resigns or retires from the service, that fund is his, but while he is in the service he has no claim upon it. Should he die in the service, that fund will pass to his legatees or next of kin. It proposes to repeal the Superannuation Act as it is to-day in respect of three classes of persons: First, those hereafter appointed; secondly, those at present in office who have contributed nothing towards the superannuation fund; and thirdly, those at present in the civil service who have contributed something, but not for ten years, to the superannuation fund. As regards the last class, the Bill provides that as regards all contributions paid by those now in the service for a less period than ten years, the amount shall be ascertained and interest computed on it half-yearly at the rate of 5 per cent, or such other rate as the House may determine, and the total sum carried to the credit of the retiring fund in respect of these particular officers. The Bill also contains a provision that, in the event of the Governor in Council being of the opinion that any member of the service is unfit to manage his affairs, should he be dismissed or otherwise, the Government may control the destination of the funds, always limited, however, by this principle, that it shall be devoted for the benefit of his wife and children or other next of kin. The Bill also provides that members of the civil service, who have been contributing for more than ten years, may, at their option, and with the consent of the Governor in Council, within three months from the passage of this Bill, bring themselves under its operation. In that event they will be treated in the same manner as those who have contributed something, but not during the full period of ten years to the fund. The reason why the period of ten years is fixed is this: under the Act at present, a civil servant who has contributed for less than ten years to the fund may be retired upon the payment of a gratuity and not of a pension. So that he does not stand in the same position as one who has been contributing for a longer period than ten years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, I have no intention of entering upon a discussion of the merits of this Bill at this time, but I may point out that the Bill seems to entirely abandon the principle upon which the policy of superannuation was based. The House is perfectly well aware that before the policy of superannuation was adopted, the disinclination of all Governments to interfere with the position and emoluments of public officers who become old and incapacitated for work, either through failing health or other reasons and to throw their families into destitution—I am not now speaking about one party and one Government, but of all—led, almost inevitably, to retaining officials who were no longer able to discharge their duties efficiently, very much to the detriment of the public service. Therefore, the policy was resorted to in accordance with the precedent of England and other countries, of making a charge upon the salary of the civil servant in order that when he was no longer capable of discharging his duties efficiently, he might be retired without his family being reduced to a state of destitution. I need not say that the cases are very few and far between in which the salaries of civil servants are not all required and all used for the daily sustenance of their families. The law was altered at no very remote period. I was not here, but I understand that the alteration was made in consequence of finding that the contribution exacted from the officials during their tenure of office was not sufficient to provide for the charges made against the superannuation fund. I believe a very marked change was made in that respect so as to render the superannuation fund, as regards all future appointees, self-supporting. Do I understand from my hon. friend (Mr. Mulock) who has introduced this Bill that this whole policy is to be swept away and that we are to be brought to the position of being obliged to choose between retaining incapable officials to the great detriment of the service or reducing their families to a state of destitution? The other question is a question altogether outside—that of an insurance policy. Though this might be a very wise and useful measure in itself, and calculated to benefit very much the families of persons who have been in the civil service, it rests upon an entirely different footing. The primary object of the superannuation fund, I take it, was the effective carrying on of the public service, and that was accomplished by a charge upon the salaries of officials when they were well qualified to perform their duties so as to enable a certain provision to be made for them when they grew old or were otherwise incapacitated. As I have said, I have no intention of provoking any discussion upon the merits of the Bill, but I would like to understand at the outset whether it is proposed by the Bill to sweep away that principle of providing for the efficient performance of the public service in the mode in which the Superannuation Act provided.

Mr. MULOCK. I think that when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) sees the Bill and makes a computation he will find that the fund will be far more beneficial to the officer and to his family than the fund provided under the existing law; and I think he will find, also, that it is a measure that will be much more satisfactory to the public and to the taxpayers of Canada generally. And, further, I think it is a Bill that will secure more efficiency on the part of the officials, for it will cost the country nothing, when this Bill is in force, to retire an officer. When he is retired, he takes with him his own funds. It is no charge upon the country, and, therefore, when an officer ceases to be efficient, he can be retired and there will be a fund available for him. At present, there is a large number of the civil servants—I will not say how many, but there are many—who, for many years, have been retained in office after their period of usefulness had expired, simply because of the disinclination that every Government feels to retire worn-out officers or men who have ceased, either from preventable causes, or otherwise, to be useful to the service. This Bill will entirely obviate that difficulty. The officer will feel that there is less difficulty in the way of his retirement. His continuance of office will then depend upon his usefulness, and the Government will not be embarrassed in retiring him, inasmuch as there will be a fund available to provide for the contingency my hon. friend refers to, the contingency of a man being turned off upon an unkind world without the means of supporting himself and his family.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) in giving his explanation in regard to the Bill specified three classes of people upon whom the new Bill would have an effect. First, those who are not appointed, but must be subsequently appointed; second, those who have been appointed but who, for reasons of age or otherwise, have not been contributing to the superannuation fund, and, therefore, are not upon the list of those who may be superannuated; and, third, those who have paid to the superannuation fund under ten years. I take it that the Bill does not affect those who have been paying in for the fund for ten years or more, unless they desire to come under the operations of the new Act, and to be relieved of the obligations under the old Act. I am sure that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) sees that that would have a serious effect—at least so it seems to me—upon the income under the superannuation, payment from which must continue for a very long time, even under the Bill now proposed by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MULOCK. I may say that if those who have been contributing more than ten years, elect to come under the Bill and the Governor General in Council consents to that election, they come under the Bill and the old Act is repealed as regards them. In the event of their so electing, an account will be taken as to their contributions, interest will be allowed upon it half-yearly, and that total sum will be placed to the credit of these men as a foundation, and they will thereafter only make contributions provided under this retirement Bill and not under the other. I think that when my hon. friends study out the figures, they will see that it will be infinitely better for the officers as well as for the public. When the Bill comes before the House to be considered in detail, I will be prepared to furnish a calculation showing what the fund will amount to at different periods, every half year, for the average life of an official.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think the hon. gentleman has missed the point I was endeavouring to make, namely, that the fact of these people being allowed to retire and to come under the operation of the new Act, would withdraw their contributions which they were compelled to make under the old Act, and would have a very serious effect upon the superannuation fund from which those who remain will have to be paid.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Those who remain are paid out of the consolidated revenue.

Mr. McMULLEN. Some two years ago I introduced a Bill of which this is evidently a recast, with some considerable improvements. At the time I introduced that Bill, the Speaker of the House met me with a point of order, saying that it required to originate with the Government. Now I congratulate the country on the introduction of this Bill. I carefully followed the leader of the Opposition in the remarks he had to make. I might say in reply, that were it not for the manner in which the superannuation system of Canada was abused by hon. gentlemen opposite, I question very much if a move would have been taken absolutely to abolish it. But the evidences of abuse that characterized the administration of that Act for the last 18 years, prove clearly that very considerable amendments needed to be made to the Act, or else it should be entirely abolished. Now the leader of the Opposition says that it is following a system that has been in existence in England for a great many years. That is very true, but at the time of the inception of the system of superannuation in England, there were not the easy and desirable modes of life insurance in existence that there are to-day. Besides, the remuneration paid to civil servants in England was exceedingly low. In England the superannuation system has been managed so as to avoid drawing upon the resources of England to a single pound. The entire sum which is paid to superannuated officers in England, is paid from the fund contributed entirely by the civil servants, not a pound is taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of that country. Had we a superannuation system of that kind in Canada, it certainly would not have been as objectionable as the system that we have had in existence here; and had hon. gentlemen opposite allowed the Act to remain on the statutes as it was originally introduced, I question if it would not have provided a fund even for the extravagant raids to which it had been subjected. But in place of doing that, they cut down the percentage that was deducted from the salary of the civil servants to the extent of fifty per cent, and from the date of the reduction down to the present time a very considerable sum annually has been added to the drain that the people have been asked to submit to in order to keep that system in existence. Now, I contend that the time has arrived when, in the interests of the people of this country, we should abolish that system. There is no reason whatever why it should be continued. There is no class in this Dominion to-day—I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to name the class that is better paid than the civil servants of Canada, there is no class that gets a better salary. Then I would like to know under those circumstances why it should be thought necessary to call upon the people of this country to contribute very nearly a quarter of a million annually to keep up the civil service superannuation system. I contend that the time has arrived to abolish it, and I am glad the Bill is introduced. I would respectfully draw the attention of the ex-Finance Minister to the introduction of this Bill, and to the determination of the Government to implement at least one of the pledges that they have given. I hope he will notice that, and that when it comes up for the consideration of this House he will give it his attention.

Mr. FOSTER. I have noted it.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, I hope so. It will at least prove that after this you will no longer be able to say that the Reform party has carried out none of its pledges. We are going to carry out this pledge. Now, Sir, I admire the improvements that have been made in the Bill by the Postmaster General. In addition to the provisions in the measure I presented to the House, it deals with those who have been in the service for ten years, but have not yet become entitled to superannuation under the Act. That, I think, is a very prudent addition to the clauses of the Bill originally introduced. These men will now be brought within the operation of this Act, the sums they have paid will be placed to their credit with interest half yearly, and the amount will be kept in the meantime as a guarantee of good faith and efficient service on their part. Should they die in the service their heirs will be entitled to the money, or if they retire from the service they have a right to draw their money and do as they like with it. I think that is an additional improvement to the provisions of the Bill that I introduced some two years ago. The Minister of Agriculture made some remarks with regard to the application of the Bill to those who have been longer in the service than ten years. They are to be allowed three months within which they are to decide whether they will continue to contribute to the superannuation fund and participate in its advantages, or whether they will withdraw and have the moneys they have paid in, placed to their credit, with interest annually, as provided in the case of those who have served ten years. That, I think, is also another good provision. It leaves it optional with them. It does not force them to abandon the right they attained when they entered the service, but it leaves them the choice as to whether they will participate in the superannuation system, or whether they will withdraw and so be able to control their own means as they like. On the whole, I heartily congratulate the Government on the introduction of this Bill. I am sure that the country will almost unanimously endorse their action in bringing a measure of this kind before the House for the purpose of wiping out a system that has been abused most scandalously within the last eighteen years, because there are men in the country who have been superannuated that never should have been placed upon the retired list, but they were placed there by hon. gentlemen opposite in order to make vacancies for those who were pressing their services upon the country. That system will now be abolished, and we shall have a different condition of things.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROPOSED TARIFF—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Before the House proceeds with the Orders of the Day, I wish to ask your attention for a moment to something which in one sense is personal to myself, and which, in a larger sense, relates to the affairs of the Government and the House. My attention has been called to an article which appeared this morning in the Ottawa "Citizen" newspaper. The first paragraph of this article, while it is incorrect, and unfair, and offensive, is nevertheless a comment upon a public utterance of my own, and, therefore, it may be held to come within the lines of newspaper criticism. I take no exception to that, and I would not call the attention of hon. members to this matter if the article had stopped there. But the writer proceeds to make some statements which are so grave that I think I am justified in calling the attention of the House to them. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read the three paragraphs:

Some other remarkable things transpired in connection with the coming revision.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the first remarkable thing?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The first paragraph is in the nature of comment upon some remarks made by me in Montreal in regard to the coal question, which have already been referred to in this House. That is comment on public affairs, and although my action is stated in a way that is most unfair and unjust, I do not take exception to that paragraph, because it may be held to fall within the line of what is commonly called fair criticism. But it is the concluding portion of the article to which I wish to call attention:

Mr. McMULLEN.

The Kingston cotton mill, in common with other mills whose business was threatened by the declared policy of the Liberals, has been running on half-time, barely manufacturing what was required for immediate sale and consumption. Suddenly it starts into unusual activity, and is now going night and day. What is the explanation? The cotton manufacturers had an interview with the Finance Minister the other day. Did he give them a tip?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House smile, as if this was a common thing to do in certain quarters. The article proceeds:

Further, within the past few days it is announced that forty million pounds of sugar have been taken out of bond in Montreal. This means that the dealers are convinced that the duties are to be raised on this article. How do they know? Have they been given a tip?

These circumstances are most auspicious, and it will be hard to convince observers that the Finance Minister has not been guilty of a gross abuse in permitting intended tariff changes to be made known to certain favoured individuals and firms who can benefit by the knowledge. The boundless corruption to which such a practice opens the door may be seen at a glance. In any case, its injustice and unseemliness are most reprehensible.

Mr. Speaker, I am a journalist, at all events I was for many years of my life a journalist, if I am not at liberty to claim a share in the profession to-day; and I think I have a pretty clear understanding of how necessary it is in the public interest that a large degree of liberty should be accorded to the press in their criticism of public affairs, and am not likely to be in a hurry to find fault. So thoroughly do I feel the necessity of giving the greatest liberty to the press that I seldom find any fault with newspaper criticism, although it may be, and very often is very unjust and very unfair. But surely there is a line of demarkation between fair criticism and a series of accusations of the gravest character without having a shadow of foundation. The charge made in the "Citizen" is a very serious one. A man holding the office of Finance Minister could hardly be guilty of a more shameful act than that of giving private information in advance of his intentions in regard to tariff changes. If it were possible that a Finance Minister should do this thing, and did it, no language the press could employ, no words that his opponents could use, would be too strong to condemn such an infamous proceeding. Having said this, I have only one sentence to add. I state that the charge made in this newspaper, which I have read to the House, is absolutely false and is without a shadow of foundation.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman and the House will allow me, I will take this opportunity of saying that the House has heard, and I am sure the country will hear, with the greatest satisfaction, the straightforward and emphatic denial of the hon. Finance Minister with respect to what might have been inferences drawn from the newspaper article that he read. It would be indeed, as he has said, a most infamous thing, which could not be too strongly reprobated in this House or the country, that a Finance Minister or any member of the Government associated with the Finance Minister should give the least information in any way as to any items in respect to the tariff soon to be submitted to the House. I am very glad to have heard the hon. gentleman make the denial. I read an article yesterday particularly for the purpose of giving the hon. gentleman a chance to make a straightforward denial in this House. The hon. gentleman did not take advantage of the opportunity yesterday, and did not make the denial. I wish to point out to the House that the position in which the hon. gentleman finds himself to-day he has largely brought upon himself. I am not personally aware in the history of Canada of any case when in advance of the tariff being brought down, in which a thousand interests are involved, a Finance Minister ever gave a public tip to any single industry.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Will the hon. gentleman take his seat?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman did give that public tip to a deputation in the city of Montreal.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order. Will the hon. gentleman take his seat?

Mr. FOSTER. I will take my seat.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not take his seat until I had asked him to do so five or six times. On the Orders of the Day being called, it is well understood that we must not have a general discussion. Personal explanations and answers given, and such remarks as may naturally arise in connection with these matters, are proper; but I must ask the hon. gentleman, especially as he is an hon. gentleman with great experience and knowledge of the rules, to be good enough to assist me in trying to preserve what he knows to be the rules of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I will try to do so, Mr. Speaker.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask the Government if the papers called for by the following order of the House have been prepared and are ready to be brought down:—

Statement showing the amount of money expended by the Dominion Government since the first day of July, 1873, for constructing, equipping and subsidizing railways in Canada, with the number of acres of land granted as subsidies, and their estimate value. Also, a statement showing separately the part of such expenditure made on railways in each province of the Dominion and the North-west Territory, deducting any sums that may have been charged against any of the provinces or the North-west Territory in their debt account with the Dominion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). If the hon. gentleman will kindly send over a memorandum, I will attend to the matter.

REPORT.

Report of the Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, for the year 1896-97.—(Mr. Fisher.)

The Civil Service List of Canada, 1896.—(Mr. Fisher.)

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Russell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McNEILL. I rise to a point of order. The point to which I wish to call your attention, Mr. Speaker, is that to which I referred last night. The point I desire to make is this: that my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick), having moved the adjournment of the debate last night, and having spoken, it is not now competent for him to speak again in this debate. I should be very sorry, Mr. Speaker, if the House were to assume for one moment that I were so ungenerous as to desire to interpose any formal objection between the House and the explanation which the hon. the Solicitor General desires to make. All I desire to do, Mr. Speaker, is to have your ruling upon this point, which it seems to me—and I venture to think, to a good many other members of the House—is a point of very great importance. We want, Sir, to have an authoritative ruling upon the question, whether it is competent for an hon. member when he moves the adjournment for the purpose of having precedence when the debate again comes on; whether it is competent for him to make an impromptu speech at the time of moving the adjournment, and then to claim his privilege of precedence and make a second speech when the main question comes on for debate. I think I may say that the practice has been unknown in this House before; at least so far as my memory carries me back I have never seen, until this session, such a practice attempted during the fourteen or fifteen sessions that I have had the privilege of a seat in this House. I think, Sir, that the practice is altogether contrary to the principles upon which our parliamentary procedure is founded. I do not want to take up the time of the House, and therefore I think it is better for me to refer to the authorities. Dr. Bourinot, in his "Parliamentary Procedure," last edition, page 417, says:

If a member who moves an Order of the Day or seconds a motion, should rise and say only a word or two,—that he moves the order or seconds the motion—he is precluded from again addressing the House, according to a strict interpretation of the rules. In moving an amendment, a member is obliged to rise, and though he may only propose his amendment, he is considered to have exhausted his right to speak on the question before the House. It is usual for a member who wishes to have the floor on a future day to move the adjournment of the debate, and to give him the priority when it is resumed. The House also frequently agrees to adjourn the debate in order to allow an opportunity to a member to continue his speech on a future occasion.

It says, "the House also frequently agrees," but not always. The House does or does not agree, as it pleases. With the indulgence of the House, I take it that the hon. member (Mr. Fitzpatrick) can continue, but I take it also that it is a practice that might be subject to very great abuse, and it is a practice that the House ought to regard with very great jealousy.

If a member should move the adjournment of the debate, and the House should negative that motion, he will have exhausted his right of speaking on the main question.

Now, then, Sir, I wish to refer you further to this very authoritative and explicit statement of May:

A member who moves the adjournment of the debate, with a view of speaking upon the main question on a future day, must to obtain this privilege, confine himself to that formal motion.

Again, I find in Denison's and Brand's decisions, by Blackmore, this ruling was laid down:

If an hon. member moves the adjournment of the debate, and speaks thereon, he cannot speak again on the main question; but, if the motion is withdrawn by leave of the House, he can then speak.

It appears that Mr. Fawcett moved the adjournment of the debate, and he appealed to the Speaker whether he should lose his right of speaking on the main subject if he made one or two observations to explain why he had moved the adjournment of the debate:

Mr. Speaker said: "The hon. gentleman would be entitled to speak on the motion he had made for the adjournment of the debate, but he could not speak again on that question. If the House allowed the hon. gentleman to withdraw his motion, he might then speak on the main question."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

I venture to submit very respectfully, Mr. Speaker, that those authorities that I have quoted practically settle this question, but I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have no desire at all to interpose between my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and his desire to address the House. I will venture to hope that if you, Sir, rule in the direction to which I imagine these precedents point, that the House will extend its indulgence to my hon. friend the Solicitor General and allow him to give his explanation. If the House does not do so, I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Fitzpatrick), if he is desirous of addressing the House, will get some of his friends to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point which the hon. member (Mr. McNeill) has raised is an important one, and one full of interest. It is, I think, a point which is new in this Parliament. There has been some uncertainty as to the practice in that matter. From my recollection, I think that occasionally, in moving the adjournment of the debate in order to have the right of speaking first on the next occasion, remarks have been made on the main question; but I am inclined to think that this is not the proper practice. According to English precedents, and indeed as a matter of expediency for ourselves in carrying on the business of the House, it would be better when hon. gentlemen desire to move the adjournment of the debate in order to secure the right to speak first, that there should be no discussion indulged in except, of course, as to the question of adjournment. For obvious reasons, it is well to keep to that rule. I find in the 10th edition of May, it is so clearly laid down as to what the English practice is that we in this House would do well to follow it:

A member who moves the adjournment of the debate, with a view to speaking upon the main question upon a future day, must, to obtain this privilege, confine himself to that formal motion.

I know that cases have occurred in England—not frequently—and in this Parliament too, in which, when an hon. member has been making a long speech, a unanimous assent has been given that he should adjourn the debate and so secure the right to speak first on the next occasion. In England, towards the beginning of the century, Mr. Percival had spoken for three hours on a certain question, and the House expressed a strong desire that he should postpone his further remarks, and at the request of the House he did cease speaking in the middle of his address, to resume on a future occasion. In 1877, the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) was making a speech—he had not spoken for three hours—and it was nearing midnight on Saturday, when at the suggestion of the leader of the House the hon. gentleman was asked, in the middle of his speech, to move the adjournment of the debate. But those were exceptional occasions, and were for the general convenience of the House, and by the unanimous desire of the House. I do not think they establish a precedent in this case, in which an hon. member rises to move the adjournment of the debate simply for the purpose of having the right to make the first speech. Therefore, I think we had better come to an understanding that in future the rule of this House shall be as it is in England. Of course, the House may assent to the Solicitor General going on with his remarks. I hope they will do so, because our practice has been somewhat uncertain, and in this case a refusal would only cause delay, because another hon. member could move the adjournment of the debate, and so secure his right to speak.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this House for the courtesy which has just been extended to me. I quite understand that it has been extended to me, because of the somewhat peculiar position I occupy in connection with this debate. I take for granted that no one will be much surprised if I feel called upon to claim some portion of the time of this House at this stage of the debate during the course of which I have engaged to a large extent the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite. I think that of all those who have spoken on the other side, one alone abstained from referring to me by name and to the position I occupy in consequence of certain pledges which were given to the bishop of the diocese to which I belong. Even the ex-Minister of Finance condescended to come down from the very superior position which he occupies in this House, to deal with me personally for a few moments. I cannot pretend to ignore what he said, because of course I felt it coming from him, and because of the way he said it and what he said. At the same time, it seemed to me that the ex-Minister of Finance might perhaps have abstained from lecturing this House and myself on the subject of political morality. I will not go further into that subject at the present time; but I will say this, that when the true history of the Manitoba school case is told, and when posterity comes to read its inner workings, it may then become known who were the secret foes and the false friends of the Manitoba minority. I shall not undertake to repeat what a colleague of the hon. gentleman said in another place when he undertook to explain what led him to resign from the former Bowell Government, nor shall I refer to the reasons which the Hon. Mr. Angers gave for resigning from that government, nor what he said about the men who surrounded Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and the position they occupied in regard to this question when to the public they professed to be the friends of the Manitoba minority. But let me come immediately to the question of those pledges; and I will at once deal generally with all the pledges that were given—those pledges that have been used by hon. gentlemen opposite as the basis of their accusation that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House occupy the positions they now occupy by virtue of the false pretenses they put forward when they went before the electors of the province of Quebec. It will not be necessary for me to recapitulate any of the circumstances in which we were placed on the eve of the last general election. It will not be necessary for me to draw the attention of this House to the pastoral letter which was issued at that time by the Roman Catholic bishops of that province. These events are still too fresh in the minds of hon. gentlemen to necessitate a recapitulation of them at my hands. On the eve of the last general election a pastoral letter, signed by all the bishops of the province of Quebec, was issued and read in all the Roman Catholic pulpits of that province, in which pastoral letter was to be found this paragraph:

Therefore, my dearly beloved brethren, all Catholics shall abstain from giving their assistance or their votes to candidates who shall not bind themselves formally and solemnly to vote in Parliament in favour of legislation restoring to the Catholic minority in Manitoba the school rights guaranteed to them by the judgment of the Privy Council.

Now, those who are familiar with the conditions existing in our province, those who know something of the workings of the Roman Catholic Church, to which I belong, those who know something of the influence which that church possesses in the province of Quebec, will readily realize what that pastoral letter meant. And let it now be understood that, so far as I am concerned, I do not in the least object to the interference of the Roman Catholic clergy in elections, but I do object to their interfering in mere party politics. I hold that there are times when they not only have the right to interfere, but should interfere; and I am far from taking the position that this case was not one in which they should interfere. Now, what took place? Candidates of the Liberal party having given the pledges to which reference has been made during the course of this debate, in accordance with the terms of this pastoral letter, what would hon. gentlemen expect would be the result? The result naturally to be expected would be an abstention on the part of the clergy from interference between the political parties. It would naturally be expected that the Liberal candidates who gave those pledges would be placed on the same footing as their opponents, and that the two political parties would be allowed to fight out the issues then pending between them without the intervention of the clergy. Was such the case? No. The result was—and it is well known by those who invoke those pledges to-day, and who now taunt us with having given them—that those pledges were of no avail, but that—openly and in such a manner as amounted almost to intimidation—the cause of the other side was espoused, and these pledges were set at nought and dealt with by the other side as though they had never been given at all. After having given the pledges it is said the Liberals did not live up to them. The pledge amounted to a contract to which there were two parties, and neither party appears to have lived up to it, so far as I can gather.

I now proceed to discuss my own case—and my case, I admit, is one that hon. gentlemen opposite pronounce the most aggravated of the lot. It is the one that has engrossed, at all events, the largest share of public attention. I may tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I gave the pledge which was read in the House, that I signed it, and that I gave it voluntarily. I went of my own accord to my bishop, and gave the pledge to him, as a Roman Catholic, dealing with the head of his church in the diocese to which he belonged. I gave it to him, and I mean now to stand by it, let the consequences be what they may. I am speaking for myself alone, I am dealing with the pledge I gave, and I say that having given, having handed it over voluntarily to the bishop of the diocese to which I belong, from that day to this I have never been asked to account for that pledge which I gave, nor has my attention ever been drawn to the fact, up to the present time, that I have not fulfilled it, but the pledge was delivered over to the Tory party to be made use of for political purposes. Now, Sir, I attach some value to the position I occupy in this House, not because of my personal merit, but because of the favour and the friendship of my hon. leader (Mr. Laurier); but more value do I attach by far to the good opinion of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House—on the other side as well as on this—and if I am called upon, as I should have been called upon before, to say why I did not fulfil my pledge, I will feel that I have forfeited the confidence and respect of hon. gentlemen on both sides if I do not leave this House the very moment I am called upon to do so by the religious authorities of my church. Now, the ex-Finance Minister represented me as having gone to my bishop and as having, as he described it, in the language which he knows so well how to use, gone down on my knees to my bishop, and as having humbly—in that very humble posture which I have no doubt would befit me very well indeed—taken the pen and at his dictation subscribed to this pledge which he handed me. Why did I do that, asked the hon. gentleman. To get into this House. That was the object. Had I not done that, said the ex-Finance Minister, had I not gone and crawled in this way towards my bishop, I would never have got here. Well, let me recapitulate—and you will pardon me, Mr. Speaker, if I make a personal allusion to myself at present—the circumstances under which I ran in the county of Quebec. The gentleman who had hitherto represented the county was Mr. Fremont, and he had voted for the Remedial Bill in the session of 1896. This gentleman again presented himself for that county. I gave my pledge, which could not have had more weight with the electorate than his vote. It could not have commended me to the electorate to any greater extent than did his vote commend him, especially as the result of his vote was that, in the contest which took place between us, four clergymen in my county openly canvassed against me, notwithstanding the pledge I had given. But what was the result? I defeated Mr. Fremont so badly that he came within half a dozen votes of losing his deposit. That is how I came into this House. That is the extent to which this pledge, of which so much has been made, enabled me to gain my election. But what I said then, and what I repeat now, with respect to that pledge, is this, that I am in favour of giving to the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba all the rights to which they are fairly entitled under the constitution, as it was interpreted by their lordships of the Privy Council. Not only do I say that, but I say that, as a Roman Catholic, it is my duty to consider that secular and religious teaching should go hand in hand. I believe that we should have religious teaching in our schools, and where it is obtainable, I believe that the separate school system is the best. That is my conviction and my belief, independently altogether of the judgment of the Privy Council, and that is what I should seek to obtain for the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba, so far as it is in my power to do so. I may be asked naturally if the legislation introduced by the Manitoba Government gives to the Roman Catholic minority that measure of justice to which they are entitled. So far as I am concerned, I must say that I believe that the Manitoba minority will not, under it, get all that they ought to get and all that they ought to contend for. I say that now, because I cannot come to any other conclusion, but I say, at the same time, that while they do not get what they ought to have and most certainly ought to contend for, it is utterly out of the question, under existing conditions, that in this House we should endeavour, by any means in our power, to give them more than they have at present. I said a moment ago that I was prepared to give to the Roman Catholic minority what the judgment of the Privy Council said they were entitled to under the constitution. For what does that judgment say they were entitled to? Here it is, in the second last paragraph:

It is certainly not essential that the Statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted or that the precise provisions of these Statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of, the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate ground of complaint would be removed, if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Now, what is the grievance? In a preceding paragraph, the judgment of the Privy Council points out what it is, and the grievance, as pointed out by their lordships, is that the Manitoba minority were deprived of their separate schools.

The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching.

Mr. LARIVIERE. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is what they say, but it is a phrase among many other phrases. Listen to this:

These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state.

That judgment means that in so far as separate schools were concerned, they disappeared by virtue of the law of 1890, which was a law passed by the Manitoba legislature within the scope of the authority of that legislature. And as a result of the passing of that law, the Manitoba minority were deprived of a portion of the public funds.

Mr. CASGRAIN. That is a grievance.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. That is one grievance. The second grievance is that they were obliged to contribute to the maintenance of public schools, to which they could not send their children. So these make purely and simply a financial grievance. That being the case, how could we remedy it here? Is it within our power to remedy it by any act of ours? How could we, in any manner, shape or form give them the rights that the judges of the Privy Council said they were deprived of.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how he interprets this part of the judgment, the remarks of the judges of the Privy Council:

Before these passed into law, there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching.

This power of control being removed, was not that a third grievance? Were there not three grievances of which the Manitoba minority complained?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. It seems to me that the answer to this will suggest itself to the mind of every man who patiently reads the judgment. If the House will bear with me, I would like to point out again that they say that the laws of 1890 were within the scope of the legislature. These laws abolished separate schools in Manitoba. By the abolition of separate schools a grievance was created. In what respect? They say that the abolition of the separate schools and the creation of a new system entailed an obligation upon the Manitoba minority to pay for schools to which they could not send their children, and also deprived them of the benefit of a share in the public funds. That is all it means, it cannot be construed to mean anything else. If, then, the grievance is a financial one only, how are we going to remedy it here? Was there any attempt made to remedy it by the last Government under their Remedial Bill? No attempt was made whatever because they felt that they could not do it. Not only have we this admission tacitly or by implication that they could not interfere with the financial aspect of the case, but we have that statement made by the ex-Minister of Finance when discussing this question in Cornwall. On that occasion he said:

We are charged with not giving to the Manitoba minority their share of the public school fund. Why, we might as well be charged with not exercising control over the funds of the Czar of Russia.

Showing how absurd he considered the pretensions that we here could in any way deal with the finances of the province of Manitoba. These are the words he used. I have given them textually as they appeared in the Montreal "Gazette" at the time. When the ex-Finance Minister was in Toronto, having gone to support the candidature of Mr. Coatsworth, his attention was drawn to this Remedial Bill. He said: Read that Bill from beginning to end every line, every phrase, every word of it, and you will not find within the four corners of the Bill anything that gives any financial assistance to the Manitoba minority. Now, my contention is this: I would not ask the minority of Manitoba to take this settlement for a final settlement, but I would ask them to take it in the spirit in which it is given. At the same time, I would also ask them to look about them, look in the Manitoba legislature, to look in this House, and tell us where they can get any more than is now given to them. I said I would not ask them to accept this as a final settlement, but to accept it as an instalment in the spirit in which it is given. I would ask them to accept in the spirit in which Mr. Greenway spoke, when at Montreal he used these words:

I repeat again—and I want you to make a note of it—that we propose to work out this system in a fair and generous spirit, and not to undertake the responsibility of closing up fifty or sixty schools, leaving the children of those schools in a state of ignorance. It is they who are assuming the responsibility.

Here is what I would say to the minority in Manitoba, Mr. Greenway said:

If they can, from time to time, suggest any way by which we can meet your views to a further extent, we shall always be prepared to consider it.

I will also draw the attention to what Mr. Greenway said when the Bill was introduced in the legislature at Winnipeg:

Manitoba had always offered, and were still ready, to deal with every question, well-founded complaint, in a spirit of conciliation and generosity. He showed that this had been the course of the government by reading from the records of the House and the replies of the provincial government to the Dominion Government.

Again he said, and this is an answer to the hon. gentleman for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain):

He was willing that they should have a voice in the selection of text-books, &c., and he was ready to consider the representations of any denomination which would take advantage of the public schools, and to treat them all, not only liberally, but generously. He emphasized this because it would be the ambition of his life to have this matter settled to the satisfaction of all, so that those who would occupy the place of the present generation a few years hence, would all grow up together, respecting and admiring one another, entertaining the most liberal views, and all working together and helping one another to make the province of Manitoba the best country in the world.

Now that is the spirit in which this proposition is made to the minority in Manitoba. But, if they refuse to accept it in that spirit, let them look around for their friends and tell us where they find them, tell us where they find the men in Manitoba who are going to do more for them than Mr. Greenway has done. Even take this skeleton Bill, as it has been described in this House, this hybrid measure as it has been called by one who moved the six months' hoist to try and get rid of it, and see what is said of it by Mr. Roblin the leader of the Opposition and his friends. The "Nor-Wester," his organ, speaking of the people of Manitoba, said:

If they choose to make the necessary preparation and exert the pressure they might on the members of the local legislature, there is little doubt that they could force the Greenway Government to maintain its original position on the school question, in spite of the appeals of Mr. Laurier. Are the Protestants and the provincial autonomists of Manitoba, however, sincere in their principles? That is just the question the Greenway Cabinet is delaying the second reading of the School Bill in order to debate. Should Mr. Greenway and his colleagues come to the conclusion that the feeling of the province in favour of maintaining the integrity of the school legislation of 1890 has evaporated, they would certainly be foolish, judged from the standpoint of political expediency, in refusing to help Mr. Laurier out of his difficulties by coming to such terms as would satisfy him and Quebec. The gravity of the present crisis is extreme; and it is no wonder that the local government is anxious for delay, in order to carefully calculate chances.

Speaking of the Orange protest the "Nor-Wester" says:

This analysis is, in the main, a correct analysis. It confirms what the "Nor'-Wester" has frequently pointed out, that the "settlement" involves the utter relinquishment of the national and non-sectarian principle of our present school system. It destroys that principle as effectually as would the re-establishment of separate schools as they existed prior to 1890, which no one has even yet proposed to do.

Now, where are the Manitoba minority going to look for assistance? Where are they going to look for comfort? Is it to the men to whose views expression is given in the articles I have just read from the "Nor'-Wester"? Are these the men to whom they must look for comfort and assistance? Are they disposed to do for them what Mr. Greenway has promised to do—treat them in a spirit not only of fairness, but of generosity—listen to any appeal they may have to make, and deal with the Bill in such a way as to remedy their grievances, and eliminate from it all those things that Catholics conscientiously object to? But if they cannot get anything from the Manitoba legislature or the Manitoba Opposition, what could they get in this House? Will hon. gentlemen on either side of the House pretend that the Conservative party is prepared to do even as much as has been done by the Greenway Government in favour of the Manitoba minority? Why, Sir, we had last night a declaration from the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), which truly expresses the position that the Conservative party occupies at the present time on this question, and which I think truly represents the position that they always occupied, notwithstanding the apparent position they took in favour of the minority on the eve of a general election. Last night the hon. member for Jacques Cartier said, during the course of his address :

A taunt has been thrown across the floor. We have been asked to propose an amendment to this Address. I can tell you what my personal feeling on that subject is. I am not disposed, for my own part, to push the controversy to that point. There are in this House a number of generous men, who, having no special or personal interest in the defence of the minority, have risked their political lives upon the defence of those rights, while many others have succumbed to that fight. I feel a delicacy about asking these gentlemen to make further sacrifices.

Sacrifices of principle to protect a minority, sacrifices of principle to enforce a judgment of the highest court in the realm, sacrifices of principle to preserve the rights guaranteed by the constitution to the Roman Catholic minority of which we have heard so much—he is not prepared to ask them to make any further sacrifices in that direction. He goes on to say :

I know what the public feeling is at this moment. I suppose that people are tired of this question. A number of the constituents of these gentlemen who have been friendly to the minority, are anxious to see this dropped.

Not only did the hon. member for Jacques Cartier use that language in this House last night, but in the month of December last, at a meeting held in the city of Montreal for the purpose of protesting against this Manitoba legislation, for the purpose of protesting against the sacrifice of the rights of the minority in Manitoba, what did that hon. gentleman say? Quoting from the "Gazette" of the 3rd December, I find :

Mr. Monk added, that, while the minority were entitled to their fullest support and assistance in any practical way, they must be careful by their action not in any way to jeopardize the future of the Conservative party, with which many great questions were bound up.

I think that is the Alpha and Omega of their position, and is an entirely correct statement of their policy on this issue. I think if we look at the course of that party on this question in the past, if we recapitulate the facts connected with this matter from the time the judgment of the Privy Council was rendered in January, 1895, until the Remedial Bill was introduced in this House in March, 1896, we will find that from beginning to end the intention was, not to come to the assistance of the Manitoba minority, not to enforce a judgment of the highest tribunal in the Empire, not to see that the constitution of the country was kept inviolate, but the intention was to perpetuate the reign of the Conservative party, and to arrange matters in such a way that the great interests bound up with the Conservative party would be protected until the elections were over. I say you will find that to have been the case all through the history of this unfortunate question; and you will find that when the member for Jacques Cartier used these expressions that I read to you a few moments ago, he was simply saying aloud what all the members of the Conservative party feel within themselves, and probably he was the only one that had the courage of his convictions. Now, I think that in so far as the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba are concerned, the best advice that can be given to them, under existing conditions, is this: Without sacrificing any principle, let them accept this instalment of justice, let them accept this instalment in the spirit in which it is offered to them, let them take advantage of the occasion to find out how this Bill will operate; and if they find it works unfairly, if they find there are grievances still to be remedied, let them call upon Mr. Greenway to fulfil his pledge, knowing that to him they must look under existing conditions for assistance, and that they have nothing to expect from anybody else in Manitoba.

Mr. IVES. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? I understand from the Speech from the Throne that the question is settled, but from the hon. gentleman's remarks, I take it that it is not settled.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I cannot prevent my hon. friend from drawing his own conclusions from my remarks. He can draw such conclusions as he likes, and I have no doubt he is perfectly honest in the conclusions he draws. Now, Sir, there are two other things that have been mentioned in this debate to which I think I may make a passing reference. The leader of the Opposition, in the course of his speech on the Address, referred to the change of solicitors that took place in London. That is a matter which naturally concerns my department, and in connection with which, in view of the statement made by a gentleman occupying the position of leader of the Opposition, I ought to give a word or two of explanation. The firm of Bompas, Bischoff & Company had been for many years the agents of the Department of Justice in London. There is no question that the relations between the firm and the department had been satisfactory; but I fail to see therein any reason which prevents us from making a change of solicitors if we choose to do so. I fail to see why gentlemen occupying that position should be assimilated to gentlemen occupying a position in the civil service. They were not dismissed as solicitors. Nobody can pretend for a moment that any one dismisses a solicitor, but he chooses a solicitor, and it seems to me that it was quite open to us to make a change in the choice if we thought fit to do so.

Mr. FOSTER. But does not my hon. friend think, when a change is made after the person has given satisfaction, that a reason ought to be given for the change?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, nothing of the sort. I have been retained many times by men who have gone next door afterwards to employ other solicitors, and have come back to me again. It has happened a dozen times.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is there any similarity between that act and the act of a Government dispensing with a respectable firm of solicitors who had been in the service of Canada for forty years—under all Governments? There is no comparison between that case and the case of a client seeking the services of a solicitor one day and going for another the next day. Why, Sir, their very familiarity with the business of Canada gives an importance to their services which those of no other firm could equal.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. On that point let me draw the attention of the leader of the Opposition to this fact. What difference is there between our changing the Government solicitors in London, and changing the firm who have occupied the position of Government solicitors here in Ottawa for so many years? I may say, further, that this same firm of Bompas, Bischoff & Company were solicitors for the province of Ontario for many years. They were changed a few years ago, but I am not aware that any great calamity occurred to the province of Ontario in consequence. There is no reason in pretending that because we employed for a certain number of years a firm of solicitors in London, we were obliged to continue employing them to the end of time. My reason for alluding to this fact now is that reference was made to the gentlemen who are now employed as agents for the Government in London, and they were referred to as men of no experience.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say that, I said, relatively. I said they did not occupy any such position as the firm of Bompas, Bischoff & Company occupy; but I did not say that they were men of no experience.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Of course, the relative position occupied by solicitors must be a matter of opinion. I presume every gentleman who employs a solicitor is of the opinion that he is the best it is possible to obtain, that there is no better solicitor than the one to whom he applies. Now, I would draw the attention of the House to this fact, that Mr. Russell, who is employed as solicitor to the Government in England, has been employed by the Dominion of Canada before; not only has he been employed by the Dominion of Canada, but by the Imperial Government, on a most serious and important occasion, in connection with the Behring Sea Arbitration in Paris.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman tell us the grounds for saying that Mr. Russell was employed by the Dominion of Canada on a previous occasion?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. In justification of my statement, let me read this letter:

Ottawa, 30th October, 1893.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper having brought under the notice of the Governor General in Council the services rendered by you as solicitor to the British Agent appointed in connection with the Behring Sea Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, His Excellency has been pleased to order that the thanks of the Government of Canada be conveyed to you for the same. His Excellency is advised that you performed important duties and with great satisfaction.

As a further proof of the sense of appreciation entertained by His Excellency and his Advisers of your efforts on the occasion referred to, His Excellency has thought proper to bring the same under the notice of Her Majesty's Government.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,

(Sgd.) L. A. CATELLIER,
Under-Secretary of State.

Charles Russell, Esq., Solicitor,
37 Norfolk St., Strand, London.

That is a letter written by the Under-Secretary of State to Mr. Charles Russell.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to say that Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper did not represent the Government of Canada but the Imperial Government as agent in the Behring Sea arbitration, and that the appointment of Mr. Charles Russell was one in a very junior and subordinate position.

An hon. MEMBER. As solicitor.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But the appointment of Mr. Charles Russell was made in connection with the position which his father, Sir Charles Russell, held, who was Attorney General of England and leading counsel in the Behring Sea arbitration.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I have not the information at my hands which enables me to answer the hon. leader of the Opposition. So far as I am personally concerned, I am restricted to information I can get from official documents. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a word on another subject, and that is the subject which has been styled the mission to Rome, or the mission as told by the emissary to Rome.

Mr. FOSTER. Tell us all you did there.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I could tell you a lot of interesting things; but I may say this in all seriousness, that I went to Rome—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. And I came back, and after I came back somebody else came. But, Sir, speaking seriously—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I went to Rome, not on behalf of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, not in the interest of the Government of the Dominion of Canada. Perhaps I have said it too often already, and I hope my remarks will not be considered too much of a personal character, and that hon. gentlemen will not believe I am continually talking about myself; I went to Rome, as I have already stated, as a Roman Catholic to bring a grievance that I felt I had in common with other Roman Catholics, before the head of my church. I will say this, that it is to me, and I believe to many others, a source of comfort, a source of gratification, to feel that while we belong to a religious body in which there are over 240,000,000 of subjects, any one, however humble he may be, can go to Rome, and within two days after he reaches there, can go to the head of the church and tell him the grievance, and he will be listened to and heard. That is what I did, and that is what I boast of. I say that any man who belongs to a church that can accomplish such a thing as that has something to boast of. There are few people perhaps to realize what the Pope's influence is. Men talk about the British Empire, about Russia, Germany and France and imagine that he has spoken of all the power there is on earth when he speaks of the Queen of England or the Emperor of Russia or the Emperor of Germany. All that influence is nothing compared with the influence wielded by him who presides at the Vatican. If the House will bear with me, I will read one or two words written by Justin McCarthy, the historian, on this subject.

Mr. IVES. Any relation of Dalton?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I am sure he would be proud to claim acquaintance and relationship with the historian, because it would be something to be proud of. Justin McCarthy says:

The Pope is understood to have an influence and the right of intervention, so far as advice goes, in every country in the world. There is not a parish priest appointed in Ireland without the knowledge and authority of the Pope. There is not a Catholic bishop made in any country of the world, civilized or uncivilized, without his authority and approval. He nominates the men who are to risk their lives in preaching the Gospel in China, and the men who are, as missionaries, to brave the terrors of death in spreading the light of Christianity over countries still less civilized and far more barbarous than China. The Vatican is compelled to have its eye and its intellect and its heart fixed on every nook and corner in the world. There is no administrative system on earth which has anything like the same widespread and watchful and necessary superintendence. The network of the papal authority has a mesh wherever men are living. The Vatican is, in this sense, the centre of the earth.

Why did I go to Rome?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Give it up.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Here is the reason—not in my words, because I cannot find words to convey my ideas to the world:

The state has nothing to fear, but everything to hope, from the existence of the Catholic Church in their midst. She has everything to hope and nothing to fear, not only as regards her independence and constitutional liberty, but as regards the liberty of political parties, as well, to none of which does the church or the Pope desire that Catholic interests should bind themselves. The church holds herself on a higher plane and looks only to the common good, to the reign of truth, justice and peace.

That is why I went to Rome.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, Canadians of all extractions, as remarked at the last sitting of this House, feel proud to join their congratulations to those of the Government on the memorable and historic occasion of the Diamond Jubilee of our Gracious Sovereign. The long reign of our Sovereign brings back to our minds a great many recollections. However, for those Canadians who descend from the founders of the country, from those men who colonized and explored Canada, the recollections evoked on this occasion by the reign of our Gracious Sovereign are quite different from the remembrances of those of our fellow-countrymen who have only lived here for a certain number of years. We, no doubt, remember with delight that it was under the reign of Victoria that our ancestors of French origin won in all their fulness the political, civil and religious liberties which we now enjoy. But we cannot but call to mind the price at which those liberties were bought. We cannot but remember that some of our ancestors laid down their lives and shed their blood for those civil, religious and constitutional liberties, which are now so dear to all Canadians. Eternal vigilance, Sir, is the price of those liberties, so highly valued by all men who love their country. Under the Act of Union of the Canadas, our political ancestors had to struggle most strenuously for obtaining that privilege which all citizens are entitled to in a free country, that of speaking their own language on the floor of Parliament and before the legal tribunals. Now, Sir, at the time when we were struggling for and claiming our rights, we, of French descent, met with a liberal aid from fellow-countrymen of different nationalities. At the time when our fathers were claiming that important privilege, a Baldwin rose to his feet in the legislative assembly and uttered a ringing statement which I would fain hear from the lips of the hon. the First Minister and his party friends. He said:

Should I believe for a single moment that the people of Upper Canada were disposed to deal unjustly by the people of Lower Canada, I would be ashamed to be their representative. So long as similar distinctions are kept up— * * * *

He referred to the French language and to the right of speaking it on the floor of Parliament and before the legal tribunals, a right which we were then denied.

—it is idle for the Government to come and tell us that they wish to see us united.

Would that my hon. friend, the First Minister, who represents in this House the French nationality, had displayed as much energy as that noble and generous Englishman did show, when he claimed and battled for the privilege which we were entitled to and who powerfully helped in the legislature our fellow-countrymen in obtaining that privilege. Thanks to the help volunteered by Baldwin, the French tongue is now one of the official languages of this country. Another privilege, which is correlative to the one I have just mentioned, is the right of teaching that language in our educational establishments. The same remark applies to the right of teaching children the religious tenets of their parents. The hon. Prime Minister, in the course of his remarks on the Speech from the Throne, the other day, tried to impress upon his fellow-countrymen in this House and in the country at large, that the concessions he had secured from the Manitoba Government were adequate and that nothing more could be expected under the circumstances. He boasted that with these concessions, the minority had secured rights equivalent to those which had been wrested from them by the Act of 1890. The hon. gentleman has, I think, given expression to views which I cannot endorse, on the importance of the concessions which he has obtained. What was the state of affairs which prevailed under the Manitoba Act passed in 1890? Section 6 of that Act reads as follows:—

Religious exercises in public schools shall be conducted according to the regulations of the advisory board. The time for such religious exercises shall be just before the closing hour in the afternoon. In case the parent or guardian of any pupil notifies the teacher that he does not wish such pupil to attend such religious exercises, then such pupil shall be dismissed before such religious exercises take place.

What more did you secure through the so-called settlement which you now boast of as restoring to the French Canadian and Catholic minority of Manitoba, the rights which they enjoyed prior to 1890? What more have you obtained than what existed formerly? You have obtained new formalities under which the school trustees may, in the future, grant those religious exercises on the petition of a certain number of heads of families in favour of their children who attend such schools; while formerly such exercises could be authorized without any formality whatsoever. How can the hon. gentleman boast that the new Act passed by the Manitoba legislature as amending the School Act of 1890, is an important concession made to the Manitoba minority? I hold, therefore, that the hon. gentleman has obtained no new concessions in favour of his fellow-countrymen; but that which he has secured from his friend Mr. Greenway merely amounts to new formalities without which no religious exercises can take place in the schools. I am of opinion, Sir, that under the concessions obtained by the hon. gentleman from his friend Mr. Greenway, the Manitoba minority are in a worse position than ever.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). (Translation.) In that case all they have to do is not to avail themselves of such concessions.

Mr. LANGELIER. (Translation.) Why so?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I have just stated why. Had the hon. gentleman well caught my meaning, he would have understood section 6 which I have just read and also the concessions secured by the present Government. The so-called concessions secured by the hon. gentleman absolutely amount to nothing for the Manitoba minority; and yet, the hon. Prime Minister, at the time of the general elections in June last, as well as his colleagues from the province of Quebec, had given solemn pledges to the people of that province in order to obtain their support. Now, I will show the hon. gentleman that I am not alone in putting that construction on his utterances and on his course of action and that pursued by his political friends during the electoral contest in June last. The hon. Solicitor General has also put a construction on the utterances of the hon. Prime Minister. Let us hear what my hon. friend, the leader of the House, said to his fellow-countrymen of the province of Quebec, at the time of the last electoral contest. When addressing this House in 1896, the hon. Prime Minister stated that Parliament had the right to interfere in favour of the Manitoba minority. He then stated that, should he fail in securing an amicable settlement from the Manitoba Government, and one that would be agreeable to the Catholic minority, he would have recourse to the means provided for by the constitution:

Should conciliation fail, I will have recourse to the means provided for by the constitution, and I will exercise them fully and in their entirety.

My hon. friend, the Prime Minister pledged himself before the electors of the province of Quebec to put through a Bill, in case of emergency. Such was the statement made by the hon. the Prime Minister before the electorate of the province of Quebec, when he wished to obtain their votes. In so far as I could ascertain from the reports of the newspapers, the hon. gentleman did pledge himself to render justice to our compatriots, either in his addresses on the floor of this House or in those made before the electors in the province of Quebec. He said :

Should I be brought into power, as I doubt not I shall be, I will settle that question to the satisfaction of all the interested parties. But, after all, should conciliation fail, I will have recourse to the means provided for by the constitution, and I will exercise them fully and in all their entirety.

At another meeting, held in the county of Portneuf, on the 20th of May, 1896, the hon. Prime Minister spoke as follows :—

I repeat here the statement I have made elsewhere in the province of Ontario, that I want full justice to be meted out to my co-religionists in Manitoba.

Speaking at Lévis, on the following day, the hon. gentleman repeated that statement, as follows :—

It is I, in last resort, with the co-operation of Sir Oliver Mowat, who will mete out full justice to my co-religionists in Manitoba.

The hon. Solicitor General, therefore, did not put a wrong construction on the utterances of the hon. Prime Minister when he stated in the course of a lecture delivered in Toronto, that the hon. leader of the House had given his fellow-countrymen in Manitoba his distinct pledge, either in his addresses in this House or before public meetings, that he would deal justly by that minority, first by conciliatory means, if possible, but failing conciliation, that he would avail himself of the constitutional means, that is to say, that he would have a Bill passed by Parliament. Now, when I hear the hon. Prime Minister state on the floor of this House that he has settled that question, I cannot refrain from putting this question to him : What have you obtained ? What concessions did you secure in favour of the Manitoba minority ? Sir, I have just put on record before this House the pledges given by the hon. gentleman ; let me now refer to the law of 1890. Under a clause of the law passed by the Manitoba legislature in 1890, it is enacted that the school trustees may grant religious exercises in those schools, without any formality. Now, under that clause, the minority enjoyed far greater rights, in respect of those religious exercises than what they boast having obtained through that so-called school settlement. Are those religious exercises granted under that settlement, to take place during school hours ? No, Sir, those exercises must take place after school hours. Therefore, we have no separate schools, where religious teaching can be given. That religious teaching, given after school hours, could take place under the law of 1890, without the help of those amendments which the hon. gentleman and his colleagues have put at the disposal of the Manitoba minority. That minority, without asking Mr. Greenway's leave, could, under that law, have schools where half an hour of religious teaching could be given. Christian ministers had without any government intervention, the right of giving religious instruction outside of school hours. Now, I would ask the hon. Prime Minister and the hon. gentlemen opposite, whether the Manitoba Government would have dared preventing the Catholic priests or the Catholic teachers from giving religious instruction in the schools ? How can it be contended that concessions have been made or that the present Government has secured religious teaching for the children of our co-religionists when that teaching must take place, as enacted under the law of 1890, outside of school hours ? Sir, the Liberal party upon two occasions since confederation climbed into power through a conspiracy. In 1874, they came into power, thanks to a conspiracy known, at the time, under the name of the Pacific Scandal ; and now, my hon. friend was borne into power, thanks to the Manitoba school question conspiracy. He is now in power to the detriment of the most sacred rights and privileges of his compatriots, the Manitoba Catholic minority ; and in defiance of the pledges given by the hon. gentlemen opposite to the voters of the province of Quebec. But the hon. gentleman was not the only one who did pledge himself to fully restore the rights of the Manitoba minority. His followers have also taken similar engagements. The hon. Solicitor General, who has just taken his seat, has felt it incumbent upon himself to make his confession. The hon. gentleman felt his duty to confess that he had signed the paper in question. Further, the hon. gentleman has taken the engagement to resign his seat in this House, should he fail in obtaining separate schools for the Manitoba minority. But he had not courage enough to resign his seat. We were told by the hon. gentleman that so long as he was not called upon to leave this House, he would remain at his post. Several colleagues of the hon. gentleman occupy the same position he is in. They also subscribed to pledges, made promises to the electors to gain their votes, and yet they have neither courage nor fair-play enough to give up the seats which they have secured through those very same promises and pledges and to return before their constituents and tell them that they have falsified the promises given them. No, none of them will have the moral courage of so doing. They will wait till Parliament expires. But then, as in 1878, the day of reckoning will have come for the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they will be asked to account for their broken pledges. Sir, nobody more shamelessly break their pledges than Liberal candidates, and we have no better proof of that than in the statements just made on the floor of the House by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). There are other papers which I will take the liberty to read to the House. I hold in my hand a very explicit statement made by one of the hon. gentlemen opposite, the hon. member for Megantic (Mr. Turcot), who was a candidate at the last general elections. The statement reads as follows :—

In view of the decision of their Lordships of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, who have finally pronounced on the question of law and fact when declaring that the Catholic minority had well-founded grievances and were entitled to separate schools ; in view also of the mandement of the bishops of the province of Quebec, who make it incumbent upon Catholics to vote only in favour of candidates who formally pledge themselves to vote in favour of a Bill restoring to the Catholic minority their school rights and privileges, as recognized by the judgment of the Privy Council of England ; I, the undersigned, candidate for the present election, do hereby solemnly and publicly pledge myself to demand and support in Parliament and vote for a Remedial Bill restoring to the Manitoba minority their full rights. I do hereby take the further engagement to refrain from doing anything that might be calculated to render it impossible for the Government to introduce such a remedial Bill or to retard its passing.

GEORGE TURCOT,
Candidate.

Sainte Julie de Somerset, 9th June, 1896.

We also have the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) who made a similar promise and gave a similar pledge. I may further state in the main that every one of the candidates of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec verbally, if not in writing, pledged themselves, after the example of their leader, and gave just as explicit promises as the one I have just read to the House.

Mr. DESMARAIS. (Translation.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, but I challenge him to prove that I have given any such pledges to the electors of the riding of St. James of Montreal.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I expected that the hon. gentleman would challenge my statement. All the hon. gentlemen who did not sign any such pledges will, no doubt, rise in their places and tell us that they did not take any similar engagement, but public rumour has apprised us of the pledges given by those hon. gentlemen to their constituents. Let the hon. gentleman who has just interrupted me allow me to tell him this : during the late electoral contest, I had the opportunity of addressing public meetings in twelve or fifteen counties in the district of Montreal, where I met Liberal candidates of the then Opposition, and I may state that on every occasion those gentlemen did take in my presence similar pledges to the one I have just mentioned.

Mr. DUPONT.

Mr. TALBOT. (Translation.) How do you account for their having been returned to Parliament ?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) They have been returned, thanks to those false promises. The hon. gentlemen who now support the hon. Prime Minister in this House, and his unjust policy towards our brethren in Manitoba, those hon. gentlemen, I say, have been returned under false pretenses, and through a conspiracy entered into by the Manitoba Liberals and the Liberal party at Ottawa. For 20 years, the Conservatives had been in power in Manitoba, and the minority, during that long lease of power, invariably met with a fair treatment at their hands. The Liberal party climbed into power in Manitoba, just as the hon. gentlemen opposite in this House, through deceitful promises, which they falsified as soon as they were in office. On the very day when the Liberal party came into office at Winnipeg, the rights of the minority were forthwith assailed. The hon. Prime Minister, who was then leader of the Opposition in this House, supported by his followers and chiefly by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), asked for justice through his organs the "Canadien" and the "Cultivateur." They besought the Conservative Government to redress the grievances of the minority. And meanwhile, the conspiracy plotted by the Liberals in Manitoba and the hon. gentlemen opposite was going on. Let me substantiate my statement. One fine morning, Mr. Jos. Martin, the framer of the school law which the Manitoba minority complains of, made up his mind to run for the House of Commons in a riding of the province of Manitoba. Now, on the very day he was returned for this House, the hon. Prime Minister of the day, the then leader of the Opposition, wired him his congratulations. Later on, that gentleman came down here and took his seat in this House, and by whom was he introduced ? By the hon. Prime Minister in person. Does the House require further evidence of the conspiracy entered into by the Liberal party in Manitoba and at Ottawa ? It is to be found in the fact that the hon. Premier has thought it fit to take into his Cabinet one of the members of the Manitoba government, and the very same gentleman who had refused to redress the grievances of the minority. Now, the hon. Prime Minister will come and tell us that there was no understanding between his Government and that of Manitoba, with a view to denying the minority their rights ! I say, Sir, that there is ample evidence that such an understanding existed between them. I say that such an understanding is implied in the fact that one of the Ministers of the Manitoba Government is now a Minister in the Ottawa Ministry. When the Conservative party was in power, the hon. Minister of Public Works could not find words strong enough to characterize the dilatory policy of the Government in redressing the grievances of the minority. What the hon. gentleman then insisted upon, was not a compromise amounting to nothing, but he then urged, in the strongest terms, the Government of the day to restore to the minority all their rights. Here is what he wrote in his organ, "Le Canadien," in its issue of 11th November, 1892 :—

The federal executive is the first guardian of the constitution, and it is in that capacity that they had to interfere in the school question.

We have here the authority of the Minister of Public Works that the Government, at that time, was bound to interfere :

My firm belief is that there will easily be found in the House of Commons a sufficient number of gentlemen willing to mete out justice to the minority, maintain unimpaired the good faith of the Dominion and cause the country to feel confidence in the honourableness of the Government, no matter what party may be at the head of public affairs. We are called upon to say whether our institutions ought to be respected and whether the spirit of our constitution ought to be violated, in order to serve the purposes of ward politicians.

Thus wrote the hon. Minister of Public Works. Now, Sir, those articles of our constitution have been infringed upon ; but let me ask, for what purposes and which is the class of politicians whose purposes have been served through the infringement of the constitution ? The hon. Minister of Public Works also gave public expression to his contempt for Mr. Greenway. And it was in no uncertain tones that he gave the description of Mr. Greenway and his government. If the House will allow me, I will just read what the hon. gentleman said of the Hon. Mr. Greenway and of his government with whom he has come to terms :

Mr. Greenway is neither a Liberal nor a Tory. He is a "vulgar political bragger" who undoubtedly pleases the majority of the heterogeneous and ill-assimilated elements of population that have flocked to the North-west. On several former occasions he has challenged the authority of the Dominion Government ; and the one great mistake of Sir John A. Macdonald was "not to have brought him to his senses" when, on the Canadian Pacific Railway question, he so flatly and boldly challenged the central power. After all, that "demagogue" represents but a few thousand voters for whom the old provinces have made enormous sacrifices ; and forsooth, our institutions, or rather our public men must have sadly degenerated when they allow themselves to be frightened out of their wits by the threats of a worthless politician and of a few unscrupulous heelers devoid of patriotism.

Such is the pass to which the Government of the day is brought ! When the Minister of Public Works wrote that philippic against Mr. Greenway and his colleagues, no doubt it was his own course of action and that of his leader which he had in view and which he meant to stigmatize with such severity. And yet, the hon. Minister of Public Works was the tool which the Government made use of for that shameful transaction which led to the surrender of the rights of the minority. But, Sir, it would be an idle task to upbraid the hon. gentlemen from the province of Quebec who support the Government with having falsified the promises made to their constituents. Now that they have been returned to Parliament, they no longer care for their constituents. They no longer make any account of their pledges. Why, Sir, it is laughing at their own promises and engagements for the hon. gentlemen opposite to cheer as they have just done, I shall not say the arguments but the captious language of the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). That hon. gentleman has not brought into the debate a single argument calculated to vindicate the course pursued by the Government and to show that they had secured the recognition of the rights of the Manitoba minority. The hon. gentleman would have the House believe that it was nothing but a money matter. The money matter is no doubt, quite important, but there are also other questions of equal moment, such as the control over the schools of the minority, the selection of the text-books and the choice of teachers who may be called upon to teach in those schools. Sir, the present policy of the Government, when contrasted with the policy propounded by them before the electorate of this country, is quite different in its bearings. The last time I came up to Ottawa, I saw that fine structure which they call the western block, with its elegant roofing, loop-holed towers and all its architectural decorations. Upon my return to the capital for the session, that fine structure had been ruined by fire, its fine roof was no longer to be seen and the chimneys which stood denuded of their ornaments, the calcined walls told us the tale of the havoc and ravages done by the fire. That dismal sight vividly brought to my mind the fact that similar ravages and destruction had taken place in the political order, and that the same difference existed between the policy of the Liberal party propounded to the people during the electoral contest and the policy which they are now pursuing. The former policy stands to-day, like the building ruined by the fire, denuded of all its ornaments, it is completely demolished and there is nothing left but—

Mr. TALBOT. (Translation.) But the groundwork.

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) Yes, and that groundwork is the possession of power. Everything has been sacrificed. All the pledges given by the hon. gentleman have been forgotten, or if not forgotten, they have been ignored, and the hon. gentlemen have made up their minds to take no account of those pledges, either with regard to the school question or any other issue.

The hon. Prime Minister and his friends, when occupying seats on this side of the House, were shocked when told that contracts for public works were to be let. On such occasions, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) managed to work himself into a state of indescribable frenzy. And I could not help expressing my astonishment, the other day, at seeing him in such a good frame of mind, in view of the fact that his trip to Washington, with the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had not been a pronounced success, if any reliance is to be put in the despatches printed in the newspapers, which are seemingly correct, as they have not been denied by the Government organ. The hon. gentlemen opposite, at the time when the Conservatives were in power, felt indignant whenever they heard of great public works about to be carried out. Shortly before the last electoral campaign, the hon. Prime Minister himself made a tour through the North-west, and the breeze of the prairies wafted the echoes of the utterances of the hon. Premier and of the gentlemen who accompanied him, and those echoes did not in the least disturb the temper of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce or of the followers of the Prime Minister. At Medicine Hat, my hon. friend, the First Minister, held out this bait to the electors of that locality. He said :

I am neither a Puritan nor a saint, I am but a man, and I have no hesitation in saying that you need public works in the North-west.

Mr. Gibson, a political friend of the hon. Prime Minister, added :

You need many things in the North-west. Your riding has not all what it should have. You need a bridge.

At Vancouver, Mr. Gibson, addressing the political friends of the hon. Prime Minister, cried out :

The Liberal party is just as much in favour of legitimate public works as were the Conservative party.

The hon. gentleman wished to allay the fears of the voters of that locality, who seemed inclined to think that the Conservative Government alone could secure for them the improvements which they needed. And the hon. gentleman exclaimed :

The Liberal party is just as much in favour of legitimate public works as the Conservative party. Any one who travels between Vancouver and Victoria may see where money could be expended to improve the approaches of the magnificent harbour of the city which serves as terminus to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The hon. Prime Minister immediately added :

I share the opinion of my hon. friend, Mr. Gibson, that there is yet perhaps something to be done for this city. It might perhaps be proper to encourage and assist the energy of the people ; and perhaps the harbour of Vancouver could be improved with the help of the Government. I can only repeat what Mr. Gibson stated, that it will be a duty, that it will be a pleasure for the Liberal Government at Ottawa, when we come into power, to encourage all the public works undertaken for the credit and the benefit of the Canadian people, and it would certainly be in the interest of Vancouver, and of Canada at large, if the harbour of this fine city were made as easy of access as possible.

At New Westminster, my hon. friend the Prime Minister made this statement :

Extensive works are required in the River Fraser.

My hon. friend the First Minister was not shocked, when such promises were made by the hon. gentlemen opposite. Those promises were made to the electors, because they were made with the intention of galvanizing the reputation of the Liberal party, noted for their stinginess. But those promises have not been redeemed, just as the pledges made to the French Canadians, in connection with the rights of the Manitoba minority. My hon. friend, the Premier and the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), have falsified the pledges taken on that occasion as those taken under other circumstances.

As to the fiscal policy of the hon. Prime Minister, I will wait, as my colleagues, until it is introduced into the House, before expressing my opinion about it. I do not know what that policy will be. Nobody can venture to guess it. As all the hon. members know, the Liberal party and their leader have shifted their policy on fiscal matters, so as to make it utterly impossible for anybody to speak of it with any degree of certitude. It is a task of no mean difficulty to follow the various and contradictory statements made by the Prime Minister and his followers, since they have been on the Treasury benches, and more particularly previous to their coming into power. In 1890, the leader of the Liberal party was an avowed protectionist, and thus expressed himself on the floor of this House :

I have read the history of unrestricted reciprocity in this way, that each reform has cost the reformists years of labour, and those years of labour I, for my part, am quite willing to sacrifice them ; and although the Democrats might be defeated in the United States, and although Canadians might lose courage and despair of Canada, the Liberal party, so long as I shall be one of their members, shall stand by that cause, until they have won the victory. I do not expect to succeed in a single day, but I am disposed to remain in the cold shades of the Opposition until that cause has triumphed, and never will you hear a complaint in my mouth.

The hon. gentleman was at the time an out and out protectionist, and was in favour of adopting the American tariff. The hon. Prime Minister and his followers were, at that time, advocating continental protection.

They did not circumscribe their ambition to the limits of the territory of their own country; they meant to extend protection to the great American continent:

I tell you that the Liberal party will never cease agitating so long as they have not won the day, and secured continental free trade. We are asked what the policy of the Liberal party is? The policy of the Liberal party is the conquest of continental free trade. Success will surely crown our efforts at short notice; and boldly fixing our eyes upon that goal, we will go on without flinching until we have reached unrestricted continental reciprocity.

At St. Thomas, Ontario, he exclaimed:

We will not allow a single trace of protection to remain: every vestige of protection must disappear from the Canadian soil.

The hon. Prime Minister later on altered his views, and on the 12th February, 1891, he wrote to the newspapers a letter setting forth the policy of his party. I gather from it the following sentence:

The reform suggested is absolute reciprocal freedom of trade between Canada and the United States.

On the 17th November, 1891, in the course of an address delivered before a large meeting at Boston, he spoke as follows:

If you are willing to throw open to us your markets, we are quite willing to open our own markets to your own products, whether natural or manufactured. We are quite willing, when a new treaty is negotiated between the two peoples, that it should apply not only to one class, but to all classes of articles, whether natural or manufactured.

The hon. First Minister and his friends had once more changed their minds as to the best fiscal system to be applied to our country. The hon. Premier and his friends had again changed their minds on the fiscal policy that would best suit the country. The hon. Prime Minister has again changed his views on reciprocity. Protection has always been with him the enemy, and it is likely enough, after all, that his Government will have to adopt it.

The PRIME MINISTER. (Translation.) Are you not afraid of it?

Mr. DUPONT. (Translation.) I am afraid that, after all, the Government will be obliged to adopt it. I have nothing to fear for myself; but I fear the Prime Minister should lose his reputation, which is already materially impaired by his attitude towards his fellow-countrymen of the province of Manitoba. Here is what he said concerning protection:

Protection is a fraud; what we want is the English policy, that policy which has made England the greatest nation on the face of the globe. Free trade as it exists in Great Britain, such is the policy for which the Liberal party will fight in the future.

As will be seen, the hon. Premier wanted at any cost free trade as they have it in England. But he is very fickle in his policy; and his political views have not taken root very deeply into his brain. Shortly afterwards, he again altered his views; he no longer advocated free trade as they have it in England, but that kind of free trade which had been adopted in 1893 by the Liberal convention at Ottawa, and in favour of which, when addressing an audience in Montreal, in January, 1895, he made the following declaration:—

We aim at destroying protection; any compromise is out of question. We stand to-day before you as the adversaries of protection; that system which has been the bane and curse of Canada. The policy of the Liberal party is free trade on broad lines such as exist in England. The Conservative party believe in protection. All their hope is in protection. The Liberal party believe in free trade on broad lines such as exist in Great Britain.

Now, Sir, once the hon. gentleman got into power, he gave up all the theories which were so dear to him, when leader of the Opposition. He has abjured continental protection. He has renounced unrestricted and absolute reciprocity. He has given up free trade, as it exists in Great Britain. Such was the last policy of the hon. gentleman. I may here draw the attention of the House to the fact that the nearer the hon. gentleman approached the Treasury benches, the more he thought of the importance of creating a revenue rather than framing a tariff calculated to foster trade and commerce. A revenue policy: such was the nightmare that so long haunted their dreams. The last fiscal policy of the Prime Minister was thus defined by him in 1895, at Sohmer Park, Montreal:

We will begin by amending the tariff with a view of collecting revenue; we will try to reduce taxation to a minimum. The system now in force is a maximum of taxation, not only on the consumer, but on the manufacturer. Protection is a fine thing, but only for a few monopolists. It thwarts the development of all our great national industries. Now, I was asked what I intend doing. I just told you where we stood, and what course we mean to pursue. We will have a revenue tariff and make a clean sweep of all the duties imposed upon raw material.

Therefore, the hon. Prime Minister and his party have given up all their fads, in order to revert, now that he is in power, to a revenue tariff, which will give his Government the means of meeting the demands of his friends, which have developed to such a degree during the 18 years spent in Opposition. Such is, no doubt, the reason why in the Speech from the Throne, the Prime Minister mentions, among other things, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Lévis to Montreal, and the purchase by the Government of various railways. Had this occurred under a Conservative Government, what an onslaught should we not have witnessed from the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, as also from the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), whom I now see sitting near the Prime Minister, and from a number of their friends! Methinks I now hear them thundering forth against the bribery and the corruption such a transaction would give rise to. Methinks I hear the hon. gentlemen speak, with the authority which they unquestionably enjoy on such matters, of the boodle which such a transaction might give the Ministers and their friends a chance of making. Now, the hon. First Minister is going to adopt the very methods which he and his friends so strongly denounced, at the time when they were in Opposition. The hon. Premier and his friends, if they wish to pursue any policy worth the name, will now have to adopt the policy carried out and developed by the late Government, and by the Ministers who preceded them on the Treasury benches. Now, that is a pretty bitter pill for the Liberal party to swallow. Just fancy the hon. gentlemen opposite, now that they are in power, being forced to adopt the platform which they so vigorously denounced for 18 years, and which they qualified as a policy that was the bane and the curse of this country. Such is the programme that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues are now going to apply to the trade and industries of our country. As to the railway policy and the public works which they so bitterly, nay more, so unjustly censured, that is the very policy which our Ministers are going to copy and pursue. The fact is that there is nothing original in the policy of the Liberal party. Should the Liberal party carry out a progressive policy, it could only be a policy which they will have borrowed from their opponents, the several Conservative Governments which have successively been in office. Now, Sir, I have just shown that the hon. gentleman and his friends, since their accession to power, have not been up to the standard of dignity which they exacted from their opponents when the latter sat on the Treasury benches. I have pointed out that their very first action was one calculated to impair, to disparage the good name of the Canadian Government in the eyes of the Canadians themselves and of the whole civilized world. What did the Government do? Contrary to their formal pledges, they have surrendered to the small Manitoba Government; a most shameful capitulation shall I call it, an appellation which best characterizes the conduct of the leader of the Government and of his supporters from our province. Why, Sir, the hon. gentleman told the House that he had secured some concessions from the Manitoba Government in favour of our fellow-countrymen of that province; that he had secured an improvement in the teaching given in the North-west schools. Well, I deny that statement.

Mr. DUPONT.

I have here the statement of the Attorney General of Manitoba (Mr. Cameron), with regard to the clause concerning the teaching of the French language. Here is the statement made by that gentleman before the Manitoba legislature concerning the Bill and that section of it which relates to the teaching of the French language. The Act of 1890 contained provisions relating to religious exercises. The following statement refers to the teaching of the French language:

Section 10 provides that wherever there are in a school ten children speaking the French language, or any other language other than the English language, as their mother tongue, such children shall be taught in French or in any other language, and at the same time in English, according to the bi-lingual method. It is absolutely necessary that in the French, German and Mennonite localities the children should be taught the English language according to the best methods, and it is a matter of experience that there is no better system than the bi-lingual system.

Therefore, we have here the statement of Mr. Cameron that under clause 10 the teaching of the French language is authorized; but with a view to denationalizing more rapidly our French Canadian fellow-countrymen in Manitoba. That is what is implied in the explanations given by the Attorney General of Manitoba; and that gentleman further stated that the transaction made with the Dominion Government—

Is a victory for the Manitoba Government and legislature.

Now, Sir, what attitude did the Government take towards that of the United States? The hon. First Minister allowed two of his colleagues to go to Washington, and the American press brought us the faint echoes of the humiliations which those gentlemen have brought on the Canadian Government in the course of the proposals made to the authorities of the United States, in view of securing American trade. These hon. gentlemen, both in their dealings with the American Government and with the Manitoba Government have, in my opinion, pursued a despicable, and abject course of action, unworthy of a government. Their line of conduct in dealing with the Manitoba Government was mean and despicable, because they sacrificed everything; equally vile and despicable were their dealings with the American Government to whom they offered our Canadian trade, our home market. Those hon. gentlemen came back, not only without having received any favourable answer from the American Government, but even without the latter having vouchsafed any reply to their demands. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who is so proud, so overbearing, came back to Canada, and the newspapers since tried to pass things over in silence his visit to Washington. His visit to the neighbouring republic, his action with the American authorities was a false step, a blow struck at the good name of Canada.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. Hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House are very demonstrative when one of them happens to make a good argument in their estimation, but when it comes to defend the programme which they have placed before Parliament they are very silent indeed, and so it happens that I am obliged to follow an hon. gentleman on my own side of the House. Most hon. gentlemen who have addressed the House have devoted themselves entirely to a discussion of the so-called settlement of the Manitoba school question, which in some quarters is claimed to be final, and which if I can judge by the anxiety and eagerness to discuss the question, is considered by some as not settled at all. Most of the other subjects in the Address have been left aside and forgotten in order that hon. members might devote themselves to this particular question. I may be pardoned if I also shall devote some time to the Manitoba school question, as I am probably the most interested member in this House on that matter. I shall, however, take up the subject in due course. The Address asks us in the first place, to join with His Excellency in congratulating Her Majesty on the celebrated occasion of the sixtieth anniversary of her reign. Other members of the House have joined in this expression of loyalty, and I coming from the west, can say that our people there rejoice with those in the east on this memorable occasion, and as loyal and devoted subjects of Her Gracious Majesty, we are glad to see that her reign has been so prolonged and so glorious. Now with regard to the tariff. During my leisure hours yesterday I was reading a speech made at Ingersoll by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and it occurred to me very forcibly, that there was a vast difference between the tariff programme announced in his Ingersoll speech and the tariff programme of his Government as foreshadowed in the Speech from the Throne. I know that certain politicians are often good acrobats and that they can jump from one opinion to another without the appearance of a change of movement, but I am afraid that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) will have to perform several acrobatic feats before he can land on the tariff platform of his Ingersoll speech. We are also told in the Speech from the Throne that we are to have a new Franchise Act, and in fact a Bill to that effect is now before the House. The new system is to consist in discarding the present Dominion voters' lists and adopting the local lists for elections to this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, if the objections urged against our present voters' lists amount to anything, these objections apply even more strongly to the electoral lists of the province of Manitoba. We are to have a different franchise for each of the provinces, because there are hardly two provinces in the Dominion of Canada which have the same franchise for elections to their legislatures. It will therefore occur, that members returned to this House in future will sit here under a different franchise, and that there will be no uniformity in the representation. That I say is wrong. There may be good grounds for making some alterations in our present system, but above all the government should try and frame an Act which would be the same throughout all the provinces of the Dominion. I may be told that the present Act does not carry out that principle, but so far as it fails in giving uniformity, our present franchise is wrong, because I believe that each member coming into this House should have the same influence and the same status before the electorate as his brother member. As to the enlargement of the canals, I approve of that, and I hope to see the day when we shall have our canal system, not only throughout the eastern provinces, but that it shall be extended so as to connect the western provinces with Lake Superior. This I know to be a very large scheme, but it is a scheme which has already attracted the attention of the people in the Canadian west, as well as the attention of the people in the western states of America. The people of Minnesota and Dakota are taking a deeper interest in the opening of a waterway through Lake Superior, down to the sea, via the St. Lawrence route. I trust that the Government will study this matter, and that in the near future the people in the west shall reap the same advantage from the enormous expenditure on our canal system as do the people of the east. Now as to the Intercolonial Railway extension, this is a local affair, but it strikes me that in that portion of the province of Quebec with the Canadian Pacific Railway on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, and the Grand Trunk Railway on the south shore, I do not see why another railway line should be built at the expense of the country generally. At any rate, I reserve my privilege of supporting or opposing any measure on this question when it is put before the House.

The cold storage system I consider as important a subject as that of the enlargement of the canals. We must do everything possible to improve the facilities for sending our produce to the European markets; and I hope that in connection with the cold storage proposition the Government will study the question of meat-packing in this country, so that an extensive trade of this kind may be established. We are great cattle raisers in the west, and I believe this is one of the questions that should engage the attention of the present Minister of Agriculture in connection with cold storage.

We are informed that a plebiscite will be taken on the question of prohibition. Well, Sir, I believe that before asking this country to express any views on that question, it would be proper for the Government to state what they will do should the vote carry in favour of prohibition. We have had a vote on this question in the province of Manitoba. There was one also, I believe, taken in the province of Ontario. In Manitoba the vote was taken at some expense, and the whole result was that the figures were published and the papers in connection with the vote were pigeon-holed, and that is the last we have heard of the matter. I am afraid that this promise of a plebiscite on prohibition will have the same end. The vote will be taken, and whichever way it goes, that will be the end of the matter. If we were told what the Government would be prepared to do on that question, the necessity and expense of taking the vote might be avoided.

There are two other items in this programme. One is that relating to the Behring Sea claims. We should be glad if that question were settled, as it has already occupied a very long time. We all regret to have heard of the plague in India; and while we should be sorry to learn of the sufferings of our fellow-British subjects in that country, at the same time I think we can congratulate ourselves upon the generosity of the Canadian people in coming to the assistance of their brethren there.

Now, I have exhausted the programme which has been put before us in the Speech delivered by His Excellency at the opening of the session, having left over the school question, which I intend to deal with as briefly as possible. I am exceedingly sorry that, for the sake of a defence of his having approved of such a settlement, my friend the Solicitor General should have thought it proper to have given quotations—garbled quotations, I may say—of what took place in the Privy Council when this question was being considered by the Lords of the Privy Council. We find that the judgment contains the following:—

The sole question to be determined is, whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed, has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law, there existed the denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of the Roman Catholics who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for these purposes by local assessment, was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of Catholic schools.

The last portion was quoted by my friend the Solicitor General; but he very unfortunately—I will not say intentionally—left out the first part of this paragraph. It goes on:

What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the tax out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute, fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctly Protestant.

If to this I add the conclusion of the Order in Council passed by Her Majesty in Council, it will be seen that the contention of my friend the Solicitor General, as well as that of the Hon. Edward Blake, are in contradiction to the fact. The Imperial Order in Council begins as follows:—

At the Court at Osborne House, Isle of Wight,

The 2nd day of February, 1895.

Present: The Queen's Most Excellent Majesty, Lord President, Marquess of Ripon, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Kensington, Mr. Cecil Rhodes.

After reciting the circumstances of the case, this order concludes as follows:—

The Lords of the Council Committee, in obedience to Your Majesty's said general Order of reference, have taken the said humble appeal and petition and appeal into consideration, and, having heard counsel for the parties on both sides, their lordships do this day humbly agree to report to Your Majesty as to their opinion that the said questions, hereinbefore set forth, ought to be answered as follows:—

(1). In answer to the first question: That the appeal referred to in the said memorial and petitions, and asserted thereby, is such an appeal as is admissible under subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," 33 Vic. (1870), chap. 3, Canada.

(2). In answer to the second question: That grounds are set forth in the petitions and memorials such as may be the subject of appeal under authority of the subsection of "The Manitoba Act" immediately above referred to.

(3). In answer to the third question: That the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in the cases of Barrett vs. The City of Winnipeg, and Logan vs. The City of Winnipeg, does not dispose of, or conclude, the application for redress, based on the contention of the Roman Catholic minority, which accrued to them after the union under the statutes of the province, have been interfered with by the statute of 1890 complained of in the said petitions and memorials.

(4). In answer to the fourth question : That subsection 3 of section 93 of "The British North America Act, 1867," does not apply to Manitoba.

(5). In answer to the fifth question : That the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction and the appeal is well founded, but that the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute ; that the general character of the steps to be taken is sufficiently defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act" of 1870.

(6). In answer to the sixth question : That the Acts of Manitoba relating to education, passed prior to the session of 1890, did confer on the minority a right or privilege in relation to education within the meaning of subsection 2 of section 22 of "The Manitoba Act," which alone applies ; that the two Acts of 1890 complained of did affect a right or privilege of the minority in such a manner that an appeal will lie thereunder to the Governor General in Council.

And in case Your Majesty should be pleased to approve of this report, then their lordships do direct that the parties do bear their own costs of this appeal, and that the sum of £300 sterling so deposited by the appellants, as aforesaid, be repaid to them.

Her Majesty, having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to approve thereof and to order, as it is hereby ordered, that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed and carried into effect in each and every particular.

Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

C. L. PEEL.

There is no doubt in anybody's mind that the Privy Council in England decided that the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba had a grievance, that that grievance consisted in the fact that the minority was deprived of a system of separate schools which it enjoyed prior to the Act of 1890, that the appeal was well founded, and that it was the duty of the Federal Government to provide a remedy in accord with the provisions of the constitution. What has been done ? The Federal Government of the Dominion passed an Order in Council based upon the decision of the Privy Council of England, and transmitted it to the government of the province of Manitoba. That Order in Council contained the following clause :—

His Excellency the Governor General in Council was pleased to adjudge and declare, and it is hereby adjudged and declared, that, by the two Acts passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba, on the 1st day of May, 1890, intituled respectively "An Act respecting the Department of Education" and "An Act respecting Public Schools," the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the said province, in relation to education, prior to the 1st day of May, 1890, have been affected by depriving the Roman Catholic minority of the following rights and privileges, which, previous to and until the 1st day of May, 1890, such minority had, viz. :

(a) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid.

(b) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

(c) The right of exception of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared, that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 aforesaid shall be supplemented by a provincial Act, or Acts, which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far, and so far only, as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

Whereof the Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Manitoba for the time being, and the legislature of the said province, and all persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

This was the result of the appeal made by the Roman Catholic minority to the Governor General in Council. The members of the Government sat in that case as a court of appeal. Both the Manitoba Act and the British North America Act provide for such an appeal. They provide that in case of an appeal being made to the Governor General in Council, that appeal shall be heard, and upon the grievance being ascertained and a decision taken by the Governor General in Council, then the Parliament of Canada shall be empowered to pass remedial legislation if the local legislature should fail to do so. In this case, what is the position to-day ? This Order in Council is still in force. I may say more, that as it is a judgment of the Governor in Council it is still in existence and cannot be repealed, and in making the so-called settlement, which was made some time ago between the Federal Government and the local government, I agree with the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) when he says that the conduct of the Government was unconstitutional. The Government of the day has no power to disregard the decision of His Excellency the Governor General in Council on this matter of the school question. The Manitoba legislature is well within its powers in dealing in any way with that question. But, so long as that Order in Council of March, 1896, has not been complied with by the Manitoba legislature the question is not and cannot be settled. That order, I repeat, is still in existence and there is no power to recall or repeal it. Therefore, the Government have not carried out the decision of the Privy Council, and whatever may have been done with regard to the so-called settlement of the school question is altogether unconstitutional and cannot have any legal effect. Now, Sir, we have heard a good deal about certain promises that were made at the time of the general election. But I am not going into these matters. They affect more the province of Quebec. Though I take some interest in what takes place there, at the same time I leave those who have made promises to deal with the parties they have deceived or to whom they have made promises. With regard to the Solicitor General's explanation of his position, that is a matter between him and his archbishop, and I will leave him to deal with his case with his archbishop. But when we were discussing the Remedial Bill, the session before last, we heard expressions of opinion on the school question by members of this House who, at that time, were not sitting on the same side of the House as that which they occupy to-day. The hon. leader of the Government himself spoke on that occasion, and he spoke more in defence of the local authorities who were the cause of the troubles we were complaining of. He said :

Now, I ask Parliament this question : Are we, upon the complaint of the minority, unsupported by evidence, without having made any investigation—are we to be told that the laws of the majority are to be set aside ? Sir, if you tell me this, then I will say that it was a mere mockery to give to the province of Manitoba the right to legislate upon this question.

This suggestion that the hon. the leader of the Government at that time proposed, he repeated all through the campaign—that he would make an investigation and when it was closed the school question would be settled, and settled to the satisfaction, not only of the majority but also of the minority and of all concerned. The investigation never was made, but a so-called settlement was arrived at between the two Governments without ever consulting the minority which was the party most interested in the affair. And now we are told that, because the Federal Government and the local government of Manitoba representing the majority are satisfied with the compromise, the minority must be satisfied as well. On this Remedial Bill which we discussed so long during this apparently never-ending session that we had, other members also spoke. The following is an extract from the speech of the hon. member for Maskinongé (Mr. Legris :—

Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the principle of separate schools has been recognized and proclaimed by the highest tribunal of the Empire, and nobody can deny this principle, which is binding to all.

I would like to ask the hon. member if, by the settlement which has been arrived at by the Government, the principle of separate schools which he seems to cherish so much has been recognized and proclaimed, and whether he is going to support this so-called settlement as against his own opinion. The hon. member for Berthier (Mr. Beausoleil) delivered a very long and interesting speech on that occasion, which I approved of in every way. I am in hopes that the hon. gentleman has not altered his opinion, and that he still adheres to the principle enunciated in that speech of his. He said :

I am one of those who believe conscientiously in denominational schools for Catholics and for Protestants as well, for Manitoba Catholics as well for Quebec Protestants. I believe in the inalienable right of the head of a family to decide in which school his children are to be educated, in which religion they will be brought up, and I look upon as an intolerable usurpation any attempt at infringing that right.

The same gentleman said :

After having twice run the gauntlet of the judicial tribunals, the Catholics now come before this House with a judgment of the Privy Council to the effect that their most sacred rights have been infringed upon. They come before this House asking that their schools be restored to them, that the imprescriptable rights of their conscience be respected, and that a stop be put to tyranny, under the unbearable weight of which they have too long suffered. Are we to turn a deaf ear to their prayer ? Shall we tell them, by so many words, by our votes, that might is right, and that there are no longer rights which the majority are bound to respect ? Are we, then, to shrink from the most important, the most imperative, the most honourable duty which is incumbent upon this Parliament, that of extending our protection to the minority in the enjoyment of their rights ? As for me, Sir, I say I cannot do so. Therefore, I will vote for the second reading of the Bill (the Remedial Bill), on this ground : first, that it lays down, as a principle, the restoration of separate schools in favour of the Manitoba minority. In the second place, I vote for this Bill on the further ground that it practically sanctions the principle of federal interference, with a view to the protection of the constitutional rights of the minorities. It is high time that we should loudly proclaim that principle, because we do not know when other minorities will come before this House and claim the redress of grievances similar to those of the Manitoba minority.

The hon. member concludes his remarks as follows :—

To my mind, it is beyond a doubt that, whatever favours or concessions the Manitoba Government may be disposed to grant to the Catholics in the administration of public schools, they will never agree to the restoration of denominational schools. In consequence, I have reached the irrefragable conclusion that the only remedy calculated to restore to our compatriots their schools, is a federal statute.

Well, Sir, this is the opinion expressed by an important member of this House who showed a real independence when we were considering the Remedial Bill, and I hope that hon. member still adheres to his principles and will not approve of the so-called settlement which has been made between this Government and that of the province of Manitoba. Now, not to keep the House too long, I shall come to this debate. In opening the discussion on this Address, the hon. Premier, following the mover and the seconder, spoke as follows of this school question :—

We went to the Government of Manitoba and said to them : The legislation of 1890 has inflicted a grievance upon the minority of Manitoba. You have the authority of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that such is the case. Repair the grievances yourselves.

Well, Sir, I am sorry that the Government has not thought proper to lay before the House all the documents in connection with that question before we were called upon to discuss it. It would have been fair that this House should be apprised of the proposals that this Government made to the Government of Manitoba, what privileges, what concessions were asked for, and what were refused. We are told here that representations were made, and that the local government was asked to repair the grievance. Well, was that in the shape of an Order in Council, or was it in the shape of a memorial ? We ought to have a copy of the correspondence that was exchanged on that occasion, so that we could judge for ourselves whether the Federal Government has done their utmost to secure the best possible settlement of this matter. The hon. Premier goes on to say :

Sir, they undertook themselves to repair that grievance. We thought, and still think—and upon that issue I am ready at any time to take the verdict of the country—that the smallest measure of conciliation was far preferable to any measure of coercion.

“The smallest measure of conciliation”—I believe that the words are well chosen, because no smaller measure of conciliation could have been obtained than that which was obtained on this occasion. We have received no concessions at all, as has been well observed by my hon. friend from Bagot (Mr. Dupont). What is the result of the settlement that has been arrived at ? But before discussing that, I will go on and quote a few more words of the hon. Premier :

I care not whether we obtained a restoration of old rights or a concession of new rights ; the only thing I care for is that, whereas, under the Act of 1890, they had not the privilege of teaching their own religion in the schools, by the concessions which have been made, whether they are concessions of new rights or a restoration of old rights, they will have the right hereafter of teaching their own religion in the province of Manitoba.

And the hon. gentleman goes on :

Well, the moment I found that the people of Manitoba were ready to make concessions which practically restored to the Catholics the right of teaching the French language and of teaching their own religion in the schools,—

“The right of teaching the French language”—I deny that under the agreement that has been arrived at between the two Governments, we have acquired a right to teach our own language in the province of Manitoba. For this statement I have the letter of the law itself, and I have also the explanation made by the Attorney General of Manitoba when he introduced that Bill ; I have the speech of the Hon. Mr. Cameron, as reported by one of the local papers, and I have reasons to believe that the report was accurate. I shall follow some parts of that speech. It begins by the statement that the present settlement is a final settlement, notwithstanding the assertion of the hon. Solicitor General, who tells us that he would not ask the minority to accept it as a final settlement but to accept it in a spirit in which it is given. Well, Sir, the spirit in which it is given is the spirit that it is a final settlement, and here are the words of the Attorney General of Manitoba, speaking in the name of his Government on this question :

He expressed the hope that the second reading, or, at any rate, the third reading, of the Bill would prove to be the final stage of what had been a very vexed and at times a very burning question.

Well, Sir, somebody is deceived, whether it is the majority of Manitoba or the minority of Manitoba who is deceived by the Attorney General of that province : or whether one side or the other of this House is deceived by some of the members of the Government when they say that this settlement is not final, and that the minority should not accept it as such. We should be in a position to know whether the statement of one Government or of the other Government is a true statement of the facts. After discussing the provisions of the Remedial Bill to which the Attorney General of Manitoba took exception, because it re-established separate schools in full force, notwithstanding the opinion of members of this House who have pretended that the Remedial Bill was not worth the ink with which it was printed, and that it was a worthless measure in the interests of the minority of Manitoba, the Attorney General of that province said :

That measure would have re-established separate schools for the minority, and he took exception to it. He took exception, also, to the proposals made by Messrs. Smith, Desjardins and Dickey, when they went to Manitoba and asked for certain concessions.

Concessions, Sir, that they asked for without the consent and without the approval of the minority, because we were never asked our opinion with regard to their mission, we never approved either the mission or the proposals that they made on that occasion. Mr. Cameron then boasts of the views that he and his colleague at the time, the present Minister of the Interior, took on that occasion, and he boasts that they resisted the request made by the delegates, Sir Donald Smith, Senator Desjardins and Mr. Dickey, in order to protect the present system of public schools in Manitoba. Then he spoke of this settlement which has been arrived at by the province with the Federal Government, and said :

I regard the terms of the settlement arrived at as a distinct triumph on the part of the legislature and the government.

A triumph of what? A triumph of the majority over the minority of the province of Manitoba, and second a triumph of the local government as against the federal authorities, as against the constitution, as against the laws of the country. The hon. gentleman regards that as a triumph; and it is a triumph. The language of the Speech from the Throne alone is proof that it is a triumph, because the wording of that paragraph of the Address is enough to satisfy us that the Federal Government has capitulated to the local government of Manitoba; and when the Attorney General of that province terms the victory he has achieved a triumph, I believe he is right, while I am sorry to admit it.

The wording of the Address which we are called upon to pass is as follows:—

After many and protracted discussions, a settlement was reached between the two governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing condition of this disturbing question.

Is not that an admission that this Government had to submit to the dictation of the local government of Manitoba; is not that an admission that this Government, instead of taking the constitution in their hands, instead of affirming their authority, submitted to the dictation of the prosecutors of the minority in the province of Manitoba? How can they come and claim that they arrived at a settlement within six months after obtaining power when this settlement is really no settlement, when there is no concession granted in favour of the minority? I now come back to the remarks of the Attorney General in respect to the provisions of this Bill. The hon. Premier said in his speech on this question delivered at the opening of the session, that by the settlement he has secured the teaching of the French language in the schools of Manitoba. Let me read the explanations given by the Attorney General of the province, explanations which are, so to speak, a part of the law, because he is the man who will put the law into operation. He made this statement :

Section 10 provides that when the pupils in the school speak French, or any language other than English, as their native language, the teaching of such shall be in French or some other language than English on the bi-lingual system. It is absolutely necessary that in French, German and Mennonite settlements the pupils should learn English by the best methods.

The teaching shall be in French. The teaching of what? The teaching of English. I now speak the English language.

Mr. LARIVIERE.

I learned it from a French professor, who could not himself speak a word of it; but he taught me the English language in French, with a grammar written in French, and thus I learned the first principles of the English language in French. But I did not learn French when I was learning English. So all that has been obtained in Manitoba, where the French language has been officially abolished by the legislature, is that the teaching in the schools of English, in the public schools, shall be in French or any other language; and yet hon. gentlemen opposite tell the people of the province of Quebec that they have established French schools in Manitoba, or that the French language will be taught in Manitoba schools. I do not object to the teaching of the English language in Manitoba or any place in Canada, but I do not want to be told at the same time that the children are being taught French, when such is not the case, I want both languages to be placed on the same footing, wherever the teaching of them may be required and may be necessary. Hon. gentlemen opposite say, in the first place, that they have secured religious teaching in the schools. Why, the Act of 1890 provided that, if the trustees chose to do so, the last half hour of the day should be devoted to the teaching of religion in the schools. I have here all the regulations regarding the schools, and I have also the programme of study as it existed before the last legislation, and which has not been at all altered. No French books are authorized in the schools, but as a sort of consolation we are told by the Attorney General that the use of the French language will be tolerated there, because the Mennonites will have the same privilege as ourselves. It is of course a great consolation to us, who were the first settlers in that country, to know that we are to be placed on the same footing as the Russian Mennonites who have been brought into Manitoba during recent years. So much for the French language in the public schools of Manitoba. The schools to-day, with the law as it was passed the other day, are the very same schools that existed before; the programme of study is the same; the religion will be taught just as it was taught before, namely, during the last half hour of the day. How the clergy of the different denominations are to arrange the matter I do not know, because it cannot be expected that clergymen, no matter to what denomination they may belong, if they have seven or eight schools in their districts can divide up their time so as to give half an hour every day to each of those schools. Then, if there are several denominations the time will have to be subdivided again, in order to satisfy the requirements of each. The system is unworkable and impracticable, and it puts the law in a worse position than it was before. It does not satisfy the minority, and the minority will not accept and does not accept it. I may tell the House that within a few months the number of Catholic schools in the province of Manitoba has doubled, and now we have more schools than we had before. And, Sir, these schools are supported by our own money. We seek no favour from the Manitoba Government for those schools, while we are called upon to pay taxes for the public schools that we have no use for. But worse than that, our own school houses that are used for teaching our Catholic children are being taxed for the support of other schools which we do not use. That, Sir, is the settlement that we are called upon to accept. That is the settlement that is given to us as a redress of the grievances that we have been complaining of for the past six years. We have been told by the Premier that if the Conservatives were in power in this House we would not get any better measure of redress than this. Sir, even if that were the case, does it prevent the present Government from doing their duty and doing it in the most liberal and constitutional way. For my part, I do not approve of any opposition to justice no matter from what side of the House justice is denied. I am sorry that I am on the side of the House where there are some influences against the ideas which I myself profess, but if the hon. Premier had not at his back a larger number of that class of people, he would perhaps have been more just in dealing with this question. It was likely because he had behind him an influential opposition to his views of justice in this case, that he could not—I will not say that he would not—do better than he has done. That, however, does not justify the stand he has taken, and I regret to see that he now seeks to defend his position by stating that he has rendered justice to the minority of Manitoba.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Carried.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. If the hon. gentleman will speak as reasonably as I have done, I am prepared to resume my seat. Well, Sir, we are told that the settlement is satisfactory because it has met with the approval of some eastern constituencies. I dare say it has, but if the position was explained to these electors as it has been attempted to explain it to us here, these people were deceived into the belief that the settlement was acceptable. They were told by the members of the Liberal party that the Roman Catholic religion was established in the schools of Manitoba, and the Liberal press in the province of Quebec went further than that, and announce that the Government has re-established French schools in Manitoba. If the people in the constituencies in which elections have recently occurred have been deceived with such statements as those, it is not to be wondered at that they returned Liberal members to this House. But,

Sir, when an election was held in that constituency where the question is of the most burning interest, where the people know the circumstances, and where they feel the persecution that the Catholic minority in Manitoba suffer; when it came to an election in the most central part of the province of Manitoba, in the parishes of St. Boniface, St. Norbert, St. Adolphe and Ste. Agathe, which are included in the constituency which I represent in this House, the people of Canada saw the result. And, Sir, had not the two candidates stood almost on the same platform as regards the school question, the result would have been different still. One of the candidates, Mr. Lauzon, said that he was opposed to the settlement and in addition to that he was opposed to the Manitoba Government, and I will read to you the declaration of the Liberal candidate, Mr. Bertrand. He declared

First.—That I have never accepted the settlement as such. It does not reinstate us in our former position. It does not remove the question from the political arena. My efforts in the House would be in the direction of improving the law, in the Catholic sense.

That is the declaration of the Liberal candidate in the electoral division of St. Boniface. He went on to make this further declaration :

Secondly.—I assuredly expressed the opinion that it would be advantageous to give the settlement a trial. It is now forbidden to us to give or advise a trial of the same. I accept this disciplinary direction and submit to the same.

I condemn the adoption of the school laws of 1890, and will make it my duty to express the blame in the House. This also applies to my first and second declarations.

(Sgd.) S. A. D. BERTRAND.

Mr. Lauzon was supposed to be the candidate of His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface, or at least the newspapers reported him to be so, but as a matter of fact, Mr. Lauzon was the candidate of the minority, and when the other man saw that he was going to lose his deposit he made the declaration which I have read. In spite of that, he was beaten by almost two to one, and he did nearly lose his deposit. That election in St. Boniface was the expression of opinion of the parties who are most interested in that Manitoba school settlement. Sir, I will conclude my remarks by stating that the minority of Manitoba were never consulted either by the first delegation that went to Winnipeg under the late Government nor when these negotiations took place under the present Government. Moreover, while we were not consulted, we were rather sore to hear that the present Minister of the Interior, before concluding and publishing the result of the negotiations arrived at between the two Governments, went to the city of Brandon and consulted the McCarthyites, and obtained their approval of the changes that were proposed in the provincial laws, while the minority were disregarded. Not one of them was consulted or asked whether the compromise was acceptable or not. I know that two or three individuals have expressed, either in writing or in newspaper interviews, their satisfaction with the settlement; but in all these cases we find that the parties were in expectation of positions from the Government. One aspired to be a judge; another is on the eve of entering the land office in Winnipeg; another is seeking a position in the Public Works Department, or in some other department. These are the people who have expressed their satisfaction with the settlement. Not one independent individual among the minority has expressed any satisfaction with that settlement. I am very sorry that the Government should have undertaken to put this question in such a position that a portion of the people of Canada to-day think that the minority ought to be satisfied, that the question is settled, and that concessions have been made to the minority which they should accept. There were no concessions at all, and the law is in a worse position to-day than it was. The minority are not satisfied, and will not accept that settlement.

Mr. QUINN. Mr. Speaker, the hope that some hon. member from my own province, one who gave one of those famous pledges in the late election, would deem it fit to answer the address of the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) determined me to keep my seat. Since none of these hon. members has deemed it fit to do so, and to redeem even in this small way a portion of the pledge he gave, it is my duty to say a few words on the questions which are mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. Coming first to that which has been the burning question in this country for so long, upon which it may be said numerous by-elections have been fought within the last few months—I mean the Manitoba school question—I would ask the special attention of the Prime Minister to the proposition I am about to make as to the constitutional position of the Government and of this Parliament upon that question; and I would ask him to be good enough to give me a reply to the question I will put. To my mind, on that question this Government and this Parliament occupy the position of the highest court of appeal; that is, it was within the power of this Government and this Parliament to remedy any grievance that was found to exist on the part of the minority of Manitoba. This Government had the right, also, to use its best offices as arbitrator between the minority and the Government of Manitoba, or, as it is called in our province, to occupy the position of “amiable compositeur.” I would like to ask the Prime Minister to enlighten the House as to which position his Government took. Did they take the position of a court of appeal to settle finally, once and for ever, this Manitoba school question? Or, did they occupy the position of “amiable compositeur” in arriving at this so-called settlement? Since neither the Prime Minister nor any of his Government thinks fit to answer that question, we must be content to remain in doubt in regard to it, as we are in regard to most of the questions which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne. So that the members of this House, particularly the members of the Opposition, are obliged to regard the Government as playing with loaded dice. If the Government took the position of arbitrator, it was their duty, before arriving at any settlement, before putting the word settlement in the mouth of Her Majesty's representative, to see that it was really a settlement acceptable to the people interested. If, on the other hand, they acted as a court of appeal, and issued a judgment which all were bound to respect and follow, then there was no necessity for them to give any reason for having given that judgment, but they should have enforced the law rigorously and fearlessly on the Government of Manitoba. But the Government occupy the position of not wishing, perhaps, not being able, to say what ground they took when they agreed to this proposed settlement. What, then, is the settlement? Was there a grievance? There can be no doubt upon this point, inasmuch as the highest court in the realm has decided that a grievance existed on the part of the minority of Manitoba. What did this grievance consist of? My learned and hon. friend the Solicitor General—I am glad to see him in his place this evening, as I have a few words to address to him particularly—said this afternoon that there was one grievance. It is quite true that if you suffer from a number of small ills, you are declared ill. So the minority of Manitoba suffered from the fact that they had been deprived of separate schools, and the Privy Council decided that this grievance existed. There are three heads to the grievance, so to speak. There is, first, the privation of supervising the books to be used and the teaching to be given in the schools; secondly, they are deprived of the privilege of selecting the teachers who are to instruct their children; and, thirdly, they are compelled to contribute to other schools in which are not taught doctrines and in which are not used books which they can conscientiously allow their children to study or read. Therefore, there are three grievances. The true position of the Government was either to see that as many concessions should be given to the minority as were possible at the time, or to enforce, according to the ruling of the Privy Council, the putting back of the minority in the position they occupied before the Act of 1890 had been passed. Have the Government of the day done this? Has this so-called settlement remedied any of the grievances which I have explained? Does it, in the first place, give back to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba the right to supervise their schools and the books from which their children shall study? Does it give them the right to select the teachers who shall instruct their children? Does it give them the right to support their own schools, and relieve them from the obligation of supporting other schools? We are told frequently by the Prime Minister himself that he has obtained great concessions, forsooth, because a Catholic priest or a Catholic teacher, is allowed to visit, under certain circumstances, the public school for a half hour in the day for the purpose of instructing the Catholic pupils in their faith. Think of it—to visit the schools for a half hour in the day for the purpose of instructing his pupils in their religion. The untutored savage in this and other countries recognized in the howling winds, in the shining sun, in the growing plants and trees, in the singing birds, the existence of a Deity, and bowed his head or raised his eyes in homage to that Deity. As civilization advanced, as Christianity came to be preached, different forms of the Christian religion sprang up, and in Manitoba, as in other places, different forms of the Christian religion existed in 1890. We are told to-day that each of these different forms will have the right to instruct the pupils in the public schools for half an hour in the day in its own particular tenets. What will occur when there are four or five different forms of religion in the same school district. A special hour is defined, between half-past three and four o'clock, and in that particular half hour each denomination will have the privilege of teaching its own school children in this district its own tenets. It does not require a very great stretch of imagination to think what would occur, supposing three or four clergymen, belonging to different denominations, should arrive at the same school-house, at the same half hour in the day, each anxious to teach his own particular form of Christianity to his own particular set of pupils.

An hon. MEMBER. They could saw off.

Mr. QUINN. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman who makes that suggestion is liable to saw off anything, even his religion. We all know how anxious school children are to be taught their religion. We all have been to school, I hope—some of us have, at any rate—and we all know, when that hour came during which it was the duty of our master to give us religious instruction, how pleased we were to take advantage of it. We all remember how anxiously we looked forward to it, and how we were prepared to give up all pleasure and everything else in order to rush into that particular portion of the school which was set apart for religious instruction; and this Government, in its wisdom, has selected that particular hour for religious instruction to the Catholic pupils in Manitoba, when all the Protestant children will be out playing hockey or football or lacrosse or some other game. Imagine the grave attention of these boys of the Manitoba minority as they hear their fellows out playing football or hockey; imagine how attentively they will listen to the words of wisdom that fall from the lips of the priest or other teacher of their religion. Is it not a farce to think that any church would be satisfied with such a meagre teaching under such circumstances?

Then we have the declaration of the hon. First Minister that he is satisfied so long as he knows that the French language, which he professes to hold so sacred, is to be preserved to the French Canadian minority in Manitoba. Is it possible he could be sincere in making such a statement, when, by the very act of which he speaks, it is not the French language that is to be taught in these schools, but the French language is to be used as a vehicle for the teaching of the English language. I do not object at all that every citizen in this country should learn the English tongue. I would like to see it made compulsory on every child to learn both French and English. I would like even to see it made possible for every child to learn other languages as well, to learn Latin, Greek, and German; but when it is pretended that the present system secures to the French Canadian minority of Manitoba the preservation of the French language in that country, that certainly is a vain boast, and the hon. gentleman, in making it, was not dealing fairly with the people to whom it is addressed.

Now, my hon. friend the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) spoke with that courage, openness and frankness as a Catholic which I expected from one of his nationality. He declared himself, in the most formal manner, as subscribing to the principle that secular and religious teaching should be given in the same school. He told us further that he does not claim that this settlement is a final one. He said, to use his own words, that the minority have not got what they are entitled to, and what they ought to contend for. In that he followed in the footsteps of the hon. First Minister who has told us that the settlement does not give as much as he would like, but that, under the circumstances, it was the most he could get. Yet both these gentlemen do not hesitate to put into the mouth of the Governor General the hope that this settlement will put an end to an agitation which has impaired the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions, and reciprocal good-will. If, as the hon. Solicitor General has said, the Catholic minority in Manitoba has not got what they are entitled to and what they ought to contend for, how, in the name of common sense, can it be contended that this settlement is a settlement at all? If they have not got what they contend for, and if they accept the advice of the Solicitor General that they ought to contend for more, how can the Government, with any show of sincerity, claim that this remedial legislation is a settlement at all? But my hon. friend again says, in speaking of the pledge, that famous pledge which he gave to his constituents, or, as he says, to his bishop, that neither party lived up to the pledges given before the election. Now, I concede to my hon. friend the right to speak for one of the parties to the pledge. I concede to him the perfect and absolute right to admit—and he is the only party who can admit—that one of the parties did not live up to its pledges, and that one is himself. But how can he say or what proof has he given to this House and the country that the bishop of his diocese did not live up to any pledge given? It is true he has said that he has never been asked for an explanation of his conduct, that is, in breaking his pledge, as he has admitted doing, but he says that his pledge has been handed to the Tory party for political purposes. But this is the gentleman who concedes, as he did, to the bishops, the right to speak and to order on any question, even a political question if it touches on a matter of religion. My hon. friend also spoke about having gone to Rome and about having come back again and about somebody having followed him. Well, with regard to the somebody who followed him I have here a very interesting article in the London "Tablet," a leading Roman Catholic newspaper which, I think, will be very instructive to the House, and certainly of great interest to the members of the Government if they will only bear with me while I read a portion of it:

Monseigneur Merry Del Val will sail to-day on board the "Umbria" for Canada, and never has a vessel carried so rich a freight of hopes for the peace of the Dominion. The Apostolic Delegate goes out as the representative of the Sovereign Pontiff to aid in settling the question which has been a trouble to Canada for seven years and embittered her public life as nothing else has done. We have seen that what is known as the "Laurier-Greenway Settlement," is unacceptable, because, however it might work in particular localities, it is based upon a system which has been condemned by the Holy See. It is months ago since we announced that that "settlement" was to be regarded as an arrangement which was tentative, rather than final. We spoke of it as intended to serve as a basis for further negotiations, and not at all as standing, necessarily, for the last word of concession. This view of the situation was somewhat hastily challenged by critics, who, perhaps, forgot that London, the sensitive nerve-centre of the Empire, was quite as likely to be well informed as to the objects and policy of the Government at Ottawa as cities situated on the Red River or on the St. Lawrence. At any rate, it is now happily admitted in Canada that the question is still open, and that no party is irrevocably committed to the terms of the settlement arranged between Mr. Laurier and the Prime Minister of Manitoba. Thus, the Conservative "Monde" says: "Les libéraux, M. Laurier en-tête, et tous ses serviles organes en queue, ont essayé de chanter une nouvelle chanson. Le règlement n'était pas définitif; il n'était qu'une base de règlement sur laquelle les parties intéressées pourraient discuter et parvenir à s'entendre." Even more direct testimony is afforded by Mr. Laurier's own organ, "Le Soleil," which, after admitting that the present proposals are regarded as unsatisfactory, says: "But we have not reached the end, and we have good reason to hope that further negotiations may yet result in an honourable settlement." The mere fact that forty-five members of the Senate and Commons of Canada, including four or five members of Mr. Laurier's Administration, have associated themselves in a common request to the Holy See to send an apostolic delegate with powers to deal with this question, was, of itself, a sufficient indication that the time for negotiations was not yet ended. For it is obvious that, if Monseigneur Merry Del Val were to find himself obliged to leave Canada with his work undone, and to report that he had been unable to secure for the minority in Manitoba their reasonable rights, he would, at any rate, leave behind him a united Catholic party, and a party united in opposition to the Government of Mr. Laurier.

It must clearly be borne in mind, in any estimate of the present situation in Canada, that the Government at Ottawa is kept in power absolutely by the votes of the overwhelmingly Catholic province of Quebec. In the six Protestant provinces the two great political parties, as far as their representation in the Federal Parliament is concerned, are almost equally divided. Catholic Quebec gives Mr. Laurier the support of 50 out of 65 members, and that majority of 35 keeps the Liberal party in power at Ottawa. This help of the Catholic province was given to Mr. Laurier in the full faith that he would secure redress for the Catholics of Manitoba, and because he stands pledged to his promise of May 7 to bring about a settlement which should be "à la satisfaction de toutes les parties intéressées," and, failing that, not to hesitate "à exercer ce recours constitutionnel que fournit la loi—recours que j'exercerai complet et entier." These words of the Prime Minister stand on record; but his followers in Quebec are even more deeply pledged. The great majority of the members returned by the Catholic province signed a promise by which they solemnly undertook to resign their seats if the Government failed to see justice done to the Catholics of Manitoba. In joining in an invitation to the Holy See to send out an Apostolic Delegate to Canada, these men have burned their boats behind them. They are bound, either to secure for the oppressed minority in Manitoba such terms as, in the opinion of the representative of the Holy See, they are entitled to, or else to withdraw their support from Mr. Laurier, and so wreck the Liberal party in the Dominion. The very fact, however, that Monseigneur Merry Del Val goes out with the cordial assent of all the Catholic members of the Government, is itself a sufficient proof that it is confidently expected that an honourable and satisfactory arrangement will be arrived at. We are convinced that Mr. Laurier is personally anxious for such a result; and, certainly, his highest duty, his honour, and his political interest, all combine to point out to the Liberal leader the path in which he must tread. Happily, if the Parliament of Manitoba should, contrary to expectation, persist in refusing further concessions, and so compel Mr. Laurier to redeem his pledge to use the powers of the Federal Government to the utmost, he may rely upon the loyal co-operation and support of the leaders of the Liberal party. But Mr. Greenway must recognize by this time that the public opinion of the whole Dominion, as expressed by the leaders of both parties at Ottawa, is against this intolerant attempt to rob the Catholic minority of their separate schools. So far, he has successfully asserted the independence of the province, and withstood the action of the Parliament of Canada, and he may well be satisfied with his achievement. He has now to deal at Ottawa with men belonging to the same political party as himself, and must understand that, if he refuses to come to terms, he is signing the death-warrant of the Liberal party in federal politics.

This editorial of the "Tablet" closes with the following significant sentence. Speaking of the opposition to the Remedial Bill proposed in 1895, it says :

The Liberal party, when opposing the Bill, explained that they did so solely because they believed they could secure the same object by other means. Those other means are now on their trial. If they fail, Mr. Laurier is bound, by every consideration of duty and honour, to revert to the policy of his opponents, and so to give effect to the judgment of the Governor General as ratified in Parliament by the vote of March 20th, 1896.

Mr. HUGHES. May I ask the hon. member a question, as I did not quite catch his statement? How many members of the House and how many members of the Cabinet signed the memorial to the Pope?

Mr. TALBOT. Give the names.

Mr. QUINN. It is reported here that 45 members of the Senate and House of Commons, and four or five members of the Government, signed the memorial.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is a great shame.

Mr. QUINN. Now, I wish to draw the particular attention of the hon. the Solicitor General to this article, as I understand—probably I have been misinformed on this point—but I understand that during his visit to England, which was merely the beginning of his trip to Rome, he made the editor of the "Tablet" his particular confidant on public questions. My hon. friend spoke about his trip to Rome, but he forgot to mention one little incident, and that is that before going there he secured the services of the Solicitor for the Dominion of Canada. It is quite true that he probably did not go to Rome for the purpose of forcing any legal process against the Vatican in favour of my hon. friend, or in the name of the Dominion Government, but to introduce my hon. friend; but with that wisdom which is characteristic of my hon. friend the Solicitor General, he thought it would be wise to have the son of one occupying such a high judicial position as the Lord Chief Justice of England, an eminently and properly respected member of my church, to use as his sponsor before the Vatican. He did so; but before doing that, he addressed, I believe, a request to the counsel, the one-time counsel, of the minority of Manitoba, that he would give him his opinion as to what the settlement really meant, and if it went as far as, in his own judgment, the Privy Council intended it should go. I had the honour to ask in this House—the question is not on the paper I see, but it will come up—if my learned friend would be good enough to give the House a copy of the letter which he addressed to that gentleman. It would be very interesting, not only as throwing a certain light on this question, but interesting also to legal members of the profession in the House, who are numerous, and to whose attention I would like to draw the action, both of the hon. the Solicitor General and of the hon. gentleman who gave his opinion on that question, and who tried to minimize, in the letter which he published, the effect of a judgment which had been rendered in favour of his clients. It is the first time in the history of the profession—and I have now to criticise the action of that learned gentleman, the Hon. Mr. Blake, with a good deal of diffidence—but I think I am safe in saying that this is the first time in the history of the legal profession that any member of it has tried to minimize the effect of a judgment that has been rendered in favour of his clients. I merely mention this en passant, and will now recur to the visit to Rome which my hon. and learned friend described. He went to Rome, introduced, as I have said, or accompanied at any rate, by Mr. Charles Russell, not only accompanied by, but I think he left, Mr. Charles Russell in Rome to watch his interests after he left there. He went there; and he says that he did not represent the Government of this country, that he did not represent the Parliament of Canada, but he went as a humble member of the church to ask for something. That something was granted—because I accept the explanation of the hon. gentleman, I accept it fully, frankly and fairly, but at the same time it requires that one should be able to believe a good deal. He went there, he says, not using his position as Solicitor General, not using his position as representative of Canada, not using his position as a member of this House, but as a private citizen clothed merely in the garb of an every-day commoner, as a pilgrim, as has been suggested to me, who approached the Throne of the Vatican to make a complaint against his bishop, or archbishop, and ask, not a judgment, not that the complaint be heard in Rome, not that the Pope should decide, but that an apostolic delegate should be sent from Rome to Canada to decide between the Solicitor General and his bishop. But I accept, of course, the explanation of the hon. Solicitor General, and I believe, because I am possessed of that credulity, that his statement is absolutely and perfectly correct. Now, my hon. friend has also been ringing the changes upon this settlement, and every member of the Government has been trying to make the people believe that the settlement is everything they claim. They are evidently not satisfied to let it go on its merits before the people; and there has not been a by-election held in any part of the province of Quebec where they have not had several members of the Cabinet, and any number of members of the House of Commons, there to try and convince the people that this settlement is the best and only settlement that could give the minority of Manitoba their rights. If, on its very face, it bears the stamp of such goodness, why all this argument? Why is it necessary to enlighten the people? The document itself, surely, ought to be sufficient to tell them that, because the people of the province of Quebec know a good thing when they see it; particularly they know a good thing that gives them the rights to which they are entitled; and they know, Mr. Speaker, and they will prove their knowledge, too, when the proper time comes, that which deprives them, or any of their brothers, of the dearest rights that it is possible for them to possess as citizens of Canada. Why then should it be necessary to go to all those pains to prove that this settlement is so good? Now, Sir, I have to say, not that the hon. Solicitor General has falsified the record, because that would not be right, but he has suppressed some of the circumstances connected, for example, with one of the hon. members of this House, concerning an expression that was made use of by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk). You remember with what force he turned to his followers on the Government side of the House, and read the declaration of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier at a certain meeting that was held in Montreal some time ago; you remember the stress that he laid upon the language of the hon. member for Jacques Cartier who had stated that it would not be advisable any longer to continue the agitation on this Manitoba school question. But he carefully suppressed the fact that this speech was delivered before an association of political clubs held in Montreal, which were convened for the purpose of deciding whether it would be advisable at that time to start, throughout the whole province of Quebec, a political agitation upon the question of the Manitoba schools; and my hon. and learned friend from Jacques Cartier took the reasonable position, took the broad position, took, I think the proper position, for any member to take when the public mind is excited—he advised his political friends not to throw the country into a wild political agitation on this question, but to wait until the proper time would come when the passions of the people would be calmed down, and when the question could be considered coolly and deliberately by the people generally. This is the portion that my hon. friend the Solicitor General did not disclose to his followers, and I think if he had done so, the cheers and applause that greeted him, would have been turned in favour of my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier, who preached toleration, who preached quietness, at a time when the people were ripe for revolt.

But, Mr. Speaker, there are other questions besides the Manitoba school question upon which the Government really played the game again with loaded dice. The Prime Minister said, in answer to the leader of the Opposition, that the whole country understood the position of the Government in regard to the tariff changes that are to take place. He said that of course there may be on this side of the House some doubting Thomases. I would not like to say that the Prime Minister was in the position so eloquently described by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), when he spoke of Rip Van Winkle; but surely the First Minister cannot have been asleep during all this time; at all events, he has not been asleep during the last few days, for we have seen him in the House, and he must have recognized in the corridors, in the hotels and on the streets of Ottawa a number of business men and manufacturers who wear upon their countenances that haggard look which indicates bad business and uncertainty. They came here to try and obtain information from the Government as to what the tariff changes would be. Surely the hon. gentleman has been in Montreal during the last three or four months. If so, he cannot have been blind to the fact that in one district alone six factories are closed, which gave employment to 3,000 hands. Fifteen thousand people in Montreal have been destitute this winter owing to the uncertainty which exists in the mercantile community as to what the changes in the tariff will be. Hon. gentlemen opposite may smile; but I speak of what I know and from information gleaned from the leading manufacturers of Montreal, who have stated in the newspapers, in answer to demands for work, that much as they would like to give employment to the people, it was utterly impossible to do so when they did not know whether they would be able to manufacture goods under the new tariff or not; that it would be madness to risk their capital in manufacturing goods unless they could sell them at a profit; that they were not running their manufacturing establishments as charitable institutions, and that however much they wished to give employment to the labouring classes they would not do so at the risk of their fortunes, and they would not do so until the Government had declared its tariff. This is not mere hearsay; there are the facts as they exist to-day. It is quite true that one of those factories, the Canada Sugar Refining Co., opened up for a few weeks; but the day before yesterday, or rather the 23rd instant, it closed finally until the tariff changes are made known. The Montreal Rolling Mills, Peck, Benny & Co., and three other institutions of the same kind are either totally closed or are running one-half or one-quarter time.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). As they do every year.

Mr. QUINN. The Minister of Public Works says as they do every year. I thank him for the interruption, because it is not as they do every year, and I stake my reputation on the statement.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to ask a question.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. They told me so themselves.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). What I wish to ask is this: Is it because Peck, Benny & Co., the Montreal Rolling Mills, and other iron manufacturing companies have large stocks of goods on hand which have been accumulating during the last two or three years that they are stopped now; or is it simply because they do not want to manufacture until the tariff changes have been announced? I know something about the matter.

Mr. QUINN. I will answer both questions. I will answer first the Minister of Public Works, who says these establishments have closed as they always do. It is quite true, I admit, that those manufacturing establishments close for a month or six weeks around Christmas or New Year, but invariably they have opened before the 1st of February, and this year they have not opened. In reply to the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), who asks whether those factories are closed because they have large stocks, or because they are waiting to learn the tariff changes, I am in a position to make this statement. It is quite true they have large stocks, but I accept the statement of the manager of the rolling mills, with whom the hon. member is well acquainted, Mr. McMaster, who in the public press of Montreal stated that notwithstanding the fact that they had a sufficient stock to supply the demands of their customers for the moment, they would have opened their establishments for the purpose of manufacturing more were it not that they were uncertain as to what the tariff would be. I think I must have satisfied the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Wood), as well as my hon. friend.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I know more about it than you do.

Mr. QUINN. Being an Irishman, I would not have the temerity to assert that I know more than anybody else, but I simply gave the source of my information, but I should be very glad to hear the hon. gentleman after I have finished.

But there is another question that is worthy of consideration. I think I have demonstrated to the satisfaction of the House the truth of what I have stated, and I feel somewhat proud of the turmoil, as I may term it, which I have raised on the other side of the House. I think it is proof that I have given some facts to hon. gentlemen opposite to roll under their tongues in regard to the tariff, and I will now proceed to deal with another question which was referred to, or which came up in the course of the discussion by the Prime Minister, that is the subject of employing emissaries and spies under the title of commissioners to investigate the conduct of different employees of the public service. It was distinctly and flatly denied by the First Minister, and he spoke about the inadvisability of sending out emissaries and spies. I do not know what they could be called in the language of my hon. friend; but I will give the House an idea of some of their acts, as by their acts members may judge them. I know. I think everybody knows something regarding a certain commission appointed to investigate matters concerning the Kingston penitentiary.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You will hear about that later.

Mr. QUINN. They were not intended to be emissaries or spies, but they were appointed under the title of commissioners. What the object was I do not know, and that is known only by themselves and by the Solicitor General. What their acts were I know something of. They seem to have directed their attention to that particular branch of the community to which I belong, and for which I am proud to claim the hon. Solicitor General, the Irish Catholics; and this inquiry was in regard to employees of the Kingston penitentiary. The mode of procedure was unique. I have had some experience in criminal courts. It has always been the proud boast of every one living under the British flag that whenever any charge is made against him, he is given a fair chance to answer it. One thing they have done is to send at different times two or three members of the commission to the city of Montreal, who come armed with a document which they have received from my hon. friend the Solicitor General appointing them. They say to the witnesses brought before them: We are commissioners; you have had such and such transactions with this penitentiary; you have given money to so and so employed there; we have got proof of it, and you might as well make a clean breast of it and tell all you know, or else you will go to jail yourself. This, of course, may not be the conduct of an emissary or a spy, but it is the lowest order of—what shall I call it—the out-west detective business.

Mr. TALBOT. A cowboy.

Mr. QUINN. Yes, cowboy. I never heard of such a state of things occurring in any country, and I only state what is absolutely true and correct for the information of my hon. friend the Solicitor General, who I know would not countenance such proceedings.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). I will not accept that information as correct.

Mr. QUINN. I will give him the names of the gentlemen who were approached in that way. Not only have these commissioners sat in Kingston with closed doors—

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. The hon. gentleman promised to give the names and we should have them.

Mr. QUINN. I will give you the names.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Right off.

Mr. QUINN. Oh, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has the floor, and I think the interruption is going a little too far. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Quinn) is very good-natured about it and does not complain, but I think it must be rather embarrassing to him.

Mr. QUINN. We have been told that we have rights here, and I would like to know by what right I can be compelled to give the name.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It is cowardly of you to say that you will give the names and not keep your promise.

Mr. QUINN. I must appeal to the Chair for protection against such remarks as those made by the hon. gentleman; I do not know where he comes from, but I suppose it is from the far west. I ask that the hon. gentleman be compelled to withdraw the word "cowardly."

Mr. SPEAKER. I did not catch the word, nor do I know what hon. gentleman is said to have used it, but if any hon. gentleman did use the word he should, of course, withdraw it.

Mr. MCGREGOR. If it is unparliamentary, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. QUINN. I was about to say that I should be very happy to give the names to my hon. friend the Solicitor General, of the firms who have been approached in this way, but he will see that it is impossible for me to give in a public place, particularly in the House of Commons, the names of gentlemen who consult me professionally in matters of that kind. These commissioners do not follow the procedure of the public courts of our country. They do not hold open court; they proceed on the style of the old inquisition with closed doors. They summon witnesses before them, examine them for three or four hours, tell them they have proof of what they charge and that the witnesses should not deny it, and when they have brow-beaten and cross-hacked the witnesses and bull-dozed them, they adjourn for two or three days in order to try and get, not proof, but suspicion upon which to cross-examine these men again. Up to the present time one man has been dragged before them four times, and his examination has not yet been concluded. I appeal to hon. members of this House, if there is any word in the English language which can characterize such conduct; the most applicable expression would be that used by the leader of the Opposition when he called these men emissaries and spies. The records of no tribunal in any country in the world will disclose such a state of affairs as that which exists in connection with the investigation into the Kingston penitentiary.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that I have occupied a much longer time than I intended to, when I rose to address the House. I speak simply from conviction. I speak on this subject, not as a follower of any particular party, but I speak as one who stands by a principle, prepared to fight for that principle, prepared to exact the enforcement of that principle, and not satisfied with a compromise on the question of principle. I cannot conceive how any men recognizing the principle which has been declared by the Prime Minister and by the Solicitor General, can in their consciences satisfy themselves by saying, that they have compromised with the Hon. Mr. Greenway upon such a question. Compromises may exist on the every-day questions of life, compromises there may be in matters which are not of very great importance, but wherever a vital principle is at stake, such as the principle of the religious training of the youth of this country, it is not only wrong, but I say it is criminal, for any men to accept a compromise upon it.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. Speaker, if it suits the hon. gentlemen opposite to fight over again the battle of the Manitoba school question, I, for one, do not feel inclined to find any fault with them. On the 23rd of June we fairly knocked out these hon. gentlemen, and since that time we have fairly licked them in every encounter we had with them. We are prepared, we are ready, we are anxious to repeat the dose every time they like to have it, and when they feel that they have got enough of it no doubt they will tell us. Sir, a great deal has been said as to the settlement of the Manitoba school question itself, but the Government has been specially assailed on what I might call incidental grounds. The leader of the Opposition in his speech on the Address, in those stentorian tones that we admire in one of his age, accused us of having sent an emissary to Rome, and he was cheered when he uttered that statement. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) went even further and said that we had violated the constitution of Canada, and that we had acted in a manner derogatory to our duties as Ministers of the Crown. In other words, we have been accused of violating our duties as Ministers of the Crown in appealing to the Pope for interference. These accusations have been made against us previously in the public press with a view of appealing to Protestant prejudices against the Government, and responsible men like the leader of the Opposition have now repeated these accusations on the floor of this House. I thank the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) for having done so because it has given us an opportunity of stating our case before this Parliament, before the British Empire, and before the whole civilized world. We have nothing to hide on that point; we have nothing to conceal. Permit me to say first that this Government as a government had nothing whatever to do with the appeal to Rome that has taken place. But I frankly admit, and I take my full share of the responsibility, that a group of Roman Catholic public men belonging to the Liberal party took the means of securing the coming-out to Canada of a papal delegate. A good deal has been said, by people who profess to know everything about it, in regard to the request that has been made to the Pope. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) stated in so many words that we appealed to the Pope to help us to settle the Manitoba school question. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Quinn) has repeated the same statement. In the Tory Protestant press the statement has been made that the Liberal Government of Canada, headed by that Roman Catholic Laurier, has appealed to the Pope to help him in the settlement of the Manitoba school question. Sir, as I have said, I take the full responsibility of my signature to the document that I am now going to read:

To His Holiness Leo the XIII. :

Most Holy Father,—We, the undersigned, members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of Holy Church, to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country, as well as to the interests of the church itself.

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy who, during the general elections in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom, taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party, and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

Sincerely attached to the institutions of our country, which insure to us Catholics the most complete liberty, we respectfully represent to Your Holiness that these democratic institutions under which we live and for which your Holiness has many times expressed sentiments of admiration and confidence, can only exist under perfect electoral freedom.

Far be it from us to refuse to the clergy the plenitude of civil and political rights. The priest is a citizen, and we would not, for a single instant, deprive him of the right of expressing his opinion on any matter submitted to the electorate: but when the exercise of that right develops into violence, and when that violence, in the name of religion, goes to the extent of making a grievous sin out of a purely political act, there is an abuse of authority of which the consequences cannot but be fatal, not only to constitutional liberty, but to religion itself.

If, in a country such as ours, with a population consisting of persons of various creeds and wherein the Protestant denominations are in the majority, Catholics did not enjoy, in all matters relating to legislation, the same political freedom as their Protestant fellow-countrymen, they would ipso facto be placed in a position of inferiority, which would prevent them from taking the legitimate part which they are entitled to take in the government of the country, with the possibility, moreover, of conflicts between the various groups of the population which history shows to be ever fraught with danger.

Then again, an active and violent intervention of the clergy in the domain of political questions submitted to the people must, of necessity, produce against the great mass of the Catholic population a degree of irritation manifestly prejudicial to that respect which religion and its ministers should ever inspire and command.

Some twenty years ago, His Holiness Pius the IX., your illustrious and lamented predecessor on the Pontifical Throne, acting through the Sacred Congregation of the Propaganda, deemed it his duty to put a stop to certain abuses of a similar character, and forbade the intervention of the clergy in politics. This prohibition was generally respected so long as His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau was able to guide the church in Canada, but since old age and infirmities have paralyzed his guiding hand, the abuses to which Your Illustrious Predecessor had put a stop, have begun again, and threaten once more to create trouble among us and to compromise, not only Catholic interests in this country, but the peace and harmony which should exist between the various elements of our population.

Again affirming our absolute devotion to the faith of our fathers and to the church of which you are the Supreme Head; affirming our respect and attachment for the person of Your Holiness, our attachment to the interests of our country and to the Crown of Great Britain, its ægis and protector, we beg that Your Holiness will renew in our behalf the most wise prescriptions and prohibitions of Your Predecessor; protect the consciences of the Catholic electors, and thus secure peace in our country by the union of religion and liberty—a union which Your Holiness ness has many times extolled in those immortal encyclicals whose precious teachings we desire in all things to follow; and, lastly, grant to the children of the church, now addressing Your Holiness, the Apostolic Benediction.

Ottawa, October, 1896.

Sir, this document, I am not afraid of saying—I am proud to say—has been signed by forty-five of us. I say as a member of this Government that I signed it, and I am proud to say so. This document speaks for itself. You do not find in it one word about the Manitoba school question. We have appealed to Rome, as it was our right to do, from the attitude of certain members of the Roman Catholic clergy. We have appealed for liberty—for political freedom. Yesterday my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) asked the question, "Why did you not appeal to the courts of the land?" Sir, we are Roman Catholics and if we are able to settle our family difficulties among ourselves, is it not better? But why did we go to Rome? My hon. friend the Solicitor General alluded this afternoon to the collective mandement which was issued during the last general election, and quoted the most important part of it. The bishops declared in that document that a remedial law was the only means by which the Manitoba school question could be settled. That mandement was read from all the pulpits in the province of Quebec. But, I must add—and my friends from the province of Quebec will bear me out in this—that this mandement does not give any idea of what took place in that province. That mandement is a mild document by itself. What took place in Quebec? In several dioceses the fact of voting for Liberal candidates became a grievous sin—a crime. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Montmorency brought that question before the House. I am sorry to have to give the explanations which we are bound to give in order to put ourselves right before Canada. In the dioceses of Chicoutimi, Rimouski, Nicolet and others, it was said over and over again in the pulpits that it was a mortal sin to vote for a Liberal candidate. You seem to be surprised that in such a position some members of Parliament signed pledges. My only wonder is that many more did not sign them. But, speaking of these pledges, what took place? Every Tory candidate took the pledge, and nearly every Tory candidate was licked in good shape and form, and some of our friends who were unwise enough to sign the pledge had a narrow escape indeed. But, Sir, the general election passed. What took place afterwards? The papal delegate gave an interview which has appeared in the public press, in which you will find that he admits that the First Minister of this country was accused in Rome to the papal authorities of being a Freemason. Five bishops went to Rome, and several of them accused the Liberal party of being an anti-religious party. But they did something more. They said that at the head of affairs was a bad Roman Catholic, while at the head of the Opposition was a very pious man indeed; and, of course, it was better to replace at the head of affairs that very bad Roman Catholic by that most pious man.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to accuse the five bishops who went to Rome, or any of them, of having said that the First Minister of the Dominion was a Freemason or a bad Catholic?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have no hesitation at all in answering my hon. friend. A few days ago, the Bishop of Chicoutimi was interviewed, and in the public press he stated that he had himself told the papal authorities that Mr. Laurier knew so little about religion that he did not expect anything more from him than neutral and godless schools. I say, on my responsibility here, that some of the bishops told the Pope himself and the Propaganda that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of affairs to-day is a very bad Roman Catholic indeed and a Freemason. My hon. friend was accused in Rome of these charges, and the papal delegate is my witness. He was so accused before the papal authorities, and the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) was put in contrast with him as one of the most devout men that ever lived under the sun. Well, the bishops came back from Rome—let my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) listen carefully to me now—they came back with the solemn pledge which they had obtained from the court of Rome that no delegate would be sent out, and they immediately issued circulars which every one has read, in which the Manitoba settlement was denounced as a shameful capitulation. And mind you, when the bishops were in Rome, that settlement had not yet been concluded. These circulars were issued, and those in the press and on the hustings who dared to discuss that settlement and to approve of it were simply destined to political annihilation. I am sorry my hon. friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Savard) is not in his place to-night, because he would feel bound, I am sure, to relate the scene that took place in his own diocese. I will not refer to it, because the hon. gentleman is not in his place, but I shall refer to things that are of public notoriety in the province of Quebec. I am a newspaper man, and my son publishes a paper of which I am the political editor. Would you believe me, Sir, without any trial, without any warning, without any explanation being asked for, my son's paper was placed under the ban. That is to say, in the diocese of Chicoutimi, there is not one Roman Catholic who goes to confession without being asked if he is a subscriber to my son's paper. The "Soleil" was under the ban in the same way and so was "La Patrie." If the answer is in the affirmative, the man is told that he has to send back the papers or that he will be refused the sacraments of the church. Sir, I am a Roman Catholic, I know the principles and the tenets of my religion, and I say that never, in the history of ecclesiastical abuses, has such a thing taken place. I am a Roman Catholic because I feel that I can be a good Roman Catholic and a good British citizen, and it is on that ground that I say now that those abuses are not known in Rome. If they were known, the Pope, who is an enlightened man, who is one of the broadest public minds of the day, would put a stop to it. We appealed to Rome under those circumstances. We were being prevented from discussing any more the political questions of the day in the province of Quebec. Let us not lose sight of what took place only a few days ago at the election in Bonaventure. It was not known, and it could not be believed in Quebec, in certain quarters, that a papal delegate would be sent out here. In the French Tory press, we were told every day: The Pope knows you, you are a discredited party in Rome, you will never get a delegate here. The election in Bonaventure came on. His Lordship the Bishop of Rimouski, telegraphed first to my hon. friend whom we are so proud to see among us to-night (Mr. Guité) that he wanted to see him in Rimouski. My hon. friend was very busy indeed looking after votes, and he replied to his lordship that he could not leave his country, but would be glad to receive any written communication his lordship would be pleased to send him. Two or three days after, his lordship kindly sent the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Guité) the following document:—

The Laurier-Greenway settlement of the Manitoba Catholic school question having been judged to be unacceptable on the authority of the bishops, I solemnly pledge myself, on my faith and my honour, to vote in the House, without restriction whatever, if I am elected member, against this settlement, or against any other which will not have been accepted by the same religious authority, according to the terms of the constitution of Manitoba and of the judgment of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

As a devoted son of the Catholic Church, I pledge myself to absolutely prohibit all who act for me in this present electoral campaign, whether on the hustings or in conversation with the voters, to utter one word in favour of the Laurier-Greenway settlement or of the trial thereof, because it is not accepted by religious authority. Therefore, I have signed this pledge to the satisfaction of Monseigneur the Bishop of Rimouski, at Metapedia, March 6, 1897, in the presence of the Rev. Messrs. Th. Landry, director of the seminary, and F. X. Ross, missionary of Metapedia, who have signed with me.

Sir, the priest who took that document to my hon. friend told him at the same time, in the presence of witnesses, that if he did not sign this document, on the following Sunday there would be a mandement deouncing him and the Liberal party. My hon. friend declined to sign the document. His answer to His Lordship was: I am a free citizen; I am a Roman Catholic, but I cannot alienate my liberty; I want to be a free man in the House. And, Sir, he was elected by 900 majority. My hon. friends on the other side of the House were nobly represented in Bonaventure. The ex-Minister of War (Sir Adolphe Caron) was there, and he advised his candidate to take the pledge, and his candidate did take the pledge. My hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) was there also. Of course, I know him so well to be a pious Roman Catholic that I do not wonder at his position. He also advised the Tory candidate to take a pledge. But seriously speaking, we appealed to Rome because we felt that we could not any longer stand such a state of affairs. Sir, I alluded a moment ago to the fact that certain of the bishops had made it a mortal sin to vote for the Liberal party. My hon. friends of Protestant persuasion may not understand fully the meaning of those words. A man to whom the sacraments are refused is a man who cannot be buried in consecrated ground. He is a disgraced man before his countrymen and cannot live among them. Practically he is a doomed man. I ask my hon. friends on the other side of the House. I ask the hon. leader of the Opposition, is he prepared to uphold such a state of affairs. It is very well to taunt us with having gone to Rome. We went to Rome for liberty; the allies in Quebec of the hon. leader of the Opposition have gone to Rome against liberty. I do not wish to traduce the bishops of my church here. I respect my church, and it is because I respect it that I am so sorry to see that designing men have been able to deceive men of good faith, such as the bishops are. It is our right, Sir, to go to Rome. The days when Roman Catholics in the British Empire did not enjoy the same privileges as their Protestant fellow-citizens are passed, we are on an equal footing with our friends of Protestant persuasion. We have a right to practice our religion, and among our rights is the right to communicate freely with the head of our church. This is not the first time in the history of the world that the Holy See has sent a delegate to an important country. Is it not a fact that a few years ago Archbishop, now Cardinal, Satolli was sent to the United States. I followed carefully the mission of Cardinal Satolli in the United States. Before 1892 the same abuses that we now complain of existed on the other side of the line. Some of their bishops had become tyrannical towards their clergy and towards their flocks. Men of foresight, like Cardinal Gibbons and Archbishop Ireland, went to the Pope and told him that such a state of affairs could not last, that the Roman Catholic religion could not stand it. And the Pope sent Cardinal Satolli. The United States people are a great people. They received Cardinal Satolli with honour. I had the pleasure of meeting him for the first time at the opening of the Chicago Exhibition. There he was given a very prominent place indeed, and the speech of the day was made in the large Auditorium by Archbishop Ireland. I have confidence that the mission of the Papal delegate will be fruitful of good results.

I am told that Mgr. Del Val is a man of great ability, and though young, of experience. They would not believe in Rome, Sir, that such abuses existed here as do exist. Speaking on my responsibility, I say that when the cardinals were told that the sacraments of the church were refused to people because they would not give an engagement to vote against such and such candidate, these cardinals would not believe it; and it was because they would not believe it then that the Papal delegate has been sent here.

I will now, with your permission, say a few words about the settlement itself. I had the good fortune to go to Manitoba before that settlement reached a final stage.

I wanted to be on the spot and to see with my own eyes the state of affairs. Gentlemen opposite have stated to-day that the Roman Catholic minority was not consulted. Let us understand each other. By "Roman Catholic minority," I never understood the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière). I know that hon. gentleman too well. I know too well the role that he has played in Manitoba, to think even for a single moment of taking advice from him. I went out and consulted the real, genuine representatives of the Roman Catholic minority. I will say more—I consulted His Grace Archbishop Langevin. It has been stated over and over again that he was not consulted. That is not the fact. Of course, I may say immediately that this Government never has agreed that this settlement should be dependent upon the approval or disapproval of His Lordship. But his views were ascertained. I had four long and pleasant interviews with him. Some other Roman Catholic people, important men, also had interviews with him. We tried our best to know what he wanted. We took information from him, and what did I find from his own lips? I found that out of 100 Roman Catholic schools that existed in 1890, 51 were closed. 51 French Canadian schools were closed. I asked his Grace, How is it that during these six long years a generation of young children has been growing up without an education? The answer of his Grace was perfectly frank—"We have no financial means to sustain our schools." Well, as I said, I had four interviews with him. At the last interview he stated very frankly to me that he would not accept anything less than separate schools. I had nothing more to say, because I knew that separate schools could not be obtained. Sir, the settlement stands to-day before Canada as it is. I am amazed at the lack of knowledge displayed by some Roman Catholics in this Parliament. They tell us that the schools of Manitoba as carried on under the laws of Manitoba, as amended, are godless schools, schools which Roman Catholic children cannot possibly be allowed to attend. Well, Sir, we live in a country where there is a province called Ontario. In that province, as every one knows, there are two systems of schools, a system of separate schools and one of public schools. In the public schools no religious teaching is allowed except after school hours, and only once a week. Clause 101 of the regulations of Ontario which I hold in my hand, are to this effect: Religious teaching is allowed in the public schools of Ontario, after school hours, once a week. Now, Sir, would you believe me when I state that in that province, out of a Roman Catholic school population of 80,000, nearly 50,000 Roman Catholic children attend the public schools with the permission of the bishops? What answer can be given to these facts? Facts are better than arguments. But there is more than that. I say that the Church of Rome does not forbid public schools, very far from it. A few years ago a council of bishops was held in Baltimore, and after Cardinal Satolli came to the United States in 1892, the fourteen propositions on education which had been adopted by the Baltimore council, were laid before him and were revised by all the bishops of the United States under the guidance of Cardinal Satolli himself. What do we find in those propositions?

The Catholic Church in general, and especially the Holy See, far from condemning or treating with indifference the public schools, desires rather that, by the joint action of civil and ecclesiastical authorities, there should be public schools in every state, according as the circumstances of the people require, for the cultivation of the useful arts and natural sciences.

There is more than that. Archbishop Langevin, during his speech during the election of St. Boniface lately, stated from the pulpit that any man who voted even approval of the school settlement, would be refused the sacraments of the church. Will you permit me to read this proposition which, I say again, has been revised by Cardinal Satolli and adopted by all the bishops of the United States:

We strictly forbid any one, whether bishop or priest—and this is the express prohibition of the Sovereign Pontiff, through the Sacred Congregation—either by act or by threat to exclude from the sacraments as unworthy (parents who choose to send their children to the public schools). As regards the children themselves, this enactment applies with still greater force.

The bishops of the United States and Cardinal Satolli seem to have foreseen the case we have before us to-day. In the United States, as I have said, they have sanctioned the public schools, provided they were supplemented with religious instruction. What were the means suggested by these eminent bishops :

The first consists in an agreement between the bishop and the members of the school board whereby they, in a spirit of fairness and goodwill, allow Catholic children to be assembled during free time and taught the catechism.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Does the hon. gentleman see a great difference between the state of things in the United States, where the constitution does not guarantee to the Catholic minority separate schools, and the state of things that exists in Manitoba, where the constitution does guarantee separate schools to the minority of that province ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Surely my hon. friend does not conclude that because in the United States separate schools are not guaranteed by the constitution, it would be a mortal sin to send a Roman Catholic child to a public school where there is religious instruction.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Circumstances alter cases.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Will my hon. friend rise in his place in Parliament and state that sending his child to a public school where there is religious instruction, would be a mortal sin ? He will not say that, nobody will say it. Then, if nobody would dare to rise in this House any say that, why are we denounced in the province of Quebec as heretics and worthy of eternal damnation ? Mr. Speaker, I will say no more on the school question. It has been said that the public are tired of that question. Well, we are not tired of it. Some of our hon. friends opposite do not seem to realize the currents of public opinion. The days are gone by when the people of the province of Quebec could be deceived and treated as my hon. friends opposite would wish them to be treated. I say that more progress in the ideas of liberty and freedom has been made in the province of Quebec during the last ten years, than in any other province in the Dominion. When I started out from my parents' farm I entertained then and entertained later many of the doctrines now held by many of my Roman Catholic friends in the clergy, and it is on that account I forgive them many things. Sir, the Roman Catholic clergy of the province of Quebec is composed of good men, of moral men, there is not a more moral body of men than the priests of the province of Quebec ; but I am bound to add at the same time that those men have been brought up, as it were, within closed walls, and some of them have become the unwilling tools of such men as those who sit on the opposite side of the House. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) stood up and said : I come to defend the rights of the Roman Catholics. There is no one on this side of the House who is not prepared to give the Roman Catholic clergy their full share of liberty. But I know what our friends opposite have in their hearts. They are a discredited party, they are a doomed party. Their only hope of salvation and redemption, if there is any redemption for them, is to succeed in dragging the Roman Catholics at their tail. They will, however, not succeed in doing it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Those who laugh last generally laugh the best, and so far we have laughed the last and the best. Some other questions have been dealt with in the course of this debate. Our hon. friends on the other side of the House doubtless expected we would make great fools of ourselves on the tariff measure. They will be badly sold. I have had a good deal of experience in public life. I have known a great many public men, and I may frankly say that I never sat side by side with a safer body of men than those on this side of the House. All my colleagues are safe men. We will not destroy any legitimate industry or trade ; but we are bound to alleviate the burdens of the people, and we will do so. Hon. gentlemen opposite would be delighted if we were to precipitate a crisis. Consider the language used by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn). He said that many mills are closed. But the hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that they are closed because they have large quantities of stock on hand, and also because every year they are closed for a certain period. The hon. gentleman is a very good lawyer, but I am afraid he is not a very good business man. I say the tariff will be a safe one. The commercial community feels it ; there is a feeling of greater confidence all along the line. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has alluded to inquiries that have taken place on accusations made against public servants of the Crown. I know that some inquiries have been held, and perhaps out of those inquiries certain developments will occur which will not please hon. gentlemen opposite. We have not acted rashly ; we have dealt very leniently with our public servants.

An hon. MEMBER. Too leniently.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I hear an hon. member say "too leniently." I ask my hon. friend to bear with us. It would be an unwise act to go forward rashly in such a matter. There are some very good public servants. There are, however, public servants who are not so good ; and speaking for my department, I know that during the last eight months I have dismissed a great number of them, and yet the service is as well conducted, or better, although I have nearly fifty public servants less. We cannot be accused of being rash and acting unfairly when we discharge unnecessary employees. In some other cases I know that men who have been connected with the Conservative party and interfered violently in elections, have been dismissed. It is not a pleasant thing to dismiss public servants, especially when they have been for a long time in the service. But our opponents will bear with us when I say that we owe it to ourselves to protect ourselves in this matter. We are not going to allow ourselves to be put in the hands of our enemies. Speaking for myself, I say this, that when I find out that one of my employees is not loyal to me, I will dismiss him right off. It seems to me that a Minister of the Crown, having a large department to administer, has at least as many rights as the manager or a great corporation. The manager of a great corporation, if he has no longer confidence in this or that employee, even if he cannot give the reason for it, and only entertains a suspicion in regard to him, will simply dismiss him. I claim the same right, and I know of some such cases. I am sorry to have detained the House so long, as I did not expect to speak at length. But I want to say this, that this Government has come into power with flying colours. Hon. gentlemen opposite, however, declare that we carried the last elections by false pretenses. How can this be said? Is it not a fact that on the school question the Premier of the day moved the six months' hoist to the Remedial Bill, in a manly way. We were all proud of his action. We have carried the day. Where did we carry the day especially? In the French province of Quebec. We desired to follow the policy outlined by him. What was it? The present Prime Minister stated that he desired to secure harmony and wanted good will to prevail between all the citizens of Canada, and this grand and broad minded policy was accepted by the majority of the good citizens of Canada. Some of my own opinions have been quoted. I have changed my views on many men and on many things, and I am very glad of it. But the point I desire to make is this: The province of Quebec has changed its mind. Progress has been going on steadily. Sir, I do not to-day recognize the province of Quebec of twenty-five years ago when for the first time I went into journalism. Progress has been going on, going on fast, and it will go on faster during the coming years. That progress has been going on in this direction: the French people of the province of Quebec desire to mingle, to be friends with their Protestant fellow-citizens. The policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite is to estrange the races in this country; they want everything separate; I want union everywhere. Why should we not be friends and brothers in this Dominion of ours? Why should not my children and your children mix together and love each other? I stand in my place in this House, not hiding my views. I am a Roman Catholic, I know the feeling in Quebec. I know that the young generation is anxious for friendship with their friends of English origin. I know that the young generation is determined to have freedom of the press, freedom of speech, political freedom in every shape and form. Our hon. friends opposite do not recognize that feeling, and that is the reason why they were so badly defeated on the 23rd of June. Sir, it is the reason why, if they were going to appeal to the province of Quebec to-morrow, there would not come back five of the party opposite to this Chamber.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise with the intention of making a speech at this hour of the night, and I have no speech to make. I rise with some hesitation, because what I shall say, I know will not please some members of my own party. But, Sir, I think it due to myself and I think it due to my constituents to say, that I have no sympathy with a good deal that has been said on this side of the House with reference to the Remedial Bill. I have belonged to the Conservative party ever since I entered politics and I claim to belong to that party to-day, but I claim that this is a question which, with me at any rate, is above party. It has been said, and I do not propose to discuss that question, that the party to-day in power got a majority in Quebec on false pretenses. About that I know nothing; but if they did get into power on false pretenses they can answer to those who voted for them. All who were in this House during the last Parliament know my views upon the Manitoba school question. I opposed the Remedial Bill; I voted for the six months' hoist, and I did so because I was opposed to all interference with Manitoba. I said at the time, that if the question were to be settled it could best be settled by Manitoba itself.

Now, Sir, I am not going to pronounce on the settlement that has been made nor to speak as to its details, because I hold that it is none of my business. Manitoba has made the settlement, she is responsible for it, and she has passed the necessary legislation. If the Government in this House brought in a Remedial Bill, then it would have been time for me to consider the matter, and probably I should take the same ground as I did before, and vote against it. I think all hon. members know that I would be very glad to see the day come when there would be no separate schools in Canada, and I believe, Sir, that day will come not by violence, not by compulsion, but that it will come of the free-will of the Catholic population themselves. There are Catholic countries where there are no separate schools, and where the children all go to school together. That state of things it is my hope to see in Canada. As I have said, I am not concerned at this moment to discuss the details of the arrangement made in Manitoba. The people of Manitoba can pronounce on that themselves when they have an opportunity. If they are not satisfied with what the Greenway Government have done on this subject, they can turn them out and put others in their places.

Sir, as far as the Dominion Parliament is concerned, in my opinion, the time has come when this question should be dropped. A settlement has been made, arranged between the present Government and the Government of Manitoba, a law has been passed in Manitoba, and, so far as I know, all has been done that can be done. At all events, this House is not asked to pass upon it here. I believe that the country is tired of this question. I believe the country wants this Parliament to turn away from this question now, and take up other questions which are of importance to Canada, and which ought to be discussed here. I therefore say that if there should be any resolution brought up condemning the Government for this settlement, I shall support the Government. I do not say that because I want to go against my party; not at all. I say it because I feel it due to my position on this question, and I say it further because I believe that I am pleasing my constituents, the men who sent me here.

Mr. HUGHES. No, you are not.

Mr. CRAIG. Some gentlemen can not only speak for themselves, but for others. I am speaking for myself and for those who sent me here, and I do not think the gentleman who has interrupted me did send me here. I am only a young politician, but I think it would be the part of wisdom for the Conservative party to drop this question. Some of them may not agree with me; they have the right to their opinion, but on this question I must claim the right to be independent, and to have my own opinion, and to express it, because it is a question on which I feel strongly. At the last annual meeting of the delegates of my riding, I stated that if any member of the Conservative party brought forward a resolution condemning the settlement of the school question—a settlement made without any Bill being brought before the Dominion Parliament—I would vote against my own party on that question. I can tell the House that my statement on that matter was endorsed by the convention. I therefore think I am perfectly safe in saying, that in speaking as I do, and in announcing the action I propose to take in this matter, I am not only representing my own views, but I am representing the views of my constituents. Mr. Speaker, I shall say nothing more; I have said in very few words and very plainly what I intend to do. I have said it so that both sides of the House may know where I stand, and exactly how I am going to act on this question.

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Speaker, It was certainly not my intention to take part in this debate, and for various reasons. In the first place, although it is not perhaps very interesting to the House, I have been suffering for a few days from a very violent cold, and am not in a position either to do justice to myself or to please the House. But I think I would be wanting in a duty to myself and to a large part of the people of this country if I were to allow the speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) to pass without notice at my hands. From the acclaim and the applause which that speech received at its close, one would imagine that the Government had reserved their big gun for the end of the debate, and had fired it off at the very last moment, as the curfew bell is tolled in the evening, so that they might all get in out of the cold. Nevertheless, I am not of the opinion that the speech of the hon. Minister of Public Works is going to have a great effect in this country in favour of the Government of which he is a member; for I think I can see the object and the intention of that speech. The hon. gentleman has himself admitted that it has been his purpose to get into Canada a delegate from the Holy See for the purpose of investigating certain matters of a quasi religious nature, and the hon. gentleman, finding that the ablegate is now in this country, and can only decide in one way upon the questions that may be submitted to him, and finding that he has nothing to gain by courting the friendship of the church or of the ablegate, turns to reviling the hierarchy of Canada, both by innuendo and by open accusation, against the interests of a church, upon which, if he is a faithful member of it, he should be the last man to cast a slur. What does he say of the bishops of Quebec? What had we heard already from another Catholic member of the Government about the bishops of Quebec? The hon. Solicitor General was bold enough to say that he had kept his part of the contract to which he was a party, but that the bishop of his diocese, the Archbishop of Quebec, Archbishop Begin, one of the most learned men of the whole hierarchy of Canada, had not carried out his part of the contract. That is the declaration of the hon. Solicitor General. I will deal with a few of the remarks of that hon. gentleman at a later stage; but I say en passant that there is no member of this Government whom I am prouder to see occupying a position of emolument and honour than the hon. Solicitor General. I have known him for many years, he was a friend of my early boyhood, and I have watched his course upwards with considerable interest. I believe him to be a gentleman of considerable ability, I have always believed him to be a man of honour, and I shall still cherish that belief until the time comes when I shall expect him to carry out the promise he made to the Archbishop of Quebec, and the promise he has made to this House tonight. When that time comes, I shall watch with interest the action that will be taken by the hon. Solicitor General. But at the present time I must direct my remarks to the few observations made by the hon. Minister of Public Works. After the statement that forty-five Liberal members of the Senate and the House of Commons had signed a petition to Rome, had been read to this House from the London "Tablet," the organ of Cardinal Vaughan and the Catholics of England, then the hon. Minister of Public Works, from whom wild horses would not have drawn the secret before, gets up, and in a fine frenzy reads the petition in favour of liberty and religion which he and forty-four other gentlemen signed. Now, Sir, I will ask the hon. Minister of Public Works if that was the only petition to Rome that he signed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. I did not sign anything else, and nobody has signed anything else.

Mr. McINERNEY. Will the hon. gentleman answer this other question? Will he tell me that he does not know that other charges and other petitions were signed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No, I never signed anything else.

Mr. McINERNEY. Do you know other documents and other charges that were signed?

Mr. LISTER. You are not in a magistrate's court.

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not in a magistrate's court, I know, but there should be no equivocation. The hon. gentleman who has interrupted is a past graduate in a police court, I understand, and not only that, but I think he would pass for a first-class bully in a ring.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Take it back.

Mr. McINERNEY. I did not say that the hon. gentleman was a bully in the ring, but that he might pass for one.

Mr. BRODEUR. The hon. gentleman must withdraw the expression entirely.

Mr. McINERNEY. If I have gone too far, I shall certainly withdraw anything of an offensive nature. I am very sorry the hon. gentleman interrupted me because he and I have always been on the most friendly terms, and I do not want to say anything to irritate him, but I wish him to understand that the interruptions which the hon. gentleman makes are of a nature calculated to call out the retorts to which he objects. The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has not denied that documents were sent to Rome other than the one he presented to this House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I state again that to my knowledge no other charges were made.

Mr. McINERNEY. Hon. gentlemen in this House have informed me that other charges were made, that charges of a specific nature against the Catholic clergy were made, that members for different counties in the province of Quebec had made charges against certain members of the clergy of that province. I am bound to take the statement of the hon. Minister, but I must confess to my surprise that, with his great knowledge of everything that transpires in this country, he is so ignorant of those other charges, and declarations, and petitions which have been forwarded to Rome. The hon. Minister of Public Works is endeavouring to appeal to the Protestant sentiment of the country against the Catholic sentiment; and in order to provide a basis for his appeal, he told us that a newspaper owned by his son in Montreal was put under the ban by the clerical authorities, and he also told us that "L'Electeur" had been put under the ban by these authorities. But he did not tell us the circumstances under which these papers were suppressed. In the first place, it must be admitted that the Catholic Church in the province of Quebec stands in a peculiar position in Canada. It has certain treaty rights in that province, which it may possibly not possess in the other provinces, but the Catholic Church in the province of Quebec, as in any other part of the world, has the right to hold certain opinions, beliefs and doctrines, and her clergy have a perfect right to forbid their flocks from reading papers or other publications which are dangerous to morals, which are subversive of the doctrines of their church, which are of an insidious character, teaching doctrines that destroy the very foundations of religion and morality in the state. It is true that shortly after the bishops came from Rome last fall, they put under the ban "L'Electeur," the most prominent Liberal paper in the Quebec district. Why did they do it? Was it because "L'Electeur" taught any political doctrine? No, Sir, I shall tell you why. Mr. L. O. David, a prominent Liberal in Montreal, issued a pamphlet called "The Clergy and its Work in Canada," in which he advanced doctrines, not only dangerous to religion but to the state as well. He advocated this doctrine among others, that it is perfectly justifiable for a people, if they are not satisfied with the laws of their country, to seek redress in open rebellion by force of arms.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I beg to tell my hon. friend that he is altogether wrong.

Mr. CASGRAIN. He is perfectly right.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. Minister of Public Works made a most brilliant speech, and he should certainly allow me now to say a few words in reply. I state here, from my knowledge of the facts, that Mr. L. O. David laid down that doctrine in his pamphlet, amongst others. The Catholic clergy of this Dominion—and in that they are in accord, I believe, with the clergy of all other denominations—do not believe in any such doctrine. They do not believe that the people in a constitutionally governed country have the right to seek to right their grievances by force of arms, but they believe that the proper mode for them to seek redress is through the constitutional channels. Under our system of responsible government, the people have the right, through their representatives in Parliament, to seek redress of grievances, and certainly have not the right to seek redress by force of arms. It was for laying down this dangerous doctrine that Mr. David's pamphlet was denounced. But what did "L'Electeur" do? It printed that document, word for word, in its columns, in the face of this declaration of the clergy. Now, if the book in which that doctrine was taught was wrong and should be suppressed, why should the newspaper that published it be not also suppressed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). That is true liberty.

Mr. McINERNEY. It is true liberty. When true liberty is properly understood, it will be distinguished from improper license. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries may understand what true liberty is or he may not, but I can tell him this, that the authorities in state and church in this country have a perfect right to see that the beliefs of the people are not undermined in matters that are fundamental and for the good of the state. I do not think it is an improper liberty to cut down like the Upas tree, as low as it can be cut, any paper, book or document that may promulgate principles which would sap the true liberties of the people and are destructive of the true interests of the state. The "Cultivateur," that paper which is the glory of the hon. Minister of Public Works and his son, was suppressed because it went as far as "L'Electeur," and I do not wonder that the Minister of Public Works should have a grievance against the clergy and should vent his spleen against them. No doubt it is out of his great love for them that he signs his name to an appeal to the highest authority in Rome to discipline the bishops of the church of his own province. His heart is overflowing with affection for these bishops, who are great and good men, but are misled by designing politicians. I remember the time when the hon. gentleman could find no words too good for the clergy of his province. But that was when perhaps they were supporting him. I remember the hon. gentleman in 1894 denouncing the Government of the late Sir John Thompson for not having disallowed the Manitoba Act. I remember him calling upon the Government then to restore to the minority in Manitoba the rights which had been ruthlessly taken from them by that arch traitor and coward, Greenway. When the hon. gentleman had gone back on every declaration he had made, when he had become a traitor to the very cause he had sworn to defend, the clergy of his own province had a perfect right, from their standpoint, to denounce him and his friends.

The hon. gentleman takes great credit for the election in Bonaventure. I know something of that county. Its inhabited portion is a very narrow, long strip of land, only a few miles in width, running along the Baie des Chaleurs, between the foot of the hills and the sea, and inhabited by farmers and fishermen, chiefly fishermen; and the Baie des Chaleurs Railway runs along past almost every man's door. What did the Government do? They promised these people that they would run the railway as a Government work, and I am told by men who were on the spot that this was a matter of vital importance to the people. You can easily understand what a tremendous influence such an interest as that must exercise on a constituency—a railway running almost from one end of the constituency to the other and running past every man's door. Numbers of these people have construction claims against the men who built that road, and were told there was now a chance to have these claims paid.

Mr. TALBOT. The hon. gentleman has just said that the railway ran the whole length of the county.

Mr. McINERNEY. I did not.

Mr. TALBOT. And that it ran by every man's door.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman may have misunderstood me or I may have made a mistake. If I have made a misstatement I am willing to correct it, and I hope he will not misunderstand me. The road does not run the entire length of the county, but runs for a long distance in the county which is settled in a narrow strip.

Mr. TALBOT. What distance?

Mr. McINERNEY. Eighty miles.

Mr. TALBOT. How long is the county?

Mr. McINERNEY. I am not standing up in a class in geography just now, or I would answer the hon. gentleman. Perhaps the hon. gentleman would state how long the county is.

Mr. TALBOT. It is 145 miles long and the road runs in it for 65 miles.

Mr. McINERNEY. But I am informed that the bulk of the population is at the end in which the road runs, that the large towns are at that end of the county. If the road runs 80 miles out of 145 miles, and runs through that part of the county which contains the bulk of the population, the proposal to take this road over was a tremendous influence brought to bear upon the people at that time. But Bonaventure was not a gain to the Government. Mr. Fauvel, the late member, carried it by over 700 in 1891, and in 1896 he carried by a large majority, though not so large as before. Bonaventure should not be a great consolation to the hon. gentleman under the circumstances. I am told that hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared by giving railway bonuses and buying railways in different counties to gain counties that have given 1,500 majority against them. It is the boast of certain politicians in this House and out of it that they are determined, by buying the Canada Eastern Railway, to secure the influence of Mr. Alexander Gibson and defeat the hon. gentleman, the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) in York. If they succeed in this thing they attribute their success, to the voice of the people. Now, I am on my feet, I intend to give a little time to the matter contained in the Speech from the Throne, the Address in reply to which this House is about to adopt. The speech is fairly long, but it has been said that it is not very broad. The speech opens with congratulations upon this being the Jubilee Year, and says that the country should take means to celebrate that glorious event. I will not repeat the words of praise to Her Majesty that have been so eloquently uttered here and throughout Her Majesty's dominions. The next subject of importance is the revision of the tariff, which is mentioned in the following paragraph :

We are pleased to learn that a measure will be submitted to us for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

Was there ever a more vague, a more indefinite, a more equivocal declaration than that? or, take the declaration of the hon. the Prime Minister, when he says that every industrial interest of the country will be protected while the burdens of taxation resting upon the people would be reduced. From that indefinite statement, he said, it was easy to perceive what the intentions of the Government were as to tariff legislation. What does the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) say? I regret that the hon. gentleman is not now in his place. Whatever else may be said of him, he has always been an ornament to this House, one of the most learned men in Canada, a man fitted for any position, but a man who has been disgraced in his own party. I may quote the declaration of Percy when he accused others of having made a conspiracy :

To pull down Richard, that sweet lovely rose,
And plant this thorn, this canker, Bolingbroke.

In place of Richard, this lovely rose, they have taken another man from one of the provinces by the sea. And why, let me ask, in passing, has this Cabinet been filled up with men who have not been on record in this Chamber. This party was prepared for a somersault, and knowing that they would turn traitors to the people on their tariff policy and every policy, it became necessary to have men in the Cabinet who have not been pledged in this House at least to any particular declaration of policy. That is why we see introduced into this Parliament the hon. the Minister of Justice (Sir Oliver Mowat), the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair)—able men indeed, although as to some of them the verdict of this House has not been passed, they are untried in this arena. It is fair to surmise that they are here because they are not on record in this House on this question of the tariff, and the hon. gentleman to whom I have referred has been degraded from the position of Minister of Finance because he had been too much on record upon this subject. But what is his declaration with regard to the definiteness with which this Government is going to deal with the tariff. He says that the measure to be introduced will :

do justice to the consumer, to the producer and the manufacturer alike, and they hope to be able to produce the tariff at an early date, which will show that the Government have, to say the least, made an honest attempt to do their duty by the people, who have entrusted them with the responsibility of office.

This is a declaration from the man who, in times gone by, prided himself upon the fact that he was open and above board in every declaration he made with regard to the fiscal policy of the country. In this speech there are many things wanting. I find in it no declaration of policy on unrestricted reciprocity; I find nothing in favour of continental free trade; I find no declaration in favour of free trade nor any upholding of a revenue tariff or of free trade as it is in England. Will hon. gentlemen deny that they have taken on various occasions, a definite position on every one of these policies. Take, for instance, the First Minister in "Hansard" of 1891. I find him reported as saying, on the subject of unrestricted reciprocity :

We, the Liberal party, maintain that the policy of this country must be based, not upon sentiment, but upon business principles; and, fresh as we come from the people, I say that the only policy which will develop this country, is unrestricted reciprocity and continental free trade.

Again he says:

Unrestricted reciprocity dead and buried! I am as good an authority on this subject as Sir Charles Tupper is, and I say it is more alive than ever.

Again:

Now, Sir, we are agitating, and we have agitated, this policy of unrestricted reciprocity because we believe it to be in the best interests of this country.

Here is their declaration in 1891. Contrast it with their equivocal declaration of policy now that the party is endeavouring to turn a somersault on the tariff question and to build up the prosperity of the country by the very policy that the Conservative party has upheld since 1878. There is another question upon which these hon. gentlemen say nothing in this Address.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is twelve o'clock. Better move the adjournment.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have no objection to an adjournment. I would move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPEAKER. That can only be done by the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman wishes the House to adjourn, there is no objection.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am quite willing that the House should now adjourn.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

REPORT.

Trade and Navigation Returns for the year ended June 30th, 1896.—(Mr. Paterson.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and at twelve o'clock (midnight) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 31st March, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAY RETURN-FARE TICKETS.

Mr. McLENNAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 11) respecting the sale of railway return-fare tickets.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain, please.

Mr. McLENNAN. This Bill is a very short one, and its object is to bring about the issue of second-class return-fare tickets at the same percentage of reduction as in the case of first-class return tickets.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 10) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day.—(Mr. Charlton.)

Bill (No. 12) further to amend the law respecting Building Societies and Loan and Savings Companies carrying on business in the province of Ontario.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

IMPORTS OF AMERICAN COAL OIL.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked:

1. How many Imperial gallons of American coal oil were imported into Canada in tank cars (bulk) during the year ending 30th June, 1896?
2. What was the cost per Imperial gallon at the point of manufacture?
3. How many Imperial gallons of American coal oil were imported barrelled during the year ending 30th June, 1896?
4. What was the cost per Imperial gallon of the barrelled oil at the point of manufacture?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The importations of coal oil in tank cars and barrels are grouped together in the customs returns, so that the quantities and cost of American coal oil in tank cars and barrels respectively cannot be from all customs ports.

RICE FACTORIES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked:

1. How many rice factories are in Canada? What is the capital invested, hands employed, wages paid (according to latest information in the hands of the Government)?
2. What was the number of pounds of rice cleaned during the year ending 30th June, 1896?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). 1. There are two rice mills in Canada. The Government has no special information with reference to the capital invested, or hands employed, or wages paid. 2. The Government has no information as to the number of pounds cleaned during the year. The presumption, however, being that the quantity of uncleaned rice entered for consumption would, one year with another, nearly represent the quantity cleaned. The quantity of uncleaned rice entered for home consumption during the year ending June 30th, 1896, was 13,311,090 pounds.

CUSTOMS OFFICER AT FENELON FALLS.

Mr. HUGHES asked:

Why were the services of the late customs officer at Fenelon Falls dispensed with? Was there an investigation? Who is now customs officer there? Who is now performing the duties? Has Mr. Junkin, who is reported to be customs officer, permission from this Government to act as sessional clerk in the legislative assembly in Toronto? What other offices under this Government does Mr. Junkin hold?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. William McArthur, the late customs officer at Fenelon Falls, was employed at that place in the Department of Railways and Canals, as well as the Customs. His services were dispensed with by the Department of Railways and Canals on the ground that he was an active and offensive political partisan, and the Department of Customs being apprised of such action on the part of the Railways and Canals, also dispensed with his services as customs officer? 2. No, so far as I am aware. 3. William Thomas Junkin. 4. William Thomas Junkin is now performing the duties. 5. The Department of Customs is not aware that Mr. Junkin is a sessional clerk in the legislative assembly at Toronto. 6. I believe Mr. Junkin is employed by the Department of Railways and Canals.

GOVERNMENT DREDGE "OTONABEE."

Mr. HUGHES asked:

Why were the services of the engineer on the Government dredge "Otonabee" dispensed with? Was there an investigation? Who were appointed to succeed him? Why is the dredge now idle? Did at least two appointed to succeed him fail in succession to be able to operate the dredge? Is the dredge now idle?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The engineer was not retained in the employ of the Government for the reason that it was not deemed advisable to retain him in the service. There was no investigation. I am not aware that two persons were appointed in succession to the engineer. Mr. Groselle was appointed and not found suited to the service. He did not continue in the employ. The dredge is not now engaged, and is idle waiting for navigation to open.

ROSEDALE WORKS, TRENT CANAL.

Mr. HUGHES asked:

Why were the services of Mr. Kennedy, foreman on the Rosedale works of the Trent Canal, dispensed with? Was there an investigation?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It was not deemed desirable by the Government to continue Mr. Kennedy longer in employment on the Rosedale works. There was no investigation, none being considered at all necessary.

TRENT CANAL, BALSAM LAKE SECTION.

Mr. HUGHES asked:

Why were the services of George Laidlaw, timber inspector on the Balsam Lake section of the Trent Canal, dispensed with? Was there an investigation? Was John Shields of Toronto notified to succeed him? Who now holds the office?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Mr. Laidlaw's services in the employ of the Government on the works at Balsam Lake section were dispensed with because it was considered proper to dispense with his services at the time. No investigation was held nor was Mr. John Shields of Toronto appointed in Mr. Laidlaw's place. No person has been in the Government employ in place of Mr. Laidlaw, and no work has been since in progress requiring the employment of any person in his stead.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to draw the attention of the Minister to the fact that he has failed to answer an important part of the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may refer to a part of a question if he thinks it was not understood.

Mr. HUGHES. I draw attention to the fact that no answer was given to the question: Was John Shields of Toronto notified to succeed him?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I may state to the hon. gentleman that I cannot say that John Shields of Toronto was notified. I know that he was not appointed, and why he should be notified, if he was not appointed, is something that I am unable to answer.

DREDGING WORK AT MIDLAND.

Mr. BENNETT asked:

1. Did the dredge "Challenger" perform any work at the port of Midland in the summer of 1896? If so, how many days?

2. Was the work for which the said dredge was sent to Midland to perform completed, and if not, at whose request was the work left in an unfinished state and was such request in writing or made verbally?

3. Did the Mayor of Midland request the completion of the said work, and if so, why was his request disregarded?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The dredge "Challenger" worked in the harbour of Midland from the 20th of May, 1896, to the 19th of June, 1896, when at the request of Mr. Bennett, M.P., she proceeded to Penetanguishene, remaining in this latter port until the 28th of September, 1896. She then returned to Midland and worked there two days, 29th and 30th of September, when she was ordered to Collingwood to lay up for the winter. The work at Midland was left in an unfinished state, and the Mayor of that town did make a request for the completion of the same, but owing to the fact that the dredge had been ordered to go into winter quarters, his request could not be granted.

Mr. BENNETT. I beg to call attention to the fact that the hon. gentleman has not answered the most vital part of the question: At whose request was the work left in an unfinished state, after two days had been done?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I cannot say more than I have just said, namely, that the dredge had to go into winter quarters.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, PENETANGUISHENE.

Mr. BENNETT asked:

1. How long has the position of collector of customs at the town of Penetanguishene been vacant?

2. Has any person been appointed to such vacancy? If so, who?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. Since the death of the late sub-collector George Clark, which took place on the 25th January, 1895. 2. No, but the position has been temporarily filled by the employment of Mr. A. B. Thompson as acting sub-collector.

BAIE DE CHALEURS RAILROAD.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

Is the Baie de Chaleurs Railroad now being operated by the Government? If so, when was it taken over for that purpose? What have been the expenses per month of operating? What have been the receipts per month during that period?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND Canals (Mr. Blair). An Intercolonial railway train has been temporarily allowed the privilege of running daily over the Baie de Chaleurs Railway to Caplin for the public accommodation. The train commenced to run in this way on the 1st of January last:

The running expenses per month have been:

January.....	$3,664 26
February.....	2,703 41

The receipts per month have been:

January.....	$1,313 31
February.....	1,201 42

POSTMASTER AT MARSHALL, ONT.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

When was Gerald G. King appointed postmaster at Marsh Hill, Ont.? What caused the vacancy to which he was appointed? When did Mr. King cease to be postmaster of Marsh Hill? What amount has been paid to Mr. King for services as postmaster of Marsh Hill?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). There is no person of the name of Gerald G. King known to the Post Office Department.

Mr. FOSTER. May I amend the question by putting G. before the Gerald and making it G. Gerald King.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman had better let the question stand to another day.

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS AT SUSSEX, N.B.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

Who is now the caretaker of the Government buildings, Customs and Post Office, at Sussex, New Brunswick? When was he appointed, and what is his salary?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Sheppard Dryden was appointed on 12th January last at a salary of $200 a year, which enables me to make a saving of $280 per annum.

NEW GOVERNMENT BUILDING AT PORTAGE LA PRAIRIE.

Mr. FOSTER asked:

Has any change been made since the last session of Parliament in the site of the new Government building at Portage la Prairie? If so, what?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). To the first question I answer, Yes. As regards the second question, a more eligible site, nearer the centre of business in the town, situated at the corner of Saskatchewan Avenue and Campbell Street, has been transferred to the department free of charge, and steps are being taken to transfer the public building to the said site.

WHARF AT BERTHIER, P.Q.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked:

What is the amount of dues collected at the wharf at Berthier, in the county of Montmaguy, since Mr. I. Bouffard was appointed wharfinger? On what dates did the said wharfinger make his reports and his remittances to the Government?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The amount of dues collected was $172.22. The reports are made at the end of each month during the season of navigation, namely, May, June, July, August, September, October and November.

ADMIRALTY JURISDICTION.

Mr. GILLIES asked:

Whether it is the intention of the Government during the present session, either by legislation or otherwise, to confer admiralty jurisdiction under the Colonial Courts Admiralty Act, upon the county court judges in the province of Nova Scotia?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). The question is being considered.

POSTMASTER OF LES EBOULEMENTS.

Mr. MORIN asked :

For what reason was Charles Elie Tremblay dismissed from his office as postmaster of Les Eboulements ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Mr. Tremblay, postmaster of Les Eboulements, was dismissed for having taken an unduly active part in politics.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN BAY ST. PAUL AND MURRAY BAY.

Mr. MORIN asked :

Why was the contract for mail service between Bay St. Paul and Murray Bay cancelled ? To whom has the new contract been awarded, and what is the contract price ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The circumstances under which the contract for the mail service between Bay St. Paul and Murray Bay was cancelled were as follows : This service being under contract to expire on the 30th September, 1892, tenders were invited, the lowest being that of Mr. Jean Bouchard, which was accepted, but the competency of Bouchard and his sureties being questioned, inquiry was made, and the inspector reported that Bouchard was quite qualified to undertake the service and that his sureties were good for several times the amount of the bond required. Notwithstanding these facts the late Government cancelled the acceptance of Jean Bouchard's tender, which was for $930, and renewed the contract then in force in favour of one Alexis Bouchard for $1,175. This renewal was made conditional upon the understanding that the lowest tenderer was to share in the benefits of the contract at this higher price. This contract for $1,170 was due to expire the 31st day of December, 1896, but on the 20th of January, 1896, nearly one year before its termination, it was renewed for four years, commencing from the 1st January, 1897, with Alexis Bouchard at $1,170, without public or other tender. In support of this renewal, the following communications are on record in the department :

16th January, 1896.

My dear Minister,—Mr. Alexis Bouchard, contractor for the mail service between St. Paul's Bay and Murray Bay, would like to renew his contract for four years. He will explain the matter to you. Please do what you can to be useful to him. He will also speak to you about Théophile Duford, of St. Paul's Bay, another mail contractor between St. Tite and St. Paul's Bay. The thing has been done before—there are precedents.

Yours faithfully,
SIMON CIMON.

ENDORSEMENTS.

It is in the highest degree important that this should be done at once, and that they should be informed of it immediately. A letter, at least.
L. P. P.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

Having been made aware of Cimon's letter, I corroborate in every point. The renewal of his contract is calculated to procure for us a large number of voters at Les Eboulements and here. You might, perhaps, advise Sir A. P. to make this renewal during the election, or, at least, to write to Inspector Bolduc that such is his intention. These people will be informed of it in time, and the matter will be all O.K.

A. H. SIMARD.

Under these circumstances, the contract for the service at $1,170 was cancelled and the service put up to tender again, tenders being due 20th November, 1896, when 20 tenders were received, the lowest being that of E. Duchesne, for $650, and the contract was awarded to him. Inspector Bolduc reported that Mr. Duchesne desired to withdraw his tender and was unable to obtain security, the price being too low. Thereupon the contract was offered to Mr. E. Bouchard, the next lowest tender, at his tender price, namely, $849, and he having furnished the necessary security, the contract was awarded to him for four years from the 1st of January, 1897, at the price of $849, being $321 a year, or $1,284 for the four years, less than the price of the cancelled contract.

LIGHTHOUSE AT CAP SAUMON.

Mr. MORIN asked :

To whom has the contract been awarded for furnishing firewood to the lighthouse at Cap Saumon, in the county of Charlevoix, for the year 1897, and at what price ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The contract has been awarded to Mr. Elzear Guerin, of St. Simeon, P.Q., at $2.90 per cord, French measure.

Mr. MORIN asked :

What amount has been paid to John Warren for the construction of the lighthouse at Cap Saumon, in the county of Charlevoix ? For what price had he contracted to build the said lighthouse ? Has he a claim for extras ? Has he been paid any money in connection with this undertaking since the first day of July last ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The amount paid to John Warren for the construction of the lighthouse was $3,700. The price of the contract was $3,700. He had a claim for extras ; part of the claim, $44, was allowed, and the matter was considered settled. No money has been paid in connection with this undertaking since 1st July last.

BEE T ROOT SUGAR BOUNTY.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron) asked :

How many pounds of beet root sugar were manufactured in Canada during the three years beginning 1st July, 1893, and ending 30th June, 1896 ? What was the rate per pound and the amount of bounty paid each year ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The following is the statement showing bounty on beet root sugar from 1st of July, 1893, to 30th June, 1896 :—

Fiscal Year.	Quantity.	Bounty.	Average rate per lb.
	Lbs.	$ cts.
1893-94	423,432	7,765 97	1-83
1894-95	1,546,527	29,449 56	1-90
1895-96	1,158,120	11,733 00	1-01
Totals.....	3,128,079	48,948 53

BYNG INLET CUSTOMS OFFICER.

Mr. McCORMICK asked :

1. When was Peter Potvin appointed a customs officer at Byng Inlet, district of Parry Sound ?

2. Was he appointed under an Order in Council ?

3. Has the said Potvin been dismissed from the said position ? If so, when ?

4. If dismissed, was such dismissal under an Order in Council ?

5. Was any complaint preferred against the said Potvin ? If so, by whom, and whether such complaint, if any, was verbal or in writing ?

6. If any complaint was made, was the said Potvin apprised of such complaint, and was any investigation held prior to said Potvin's dismissal, if he has been dismissed ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The following is the reply to the hon. gentleman's question :—1st. Mr. Potvin was first employed as acting landing waiter at Byng Inlet on the 6th June, 1879. 2nd. No. 3rd. Yes, his salary ceased from the month of September, 1896, and he was notified of his dismissal on the 12th March, 1897. 4th. No. 5th. No, but the department was advised that Potvin had left his books and papers at Byng Inlet on the 1st September, 1896, and had proceeded to Midland to live. The matter was referred to the collector at Collingwood, who reported that Mr. Potvin had not notified him of his removal from Byng Inlet to Midland, or of the disposal of his books and papers, nor did Potvin report such actions to the department at Ottawa. Mr. Potvin had no right to leave his post without proper authority ; moreover, it appeared on investigation by the department that Mr. Potvin had been away from his office in Byng Inlet during the winter of 1895, and had received his salary for that period, although as a temporary officer he should only have been paid for the time actually employed. The department was not aware of such absence until the month of November, 1896. 6th. Mr. Potvin was called upon by the department, through the collector at Collingwood, for an explanation of his conduct for leaving his office and disposing of his books and papers without receiving the proper authority.

SAMUEL E. OLDFIELD, LIGHTHOUSE KEEPER.

Mr. McCORMICK asked :

1. When was Samuel E. Oldfield appointed lighthouse keeper at Point au Baril, district of Parry Sound, and was such appointment under Order in Council ?

2. Has the said Oldfield been dismissed from the said position, and if dismissed, was any investigation held, or was he furnished with any particulars of any complaints against him or any opportunity afforded him to meet such complaints ?

3. If dismissed, has a successor been appointed, and if so, what is the name of the new appointee, his age, and has the department any evidence as to his fitness for such position ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Mr. Samuel E. Oldfield was appointed lighthouse keeper at Point au Baril, by Order in Council of the 4th June, 1889. Mr. Oldfield's appointment was cancelled by Order in Council of the 1st February, 1897, on the ground of his having been, while lighthouse keeper, engaged in illegal fishing ; the tug "Gauthier," owned by him and others was seized and is now under seizure for being engaged in fishing with illegal nets which are wholly prohibited in Ontario waters. A full investigation was held by Captain Dunn of the cruiser "Petrel." By Order in Council of 1st March, Charles McDavitt, of Parry Sound, has been appointed. His age is a little over 40. The department has evidence that he is well qualified for the position.

AGE OF LIGHTHOUSE KEEPERS.

Mr. McCORMICK asked :

Is it the intention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to adhere to the rule adopted by his predecessor to appoint as lighthouse keepers no persons over the age of forty years ? If not, what is to be the limit in point of years, if any, in making such appointments ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Yes ; as closely as possible.

POSTMASTER AT ODESSA.

Mr. WILSON asked :

What is the name of the postmaster at Odessa, in the riding of Lennox ? When was he appointed, and who recommended him to the Postmaster General for the position of postmaster at Odessa ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The name of the postmaster is Peter A. Mabee. He was appointed on the 9th February, 1897, upon the recommendation of D. W. Allison.

JAMES GORDON NUNN, OF ST. THOMAS, ONT.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

Is it the intention of the Department of Customs to pay James George Nunn, who acted for several months as sub-collector of Customs at the port of St. Thomas, Ont., the balance of salary due him previous to his dismissal without cause ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). With reference to that question the hon. member well knows that he makes an assertion at the end of it.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Ingram), at my suggestion, struck out the latter part of his question and did not ask it.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. All I can answer off-hand at the present time would be, that I am unaware that the department owes Mr. Nunn anything, but I will inquire into it, and certainly if anything is due him it shall be paid.

Mr. INGRAM. Let the question stand.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. That will not be necessary because if the hon. gentleman calls at my office or asks me at any time later, I will tell him.

FISHING LICENSE FEES IN ADVANCE.

Mr. INGRAM asked :

Has the rule formerly in force in the Department of Marine and Fisheries compelling the payment of fees for licenses for fishing in advance, or at the time of delivery hereof, been abandoned, and if so, when are licenses now paid for, and are persons now permitted to fish after issuing licenses in their name but before payment of fees ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The rule for demanding payment of the license fee for fishing in advance has not been abandoned, but on a recommendation of the Inspector of Fisheries for Ontario, it was decided that in a few cases where the fishermen of Lake Erie had been previously in the hands of United States fishermen and dependent on them for the license fees they be allowed until the month of June for paying such fees. Such persons will therefore be permitted to fish after the issue of such licenses.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY.

Mr. MACLEAN asked :

Have the Canadian Pacific Railway Company deposited plans with the Department of Railways for the construction of a branch line running through what is known as the Crow's Nest Pass, British Columbia ? If so, on what date were said plans deposited ?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). They have submitted plans for deposit in the department for a line through the Crow's Nest Pass. The letter from the secretary of the Canadian Pacific Railway forwarding these plans for deposit in the department, is dated 9th March, 1897, and the plans were received in the department on 10th March, 1897.

THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

Will the Government introduce the Tariff Bill before the 13th April, the date of the nomination for the provincial general elections in Nova Scotia ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). It is not deemed expedient or according to precedent that the precise date of the bringing down of the tariff resolutions should now be announced. They will, however, be brought down at the proper time, with due regard to the best interests of the Dominion.

BEAUHARNOIS POSTMASTER.

Mr. DUGAS (for Mr. Bergeron) asked :

Whether the Postmaster General is aware that Octave Laurin, the postmaster at Beauharnois, is busily engaged electioneering through the county of Beauharnois, and especially in the post office ? If not, will the Postmaster General see that said postmaster be not an active and offensive partisan ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The Postmaster General is not aware that Octave Laurin, postmaster of Beauharnois, is busily engaged electioneering through the county of Beauharnois, whether in the post office, or elsewhere, and has no reason to suppose that he is likely to become an active and offensive partisan.

POSTMASTER OF MARSH HILL, ONT.

Mr. FOSTER. Will you allow me one moment to say, with reference to the question I put, that what I asked was whether Gerald G. King was appointed postmaster of Marsh Hill. I believe that George G. is the name of Mr. King, the G. standing for Gerald. The Postmaster General refused to answer on the ground that Gerald appears first, instead of George. Both are the names of the person indicated.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose it is only a question of whether the hon. Postmaster General has been furnished with the information, or whether, as he has stated, he has inquired and finds that there is no such person in the department. I do not suppose that either the hon. Postmaster General or the hon. member wishes to haggle over technicalities, and if the hon. Postmaster General happens to have the information that fits the question, he will probably give it. Otherwise, I suppose the question might stand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am only too anxious to furnish hon. gentlemen with all the information which the department can afford; but when I am asked for information with regard to a person named Gerald G. King, supposed to be an officer of my department, I say that there is no person of that name on the books of the department. Such is the information I have got from the deputy. If the hon. gentleman wants any information with regard to a person of a different name, and will be good enough to furnish me with the name of the person, I shall be glad to give him the information.

Mr. FOSTER. Since the person is not known, I will give the information. George G. King, the G. standing for Gerald, was the member for Queen's and Sunbury, N.B., and was induced to resign his seat in order to give the present Minister of Railways a constituency to run in, and he was appointed postmaster of Marsh Hill for that purpose.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. Postmaster General has not information of any person of this name in the department, the hon. member may give the name of the person he meant, and repeat the question.

Mr. FOSTER. I have to state, then, that the person here meant is George G. King, at present senator of the Dominion.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman will be good enough to state in the proper way what he means, I will endeavour to give the answer.

Mr. FOSTER. May this question be allowed to remain, with the substitution of George G. King for Gerald G. King?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think there had better be no further discussion on it, but let the hon. member again give notice of the question in proper form.

RAILWAY SUBSIDIES.

Mr. MARTIN. I asked yesterday when certain papers regarding railway subsidies would be brought down by the Government, in compliance with an order of the House of last session; and I did not receive any reply.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I shall be very glad to furnish the information as soon as I can do so.

Mr. MARTIN. Can the hon. Minister give me any idea when this statement will be laid on the Table of the House?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I would not like to pledge myself at present to any specific date. I think the hon. gentleman will have to be content with my assurance that it will be done as speedily as possible.

THE ESTIMATES.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask the Minister of Finance when we may expect the Estimates to be brought down?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). They are in a very advanced state, and I hope they will be brought down at a very early day. I am not able to state the date exactly, but it will be very shortly.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. QUINN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to explain to the House that I am reported to have stated, in the remarks I addressed to the House last evening, that the Canada Sugar Refinery closed on the 23rd of this month. I made that statement on the information which I had received, and which I believed to be accurate. I have since received other information, which I believe to be authentic, that the sugar refinery did not close on that date. I make this correction immediately, as I would not wish the House to believe that I would make any statement here that was not absolutely correct.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Russell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. McINERNEY. Mr. Speaker, when the debate was adjourned last night, I was proceeding to show the great difference that exists, between the flimsy, ambiguous and equivocal declarations of this Government on the tariff question, as contained in the Speech from the Throne, and the manly, straightforward, distinct and explicit declarations of policy on that subject made by leading members of the Liberal party in years gone by. I am strongly convinced of one thing, that the smiling cynicism of hon. gentlemen opposite, in completely changing the policy to which they have consecrated the efforts of their lives in times past, does not meet with the approval of the people of this country, and that, when the history of the tariff policy of 1897 comes to be written, the position taken by the Liberal party to-day will be known as the great somersault act of the Laurier-Mowat combination. Sir, I have already offered some proofs of the statement I make in that regard. I have shown that the hon. leader of the Government in 1891, as he came fresh from the people, stated distinctly to this country that the only policy which could be of benefit to Canada was a policy of unrestricted reciprocity and of continental free trade. As late as 1891 he, the responsible leader of a great party, knowing what his responsibility was, and, I suppose able to foresee a few years into the future, made the distinct declaration that the only policy which could benefit Canada financially was a policy of unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and of continental free trade. I have other declarations of the hon. gentleman, following that very strong declaration, which I intend now submitting to the House, because I think that it is important that the attention of the people should be riveted upon the great changes in the policy of the Liberal party to-day as compared with their policy in the years gone by. Here is a positive declaration of Mr. Laurier :

The policy which we have advocated, and which we still continue to advocate, is the removal of all commercial barriers between this country and the great nation to the south. The Liberal party, as long as I have anything to do with it, will remain true to the cause until the cause is successful. I do not expect to win in a day, but I am prepared to remain in the cold shades of opposition until this cause has triumphed.

This great cause, the cause of unrestricted reciprocity, then advocated by the Liberal party from one end of Canada to the other, is not even whispered to-day in this Assembly. Not the slightest mention of it do we hear to-day. From that, I proceed to another declaration of the hon. gentleman, but this declaration concerns another policy of his, the policy of continental free trade :

The Liberal party will never cease the agitation until they have finally triumphed and obtained continental freedom of trade. We will not be drawn away by this issue or that, but, keeping our eyes upon the goal, will work until we accomplish our end. If the Reformers of these days can accomplish what they have in view—the great principle of free trade in America—they will have done to their country and the British race a service of which they will have reason to be proud.

Again, I have a declaration of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), whose declarations it is not always easy to find, and whose declarations, when you do find them, the hon. gentleman is very often ready to declare he never made, which denial, of course, we are bound to accept in this House. That hon. Minister said :

Sir, we tender a flag of which we are not ashamed, a flag upon which is inscribed unrestricted trade with the United States.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce—and of him I will say this, at least, that we always know where to find him upon a policy ; that when he has a policy, he is no-wise backward in making open and above-board declarations of it—in 1891 used these words :

Mr. McINERNEY.

But what is of even more immediate consequence, we propose to obtain for you power to trade freely with the rest of this continent, and to have leave to make the best use you can of your great natural advantages, which can only be done by full, free and unrestricted reciprocity with our kinsmen in the United States.

And further on, the hon. gentleman uttered these significant words :

If this policy does discriminate against Great Britain, we have the right to discriminate. We owe Great Britain nothing but charity for her atrocious blundering against our interests. There never was a time when Canada could not have bettered her position by joining the United States.

And the hon. leader of the Government, at Brantford, speaking on the question of free trade as it is in England, in 1894, a little more than two years ago, said :

I propose that we should follow England's example, and open our ports to the products of the world.

And later on, he said :

I come before you to-night to preach to you this new gospel of free trade. I denounce to you the policy of protection as bondage, yes, bondage ; and I refer to bondage in the same manner in which the American slavery was bondage.

And again, he said :

Upon that question, I need not tell you that we stand at the very antipodes of the Conservative party. The Conservative party believe in protection, all their hope is in protection ; the Liberal party believe in free trade on the broad lines such as exist in England.

And again, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce said :

Our policy, from first to last, is to destroy this villainous protective system by free trade, revenue tariff or continental free trade.

His prophetic eye—I was going to say his poetic eye, in fine frenzy rolling, turned from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven, and he made a prophecy to his party. He said :

There are two lessons which I think the Reformers of Canada should learn. One is presented for our example and warning in the fate that has befallen the Democratic party in the United States. It shows to all who choose to read the signs of the times, that, when a party places itself at the head of a great popular movement, if that party tenders the people a stone instead of bread, it is half-hearted in the prosecution of the great aim it sets before it, and will be deservedly swept out of power by the very people who would have sustained and advanced it.

The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) speaking in the House, said :

We have been attacking this policy of protection year by year. It is a cursed system, accursed of God and men.

In Nova Scotia, the same hon. gentleman, in 1894, made this declaration :

Well, gentlemen, I need say no more. Whatever doubt and difficulties there may have been about understanding our trade policy in times past, there can be none now. Our platform is clear and definite. To-day the people of Canada stand face to face with such an issue, and the next contest is to be one between free trade and protection. * * * The policy of the Liberal party, on the contrary, is the reform of the tariff by the elimination of every vestige of protection.

What I have endeavoured to point out, and I think it is no waste of time to do so, is that this party whose leaders made these explicit, and bold, and manly, and straightforward declarations of policy within the last few years, now have not one single word to say in favour of the policy which they then propagated and advocated. There is one gentleman whom I would like to quote on this subject, because of all the strong language used in the denunciation of protection I think his takes the bakery. I refer to the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald). That hon. gentleman denounced protection as "an abomination of iniquities." I can remember the speech of the hon. gentleman. He will not deny that these were his words. Will the hon. gentleman sit quiet and swallow the sugar-coated pill of protection that will be offered to him at this session? Will the hon. gentleman sit quiet and allow the duty to be retained on oil as at the present time, or will he make a claim upon his Government, and if he fails to have that claim made good, will he take an independent and honourable stand on this question in this House?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman does not mean to say that I advocated free oil.

Mr. McINERNEY. I have here the words of the hon. gentleman and can produce them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You produce a statement there that I was in favour of free oil. I will admit that I am inconsistent.

Mr. McINERNEY. In the "Hansard" of 1891, page 89, the hon. gentleman is reported to have gone into an intricate computation of the tremendous burdens imposed upon the people of this country by the oil duties and to have declared that it was an "abomination of iniquities." The hon. gentleman went further and said that the protective tariff was wasting millions and millions of capital;—nearly ninety millions a year, the hon. gentleman said was being wasted by the National Policy. Will the hon. gentleman rise in his place in this House and say that he is in favour of the retention of the oil duties?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I will say that in that speech which the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) has before him

I declared that in my opinion the duty on oil should be reduced to about 5 cents per gallon. If he looks at the speech he will find it there, or, if he will give me the book for five minutes, I will show him the very sentence in which that statement is made.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) will have a glorious opportunity after I have taken my seat, an opportunity that we will be only too glad to accord to him, with the assurance that we shall listen to him with extreme pleasure. We shall be surprised to hear, but proud to know that the hon. gentleman is a convert on this question. Why, if there was one man in Canada having a seat in Parliament whom we believed to be an out and out free trader, one who denounced protection in all its moods and tenses, it was the hon. member for East Huron. For hours and hours we have heard him fulminate against this "iniquity" of protection; and we will be only too pleased, even at this late date, to take the hon. gentleman into our fold, because it is broad enough for all of them, after all.

Now, this free trade as it is in England policy which these hon. gentlemen a few short years ago agitated in this country always struck me as being a most peculiar policy indeed to advocate here. If I know anything about the free trade policy of England it simply means that one-half of the taxes raised for carrying on the public affairs of that country is raised by direct taxation. As $400,000,000 at least is raised by customs and excise, this means that $200,000,000 is raised by imports placed directly upon the people in the form of a land tax, a house tax, a stamp tax, and other imposts of that nature. As applied to Canada it would mean that at least $20,000,000 should be raised by direct taxation upon the people of this country. That is the policy these gentlemen were bold enough to propose in this country some time ago. But I do not intend at this time to enter into a lengthy discussion of the tariff or of the propositions the hon. members here make. It will be time enough when the details of the tariff come down to criticise them, as, I have no doubt, they will deserve criticism. But I thought the House would bear with me while, for a few moments I tried to call attention to the one issue on which I thought the parties were divided, but on which we now find the party on the other side has jumped Jim Crow completely and left every vestige of their policy behind them.

There is one subject on the Address outside of the tariff that I wish to refer to for a few moments—the Franchise Act, the one great question which is at all clearly enunciated in the Speech from the Throne. Sir, I occupy upon the franchise question a somewhat peculiar position. In 1893, when I first came into this House and was accorded the privilege and honour of moving the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I stepped aside from the matter of the Speech itself to put myself fairly on record in favour of manhood suffrage, in favour of residential manhood suffrage. I want it distinctly understood, in the few remarks I am going to make upon this subject, that this is not the first time that I have declared in favour of residential manhood suffrage. In 1894, our then respected and much lamented leader, Sir John Thompson, introduced into this House, or brought before the consideration of the Conservative party, a measure for residential manhood suffrage, in the Franchise Bill he was about to ask this House to adopt, but for one reason or another, the Bill never went through. But, Sir, I then thought it advisable, and still think so, that the Conservative party should have put itself on record in favour of residential manhood suffrage; and I now think it advisable that the Conservative party should declare itself almost to a man, as our leader has told us, in favour of residential manhood suffrage as against the peculiar patchwork system that hon. gentlemen opposite wish to put upon the Statute-book. I believe that every man 21 years of age who takes upon himself the burdens of a citizen of Canada in times of peace, and every man 21 years of age who, in time of war, may be called upon to shoulder his rifle for the defence of this country, should at least have something to say as to how our institutions should be conducted; and the least we can do for him is to give him the franchise, allow him to vote for members of Parliament to make the law which govern the institutions of the country in which he is deeply interested. The leader of the Opposition pointed out that in this country this measure would not bring the franchise to such a low level as it is in the thickly populated countries of Europe. That is so. There are a large number of agricultural people in this country who take a great interest in the political questions of the day, and we have not many of the lower classes of people in Canada. Our population is all fairly intelligent, and able to understand the public questions that may be submitted to them from time to time.

Now, I will ask the House to bear with me for a few moments while I deal with a question which has been a burning one in Canada, and which I believe may continue for some time to come to be a question of considerable importance to the electors of this country. This is the first time that I have, in this House, opened my mouth on the Manitoba school question, this is the first time that I have uttered a syllable upon it; not because I have no views upon that great question, not because I do not entertain opinions of my own concerning it, but because I knew that there were men on our side of the House from whom declarations of our policy upon that question would come with greater force than they would come from me, considering the position that this party took upon that question a short time ago. But before proceeding to speak directly upon this so-called settlement that has been made, I wish to call attention to this petition that the Minister of Public Works read to the House last evening. I said, Sir, after that petition had been read, that it came with a surprise to us, we were surprised that the hon. gentleman should have so blandly and generously given us his own name as one of the signatories to this petition, that he should have told us so frankly that forty-four other gentlemen had signed it, when before that it had been utterly impossible to drag from them by any process that was known to us any intimation that members of Parliament or public men in Canada had sent any petition to Rome to have an ablegate sent here to regulate this question. It was only after my hon. friend to my right, the hon. member for St. Anne's Division of Montreal (Mr. Quinn) had read the statement in the article from the London "Tablet," that the Minister of Public Works thought fit to take the bold front he did upon that question. I may say that the article that was read here yesterday from the London "Tablet" comes with a special force from that paper when you consider the circumstances of the case. The London "Tablet" is the leading organ of the Catholics in England, the London "Tablet" is supposed to be the organ of Cardinal Vaughan himself. When the hon. gentleman from Quebec County, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), was in England, there can be no doubt about it that he tried by all means in his power to bring pressure upon that paper to support the settlement they were then making; because at that time the people of this country were surprised to find that the London "Tablet" advised the Catholics of Canada to accept this Manitoba settlement just about the time that the Solicitor General was in England. But, Sir, the utterances of that paper now acquire an additional significance when we know that after it was made acquainted with certain facts which it formerly ignored, that paper came out and took an exactly opposite view upon that question, and now says that Mr. Laurier, the leader of the Government, the Prime Minister of Canada, must either stand true to his pledges and the pledges given by his party on this question, or turn against him the whole Catholic hierarchy, and a large body of the Liberal party in Canada. So that paper is now informed that Mr. Laurier and his party did make certain pledges to the hierarchy of Canada. Now, passing that for a moment, I wish to come to this petition itself. We were given to understand in the press by interviews and by declarations made upon the public platform, amongst them a declaration of the hon. Solicitor General, that a few Catholic gentlemen of Montreal and vicinity had proceeded to Rome for the purpose of laying a personal grievance before His Holiness. That, Mr. Speaker, was the statement that was sent broadcast throughout the country. But what have we here, Sir? We have here, in the very first sentence of this petition:

Most Holy Father, we, the undersigned members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness, &c.

Now, Sir, these gentlemen held out to the Holy See, so far as we can glean from their petition, that they were the only members of the House of Commons and of the Senate of Canada; but whether they were or not, that they represented in the House of Commons and in the Senate of Canada, the Liberal party on this question. There cannot be any possible doubt about that. After the Minister of Public Works read his petition, I asked him if that was the only document, or only charge, that these gentlemen had sent to Rome. The hon. gentleman did not negative the question nor deny it, but he left the inference to be drawn that that was the only statement that had been made. Well, in this very document itself is contained evidence contradictory to that inference—in the very next paragraph:

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain parties.

How was His Holiness already made aware? Made aware, Sir, by documents and statements sent over to him by members of the Liberal party in Canada. Sir, if I know one fact as a fact—and I would want considerable contradictory evidence before I abandon my belief, or recede from my position—it is that many gentlemen on the other side of the House laid charges against certain individuals of the priesthood in the province of Quebec, and that in addition to the great point that they wanted to make in favour of their settlement, they wished to get an ablegate out here for the purpose of reconciling the Catholic clergy of Canada with the position taken by their leader upon this subject, and there were also many other charges which they laid before the foot of the throne at the Vatican. I should like to say here, and I desire to ask the attention of the Minister of Public Works for a moment, that I charge the Minister of Public Works that he stated in this House that unless justice was granted and the guarantees of the constitution were obtained for the French minority in this country, they would annex themselves to the United States.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I say my hon. friend is altogether wrong. I never made such a statement either in the House or outside of it.

Mr. McINERNEY. I should like to accept the statement—I suppose I am forced to accept the statement of the Minister of Public Works, a statement made by an hon. gentleman occupying a high and honourable position in this country. I should be proud to accept his declaration; but you, Mr. Speaker, will perhaps permit me to read to the House, in vindication of the charge I have made against him, certain assertions made by the hon. gentleman on 6th March, 1893, in the House of Commons, as reported in "Hansard."

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Read the whole of them.

Mr. McINERNEY. The hon. gentleman was referring to the guarantees under the constitution and to the patience shown by the French people under the wrongs inflicted on them, and he added:

It must not be thought that these evidences of patience, of tolerance, ought always, in every case, to come from the same side. On this continent of America, it will be well never to forget it; there is much space where we could find protection, and where our rights would not be assailed.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Is that all?

Mr. McINERNEY. That is enough. I have read over the speech delivered by the hon. gentleman with considerable care, in order to compare his attitude then with his attitude to-day. But while he conveyed much by innuendo, how can he explain his declaration: "There is much space in the broad areas of America for freedom, if we cannot get it here." "It is well for the people of Canada to remember it," he said. That speech, delivered in the House of Commons, I say, is a threat, that unless justice is done to his compatriots in the province of Quebec and the province of Manitoba the hon. gentleman will be prepared to lead his people either in an exodus or a rebellion against the constituted authorities of the country, to secure their protection.

Coming to the Manitoba school question and the settlement which hon. gentlemen opposite say they have made of it, I should like for a moment briefly to state what I understand the Manitoba school question to be. From 1871 to 1890 the Catholic minority of the province of Manitoba had had the control of their own schools, had levied their own taxation for the maintenance of their own schools, had had the choice of their own text books, had had the choice of their own teachers, and, in fact, a system of separate schools prevailed in that province. In 1890 that system was abolished by an Act of the provincial legislature. Then, under a clause of the constitution, as passed upon by the Privy Council, the minority was led to believe that they had a right to expect redress for their grievance, because the taking away of those privileges and rights were held to be a grievance, and it was the duty of the Government of Canada to grant them redress. They came to this Parliament, and the Conservative party endeavoured by the Remedial Bill to give them a measure of redress of their grievances, a measure to establish separate schools to which they were entitled, in so far as it was possible for this Parliament to establish them, and restore the rights of the minority. But the Bill was not passed. The Liberal party by promising more than that measure offered, by denouncing the Government, and by going through the province of Quebec and declaring that the Bill was not sufficient, and that if they were returned to power they would fully restore to the minority their rights, they were victorious at the polls, and they have proved either false to their pledges to the people of the country at large or to their pledges to the minority. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us they have settled the question, and they ask us to accept the settlement made. They not only ask the minority of Manitoba to accept it, but they ask common-sense and thinking men in every part of Canada to accept it as a final settlement of the question, as stated in the Speech from the Throne. Is it a settlement of the question? The only way it can be a settlement of the question is that it shall be a settlement on its merits. Is it a settlement on its merits? I think not, for it ignores the principle of separate schools, which was accorded to the Roman Catholic minority of Manitoba between 1871 and 1890; and all the benefit it confers is that it secures a half hour for religious teaching after regular school hours, which is of no practical advantage, as has been shown in this debate. What does it mean? It simply means half an hour each day for religious teaching after the school is out. That is to say, that a clergyman can go there and teach religion during half an hour. It is understood, at all events in my province, that a clergyman often has six or eight schools in his ecclesiastical parish. How is it possible, even if he has no other duty to attend to at that time, to give religious teaching in six or eight schools during the same half hour on the same day? But what right has any legislature to impose such a duty on a clergyman? Why should he enter the school and teach religion there, and, indeed, it imposes on the clergy a burthen which they are not called upon to undertake. As regards the towns, when we speak of the great benefit conferred on the minority by the settlement which allows them to have a Catholic teacher, I wish to say that I look upon that provision as a tyrannical part of the law. If I were a Protestant, I should look upon it as a most tyrannical part of the law. Why should a law be placed on the Statute-book providing that no one but a Catholic should be employed in schools in any case? I say that the Government has done this: they have put one thing against another, they have tickled the Catholic palate with one bit of legislation and have tickled the Protestant palate with another; but I wish to say as an independent man on the floor of the House that when it distinguishes between people belonging to different religions, and declares that Catholic teachers only under certain circumstances shall be employed by school trustees, it is a tyrannical and unjust law. This is held to be a tremendous boon to the Catholic population of Manitoba, that where there are, in a town, ninety-six children of school age belonging to the Catholic Church, and when, in a rural district there are sixty children of school age able to attend school, a Catholic teacher shall be employed. I wish further to show that not only is this settlement deficient on its merits, but that even the leader of the Government, and the Government itself, as far as we have had the expressions of the Government in this debate, have declared that they do not themselves believe in the settlement. What is the declaration of the hon. the Prime Minister? He said that he did not get all he desired. Well, Sir, he either desired more than justice or got less than justice; he either desired more than he had a right to or got less than he had a right to. He therefore compromised on a question of principle, for political safety. Also, I charge the hon. the leader of the Government that he has trafficked with a question of principle, that he has compromised on this question, and that he has not stood true to the pledges and the declarations that he has announced to this country during the last five or six years.

But, Sir, he is not the only gentleman who says that they have not got all they desired and have not got enough. Has the hon. the Solicitor General declared that this is a final settlement? Has the hon. the Solicitor General declared that this settlement is one that he can accept? No, Sir; the best that he will do is to advise the Catholic people of Manitoba to accept this as a settlement now, and then to rely upon the generosity of Mr. Greenway for further concessions in the future. Rely upon the generosity of a man who a few short years ago robbed these people of their rights under the constitution; rely upon him for generous treatment and generous concessions, because, forsooth, at a banquet given to the leader of the Government at Montreal at which Mr. Greenway was present—and present for a purpose—Mr. Greenway in order to smooth down the French Canadian people that he saw surrounding that table held out certain hopes of future concessions to the people of Manitoba. I wish for a moment to draw the attention of the House once again to the extraordinary pledge of the hon. the Solicitor General. In the few remarks that I made last night I said that there was no man in the House for whom I had a higher personal regard or friendship than for the Solicitor General, and that is true. But, Sir, I find in this pledge of his a strange declaration for a public man to make. It is this :

I, the undersigned, promise, if elected, to conform myself to the bishops' mandement in all points and to vote for a measure according to the Catholics of Manitoba that justice to which they have a right by virtue of the judgment of the Privy Council, provided that the measure be approved of by my bishop. If Mr. Laurier reaches power, and does not settle the question at the first session, in accordance with the terms of the mandement, I promise either to withdraw my support or resign.

We have that pledge and that statement of the Solicitor General read in this House. We have had the pledge here face to face with him, but we have now in addition to it the further admission of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) : Unless this statement is satisfactory to my bishop I will resign. But how does the hon. gentleman try to straddle the fence again on this question. He told us that as an honest man, looking upon this as a question of principle, he voluntarily went to Archbishop Begin of Quebec, and offered him this pledge which has been published before the country. He tells us that he offered the pledge as a question of principle believing he was doing what was right as a high-minded public man. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) told us shortly afterwards that he was at liberty to disregard this pledge or contract—he held it was a contract—because he did not receive his quid pro quo. It was not then a question of high political morality for him ; it was not a question of principle for him, but a question of political support, and because he did not get the political support that he thought he was bargaining for he held himself free to throw up the whole contract. Let me ask then : did the hon. Solicitor General when he went to his archbishop, go for the purpose of taking a stand upon a high question of principle ? No, Sir ; for he has admitted to the House by his own statement, that his object was to try and obtain political support, and he turns around coolly afterwards and says : But the bishop worked against me. He makes a charge deliberately against the Archbishop of Quebec. He tries first to have us believe that the archbishop agreed to support him, although there is not the slightest evidence of that. Mr. Fremont who had gone through the fire and furnace on this question, who although a Liberal voted with the Conservative party on this question ; Mr. Fremont was a candidate in the district. The people of Quebec knew perfectly well that Mr. Fremont was true upon that question, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) would not have had a ghost of a chance of election if he had not gone to the archbishop and made this pledge that has been produced. But the hon. gentleman coolly tells us that the archbishop did not support him, and the next moment he tells us that he almost beat the other fellow out of his boots, and that Mr. Fremont only saved his deposit by six votes. Then we have it, that the Solicitor General is a man of wonderful power and strength in the district of Quebec ; it is a wonder that he did not come here before.

Sir, I think it but right that the conduct of the Solicitor General in this matter should be called to public light. What position is he in ? He has gone on a certain mission, and anybody with half an eye can see that its purpose was to obtain time, to try and get time, to try and stave off the declaration of his bishop that the settlement was unsatisfactory because when that declaration is made the hon. the Solicitor General as an honest man must resign his seat in this House. His object was to stave off that declaration, and so he took a pilgrimage to Rome, and having returned he thinks now that he can wipe out his pledge, and wipe out all the principles that he announced on this question, by reading from Justin McCarthy's work a sentence or two upon the great intellectual power of the Pope. He offers this as a sop to the Catholic people of this Dominion for the betrayal of their interests and their rights in his pledge upon this question. Sir, I still entertain the hope, I would be surprised if the hope is not realized, that the hon. the Solicitor General will see his way clear, when this question is decided or reported upon by the ablegate—and it can only be decided in one way—I trust the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will see his way clear to make good the pledge given to the Archbishop of Quebec and repeated again upon the floor of Parliament. I, as a personal friend of the hon. gentleman, would like to see him take that course. But the hon. the Solicitor General was not the only gentleman who gave this pledge. The hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) gave the pledge. The hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Lemieux), who seconded the Address last year, gave the pledge.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Read my pledge.

Mr. McINERNEY. The pledge as I have it is in these words :

I the undersigned candidate in the county of Gaspé, do solemnly promise to vote in the House according to the desires expressed by their lordships in the recent pastoral.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I beg to say that I never signed that pledge. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) will allow me I will tell him this. On nomination day at Percé, my opponent Dr. Ennis, who was fighting the sacred cause of Conservatism tried to use religion as a means of carrying the election. He was offered by me to sign a pledge of which the hon. gentleman has only read the first paragraph. The pledge I offered to the Conservative candidate reads as follows:—

I, the undersigned candidate in the county of for Gaspé, pledge myself to follow the mandement of the bishops of the province of Quebec on this question. I also pledge myself to repudiate Sir Charles Tupper, leader of the Conservative party, who declared that a French Catholic should not be Premier of this Dominion.

And my opponent refused to sign this pledge and I refused also. It is easily seen why the Conservative press published only part of the document.

Mr. McINERNEY. That is a very frank explanation, and I suppose we are bound to accept it. But has the hon. gentleman told us that he did not sign any pledge at any time during that election?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Never.

Mr. McINERNEY. Did you ever take a pledge, Sir?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Never.

Mr. McINERNEY. Well, I understand that the hon. gentleman offered to sign the pledge which I have read. I do not make the declaration outright; but when an opportunity is offered, I think I shall be able to adduce evidence to show that the hon. gentleman did offer to sign that pledge.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Never.

Mr. McINERNEY. If the hon. gentleman made no pledge, then he cannot break any pledge; and that is the difference between him and the hon. Solicitor General.

Now, Sir, I have stated that this settlement is neither good in itself on its merits, nor as judged by the opinion of the Premier or his following, nor is it acceptable to the minority. I take it that there must be two parties to a settlement. I do not see how a matter can be settled unless the two parties to it agree to have it settled. In this case the two parties were the Greenway government and the minority in Manitoba. In order to effect a settlement, both of these parties should be agreed upon it. I could understand the hon. leader of the Government giving a verdict or a judgment as a jury or a judge between two parties, and one party not liking it. But I cannot understand a case being settled when one of the parties is dissatisfied. It is as if I owed you, Mr. Speaker, a thousand dollars, and you had a judgment against me for it, and the leader of the House came to me and offered to settle the matter. He comes to me, and says, "Give me thirty pieces of silver, and I will settle the matter for you:" and he takes the thirty pieces of silver to you as a full settlement of your thousand dollar claim against me. You are not disposed to accept it, because you have a judgment for your full claim against me. Still, the hon. gentleman turns round and says, "I have settled it completely." There used to be a way to settle coffee by dropping an egg into the coffee pot. I can understand the leader of the Government standing over the coffee pot, with Mr. Prendergast standing on a two thousand dollar pedestal beside him, and the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) and the hon. member for Chambly and Verchères (Mr. Geoffrion) and others behind him, while he takes up a robin's egg and drops it into the coffee pot, and says, "See, gentlemen, I have settled it." That is about the kind of settlement the hon. gentleman has made of the Manitoba school question. Now, Sir, this settlement is not satisfactory to a large part of the people of this country. It is not only not satisfactory to the minority, but it is not satisfactory to the French Canadian people; nor is it satisfactory to many other right-thinking men, of all shades of politics, all denominations, and all nationalities in this country.

We are told that the recent elections in Wright and Bonaventure have proved that the French Canadian people are in favour of the settlement. Well, Sir, if the French people of this country had declared openly in any large majority for this settlement, it would possibly be well for us to say very little about it. But I have still to see evidence to convince me that the French people of Canada can be satisfied with any such settlement as this. I spoke last night of the county of Bonaventure. I wish to speak now of the county of Wright. Who represented Wright in this House last year? Mr. Devlin, who took a strong stand on this question; and is there any doubt in the mind of any thinking man that Mr. Devlin was prepared to come here and refuse to support this settlement? Can there be any doubt that he notified the leader of the Government that he could not come into this House and support it? And then Mr. Devlin was appointed to office. Perhaps his circumstances compelled him. I will not make any charge against him. All I know of Mr. Devlin is that on the floor of this House, when he had anything to say, he said it like an independent man, and judged questions of this kind by what he thought was right. I only wish I could extend the compliment to some other gentlemen on the other side of the House. I entertained the hope that many men in the Liberal ranks, before they met this Parliament in session, would have either tendered their resignations, or would have given it to be understood publicly that this settlement could not be accepted. But we are told that the election in Wright county with its large majority clearly proves that the French people are favourable to this settlement. The majority in Wright has increased, it is true, but still the total vote polled is about six hundred less, I understand, than the vote polled in the general elections, and we had it stated broadcast in the press of the country, and not contradicted, that a large number of men from the neighbouring town in Wright county was brought over here and given employment on the roof of the building that was recently burned. I am not going to say that the people of Wright sold themselves openly in this contest; but a friend of mine put it in this way. He said that the hon. Minister of Public Works was a much maligned and slandered man. He had heard it stated, and he had read, that the Minister of Public Works had a whole brigade of the electors of Wright at work on the top of the Western block; but on the twenty-third of March he went there and he could not find a single elector of Wright on the work. It happened to be election day in the county of Wright, and the men were attending to their election duties, as they had a right to do in their own county.

There has been a delay in the rendering of the judgment of the hierarchy of Canada on this question. Some people have ventured to say—I believe the statement has been made in this House—that the bishops of Canada have no right to express an opinion on this question at all. I cannot understand how any intelligent man could take that stand. If the rights of the Catholic minority of Manitoba have been invaded, who should stand as the advocates of these rights, who should declare whether the people have been reinstated in these rights or not, if it be not the Catholic bishops? Suppose, for a moment, the rights of the Anglican community in Canada had been invaded or that the rights of the Methodist community had been attacked, would anybody deny to the bishops of the Anglican Church or to the Methodist Conference the right or the duty to declare that their people had not been treated fairly? I think not. The charge is, moreover, hurled against the Roman Catholic bishops that they alone have taken a stand on this question, that no other clergymen of other religious denominations have declared themselves upon it. That is not so. There are Protestant members in this House who have told me and on whose statement I rely—and I know it apart from their statement—that in their own constituencies, conferences have been held by the ministers of various denominations among Protestants, in which these ministers denounced any attempt to pass a Remedial Bill, in which they denounced any effort to remedy the injustice inflicted on the minority. Have we not all heard of the declarations of the Rev. Mr. Douglas and of the Rev. Dr. Carman on this question? Do we not know that the Evangelical Alliance denounced the Government of Sir John Thompson for even attempting to give back to the minority of Manitoba any particle of their rights at all? Let us be honest. I do not think that I am making any vain claims when I say that I know of nobody more fit to tell the Catholic people of Canada whether their religious rights in the matter of education have been restored to them than the bishops of the Catholic faith. But it was thought necessary by the Government to delay the decision of the bishops on this question, and what was done? Mr. Drolet, a gentleman of Montreal, who was formerly a Papal Zouave, went to Rome, carrying, I suppose, the petition which the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) read to us last night. He was followed by the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick). On their way to Rome they sought to obtain influence with the Papal Court, they sought again, through Cardinal Vaughan and the London "Tablet," and Lord Russell, influence with the Court of Rome, and the means they took are known to all. They appointed the legal firm of Day, Russell & Company, of which Mr. Charles Russell is a member, the agents of the Canadian Government, and Mr. Russell went to Rome with Mr. Fitzpatrick and stayed there until the ablegate was on his way or about to start on his way to Canada, and then cabled out that he was on his way. Why did the Liberal party desire that an ablegate should be sent to Canada? Because delay was of the very highest importance to these men. The elections in Bonaventure and Wright were about to be contested. The local elections in the province of Quebec were soon to be brought on, and these gentlemen thought that as long as they would delay the pronouncement of the bishops of Quebec on this question, they would be safe. They desired to be able to say to the French Canadian Catholics of Canada, as they did say to them in Bonaventure: The Pope is on Mr. Laurier's side in this question, see how he snubs the bishops of Canada by sending out an Ablegate to discipline them. That was the canvass made among the French Catholics of this Dominion; and that is why it is the cue of hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to hang up this decision of the bishops until the local elections in the province of Quebec are over. That is politics, you may say. Well, it may be politics; but if politics have sunk to such a depth that men who oppose and denounce their clergy, will, for the purpose of getting political advantage, endeavour to secure the visit of an ablegate from the Papal See in order to delay a pronouncement on the part of their bishops until the elections are over, then I must say that politics in this country, under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite, have sunk to a very low depth indeed. We will, however, have a decision on this question from the Catholic hierarchy of Canada. There cannot be much doubt about that, and the question I put to the hon. members from the province of Quebec is: are they prepared to abide by that decision when given, or will they be led into a cul de sac by the Liberal party in this country?

An hon. MEMBER. En Anglais?

Mr. McINERNEY. A blind alley, and the hon. gentleman is likewise a blind ally. I believe that in good time, sooner perhaps than many expect, this country will tire of men as reckless in their promises and as reckless in their breaches of faith as they will be reckless in their expenditure of public money in order to maintain themselves in power. The cement of office may unite them for a season, but parties held together by interest are bound to fall apart on principle, and there will be offered in Canada a repetition of the spectacle that was presented in the United States when a great party, recreant to its trust, false to its promises and platform, was, at the first opportunity that offered, hurled ignominiously from power.

Let me say one word to my hon. friends, the Conservative members of this House and the members of the Conservative party in Canada, and to them I would say that their true position is to stand staunch and steadfast by the principles they have enunciated and fought for—the principles they have suffered for—the principles of eternal justice incorporated in the constitution, in that constitution which, when this deluge of discord shall have ended will still endure as the ark bearing the covenant between these different provinces in sacred security for ever more.

Mr. MACLEAN. I desire to take up the attention of the House for but a very few minutes. I wish merely to say that I repudiate any responsibility for what might be construed as an attempt to introduce again a measure coercive of Manitoba on the school question. I desire to repudiate the responsibility for any such action or desire on my own behalf as a Conservative coming from Ontario, and further, to repudiate any connection with anything which might be construed to imply that Ontario Conservatives are not in sympathy with the people of Quebec in any attempt they may make to protect their civil liberties. I have every sympathy with what has been said concerning the attempt now being made by the representatives of the province of Quebec to vindicate their civil liberties. These people have not only my sympathy in that attempt, but in my newspaper I have backed them as well as I could. This school question, in my opinion and I believe in the opinion of all Conservatives in the province of Ontario is a question that has been settled for ever. While the minority of Manitoba had a grievance—and I believe the highest court of this country decided that they had—and while that grievance was sought to be remedied under the constitution, the question was still an open one; but now that it has been settled by constitutional means, we have not the right to bring it up again. With us, different from what is the case under the constitution of the United States, our Government must assume the political responsibility of every action taken by this House. For the administration of the constitution, no matter what the courts have decided, the Government, the dominant party, is responsible. The courts may have decided that the minority had rights which had been taken away, but the restoration of those rights was a matter of policy, a matter of responsibility; and that responsibility I am glad to know, from the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite, they are prepared to assume. I am glad to see that even the Prime Minister accepts that responsibility of the settlement which has been made. The Liberals, as a party, accept the responsibility of the settlement.

And, speaking of parliamentary responsibility, I come to another point. After what was said in this House yesterday by the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), after what was said by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), after the reading of that celebrated document last night, I say that the Government and their party must take full responsibility for that mission to Rome. They cannot escape that responsibility. They have said that it is on behalf of their party that they went there, and, seeing that we are governed by the principle of parliamentary responsibility, they must accept that responsibility before the people. They say that they went to Rome to vindicate the civil liberties of the people of Quebec. Mr. Speaker, while I sympathize with them in their efforts to conserve their political liberties, I do not agree with them in the authority to which they went to protect those liberties. It is not in St. Peter's, it is not in the Vatican, it is not on the Seven Hills of Rome that the political, the civil liberties of British citizens are conserved. If there is a temple sacred to British liberty, if there is a place where our rights are to be protected, that temple is within these walls of Parliament. The shrine of our liberties is on the floor of this House, and we, the members of this House are the sacristans of that temple; we are the priests, the ministers at this shrine; we, worthy or unworthy as we may be, are the men who must protect the civil liberties of the people. What will happen to gentlemen on the other side if it turns out that the delegate now in this country does not come to their relief, and does not pronounce in their favour and guarantee the civil liberties which they now profess they seek to protect. They will have to come back here to defend and protect those liberties if they are assailed. If they do come to Parliament I will aid and support them in doing what they should do now here, and not outside, to protect the liberties, not only of the people of Quebec, but of the people of all Canada. I must take objection to the statement of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) last night in the comparison he made between His Holiness and Her Gracious Majesty. We who are Canadians say that there is no one but Her Majesty to appeal to in the protection of the civil liberties of British subjects the world over. She is the guardian of our civil liberties, not His Holiness of Rome; and, as a Conservative, I hope to have the support of all the Conservative party in at least making that statement. And there were names mentioned in that statement in regard to civil liberty. I have the greatest respect for the present Pope of Rome. He is known to be a liberal man. But the Liberals must invoke some other name in regard to liberty than that of Pio Nono. When we read the history of the unification of Italy, when we recall the names of Garibaldi and Mazzini, and other heroes of that struggle, he is not the man whose name should be quoted by the Liberal party in the vindication of the civil liberties of the people of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say on the school question, but I think it is very important, and I think I speak the views of the great bulk of the Conservatives of Ontario in regard to that question. From this I wish to pass to another point in the Address, and, just for the moment, to look at the pledges of hon. gentlemen on the other side. In 1887 there was a conference in the city of Quebec of representatives from the local governments in the Dominion of Canada. These gentlemen, after long consultation at the Ancient Capital, reached certain conclusions in regard to the Government of this country, and they drew up a paper which was signed by them. The first name appended to that document appears as O. Mowat, Prime Minister of Ontario and Attorney General. There is a great group of Prime Ministers' names appended to the document. I only recognize one Prime Minister in the country, and that is my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Laurier). But the first of the number of these petty Prime Ministers whose name appears here is O. Mowat. That gentleman has begun already to repudiate his former title of Prime Minister, for in a letter to his successor, he addresses that gentleman as "My dear Mr. Premier." The next is the Hon. Mercier, Prime Minister of Quebec, and Attorney General, of whom nil nisi bonum. The next is W. S. Fielding, Prime Minister of Nova Scotia, and Provincial Secretary; and the next is Andrew G. Blair, Prime Minister of New Brunswick, and Attorney General. We have now here a Government which includes three of these Prime Ministers of provinces at that time. Being associated with the Prime Minister in the carrying on of the Government of this country, they are bound, if they are honest men, to stand by their records in that celebrated document. What does that document call for? Among other things it declares that they pledge themselves to the conservation of provincial autonomy against federal power. But the British North America Act, according to them, is obscure, and must be revised and amended. Since they have got into this Cabinet and this Parliament, these three celebrated Prime Ministers have not brought forward a measure to either revise or amend the constitution. I wish to direct attention to two or three of the most important planks of their platform as presented in this document. These three Prime Ministers declared that they were in favour of reappointing the subsidies given by the Dominion to the provinces, and increasing them very much. They are going not only to increase the revenues of Canada, if they can get control of her affairs, but they are going to divide them at once among the provinces in much larger proportion than at present. The leading organ of the party at that time expressed its views in regard to the division of the money in this way:

This skilful scheme is fair all round, and will do financial justice to Ontario for the first time since soon after confederation. The actual increase of provincial revenues under the proposal would be: $581,700, or 28 cents per head, to Ontario; $337,959, or 24 cents per head, to Quebec; $162,457, or 37 cents per head, to Nova Scotia; $130,000, or 40 cents per head, to New Brunswick; $70,000, or 65 cents per head, to Prince Edward Island; $100,000, or $1.51 per head, to Manitoba; $65,000, or $1.31 per head, to British Columbia. The greater per capita gain of the smaller provinces is due to their disproportional allowances for civil government and legislation, which allowances are based on recognition of the fact that the expenses of civil government and legislation are disproportionately large per head when population is small.

That was their main contention, that the revenue of this country had greatly increased, and, therefore, that when they came to power it was their intention to distribute this increased revenue among the various provinces. Are they prepared to do so now? Have they brought forward any policy to-day on that line? I say, no. Then these gentlemen, meeting as representatives of the provinces, undertook to deal with the trade affairs of this country, and they passed a resolution in regard to unrestricted reciprocity which they declared was the policy of the meeting of all the Premiers of the various provinces; and in connection with that, here is what their leading organ said on the subject:

It will no longer be possible for the most fatuous ringsters to indulge in that assertion. Five provinces have stated distinctly that nearly the whole Canadian people wish for unrestricted reciprocity. This should have a large influence upon the commissioners about to meet in Washington. They cannot now doubt what Canada wants. The British representatives cannot but perceive that the Ottawa Government, if it pretends that Canadians in general do not wish for commercial union, does not represent the Dominion truly. And the Ottawa Government, if it wishes to escape from the wrath to come, will load Sir Sackville West up the other way from Mr. Chamberlain, and endeavour to bring about continental free trade.

That was the policy these hon. gentlemen had then. Have they any intention now of bringing forward any such policy? Now, Mr. Speaker, they had other planks in this meeting of the provincial premiers, they had one in regard to insolvency, and if hon. gentlemen opposite have any real intention of benefiting the commercial interests of this country, if Sir Oliver Mowat wishes to make good his pledges which he then gave in that convention, it is his duty to-day, in another Chamber, to bring forward a measure dealing with insolvency in this country rather than the measure which we have now before us dealing with the franchise, which will be of no practical benefit at the present time. Sir, I submit that hon. gentlemen opposite have no intention of carrying out the pledges they gave at this interprovincial conference. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I just wish to reiterate what I said before, namely, that we in Ontario consider the school question settled. We sympathize as far as we can with the people of Quebec in their efforts to maintain their civil rights; but if they wish to vindicate them, we feel they ought to vindicate them in this Chamber and not by a round-about mission to Rome.

Mr. MacPHERSON. My first words in this House will be words of apology for taking up time that could be employed very much better, as I think that the discussion has been sufficiently prolonged already. Still, I have heard a great many things spoken in this debate to which I wish to draw attention. From the opposite side I have heard things, some of which are new, and some of which are true; but the great misfortune is that those things which are true are not new, and those which are new are not true. I am sorry to say, Mr. Speaker, that I have not followed all the intricacies of the debate on the Remedial Bill or on the school question; but I have read enough to lead me to believe that the settlement arrived at between the Government of Manitoba and Government of the Dominion is a right and proper one, and one that ought to be accepted by the people of Canada. I have before me the judgment of the Privy Council of Great Britain—I am not going to read the whole judgment, but I will read one clause towards the end of the judgment which is to my mind exceedingly plain:

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, nor that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Act of 1890, no doubt, commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of, the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate ground of complaint would be removed, if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

Mr. MACLEAN.

Now, my opinion is that the legislation which has been enacted meets this clause in the judgment of the Privy Council. I may say with reference to the remarks that fell from the hon. member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney) that I understood him to state, though perhaps I was mistaken, that the Minister of the Interior desired to obtain the assistance of the "Tablet," the organ of the Roman Catholic people of Great Britain and of Cardinal Vaughan; and I understood him to say that this was withheld. Now, Sir, I secured only recently a copy of the "Tablet," and from that, without wishing to weary you with quotations, I will read one article which, to my mind, puts the whole situation in a nutshell. I may add that the gentleman who writes the letter referred to here, seems to have the same opinion of the matter that is held by the hon. leader of the Opposition. The article goes on to say:

We publish elsewhere a long letter from a "London Priest" upon the Manitoba school question. We have no wish to anticipate anything that "A Catholic Canadian" may have to say in reply, but it is probably desirable that we should at once intervene to correct what seems to us a mischievous delusion.

I may here remark, parenthetically, that many members of the Opposition have been trying to make those mischievous delusions permanent, but in this I am positive they will not succeed. The article goes on:

It is worse than useless, it is misleading, to talk in this connection of the violation of "fundamental laws," or to speak as if "a formal treaty, like the Manitoba Act, involving the honour of the Federal Government and the word of the Queen," had been "torn to shreds." The clauses in the Manitoba Act which govern the situation, are these two:

"1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law or practice in the province at the union.

"2. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education."

The "Tablet" then goes on to say:

The judgment of the Privy Council, delivered in July, 1892, decided that the first clause does not cover the case of the separate Catholic schools in Manitoba. We may regret the effect of the judgment, but it is obviously idle for any individual to set up his own interpretation of a statute against that of the highest tribunal in the Empire. The decision of the Privy Council is final, and we must, therefore, take it that the Manitoba legislature, when it abolished the separate school system, was at least not acting ultra vires.

Mr. QUINN. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman to give me the date of the "Tablet" from which he is quoting, as I think it will be found to coincide with the visit of the Solicitor General.

Mr. FRASER (Guysboro'). And that is the organ of your church.

Mr. MacPHERSON. I regret that while during the last session of Parliament the leader of the Opposition was very ready to stop any hon. member from interrupting a member who was making his first speech on the Opposition side of the House, today he has not shown the same alacrity. Still, for the information of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) I may mention that the date of this particular number of the "Tablet" is February 13th, 1897. The article goes on to say :

The second judgment of the Privy Council, delivered in January, 1895, decided that the second of the clauses of the Manitoba Act quoted above, was applicable to the case of Catholic schools, even though the rights affected had been acquired through legislation of the province after the union. But we only prepare disappointments for ourselves, if we exaggerate the effects of this decision or read into it a meaning which it does not possess. The Catholic minority is entitled to lay its griefs before the Federal Parliament. The Federal Government must hear the appeal, but as unfettered discretion as to what it shall do. To talk, therefore, of the violation of "fundamental laws," or of a "former treaty" being "torn to shreds," is merely irrelevant rhetoric.

This has a suspicious flavour of the language frequently used by the hon. the leader of the Opposition.

"A London Priest," however, is mistaken in his fact, as well as in his law. He says, "There is the province of Quebec to be reckoned with, specially by Mr. Laurier, who has been placed in power by Quebec." The province of Quebec, with all the facts of the controversy before it, has already spoken, and with unmistakable clearness. It has supported Mr. Laurier, though he opposed the Remedial Bill, and given him 55 out of 62 seats. Common charity requires us to believe that, in supporting Mr. Laurier in this overwhelming way, the Catholic province acted in the belief that the Liberal party would obtain better terms for the Catholics of Manitoba than it was possible to get by attempting to coerce the province. We have already said that we regard the terms provisionally suggested by Mr. Laurier and accepted by Mr. Greenway, as unsatisfactory, in that they failed explicitly to recognize the principle of the separate Catholic school. But the end is not yet; and we have strong reason to hope that further negotiations will still result in an honourable settlement. Meantime, we believe, for our part, we can best help forward this issue by getting rid of dangerous illusions as to legal rights which have no existence in fact.

That statement, Mr. Speaker, seems to me to put the present situation in a nutshell. I regret exceedingly that so much time has been wastefully used in discussing this question during the present session. I understood before I had anything to do with Parliament that it was thoroughly discussed from beginning to end, and that the people had become wearied of it. A great deal of the discussion was unnecessary and pernicious, and I was sorry indeed when the leader of the Opposition started it once more. I am also sorry to think that in debating the Speech from the Throne so much time has been devoted to this question to the exclusion of other subjects. But there is no evil without a benefit, and I was delighted and charmed to find that the member for East Durham and the member for East York—and you, Mr. Speaker, know that the wise men come from the East—possessed sufficient manliness to rise in their places and tell the hon. leader of the Government that they would not support him on that issue. I do not know whether they were bold under all the circumstances, but feeling they might have been ruled out of the party they showed a great amount of courage. It may be, however, when we consider the position of their party, they felt that the leader of the Opposition is not in a position to rule them out for the simple reason that if he did so his party would number very few members.

I will now refer to the Speech from the Throne as it affects the tariff. And I draw attention to the fact that the leader of the Opposition takes great credit to himself as a supporter of the National Policy—I understand in fact that he considers he inaugurated it. One point to which the hon. gentleman drew attention was that the excess of exports over imports during the National Policy period had very greatly increased. When this policy was introduced the principal benefit claimed for it was that it would bring our markets closer home; that the towns and cities would grow in population and would consume the agricultural products of the country. Does the result show that this prophecy has been fulfilled? Why, the hon. gentleman says the exports have increased, although we were led to believe at the time the country was asked to adopt the National Policy that the condition would be otherwise. Instead of considering that the National Policy has been advantageous to the country, I hold it has thrown Canada back at least twenty-five years. Evidence is to be had of that fact. The argument put forward by its promoters has proved to be a delusion, and this so-called National Policy has nothing to commend it but its high-sounding name. The school question together with the National Policy constituted two of the great issues submitted to the people during the last election, and I will refer for a moment—I hope not offensively—to the result of a meeting held on 20th June when the honoured leader of the Opposition made his last dying political effort in the city of Hamilton. On that occasion the leader of the Opposition arrived in the city with great flourish of trumpets. Naturally he made his last effort in the city which he considered to be the home of the National Policy, the city which has been over and over again stated to be the Birmingham of Canada. What was the result? No one can question that the people of Hamilton by their votes showed that they were satisfied neither with the National Policy nor with the Remedial Bill. There is no doubt whatever of that fact, and I am convinced, and I have had many occasions to meet workingmen, that while some of the manufacturers were willing and even desirous to continue the National Policy, the working-classes were thoroughly dissatisfied with it, because the large wages promised under protection had not been realized. I may add that during that election it was possible for our friends on the Reform side to occupy as committee rooms no less than three or four factories which had been built under the National Policy. The leader of the Opposition I understand is still uncertain as to how the result reached on 23rd June came about; he cannot yet make out how such an enormous change in public opinion occurred. I find that many matters have been explained in this discussion into which it is not needful that I should enter; but in my opinion there were three or four causes. The first was dissatisfaction with the National Policy, the second was the Remedial Bill, the third was differences in the late Cabinet and the members thereof. I am reminded by the remarks made by the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) about Rip Van Winkle, that when he awakened after his prolonged sleep he found a dog hanging on a tree. It brings to my mind an incident which I read about some considerable time ago in one of the English papers. Mr. Labouchere was speaking at a meeting and during the course of his remarks he had occasion to mention the name of Mr. Chamberlain, the member for Birmingham. One of his audience indiscreetly called out "Judas"; whereupon Mr. Labouchere said: My friend who has called out "Judas" does no honour to his memory, for Judas after he betrayed his Master, did not go out with the high and mighty, with the nobility of the land; he did not sit down with the high priest Caiphas, but quietly and very respectably and very decently, and very properly, he went out and hanged himself. I have had hopes that during the last election a similar fate—not similar physical fate, but a similar political fate—would have happened to the gentlemen who deserted their Premier. Unfortunately, however, many have been chosen and only one left, and from what I have read of parliamentary history the one who was left out of the House was one whom we all admired and who would have done credit to the Conservative party.

I may go further in my reference to tariff matters and say that in the coming tariff I hope the modifications will be of such a character as to benefit the farming interests of the country. There is no question but that during the last eighteen years, under the National Policy, the farmers have suffered to the betterment of the manufacturers; not all manufacturers but some favoured few who have succeeded in acquiring a great deal of money. In other words, under the National Policy as it existed, the classes have been benefited to the injury of the masses. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Kent (Mr. McInerney) was kind enough to talk about the Government, and he called it the Laurier-Mowat Government, and he spoke of it turning a somersault on its tariff policy. As far as I can make out, it ill becomes the member for Kent to make any such reference, for I am credibly informed that before he became a Conservative he had four times been a Liberal candidate. If that was not a somersault I do not know what is.

Mr. FRASER. Four somersaults.

Mr. MacPHERSON. Yes, four somersaults. In addition to that, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInerney) was talking out of term, because we have no idea yet what sort of tariff the Government is going to bring down, except that it will be in the line of a reduction in many cases, and an amelioration of the condition of the people generally. It is such a tariff that we are looking for, and if we get it we shall have cause to thank the new Government. I am sure they have given serious thought, and gone to a good deal of pains in endeavouring to remove everything of an evil character from the present tariff, and that must have been a difficult task because there are very many things of an evil character in the tariff with which we have been burdened. We have had a good deal of discussion anticipatory of the tariff, and that discussion I consider to be a waste of time, because when the tariff is brought down we shall simply have a repetition of the same talk. I do not wish to make any sort of comparison between persons, because comparisons are odious, but I cannot abstain from saying that if we had fewer lawyers in the House it might be better.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MacPHERSON. I only said it "might" be better, but it might, on the other hand, be worse. Without wishing to give offence I must say that I believe that too many opportunities are taken advantage of by lawyers in this House to bandy words backwards and forwards across the floor. I do not wish to lecture them, but I must say that there are many business men in the House who are anxious to get back to their means of livelihood, and who have other things to do than to sit here for four or five months listening to idle talk. I trust that those lawyers in the House who speak a great deal may see their way to curtail their remarks in the future. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that in preparing a tariff we have, no doubt, to consider the action of our neighbours to the south, and I am sorry beyond measure to find that in legislating lately, the United States Congress has shown a distinct antagonism to Canada. For a nation of sixty or seventy millions of people to show this antagonism towards a small country of five or six million inhabitants is by no means magnanimous, and is in singular contrast to the action of Great Britain, in every instance where she has had to deal with smaller powers. If the American people have an idea that by legislating in this way they are likely to coerce us into a union with them, they are making one of the grandest mistakes they ever made in their lives. The people of Canada will always be willing to be led in the right path, but the path to the United States is not the right path, and under no circumstances will our people consent to be driven. The more any people or any nation tries to drive Canadians, the less likely are they to go. I can speak feelingly on this subject, because I know that in years gone by there was a considerable annexation spirit prevailing throughout Canada. I come in contact with people from different parts of the country now, and I have discovered that some who held such feelings in the past have completely changed their views. Men who at one time thought they would send their children to school in the United States now feel that under no circumstances would they do so if they could help it. In addition to the antagonism shown to Canada by the fiscal policy of the United States we have also the Alien Labour Law, and I understand that a measure of retaliation in that respect is likely to be brought down here. I am sorry that I cannot agree in toto with any legislation of this character because I consider that a smaller nation is unable to retaliate against a larger one, and would be more likely to get hurt in the end. Undoubtedly the United States deserves no better treatment from us, and if they persist in going on with the Alien Labour Law it might be advisable for us to take action here. I have still hopes that the present Ministry will be able to arrange some measure of conciliation between Canada and the United States, a measure that would be satisfactory to both and promote a better feeling between the two countries.

After Recess.

Mr. MacPHERSON. Mr. Speaker, lest there should be any doubt as to my views on the question of retaliation in regard to the Alien Labour Law, I wish to reiterate what I said before six o'clock, to the effect that it is desirable, if possible, not to adopt extreme measures, and that every effort should be made to meet the representatives of the United States in a spirit of conciliation. But I am inclined to go so far as to say that if these efforts should prove ineffectual, I should then be disposed to support a measure of retaliation in the shape of a Canadian alien labour law.

Mr. Speaker, I have come away, unfortunately, without my scrap-book, and I have no doubt many hon. members will be highly pleased at being saved from the reading of extracts, which is too frequently a part of the debates in this House, a practice which I hope will soon be given up and be replaced with what is in reality debating.

For some years past the late Premier of the Dominion, the hon. leader of the Opposition has been endeavouring in Great Britain to bring about what he calls Imperial federation, but what I will call a will-o'-the-wisp. It strikes me that the only way in which such a thing can be accomplished is by the colonies adopting the same fiscal policy as that which prevails in Great Britain. Until we are prepared to do that, it is idle to speak of the matter. Everyone knows that the great Napoleon referred to England as a nation of shop-keepers; and such being the case, notwithstanding the friendship they entertain for the colonies, they are not going to deal with people from whom they do not get any benefits in return; and such benefits we can never expect to realize until we can prove to them that our trade and that of all the other colonies will equal the trade of Great Britain with the rest of the world. That I consider rather a hopeless task, and therefore I shall expect to hear very little of Imperial federation for some years to come. The great British nation, although indisposed to deal with colonies or foreign countries except to their own advantage, have within recent years shown a distinct feeling of friendship towards Canada and all the other colonies. This is evidenced by the invitation which has been extended to all the colonial Premiers to take part in the Queen's jubilee celebration; and I can only add my own to the good wishes of the previous speakers and say that we all desire that the presence of our Premier in Great Britain will be an era in the history of Canada, and I trust that the Opposition, with their usual loyalty—at least, that loyalty of which they have so frequently boasted—will assist in expediting the business of this House, so as to enable him to get away in time for that celebration.

I am delighted to find that, instead of following the will-o'-the-wisp of Imperial federation, the present Government have taken up some practical measures, which I trust will be carried to a successful issue—such measures as the provision of cold storage, in the able hands of our Minister of Agriculture, and the establishment of a fast line of steamships. I do not by any means say that I advocate a speed of twenty-two or twenty-three knots an hour: but there is room for faster and better steamships than we now possess. Another important measure is the enlargement of our canals. Whether these measures are within the power of the Dominion of Canada, in view of its present enormous debt, I am not at present prepared to say; but if they can be carried out successfully, I look upon them to some extent as necessities, in view of the antagonism of the United States, which will only drive us further away from them, and lead us to feel that our great market is that of Great Britain.

The next measure promised in the Speech from the Throne is one to repeal the Franchise Act, a most monstrous Act, which has been in existence for years to the prejudice of our party, and for the benefit of our opponents. I am pleased to feel that that Act will soon be abolished, and a superior franchise adopted in its place. I know that the members of the Government are desirous of giving us the improvements and reforms we require in this respect, and I trust that they will go as far as they can towards manhood suffrage, with one man one vote.

There is one subject referred to in the Speech from the Throne in regard to which I am sorry to say I cannot so cordially support the action of the Government: I refer to the subject of prohibition. I feel that prohibition, if carried out, will be a direct interference with the liberty of the subject, besides which it will affect our revenue so seriously that it will be difficult to devise means for making up the loss. I look upon Great Britain as being not only the home of freedom, but as possessing the best fiscal policy possessed by any country in the world; and I find that recently, when a deputation of temperance people waited upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to ask for the removal of the tea duties, he politely but firmly declined to accede to their request, on the ground that if those duties were removed, the temperance people would not pay their fair share of taxation. They do not drink spirits, neither do they smoke tobacco, and if they were relieved of the duties on tea, they would practically contribute nothing to the revenue. For that reason, among others, I am opposed to prohibition coming into force, and I doubt if a plebiscite is likely to be a success. I hope for failure for it, at any rate.

Referring again to the school question, the member for Kent, N.B. (Mr. McInerney), said before six o'clock that he was still not satisfied that the French Canadians were favourable to the present Government. It amazed me to hear any member of this House expressing such an opinion in the face of the enormous majority obtained by the present Government in the general elections in the province of Quebec, and in the face of the results of the elections which have since taken place. Would it be necessary, in order to convince the hon. gentleman, that one should rise from the dead?

Mr. MacPHERSON.

If so, I think less of the intelligence of that hon. gentleman than I did before. The hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) and the hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean), who have boldly announced their want of allegiance to their party and their leader on the subject of the school question have probably already realized the resemblance of the hon. leader of the Government to Shakspeare's description of Cardinal Wolsey:

Lofty and sour to them that loved him not,
But, to those men who sought him, sweet as summer.

Although I understand that the hon. member for East York is in no way connected with business, I appreciate his desire for the early production of the tariff. But the paralysis of trade to which he has referred is only of a temporary character. And it is better that in any changes or any tariff we may have, we should have permanence. Many people in this country, notwithstanding this temporary paralysis of trade, feel hopeful, simply because of the change brought about on the 23rd of June last. Although nine months have elapsed, reasonable men throughout the country wait patiently for the coming tariff changes, knowing that hasty legislation might result, as it so often did during the administration of previous Conservative Governments, in many errors that continually required correction and frequent changes which were injurious to the trade of the country and productive of great loss to both merchants and manufacturers. We want no hasty legislation, but expect and will get, righteous administration from the present Government, which will bring about good-will among all people, peace, plenty and prosperity throughout the country, and lead to a degree of happiness that we have not experienced in the past eighteen years, and thus make the people thankful for the result of the last election on the 23rd of June, 1896.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not intend to take part in this debate on the Address, because I find that lengthy debates on the Address lead to no very satisfactory conclusion, and besides the questions that are referred to in it are usually brought before the House later in a more tangible shape—in the form of Bills or resolutions—to be dealt with specially by the House, and on such occasions there is better opportunity to express one's views on these subjects. But there is one question that has apparently attracted the attention of those who have taken part in this debate, and as that question may not come before the House again in any other form, and as this may be the only opportunity afforded us to express our opinion upon it, I take this opportunity to do so, and shall confine the few remarks I propose to make to-night to that question alone. It has been discussed a good deal in this House and out of it, whether the Remedial Bill presented to the House by the late Government, or whether the settlement made by the Manitoba legislature is most favourable to the Roman Catholic Church. Well, as you know, Sir, we all paid a good deal of attention to the Remedial Bill during the first session of last year and became quite familiar with its contents—or, at least, we supposed we had—and I have no hesitation in saying that the evidence appears to me to be overwhelmingly in favour of the contention of the hon. leader of the Opposition that the Remedial Bill presented to the late Parliament at its last session was a measure more strongly calculated to answer the purposes of the Roman Catholic church and to establish a system of separate schools in Manitoba than the settlement made by the local legislature. I will go further and say that, in my opinion, there is a very wide difference between the two measures. As has been pointed out by the hon. leader of the Opposition in this debate, the peculiar feature of the Remedial Bill presented to the last Parliament was that it established a complete system of separate schools in this country. What are the clauses? I will just trespass upon the time of the House for only a few moments in reading the clauses as stated briefly by the hon. leader of the Opposition. He said:

The Remedial Bill proposed to constitute a separate school board of education for the province, to be composed of a number of persons, not exceeding nine, all Roman Catholics. This board was to have control of the separate schools, and, among other things, to select the books, maps and globes, to appoint a Roman Catholic speaking both French and English as superintendent of separate schools.

To select all the books, maps and globes to be used in the schools under its control; provided, however, that no book, map or globe other than books in history, morals or religion, shall be selected, unless such books, map or globe has been authorized for use either in high or public schools of the province of Manitoba, or is now, or hereafter shall be in use in any of the public or separate schools of any province of the Dominion, or books published in any country.

Other clauses gave most complete power to this separate school board to control the educational system of the Roman Catholics of Manitoba. It was true that the Bill was defective in one particular. It is true that it did not provide sufficient funds for the carrying out of this programme, but it is also true that the last clause of that Bill provided that further legislation might be enacted to carry out its provisions—not to restrict any of the clauses but in order to give the Government power, at a later date, to raise money from any source where money could be legally raised for the support and maintenance of these schools. It is clear to my mind, at any rate, that the Remedial Bill was one that gave more power for the establishment of a school system satisfactory to the Roman Catholic hierarchy than the Bill enacted by the local legislature.

There is a number of clauses in the Bill enacted by the local legislature of which I do not approve, and which I would most determinedly oppose, if that enactment had come before this Parliament. But, in the first place, it does not come before this Parliament, and, in the next place, it goes before the people of Manitoba, who, we have always contended, are the proper parties to enact this legislation. We have always contended that it was dangerous and unusual and unprecedented for this Parliament to attempt to enact school legislation when ample powers had been given to the province to do so, and when there is no province in this Dominion that would legislate unfairly against any portion of the people, or legislate to do them injury, but rather that they recognized that their duty was to legislate for the whole people, the majority as well as the minority. A settlement has been made of this question by the province of Manitoba. They have the power to do what they please in the matter. They could give ten times as much privileges to the minority in Manitoba if they saw fit to do so, and it would be largely their own business. They, at any rate, have settled the question. There are clauses in that Bill that, if I were there, or if the question came up here, I would oppose. There is the clause, for instance, compelling, in certain cases, the employment of a Roman Catholic teacher in a school, which means that a Protestant teacher may be dismissed from that school and a Roman Catholic put in his place, not because the Protestant teacher did not do his duty, but arbitrarily and unnecessarily. There are other clauses equally objectionable to which I shall not at length refer, because they do not come immediately before us for consideration. But we were told that when this legislation was passed in Manitoba, it was to be a final settlement, that we should never hear of it again, that the Parliament of Canada was to settle down to its legitimate measures of dealing with the important matters affecting the people of Canada, affecting the prosperity of the country and its future. I think the whole country would rejoice to believe that this matter was out of our way altogether. But, Sir, I never shared so very cordially such bright anticipations. I knew the history of our country in the past, and I was not so sure that the predictions that had been made by the Premier and other members of the Government would be verified. And to-day what do we see? We see the time of the Parliament of Canada for the first week taken up almost exclusively in the discussion of this question—not brought on by us—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. WALLACE. The hon. gentlemen may say "Oh, oh." I say that so far as those who think as I do on this question are concerned, I believe that this afternoon was the first time this session when any of us addressed the House on the subject. Therefore, it is that I say that the discussion has not been brought on and continued by those who think and act on this matter as I do. I have said that, remembering the history of our own country, I was not so sanguine as the Premier was that this question was settled now and for ever. Consider the history of our own province of Ontario. Hon. George Brown, the leader of the Liberal party in this province, and in the provinces of Canada was a gentleman who, during the whole of his political career had shown a most determined resistance to the principle of separate schools in Ontario. He had fought that question with great vigour and great success. I remember very well reading the speech he made in agreeing to the article of confederation which included the establishment of separate schools in Ontario. In explaining and defending his course in this respect he said: I have opposed the establishment of a separate school system in this country; I have fought against that in every hustings in Ontario. You ask me why I yield to the establishment of a separate school system in Ontario and to make it a part of the Confederation Act. In the first place, everybody must make some sacrifice in order to carry this great measure of confederation. But the important reason was the establishment of this separate school system, which, it was expected would not extend very much through the province of Ontario, was a final settlement of the question. The hierarchy of the province accepts this as a final settlement of the question and it will never come up to disturb us again, as the hierarchy will ask no more. For these reasons I have agreed to the proposition. This was the explanation given by Mr. Brown. But look at the subsequent history of Ontario. The Government of Sandfield Macdonald, himself a Roman Catholic, refused to give the hierarchy concessions and to extend the separate school system and make the law, as they said, more effective, say what George Brown had said—that this was a final settlement at confederation and that they had no right to propose to open up the question at all. He therefore refused, and he met with the determined opposition and was defeated at the next election largely through the influence of the church which opposed him because he refused to open up that question. In a short time, the present Sir Oliver Mowat became Prime Minister of Ontario. Session after session there were concessions made to the hierarchy. The separate school law was amended year after year, and was made to conform to the wishes of the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church in violation of the pledge that has been given, the open pledge that had been made that the terms allowed at confederation were to be accepted as a finality, which pledge induced Hon. George

Mr. WALLACE.

Brown to accept it and make it part of the Confederation Act. And to-day we find history repeating itself. After the Premier has told us, after the Ministers have told us that this question was settled for ever and would come up no more, after the legislation has been adopted in Manitoba and the provincial legislature prorogued, we find a gentleman coming out from Rome in connection with the matter. We are told that he comes out to settle domestic difficulties. But if we examine the matter we shall find that he comes not alone to settle domestic difficulties, if such there be, not alone as spiritual adviser of his people. If that were the role in which he came, those not of that faith would have no reason to interfere. But, does this gentleman come on any other mission? Let us take his own evidence on that point. But before I do that, let me remind the House of the fact that after that settlement had been made between the two Governments, after legislation had been promised by the legislature of Manitoba, which legislation has now become law, what do we find? We find delegation after delegation going away, what for? To seek the foot of the throne? To bring grievances to the attention of the head of the British Empire? No, but going to the Pope of Rome for assistance, advice, or instruction. The first to go was, I think, Abbe Froulx. The question was brought up last session, I think, and the Premier said that he had nothing to do in sending Abbe Froulx, and, of course, that statement was accepted. After him we find Mr. Drolet going, and after him, Mr. Russell, and after him the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) one of the members of the Government. We find them all stating that they go there as private citizens, for the good of their health merely to take a trip to Europe, to recuperate their exhausted energies, and fit them for the next meeting of Parliament. But the news comes out now that these men went there with one object in view—to see the Pope with regard to affairs which, I say, should never have been submitted to the arbitration or settlement to anybody outside British dominions. Our constitution provided ample powers for settling every question that comes before the Parliament or people of Canada. And, when they went to Rome for this purpose, they went to Rome violating the privileges which belong to the people as British subjects. And a member of the Government committing the Government and the people of Canada to a course which I, for one, will certainly not approve of, and which, I believe, will not be approved by the people of Canada. Now, the result of these missions is the presence of a delegate or ablegate—delegate I think they call him, Mgr. Merry del Val. He was interviewed in New York and this is what is reported of him:

The ablegate would not say why he regretted that action had been taken, or whether it was understood at Rome that nothing would be done by the legislature pending his arrival. The impression was conveyed that such action was regarded as discourteous, in view of his appointment, not that its legality was questioned.

Now, is not the position one for most serious consideration? We have here the legislature of Manitoba legislating on a political question entirely within their power when they choose to legislate upon it after coming to a settlement that is satisfactory to the Government of the Dominion which has powers under the constitution which we need not refer to, should the province refuse to act. It was a settlement fairly satisfactory to the Government of Canada, a settlement that was satisfactory to the people of Manitoba as represented by their legislature. Now a delegate from Rome is sent out here by the Pope, and what does he say? Why, he says substantially: You should not have settled this question, the legislature of Manitoba should have adjourned for a week, or for a month, when they heard I was coming, they should have suspended their business and waited from day to day until I arrived to settle this important question for them. If he does not mean that, Mr. Speaker, I do not know what he does mean. It is a case to which the history of Canada furnishes no parallel; and so far as I know the history of no British possession for hundreds of years furnishes no parallel to the position which was taken by this delegate coming to Canada to regulate, control, manage and dictate the course that the people of Manitoba should take in their own local affairs. Why, Mr. Speaker, we protested against the hierarchy in the province of Quebec interfering in the case of a sister province; we protested against this Dominion Parliament interfering with Manitoba, because we said the people of Manitoba are citizens of Canada, loyal and patriotic as ourselves, desirous of promoting the best interests of their country, and they will do nothing to injure the material interests and the moral interests of the province of Manitoba. This Parliament had the power, no doubt, to interfere; but we said it was unwise and injudicious to exercise that power which, under certain circumstances, we might exercise. Then, Sir, why did this delegate come to Canada? One after another of those ambassadors from Canada have spoken; the last one, the Solicitor General, I assume, unless I have evidence to the contrary, on behalf of the Dominion Government. At any rate, such was the statement of the Minister of Public Works last night. I did not hear him speak, but I have his speech before me, in which he says that he signed the petition to Rome as a member of the Government, not as a private citizen, not even as a member representing a constituency that might have authorized him to do so, but as a member of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, representing all classes and all portions of this Dominion. Here is what he says:

This document, I am not afraid to say, I am proud to say, has been signed by 45 of us. I say, as a member of this Government, that I signed it, and I am proud to say it.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He did not say he signed it as a member of the Government. Read it again.

Mr. WALLACE. I am going to read for the hon. gentleman's benefit, not my own:

I say as a member of this Government that I signed it, and I am proud to say so.

As a member of the Government, he signed it. Who authorized him, Mr. Speaker, to speak for this Parliament of Canada, for the people of Canada, in signing a document in which he says:

We, the undersigned members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness.

Well, at any rate, he says that he represents the member for Brant (Mr. Somerville) if he does not represent the member for West York (Mr. Wallace). He represents the Liberal party, but he does not represent me in the matter. Now, Sir, they complained of the conduct of the hierarchy in certain matters. But what did the Solicitor General tell us last night? He said that he did not object to interference by the hierarchy. He quoted a portion of the Address issued by the hierarchy in the province of Quebec. I will read the clause over again. This is what I most strongly object to, but which the present Government, represented by their Solicitor General, do not object to:

Therefore, my dearly beloved brethren, all Catholics shall abstain from giving their assistance or their votes to candidates who shall not bind themselves formally and solemnly to vote in Parliament in favour of legislation restoring to the Catholic minority of Manitoba the school rights guaranteed to them by the judgment of the Privy Council.

Mr. Speaker, during the session of a year ago, we protested with all the vigour we could against that mandement issued by the bishops, against their assumption of power to interfere with the electorate of this country. Now, I am not going to inquire as to whether the people object to this mandement, or whether the hon. gentlemen redeemed the pledges which they made. That is somewhat of a domestic matter that I am not going to interfere with at present; that can be settled in other ways. But that is what we protested against, it is what we understood the present Government then in Opposition protested against—the assumption of the hierarchy to dictate to a single elector in Canada how he should record his vote. They have their spiritual powers over the people, and no Protestant wishes to interfere with them in the exercise of any of their just rights, but we do protest in the strongest manner against their attempt to dictate to the electors, and to say how they shall vote on any political question, or for any member of Parliament. They have no right to attempt that dictation, or to threaten the people with all the powers of their church on refusal to obey them. But the Solicitor General does not object to this. He says :

Let it now be understood that, so far as I am concerned, I do not in the least object to the interference of the Roman Catholic clergy in elections.

This, then, was all right according to him. He did not go to Rome to object to their course in dictating to the people, because the Solicitor General says that course was all right. What more did he say :

But I hold that there are times when they not only have a right to interfere, but they should interfere ; and I am far from taking a position that this case was not one in which they should interfere.

He says here is a case in which the clergy have a right to interfere, they did interfere and there is no wrong done. Then what did he go to Rome for ? Was it to find fault with the clergy, as they say, or as the Minister of Public Works said yesterday afternoon, "To assert our freedom" ? Nothing of the kind. Here is the specific statement of the Solicitor General of Canada, not that he went to Rome to assert their freedom—because he says the Roman Catholic clergy have a right to interfere in certain cases, and this case was one of them. But what did he say further :

It would naturally be expected that the Liberal candidates who gave these pledges—

And he mentions himself as one who gave a pledge :

—would be placed on the same footing as their opponents, and that the two political parties would be allowed to fight out the issues then pending between them, without the intervention of the clergy. Was such the case ? No.

Then it resolved itself into a question of good faith as to whether the bishops carried out their part of the bargain. Surely that is not a matter in which the people of Canada are interested ; but that is only an excuse. But there is another matter. He wants this papal delegate to be brought out to Canada, not for the purpose of settling those domestic disputes, not for the purpose of reprimanding the bishops, because he assumed that the bishops did right. Then what for ? Why, to do what the delegate, on his arrival in Canada, expresses surprise about, namely, because the local legislature of Manitoba had had the audacity to go on and transact their business, to enact their laws, knowing that he was on the broad Atlantic coming over to settle it for them himself ; that is all. The

Mr. WALLACE.

Solicitor General said that question was not finally settled. Here are his words :

So far as I am concerned, I must say that I believe that the Manitoba minority will not, under it, get all that they ought to get, and all that they ought to contend for.

This was said yesterday, after the legislation had been passed, and passed with the concurrence of this Government. It was in strict accordance with the arrangement made between the two Governments. If that arrangement were made, if the matter was settled, why did we find the hon. Solicitor General stating as follows :—

So far as I am concerned, I must say that I believe that the minority will not under it get all that they ought to get and all that they ought to contend for. I say that now, because I cannot come to any other conclusion ; but I say, at the same time, that, while they do not get what they ought to have, and most certainly ought to contend for, it is utterly out of the question, under existing conditions, that in this House we should endeavour, by any means in our power, to give them more than they have at present.

In the future there will be more still, he indicates, showing the great danger which I have always anticipated, namely, that this is only considered an instalment. I will not say that the Government have not acted in good faith, believing that this would be a settlement ; but here is a member of the Government stating that he is not satisfied with the settlement and that he does not think the minority will rest under it, but at the same time he advises them to rest on their oars for the present. That is the position of affairs, as I gather it from his statement. I see in the "Globe" to-day a repetition of the statement made by the papal delegate in England, in New York, and yesterday in Montreal. What does he say ? He says :

I express regret, certainly ; but it would not be correct to say displeasure. You must understand that I have seen nothing of what has appeared about me. I believe there have been all sorts of rumours, but, naturally, I give no attention to them.

Then the reporter asked :

You understand that the school question is settled : that the Manitoba Government has accepted the arrangements suggested by the Hon. Mr. Laurier, and that the question may now be said to be removed from the political arena ?

In reply the delegate said :

Might there not be such a thing as an amendment ?

That is the point exactly. The session of the local legislature has been closed. But trails will be laid and arrangements completed for reopening the question at the next session, because the delegate already suggests that there might be such a thing as an amendment ; and will he not be able to use such influence as to induce the legislature of the Government of Manitoba to grant further concessions, to bring in some further amendments? I consider, Mr. Speaker, that the whole thing is wrong from beginning to end, that this gentleman has no right to come here in the capacity in which he has announced himself—not in the capacity in which we may imagine he has come—to settle this question, and he says the Manitoba legislature, as a matter of courtesy, might have waited until he arrived. He said further:

Well, all I said, and all I thought, was that the Manitoba legislature might have waited my arrival before proceeding to deal with the matter finally. Understand that I express no opinion as to the question itself.

We understand that. We do not know what position he may take on this question; but he comes here, according to his own statement, made in England, later in New York, and in Montreal yesterday, and considers that the Manitoba legislature should not have closed their business and gone home, but have adjourned from day to day, and hour to hour, until he arrived. Why? Was it to obtain knowledge in regard to their own affairs? They know their business much better than he would know it after six months or twelve months' residence. They know the people, and their wants and desires. They have consented to make concessions, which they say will satisfy the minority. I do not know whether they will do so or not, and I have nothing to do with that matter; but here we have interference by a papal delegate in local legislation by the people of Canada. The hierarchy in the province of Quebec attempted to interfere in the last election, and according to the accounts, they met with disaster, because we are told this settlement does not meet their approval. Then if it does not meet with their approval, if after the desperate conflict they waged they found themselves worsted in the end, I think we may fairly conclude that the people of Canada, who would not submit to the hierarchy here, will not submit to a delegate sent by the Pope of Rome for a similar purpose, to endeavour to intimidate them, to coerce them into adopting legislation which would be inimical to their interests and to which they are unalterably opposed. I will not occupy much more of the time of the House, but I thought it my duty to refer to this matter because no other opportunity might have been given. But before I resume my seat I will refer to another subject allied to this, and which is one of very considerable importance. There was a newspaper in the province of Quebec which I understand was an ardent supporter of the present Government. A mandement or command was issued forbidding the people reading that newspaper, forbidding the owners publishing it, forbidding printers, pressmen and reporters and all the staff from doing their ordinary day's work under pain of the terrors of the church to which they belonged. Why, Mr. Speaker, such a thing has never been known in a free country. Yet that condition was permitted, and the paper disappeared in one day. The order of the church had been given that this private property was to be destroyed, that the freedom of the people as regards reading this paper was to be taken away and that the men who were earning their livelihood by working on this journal were to be deprived of their rights. We were told that the people of Canada were too high-spirited, and too independent through their representatives in Parliament and in the Government to tolerate such a thing. But, Sir, it was done. These hon. gentlemen had a supporter of their own who was subjected to that, what I call an illegal act, and if it is not an illegal act under our present laws, then the Minister of Justice should at once prepare a Bill to make it illegal and to punish men who would be guilty of depriving other men of their freedom, of their political rights, and of their property. Apparently the power to punish such men for their wrong-doing has never been recognized. I would like to ask the Solicitor General, or any member of the Government who can speak with authority on the subject, whether the law of the land is at present able to reach wrong-doers of that description. If no reply can be given by them, I suppose there is no doubt that this Parliament is seized of the power to legislate on that matter. I say that we look to the Government to legislate in such a way as will prevent for all time to come, any man—I do not care how high an ecclesiastical dignitary he may be—from interfering with the freedom of the lowest of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada. In conclusion I wish to say, Sir, that I believe that the course a few of us took in this House during the last session was the one that the majority of the people of Canada approved of. The school question has been settled, not just exactly as we would wish, but approaching to it and on the lines of a refusal to establish separate schools in Manitoba. As to the National Policy of which we were strong advocates, why, I have been told that we have converted the members on the ministerial benches. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) who moved the Address said, that on the fiscal policy the differences between the two sides of the House will be theoretical and not practical. What does that mean? It means that they had a theory of free trade which they would not dream of putting into practice. The Prime Minister himself said, that they would adopt a policy that would bring prosperity to every town and to every part of the country, and that they would not interfere with existing industries. Why, Sir, when the Premier was speaking on this question I could imagine that the remarks came from the ex-Minister of Finance or from the leader of the Opposition. I say again that we who took the ground that the National Policy should prevail, and that no separate schools should be tolerated, took the ground approved of by the majority of the people of Canada, and I feel sure that both of these principles will obtain in the land before many days have passed.

Mr. CASEY. The late Sir John Macdonald said on one occasion about a former leader of the Liberal party who had gone a certain distance towards reconciliation and had afterwards come out very strongly on his former lines, that after all, what that leader of the Liberal party said, was the "old Brown stuff." We have seen for a year or more the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) sailing under somewhat different colours from those which he once hoisted. During the session of last winter he was sailing under the colours of independence, but to-night he has come out in his true colours, and it is the old yellow stuff after all. He has done the Orange part of the talking while my hon. friend from Kent (Mr. McInerney) has done that share of the talking which wears the opposite colour. The result of the caucus of this forenoon is evident. The party is reunited; they intend to do in the future as they have done in the past, and to continue riding the old rocking-horse with a head at each end; one head where the tail usually is, and another where the head ought to be. This animal will be teetering up and down with a graceful ease of motion, and it will appear to those opposite one end of it that it is making progress towards Rome, while the other end will appear to be cantering towards Derry. That has long been the policy of that often disrupted and often united party, and I am not surprised to see the old rocking-horse to the front again.

My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) has certainly not done credit to that intelligence which he showed in previous sessions when dealing with this question of the Manitoba schools. He undoubtedly did develop a great talent for independent consideration of that subject, and he went so far as to ostensibly break with his leader. It was not long after the elections, however, until we found him up in North Grey, riding the old horse again, and saying that the Protestants of Ontario must be united to keep down French domination in the person of the leader of the Liberal party. We find him to-night talking on the same lines. He has done violence to his own convictions, by charging the Liberal party with all the sins of the leader with whom he is reunited and whom he now so loyally follows. We have heard him speak of the mandement issued by the bishops, and about the ban that was put on certain newspapers in the province of Quebec, all mixed up with the question of the papal delegate, until one would think that these were the sins of the Liberal party. But, we all know that these things of which the member for West York complains were done at the instigation of his leader, and for the benefit of the party to which he belongs. Yet, this independent member for an independent constituency, who received many non-Conservative votes on the ground of his independence, now supports that leader whose actions he so utterly condemns. I say, Sir, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) has gone back—and I use the words in their purely parliamentary sense—he has gone back to his wallowing in the old mire of partyism, and has no longer a right to the title of an independent member.

Now, the hon. member (Mr. Wallace) pretends to not be convinced, as my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) pretends to not be convinced, that the petition sent to Rome was a personal petition against personal grievances, and they both wish to hold the Government responsible for it. They talk about the Seven Hills of Rome, and about going to Rome instead of going to the foot of the Throne, in a manner that would do pretty well perhaps in an Orange lodge, but which will not do for the floor of this House because here we are at least men of the world. We know perfectly well, that there is no foundation for the assertion, that the evils complained of in this petition can be removed in any other way than by the exercise of the authority of the head of the Roman Catholic Church.

The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) says the constitution provides ample power to remedy all evils of this kind, and that this sort of thing which is complained of should be made a crime, and so on. Does he not know very well that the sort of thing complained of in this petition is something that cannot be reached by any law of the land? Can the Queen or the British constitution or the Canadian House of Commons, or an Orange lodge, or any other civil power, compel a priest to give absolution to a man to whom he declares it cannot be given? Can the Queen, the Lords and Commons, and all the other powers of the state combined, compel a bishop or a priest to give the sacrament to an individual, or a class of people, to whom they have refused it? I tell you, no; and the hon. member knows it as well as I do. However we may differ with the Church of Rome, however we may complain of it for some of its actions, if we were inclined to do so, we must admit, as reasonable men, that the only means of enforcing order and discipline in that church, or of settling differences between the clergy and the laity, rests with the Pope of Rome and his advisers. There is no other tribunal to which Catholics who feel aggrieved in regard to any question of church discipline can appeal.

I think the production of that petition last night by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was the very best thing that has been done during this debate. It has knocked the bottom utterly and for ever out of the shallow pretense that the Government of Canada had sent to Rome for a papal delegate to come to Canada to assist them to settle the school question. I need not read to you the terms of that petition in full. You heard it last night, and you will probably have cause to remember it, if this question lives in history. The signers of that petition, describing themselves as senators and members of Parliament, as they were, and as Catholics, as they were, proceed to set forth that twenty years ago His Holiness Pius IX. had deemed it his duty to put a stop to certain abuses of a similar character to those now complained of, and forbade the intervention of the clergy in politics. Then they say :

This prohibition was generally respected so long as His Eminence Cardinal Taschereau was able to guide the church in Canada, but since old age and infirmities have paralyzed his guiding hand, the abuses to which Your Illustrious Predecessor had put a stop, have begun again, and threaten once more to create trouble among us and to compromise not only Catholic interests in this country, but the peace and harmony which should exist between the various elements of our population.

This is the complaint of the petitioners. Their prayer is that a similar course may be taken to that which was taken in 1877. There is not a word in the petition from beginning to end about the school question. There is not a hint that they expect the delegate to favour one party more than the other. They want him to come out to settle this question of church discipline, just as a delegate might be sent from the ruling body of the Episcopalians, the Presbyterians, the Baptists, or the Methodists to settle a question of discipline in any of these churches.

Now that I am on the much-vexed question of separate schools, I may as well, perhaps, finish what I have to say about it. While listening, rather carelessly I admit, to the speech of my hon. friend from Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) this afternoon, I heard him say something about some individual who had pledged himself to support the Catholic Church and remedial legislation, and who had gone back on that pledge in consequence of not having received the support of that church. I remarked to my friend beside me, "Is he pitching into the leader of the Opposition?" "No," he said, "he means the Solicitor General." "Oh," I said, "I thought he meant the other individual," because certain words which I had heard from the leader of the Opposition at the opening of the debate were still fresh in my memory. The hon. member for West York was not aware that the re-opening of this question came from that side of the House, or that his leader, on the first day of the debate, spoke to this effect :

Whatever means were taken, the hon. gentleman knows that the support for which I had a right to look, both from a public standpoint and upon the question of principle, from the province of Quebec, I did not receive.

Still further, he said :

At very great risk as a public man, I went forward to vindicate what I believed to be demanded in common justice by the minority under the constitution, and I was defeated, and defeated by the votes of the Roman Catholic electors of the province of Quebec.

What follows ?

No person will be more delighted to find this question removed from Parliament for once and for ever. I am glad that the responsibility no longer rests on my shoulders, and freed from the responsibility of Government, while my views remain unchanged and my personal opinions will be always maintained, I shall not feel it in the future, as in the past, incumbent on me to make those exertions that I did make in defending rights, the protection of which under the constitution now rests upon the shoulders of the hon. gentleman who sits opposite.

It was the leader of the Opposition who told this House that because the Catholics did not support him in the last election, he washed his hands of this whole affair of remedial legislation.

The responsibility rested on the shoulders of the Government, and yet the hon. gentleman was not content to leave the question in peace. He said that on the grounds of race and religion he had hoped to get the support of the people of Quebec, and yet he did not get it. Was it because he failed to make appeals to race and religion? Did he not declare on the floor of this House that the present Premier was a traitor to his race and his religion? Did he not reiterate that statement and insist on having it reiterated in his organs in the province of Quebec? Why did not the people of Quebec take him at his word, and call one man a traitor and the other man their friend? Because they did not believe in the leader of the Opposition; because they did not believe in his honesty or integrity of purpose. They supported the man who is believed in all quarters except the most prejudiced to have done more than could have been done by any other man to settle this school question.

I again call attention to that paragraph in the petition which states that there had been no interference in elections in Quebec since the visit of the late Bishop Conroy until the time of the late elections. Whatever action may have been taken by the bishops, and however justly it may be complained of by those parties acquainted with the facts, that action was taken at the instigation of the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition. It was not the habitude of the bishops to act in this manner; it was something unexpected on their part. I hope it may be only a passing aberration from their ordinary custom. I am inclined to believe that their whole conduct complained of is nothing but a case of infectious Tupperism. I say infectious Tupperism, because we know that the bad habits of dictation, of bull-doing—as we used to call it in the old days, when parliamentary language was freer than it is to-day—are contagious. I am sure that the bishops of Quebec, those of them who have erred in this matter, have caught the contagion from the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) and I hope that when the contamination is removed they may return to a sounder state of mind on the subject.

Now, my hon. friend from Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) gave us a good many occasions for reply, but I have not the time to follow his speech in detail. For example, he made a great point about the election in Wright. He said that Mr. Devlin had resigned because he could not support the present leader of the Government. Now, it happens that Mr. Devlin himself, and the leader of the Government, who are the parties best acquainted with the facts, have both given that statement a straightforward denial. My hon. friend from Kent finds himself, with regard to that charge, in the same position as he found himself in with regard to other charges he made, that of having to retract them. He blundered into a great many charges and retracted them all. It is a good thing for an Irishman that he can speak twice, but it is not in the nature of an Irishman to make charges which have no foundation in fact. Did it not occur to him, when discussing the election in Wright, that the fact that Mr. Devlin had opposed his leader on the Remedial Bill may have had something to do with the increased majority which his successor obtained in that riding? My hon. friend said he could not account for the fact that the county of Wright was carried by a larger majority now than in June last, except in a way to which I shall shortly refer. He should remember that Mr. Devlin felt himself conscientiously bound to oppose his leader on that question. Mr. Devlin went back and was re-elected, no doubt; but when the constituency was re-opened and a new candidate presented himself, who was in thorough sympathy with his leader on that question, he was elected by a majority more than twice as great as that which Mr. Devlin had in the French and Catholic county of Wright. My hon. friend found another explanation of this great majority. He said it was due to the fact that the entire electorate of Hull were employed on the burnt building of the western block. I am very much surprised that in his eagerness to make charges, he did not imply that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) had put a torch to that building and set it on fire just on purpose to employ the electors of the county of Wright there. There would be about as much foundation for that charge as for the others he made in his address.

There was one other choice accusation which I am not in a position to deny of my own personal knowledge, but which I will leave the House to estimate at its true worth. He told us that when the Government, as he incorrectly said, sent the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) to Rome, they bought the support of Lord Russell the Chief Justice of England by appointing his son the solicitor for Canada in England. I do not believe that half the House noticed that statement of the hon. gentleman, and I beg to call their special attention to it as a curiosity, and leave it to the House to decide what value to attach to it.

I do not propose to take up any further time commenting on the remarks of these hon. gentlemen. I have reversed the procedure of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. I have had to take the debatable matters up first, and now propose to say a few words on subjects as to which we are probably more generally in accord. It is impossible to speak on this Address without saying something about our Queen and Her reign and the Jubilee which is to celebrate that wonderful reign. Of the Queen herself no one can speak too highly. It is hard to say in which capacity most could be said about Her—whether as the Queen, the leader of society, the practical introducer of a new epoch, or as the woman. During her long reign progress has made greater strides than during any previous reign, no matter how short. Her reign has been the longest on record, and during the Victorian era have been witnessed practically all the developments and advancements that are claimed as belonging to the nineteenth century. The reign of Her Majesty has not only brought the British Empire to what is perhaps its culminating point, but has wielded a moulding force on the destinies of the world at large, which has not been exceeded in the world's history.

As to the loyalty of Canadians towards our Queen and the mother country, little indeed need be said. Our loyalty is composed of several component parts. There is the pride that we have in our historical heritage as Britons, there is the admiration we feel for the present occupant of the Throne, and there is besides that element of chivalry and romance with which we, at a distance, look upon everything connected with the older land. It is probably that distance from the scene which prevents any of that friction that appears to exist in British politics from extending to our shores, which makes the loyalty of the colonies generally more romantic than that of any class within the British Isles themselves. I am happy to hear that loyalty voiced by our fellow citizens of French extraction, in spite of the efforts made by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk), the other evening, to make us believe that French Canadians were a disloyal people, un-British in their sentiments.

Mr. MONK. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I do not remember saying that at all. I simply quoted the utterances of some of the Liberal papers.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman read extracts from a large number of newspapers which, he said, represented the sentiments of the people of Quebec, and tried to create the impression—as he undoubtedly did on many members who do not know the French Canadians—that there was a strong vein of disloyalty to British institutions existing among that people. In spite of his efforts to malign those fellow-citizens of ours, we feel that their pulse beats in union with ours in this affection for the motherland. Why should there not be unity in this respect? Why should not our friends of direct Norman and Breton extraction feel sympathy and unity with their kindred who have come to Canada through the British Isles? Is it not from Normandy that the proudest families of Britain claim their descent? Is it not well known that the people of Brittany are one in blood with the Celtic population of the British Islands? Why should not the Normans and Celts who talk French, in Canada, feel a community of sentiment and interest with the Normans and Celts who talk English in Canada. I do not see why that unity should not exist. I believe that the state of things which has lately been inaugurated will do more to promote that unity than anything that has ever taken place. When we consider the attitude of that population under the intense strain that was put upon them during the late election, do we not see the old British qualities cropping out, the qualities that we are too apt to claim as being purely British? Do we not see that instinct for individual liberty, that resistance to dictation which John Bull is too apt to claim as his alone? We are proud to recognize in these related races the related qualities.

We have had a good deal of discussion about the celebration of the jubilee. The Government have not yet told us how we are to be represented on that occasion. I hope we shall be represented on a scale commensurate with our importance. I do not believe that it will pay to save a little expense if thereby we are going to lose any of the éclat of the occasion as a people. A suggestion was made to me by the by, the other day, that has apparently been made to others in the House, by a good friend of mine in London, Ont., a gentleman well known to many members of this House. He thought that one of the best contributions that we could make to the military pageant would be to send a strong detachment of our North-west Mounted Police. I would commend this suggestion to the only Minister (Mr. Sifton) whom I see present, at the moment, as worthy of consideration by himself and his colleagues. My friend pointed out that nothing could be more reassuring to the intending settler, the man not accustomed to go far from home, than to see a magnificent body of men mounted on magnificent chargers, and to be told that these were not regular soldiers, not even volunteers, but the ordinary police of the country who guarded the settlers from Indians, Yankee whisky traders, and that sort of cattle.

We in Canada hope to have a celebration of our own. We have not only a jubilee occasion but we believe we have a jubilee Government, one that has the qualities in it required for a celebration of this kind. It has not reigned for sixty years, but we do not know what may come to pass—some of them are young men yet. One member of the Government reigned for twenty years in his native province, and he seems quite capable of putting in fifteen or twenty years more in the Dominion Government.

There is in the minds of the people in Canada a turning towards the production of new wealth out of the ground in various ways. Capital exists in plenty in the country, the outlet alone has been wanting, and this has produced hard times. Manufacturing, under the hot-house system to which it has been subjected, has been overdone. Farming has been overtaxed. Lumbering has been as fully developed, perhaps, as there is room for. There remains the production of new wealth by mining, boring for oil, and other methods of that sort. A large area of our country ought to be further developed by the construction of railways. I do not wish to din too many suggestions into the ears of the Ministers. no doubt they hear a great deal on this question every day. But I would urge upon them that in the matter of railway development and affording facilities for opening up the mineral wealth of the country in all directions, they may find generosity to be the true economy. It may be that they will find an example by reversing that of Pharaoh—they may find that considerable expenditure in the lean years may hasten the return of the fat years. At all events, I beg to offer my own personal opinion that it is not an improper governmental function to tax posterity a little, if necessary, to put money in circulation at a period when times are hard, and when a small expenditure of public money may lead to a large development of national wealth.

In the years when the National Policy was first in existence and was producing, not protection, but a very large revenue, we were too extravagant in expenditures of this kind; we threw away our wealth as though it were never coming to an end, and, perhaps, contributed unduly to inflate the good times then existing. But now, without rushing to such extremes, I believe that a very generous expenditure on objects of that kind will add greatly to the population, wealth and prosperity of the country. I have every confidence in the men who rule the great spending departments, and I believe they will look upon all suggestions of this kind, as they are considered in detail with a friendly eye.

I have alluded, in passing, to the mining prospects of this country. I do not want to say too much on that point for fear I may be told that I am merely a mining boomster. But I do believe that it is our duty as legislators to impress upon the people of this country that we have a vast heritage of that kind. Now that there has been a change in the ruling powers of this country, now that the dark cloud which hung over us so long has passed, people are beginning to take a brighter view. It is possible to make people believe there are good mines and good lands, and everything good in Canada, and I do not believe that by encouraging that opinion by every rational expenditure, we are running any great risk of inducing an unfounded boom in mining matters. Mining is an industry which very soon finds out whether there is anything to support it or not. People do not buy mines and hold them indefinitely for a rise in price, but they seek to find out as soon as possible if there is anything in them, and if not they pass to somewhere else, and if there is, it is an addition to the wealth of the country. I think that investment in mining is as legitimate as in manufacturing, farming or other things in which capital is now largely employed. I hope to see, in the near future, Canada recognized by the nations of the world as being, what I believe she is, the richest mineral country on the face of the earth.

I think that I may say without violating confidence, that I had private intimation some months ago of the report of a very distinguished European expert who was sent to British Columbia to report on what he saw there for the benefit of European investors, and he informed the person through whom I got the information that when he went home he was going to report to those who sent him that all the fabulous things he had ever read of in fiction were surpassed and outdone by what he found actually to exist in the mining districts of British Columbia alone. We all know that it is not our only mining field, we have plenty more. But I believe it will be found that the precious metals, the iron and copper which exist at the boundary line in British Columbia, which exist in the Cariboo, in the Slocan, and at the extreme northern boundary of British Columbia on the Yukon River, extend all the way between those points also, and that we have a strip of mineralized territory there equal in extent to all the other mining districts of the world, and not inferior perhaps in the richness of its minerals. I hope that this golden era will be fully developed under the auspices of the golden Government which now rules the destinies of Canada; and I hope that not only those who believe in that Government and its golden principles, and in its golden future, but those who are opposed to them, will share in the great prosperity which will be brought about by their exertions.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I had not expected to take part in this debate, but the discussion has taken a turn that I did not anticipate until I heard the speech of the hon. the Minister of Public Works last night. I confess that I admire the frank and fearless manner in which he handled the question, and in which he discussed the trouble primarily created for him by the member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), and subsequently created for him by my hon. friend the member for St. Anne's Division of Montreal (Mr. Quinn). Now, reverting to this so-called mission or excursion to Rome, it seems to me that those of Her Majesty's subjects who happen to be Roman Catholics, retain all their spiritual rights when they exercise their civil rights in this Parliament, or as members of a government. Among the spiritual rights that these gentlemen have is the right to appeal to the head of their church against interference with those same spiritual rights. Such an appeal is not a civil matter. It is not, I hold, within the province of this Parliament to say to any member or to any Minister who may be a Roman Catholic that he has no right to carry his spiritual grievance to the head of his church at Rome. So long as our political troubles are settled here in Ottawa, I care not where the spiritual troubles of my Roman Catholic friends are settled. I certainly think that it was time they appealed, even if their hope was that their appeal might interfere with the use of hell and damnation as campaign arguments on behalf of certain so-called Conservative candidates in the province of Quebec. I am firmly of the opinion that no man, no religious authority seated anywhere on top of this God's earth, has a right to interfere in the politics of this country. If this Government had made the Pope a party to this Manitoba school settlement, I would have opposed the Government and voted to condemn that Government. If this Parliament proposed to ask the mediation of the Pope, it goes without saying that I would protest against such a proposition to the utmost of my power. But I am not going to vote, supposing that it came to a division, in favour of the false doctrine that this Parliament has anything whatever to do with any of its members in connection with their church affairs, even if the members are in charge of the business of this country. Just now let me say a word in connection with the paragraph in the Address that refers more particularly to the school settlement. I do so because this morning I happened to receive a copy of the Manitoba School Bill, which, as I see by the papers to-night, has been assented to by the Lieutenant-Governor of that province. I was much interested in it, and read it carefully. With regard to this so-called Manitoba school settlement. I come, so to speak, from the walls of Derry to protest against it. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have spoken against this settlement, come, so to speak, from the gates of Rome. They have objections to the settlement and so have I. They object to it because it does not go far enough, and I object to it because it goes too far. The opinion of those members on this side who oppose this settlement establishes a sort of cross roads where extremes, or shall I say extremists meet, and both march forward shoulder to shoulder against a settlement that is objectionable to both. I have no hesitation in saying that this so-called settlement, arrangement, adjustment, compromise, call it what you will, is unsatisfactory to me. I have read some of the clauses of the Bill that has been passed and assented to by the Lieutenant-Governor of Manitoba. I believe that no man or woman in Canada should be employed in, or excluded from, the public service on account of that man's or woman's religious belief; therefore, I object to the clause which provides that under certain circumstances teachers of a certain religious belief shall be employed. That clause is in direct conflict with my ideals of what is right and just. I object further to another clause. I think it is clause 10 in the Bill, which provides for the instruction of children in language other than English. I hold that it is unwise to perpetuate differences of language in this country. On this point also I find myself at war with this Manitoba school settlement. I cannot say that this settlement is in compliance with all the principles that I was sent here to uphold. But the question is this: What have I to do, what has this House to do, with the way that Manitoba chooses to deal with her own business? I was elected to protest against this Parliament's interference with Manitoba when Manitoba was doing right; and I hold that this Parliament has no right to interfere with Manitoba even when, in my opinion, she is doing wrong. It may be, as some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have suggested, as some of the newspapers in the province of Quebec have suggested, that the hon. the First Minister has not kept his promise to the people of Quebec. Well, I cannot see how this House is to be turned into a tribunal for the trial of a suit of breach of promise brought by the people of Quebec against the First Minister. If the people of Quebec have been deceived, the people of Quebec will sooner or later meet their deceivers at the polls; and in the meantime, if the statements of my hon. friend from Montreal are correct, that they know a good thing when they see it, they ought to be dead sure that they are not being deceived again. If the people of Quebec have any idea that the Conservatives of Ontario sympathize with this attempt to keep the Manitoba school question alive on the floor of active politics, they are deceived. The people of Quebec are deceived if they think the sympathies of Ontario Conservatives went out to their leaders who fought a losing fight in Bonaventure against the very principles of civil liberty. I speak for a constituency which has been Conservative since confederation, with one exception, and is Conservative still. I think there are thousands of Conservatives in Ontario who believe it is about time that the Conservative party dropped the Manitoba minority out of its affections, for sympathizing with minorities is a weakening disease. When the Conservative party first undertook to sympathize with the Manitoba minority and became affected with that sympathy, the party was strong and robust, even a giant in size. Now it is reduced to a shadow, a skeleton, through sympathizing with the minority and now it is a minority itself. I can tell the leader of the Opposition that the minority in this House can supply its leaders with a home market for all the sympathy they can raise and manufacture, and the same minority want a good deal of care and wisdom which has been wasted on the minority in Manitoba. If I had a vote in Manitoba I would raise my voice against this so-called settlement. This compromise strikes at two principles to which I owe allegiance, and if I had a seat in the Manitoba legislature I would vote against the settlement; but as my seat is in this House, I will try and attend to my own business. I do not approve of the manner in which the Manitoba school question has been buried; but the chief point about it is that it is dead. And it has not been buried on the instalment plan, as was suggested by one of the speakers in the House yesterday evening. The Conservative party, I hope, are not willing to become a party of political body-snatchers, wandering around the graveyard of parliamentary history seeking to resurrect old and buried quarrels. The Conservative party cannot take the Manitoba school question out of the graveyard in a hundred years, but the Manitoba school question can keep the Conservative party in that graveyard for more years than I want to see it stay there.

Mr. TALBOT. Mr. Speaker, in rising to address this honourable House for the first time, I cannot help but feel somewhat timid at the bold attempt I am about to make in using a language with which I do not consider myself sufficiently familiar. However, I trust my efforts will meet with the indulgence of English-speaking members as regards the numerous mistakes I may make in the use of a language which it is my ambition to speak more correctly. Many statements made on the floor of the House since the opening of the session have struck me most unfavourably. The principal argument that was used against the Liberals was that we assumed power under false pretenses. This argument leads me to go back during recent years to the constituencies as they were then and recall the different issues on which that great fight was fought. We Liberals of the province of Quebec, at least,—and I think it was so contended in all other parts of the Dominion—contended that the National Policy had not made the country prosperous. Not only did we present that view, but the same argument was used throughout the Dominion. We took parliamentary statistics and we proved that the National Policy had not increased the population of the Dominion in proportion to its indebtedness. We proved, moreover, that the National Policy had not made the great farming community any richer than it was when the policy was inaugurated. We proved, also, that the taxation imposed in order to maintain hot-house industries bore more heavily upon the consumers, upon the labouring community and particularly on the poorer classes than it did on the richer classes. We also proved from letters written and read in different countries throughout Europe that settlers, who had come to this country were not satisfied with the existing state of things, and that letters written by them to their friends abroad tended to prove that they were brought to this Dominion by false reports, and that present conditions were not what they expected to find. The verdict which was rendered on 23rd June last clearly proved that what we asserted at that time was correct. No one will pretend that the people could have been deceived on these matters, and that they would have accepted our arguments had they not been based on facts. On the other hand, what were the promises made by the Liberal party and its supporters? Our promises were that we would reform the tariff, that we would do something regarding the Superannuation Act, that we would abolish the Franchise Act and endeavour to administer the affairs of the country with more economy than had hitherto been exercised. I think the Speech from the Throne is ample proof that the Liberal party has decided to carry out the promises made to the electors at the last elections. Consequently, I am now able to say that those hon. gentlemen who have asserted that we assumed power under false pretenses have drawn largely on their imagination, and there is proof that our arguments against the former Administration were based on facts we have established and that we intend to carry out the promises made to the electors as shown by the Speech from the Throne. I think the assertion that we have assumed power under false pretenses falls flat in the face of these declarations. I am free to draw the conclusion from the speeches made by hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House that the principal attack was made on the French Liberal representatives from the province of Quebec. I infer from many of the speeches made, that the great grief of the Conservatives now is, that they were transferred from one side of the House to the other through the influence of the large Liberal representation from the province of Quebec. We have been taunted on many different grounds. The Conservatives have in the first place accused the Liberal Government of being composed of men who expect to keep power, or at least who expect to solve the problem of the school question, by sending, what they called, emissaries, missionaries, pilgrims, and so on to Rome. But these gentlemen of the Conservative party who so accuse us, seem to forget that the first pilgrims who went to Rome were not sent by us. It is most assuredly a fact that those who first went to Rome about the school question had nothing whatever to do with the Liberal party of Canada. I think there is one man whom we can charge the Conservative party with sending to Rome and that is the Hon. Senator Landry. I should like to know who sent Senator Landry to Rome? One would think that the interests of the Conservative party were well enough served at Rome by the different members of the episcopacy who remained there for months, without the necessity having arisen of sending over Senator Landry to re-inforce them, and to give strength to their assertion. We do not claim Senator Landry as one of us, and we have every right to surmise that when Senator Landry went to Rome he was sent there by some of the leaders of the Conservative party.

Now, Sir, during the last campaign throughout the province of Quebec, the ugly part of the fight was, as we pretended at the time and we still pretend, the intervention of some of our bishops and priests. We Roman Catholics found it very awkward to fight a double battle against the Conservatives and against the clergy. We could very easily resist the arguments of our political opponents, but when it came to take up arms, as it were, against those to whom we owe the greatest respect and admiration, we found it very unpleasant indeed. After all, Sir, have we not the right to accuse the leaders of the Conservative party of being the cause of this interference. Have we not seen in the newspapers since the last election, a declaration from the hon. the leader of the Opposition expressing his disappointment at the returns from the province of Quebec, and saying that he had been deceived by the figures which the hon. Senator Angers had given him. I have seen it stated in the papers, and it has not been contradicted, that he anticipated in the province of Quebec, through the influence of the bishops and the mandement, the large majority from that province which had been promised him by his confreres representing Quebec. As I say, Sir, we had to resist this interference of the clergy, and we resisted it in the best way we knew how. We have been taunted in regard to pledges which we made during last election in order to save ourselves, and in order to carry to a successful issue the fight we had undertaken. The hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) charged me with having signed, or with having made before the different churches in my county, solemn declarations that I would favour legislation restoring to the minority in Manitoba all their rights, and legislation which would be approved by the episcopacy of the province of Quebec. I have in my hand the declaration that I made, and which I did make at the time because I thought it was proper for me to do so. Here is the way I spoke before the electors of my county :

I solemnly declare that, if I am elected, I will favour any legislation based upon the judgment of the Privy Council.

That is the declaration I made and that is all the mandement asked me to make. I never added that I would favour legislation approved by the bishops of the province of Quebec, because I considered that if I could not come into this House as a man free from shackles and fetters, it was far better for me to stop at home and mind my farm. And more than that, Mr. Speaker, at the time that the clerical battle was raging against us in the province of Quebec, some of our friends in the city of Quebec proposed to issue a declaration signed by all the Liberal candidates, to send that declaration to the bishops, to have it endorsed by the bishop, and then to distribute it to all the priests of the province of Quebec. When this declaration was made to me I at once declared that I was against it, that I would sign nothing of the kind, that I was willing to stand by our political programme, and to fight the battle as free men ought to fight it. That is the stand I took, and although I am one of the youngest members, and although I was but a debutant in politics at the time, I can flatter myself that my opinion prevailed and that the declaration was not signed and that we did not consult anybody as regards our rights and our liberties. The hon. gentleman from Kent, N.B., (Mr. McInerney) stated this afternoon, that in the county of Bonaventure the Liberals declared that the Pope was with them on the school question. Well, Sir, I was in the county of Bonaventure for seventeen days, and I had the honour of speaking over twenty times before Protestant and Catholic audiences, and I never heard a statement of that kind made by any one of us. I did hear a statement of a somewhat similar kind made, but I heard it from the pulpit and in an entirely different connection, and I heard it applied to the Conservative party. The hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) was then in the county of Bonaventure fighting the battle for the Conservatives, and in his presence the curé of Paspebiac stated from the pulpit : That the Pope was against the Liberals and in favour of the Conservatives on this school question issue.

Now, Sir, to give another proof that I did not pledge myself to anything that would bind me down or deprive me of my liberty in this House, the fact is, that my own parish priest, a particular friend of my own, who had promised me and promised friends of mine to support my candidature, declared that he could not support me because he considered that the pledges I had given were not sufficient. This is another proof that I have not signed the pledge or made the promise before the different churches of my county that I have been charged with. I should certainly conclude from these declarations that a friendly priest would have been satisfied, and would have supported my candidature, as he had promised to do at the beginning. Now, I come to the county of Bonaventure, about which very much has been said. What did we see at the nomination at Caplan at the beginning of the campaign? The Conservative party was there represented by Sir A. P. Caron, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain), the hon. member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and Mr. Lawrence Stafford, who in the last election opposed the hon. member for Portneuf (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) ; and they are now surprised at the result of the election in Bonaventure. They say we also carried that country by false pretenses and false promises. But if you had seen the candidate whom they brought into the county to oppose our friend Mr. Guité, you would not have been surprised at the defeat they got. They brought there a man who was sick both in mind and body—a man who could not stand on the platform and explain to the people why he was there ; a man who fought in two elections under the standard of the Liberal party, and who, after that party went down in the last provincial campaign, thought proper to go over to the other side. The indignation of the people on nomination day proved to be so great that this brave man, this knight-errant, who has represented nearly all the counties of the province of Quebec, and who now represents Three Rivers, could not find a back door wide enough to get out of the county. You never saw a man skip over snow banks or climb over fences as quickly as he did. And now these gentlemen are surprised at the defeat they got in that county. They say that we told the people that if they did not vote for the Government, the Baie des Chaleurs Railway would stop running. I went through the length and breadth of that county twice, and was present at nearly all the meetings, and I never heard from our side a declaration of that kind. I have also heard a statement made in this House that the railway had been opened for the purpose of carrying our election; but we were told by the Minister of Railways to-day that the railroad was opened on the 1st of January, when the late Mr. Fauvel was in the full enjoyment of health. It was not until the latter end of February that his death took place. Consequently, that charge is utterly devoid of all truth and sincerity. We fought the battle in March, and the road had been opened on the 1st of January, when there was no idea of a Federal election at all.

Now, the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) has been in the county of Bonaventure before the recent campaign. He was there in 1894, when we had a provincial by-election. At that time he promised in three or four parishes of the county, to settle some seigniorial claims which the electors were very eager to see settled. He went down there and promised to settle these claims, in order to carry the county in the Conservative interest; but that promise was never realized. In the recent election, he took good care not to go back to any of these places, although the people expected him to come and tell them why he had not carried out the promise he had made to them. I am surprised to hear the hon. member making such attacks upon his fellow-members from the province of Quebec who are not of the same political opinions as himself. If he were present in the House, I would like to ask him why it is he is now a member of the House of Commons instead of being a Minister of the Crown in the province of Quebec? I would like to ask him if his presence here is a proof of the confidence of the other Ministers of the Crown in the province of Quebec in him? His ambitions were not satisfied. He had hopes at one time to be more than he is to-day; and finally when he found that these hopes could not be realized, he resigned his seat in the local House, and ran in Montmorency for the Federal House. It is true, he succeeded, but he was one of the few who survived in the last struggle. Now, to show how disinterested, how intelligent and how free the population of Bonaventure County is, I will give an instance of the way in which the recent battle was conducted in the interest of the Conservative party. In the Catholic electoral divisions the battle was left entirely in the hands of the priests. The only places where we could hear the supporters of the Conservative party were in Protestant electoral divisions. Elsewhere the priests fought the battle for them. In the pulpit, where we could not answer them, they made the most terrible charges against the Liberal Government in connection with the school settlement. They went so far as to say that the Liberal party would never complete the railway in the county of Bonaventure; and in one of these parishes, Paspebiac, where I was, I know positively that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron) spent the whole of a Saturday afternoon with the priest. On the Sunday following I heard from the pulpit the most terrible charge that was ever made from the pulpit against the Liberal party in regard to the settlement of the school question; and I have reason to infer that the words which the priest uttered in the pulpit were put in his mouth by the hon. member for Three Rivers. My reason for saying so is that, at the time, the hon. gentleman was sitting in a front pew of the church, wearing his eyeglass, and turning round now and again to the congregation, and grinning with satisfaction at the words which were so well said in favour of his party.

Now, I should like to ask the hon. member for St. Anne's Division of Montreal (Mr. Quinn) whether, in quoting from the London "Tablet," as the organ of Cardinal Vaughan, he meant to state that the article which he read was approved by the Cardinal or written under his dictation.

Mr. QUINN. My recollection of the statement which I made is that it was an article appearing in the London "Tablet," which is the organ of Cardinal Vaughan, and that the position it occupied in the church was such as to commend itself to the attention and even to the great consideration of the hon. Solicitor General on his arrival in London.

Mr. TALBOT. That is not exactly the answer which I was hoping to get, but I am satisfied with it, because I wish to say to the hon. gentleman that the article he read was written in Canada and sent over to England. It is an anonymous article, but supposed to have been written, and stated in the paper to have been written by a Canadian. The inference from the hon. gentleman's remarks was that it was authorized by the editor of the paper, whilst it appears to be simply an expression of the opinion of a Canadian.

Mr. QUINN. It is an editorial article.

Mr. TALBOT. I shall give the hon. gentleman proof that it is not so. We heard a good deal from the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) about the St. Boniface election, which, he argues, showed that the Catholic minority in Manitoba are not satisfied with the school settlement. When we consider that out of the 900 voters on the lists in St. Boniface less than 600 cast their votes, and when we take into account the strong pressure which was brought to bear on this election by the religious authorities in that district, have we not every reason to suppose that if the electors had been left free to cast their votes as they chose. The remaining 300 would have voted for the Liberal candidate.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. They could hardly have done that, because quite a number were dead.

Mr. TALBOT. Over 300 did not vote, and they were not all dead.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. There were as many votes cast in that election as in the previous one. Of course, there is always a certain number in every election who abstain from voting, and it is not on record that on any occasion all the voters on the lists have voted. Nor were there 900 voters on the list either.

Mr. TALBOT. There were 900 voters on the lists which it was supposed would be cast in that election, and the Conservative press boasted that at least 600 of these would be given to the Conservative candidate, as a protest against the school settlement, whereas only 596 voted altogether. If it had not been for the strong influence brought to bear upon the electorate, I do not think there can be any reasonable doubt that those who did not vote abstained from voting because of that influence, and would have voted in favour of the Liberal candidate had they been free. The hon. gentleman went further and declared that both Mr. Lauzon and Mr. Bertrand were on the same platform. Well, I find in the Winnipeg "Daily Review," of Friday, March 26th, that all the Catholics who voted in favour of Mr. Bertrand had to obtain a paper from their archbishop before they could receive the sacraments of their church, and this paper reads as follows :

M..... regrets the past, and is well disposed to take the advice of his archbishop in circumstances where the Catholic conscience is concerned. Any priest can hear him in confession.

ADELARD, O.M.I,

Arch. of St. Boniface.

Unless those who voted in favour of Mr. Bertrand obtained a paper of that kind they could not receive the sacraments of their church, and furthermore were threatened by the archbishop himself with being deprived of Christian burial in consecrated ground.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. No such declaration was ever made by the archbishop that anybody who did not vote according to his advice would be deprived of Christian burial.

Mr. TALBOT. The statement was published in the papers and never denied, and we have the authority of a reporter, who said that the archbishop of St. Boniface did not deny it. At any rate, we have here the proof that when the hon. member for Provencher said that Mr. Lauzon and Mr. Bertrand stood on the same platform, he was incorrect, because those who voted for Mr. Bertrand had to sign a paper of regret and receive an acknowledgment of such admission by the bishop before they would be allowed to participate in the sacraments of their church.

Now, it appears that we French Catholic members of the province of Quebec stand in a very peculiar light in this House, considering the pledges which we made and which we did not carry out. I can say for myself, that before I came to this House this session, I visited my county throughout its whole length. Out of thirteen parishes I visited twelve, and I addressed three large meetings. At these meetings I spoke of this school settlement, and received the unanimous approval of my constituents of the stand which I am now taking and which I have been taking on this very question. And I therefore feel warranted in saying that if I have obtained the approval of my county in this matter, any other member for the province of Quebec would receive the same approval under similar circumstances. Some hon. gentlemen find it strange that we should have to sign these pledges. I find it much more strange that those who did sign pledges such as have been read to the House were met with the bitterest opposition. We have, for instance, Dr. Vaillantcourt, who was the Liberal candidate in Dorchester. Dr. Vaillantcourt was made to sign a pledge of that kind and, though an election by acclamation had been promised him, he was surprised on the day of nomination to find an opponent nominated, and that opponent eventually defeated him. We have the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Godbout) who, we are told, signed a pledge of that kind. He also met with the bitterest opposition though he had every right to expect after signing that pledge that at least there would be neutrality on the part of the clergy of his county. We have also the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Angers) who had exactly a similar experience. But there is another point. In the mandement of last summer, the bishops made an appeal to the liberal-minded, right-thinking Protestants. And yet we find that the hon. member for Portneuf (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbiniere) met with the bitterest opposition of his county in the person of Mr. Stafford on the ground that he was a Protestant. The hon. member for Portneuf stands today in the province of Quebec as the most liberal-minded of men. In his county of Lotbiniere we find in every parish proofs of his liberality and benevolence to religious institutions, that is, to Catholic institutions, for there are no others in the county. I think that under the circumstances he should certainly have been understood to be one of the fair-minded Protestants referred to in the mandement.

Now we have heard a good deal about dismissals, emissaries, and spies. During the late election every man who took a share in the campaign must remember perfectly well—at any rate I speak with certainty of my own district—that emissaries were sent to different parishes where there were relations of employees to find out what were the political leanings of these relatives; and, in every instance, where it was found that they were Liberals they were threatened that if they voted Liberal, their relatives who were employed by the Government would be dismissed. In my own county several electors were prevented from casting votes for me and did not vote at all, because they were afraid that they would suffer through some members of their families, who, unfortunately, happened to be employed by the Government at the time. Under the circumstances as I know them to be, I think it is not at all just to find fault with the members of the Cabinet in reference to dismissals. For my part, I went pretty far with the hon. the Minister of Railways. I wanted to get dismissals, but he would not meet my wishes. I held inquiries and proved that certain gentlemen had been offensive partisans. But, in spite of the proof I made, I found that the hon. the Minister of Railways was very reluctant to dismiss, and in fact in three cases he refused to grant me the dismissal. I think that this is ample proof that this Ministry has not been tyrannical in the changes that have been made among office-holders since they came into power. Before I take my seat I wish to make a declaration and I think that in doing so I am an echo of what is thought by the French Liberals of Quebec. In the position we took in the last campaign upon the school question we unfurled to the breeze of peace and harmony the broad standard of unity and good fellowship, which will cover with its ample folds all men of good-will. We planted that standard on the rock of strong logic and reason, against which the storm of passion will blow in vain and the waves of sectional prejudice and narrow-mindedness will fruitlessly exhaust their fury. We are proud of what we have done, as we feel that we have helped to destroy many prejudices which existed not only in the province of Ontario but in all the other provinces, the majority of whose people profess a different religion from ours.

Mr. CLANCY. In case hon. gentlemen on either side should fear that I intend to inflict a long speech upon the House, let me give at once the assurance that I shall speak only for a few moments, and, probably, upon one question only. Having made that statement I may be excused from paying attention to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who just sat down, notwithstanding what he said in closing. He has told the House that the Ministers have adopted a policy against dismissals since coming into power. He stated that he brought evidence against certain officers. He was the accuser, he was the witness. And, notwithstanding this the Minister refused to dismiss in three cases. The House must conclude that the Minister did not believe him. I may be excused if I agree with the Minister, and, therefore, would hardly be justified in taking the time of the House in replying. As a new member of the House I have witnessed to-night a scene that is most unusual. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has given the clergy of Quebec a rather doubtful character. I fancy that when his remarks are read in the newspapers the people from one end of Canada to the other who have little information of the state of things in the province of Quebec will be puzzled to know whether the statements of the hon. gentleman are true or not. If his statements are true the charge is a very serious one for the clergy, and if they are not true, it is a most serious thing for any hon. gentleman to make such a charge in this House. He has given a certificate of character to the clergy which, if true, is perfectly disgraceful.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I hope that when I get through I shall have his approval as I have at this moment. I take it from that "hear, hear," that he holds the statement to be true in details. I take it as a complete endorsement of the remarks made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot). That hon. gentleman said that he had made a pledge upon his honour as a man to his constituents. He felt some pride in not having made that statement to the clergy of the province of Quebec. But he did make the pledge that he would support the claims of the minority in the province of Manitoba upon the lines of the constitution. Now, my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) says "hear, hear." I asked the First Minister if this statement to which he has assented, by implication, at least, by putting it into the mouth of the representative of Her Majesty—I ask him: Is that in essence, in truth, stripping it of all technicalities that may surround it, a fair fulfilment of a promise of that kind? Perhaps my hon. friend will say, Hear, hear. I shall not now enter into a discussion of separate schools, whether it was wise or not to ingraft them upon the constitution, or whether it would be a proper thing to agitate in the future for an amendment to the constitution wiping away all such guarantees. That question is not before the House. But I wish to say that whatever opinion may be held on the question; whatever might have been present in the minds of the framers of the constitution, that provision was passed in open daylight, it was discussed in this House, it was not surreptitiously carried through the House. Let me ask what led up to this. Hon. gentlemen have said that it was the Conservative party that gave rise, to some extent, to this unpleasant agitation in the country. Now, Sir, was it or was it not the Liberal party who first introduced legislation in violation, in defiance, of the constitution? Was it not a section of the Liberal party who did that? What was the attitude of the hon. gentlemen opposite? Just so long as the Government were led by the Conservative party they were either silent or they were condemning the Conservative party for not taking a more active course for the purpose of doing away with what they said was a violation of the rights of the minority. They were very outspoken at that time. They declared that the Conservative party should have disallowed that Bill. The First Minister was last session asked this question: Would you approve of the disallowance of that Bill; do you think it would have been a proper thing to do? What was the hon. gentleman's answer? Why, he said that was a doctrine of the Conservative party. I ask hon. gentlemen if that is a fair argument. He was pinned to one thing or the other, it was either right or wrong to disallow that Bill. The hon. gentleman knew well what the conclusion of that argument would have been; he knew that it would have been a complete vindication of the course of the Conservative party. Well, we have had examples of the results of disallowance before. There was the case of the Streams Bill passed by the Ontario legislature. Every time the Bill was disallowed it was re-enacted; and every time this Manitoba legislation was disallowed it would have been re-enacted. An unseemly agitation would have arisen, and I am not sure but what the people of Manitoba might have fairly complained if you had swept away from that province a school system suited to their wants. I say hon. gentlemen have been inconsistent from first to last. If they were in power they surely would not have disallowed that Bill. Now, let me go further. During the time that the Conservative party was in power, when some action was taken because a strong pressure was brought to bear upon them, a pressure even enforced by hon. gentlemen opposite, what took place? Why, Sir, we had the unseemly spectacle of one of the Ministers of Mr. Greenway coming down and taking part in the Haldimand election, when a member of the Conservative Government went back for re-election. Was there ever in Canada a more unseemly or a more indecent piece of political strategy than that? True, the leader of the Government did not have anything to say, but the Liberal press and the Liberal party backed up that course. What followed? The legislation was wholly within the rights of Manitoba, and relief from the Governor in Council could only be reached in consequence of that Act being within the power of the Manitoba legislature. If it were not within the power of Manitoba to pass it, the ordinary tribunals would have dealt with it, and it would never have reached this House. The Act would have been a nullity, and we should never have had any difficulty with it. But it was because they went beyond the bounds of the restrictions placed upon the provinces in matters of education. I say that while the Manitoba legislature was clearly within its legislative rights, no person knows better than the hon. gentlemen opposite that it was a gross violation of the constitution. Now, Sir, when the hon. gentlemen came into power they were in what position to go to the Government of Manitoba and ask them to retrace their steps. The people of Manitoba were committed strongly against establishing separate schools of any description whatever; there is no doubt that Mr. Greenway went to the people of Manitoba to get their sanction upon that question; and there is no doubt that the Liberal party in the Dominion came into power after having made declarations that the minority should have relief from the position that they were in. Mr. Greenway went to the country on the platform that there should be no receding from the position that he had taken in the legislation of 1890. Well, the hon. gentlemen said to the people: Let us get into power and there will be a settlement. They have come into power, and let us see what took place. The hon. gentlemen came face to face with their pledges and they were bound to redeem them; they were bound to use every means possible to bring about a settlement that would restore their rights to the minority of that province. When that came about, what did the hon. gentleman do? He stood on the ground that had been occupied by Manitoba during the previous year, that there should be no separate schools under any consideration in the province. The people there murmured against such a settlement. But the hon. gentleman found themselves in a difficulty; and what did they do. They made an appeal to Rome. They appealed to Rome—for what? To sanction a settlement that the people refused to accept, a settlement that the minority had declared, so far as expressed words could declare, to be a very improper settlement. Let me ask the hon. gentleman now if he would have been willing as an old and influential member, as the most influential member of the Liberal side of the House, and as the hon. gentleman who now has the weight and prestige of being First Minister of the Dominion of Canada, to have asserted if the Conservatives had made such a statement? Would he not have been the first one and would not have his friends generally throughout the province of Quebec have been not complaining against the bishops and sending to Rome to protest against help being furnished the Conservative party, but would they not have been carrying the torch of denunciation from one end of the province to the other if a settlement of that kind had been arrived at. The position taken by hon. gentlemen opposite is rather a unique one. We have heard for the first time a declaration, and it was drawn out by a very tedious process, as to the position of the Government on this question. It has been stated that the hon. gentleman sent emissaries, if I may use the word—and I do not use it in an offensive sense—to Rome. For what? Why, for the purpose of making an appeal for the religious liberties of the people of the province of Quebec. Was there a petition signed by the great electorate of the province of Quebec; was the great electorate consulted as regards the petition; were they suffering individually as citizens of this country from the oppression of a church; was this course adopted with the design of punishing men because they were Liberals or was there any other question put forward for the purpose of hiding the real issue? The petition was signed by 45 members, one hon. gentleman declaring that he signed it, and was proud to have signed it as a Minister of the Crown. He had a perfect right to sign it as a Minister of the Crown, but when the hon. gentleman tried to make the electors believe that they would shake off their ministerial garb, leave their gowns at the door, and go on a mission and present a petition in behalf of the great electorate of Quebec and for religious liberty, and disassociate themselves and their position for that of the Government, I doubt whether the electorate would believe him. Is it a reasonable thing I ask—and I put it to hon. gentlemen opposite in this way—to believe that those hon. gentlemen had behind them, and were conscious of having behind them all the power and influence of the Government.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." I am glad we now have his assent by implication at least, that the First Minister signed the petition as Prime Minister of Canada. And for what purpose? Because he was languishing, because he was desirous of protecting the liberties of the electorate of the province of Quebec; or because he wanted that petition to help him out of the hole. Let us see whether it is not a question after that fashion.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You were in the hole then, when the petition was signed.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend is speaking from that side of the House, and I will take him as the authority for the moment. Let me call attention to this; the object of the petition is to complain against the undue influence exercised by the hierarchy in the province of Quebec. They are interfering with whom? They are attacking the Liberal party. I am sure the hon. gentleman who interrupted me feels at the bottom of his heart that the bishops of Quebec are persecuting the Liberals for the sole reason that they are Liberals. I ask if the hon. gentleman believes that. Or is it rather that the action taken by the hierarchy, whether rightly or wrongly it is not necessary to discuss at this particular moment, involves the persecution of the Liberal party; or did they raise their hands in protest against what they believed to be the narrowing of the rights and liberties of their fellows. Which does he think to be the case—I will await his answer. The hon. gentleman and his friends are all silent. He is in the hole now, as a hon. friend besides me suggests. What followed? Those hon. gentlemen are playing the role of martyr now—they are martyrs before the country. They made a strike for religious liberty. We have entered into a period of intellectual emancipation, as the House was told yesterday by the Minister of Public Works. He said that the province of Quebec now is quite different from what it was when he entered upon newspaper work there. I do not know whether that improvement is attributable to the hon. gentleman, or whether the people became enlightened apart from the hon. gentleman's efforts. But the people of Ontario to-day are led to believe—I ask the First Minister to say "hear, hear" to this statement, because it has gone abroad—that the people of the province of Quebec are no better than serfs, that they possessed no political liberty, that the head of the church forced them to sacrifice their religious liberty if they dared by word or act to assert their political rights. I want to know if the Prime Minister is prepared to give his assent even by a "hear, hear" to a proposition of that kind. If hon. gentlemen opposite want to play the roll of martyrs, they know too well that they are martyrs without having been persecuted, that they are crying out without having been hurt, and their policy is to tell the people of Ontario that for the first time a Frenchman and Roman Catholic in the Dominion has risen against tyranny and has made a strike for religious liberty. That is what is to be said in the back school houses of my province. Let me state what the position is. The bishops have cornered, they say, hon. gentlemen opposite; but have they not tried to corner the bishops? They complain that the bishops have restrained the people in the exercise of their liberties. Let me ask if there is any foundation whatever in the charge that the bishops have restrained hon. gentlemen opposite in their political liberties? Does their action not mean that the minority were not able to accept, otherwise than by sullen submission, the settlement arrived at. It is not necessary for me to attempt to discuss details of that settlement. I have no hesitation in saying in the first place, that this House has no right to dictate what kind of a public school system the province of Manitoba may have. That is a matter belonging wholly and solely to the province of Manitoba, and if it were left to me—I wish to be broadly understood—to, for the first time—independently of all the circumstances that surround the case of Manitoba, if it were proposed at the solicitations of any person in the Dominion of Canada, for the first time for this Parliament to fasten a school system of a sectarian or even partly sectarian character upon a single province in the Dominion of Canada, I should feel it my duty to oppose and to vote against any such proposition. But, Sir, permit me to point out the danger that must arise from a settlement of that kind as applied to the case of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec. It is well known in the province of Ontario that we have two school systems side by side; one a voluntary system, and the other a system of the state. One system may come and go just as it suits the convenience of those by whom it is permitted to be put in operation, and the other, day in and day out, no matter what takes place, the state system stands out boldly and must be maintained. Now then this Government, in the case of the province of Manitoba have for the first time laid down the foundation of a dangerous proposition, under which the rights of minorities are for ever gone. I say this independently altogether of the details of the settlement. I would like to know where the security of the minority in Quebec is now? I would like to know where the security of the minority in the province of Ontario is now? If any invasion of the rights of the minority in either province should occur, the case which arose in the province of Manitoba can be cited, and we will be told that the province of Manitoba passed an Act clearly within its legislative rights, but not less a violation of a constitutional compact. We will be told that there was a plan hatched out, or rather let me say, there was a settlement reached, utterly at variance with the spirit of that constitution and we will be asked, what is the use of complaint. We will have clearly laid down a principle which may be cited in every case, and under which the minority in any province may have its rights swept away by the same process, when it may suit the interests of any political party in Canada to do so. I ask the Prime Minister: If the same case arose in the province of Ontario to-morrow, could he recede from the position he has taken in the case of the province of Manitoba? If the Conservatives were in power he would give us a little trouble, but if the Liberals were in power the hon. gentleman would do what he and his friends have done in this instance. It does seem to me, Sir, that a very dangerous principle has been laid down for the first time in the constitutional history of Canada. I know the two school systems that obtain in the province of Ontario, and I know that nothing could be more dangerous to the minority in that province, than that such a principle should have been adopted. Under this principle the minority could be deprived of the rights they have now, and then let me ask what would be the position in the public schools? The public school system would be crippled, and the foundation for serious strife would be laid down. We would have strife in the election of school trustees, and strife in the election of municipal councillors who establish a school section, for the mere accident of whether there were twenty-four or twenty-five Protestant or Catholic children must determine the fate of all the others. The principle is fraught with difficulty, and with strife, and with discord in every feature. I ask, is there an hon. gentleman in this House from the province of Ontario, however he may be opposed to separate schools in principle and however strongly he may advocate their abolition, who would assent in Ontario to a settlement of the kind now made, and remembering all the strife that it would give rise to, would exchange it for our present school system in that province. I care not how strongly he may take the ground that separate schools are a mistake and should be abolished, I venture to say that there is not an hon. member in this House from the province of Ontario who would accept a settlement of that kind, with its insecurity, its invasion of rights, and its other defects. Hon. gentlemen opposite are asking for peace, and they have chosen an appropriate time to seek for that blessing. I say too: Let us have peace, but let us have peace in fact and not in name. Let us have peace on grounds that are sanctioned by honour, by justice, and by the fulfilment of these pledges in the broadest sense. Let us have such peace that every man may feel, that while there may be a sacrifice of opinion there shall be no sacrifice of honour. That is the only kind of peace that can be perfect. Let me for a moment call attention to the position of the Government and some of its Ministers. We have the declaration of the First Minister that this is not a final settlement, and we have also the declaration of the Solicitor General to the same effect. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton): Is it a final settlement? I would like to have his opinion on that; because we have not yet had his declaration as to whether it is a final settlement or not. I imagine that the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Macpherson) would be shocked if he thought it was not a final settlement, and the "Globe" newspaper would be shocked if it believed it were not a final settlement. Everybody is shocked that it is not a final settlement except those hon. gentlemen who are conscious that they have not fairly fulfilled their pledges. The hon. the Solicitor General has endeavoured to relieve himself from his pledge by a most extraordinary plea. He states that he is willing now, and that he shall always contend that the Manitoba minority should have such rights as are guaranteed them under the constitution and as defined by the judgment of the Privy Council. But, the first task that the hon. gentleman sets before himself is to show that the minority have no rights. He endeavours to show that it is a mere financial grievance, and it would be impossible to remedy even the grievance that is stated by the Privy Council to exist. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) throws up his hands in despair and declares that the judgment of the Privy Council is impossible of being carried out, and he therefore gives it up. That is his excuse for not redeeming his pledge. It is a most ingenious excuse; it is one few men would have thought of, it is worthy of the hon. gentleman who is in a close place and who must realize the serious consequences of taking such action.

In this jubilee year of Her Majesty, I repeat let us have peace; let us have that peace that Canadians are proud of; let us have peace with honour; let us have peace so that we who live, and I hope shall continue to live, under the folds of the British flag may feel without suspicion, that our flag gives full and complete liberty to every citizen of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. CLANCY.

CARRYING THE MAIL AT MURRAY BAY.

Mr. DUGAS (for Mr. Morin) asked :

What is the name of the lowest tenderer for carrying the mail between the wharf at Murray Bay and the post office of that locality?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The lowest tenderers were A. Tremblay and L. Trudel, whose tenders were equal.

DISBANDMENT OF THE GARRISON BATTERY OF ARTILLERY.

Mr. BRODEUR (for Mr. Langelier) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to take any measures, and if so, what, in the matter of the complaint of Captain D. Morgan, relating to the disbandment of the Garrison Battery of Artillery No. 3?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). No. 3 Quebec Garrison Battery having become non-effective, it was gazetted out on the 17th December, 1892, and Lieutenant Morgan was necessarily removed from the list of officers of the active militia. Mr. Morgan's several complaints have been thoroughly investigated and reported upon, and it is not the intention of the department to take any further steps in this matter.

B. C. SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to disallow an Act passed by the legislature of British Columbia in the 59th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, entitled "British Columbia Southern Railway Aid Amendment Act, 1896" ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). So far as the Government is concerned, this is purely a local Act, and it is not the intention of the Government to disallow it. I may say further that the Government has received no complaints against that Act.

JOHN CROWE, INDIAN AGENT.

Mr. McNEILL asked :

1. Has Mr. John Crowe, recently Indian agent of the Saugeen reserve, been informed why he has been dismissed? 2. If not, why not? 3. Of what offence has the Government adjudged him to be guilty?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. John Crowe has not been informed as to why he was dismissed. He has not been informed of the reason why he has been dismissed because he has not asked for the reason. He was officially advised on the 12th February, 1897, of the fact of his dismissal, and on the 15th of that month he acknowledged receipt of the notification, and thanked the department for the kind consideration received at its hands during his tenure of office. He was dismissed because it was clear from a report of Mr. Inspector Macrae, who held an inquiry into charges made against Mr. Crowe, that Mr. Crowe had acted very irregularly in the conduct of the business of the agency, and showed himself unfitted for the position he held.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS AT MORRISBURG.

Mr. REID (for Mr. Broder) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to install David Halliday, who was duly appointed by the late Government to the position of collector of customs at the port of Morrisburg, or will the office be filled, as at present, by an official from Montreal or elsewhere?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is not the intention of the Government to appoint Mr. David Halliday collector of customs at the port of Morrisburg. In answer to the last part of the question, I would say that that subject is under the consideration of the Government.

TENDERS OF THE SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

How many tenders were received for sections 4, 5, 6, 7, of the Soulanges Canal? Who were the tenderers? What was the aggregate amount of each tender? How many tenders were received for section 12 of the Soulanges Canal? Who were the tenderers? What was the aggregate amount of each tender?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have no objection to inform my hon. friend as to the number of tenders received on these sections of the Soulanges Canal. As to sections 4, 5, 6 and 7 there were 17 tenders in all. As to section 12, there were 13 tenders. The other questions, I do not think I could properly answer now. It would not be in the public interest until the contracts are not only awarded but actually executed, to make any statement as to the names of the tenderers or as to the respective amounts.

Mr. WALLACE. Will you give us the information later?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will be happy to do so later, if the hon. gentleman will repeat the question.

BRIDGE OVER ST. LAWRENCE AT QUEBEC.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

Is it true that at a meeting held recently at Quebec, the hon. member for Quebec West declared that he had been authorized by the hon. the Premier or by the Government to say that the Government would aid to the extent of a million dollars in the building of a bridge over the St. Lawrence at or near Quebec?

2. Was the hon. member authorized to make this declaration either by the Premier or by the Government?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to aid in the building of the said bridge, and if so, how, when and to what extent?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the Government cannot say whether it is true or not true that the member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobell) made the statement mentioned in the first paragraph of this question. On the 9th September last the Government made the following declaration on the floor of the House with respect to this question:—

When any responsible persons, or company, submit to the Government that they are prepared to undertake the construction of a bridge over the St. Lawrence at Quebec, the Government will be disposed favourably to consider the project, with the view of determining how far it should receive material assistance.

This was the policy of the Government, and no one was authorized to make any contradiction of that statement of policy.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

His Excellency the Governor General having informed the House "That after many and protracted discussions a settlement was reached between the two governments which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question" (the Manitoba school question), will the Government inform the House what were the propositions made to the Government of Manitoba, what concessions were asked for, and which of these, if any, were not granted?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The negotiations were verbal; there is no record of them. The papers connected with that subject will be brought down.

THE VICTORIA BRIDGE.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to ask the Minister a question, if he feels inclined to answer it off-hand. I notice in the newspapers several telegrams and announcements as to the Government having passed an Order in Council granting $300,000 to the Grand Trunk Railway for the re-arrangement of the Victoria bridge. Has that Order in Council been passed, and if so, will the hon. Premier bring down the papers without a motion being adopted by the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That is one of the questions I could not answer off-hand.

Mr. FOSTER. It has gone through without the hon. gentleman being aware of it.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Russell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to and I have read with a great deal of interest the Speech from the Throne. It is to me one of the brightest, and I think one of the most hopeful speeches that has ever been submitted to this House. It is patriotic in tone, for I think it does not matter on which side of the House we may sit, we can all agree on this, that the expressions used in regard to the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen are both graceful and felicitous. It is likewise touched with a spirit of progress. We are told in it that we are to have some amendments made in the tariff. I think it matters little what our views may be in regard to protection and free trade, we are all deeply interested in the people, especially at election times, and we all sympathize with any effort put forward to lighten the burdens the people are carrying at the present time.

We are also led to believe that something radical will be done with respect to the Franchise Act. Now, if I know anything at all of the temper of the people, I do not know of any single person out west at least who will shed one tear over the removal of the present Franchise Act. The Speech also speaks of conciliation and of peace. Nor does it matter what our views may be with respect to the Manitoba school question, for I believe we are all more or less anxious that a reign of peace should come and that the bitterness of the past should cease, and that all the different units of this fair land may dwell together once more in the spirit of unity, of love and of peace. Take it all in all I think it is a Speech which will commend itself to the hearts, to the hopes and to the aspirations of the people of Canada. I said I had listened to the Speech itself. I also listened to the speeches of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have tried to gather up the wisdom which has been dealt out to us in copious draughts. I do not think I am much wiser than I was before, but I have tried to take in all that has been given. It is evident there are great differences in the views presented by the different speakers, and as I listened to the principal speech and to the views enunciated and the programme laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite, I felt these differences, and I felt that comparing these views with the views held on this side of the House they are radically different, radically different in their inception, and in their consequences. And that reminds me of a story which I heard not long ago of two gentlemen who were discussing a particular question. One was old and the other was young. The old man had a squint eye, and never looked a man straight in the face, as hon. members can well imagine. After discussing the question for a considerable time they grew excited, and the old man said: "It is no use discussing the question any further; the time will come when we shall see eye to eye." The young man, looking at the old man's eye, said, "God forbid." As I listened to the principles and policy enunciated by hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to several public question I entertained the hope that the time will never come in Canada when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will agree with those principles or will see eye to eye with hon. gentlemen opposite.

The Speech contains a very pleasing reference to the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty. Those hon. gentlemen who are familiar with the poems of Tennyson will remember the poem he wrote on Her Majesty many years ago, and which is placed in the first page of his volume. I may be permitted to quote one or two lines from that beautiful poem, in which the poet almost breathes a prayer, when he says:

* * * * * May you rule us long,

And leave us rulers of your blood
As noble till the latest day!

May children of our children say,
"She wrought her people lasting good ;

"Her court was pure, her life serene ;
"God gave her peace ; her land reposed ;
"A thousand claims to reverence closed
"In her as Mother, Wife and Queen."

I think that the prayer has been abundantly realized through the long, the glorious, the prosperous reign of our beloved Queen. But when we take into consideration the magnificent, the almost unexampled outburst of loyalty, the manifestation of devotion now being shown to the person of Her Most Gracious Majesty, we are tempted to ask why and for what reason the people are so devoted to Her. Now, I must say I am no particular admirer of the hereditary principle of government ; I have no particular fondness for King or Queen as such. I hold that while they occupy exalted positions, they should be as man or woman worthy of the position they fill. But when we turn to Her Majesty we find one who has adorned the place she has occupied, one who has proved herself a constitutional sovereign, one who has ever obeyed the will of the people as expressed through the majority of the representatives of the people, one who as wife has proved faithful to him who never uttered anything that was base, while at the same time so far as her sympathies were concerned she has always been in touch with the sufferings of her people, so that to-day she commands the homage of her subjects, because of her worth of character, worth of sympathy, worth of government. So that to-day the whole Empire can sing with one voice :

Send her victorious,
Long to reign over us,
Happy and glorious.
God save the Queen !

It is particularly pleasing in connection with the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of Her Most Gracious Majesty's reign to see that the party which has always been denounced as being disloyal, that the party which has always been held up to the scorn and derision of Canadians, and sometimes of the old country people as well, should be the party that on this auspicious occasion will send their leader to London, and send not only their leader but the Premier of Canada to represent them there. I believe, Sir, that our leader and our Premier as well, will represent us there as faithfully, as eloquently, with as much dignity, and with as much credit to himself and to us, as any one which could possibly be sent from the premier colony.

There is another point in connection with the Speech from the Throne to which I suppose I must refer, and that is the school question. This is one of the questions that no man cares about touching. I say so because I feel that every one who justly estimates what is embedded, so to speak, in this question, feels more or less the responsibility which attaches to him when he has anything to do with a question that divides man from man, and race from race, and religion from religion. It is, however, one of those subjects which, while a man realizes his responsibility, he has, at the same time, to speak upon it according to his conscience and according to the demands of the people who have sent him to this representative assembly. I was one of those who was strongly opposed to the Remedial Bill of the late Government. I opposed that Bill not so much because of what it contained, and not so much because of what it offered to the minority, but because that Bill brought into force a weapon, namely, coercion, which all intelligent men of the nineteenth century abhor and condemn. It is agreed, and it was agreed then to a certain extent, that this was purely a Manitoba question, one which peculiarly belongs to that particular province, one which ought to have been fought out in that particular province, and one which should have been settled by the people in the province. I opposed that Bill very much on this ground, and I find my sentiment is pretty well expressed by a remark which Sir John Thompson made in connection with another difficult question which was before this House. He said :

I say that, within the limits of its authority, and subject only to the power of disallowance, the provincial legislature is as absolute as is the Imperial Parliament itself.

Now, just because that legislature was absolute, just because it had the right to deal with that question, just because its legislation had been confirmed by the highest law of the land, so I felt bound, for the sake of breaking up any tendency that might be, in the future, towards the creation of coercion in a free land and among a free people, to oppose that Bill so far as I possibly could. So far as the rights of the minority are concerned, I am just as well disposed towards the minority as any man in this House. I believe that minorities have rights just as well as majorities, and so far as the histories of all countries teach me, and I believe we will find that the right has been on the side of the minority, at least as often as on the side of the majority. But, at the same time, majorities have their rights as well as minorities. Our constitution is based upon the principle of majorities. All legislation means grievance towards those who have been legislated against, and every particle of legislation means the curtailment of some right that has hitherto been guaranteed and enjoyed. I cannot see any reason why we should legislate for minority rights in one case more than we do in others, while at the same time I say that no majority has any right to ride rough shod over the consciences, over the feelings, over the hearts and over the sympathies of a minority. It is the right of a majority at all times to so legislate as that that legislation will be, so far as they know, and so far as they see, in the best interests of the country which they love, and of the people who are part and parcel of it.

I may say, Sir, that I believe, with all my heart, in national schools. I believe in one school for the people of the country. I have seen the two systems at work in the old country and in the province of Quebec, and I have seen the other system of national schools in the province of British Columbia. So far as the separate school works, it always works in one direction, and that is to separate the people, to separate at least the children of the people. They never get to respect each other until, perhaps, they are well advanced in life; they never get to know each other, and thus they grow up oft-times dividing more and more asunder the older they grow. This never can be the ideal so far as the people of this country are concerned, and I believe the ideal at which we all should aim is to have one school for the whole people, in which they may be educated, in which they may be drawn together, and in which they may know and respect and love each other throughout all the days of their life. It seems strange to me that the youngest daughter of this confederation should be able to teach the people of Canada a lesson so far as the school question is concerned. I can tell you here, Sir, that the province of British Columbia, of all the provinces of the Dominion of Canada, is the province which has settled the school question, as I believe, for all time. Out there we have one school and one school only. If you go into any of these schools you will find there children of all colours; certainly you will find both Protestants and Roman Catholics sitting together. If you inquire as to the religion of the teachers we employ, you will find that both Catholics and Protestants teach there. There is no feeling and there are no prejudices against one another in British Columbia. We recognize our right to be together; we recognize our right to employ all kinds of teachers that are qualified for the position, and there is no province in the Dominion of Canada that is freer from prejudice and bigotry than is ours. Now, so far as my position is concerned, I believe in religion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MAXWELL. I shall answer the astonishment of the hon. gentlemen in a few minutes. I am always very suspicious of men who claim to be very religious. I have had a great deal to do, in my life, with this kind of men, and I have always found that men who made the greatest parade of religion were the least religious.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. MAXWELL. I hope my hon. friends opposite will just remember that and not show their weakness in the future. I say, Sir, that I believe in religion. I am a member of the Presbyterian Church and I have been for years a minister of that church. I believe that church is second to no church in Canada or anywhere else, but I am not a bigot. I do not want Presbyterianism taught in any school with which I have any connection. I do not want my "ism" taught my children where other children are being taught. I believe that so far as I myself am concerned I am quite capable of attending to that, and I believe at the same time that my church, if it is imbued with the right spirit ought to do that business in its own interest. But I say that religion is more than "ism." It is greater, grander, wider far than any view of it. The head men of our churches—the archbishops, the moderator of the general assembly, the president of the general conference—could have settled this school question in twenty-four hours if they had been willing to do it. There should have been no difficulty in framing such an Act as would have satisfied almost every conscience in the country. But these men preferred to stand out for their "ism," and I say, "Gentlemen, if you prefer fighting, go on fighting as long as you like; but so far as my influence goes, I intend to keep you from fighting in the school." Let the school be kept free from it, and let our children there be taught such things as will enable them to become honest, industrious and successful men in life.

Now, there are various ways in which we may look at this settlement; and, for the sake of hon. gentlemen opposite, I will read a quotation from a speech delivered by Sir John Thompson when dealing with a question which the Scotch say was as "kittle" as the one we have now under consideration. He says:

Whenever we touch those difficult and delicate questions which are in any way connected with sentiments of religion, or race, or education, there are two principles which it is absolutely necessary to maintain for the sake of the living together of the different members of this confederation, for the sake of the preservation of the federal power, for the sake of the good-will and kindly charity of all our people towards each other, and for the sake of the prospects of making a nation, as we can only do it, by living in harmony, and ignoring those differences which used to be considered fundamental. These two principles surely must prevail, that, as regards theological questions, the state must have nothing to do with them, and that, as regards the control which the federal power can exercise over provincial rights in matters touching the freedom of its people, the religion of its people, the appropriations of its people, or the sentiments of its people, no section of this country, whether it be the greatest province of Quebec or the humblest and smallest province of this country, can be governed according to the fashion of three hundred years ago.

There is both sense and wisdom in these words, and I admire the policy of conciliation which was adopted by the members of this Government. I rejoice that they had sufficient sense to meet with the leaders of the province of Manitoba, and that the leaders of the province of Manitoba had sufficient sense to meet with the leaders of this House. I rejoice that they discussed this question; I rejoice that they made concessions to each other; and I rejoice that out of the wrangles, the strife and the quarrels which we have been having there has come to us the angel of peace, and that angel is brooding over our country to-day. The settlement may not be all that we want. It may not satisfy some hon. gentlemen on the other side; it may not satisfy some hon. gentlemen on this side; but I say, take it all in all, it is a fair, a just and a statesmanlike settlement—and a settlement which I believe will stand until the voice of Manitoba shall in any way amend it. In that poem to which I have referred, you will find words like these, which show to some extent why the reign of Her Majesty has been so glorious:

And statesmen at her council met,

Who knew the seasons, when to take

Occasion by the hands, and make

The bounds of freedom wider yet;—

By shaping some august decree,

Which kept the Throne unshaken still,

Broad based upon her people's will.

The leaders of the late Government were so narrow, so lacking in these things, that they could not see the seasons; they could not take occasion by the hands; they were unwilling to make their law broad, based upon the people's will; and so, when the will of the people was expressed, where did they find themselves? Where they will be for a long time, until they realize that the people, and the people alone, have the say in these matters. But the leaders of this Government did take the occasion by the hands; they have made this settlement broad based upon the people's will; and I believe that the people of Canada to-day, throughout all the provinces, are thoroughly well satisfied with that settlement, and are thankful to these men for the wisdom and the tact they have displayed in bringing the different provinces once more together in harmony and peace.

Now, reference has sometimes been made in this debate to bishops and priests and ministers. I am unfortunately one of these ministers. I believe they can take their own part wherever they are. Some men are very much afraid of a minister, especially about election times. I have no fear of a minister at any time, and I have no fear of a politician at any time. A minister, whether he be called a priest or a bishop, or whatever may be his title, has just as much right to have his say in the politics of the country to which he belongs as any politician in it, and why? Because he is just as much a citizen of the country as any other man; he is just as reputable a man as any other man; he possesses just as much wisdom as the ordinary politician; and I take it upon me to say that there are few men who know the affairs of their country better than the minister or the priest or the bishop, and these men ought to have the same right and the same liberty as any other men to express their opinions on the questions of the day. Now, my hon. friend from Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) said that the Presbyterians were just as bad as the bishops in regard to the school question. I am aware that my hon. friend is not expected to know very much about Presbyterians. I shall be very glad to give him a little tuition, and I will not charge him anything for it. In all seriousness, however, I do not think that it can be truly said that any Presbyterian minister has ever gone out of his way to frighten, or to command, or in any way to interfere with the liberty of the subject or of the people of his congregation. I do not deny that some of us might like very well to be able to do so, especially good old Tories; but I feel free to say that, even if we were anxious to have this power, our people are too sensible to let us do it. Will you say that the Presbyterians are not religious because they are not led by their ministers? Will you say that they are not as religious men as any in Canada because they do not obey the wishes of the moderator? I believe it is just because the responsibility has been laid upon them it is just because they feel their responsibility in every vote they give and in the opinions they form and the principles which they shape, that they are to-day the religious men we know them to be wherever they may be found. Mr. Speaker, the more you coerce or drive men, the more you drive religion out of them. Put them upon their own bottoms.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MAXWELL. I know that my hon. friends are not used to that posture. They always want to be led, or to be carried, or to get on their knees, and some of them are always very devout about election times, but I say that the more you put responsibility upon men, the more you put them upon their own bottoms, the more you make them act upon their own judgments, according to their own consciences, the more you make them not only religious but conscientious in all that they say and do.

Now there is one point more which, I think, I ought to touch before I sit down, and that is the famous visit to Rome. If I were asked what I think about this, I would say frankly that I do not think it ought to be discussed in this House at all. I would resent as strongly as I possibly could any attempt to have the affairs of my church brought up for discussion in the House of Commons of Canada. I believe that this whole question is simply a question to be dealt with by the members of a particular church. It is purely a church question from beginning to end. We have church quarrels in the Presbyterian Church. These quarrels occur in every church. Some of you may have been in them; and I know it is quite customary for us Presbyterians, when we are not satisfied with our Moderator of the Sessions to go to the Presbytery, and if we are not satisfied with the Presbytery, we go to the Synod, and if we are not satisfied with the Synod, we go to the Assembly. We invoke all the powers, from the lowest to the highest, to obtain justice. Therefore, I say that if these men felt that they had a grievance and were not getting justice in the church which they love, their own church and the church of their forefathers, they were perfectly right in invoking all the powers and authorities of that church to give them the liberties they desire to possess. I think every honest man—and I appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite—will say that these gentlemen had some reason to go to Rome. If it be true—I do not say that it is true because I am outside of the conflict and do not want to meddle in it, if I possibly can help it—if it be true that a man who owns a paper and in that paper seeks to express what he believes and what are the convictions of his own conscience, is liable in a moment to be deprived of his property and his revenue, I ask how can any such arbitrary exercise of power be justified? Is there a man on the opposite side who will stand up and say that that is right? If you are a member of a church, the head of which did that to you, how would you feel, how would you squirm and growl and howl about it? Would you remain quiet in your seats? Would you not, if you knew there was some power in that church which would take that load off you, invoke that power? I believe you would, and do it speedily. And I say if men have the power, as I understand it, without inquiry into the motives, to destroy in a moment a man's living, that man is perfectly right—I do not care if he be Conservative or Liberal—if he goes to the powers that can aid him and help him out of his difficulty. Again, if it be true that these same individuals have the power, and have exercised that power, to refuse the sacraments to those who belong to that church, and if they refuse to give them burial in their holy and consecrated ground, and even go so far as to say that these people will never get to Heaven, how would you like, if you held the same views with regard to the same things, to be thus treated?

An hon. MEMBER. It would not make much difference.

Mr. MAXWELL. My hon. friend says it would not make much difference. I do not know whether it would or not, I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen opposite has any hopes, as far as the future is concerned, but this I do know that there is not a man sitting on the opposite side who, if he were to undergo such treatment would not spurn, with all the manliness of his being, any such treatment, and seek every redress possible in order to be delivered from this tyranny and incubus. So when men talk to me of going to Rome, I say let them go and come back as often as they please. That is not my business. So long as they are seeking what I believe is right, so long as I believe they are doing what is right, according to their conscience, it is no matter how often or how long these men go and stay in Rome. But it may be asked, how far do these men represent the Liberal party? Well, Mr. Speaker, these men have represented me, in all these proceedings, just this much. So far as they want liberty, so far as they want freedom, so far as they desire to act according to their consciences and to vote according to their consciences and to support the men they believe in their consciences should be supported, they represent me, and I wish them God-speed and every success because I believe it will be all the better for Canada, and every man throughout this land will be free to do any act according to his conscience.

Now, I do not wish to say anything more on this point, but as I have sat and listened to hon. gentlemen speaking on this question. I would like to say to them: Now, gentlemen, if you believe all you say, if you want to support the bishops in this matter, if you want to bring in another Remedial

Mr. MAXWELL.

Bill, bring on your motion. Put your thoughts into a motion and give us a chance of voting on it. So far as I am personally concerned, I tell you straight that if any motion be made upon the basis of the opinions which have been expressed on the opposite side, I shall not have the slightest hesitation in casting my vote against it.

I might go on to speak of the tariff but shall not deal to any extent with that subject to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite say that the party on this side are theoretical and not practical. Now, when a party has been so long in power as hon. gentlemen opposite have been, and when a party has made a mess of things as the party in Opposition confess they have done, it takes the new party a long time to put things on a proper footing. I am a free trader in principle. I was brought up as a free trader: I have been brought up in a land for whose people free trade has done wondrous things. But, considering the existing state of things in this country, considering the mess which has been made of the great resources of this country by the late Government, I am quite prepared, as a free trader, to accept any lessening of the burden of taxation now resting upon the people, being confident that, as time rolls on, the Government, by economy and wise management will reduce the expenditure of this country and thus make it possible to reduce taxation more and more, until we shall be free, as we desire to be, to buy in the cheapest market and sell in the dearest.

In conclusion, I rejoice that we have reached such a point in our affairs as we have reached to-day. I hope, as I said before, that peace will dwell among us; I trust that the good sense of the people of Canada will loyally support everything that makes for harmony and unity among the races. I believe that, when our Premier goes to the old country to represent us there, he will represent a nation growing up into manhood, and a manhood that will not be the least among the great developed nations of the earth at the present time. Therefore, as far as my influence and my vote are concerned they shall be given in favour of the settlement which the Government has made on this school question.

Mr. HUGHES. It was not my intention, as I presume it was not the intention of other gentlemen, to prolong this debate. But, inasmuch as, during the last few days, our friends on this side of the House have been successful in unearthing a great deal that we did not know before and in bringing to light some of the means by which hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded in capturing the country on the 23rd of June last, I deem it advisable to continue the debate, in the hope that something further may be developed, something that will prove still more surprising than anything that has been brought forward and that may be of service in the future history of the country. I have listened with pleasure to the remarks of our clerical friend from the far west (Mr. Maxwell). I have not the slightest doubt that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite thought it the best sermon they have had the pleasure of listening to for some time. Personally, I must say, I was very much pleased with his remarks in many respects. One thing about the hon. gentleman's speech struck me forcibly. He is a free trader, but he is prepared to box the compass and support the Government in any trade policy they may bring in so long as it keeps them in power: he has certain views on the school question, yet he endorses the settlement of the Manitoba school question which contains features diametrically opposed to the views he enunciated. He reminds me of the western statesman who said: "These are my sentiments, gentlemen, the sentiments of an honest man. But if they do not suit you, they kin be altered." I had intended to leave this question to be fought out by the representatives of the province of Quebec on either side of the House. However, our friends opposite have been exposing themselves most systematically and have been giving us a great deal of unwritten history which we had not previously. Hon. gentlemen on this side, also, have brought out many important facts on the situation. Therefore, as I said, I think it well to continue the debate in the hope that something further may be developed. I take occasion, in passing, to congratulate the Prime Minister upon the remarks he made in reference to the Queen's Jubilee. No man, I believe, has ever adorned the halls of Parliament who could more suitably express in chaste language his appreciation of Her Majesty's Jubilee year. But I will take the privilege of drawing the attention of the hon. gentleman to a very peculiar point in connection with this matter, and I trust that he will not think me captious in so doing. On page 25 of the "Hansard" will be found the remarks of the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) which are, in part, as follows:—

It is a still more agreeable duty on my part to tender to the leader of the House, the First Minister, my most hearty congratulations upon the distinction which has been conferred upon Canada, as well as himself, by the invitation of the Imperial Government to take part in the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee. I need not say, Sir, that there is no person within the wide domain of Canada who will not, in my view, not feel it fortunate for Canada that on such an occasion, when so great a compliment has been paid to this country, an hon. gentleman occupies the position of First Minister who is so well able to discharge the duties incident to that hon. gentleman's position on so important and so august an occasion.

This, I am certain, expresses the sentiments of hon. members on both sides of the House. I would now draw the attention of the First Minister to what, I presume, is an oversight, although it is claimed, I am informed, by some of his friends that it is one of those very skilful expressions, common with our worthy Prime Minister, which can be translated one way in the province of Quebec and another way in the province of Ontario. On page 61 of the "Hansard," he is reported to have said:

What he said with reference to the fact that the position which I now occupy may compel me to go to the other side of the water in order to take part in the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee this year, was not only courteous, but very generous indeed, and I am happy to tender the hon. gentleman this expression of my sincere gratitude.

I would draw the attention of the First Minister to the peculiar use of the word "compel." It is used in both ways already. Side by side with his polished remarks on the Queen's Jubilee, let me quote a brief extract from a newspaper which, I am informed, is one of his leading organs in Quebec. "Le Signal." This journal echoing, I presume, the sentiments of the Government on this question, deploras "the wind of imperialism" which is blowing over Canada. It says:

The act of English Canadians in subscribing to the Indian famine fund, in seeking to make England the only market for our products, and in singing "God Save the Queen" on every occasion, is calculated to arouse British feeling in their hearts; but, in the presence of such a state of things, French Canadians should devote themselves more than ever to the French cause, work to elevate French education, and teach their children the love of France.

I call the attention of the Prime Minister to the very peculiar following up of his loyal remarks—with the exception of the one word "compel"—with the editorial utterances which we find in many of the leading journals which support the hon. gentleman in the province of Quebec.

The trade matters and other matters which are referred to in the Speech from the Throne and in the Address will all, I presume, come up in due course in this House excepting, possibly, the one matter of the Manitoba school question; and inasmuch as we are asked to join in endorsing the so-called happy settlement of that question, I, for one, must express my dissent from those views. I may be permitted briefly to review the history of the question. In the first place, a Remedial Bill was presented to this House, and what did it propose to give to our Roman Catholic countrymen? It gave them the one privilege of using their own taxes on their own freehold property for the education of their own children: and, of course, in connection with that, it had to confer upon them the necessary machinery whereby to collect those taxes and to manage their schools, buy their text books, and pay their teachers. That is simply what the Remedial Bill gave to the Roman Catholic people of the province of Manitoba--the right to use their own taxes for their own schools. Not one dollar of Protestant money, either directly or indirectly, either of provincial money—unless the province chose to give it, or of Dominion money, or of local taxation money—not a dollar of Protestant money could by any hook or crook go to the support of Roman Catholic schools in the province of Manitoba under that Remedial Bill. Preceding that Remedial Bill, however, was the visit of the commissioners who were sent up by the Liberal-Conservative Government; and the offer of the commissioners may be summed up in these words: the minority agreed to accept the half hour at the close of the school day, and they agreed to accept, in cities and towns, where there were fifty Roman Catholic children, that there should be one Roman Catholic teacher among the number of teachers in that town—I presume for the purpose of giving the children of that place religious instruction occasionally. Now, Sir, I had the honour, and I claim it was an honour, of opposing that Bill, and I would have opposed the settlement of the commissioners at that time, for the reason that I believed that the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council conferred upon the Roman Catholic people of the province of Manitoba certain rights, the right to have certain grievances redressed; but those grievances did not involve the right to give instruction on intellectual or moral subjects but merely the right to have religious instruction that would be satisfactory to the parties concerned. That is the stand that I took then. I opposed the Remedial Bill on that ground. Had there been a measure, as I stated at that time, brought into this House which would have left the state in control of intellectual teaching, and have left to the church the teaching of their religious ideas, I would not have opposed that Bill. I still claim that it would have been objectionable policy to bring such a Bill into this House; still, the province of Manitoba, having refused to do anything, she certainly drew upon herself whatever this House might have inflicted upon her. I also opposed the proposition made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, the present Prime Minister of this Government. It is well known that he moved a motion for the six months' hoist in amendment to the Remedial Bill. Well, taking the statements made in the province of Quebec, in the province of Ontario, and in this House, by the then leader of the Opposition and his supporters, I consider no other course was left to me than to vote against giving him any opportunity of settling that question. He and his friends were on record time and again as promising that in case that they got into power they would give a stronger Bill, they would give, not a half-hearted or faint-hearted measure, but a whole-hearted and a stronger measure, one that would supply the deficiency in that Bill in relation to the payment of money out of the public funds for the support of those schools. I objected to giving my own friends the opportunity of creating a system of separate schools wherein any church would have the right of giving intellectual instruction, a right which I maintain belongs to the state alone, and I certainly would once more object to giving my opponents the right to give a stronger control over the teaching of these subjects. It is not necessary that I should here enter into the arguments that our friends opposite used in all the various provinces. In the province of Ontario their watchword was: "Hands off Manitoba." "We demand the establishment of a national school system," was another of their cries; and "we will have none of this separate school business." And, Sir, they went so far as to attack the mandements of the bishops in the province of Quebec, forgetting that in the province of Ontario these gentlemen had gone to the polls under the leadership and following the battle-flag held aloft for them by the late Archbishop Lynch and my old friend the present Archbishop Cleary. These gentlemen had gone to the polls, election after election, in the province of Ontario under what they call, in that province, a "pastoral letter." It is as strong a term as the word "mandement," and if a comparison were made between the mandements issued by the bishops in the province of Quebec and the pastoral letters issued by the two gentlemen referred to in the province of Ontario, why, Sir, the mandements in the province of Quebec sink into insignificance as regards strength of language, when compared with the pastoral letters of the Ontario bishops. Yet we find these gentlemen opposite going to the polls, election after election led by the Archbishop of Toronto and the Archbishop of Kingston on this very school question. We have seen the present Sir William Ralph Meredith hounded from one end of the province to the other by the very men who to-day are pretending to stand up here and ask for freedom from clerical intolerance; while in the province of Ontario the identical arguments being used by gentlemen opposite to-day are the arguments that were stolen from the speeches of Sir William Ralph Meredith on the subject. These gentlemen, I say, in the province of Ontario and other Protestant districts, hold aloft the mandements of the bishops which, as the Solicitor General has admitted, favour their side as much as it favours the other side; and they shout: So long as a drop of covenanting blood runs in our veins we will never submit to the mandements of the bishops;—while these same gentlemen go into Roman Catholic districts and say: The Remedial Bill is no good, it does not give the Roman Catholics of Manitoba any lands or moneys to support their schools, and they have to pay for them all out of their own taxes. Then they appeal to the Roman Catholics and say: Who gave you separate schools in the province of Ontario? Who gave you these rich amendments to the Separate School Act? Why, it was Sir Oliver Mowat and he is along with Wilfred Laurier in the present Government. Then they point out, as I already said, that Sir William Ralph Meredith and the Orangeists of the province of Ontario are the enemies of the Roman Catholic religion. Well, Sir, it is not necessary to go through all these charges; but, in my immediate locality, one of the chief charges was that I spelled Roman Catholics with a small r and a small c. Now, this is a very small matter, but I wish to take the opportunity of educating a few hon. gentlemen opposite on the subject. I also spell Methodist, my own church, and Presbyterian, the church of my clerical friend from Vancouver (Mr. Maxwell) with small letters also. I have also in my hand a paper, I believe it is the official organ of the Prime Minister, and would you believe it, Sir, in the first column I find the word Catholic spelt a dozen times with a small case letter. The rule in French is the same as in well-written English, that adjectives, once they have become nationalized, once they have become acclimated, so to speak, are spelt with lower case letters. This is a small matter, but, at the same time, it is annoying to common-sense people to hear men who should know better, talking of these trifling matters. The paper is here, and the hon. gentleman's friends in Ontario can see in the Prime Minister's own paper, this paper which runs in the line of the church, half a dozen references to the Catholic church so printed.

An hon. MEMBER. Name the paper.

Mr. HUGHES. "Le Soleil." I will now take up the consideration of what some hon. members consider to be the satisfactory settlement of the school question, the settlement brought about by the sunny ways of the First Minister. Talk about the coercion of Manitoba. I should like to ask the First Minister if when he brought representatives of the Government of Manitoba to Ottawa and gave them to understand what his wishes were, whether coercion was exercised or not? I can tell him, what he well knows, that there was coercion, and those gentlemen fought long and bitterly. It was announced that the settlement would be arrived at in a certain number of days, but it was adjourned from time to time, and those gentlemen from Manitoba, whether they were conscientious or not in their demands, and whether it is true or not that they would have no interference and did not desire the recognition of any church to be made in the settlement, gradually came down step by step until the present settlement was accepted by them. They were coerced, more than the province which they represented would have been coerced by the Remedial Bill submitted two sessions ago. What did they secure by that settlement? Half an hour of school time, which is all that any church should require. I object to any church claiming the intellectual direction of children attending school, which is a matter belonging to the state and not to the church. As regards religious teaching, that is a matter of conscience, but it should not be paid for by the state. In cities and towns where there are forty Roman Catholic children of school age they have the right, under the settlement, to have a Roman Catholic teacher. That is not so very objectionable, because probably there is no town in Canada where teachers of Catholic and other faiths are not engaged in the work of instruction. But here is one of the most objectionable points in connection with the settlement. In any rural district and settlement where there are twenty-five children of the Roman Catholic faith, it matters not how many children of the Protestant faith there may be, or whether the Protestants pay 95 per cent of the taxes, the teacher, not "may be," but "shall be," a Roman Catholic. Let us examine that provision for a moment. I can take any hon. gentleman to about thirty school sections in my own district in Ontario where under such a provision the Protestant teacher would have to be dismissed, although Protestants pay 90 per cent of the taxes. What was the old struggle in Ontario? It was against Protestants being taxed for the support of Roman Catholic separate schools. Those people are granted separate schools under the constitution; let them pay for them. We demanded that not one dollar of Protestant money should go to their support. That was an important condition in the Remedial Bill—that not one dollar of Protestant money, directly or indirectly, should be taken for this purpose. In Ontario in the old fight we demanded that if the Roman Catholics wanted separate schools, we should not pay for them and not be taxed for that purpose. Under this provision of the Manitoba settlement by which where there are twenty-five Catholic children there shall be a Roman Catholic teacher, even though Protestants pay nine out of every ten dollars of the taxes, it will be found that greater complaints will arise in Manitoba than were ever raised against the Remedial Bill. The Roman Catholic teacher will be employed, but the Protestants will have to pay by far the greater part of the fees. There is another section in this, that where there are over ten French Canadian children of school age the teacher shall give instruction in French and English. I am delighted that the French Canadian race is prolific. Two or three families could easily have ten children of school age, and if there were ten French Canadian children of school age in a school section, under the law recently passed by the Manitoba legislature, the teacher must be able to instruct both in French and English; in other words, the English teacher would be dismissed because he would not be able to teach French, and a French Canadian would be put in his place.

An hon. MEMBER. But it would never be enforced.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, it is useless to pass this School Bill unless it is to be carried into effect. We have to deal with the provisions of the law as we find them in the Bill. Had any one declared to the people of Canada that the Ministers of Manitoba could have been coerced, no one would have believed the statement. What did the present Minister of the Interior say? He declared his admiration for the United States because they never compromised with the Church of Rome on the educational question, because they would allow no recognition whatever of any religious body, or any interference by any religious body, it being held by them that to grant such recognition would be to permit the entering of the wedge and the whole fabric would thereafter fall. Speech after speech could be quoted to show that so long as our friends were in power the Manitoba Government was strong and unbending, the rock of Gibraltar not being comparable with the attitude taken by those men; but when the genial influence of the present First Minister came over them, they came down from their perch and passed the most iniquitous separate school law in force in Canada today. There are two or three other conditions of the settlement which are not embodied in the law. Under one of these Parliament last year voted $2,000 for a French judge. Another was the translation of the present Minister of the Interior from the back place he occupied in the province of Manitoba to a seat in this House. There are other claims which have not yet been presented, but which will be presented shortly, and we are led to believe by the Prime Minister that still further concessions regarding the school question may be made. But if such remarkable concessions have been made to the Roman Catholic Church, why say some are the bishops raising a row? This is a very proper and pertinent question. I will give the explanation offered to me by a priest of the Church of Rome. First, this settlement does not in any sense carry out the judgment of the Privy Council; second, the clause providing that a Roman Catholic priest can enter a school and teach for half an hour after half-past three o'clock will lead to a similar agitation to that which prevailed, I was going to say, disgraced the province of Ontario for a number of years. They claim they do not want such an agitation, that they only want a fair settlement and do not make further demands than those to which they are entitled under the law. It is contended, on the other hand, that this settlement is not in accordance with the spirit of the constitution, and that to take Protestant money raised from taxes paid by Protestants, for the support of Catholic schools would prove a source of trouble with their Protestant neighbours, and the Catholics claimed they do not want it. It may be permitted for me to show that since this Bill has been known to the Protestants of the province of Manitoba, it does not commend itself to their good sense, and especially does it not commend itself to the Orangemen of that province. And, Sir, when it does not commend itself to the good sense of the Orangemen of Manitoba, I take it for granted that it does not commend itself to the good sense of any class of the people, because Orangemen ask for nothing but what is fair and tolerant. At a recent meeting of the grand lodge of Manitoba, this resolution was passed:

At the annual meeting of the Orange Grand Lodge of Manitoba, held in Brandon last week, the following resolution was passed:—"Whereas, this R. W. Grand Lodge, at each annual session, strengthened the hands of the government, approving by resolutions the School Act of 1890, and assured the provincial government that as long as they maintained our national schools and pursued a policy of no compromise and no surrender, this Worshipful Grand Lodge would give to the government its moral and material support. In January, 1896, and again in June, 1896, the same policy was followed out by a majority of the Orangemen of this province. Partyism was sacrificed to prevent, as many honestly thought, the coercion of the local government to restore separate schools. But as soon as the government was elected to power, the cloven hoof was exposed, and the terms of the settlement arranged between the representatives of the federal and provincial governments is one of the rankest and basest acts of duplicity in the history of responsible government, and a menace to the liberty of Protestants of Manitoba.

1st. The teaching of Roman Catholic dogmas in our schools, which was abolished by the Public School Act of 1890, is again restored by the settlement agreed to by the representatives of both governments. The principle which Orangemen were contending for, viz., that the state should not recognize any religious denomination in our schools, has been sacrificed. The Roman Catholic Church has been specially singled out for favours, while all Protestants are simply referred to as non-Catholics. One-half the time set apart for religious instruction is given to the Roman Catholics, while they only represent one-twentieth of our population, and where twenty-five Catholic children attend the public school, a Catholic teacher must be engaged to teach the religious dogmas of that denomination. This provision actually makes Roman Catholic children attending the public schools wards of the state, and gives the Roman Catholic Church the status of a state church. Again, where French-speaking pupils attend a public school, provision is made for a bi-lingual system of teaching, which will require a teacher competent to teach both languages. The great majority of Manitoba teachers are not competent to teach two languages, and teachers will have to be imported from Quebec. This provision answers a double purpose, by introducing into our public schools the dual language and Roman Catholic teachers. "Again, settlement has other features even more vicious than the old separate school law.

The policy of Rome has ever been aggressive, Roman Catholic teachers will be scattered throughout the province and will have an opportunity of proselytizing to a much greater extent under the terms of the settlement between the Laurier Government and the Government of Mr. Greenway than ever before. Why has the Federal Government sent emissaries to Rome to obtain the sanction of His Holiness to the settlement? Abbe Proulx, Charles Fitzpatrick and Chevalier Drolet, each in turn, visited His Holiness to obtain his consent, and requested His Holiness to appoint a papal ablegate for Canada, to whom all legislation affecting the Roman Catholic Church would be submitted before being acted on by Parliament. The humiliation of our great Dominion in the eyes of every liberty-loving nation must indeed be great, when our rulers so far forget their dignity and that of our country as to endeavour to obtain the sanction of a foreign potentate before legislation is submitted to Parliament.

"Therefore, be it resolved,—That this R. W. Grand Lodge of Manitoba, assembled in the city of Brandon, hereby express in the strongest terms possible our disapproval of the so-called settlement, and denounce it as a delusion and a snare, and that we will use every legitimate and constitutional means of defeating every member of Parliament, both federal and local, who uses his influence or gives his vote in favour of the settlement, as stated in the preamble, and that we are opposed to any compromise with the opponents of our National School Act, as enacted by the legislature of 1890."

That resolution passed by the Grand Orange lodge properly recites the feeling of the people in Manitoba. We now find our friends from the province of Quebec coming here, after having captured that province by appeals not alone on the school question, but on other different questions of a disloyal nature, and they cry out for our sympathy against the bishops. Why, the Solicitor General told us that he endorsed all the bishops had done, and he thought they were perfectly right in the course they had pursued. The clerical gentleman opposite (Mr. Maxwell) declared that the bishops should be deterred from coercing men, and he stated that the Roman Catholic people of Quebec had a perfect right to go to the powers they looked to, and he endorsed the action of the Government in sending these emissaries to Rome. Sir, I ask, where is the proper place for redress of grievances in civil matters. It is in this legislative hall, or in the courts of the country. There is no grievance under British law but has its remedy. Every lawyer knows that one of the first principles of law is that every grievance has its proper redress under British law, and if the members of the Government and the people of the province of Quebec felt aggrieved, they should have had recourse to the courts of the country, and if the courts did not afford them sufficient protection, they should have come to Parliament where every civil grievance can be redressed. I have never yet found, and I presume that no member of Parliament or elector of this or any other country has ever found an offence so great, that it did not find its apologist even in the ranks of the clergy, and the apology of our clerical friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Maxwell) reminds me of the following lines:—

Where with the hymns the ghostly fathers sung
Mingled the groans by subtle torture wrung,
Heaven's anthem blending with the shriek of hell!
The midnight of Bartholemew—the stake
Of Smithfield, and that thrice-accursed flame
Which Calvin kindled by Geneva's lake,—
New England's scaffold, and the priestly sneer
Which mocked its victims in that hour of fear,
When guilt itself a human tear might claim,— Bear witness, O Thou wronged and merciful One!
That Earth's most hateful crimes have in Thy Name been done!

And so we find here that a clergyman of the Presbyterian Church has the hardihood to stand before Parliament, and endorse the action of the Prime Minister and four of his colleagues and forty-five of his followers, in sending this memorial and these emissaries to Rome. If it were simply a religious matter, I would not care whether they went to Rome or to Mecca or to Canterbury, but I will read the first paragraph of the memorial to the Pope and hon. gentlemen will see from that, that it was not considered a religious matter but that it was looked upon as a constitutional question. The first paragraph says:

Most Holy Father,—We, the undersigned members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of Holy Church, to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue, might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country, as well as to the interests of the church itself.

They say it is dangerous, not to the church, alone, but to the constitutional liberties of the country. Right on the face of it these hon. gentlemen have for all time to come set a precedent for an appeal, on the part of any political party in this country to the Pope of Rome, in matters of temporal concern.

Mr. LAVERGNE. Is not that our business?

Mr. HUGHES. It is the right of any Roman Catholic citizen to appeal to Rome in matters concerning his church; but it is not the right of any citizen of this country to appeal to Rome in matters concerning the state. It is true, in the old days an offence of this kind would have met with legal punishment—with impeachment, or some other kind of punishment. To-day such offences are punished by public sentiment in the country, and I venture to say that neither in the province of Quebec—where the bishops, to their credit be it said, have stood manfully for the constitutional decision of the Judicial Committee of the Imperial Privy Council—nor in the province of Ontario, dare these gentlemen appeal to the people to-day, to test the issue now before us. I venture to say that at the very first opportunity the people of Canada have of expressing their approval or their disapproval of such conduct as this, public opinion in this country will condemn these hon. gentlemen most severely. Contrast the policy of the Conservatives in the province of Quebec with that of the Liberals. The Conservatives have stood loyally by the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council, while the Liberals, after using this cry to get into power, now declare that they will force into line the men who put them into office by overriding the judgment of the Queen's Privy Council and appealing to Rome. I tell them that the conduct of the bishops stands out prominently to their credit, in comparison with the conduct of these gentlemen, who have overridden that judgment by appealing to the Pope of Rome. I have listened very carefully to the speeches of all the hon. gentlemen on the other side, and not one of them has given a solitary reason for their appeal to Rome other than the design to bolster themselves in office. They have not given one solitary instance of clerical tyranny.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. HUGHES. I notice that the leader of the P. P. A. organization in the Dominion, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) cheers that statement. They have not produced one solitary instance in which the communion or the sacrament has been refused—I do not know the technical terms of these matters, and I trust that our friends will make allowance for me. They have not given one instance in which a body has been refused burial in consecrated ground. And yet gentlemen from the province of Ontario, who stand up and boast of their Presbyterianism and their Protestantism—I could name many of them—have over and over again aided and abetted the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in forbidding their people to vote as they pleased. Even the Rev. Dr. Caven, a gentleman whom I respect very much, has more than once come to the rescue of his old friends, Archbishop Lynch and Archbishop Cleary, and worked his friends into line, to serve the purposes of these gentlemen in the province of Ontario; and Sir Oliver Mowat has done the same thing. It was all right then, when they were getting the votes. It was then our ox that was being gored; but today the shoe is on the other foot, and it does my heart good to see these gentlemen squirm under the lash of the bishops. I believe a cry was raised on behalf of the predecessor of this "Le Soleil" paper "L'Electeur," because it was brought under the ban of the church. If a clergyman of my church tried to bull-doze me, as to what paper I should read, I would very quickly turn him to the right-about.

Some hon. MEMBERS. What church?

Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. HUGHES. This is a free country, and my religion is a matter which concerns only my conscience and my God. I venture to say that no man in the province of Quebec has ever been refused the sacrament, or has ever lost a day's wages for reading that paper. He need not give up reading it unless he likes; he need not obey his bishop unless he likes; this is a free country. Who are the gentlemen appealing to us for sympathy? Who is the man on whose behalf this appeal for sympathy is made? Mr. Pacaud. And who is he? I need not speak of his connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway. I will simply say that this is the man who raised the "parti-national" cry in the province of Quebec, the cry that carried Mercier into power. And what was that cry? "A bas les Orangistes d'Ontario"—"we must build up a French nation on the banks of the St. Lawrence." These were the cries raised by this gentleman who edited that paper.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Mr. Pacaud has nothing to do with that paper at all. It is owned by a company.

Mr. HUGHES. It does not matter whether or not he has anything to do with this paper. He certainly had to do with "L'Electeur." This good, pious gentleman, who has been blessed by the church, who has received some decoration or title or fixing-up from Rome for his previous services, and was afterwards forced to bring out that paper under another name—who is he? The man who drove an English-speaking girl from the post office in the city of Quebec—who attacked her in his paper until people refused to receive letters from that office. This is the gentleman we are asked to exercise our sympathy or pity for, because he has now a quarrel on his hands with the bishops who were his former friends. I say, God bless the bishops for lashing him.

An hon. MEMBER. Tell of Pacaud's stealing in the Baie des Chaleurs Railway.

Mr. HUGHES. I said I would not refer to the stealing he did in connection with the Baie des Chaleurs Railway; the country is well acquainted with the history of that transaction. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not find it easy to work up any feeling of sympathy in Ontario for this gentleman because of his present quarrel with the bishops. In his paper he has always appealed to the worst forms of fanaticism in the province of Quebec, and has always inspired hatred of everything English. It is all very well for these gentlemen, now that they are in office, to say, Let us have peace on this school question. Who kept this agitation alive? Hon. gentlemen opposite know that in one province they had one cry, and in another province they had another cry—playing everywhere upon the prejudices of the people. On some platforms, it is true, leading speakers would talk of sunny ways, and of living in peace and harmony; but along the side roads and on the hustings in back districts words of hatred were used, and prejudices were appealed to, in order to secure the return of hon. gentlemen opposite to power. They must go some place else than Ontario to get sympathy for Mr. Pacaud and his friends in his quarrel with the bishops. He has stirred them up and brought the quarrel upon himself. Now, I do not think it is necessary that I should take up any more of the time of the House on this part of the question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on, go on.

Mr. HUGHES. I can, if necessary, give other and more detailed incidents in connection with the history of this agitation and the men who are behind it; but I am satisfied that the Conservative party of the province of Quebec and the bishops of that province have found out their man, and I don't think that his record is such as to entitle him to any sympathy in this House. I see my hon. friend the Postmaster General here. He is a very genial gentleman and not at all backward in the use of the most questionable means when his object is to secure an election.

An hon. MEMBER. Is he a member of the P. P. A.?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not vouch for the fact that he has been regularly initiated and ridden the goat, but I do know that he has engineered that organization. I do know that he had a number of these gentlemen employed in the recent North Ontario election, and in his pay, establishing lodges in that constituency.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). Lest the hon. gentleman's remarks might be taken seriously, I wish to say that the statement he has made is absolutely without foundation in fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. gentleman recall the statement?

Mr. HUGHES. Most assuredly I must take my hon. friend's word so far as it concerns himself, but I do not think I am out of order in proving my case and in referring to what took place in the recent North Ontario election, when the hon. Postmaster General opened the ball. He was a Patron there. He sat on the platform at the opening meeting, and I have a poster here announcing that meeting, where the Patron, D. O. Currie, was assisted by the hon. Postmaster General. And as this might possibly be denied if I did not produce the bill, I show it to the House. The first meeting was held in the town hall of Scott, and was addressed by the hon. Postmaster General, and among the speakers appears first the name of Mr. Curry, whom we all know as one of the Patrons who sold himself to the Liberal party last June. The campaign was opened there by the Postmaster General, allied with the Patron organization. He did very well, he made a very nice speech, which I had reported, as I always did the speeches of these hon. gentlemen, so that we could show the public how, when they were in a Roman Catholic centre, they pleaded for the oppressed Roman Catholics of Manitoba, and how, when in Protestant districts, they took exactly the opposite line. The hon. Postmaster General will not deny that he is acquainted with a gentleman named John Shields, of "frozen whisky fame."

Mr. BENNETT. Where did they have Col. O'Brien riding the Protestant horse?

Mr. HUGHES. They had him in Simcoe assisting them there. The hon. gentleman will not deny that he knows a gentleman named Geo. W. Dawson, who stood up in this House, within the memory of many present, and endeavoured to bring down on an hon. member of this House its censure because he had, outside these walls, spoken on matters connected with a foreign country. How is it that now we do not find any of these gentlemen seeking to obtain the censure of this House on certain members for having gone to Rome? Mr. Dawson was in there under somebody's pay. He and others of the party were very lavish with money, and the bars were running freely. There was also a young barrister from Toronto named Threlkeld, who engineered the general election in North York for the hon. Postmaster General. Then there was a gentleman named Caldwell who said: We have been sent in here by the Postmaster General, he took us down to Cornwall and Stormont, and we just doctored those old Scotchmen and Micks down there in great shape. There was also a gentleman named Switzer, who had been taken to Cornwall by the Postmaster General, and who also was brought into North Ontario with those I have named, and with others. One of these gentlemen, a man named McWhirter, obtained leave of absence from his situation in Toronto in order to go and bury a dead brother in New York.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He buried a lot of Tories in North Ontario, instead.

Mr. HUGHES. Only one member of this House from the province of Ontario has the hardihood to applaud that remark.

Mr. SPEAKER. If this case is before the courts, it is not in order to bring it before Parliament.

Mr. HUGHES. I am not discussing the corrupt practices which will assuredly interest the hon. gentleman when he comes before the courts, but I am merely speaking of his establishing those P. P. A. lodges, and that is not contrary to the election law. Mr. McWhirter came in there, and Mr. John Shields, of frozen whisky fame, Mr. Colwell, Mr. Dickson, Mr. Dawson, ex-M.P., Mr.

Switzer, and scores more, and they all went round endeavouring to establish P. P. A. lodges. They came into the gallant old township of Brock, and said they came in there under the direction of the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General was there anyway and he had brought them there from Cornwall, so they said, where they were pretty lavish of money. These gentlemen went around and they said: "Boys, you have to stand by your guns. These bishops in Quebec are just going to smash Laurier right out of power. Rama and Mara are going solid for McLeod." They flaunt the banner of Protestantism in the Orange centres. Then they would go to the Roman Catholic districts, and would say: Look at the settlement Laurier has given you, and see what a fine one it is. They would recite the various clauses of the Laurier-Greenway school deal, declare it was a grand settlement, and appeal to the Catholics on that line. There was another story which they circulated there and which even my good friend the hon. Postmaster General went so far as to endorse. It was that the Conservative candidate, Mr. McLeod was the man who had paid Margaret L. Shepard to go in there and establish P. P. A. lodges some years ago. They had active workers, Ontario officials and others, all engaged in the good cause, and who went from place to place appealing, privately, to the Protestants to elect Duncan Graham because—I do not say that the Postmaster General said this, but his canvassers did—the hon. Postmaster General wanted Duncan Graham elected so as to have another Protestant from Ontario, at any cost, as he was afraid to trust these Frenchmen behind Laurier from the province of Quebec.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Will the hon. gentleman permit me for one moment? If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will say that everything that the hon. gentleman has said concerning me personally, including the last remark, is absolutely devoid of truth, if I am within the rules in saying so. The hon. gentleman is absolutely mistaken in saying that I ever made such a remark about my French compatriots. I do not intend to follow the hon. gentleman and deny anything further he may say concerning me, because I feel that in doing so, I am only encouraging him in making these inaccurate statements.

Mr. HUGHES. I have carefully refrained from saying that the hon. Postmaster General said these things. I am telling that I can produce fifty affidavits to show what his agents did—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must accept the statement of the Postmaster General on a matter which the Postmaster General knows and the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) does not know.

Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. HUGHES. I have not charged the hon. Postmaster General with saying this. What I do say, and it is a thing which I know and the hon. Postmaster General does not, I should say, may not know, is that the statements were made. And I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, and the Postmaster General, and the hon. members of this House that the Liberal canvassers did use these statements repeatedly. So I have nothing to take back and nothing to accept from the hon. Postmaster General. I will give him one more assertion and he will not have the hardihood to get up and deny it. It will surprise many in this House to learn that in the village of Sunderland the hon. gentleman stood side by side with D. O. Currie on the platform at a meeting at which they were canvassing the people of that locality for their votes. It is a Methodist temperance locality. Mr. Currie had the hardihood to stand up and say that your order, Mr. Speaker, closing the bar here was issued in order to keep the Conservative members from getting intoxicated down below, and the Postmaster General followed this up by stating that he had issued an order in reference to his department to the effect that any officer who was guilty of a second offence against the law of sobriety must walk the plank, that he was determined that temperance should rule in his department. I give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of denying that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I never heard any such statement with regard to the Conservative members of this House made by Mr. D. O. Currie or by any other public speaker on the platform in North Ontario, or in any other riding. As to what the hon. gentleman says in regard to my own department, I may say that I was requested by a gentleman in the audience in Sunderland to speak of my own department, and I did proceed to make some reference to the state of my department which I am prepared to repeat in the presence of any responsible gentleman. In the course of that explanation, I may have said—and if I did, I stated the literal truth that among the features of the department requiring organization, I found it necessary in the public interest, in connection with the railway mail service, to see to it that Her Majesty's mails were entrusted only to persons in every respect fit for that responsibility. This I found necessary because I had had occasion to suspend from duty several mail clerks—and I am sorry to be obliged to state this here, but the question has been put by the hon. gentleman—because of their having been found guilty of intoxication when in charge of the mails. For this reason I issued a general order—and I now state it publicly—that any mail clerk found under the influence of liquor when on duty or about to enter upon duty, should be suspended for a period of three months.

that his suspension should continue until he gave evidence of permanent reformation, and, if reinstated and if he lapsed, that lapse should be regarded as a practical severance of his connection with the service. That is my policy in regard to that matter.

Mr. HUGHES. I am very much pleased to hear the remarks of the hon. gentleman. But I regret that he feels called upon to apologize for making them here. If it was right to make such an announcement on the public platform at a campaign meeting in Sunderland, there surely should be no reason why he should hesitate or apologize about making it in Parliament. It just shows that in carrying on his canvass he was taking advantage of every little quirk. He could not, without apology make the statement in Parliament, but he made it on the stump for the purpose of impressing the temperance people. And at the same time his agents were out establishing P. P. A. lodges, and squandering money lavishly over hotel bars.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have denied that.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for North Victoria really must not trifle with the rules of the House. The hon. Postmaster General has denied that statement at least once. I heard him distinctly. The hon. member for North Victoria must accept—

Mr. HUGHES. If you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, I will put it in the form of a question. I would ask him and he will not dare to deny it, was John Shields—we all know him, John Shields of frozen whisky fame—or Caldwell, or McWhirter or Switzer—were these men or any of them out establishing P. P. A. lodges by his invitation or by his direction?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can cross-examine a Minister if he chooses.

Mr. HUGHES. He cannot deny it. And whether or not he will deny that they were establishing P. P. A. lodges, I do not know; but I do know, as a matter of fact, that they were. I merely pointed this out to show that not only in general elections, but in by-elections the same means that our friends say were resorted to in Bonaventure and in Wright were resorted to in favour of the Liberal candidate in North Victoria. And our good friend the Postmaster General came to North Ontario and visited the homes, the kitchens all round the country and displayed an interest in the canvass that no Minister of the Crown in Canada ever descended to before. He made himself the leader of the house-to-house and to meeting campaign, and he did it in order to elect a Patron in order to elect a Protestant, because they "could not trust these 'Frenchmen' who were behind them." That is a quotation, Mr. Speaker, not an original remark. More than that, I want to tell these gentlemen that the Liberal-Conservative cause is not dead in North Ontario, or in that part of the province. In spite of all the forces against them—and I could name to you sixty-three Ontario Government officials and paid agents of these gentlemen who were in the riding, swarming all over it—the Liberal-Conservative party in that riding polled sixty more votes than it ever polled before. There is a matter that is before the courts, and which I shall not do more than refer to at the present time. It will undoubtedly furnish food for discussion at some other time. They talk about the ballot stuffing in Manitoba. Why, nothing that our Liberal-Conservative friends did there could compare with what was done on the Reform side in North Ontario. Take one case. In the village of Vroomanton on the morning of the election a stranger presented himself as a voter. He was handed what purposed to be one ballot by the returning officer, and went in to mark it. When he came out he demanded of the returning officer what he meant by giving him six ballots. The returning officer had mistaken his man. "Oh," he says, "I thought you were a friend." He handed that man six ballots. He was a Liberal-Conservative, though, and only marked one of them, and came out in the presence of all the persons assembled and returned the five ballots. During the afternoon the same officer was caught giving extra ones to another man. Throughout the riding our scrutineers trusted these people to be honest, until a few days later when they found how the thing had been done. Talk of corruption in the Northwest! In spite of corruption in North Ontario, the Liberal-Conservative candidate, if he had his just dues on the ballots in the boxes, would now be occupying that seat.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there are a great many other questions arising out of the Address. One is a remark made by the First Minister that no man should be dismissed but for cause. I asked a question in this House only yesterday, and was informed officially that four gentlemen, I think, three gentlemen concerning whom I asked, had been dismissed without cause. One day the First Minister says that no man should be dismissed but for cause, that an investigation should be held, and each one be given a chance to make a defence, that every charge should be investigated; yet the next day or so the First Minister's statement is contradicted by one of his own Ministers who says that men have been dismissed without trial, that men have been dismissed without cause, and that the charges have not been investigated. I join heartily in the desire that mutual concessions should be made all round in relation to the different races that inhabit this Dominion. If we are ever to be a great country we must be united, although I must say that a little discussion of this kind once in a while does not do any harm. Take the early days in English history when the old struggles between the Saxon and Norman were going on; take the struggles along the Welsh border between Celt and Saxon, and along the Scottish border of England and Scotland, or between Highlanders and Lowlanders. I have no doubt in the world that the struggles between the various races in those days tended to bring out all that is good and all that is great in those people, and have largely assisted in placing that united race at the head of the world as it now is. So, Sir, although there may be discussions backwards and forwards, though there may be French questions and Manitoba school questions coming up, I have no fear that, if proper judgment is used in the contest, the upshot will be the ultimate fusion of the two races in the one grand and noble Canadian race.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It was not my intention to speak upon this subject, nor would I rise at this hour were it not that I intend to speak very briefly. Inasmuch, however, as I represent a Manitoba constituency. I thought it probable that I might be able to contribute something of some slight value to this discussion. It has been a matter of considerable regret to myself to observe the manner in which this question has been discussed. When this question came up in the North-west the people of Manitoba looked upon it with deep concern. The problem that we had to solve was how to establish one system of efficient schools in the province of Manitoba. You, Sir, and the members of this House, will recognize the desirability of having one system in a province that is so sparsely populated. You will understand that in districts where there may be only ten or twelve families, a few of which would be of the Roman Catholic persuasion whilst the majority were of the Protestant persuasion, it is almost impossible to establish and maintain two efficient systems of schools. Where that plan was tried we found that these schools were not properly equipped, that it was not possible to employ properly certificated teachers, and the result was that the children did not receive a proper education. That, Sir, is the principal reason why the legislature of Manitoba moved to abolish separate schools, and to establish one system of national public schools. The object was not to strike at the Roman Catholics of Manitoba, or at the Roman Catholics of the Dominion of Canada; the sole object was to secure efficient schools for all the children in the province. I think if hon. gentlemen will bear that fact in mind from the start, they will be better able to understand this question and to deal with it from a more patriotic and fair-minded standpoint, than it has been dealt with by some hon. gentlemen in the discussion to which we have listened. It must be remembered that the Manitoba School Act of 1890 was passed to meet the wishes of a small minority who desired to have separate schools established. Now, I will ask the hon. members of this House, and I will ask the people of Canada whether it is right that because a small handful of natives—a few thousand unlettered people, forsooth, sought to fasten upon the province of Manitoba, upon that great western progressive province, a system of separate schools which would be a serious detriment and obstacle to the cause of education for all time to come, I would ask whether such a system, even if once established, by means to which I do not now care to refer although they are a matter of history, should be for ever continued. The legislature of Manitoba, representing the people of that great province, came to the conclusion that if that province, if that western country, were to enter on a career of prosperity, one of the most certain means to accomplish that much desired object would be to abolish the system of separate schools, and replace it by a system of national public schools. The province had but a limited revenue at its disposal, and the people had found it impossible to keep two systems of schools in operation. I may say, Sir, that after these separate schools were abolished, and before the struggle began to have them restored, the people of Manitoba were deeply stirred over the question and were resolute in their determination to maintain the new system in its integrity. When the question of making a settlement came up the people were prepared to make a reasonable arrangement providing the national principle in their new school system was protected. We did not oppose separate schools because we had any feelings of hostility towards our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens, but because we desired to see the best interests of that province protected, so that it might become great and prosperous. I am satisfied the House will agree with me that that was a most desirable object. Now, Sir, when the recent settlement was arranged, I may say, as one who edited a newspaper that led the fight in that province for national schools, that that settlement was not entirely satisfactory to me, that that settlement was not entirely satisfactory to a great number of the non-Catholic people in Manitoba; but for the sake of peace and concord, for the sake of being able to live in amity with our French and Catholic fellow-citizens, we were willing to make sacrifices on many points which although important we did not probably regard as vital. I may say, for instance, that we objected very strongly to that clause which provides that Roman Catholic teachers shall be employed under certain circumstances, because we saw that it was a special recognition in law, of one denomination, and we in that western country, desiring to build up one great nationality, believed that the recognition of any denomination in the settlement was not consistent with the policy we had set ourselves out to carry through. However, we conceded that point, and we thought at the time, as we still think, that we were conceding a great deal. Then there was the question of teaching in different languages. That was another point that was difficult to accept, but when it was pointed out that it was necessary to employ other languages than English in order to impart instruction to a considerable number of children, that point also was yielded. So, Sir, I say that the people of Manitoba themselves have not felt that this settlement is all that could have been desired; and they yielded many points, as I have already said, in order to secure peace and harmony. I must say that there is no foundation for the charge that the people and Government of Manitoba conceded to the Laurier Government what they were not willing to concede to the commissioners sent up by the late Government. Almost everything that these commissioners desired, and little more, has been conceded in this settlement; and when the House understands that the majority in Manitoba have made these concessions, considerable in their view, in order to secure a settlement that would be satisfactory to all moderate men, hon. gentlemen will be prepared to look upon this question in a more conciliatory and patriotic frame of mind.

I may say further that in the Speech from the Throne which the Manitoba Government placed in the mouth of the Lieutenant-Governor at the last session, Mr. Greenway promised to administer the School Act in a spirit of tolerance, conciliation and fair-play to the minority. An expression of that kind means more, probably, than the words employed would indicate, and if these people who wish to stir up strife and keep the question alive would drop their agitation, it would enable Mr. Greenway to treat the minority in the fairest and kindest manner. I should like to ask this House what could possibly be gained by disturbing the settlement of the Manitoba school question. People cannot possibly hope that, even if that settlement were upset, any more satisfactory conditions would be obtained by the minority. That settlement has behind it the people of Manitoba, and the people of that province, and I state it with all sincerity and definiteness, are prepared to stand by the settlement as final; and I state further, that I do not believe the people of Manitoba will ever yield another point. I do not consider any government could exist one hour if it proposed that separate schools should be restored or that settlement should be disturbed, or any further concessions given to the minority. I sat on the floor of the legislature about two weeks ago when the Bill adopting this settlement passed its second reading, and I think there were only three votes, three French votes, recorded against that settlement in a legislature composed of some forty members. That fact shows to this House and the country what the people of Manitoba think of this settlement, and, as I have said, the people of that province were never more thoroughly in earnest or more determined on any point than they are in guarding their national schools. The people of Manitoba are resolved to stand by this settlement. They desire, however, that their children shall attend the same schools as are attended by the French and Catholic children. They in that western country desire that the children should grow up learning to respect and love each other, and it is because of that great principle the people of the west are determined to stand by their public national school system. With respect to the alleged mission to the Pope, I may say that at first when I heard it spoken of, it seemed to me to be a mistake; but when I heard the Minister of Public Works read from his place the letter sent to His Holiness, I came to the conclusion that the matter had been misrepresented. I am a Protestant, but I desire to extend to my Roman Catholic fellow-citizens the right to appeal to their church on matters affecting themselves. The appeal to the Pope was not with respect to the school question whatever, but it was an appeal to His Holiness to send a delegate to Canada in order that he might settle some differences which exist between the people and the clergy of the province of Quebec. Viewing the matter in that light, I see no necessity for condemning it in any respect. I promised I would speak only a few minutes, and I have finished what I have to say. I would urge this House to think quietly and calmly over this Manitoba school question. The House should remember that this is a matter which affects the people of Manitoba and the North-west and them alone, and hon. members should say that so far as they are concerned, they propose to leave Manitoba to work out its destiny in its own way.

Mr. CHAUVIN. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, it was certainly not my intention to take part in this debate, and if I now rise in my place to address the House, it is because the words fallen from the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Talbot) and from the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) against the Catholic clergy of my province, make it incumbent upon me to reply to such attacks. The hon. Minister of Public Works won an easy triumph. We have just seen him, amidst the plaudits of those who sit around him, slinging mud at the face of the bishops of his own church. Well might I retort upon the hon. gentleman, by quoting the words of Count de Montalembert and tell him that those cheers were the fitting chastisement—or, to use a more parliamentary expression—the fitting reward of his utterances. Surely, the hon. gentleman must have taken to heart the lecture and the upbraiding administered to him by the hon. member who championed before this House the right of the bishops to interfere, in their capacity of citizens, in political matters, a right which they have always made use of in the general interests of the country. I am sure the hon. gentleman must likewise have keenly felt the stings of conscience, after the hon. member telling him that it was the right of every religious community to settle as they pleased their own domestic disputes. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) told the House, the other day, that he had gone to Rome, not on behalf of the Government of the Dominion of Canada, but in his own private capacity and that he had obtained from the Pope the appointment of a papal delegate to Canada. The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) will allow me to dissent from him, when he boasts and assumes the credit of having been instrumental in obtaining that honour. The Pope, whose sovereignty and moral prestige are acknowledged the world over, is not likely to grant to the first comer and under the most futile pretence, such an honour as the sending of a papal delegate, as distinguished as is the prelate whose arrival in our midst has been hailed by the whole Catholic people of Quebec, and whose presence in the Capital of the Dominion, notwithstanding the murmurs which may be heard from the hon. gentlemen opposite, will be cheered within the walls of Parliament, with the same respect and admiration. Sir, it was as a member of the Dominion Government that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) repaired to the Vatican and sought an audience from the Sovereign Pontiff, just as it was as members of this House and of the Senate, as remarked the other day by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) that those forty-five gentlemen signed the memorial to the Pope which was read in the House, the other day. Now, granting that it was in their official capacity, as members of Parliament and of the Ministry, that these hon. gentlemen signed the memorial to the Pope, and that it was on that petition that the delegate was sent to Canada, it follows as a matter of course that the Government assume the responsibility for the appointment of the ablegate. Now, as far as I gather from that memorial, the mission of the ablegate may have a two-fold object; he may have been sent here either to discipline the bishops, in connection with their interference in politics, or, if we take the statement made on the floor of this House by the hon. Solicitor General, and the editorials published in the London "Tablet," which were read here the other day, or the utterances of the ablegate himself, on his arrival in this country, when he expressed his surprise because the Manitoba legislature had passed their School Bill without waiting his arrival, he may have been delegated here in order to help the Government or certain members of the Ministry to settle more efficaciously, more easily the Manitoba school difficulty. As to his coming here to discipline the bishops, that is a matter of no concern either to the Government or to Parliament, nor would thereby the British constitution be jeopardized, as pretended by some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Should he, on the other hand, come here to assist the Government or certain members of the Ministry, in settling the school trouble, then, I ask, why did the Government have it stated, in the Speech from the Throne, that the question was settled and that a new era was ushered in. And should the ablegate come here to help the Government in settling at rest this question, the very first words uttered by the prelate on his arrival in our midst, would go to show that he expected that nothing would be done by the Government and their allies in connection with the School Act, pending his arrival. That being so, the ablegate expected that the Government and their Manitoba allies would at least consent to a truce, either in the Manitoba legislature or in this House, on the school question. Now, I ask, why did not the Government or some of their friends, obtain such a truce from the Manitoba Government? Is it to be inferred therefrom that the Government's action was discourteous towards the eminent prelate whom they have asked the Pope to send here? Notwithstanding the provoking and injurious words uttered on the floor of this House, the other day, by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), against the Catholic clergy of his province, I cannot bring myself to believe that the Ministry should be guilty of such a gross breach of etiquette towards so august a personage. Now, granting that the Ministry have not, wilfully, made themselves guilty of such a breach of etiquette, or that they have had nothing to do with the delay occasioned in the arrival of the delegate here, they have, to say the least, shown a sad lack of prestige and authority over the Manitoba Government, as they could not even secure from the latter an armistice, until the arrival of the papal delegate in our midst. The members of the Government who signed the famous memorial to the Pope have evidenced how little influence they enjoy on their colleagues, as they could not even succeed in prevailing upon the Manitoba legislature to adjourn their Bill, pending the arrival of the delegate. Those members of the Government, I say, Sir, have, therefore, shown their utter lack of prestige and influence on their colleagues in the Ministry. They have falsified the pledges given to the papal delegate, who is now in our midst, just as they have set at naught the pledges given to the Catholic voters in the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, before resuming my seat. I wish to say a few words in English, in reply to those hon. gentlemen who attacked us in connection with the mission to Rome. Those hon. gentlemen who denied Catholics the right, as British citizens, of appealing to Rome and kneeling down before the throne of Peter, to beseech his advice and protection, do not understand a word of our religious and political beliefs. Those who went to Rome and who are waiting, in a spirit of obedience, for the decision of the Pope, had first appealed to and sought redress for their grievances from the highest and most august tribunal in England. The trouble is that those hon. gentlemen who charge us with lacking loyalty and fidelity to British institutions do not first begin by setting an example to us and obeying the judgment delivered in favour of the Manitoba Catholics by the highest tribunal in the British Empire, the Privy Council of Her Majesty.

I am surprised, Mr. Speaker, to see that the same men who found fault with those who appealed to Rome for guidance on politico-religious questions are the very same men who, when we appealed to the highest tribunal in the British Realm, sided with those who refused to submit to that highest British tribunal. Some may have appealed to Rome but it must not be forgotten that they first appealed to British justice to which we were willing to submit, but they are not willing to do so.

After Recess.

Mr. CLARKE. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to take any part in this debate, and I shall occupy the attention of the House for a few minutes only. I am constrained to say something, however, because the burden of the speeches which have been delivered on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne has consisted very largely of comments and opinions on the settlement which has been reached in reference to the Manitoba school difficulty. In anything that I may say I do not hope to give any information to the House, but I deem it due to myself to place my opinion on record as to the wisdom or unwisdom of this settlement. I desire to emphasize the opinion that has been expressed by some hon. members on this side of the House, and to say, that so far as I am concerned, this Manitoba school question has been practically settled by the agreement which was reached between hon. gentlemen opposite and the Government of Manitoba, and by the crystallization of that agreement into an Act which has received its third reading and being passed by the legislature of the province of Manitoba.

Now, Sir, I say that this question, in my judgment, is settled, and I say it not only for the reason I have given, but also because, as I understand it, there are only two legislative bodies in this Canada of ours which have the right or the authority to deal with this question. One of these bodies is the Parliament of Canada, and the Parliament, at a recent session, a session held not more than twelve months ago, tried ineffectually by legislation to interfere with the school affairs of the province of Manitoba. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that the failure which attended the efforts of the gentlemen who were then in power—efforts which were put forth, I am sure, with the sole idea of doing what they considered an act of justice to the minority in Manitoba—the failure, I say, which attended their efforts on that occasion will deter others from making similar efforts in the future in this House to coerce by legislation any of the provinces in regard to matters that have been relegated to them under the constitution. When the legislature of Manitoba enacted amendments to the school law of 1890, I felt bound to consider the character of these amendments, and having done so carefully, I am forced to the conclusion that it is my duty, as a member of this House, to support the agreement as reached, and to support the legislation which has been enacted by the province. The advantages which have been obtained by the settlement of this vexed question are not all that either side to the controversy desires; but when it is considered that this settlement is a compromise, I think that most fair-minded men will agree that it is a fair compromise and a compromise that will meet with the support of the great majority of the people of this country. It has been pointed out by many hon. members who addressed the House that there are objections to the settlement. I am free to confess that there are many and grave objections, and I refer particularly to the clause which makes it compulsory for school trustees in certain districts, and on certain conditions, to employ teachers of a particular faith. I think that is a grave objection; but as I understand the question, it was necessary in order to provide for religious instruction being given in the schools that such a condition as the one I complain of should be embodied in the settlement. It is my opinion that in the employment of teachers the trustees should have the fullest liberty. In the appointment of a teacher, his efficiency as an instructor of youth should, I believe, be the only qualification demanded from him. While I object to that clause of the agreement, still I think it is better even with an objectionable clause of that kind that it should be accepted and this school controversy settled. But while there are objectionable points in the settlement, there are undoubtedly many points of advantage, and these ought not to be lost sight of. It is the recognition of the advantages that will arise from the settlement that prompts me to give it my support. In the first place, this settlement secures and guarantees to the people of Manitoba, for all time to come, the existence of a national non-sectarian system of schools. That is the main and the prime reason why I support that settlement. The people of Manitoba had the experience for many years of a dual system of education, and they found that system did not work as smoothly or as efficiently as a school system ought to work. In view of the sparse settlement of the country, in view of the few inhabitants in the country, it was believed, and events have fully justified the belief, that the wiping away of the old system and the establishment of a common national system would secure better results than had been obtained previously. This settlement, in addition to maintaining and perpetuating the system of national non-sectarian schools, also provides for qualified teachers for all the schools in the province. I am sure it cannot be said that prior to the establishment of the system of national schools in Manitoba all the teachers in that province were qualified in the proper sense of the term; this, therefore, is a substantial advantage, and one that will be continued for all time to come. Then, the settlement provides for a rigid system of inspection, so that the schools shall be kept up to the standard. Surely that is a condition which we ought to approve of and support. The settlement also provides for the election of school trustees by ballot. Every elector in the province of Manitoba will have the right to use his franchise freely by means of the ballot, so that no coercion can be exercised over him in the discharge of that important duty of citizenship. Then, this settlement provides that the same curriculum shall be used in all the schools, which in my humble judgment is another great advantage. Further, if availed of by all the people, this settlement will enable the children of the people of Manitoba to obtain the blessings of a common school education at much less cost to the taxpayers than they could be obtained under a dual system. It brings together, too, under the one school roof the children of parents who hold diverse religious views; and I am sure the commingling of these children, and their being brought up together from the school age will promote good feeling among the people of that province, and set an example which we in the older provinces might do well to imitate. This settlement also meets the scruples of certain classes of people by providing opportunities for imparting religious instruction; and it makes provision for giving the children of the minority a knowledge of the language of the majority.

Mr. CLARKE.

Under all these circumstances, and in view of all the advantages which are obtained by this settlement, I feel constrained to give it my hearty support. Speaking generally, it provides for a system of national education, non-sectarian in character, that is not excelled in any province of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite ask for support of this settlement, and speak of it as being a desirable settlement; and yet I respectfully draw their attention to the fact that gentlemen who are opposed to them in politics have time and again striven to obtain for the children of some of the people of this province of Ontario advantages such as have been secured by this settlement for all the children of the province of Manitoba, and we have been always met by the active and bitter hostility of hon. gentlemen opposite and their friends. I wonder if those gentlemen who approve of the introduction of the ballot for the election of school trustees in Manitoba will support a proposition to give all the school electors of the province of Ontario the right to elect their school trustees by ballot? I wonder if they will demand from their friends who are in power in Ontario the same qualifications for separate school teachers that have been secured by this agreement for the province of Manitoba? I feel satisfied that they will do nothing of the kind. Yet I feel constrained to support this settlement, because I believe it to be in the best interests, not only of the people of Manitoba, but of the people of Canada generally, that this burning subject, which has disturbed this country for the last six or seven years, should be finally set at rest.

Now, it appears from what has been said by many hon. gentlemen in this House, that while we have been congratulating ourselves on a settlement of the Manitoba school question, there is some reason to doubt whether we have reached a final settlement of the matter or not. I take it that so far as this Parliament is concerned, the matter has passed from our hands, and that any further action that may be taken in the matter or any amendments to the school law that may be required, should be confined to the legislature of Manitoba. But it appears that we have not yet reached that happy state. Within the last few months we have read and heard of delegations crossing the Atlantic and paying visits to the Eternal City, and for what purpose? We have been assured by hon. gentlemen opposite and by their press throughout the country that this Manitoba school business has been settled; but, we ask, why these delegations to Rome that have been crossing the Atlantic in mid-winter? We are told that they are being sent over to secure the aid and co-operation of His Holiness the Pope in settling domestic disputes in the church in the province of Quebec with regard to matters of faith and religion, with which I take it those who are not Catholics have nothing whatever to do. But, Sir, when we examine what the distinguished gentleman and prelate who has been sent from Rome to Canada says with regard to his mission, we must come to the conclusion, as reasonable and honest men, that he has been sent out here to aid these gentlemen in coming to some further settlement or some further arrangement in connection with this school business.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARKE. Gentlemen say "oh, oh," and laugh. I find in the "Globe," of March 30th, reproduced from the Montreal "Herald," reports of interviews which took place with the Papal delegate upon his arrival in New York, to the following effect :

In an interview with a reporter of the "Herald," who went to New York to meet the delegate, Monseigneur Merry Del Val said : "My mission is one of peace, and I sincerely hope that it may prove successful. I shall lose no time in reaching Canada, and see the members of the Government at Ottawa very shortly."

"You intend, then, to act with the members of this Government in anything you may do in connection with this matter?"

"Oh, I should not care to say that. It will, of course, depend on circumstances entirely. Then, you see, the settlement has been completed. I said a few words about that to a press representative before I left England. That interview as published is quite correct. I certainly said that I was very sorry that the legislature of Manitoba had acted so promptly, when the Pope had decided to send a representative to Canada."

The ablegate was reported as having stated in England before he sailed across the Atlantic :

The Bill passed by the Manitoba legislature embodying the Laurier and Greenway compromise, comes to me as a painful surprise, as it can hardly act favourably towards a settlement of the question to which I am addressing myself. I think it was due to the Pope to have waited until he had time to place before the Government his views and wishes.

Now, Sir, from the speeches that have been made in this House by gentlemen who signed that famous manifesto to the Pope, and who know whereof they speak, I think it must be clear to every person in this House that this delegate has come to Canada in response to the petition which they sent to the Holy Father ; and, Sir, if the Papal delegate expresses his views correctly in these interviews which I have quoted, he certainly understands that he is coming here not to settle a domestic dispute between members of the same church, but rather to aid as the representative of the Holy Father in the settlement of a matter which certainly ought to be settled by those most interested, the people of Canada, and by them alone. But, Mr. Speaker, in this same interview, the correspondent put this question :

I ask you whether your mission was undertaken with the view of approving or disapproving any settlement which the Government of the province of Manitoba might propose, or with the desire to study certain matters which appear to be at issue between the different schools of thought in the Catholic Church of Canada.

To that question the papal delegate replied :

I do not, for one moment, question the right of the Manitoba legislature to make what laws it may see fit ; but in every case where a settlement is arrived at, satisfaction is established, and in this case there are certainly quite a large number of persons interested who are not satisfied with the arrangements which have been made.

I take it then that the mission of this reverend gentleman to this country has been undertaken at the special request of hon. gentlemen opposite. I take it that he has come here in response to the memorial which they sent across the Atlantic, and has come not only, if possible, to settle the disputes which exist among the faithful, but also to interfere in the legislation of our domestic affairs. As one who sincerely hopes that the settlement arrived at will be a final settlement of the whole matter, I enter my most solemn protest against the action of the Government in appealing to an authority outside the Dominion of Canada or the British Empire regarding the settlement of a matter of importance primarily to the citizens of this country.

I listened with a good deal of interest and pleasure to the forcible oration made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the other night in this House and his strong appeal on behalf of civil liberty, equal rights and fair-play for gentlemen holding diverse political views in the province of Quebec, and I think that to that appeal—honestly made, as I believe it was—we should not turn a deaf ear. It is regrettable that a gentleman occupying the position of a Minister of the Crown should have, from his place in Parliament, to make the statement, which the hon. gentleman took the responsibility of making, of the condition of things existing in that province to-day. I listened with a good deal of interest to the statement which the hon. gentleman made of the condition of affairs in the sister province ; and I say that while we may congratulate ourselves, as loyal British subjects, upon the wonderful strides which all parts of the Empire have made during the long and glorious reign of Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, yet a dark spot in her wide dominion is this province of Quebec, if the hon. Minister of Public Works correctly presented to this House the condition of affairs which exists there at present. I notice, in the first place, in connection with this matter, that the petition sent by hon. gentlemen opposite to the Pop contains the following expression :—

The priest is a citizen, and we would not, for a single instant, deprive him of the right of expressing his opinion on any matter submitted to the electorate; but, when the exercise of that develops into violence, and when that violence, in the name of religion, goes to the extent of making a grievous sin out of a purely political act, there is an abuse of authority of which the consequences cannot but be fatal, not only to constitutional liberty, but to religion itself.

It seems to me that it is an extraordinary condition of affairs when a Minister of the Crown in Canada will appeal to a foreign authority, who is not subject to Her Majesty at all, for relief, assistance and protection in the enjoyment of his constitutional rights. Who is it that guarantees and secures to British subjects their constitutional rights? Surely it is not the Pope of Rome. Surely we ought not to have to appeal to that prelate for protection in the enjoyment of our constitutional rights. So far as I know, it is a case unparalleled in modern history, that gentlemen occupying the positions which hon. gentlemen opposite do, will unite together, ignoring the courts of this country, ignoring the legislatures of this country, ignoring the highest court of the realm, the Privy Council, and address themselves to a foreign potentate to ask for relief from the grievances and disabilities under which they labour as British subjects. Our fathers long ago declared that the Pope of Rome had no jurisdiction in this realm or Empire, but these gentlemen, by their action, appear to be pushing back the hands on the dial, when we find them going to Rome for the assistance they should demand from the Parliament of this country. Quoting again from the speech of the Minister of Public Works, let me draw attention to the condition of affairs which, he says, exists in the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman said:

We have appealed to Rome, as it was our right to do, from the attitude of certain members of the Roman Catholic clergy. We have appealed for liberty—for political freedom.

Is it not rather a strange condition of affairs when British subjects appeal to Rome for political freedom, ignoring altogether the constitution, the institutions of this country and the old land, whence our liberties have come? Further on the hon. gentleman said:

I am sorry to have to give the explanation which we are bound to give in order to put ourselves right before Canada. In the dioceses of Chicoutimi, Rimouski and Nicolet, and others, it was said, over and over again, in the pulpits, that it was a mortal sin to vote for a Liberal candidate. You seem to be surprised that in such a position some members of Parliament signed pledges. My only wonder is that many more did not sign them.

Further on the Minister of Public Works said:

I say, on my responsibility here, that some of the bishops told the Pope himself and the Propaganda that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of affairs to-day, is a very bad Roman Catholic indeed, and a Freemason.

Horror of horrors, that this charge should be made against the hon. Minister that he is a Freemason! It matters not that the Heir Apparent of the Throne is the Grand Master of that organization in England. It is said to be a crime by a large section of the people in Quebec for an hon. gentleman to be considered a member of such an honourable, noble society as that of the Ancient Order of Freemasons. Further on, he said:

I am a newspaper man, and my son published a paper, of which I am the political editor. Would you believe me, Sir, without any trial, without any warning, without any explanation being asked for, my son's paper was placed under the ban. That is to say, in the diocese of Chicoutimi, there is not one Roman Catholic who goes to confession without being asked if he is a subscriber to my son's paper. * * * Never, in the history of ecclesiastical abuses, has such a thing taken place. * * * We were being prevented from discussing any more the political questions of the day in the province of Quebec.

I am sure the hon. gentleman has truthfully and fairly told the House the condition of affairs which at present exists in the province of Quebec, and I ask him and hon. gentlemen opposite, who control the legislation of this House, are they doing their full duty as British subjects and representatives of Her Majesty in the Dominion, if they do not put a stop to the continued existence of such a state of affairs in any part of the Dominion? These hon. gentlemen control the legislation of this House, and if legislation does not exist in our statutes making it an offence against the law for any body of men to arrogate to themselves the right to dictate to any man how he should vote, should they not see that such legislation is enacted?

I say these are grave abuses that ought not to be permitted any longer in this country of ours, and if they are, in view of the statement which the Minister of Public Works has made, he and his party, as long as they remain in power, if they do not enact this legislation, will fairly and justly be held responsible for the continuation of such a condition of affairs.

Mr. Speaker, I felt it to be my duty, painful though it is, to draw attention to what I considered an unfortunate incident in connection with the school settlement. I am prepared to stand by that settlement, to vote for it here and to support it here or elsewhere. But we shall not have to wait long to see whether that settlement is to be permitted to remain as it is or whether insidious attempts will be made to destroy or weaken it and bring about some other settlement that is not now contemplated.

An election took place a few days ago in one of the constituencies of Quebec in which the candidate who afterwards proved successful was asked, according to the statement made by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte), to pledge himself on his faith and honour "to vote in the House without restriction whatever, if I am elected member, against this settlement, or against any other which will not have been accepted by the same religious authority." And further, he was asked to "absolutely prohibit all who act for me in this present electoral campaign, whether on the hustings or in conversation with the voters, to utter one word in favour of the Laurier-Greenway settlement or of the trial thereof because it is not accepted by religious authority." The hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) stated that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Guité) whom we are proud to see elected because he refused to sign that pledge, was told that if he did not sign it, "on the following Sunday, there would be a mandement denouncing him and the Liberal party in the county of Bonaventure." I say that it is a disgrace to the civilization of this Canada of ours to allow this state of affairs to continue. If these gentlemen are fighting the battle of civil liberty and religious liberty in the province of Quebec, it is their duty—a duty in which they will be cordially supported by many hon. members on this side of the House—to take the necessary steps to put a stop to this state of things. Otherwise, we cannot expect that the people of Canada will be given an opportunity, when electoral contests take place to express their opinions fearlessly as to the merits of the rival candidates and policies presented for their choice. Most heartily do we join with hon. gentlemen opposite in the reference made in the Speech from the Throne to the long and honourable career of Her Majesty on the Throne of Great Britain, and we sincerely hope that she may be spared for many years to come, to enjoy the homage of a free and contented people. But true freedom can exist only where tyranny has been banished; and, if tyranny exists in the province of Quebec the people cannot claim to be wholly free. And so, in this jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign, we should do something substantial for the benefit and advantage of the people from end to end of the Dominion, by wiping out the last vestige of clerical interference with the electors in the exercise of their constitutional rights as British subjects.

Mr. PREFONTAINE. Like other gentlemen on either side who have spoken I must say that I had not intended to speak on the motion now before the House. But the discussion has taken such a course that I cannot keep silent altogether. I shall confine what I have to say to a few remarks. It has been stated here that the Liberal party gained their majority of the province of Quebec by false representation and that the promises they made went further than those made by the supporters of the late Government. As regards myself, I must say I have never taken such pledge as has been referred to. What I said to the electors of Maisonneuve, which was a Conservative constituency and was framed purposely to secure the election of a Conservative, was very plain. I have here a copy of the address which I sent to every elector of the county. I have the honour to read to the House the words I used, which are clear and cannot be misrepresented. I will read them first in French and afterwards give the translation in order that all may understand:

Je suis sûr et convaincu que Monsieur Laurier avec l'aide de sir Oliver Mowat pourra régler avantageusement le question des écoles, dont le parti tory abuse depuis six ans.

Or in English:

I am sure and convinced that Mr. Laurier, with the aid of Sir Oliver Mowat, will be able to settle advantageously the school question, of which the Tory party has made such an abuse for six years.

Where is the pledge in such a declaration I would ask hon. gentlemen on the other side? Where is the pledge except to do what was right to Manitoba and to the minority in the province of Manitoba. I have always declared that I had confidence in the leader of the Liberal party and that I was sure the settlement he would arrange with the authorities of Manitoba would be satisfactory to the minority there and to the majority of the people of the province of Quebec. The majority of the people of the province of Quebec had confidence in his declaration. In the district of Montreal, where formerly only a few Liberal members were elected, a majority of Liberals were returned to this House in the last election. Now, we are told, in the face of what has happened, in the face of the persecutions to which we have been subjected by the hierarchy, that we have no right to go to Rome and ask for the intervention of the Pope to protect, not the Government, but ourselves and our families. We are told that the ablegate who has been sent from Rome has been sent to obtain better terms in the Manitoba school settlement, and that he has been asked to intervene in this matter. I cannot understand the matter otherwise than as it is presented in the petition which I had the honour to sign; and you can read it and re-read it and not one word will you find asking the Pope to send a delegate here to obtain better terms or to regulate the Manitoba school settlement in any way, shape or manner. On the contrary, as we had a right, as Roman Catholics to do, we ask the Pope who exercises supreme power in our church to intervene in the difficulty existing among ourselves, and to try to re-establish peace and harmony among Roman Catholics. We had that right, and had we not exercised it, we should have been false to our religion. For, it is well understood, for I have heard it from eminent priests not only in Canada but on the other side of the water, that this difficulty between the clergy and the people in the province of Quebec, is doing more harm to the church than would be done by fifty years' of persecution, that the difficulty existing between the people and the clergy is driving the people from the church, and that, if this state of affairs were to continue, the result might be that half the people would be driven from the church. Had we the right, in order to protect ourselves and our families to apply to the supreme authority of our church to send here a delegate in order to investigate the facts and understand the situation? That is the position and there is no use to try to misrepresent it. The facts are there and speak for themselves. We are told by hon. members on the other side of the House who come from Ontario that it was a mistake to do as we have done. Pretended newspaper interviews are cited. Well, we know perfectly well how most of these interviews are got up. I find one here to-night in the "Free Press," which entirely contradicts the one quoted by the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke). It reads as follows:—

Being asked about the interview which is reported to have taken place with him at his arrival in New York, Monseigneur replied that he had heard that long interviews had been published in some papers, but that he had no knowledge of having spoken to such a great extent.

And to show it by example, he adds :

Being presented with yesterday's "Star," he could not keep from laughing when he read the part of the report where he was described as a short man. "Surely," said the ablegate, "I am not so small, after all, as you can see." As a matter of fact, Monseigneur is nearly six feet high, and represents, notwithstanding his youthful appearance, a fine specimen of an energetic and clever man.

Well, you see that this interview is just as credible as the one quoted by the member for West Toronto. He takes his from the Toronto "Globe," which takes it from a New York paper, while I quote this from the "Free Press," which reports a conversation that took place not later than yesterday. So that I see no grounds whatever for using this argument against us in the present circumstances. What are the facts as to this question at the present time? As I have said, the majority of the electors in the province of Quebec had full confidence in the Liberal party in the election of 1896, and returned a majority of members supporting the hon. leader of the Government. Now, what has happened since? Elections have taken place in the province with the same result, in spite of all the influences that could be exerted against those who represent the views of the Government. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat stated honestly and frankly that, although a Conservative, he was ready to support this settlement in its entirety, and that he would support no amendments to it unless such amendments came from the Manitoba legislature. Now, Sir, let me ask that hon. gentleman and the other members of the Conservative party now in this House: Are they not using the same kind of influence that they used during the elections of 1896? Are they not still using the religious cry for all it is worth? Why, Sir, not later than last Sunday, a priest in the county of Champlain—I will give his name, there is nothing to conceal—the Rev. Mr. Lafleche, preached from the pulpit in the church of Batiscan in support of the Conservative candidate, Dr. Marcotte, who sat in this House last session. What did he say :

It has been stated by the speaker that I was educated at Nicolet College, and that there we had the catechism only twice a week. Did you ever hear anything so absurd and so ridiculous as that?

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing very extraordinary in that. In the Roman Catholic schools of Montreal, and I speak as a Roman Catholic commissioner for the last ten years, according to the rules of our schools, which are approved by the clergy, only half an hour a week, on Friday, is given to religious education; yet here is a priest who goes into the pulpit and abuses the Liberal party and the Liberal candidate because some of the Liberal speakers have said they are satisfied with half an hour a week given to religious education in Manitoba—trying to make these people believe that the school settlement granting half an hour a day for religious teaching in Manitoba was something that should not be accepted by the Roman Catholic Liberals of Quebec. What does he say more :

No one can vote for a candidate who approves of the school settlement. To vote for a candidate who approves of the school settlement, is to vote for fanaticism, and will be equivalent to abandoning his religion. You must either follow Satan or Jesus Christ. In my opinion, Liberal Catholics stand among the friends of Satan.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a specimen of the language used in the pulpits in Quebec in order to coerce the Roman Catholics to vote for Conservative candidates. Then he goes on :

The county has been invaded by speakers who speak contrary to the doctrines of Jesus Christ. If they come to your house, set the dogs after them, chase them with sticks.

This is language that some of the hon. members on the other side of the House approve of. Thank God! There is enough of independence, there is enough courage, among the Roman Catholic French Canadians of the province of Quebec not to stand any such language as that. Sir, everybody knows that at the present moment some of the most important members of the Conservative party are in the county of Champlain approving of this language—I mean the member for St. Maurice and Three Rivers (Sir Adolphe Caron), the member for Beauharnois (Mr. Bergeron), and the member for Bagot (Mr. Dupont). They approve such sermons as this, they benefit by them, and no doubt they did something to prompt them. Well, Mr. Speaker, if we had not taken the action we did, if we had not asked for justice, if we had not asked to be treated as free men, as other British citizens, we would not be worthy of a seat in this House. We consulted the people of our province, and they gave their answer. The time had arrived when the allegations made against them should cease. That was why they appealed to the supreme power to send a delegate, not to settle the school question, but to investigate certain matters and lead those people in the right way and place matters in the right course. It is not the first time that matters of this kind have been referred to Rome. Some years ago, I think ten or twelve years ago, the Pope had to send over to Canada an ablegate, Bishop Conroy. Why? At that time there was no school question before the people, but it was stated, and I heard it when I commenced public life, that in the Catholic Church it was a sin to be a Liberal of the province of Quebec. We were singled out as bad citizens; and we resolved not to continue under that reproach. We appealed to the supreme power, and we asked for a decision, and we obtained the famous decision of Bishop Conroy that it is no sin to be a Liberal. Neither bishop nor priest was condemned for having said it was a sin to be a Liberal; but they did not say so any more. We do not ask, it is not the intention of those who forwarded the petition that bishops or priests should be reprimanded. There is no need of such action; but we want to exercise our civil liberty like other British subjects, and we desire that the supreme power should inform the bishops that their action must cease. If it is fair, reasonable and constitutional, I do not see why we should be reproached for having taken this action. I recall another instance where a representative of Roman Catholics was asked to intervene in a certain political difficulty. I wish to remind hon. gentlemen opposite of the special request made by their late leader Sir John A. Macdonald, to Bishop Taché in Rome in 1870, that he would come in haste to Manitoba and establish peace and harmony among the people of that province. That action was considered wise at that time. When we asked the same right for ourselves, the course is not considered right and proper. The people of the province of Quebec have said that we were right in doing so. They made that declaration at the last election, and I am convinced from what I know of the electors that if the electors are the same in Champlain as elsewhere they will resent the injustice done to them and on next Wednesday will elect a Liberal member to sit in this House. It has been too often stated that the electors of the province of Quebec were priest-ridden, that they had no opinions of their own, that they could not be trusted to discuss public questions and pronounce on issues which were of interest to the whole country. This statement has been so frequently made by our adversaries in other provinces, that they were astonished when the people of the province of Quebec asserted themselves on 23rd June last. They did not understand it, and an hon. gentleman on the other side of the House, who certainly does not belong to our creed and nationality, but belongs to the Conservative party, proceeded almost to the length of stating that the priests were right and we were wrong in asking for our just rights and liberties. We are not here to defend those ideas, which were presented in a very clear and eloquent manner on 30th December, 1896, at a banquet given to the leader of the Government in the city of Montreal. What did the leader of the Government state there in the presence of over 700 people, most of whom belong to the Roman Catholic Church and were French Canadians? Did he draw back from the position he had taken? No; he spoke to the same effect as he had done during the elections, and he stated to the people of Montreal, to the Conservative city of Montreal, that he was not afraid of the settlement he had made with the province of Manitoba, that he stood by that settlement and would, if necessary, fall by it. Was the hon. gentleman reproached for having used that language on that occasion; did the guests on that occasion attempt to condemn him for his words? On the contrary, he was applauded by the fair-minded people of the province of Quebec, whether they belonged to the Conservative or the Liberal party. After uttering those noble words, the leader of the Government was followed by Mr. Greenway, Premier of Manitoba. What did Mr. Greenway state on that occasion in order to satisfy in the most complete manner possible the people of Quebec that the settlement was a fair one, and the only one that could be granted under the circumstances. Mr. Greenway said:

I know I am speaking for the people of Manitoba, and I repeat again, and I want you to make a note of it, that we propose to work out this system in a fair and generous spirit, and not to undertake the responsibility of closing up fifty or sixty schools, leaving the children of those schools in a state of ignorance. It is they who are assuming the responsibility. If they can from time to time suggest any way by which we may meet their views to a further extent, we shall always be prepared, Mr. Premier, to consider it.

I think, Mr. President, you can readily understand that this is but the result of the views which I have placed before you, when I said that I was desirous that in this greater Canada we should build up the greater parts of Canada upon an amicable arrangement between all classes that go to make up our common country. We want to see our French Canadian friends in the province of Quebec, we want to see our English friends in the province of Ontario, we want to see our friends from across the water, we want to have all the people here, and with the gathering together of the races we shall have by and by a great people, because, sir, we have not only a climate to grow wheat, but we have a climate to grow men.

Reading those eloquent words, pronounced by the Premier of Manitoba, what could the electors of the province of Quebec say? Knowing the circumstances and understanding the question much better than the Conservative electors of the province, they believed that since it was impossible to get a system of separate schools, it was better they should get the next best thing, and they believed that they should accept a system which would allow their fellow co-religionists in Manitoba to be educated, and enable the French Canadian boys and the French Canadian girls to acquire such secular instruction as would fit them for the battle of life. The people of Quebec are satisfied with the settlement, which allows Catholics in Manitoba to be protected in their religion, and in their knowledge of their mother tongue as well. Hon. gentlemen opposite know very well that if they tried to call a public indignation meeting in the province of Quebec at the present moment, they would not get twenty electors to attend and to support their contention. It is all very well for some hon. gentlemen opposite to say that this question cannot be considered as settled. We know very well that whenever any other province or whenever even the Federal Government passed legislation that was thought to encroach on the rights of the French Canadian people, the representatives of the province of Quebec in the Quebec legislature always made their views known. But what have we seen on this occasion? The Government of the province of Quebec is Conservative, they have a majority of nearly two to one, but the session of the legislature has recently been prorogued and they dare not propose a vote of censure against this settlement of the Manitoba school question. Even now, Mr. Speaker, in the midst of an election contest in that province, the Conservatives dare not openly attack that settlement, and as a matter of fact they avoided it entirely in public. I know perfectly well that they are trying to use it elsewhere. They are trying to use it in this House with the object of continuing the disunion amongst Roman Catholics, and to excite a bad feeling amongst the citizens of this country generally. It is for that reason and that reason alone that the question is dragged up in the

Mr. PREFONTAINE.

House now, and that there has been so much discussion on it in this debate. We find gentlemen on the other side of the House trying to misrepresent the judgment rendered by the Privy Council, trying to misrepresent the petition that has been sent to Rome, and trying to misrepresent the result of the last general election. I have an idea, Sir, that when this debate is finished, it will be the last we shall hear of the Manitoba school question in this Parliament. I know very well that the Conservatives in this House will not dare to propose a motion of censure on the settlement. Those men who boast of being devoted to the Roman Catholic Church, who reproach the Liberal party for having done as they have done, and who approve of the attitude of the clergy, these men, I say, will not dare to propose a motion of censure in this House, because we know and they know that they would not get ten members to vote for such a motion. As regards ourselves, we are perfectly satisfied. If the settlement is carried out in good faith, and carried out generously as Mr. Greenway promised in the Manitoba legislature, then we are satisfied and our people are satisfied because we know that, for the present, we cannot get more. I believe, Sir, that when this controversy is ended, as ended it will be in a short time, the people of the province of Quebec will be considered as ordinary British subjects, and that their liberty will be respected. I believe that the fight the Liberal party in the province of Quebec have made, and the victory we have achieved will be of some good, not only to ourselves, but to our children who come after us, and that it will redound also to the benefit of the country in general.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will pass from this matter and briefly refer to that paragraph in the Address which relates to the tariff. The Liberal party, as a whole, have been accused of changing their policy on this question which interests specially our mercantile community. I may say that the very first day I addressed the electors in Maisonneuve, I told them that although I was a free trader, I knew perfectly well that free trade was impracticable and that the best policy was for the Government to alleviate the burdens on the people without imperiling in any way our national industries. I stated that openly and without reserve. If at the present time, the Government, in face of the McKinley tariff in the United States, goes further than the declaration I made before my constituents, I will approve of their course. In the face of such a tariff in the United States, I believe that, as business men, we have to consider the situation in the light of the best interests of our country, whether we have free trade or protectionist proclivities. We want a common sense and business-like fiscal policy from the Government, and that is what the merchants and manufacturers of Montreal are asking for now. Since I returned from Europe a month ago, I have met many of the business men of Montreal and the consensus of opinion amongst them is, that they do not make any difference whether the Government is Liberal or Conservative, but that if the present Government acts in such a way as not to injure our national industries they are ready to support them. That is what this Government, I believe and trust, will do, and that is what is required by the merchants of Montreal and by the merchants and business people in all parts of Canada. If the Government chooses to bring down a tariff, which may be on certain articles more protectionist than the existing tariff, I say so much the better if it is considered to the advantage of the country to do it, and then let every member of the House and every elector judge of that tariff when it is brought down.

Mr. BRODER. Mr. Speaker, the debate on this Address has already taken a wider range than any one anticipated at its inception. I wish to say something about a few questions referred to by some hon. members who have already spoken.

Now, Sir, the hon. Minister of Public Works disclaims any intention or any purpose of sending to His Holiness of Rome to ask his intervention in the settlement of the Manitoba school question. Well, Sir, if that is not the object, then the object is one still more out of the range of the hon. gentleman's duty to this country. I will give the hon. gentleman his own words to show that the object of these gentlemen in appealing to the Pope was not simply to obtain the settlement of a dispute with the clergy in the province of Quebec with reference to religious doctrine or the rights or privileges of the Roman Catholic people of Quebec, but was on the broad question of political freedom. If that was the object then, Sir, I say that every Canadian, irrespective of class or creed, ought to rise in his might against it. This is a British country, and it is willing to give to every man under its domain the liberty which he ought to have. But the hon. Minister of Public Works, speaking of this document says :

Sir, this document, I am not afraid of saying—I am proud to say—has been signed by forty-five of us. I say as a member of this Government, that I signed it, and I am proud to say so. This document speaks for itself. You do not find in it one word about the Manitoba school question. We have appealed to Rome, as it was our right to do, from the attitude of certain members of the Roman Catholic clergy. We have appealed for liberty—for political freedom.

That is the point I wish to make. He says: "We have appealed to Rome for political freedom." Has this Government, which is clothed with the executive authority of this Dominion, dismantled itself of its duty? Has it delegated its power to His Holiness in the Vatican? Are these gentlemen not the custodians of the political freedom of the people of this country? If that was the question referred to Rome, and not the question of the Manitoba schools, then the Minister of Public Works went beyond his place when he imported into the discussion of that question in this House, this document, which has nothing whatever to do with it, and was altogether foreign to anything contained in the Address. And, Sir, there is more than that underlying this matter of appealing to His Holiness. It is done for the express purpose of helping hon. gentlemen opposite out of a difficult position into which they have put themselves. What do we find? Many of them on the floor of this House said that the Remedial Bill did not go far enough; and they went down to the province of Quebec and declared on many platforms that the reason they had voted against the Remedial Bill was that it did not go far enough. While the bishops were satisfied to accept it as going far enough to satisfy the just demands of the minority in Manitoba, these gentlemen went further, and voluntarily, according to their own statements, handed over to their bishops the pledge that they would either secure the rights of the minority in Manitoba, or vote against Mr. Laurier. Now, what is the position of affairs? The position of affairs in this country to-day is this, that the life of this Government of Canada is in the hands of the bishops of Quebec. That is the position they find themselves in, and it is because of the leniency of those bishops in not requiring them to carry out their pledges that many hon. gentlemen opposite are sitting in this House to-day. Hence they have gone to His Holiness to ask him to get them out of their difficulty. The whole move is for political effect, in the interest of the Reform party in this country. They come here with a document which they say is in the interest of civil and religious liberty; but in that document they say: "Your Holiness is aware that men have acted in such and such a manner in the province of Quebec." Have they one document for publication in Canada and another document sent secretly to His Holiness in the Vatican? The document read here discloses only part of their scheme which has been partly enacted on the floor of this House for the purpose of securing these gentlemen firmly in their seats. The life of the Government of this country should never be in the hands of the clergy of any church; and these gentlemen declare, by what they themselves have said, that that is virtually the position they are in. If this delegate has not come out for the purpose of settling the Manitoba school question, then why has the Hon. Mr. Greenway been invited officially, as the press says, to meet him? Has Mr. Greenway anything to do with the settlement of any disputes between members of the Roman Catholic Church? It is said that Mr. Greenway has been sick, and has gone to his farm because his physician told him that it was not well for him to come down here yet. But he will be down here after a while; there is no doubt about that; and if from what the ablegate says himself, if he is reported correctly, and I believe he is, he is coming here to settle the school question. These gentlemen need not talk about civil and religious liberty, after compelling us, by putting off the meeting of the House, to wait until the ablegate could reach this country. That is the reason this House did not meet on the 11th of March. These gentlemen dare not meet the House while the bishops had those pledges in their pockets. The life of this Government could not be worth sixpence while that state of things existed. There was a fire, and I believe every gentleman in the Reform party was glad to see the delay. No, Sir, they did not want to meet the House, and so the meeting of Parliament was postponed, and in the meantime one delegate after another was sent to Rome for the purpose of getting this matter settled. It was not a question between the Roman Catholics and the bishops of Quebec, but a question between members of this House who had pledged themselves to do a certain thing, and the Government they wanted to support. That is the position these gentlemen are in, and they want to be relieved. They are afraid to stand up and do what they agreed to do, and they want a higher authority in their church to come and absolve them from the pledge which they gave to their bishops. Now, as to any question between the Roman Catholics and the authorities in their church, I have nothing to do. That is a matter of their own concern. But I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman, who has just sat down, draw a parallel between the delegate from Rome and the mission of Archbishop Taché, at the request of Sir John Macdonald, to Manitoba and the North-west Territories in 1885, in order to endeavour to settle the disturbance then existing. Archbishop Tache was a British subject, who had the spiritual charge of those people and very great influence over them, and he went out there in the interests of harmony and peace. But these hon. gentlemen opposite did not look to British subjects to settle their difficulties. I do not care how many prayers they may obtain, my own opinion is they will require the prayers of all the churches, and I have no fault to find with them in this respect, for I like to hear sinners prayed for; but if it is the liberty of the subject that is at stake in the province of Quebec, that liberty is in the custody of the Parliament of this country and should remain there. But if we are to accept the argument of the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine), in which he claimed an analogy between this delegate from Rome and the mission of Archbishop Taché to Manitoba, it will put these hon. gentlemen in an awkward position. It was not a religious question which Archbishop Taché was sent out to settle; and if we are to accept the analogy between the two cases, this is not a religious question either but a political one. Where then does the hon. gentleman's argument place him? It places him in the position of admitting that the difficulty which they desired to have settled by Rome is not a religious difficulty at all, but a political one over which clearly no church has any jurisdiction.

We had hon. members opposite getting up and saying that the school question was settled once for all and that we could not go any further, but we would like to hear the real representative of Manitoba, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton) give his opinion on the subject. What has he to say? He has been settled in his seat in the Cabinet through this question, and we ought to learn from his lips whether it is final or not. But we have a higher authority in the Government than he, we have the hon. First Minister who said in the county of Wright, the other day, that he did not consider this as a final settlement. We have also the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) who said that this was only an instalment, and we ought to know whether the full payment is to run over twenty or thirty or forty years or how long. It is to be in yearly instalments, I suppose. This question apparently is to be still agitated. Well, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where is the agreement on the other side of the House? One says the question is settled; the other says it is not. The only thing in which they appear to be in accord is in their cry which they make in concert: Oh, we want peace. It was rather surprising to hear hon. gentlemen get up last night, when the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) was denouncing certain things, as he had the right to do, and scout the idea that there was harmony on this side; and they did this after praying for peace the whole week. They only want peace on their own side, and I hope they will pray a long time for it before their prayers are answered.

There is another point I wish to bring out, and it is this. The hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross-Robertson) made a statement last night which was cheered to the echo on the other side, and at which I was very much surprised. He said that this sympathy for minorities was a decaying disease, and it had shrunk the whole Conservative party into very small proportions. He spoke of it as a disease, and hon. gentlemen opposite, when he was deriding the idea of sympathy for minorities, cheered him to the echo. Sir, the great bulwark of English freedom is equal rights to everybody. Talk about the great jubilee we are looking forward to, is there any man who is not proud of the prospective future as well as the past of that great Empire, and is there any one who will deny that the great source of British strength is the freedom she gives everybody irrespective of class or creed? When men are deriding the principle of guarding the rights of minorities, they forget that the great fabric of this Dominion, if it is to hold together, must be cemented by the freedom of every man to enjoy his rights no matter what may be his class or creed. The majority, Sir, can take care of itself, but the minority has rights which ought to be respected by the greater power.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I hesitated, before rising to speak this evening, for two reasons. First, because I am not familiar with the language spoken by the majority of the members of this House; and second, because I think that everything has been said of what could be said during this debate. But after the speeches I have heard, and more particularly after the speech that has just been made by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder), I feel it my duty to illustrate in a few words what is to-day the policy of the Conservative party. We have heard the hon. member reproaching the Liberal party with having gone to Rome to seek for civil liberty for the province of Quebec. On the other hand, we have heard this evening my learned friend the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) make just the contrary reproach to the Liberal party of the province of Quebec. He told us that we were going back on the hierarchy of our church. This is only a repetition of the old double-faced policy—one policy for Ontario and another for Quebec. In Ontario hon. gentlemen opposite ride the Protestant horse, and in the province of Quebec they would like to ride the Catholic horse, but we have put an end to that. The hon. member for Dundas eulogized the late Mgr. Taché, but I regret to say that evidently he has not read the last words which were uttered by that eminent bishop on his death-bed, when he said that he had been shamefully betrayed by the Conservative party on this very Manitoba school question. The hon. gentleman said also, contemptuously, that the Liberal party in this House remained in power because it was sustained only by the Quebec people. Sir, it is evidently a crime to-day to be sustained in this House by a majority from the province of Quebec. But was it a crime on the part of the Conservative party when, during twenty-five years they sought the support of that majority in my native province? I am too young to have any personal knowledge of it, but it is a matter of history that when Sir George Etienne Cartier was a leader of the Conservative party he used to rally round Sir John Macdonald the whole of my native province, and when Sir Antoine Aimé Dorion sat in this House, he was surrounded only by a small but gallant phalanx of ten or fifteen members from Quebec. Sir, speaking of this Manitoba school question, it is evident that Quebec—not the Liberal party but the whole province—has accepted the settlement arrived at between this and the Manitoba Government, and is satisfied that the judgment of the Privy Council has been closely followed. The Privy Council of England did not decide that we were bound to restore to the Catholic minority of Manitoba the schools that existed prior to 1890, but that we need only supplement the Greenway laws; and I maintain, in all humility, as a young barrister, that if we read carefully the conclusion of the Privy Council's judgment, we cannot fail to agree that by this settlement it has been put into effect. The law of 1890 has been supplemented by more liberal provisions, and the Catholics of Manitoba are no longer obliged to contribute for the support of Protestant schools. I agree with the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Préfontaine) that this settlement, perhaps, is not perfect. But, Sir, we often aspire to the ideal, though we do not reach it. As has been said by a French poet:

Borné dans sa nature, infini dans ses vœux, L'homme est un dieu tombé qui se souvient des cieux.

Let me translate it:

Limited in his nature, but infinite in his wishes,
Man is but a fallen god who remembers heaven.

The least we can ask of the Conservative party, the least we can ask of the ultramontaine party of the province of Quebec and Manitoba, is to try and accept the settlement for a few months, bearing in mind what was said by Hon. Mr. Greenway at the Laurier banquet in Montreal. The least they can do is to wait and see if this settlement cannot give substantial justice, to see if it will not work for a few months or a few years. Out of this Manitoba school question has sprung up another religious agitation in the province of Quebec, and, I may say, in the whole Dominion of Canada. This is not the first time in our history that the Liberal party has been persecuted by some members of the hierarchy. For reasons that I do not understand yet, the Conservative party in our province has, for many years, declared that they alone supported and stood by the clergy. They have misrepresented the principles of the Liberal party and have sought to give to the word "Liberalism" a meaning that it does not fairly convey in this country. We Liberals of Quebec have been represented as Liberals of the French and Italian schools, though our leaders have declared again and again that we belong to the Liberal party as it is understood in England, to the Liberal party of Gladstone, O'Connell, and Russell, and those other great men who have been the pride and honour of the mother country. From what is said by some of the Conservative members from Quebec, it would seem as if the structure of the church was too narrow to contain the members of the Liberal party, and so they wish to evict us just as the Irish tenants are being evicted by the landlords. But I am glad to say that I will remain a Roman Catholic, and come what may, I will not be evicted from my church. I am a Roman Catholic, but I am also a free man, and that is why I am a Liberal. I belong to the school of Lacordaire, of Lacordaire who said to his young fellow-countrymen that he would die a repentant monk but an unrepentant Liberal. We have listened to many severe criticisms from our opponents because we have appealed to Rome. But, Sir, we have gone to Rome to protect our civil liberty. Long ago when, in Rome the Christians were being scourged, those of them who were Roman citizens had only to announce their citizenship to secure protection. To-day, we, the Liberal members of this House go to Rome where our British citizenship will be our protection.

As to the tariff, I corroborate what has been said by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. I say with him that the Government must be faithful to the promises they have made the electorate, but they must not lose sight of what has been done lately by the United States Government. I believe that this country should adopt two tariffs, one prohibitory as against the countries that do not offer us any advantages and one that will enable us to offer some compensation to those countries that give us the advantage of the most-favoured-nation clause. It is true there is a difficulty in the way. True, it is that the mother country regulates our commercial relations with the other countries of the world and that is the reason why, for so many years, we have been excluded from the European markets. If we take, for instance, the Anglo-Belgian and Anglo-German treaties, we see that we are excluded from these great European markets. Article 15 of the treaty concluded in 1862 between England and Belgium, reads as follows:—

Articles, the produce, or manufacture, of Belgium, shall not be subject in the British colonies to other or higher duties than those that are, or may be imposed upon similar articles of British origin.

The same clause is found in the Anglo-German treaty. In spite of those treaties I must say that to-day we have the sympathies of many eminent British statesmen. For instance, we have the sympathies of Lord Salisbury, the Prime Minister of Great Britain. Speaking on the 19th June, 1891, before the United Empire League, he said :

With respect to these two unlucky treaties, they were made by Lord Palmerston's Government, some thirty years ago, when, I am sure, our relations with our colonies could not have been fully considered. We have tried to find out from official records what species of reasoning it was that induced the statesmen of that day to sign such unfortunate obligations; but I do not think they could have known what they were signing. I have never been able to discover that they at all realized the importance of the engagements upon which they were entering. We shall be very glad indeed to take any opportunity that may arise of delivering ourselves from these unfortunate engagements.

Now, Sir, having the sympathies of the Premier of England, we may expect that the advantage accruing from such a visit as that contemplated by the leader of this House on the occasion of the diamond jubilee, shall be commensurate with our great natural resources and commercial capabilities. I think we should bring something back from England other than reciprocal congratulations and platonic wishes, other than honours, titles or parchments. I submit that our Prime Minister would win the eternal gratitude of his fellow-citizens if he could secure from the mother country some better terms for the colonies, and especially for Canada. As to the jubilee celebration, we all concur in the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne adverting to this important and glorious event. A woman whose name is synonymous with virtue, love and charity, has presided for sixty years over the destinies of the greatest empire of modern times. At the accession of this illustrious woman to the Throne of Great Britain, Canada was misgoverned, and we were seeking representative government as the corner stone of our free institutions. What we could not obtain from George IV. or William IV., was conceded to us very freely by Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. The dominating idea of the reign of this glorious Queen has been one of peace, of harmony, of concord and of conciliation. Shall it be written in future times that towards the end of that reign this country gave to Her Majesty the spectacle of a people constantly agitated by passions and prejudices? I submit that we should at this period of our national life compare our country to the Ship of State so poetically described by Longfellow :

In spite of rock and tempest's roar,
In spite of false lights on the shore,
Sail on, nor fear to breast the sea,
Our hearts, our hopes are all with thee.
Our hearts, our hopes, our prayers, our tears,
Our faith, triumphant o'er our fears,
Are all with thee, are all with thee.

Mr. OSLER. From business reasons I was prevented from attending this House for the first two or three days of this work. I hoped that this debate would be over before my arrival in Ottawa : but unfortunately, for some reason or other, time is still being wasted upon it in talk useless or otherwise. I will not apologize to this House for speaking upon the school question, because my remarks will be very brief.

I thought this question had been relegated to the past. The school question, I believe, has been settled, and so far as this House is concerned, settled for all time. A great deal of the time of this House seems to have been taken up in discussing matters that would be more suitably discussed at a church or vestry meetings. We have been discussing this, that, and everything, except matters that are vital to the interests of our country. I think the main point has been lost sight of in the discussion. The Manitoba people themselves are those who eventually will decide as to what is to be done with the school question, or as to whether any or what changes will be made in their school legislation. Personally I feel that the settlement has gone further than I would have liked. I believe that more concessions have been made to one church than were proper, because I do not think that any church should be allowed to control the education of children in this country. Our children should be brought up together, without imbibing prejudices in school arising from the fact that they are Roman Catholics, or Methodists, or Presbyterians, or Church of England. The teaching of religion is a matter that should be attended to in their own homes, by their own mothers. I recognize that in the settlement of a controversy of this character there must be concessions on both sides. I believe that the concessions made by the Manitoba Government have gone to the utmost limit, they have gone further than I would have approved if I were consulting my own feelings in the matter. I think we can leave the settlement of this question with the greatest confidence to the people of Manitoba, and I do not think that they will allow any further concessions to be made to sectarian schools. It is a pity that we should prolong this discussion uselessly when the question must be settled in the end by the people of Manitoba. The head of the Roman Catholic Church has been brought into this discussion by some of the speakers. Well, Sir, if the Pope himself whom every one of us, I think, must respect as an individual, were to come out and settle in Winnipeg for a year, I do not believe that he could in any shape or way influence the people of Manitoba, or cause them to swerve one iota from their fixed idea that they will have national schools so far as possible. I merely wish to make these remarks to show where I stand, and as representing on this question, I believe, the views of the people of West Toronto, as well as my own views. While the settlement has conceded more than I should have liked, I think it has been a fair one, and is a compromise on both sides. As a member of this House I regret that the question of religion has been brought into this discussion. Religion is a matter that should not be brought up here; we are not here to discuss each other's consciences, or to say what the people of this country should believe, or what church they should belong to. We are here to make for them the best laws we can, to do the best we can for our country, that we are proud of; and I think that we should leave the churches to fight out their religious squabbles among themselves, while we carefully abstain ourselves from forcing religion on any one. Were the question to come to a vote, I should vote approval of this settlement, believing that it is a reasonable compromise on both sides.

Mr. McCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, at the present stage of the debate, it is neither my desire nor intention to detain the House at any length. However, I do not desire to allow the resolution which has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, moved by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), approving of the Address of His Excellency the Governor General to this Parliament to pass without giving expression to some of the thoughts that have come to me during the progress of the debate up to this hour. I have no inclination whatever to examine critically into the Address. There is very little in it to criticise adversely. We all agree with the paragraph in the Address which relates to the diamond jubilee of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and I need hardly add any words to the loyal and patriotic statements which have been made by hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House of their attachment to the Queen and to our British Empire. Canadians have always been loyal to the British throne. While we admire and revere our noble Queen, not only because of the glory which has surrounded her reign, we admire her as well because she is the exponent of the best form of government this world has ever seen, because she is the exponent of the greatest national life this world has ever seen, a national life which for more than a thousand years has been full and ripe with grand and heroic deeds of scholars and patriots, of statesmen and warriors. So that, Sir, we have in Canada great respect and love for our noble Queen, who, as has been stated by hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, as Queen, wife and mother, has loyally and devotedly fulfilled all her duties. We have been told by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, particularly by hon. gentlemen on the Government side, that the Manitoba school question, which has been the burden of the debate so far, should be a dead issue so far as this House is concerned; that no longer should the attempt to resurrect it or speak in respect to it, that a settlement has been arrived at which relieves the minority to such an extent that it is acceptable to them. To this attitude on the matter I have no desire to take exception. If this Manitoba school question is settled and settled finally, no one will welcome the fact more heartily and readily than I shall. I sincerely trust that the predictions which have been made by hon. gentlemen opposite from the province of Ontario and the province of Manitoba will be fully realized, notwithstanding the fact that the Solicitor General has told the House that it is not a final settlement.

But while I do not desire to discuss the Manitoba school question, I think there is a question arising out of the history of the Manitoba school question that might fairly engage the thought and attention of the House for a short time, and that is the question as to what shall be the standard of political morality in this country, as to whether it shall be right and proper for men who are aspiring to seats in the Parliament of the country, men who are aspiring to occupy the Treasury benches and form the Government, should by subterfuge and deceit gain those positions without being called to account in this legislature for their action. We from time to time in this Parliament and also in the legislatures of the provinces, pass laws regulating election matters, and we have stringent and severe laws upon our Statute-books which, when enforced, are intended to make our elections pure and right in every sense; and very recently the highest court in this country decided that the simple act of one agent treating two or three voters in a constituency deprived a gentleman who was a member of this House of his seat here. What can be said of that status of political morals in this country when men have the presumption and hardihood to come before the representatives of the people in Parliament and say: Yes, I have given a public pledge, I have given a pledge to my constituents that I will take a certain course in Parliament, but because some other one who is interested in the contract has not carried out his end of it, there is no obligation on me to carry out my pledge. I say, Mr. Speaker, it is a very undesirable state of affairs in this country if such action is to be tolerated. In my opinion, there are tens of thousands of citizens to whom it makes very little difference who the men are and by what party name they may be known who occupy the Treasury benches so long as they are capable men, honest men and men who have stood for and do stand for some political principle that is right. But I believe those same tens of thousands of people will not and cannot countenance men who by subterfuge and deceit gain position and place in this Dominion. We have heard a great deal in this House and from the press and supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite of the splendid virtues of this splendid Government, this wonderful aggregation of all the wisdom, of all the honour, of all the statesmanship which can be gathered from the four corners of the map of British North America, excelling, as they tell us, by all odds any Government that this country has ever possessed.

Mr. McCLEARY.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McCLEARY. Well, Sir, I am glad to notice that a few hon. gentlemen opposite say "hear, hear," to my statement; at the same time I do not think they believe it, and I do not think they want to endorse it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell), who so eloquently moved the Address, represented the leader of the Government as possessing that charity which is not easily provoked, which beareth all things, which hopeth all things, which endureth all things. Well, Sir, as I heard these words coming from the lips of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) it struck me that there was some truth in the statement that was made by one of the clerical gentlemen who went over to Rome a few months ago, and who on his return said: while he was speaking to the bishops at Rome of the hon. the leader of the Government, the Holy See exclaimed, that Mr. Laurier must be the only man who was preaching the Gospel in Canada. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Russell) spoke of these noble virtues of the leader of the Opposition, I thought that there must be a great deal of truth in it. But if the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Russell) had pursued his biblical research a little further, he would have seen that the same authority who speaks so eloquently of charity being the greatest of the three graces, also says: That it is not easily puffed up. Now, Sir, I would not if I could, take one single inch away from the pyramid and pinnacle upon which the hon. the leader of the Government and the Government itself have been raised by their friends. But I will say, however, that we shall judge them by their fruits. I would rather judge them by what they really are than by any eulogy that may be passed upon them by those who are interested in them so much. Pewter as pewter is honourable and praiseworthy, but when it is attempted to be passed upon us as gold we scorn it and give it no place in our consideration. Now, Sir, the members of the Government will just pass for what they are worth, and the country will judge them not by what they have said they will be, but by what they are and by what they will perform. We have with us in the House to-night, and I am glad to see him in his seat, the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), and the few words that I have to say in reference to him will be by way of application to the issue I raised at the outset, as to what should be the standard of political morality in this country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has been so much associated with this Manitoba school question that it may be fairly said, that he is the product and the outcome of it. Let us consider for a few moments this so-called settlement in its relation to him, and his relation to it. In the first place, the terms of this settlement contain an admission that the school law complained of by the minority, was, in the opinion of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) open to the objections which he and his friends so long denied existed. As far back as 1894, the Dominion Government addressed a memorial to the Manitoba Government setting forth the complaint of the minority in Manitoba and asking for redress. The reply was given by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) and his colleagues:

That there was no ground of complaint, and consequently no change in the law could, or would, be made.

The action of the Minister of the Interior in agreeing to this settlement and taking his seat in the Government of Canada, declares that statement to be untrue. We have, therefore, in this grand and great and pure Government, a gentleman who formerly declared there was no ground of complaint and who now, by his agreeing to a change in the law, admits that there was ground of complaint. In 1895 the question was raised in the Manitoba legislature and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) made a speech which was reported as follows:—

It is suggested that we should say what we are willing to do, but I can see no justification for the adoption of this view by the legislature. In 1890 we passed an Act which represented our views on the matter. These views have not changed. Why should we suggest a change, when we do not approve of any alteration?

But that position is now abandoned, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has declared by this agreement that deceit and cunning were the ruling influences which operated the minds of the Manitoba Government relative to this school question. On February 28th, 1895, Mr. Fisher introduced in the local legislature a resolution stating:

That the House was ready to consider the grievances, with a view to provide reasonable relief, while maintaining, as far as possible, the principle of the present Act.

The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), then a member of the Manitoba Government, at once charged Mr. Fisher with being corrupted and bought by innuendo at least, and added further:

If we give the matter any further consideration, it would be letting in the thin end of the wedge.

Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has not only permitted the introduction of the thin edge of the wedge, but he has allowed it to be driven home to such an extent, that we find it has elevated him out of the narrower and smaller field of provincial politics in Manitoba, into the larger and more remunerative place in the Dominion Government. Not only did the Minister of the Interior make these declarations in the legislature, but there was a by-election in Haldimand and the hon. gentleman came down there in the month of April, 1895. I had the pleasure and privilege of being in that constituency for a few days, and I can witness, that no one could be more pronounced in his determination to stand by and uphold the Manitoba public school law of 1890, than was that hon. gentleman. He declared from one hustling to another, that no interference would be allowed, and that no change in the public school law of the province of Manitoba would ever be acceded to by the Greenway Government. But what do we find now? We find that he has entirely changed his mind in this regard with the new light that has come to him. When the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) was in the legislature he continued his address at the time I have referred to, and he said:

As to making a compromise, that is out of the question. If the Roman Catholics were allowed the slightest latitude, they would, from day to day, renew the attack and take advantage of it. He admired the people of the United States for one thing, that they never compromised on their school law.

In the light that is now thrown upon the position taken in the legislature by that hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) on the Manitoba school question, is it too strong to say that his position was not a true one. Then, Sir, on the 20th of December, 1895, the hon. gentleman wrote in reply to the Dominion Government:

In the present case there has been no wrong committed by the provincial authorities. It is justly maintained by the legislature that the law complained of is founded on the principle of equal justice to every section of the community.

This is the last public statement that I have showing the attitude of the hon. the Minister of the Interior on this school question while he was holding the position of Attorney General of Manitoba; but as soon as there is a change in the Government of this country, as soon as there is a chance for the hon. gentleman to improve his position, these splendid principles, which he stood by from 1890 to 1896 are forgotten, and he has no hesitation whatever in going back on his record of the past, and subscribing to what he calls a settlement of the school question, providing for changes in the School Act of 1890, which he declared repeatedly was in the interest of the people of Manitoba, and could not and would not be interfered with.

Now, Sir, what I have said in regard to the hon. Minister of the Interior can be well applied to several other members of the Administration, only that they were shooting with the other barrel of the gun. Because it is only right to say, from the statements which have been made in this House since we have met, that there are many other members of the Cabinet, and scores of hon. gentlemen who support them on the back benches, who have compromised their principles for place and position ; and this Parliament and the people of this country cannot any too soon be awakened to the serious position in which such conduct places the Parliament of Canada.

Leaving this matter for the moment, let me refer briefly to one or two items in the Speech from the Throne. Let me first say a word or two on a subject which I think should have been included in that Speech. I refer to what is familiarly known as the Alien Labour Law. The county which I have the honour to represent is very much interested in the passage of a law that would give to our fellow-citizens, our artisans and mechanics, that protection which they are entitled to as against the American law, which is being enforced every day against Canadians. I have always told my constituents that, considering what the hon. the Premier had said last session, and what he had repeated on the public hustings in East Simcoe and elsewhere during the by-elections, I had reason to hope and expect that this question of an alien labour law would receive attention at the hands of the Government this session, and that there would be a paragraph in the Speech from the Throne in reference to it. I am very much disappointed that such is not the case. However, I am glad to see that the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) has introduced a Bill into the House on this matter ; and, although I have not seen it. I hope it contains provisions that will meet with the approval of our people. I have no sympathy with the remarks made yesterday by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. MacPherson) when he stated to this House that he considered that it would not be judicious for us to pass an alien labour law, as Canada is too small a country to retaliate successfully against the United States. I do not believe the hon. gentleman is representing the feeling of his constituents by making such a statement. In going up and down through the province of Ontario I have not come across one single man who is not anxious that an alien labour law should be placed on the Statute-book of this country—not two or three or four months hence, but now, at this session of the legislature. I have noticed in the papers supporting the Government the statement that the hon. member for South Essex is willing that the Government should take charge of his Bill—that is, if they endorse it—and that after passing this legislature it should be held in reserve until the Government sees fit to bring it into operation by a proclamation of the Governor General. I sincerely hope that the hon. member who has introduced the Bill will not consent to any such proposition. Why should we delay this matter any longer? Is not the Government of the United States acting every day against Canadians? Why, Sir, only the other day, since this House assembled, a young man, a carpenter, came from Western Ontario and crossed over at Fort Erie to Buffalo, where he was going to work for his brother. He was met there by Mr. DeBarry, and sent back ; and on the same boat that brought him back to Ontario, there were three carpenters coming over under contract to work in Canada. We should not permit this state of things to last a week longer, and we shall not rise to our dignity as representatives of the people if we do not see that such a law not only passes this House, but that it is made operative and effective.

Now, Sir, I want to say a word in reference to the attitude of our friends on the other side of the House with reference to this prohibition plebiscite which we are about to have. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. MacPherson) apparently does not believe in it ; he does not want it ; and if it is adopted, he does not believe the country would have prohibition. I am not going to argue the question ; but I just want to point out to the House and the country the position of the Liberal party in this regard. They are sorry now—there is no doubt about it—that they ever gave the pledge to the temperance people that they would ask for a plebiscite, and no one can read what is going on in the Grit wing of the temperance organizations of this country without seeing that they are trimming their sails. And now, was it in yesterday's "Globe" that I saw the statement that it would be impossible to enforce a prohibitory law in this country unless what—unless more than one-half of those who are entitled to vote for members to this House cast their votes in favour of it. Evidently the friends of the Government are not burdened with any great desire to have an opportunity to pass this prohibitory law.

The hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has introduced a Bill known as the Franchise Act, concerning which the Speech from the Throne contains a paragraph. This is one of the good things that this good Government is going to give us ; it is one of the first laws that this splendid Government is going to place upon the Statute-books. Well, Mr. Speaker, if I heard correctly the remarks of the hon. Solicitor General, this Franchise Act, does not belong to them at all, but they got it from the Hon. Sir John Thompson. It appears that it was one of his Acts which he had brought before this Parliament, but which, for some reason or other, was not proceeded with. The same may be said of the Superannuation Act which the Government intend to bring before this House. That does not belong to the Government either, because no sooner had the Postmaster General introduced this Bill than the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) got up and declared that he had stolen it from him. So that after all, although we are frequently told that this Government has all the talents, it has not as yet given us any legislation which is really the product of its own mind. Before I sit down, let me say that although I belong to the Conservative party and always have belonged to it, I am not quite sure that there is not something in the change of Government on which we may congratulate ourselves, and that is that while in Opposition, these hon. gentlemen were continually tearing down and never attempting to help in the construction of a single law of importance that ever passed this legislature, or to assist the Government of the day in striving to improve the commercial interests of the country, but were continually decrying and doing everything in their power to hinder the development and progress of the great interests of this country, these hon. gentlemen are to-day placed in a position in which they are compelled to be loyal to Canadian interests and in which they can soon be brought to task by the people if they attempt to carry out the position they formerly occupied with regard to the fiscal policy of this country. No wonder that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite are congratulating themselves on being on the Government side of the House and on being able now to speak of our country with some degree of decency, to speak of it as a country with aspirations to become a great nation. I am glad, as a young Canadian, that this state of affairs exists, and I hope that in the few years during which those hon. gentlemen will be in power, they will be able to wipe out the blot on their political escutcheon, which they have placed upon it during these years past. I have nothing further to say on the question before the House. In conclusion let me express my sincere wish that peace, harmony, good-will and prosperity may be the portion of our fair Canada in all the years to come.

Mr. FRASER. I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BENNETT. Before the House adjourns, I desire to make a few remarks on the matter that has been under discussion for the past few days, namely, the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. A great deal has been said since this debate opened—and I suppose we shall be treated throughout this session to a repetition of the same boast—about this administration being endorsed by the country whenever an opportunity has been offered the people; and as one of the representatives of the people who has had an opportunity since the last general election of contesting a constituency in opposition to the Government, I now propose to make a few remarks to the House. The riding which I have the honour to represent, East Simcoe, was opened since the last general election, and the First Minister himself, surrounded by his cohorts, came in force into that riding, but unhappily for the Premier, he came and he saw but he did not conquer. But it was, not for want of assistance, because he was ably backed by the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock), and I cannot help but think it is a most amusing proposition that the Premier has laid down, that the Government has endeavoured to carry out the principle of simultaneous elections. Now, the constituency of Cardwell was open, the constituency of East Simcoe was open, the constituency of Brant, and the constituency of North Ontario. Why did not the First Minister bring on the four elections on the same day? He did not do so because it was necessary that the plant should first be placed in the riding of Cornwall. They carried Cornwall, and I do not know anything particular to their credit in this, when it is considered that the constituency of Cornwall had been carried by the late Dr. Bergin, owing, in a great measure, to his large personal popularity and to the fact that he had the influence of the Government at his back. Backed up, as they were, by all the influence of the Government, hon. gentlemen opposite succeeded in carrying that constituency. Some more elections still remained to be brought on, but so great was the feeling produced in the constituency when this plant was moved into it, that it was decided better not to bring them on all at once. And so the political ring-master from North Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) was deputed to South Brant and the Postmaster General took under his supervision the two constituencies of North Ontario and East Simcoe. Making headquarters at a point between the two ridings—it was practically an election in one riding—the Postmaster General moved hither and thither. The result was that the Opposition carried both ridings. For, while we have succeeded in carrying East Simcoe at the polls, we also succeeded in carrying North Ontario, and if to-day a gentleman sits here as representative of that riding, who was not our candidate, he owes his seat here, not to the majority of the electors, but to the kindly offices performed for him by a partisan judge. What was the result of the contest in East Simcoe? The Premier came and addressed three different meetings. The first was a large meeting in the town of Orillia. It is evident that the Premier had been duly apprised of the desperate chances of his candidate, despite the great personal popularity of that candidate, Mr. H. H. Cook. He saw that something desperate had to be done. And so all the artifices of the politician and the trained orator were resorted to by the Premier on that occasion. The meeting was attended largely by people of the agricultural class. I trust the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) will not feel at all annoyed by the reference made to him by the Premier on that occasion. The Premier deprecated the action of the Conservative Governments in their treatment of the agricultural classes. He said that instead of taking from the toiling masses of the farmers of this country one of themselves, Conservatives had doctors and lawyers as Ministers of Agriculture. Let me quote the words of the Prime Minister as he presented the Minister of Agriculture to the agriculturists of East Simcoe on that occasion :

We have at the present time a farmer as Minister of Agriculture ; not a kid-gloved farmer, not a fancy farmer, but a farmer who earns, and has always earned his living by the toil of his hands.

That did not have the desired effect upon the audience, for the reason that the people of that riding are a reading people. And then, I know it must have been with fear and trembling he took up what will be in future years for some of his followers, as it has been in the past for others, a very serious matter, the Manitoba school question. Doubtless, the hon. gentleman had been informed of the political complexion of the riding, that there were some 1,400 Catholic voters, of whom nearly 1,300 supported the Liberal candidate, and so the Catholic vote must be handled very tenderly and very gingerly. At the same time, he was informed that in this large riding of 7,000 voters, the Protestant party would also have to be touched very carefully. And so the hon. gentleman preached what he always preaches, or rather always preaches at this time, peace, amity and good-will among men. One would hardly suppose that he was the same gentleman who, in the campaign of 1887, attempted to rouse passions and prejudices in the province of Quebec because of the execution of Louis Riel. In the riding of East Simcoe, upon the Liberal side, there has never been an attempt to carry an election without the most violent appeals of race and religion. The result of the Premier's meeting at Orillia was that my majority in the town and township of Orillia which had almost been nil in previous elections, was increased to considerably over 100. The Premier then went to what was really his objective point in the riding, and that was the point where everything was to be turned upside down. I regret to say that his speech on that occasion was not reported in the "Globe." In all probability it was one of those speeches that it would not be well to publish in the "Globe." The solitary comment upon the speech that he made was that the Premier delivered an address that set them on fire with enthusiasm. This meeting was among his French compatriots, and they were "set on fire with enthusiasm." I have been informed by gentlemen who were in the hall on that occasion that the speech was not at all like the speech delivered here this afternoon by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), not a speech to the effect that the province of Manitoba had given a final and conclusive answer on this question, but it was on the lines of the speech of the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), to the effect that the thin edge of the wedge had gone in with regard to the Manitoba school question, that instalments had to be expected, and that it was to be hoped and expected that the instalments would be very much larger. I am delighted that the Premier came to the riding, for he was able to see that it was an intelligent and wealthy riding, and it must indeed be a sore thing for him to know that a riding of such wealth and intelligence has not endorsed the policy which his Government has followed for the last six months. But, Sir, in these days of rapid communication, it is rather troublesome that even a riding spread over 120 miles in length, such as East Simcoe is, that matters and things done in one part are known in the other parts. And so it came that we knew that while the hon. the Premier was at one end of the riding among the French-speaking people preaching peace on earth and good-will to men and advocating the Manitoba school settlement on the instalment plan, in the other end they had Col. O'Brien, the Protestant, who while a member of this House reviled Pope and Popery, asking the people to vote in favour of my opponent on the ground that I was a supporter of the Tupper Administration, which was in favour of coercive measures in the case of Manitoba. He told them also that the time had come in this country when the Premier, a French Roman Catholic, standing up as he was standing up against all the powers of Rome, should be supported to the end. The result was that the people of the riding looked upon the whole thing as a piece of political clap-trap and so, between the Protestant horse and the Catholic horse, the unfortunate candidate of the Government came rudely to the ground. The Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) was there in force, and was to be seen at all times and at all places. It mattered little to him whether he had an audience of 500 or five, and as the "Globe" newspaper said he proved himself to be a perfect prince of campaigners, I am willing that the hon. gentleman should console himself with that reflection ; but the fact is, and I say it in all seriousness, that in the ridings of East Simcoe and North Ontario this Government met with a positive and certain repulse at the hand of the electors. Well, Sir, where did they win on their merits, if anywhere ? They went into the riding of South Brant, and if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to analyse the votes in that riding he will find some curious things. The hon. Premier, who spoke there, and other gentlemen who worked on behalf of the Liberal candidate, succeeded in converting a majority for the Conservative candidate at the general election into a majority of 400 for the Liberal candidate. And wonderful to be said, the class of electors the hon. gentlemen were able to change was the Indian vote, in which alone there was a change of nearly two hundred; and while hon. gentlemen in the constituency of East Simcoe did reduce my majority, let me say here that the biggest part of the change—some fifty odd, was made in the Indian vote in that riding, too. Well, I have great respect for the Indian voters, but it would seem that the convincing arguments hon. gentlemen put forth had much more weight on the Indian element of the three ridings than on any other part of the population. Now, Sir, coming down to the matter of the school question, in the last Parliament I voted against the Remedial Bill that was introduced by the Government of the day. I did that believing that I was voicing the sentiments and the views of my own constituency. I did that believing that in the long run all would be well in the province of Manitoba. But, Sir, after the utterances that have been made by hon. members of the Provincial Government in Manitoba, after the utterances that have been made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and many other gentlemen in this House, day after day, and night after night protesting against any interference with Manitoba, I never believed that those gentlemen would sit idly by and approve of the tearing to pieces of this same Manitoba School Act without a protest and without a demur. The Act has been tampered with, the Act has been changed, and it has been changed, not in order altogether to suit the wishes of both parties—because they may not have been able to do that—but it has been done simply and solely to meet the political exigencies of a party of political opportunists. Well, Sir, these gentlemen refer in the Address to the fact that they hope, by generous treatment of one another, and mutual concessions, that reciprocal good-will will result. That seems a piece of bitter irony, to my mind, towards the hon. gentleman who sits over in the Senate Chamber, and who, day after day, and night after night, sat alongside the present Premier when the Liberals were in Opposition. I fancy that the Hon. David Mills himself thought this a home thrust at himself, because, if the hon. gentlemen had, in the fullness of their hearts, and kindness or any compassion for one who had stood the brunt of the battle here for years, they should have extended to that hon. gentleman some little consideration and some kindnesses. So, also, there was the hon. member who formerly represented Winnipeg. A seat could be got for the present Minister of the Interior, but no seat could be got for the hon. member who formerly represented Winnipeg. Well, I can imagine the reason of this. The present Minister of the Interior rather held the keys to the situation; he was in a position to concede, as a member of the Greenway Administration, to make so many concessions in order to fit himself for a place in this Cabinet; and that alone was the reason of the concessions being made by the Greenway Administration. Now, Sir, is the question settled? The Speech from the Throne says it is settled. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), who supports the Government, says to-day that the concessions made are the only concessions that will ever be tolerated by the province of Manitoba, that come weal or come woe, the province of Manitoba will stand firm to its pledges, and no more changes will or shall be tolerated. What are the remarks of the Solicitor General? Are they of the same nature? Or are the statements of the Premier himself, made in Hull a few weeks ago, at all on that line? But we are told by these gentlemen that, from all accounts, day after day, and months after months, at all events, this subject is to be made the catspaw for these designing politicians. All I can say is this: that for a certain length of time the public can be humbugged, but the public cannot be humbugged for ever on the question. When one looks along the seats of hon. gentlemen opposite he can at once see, that among the representatives of the province of Quebec, the men who desire and the men who expect to remain in Federal politics, do not applaud the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for Lisgar; but they hope and they expect to see such concessions made by the Manitoba Government that they may be able to redeem the pledges that they made to their constituents. What is the position, I ask, to-day, of the Solicitor General? What is his position as a man bound in honour? He says that he has given a pledge, and on the demand that that pledge shall be carried out, he is prepared to carry it out. Sir, to my mind a pledge of honour should not require to be carried out in that way. But the hon. gentleman now, when he finds his party is not in accord with the pledge he has given, should sacrifice the position he holds in this Cabinet; and feel bound to say that the hon. gentleman's conscience would be much cleared by such action on his part. Now, Sir, my position on the Manitoba school question is just what it was before. I believed in the last Parliament that there should be no interference with Manitoba. While I believe that still, at the same time do I think it is utterly improper and utterly wrong for the province of Manitoba, from time to time to make concessions, as they have been making, which impair and interfere with the usefulness of the national schools in the province. Now, Sir, a great deal has been said in this Chamber of the presence of the papal ablegate in this country. Well, I re-echo heartily what has been said from this side of the House—because I have not heard the sentiment expressed from the other side—that there should be no interference from any power beyond the powers that be in the British realm. I think if we in Canada cannot settle these matters ourselves, it is not within our province, not within our rights, to go to the Holy See at Saint Peter's and ask for interference there. It is true, hon. gentlemen have said that the presence of the ablegate has no connection at all with the school question. Well, time will tell. But can it be possible that this distinguished prelate has been misrepresented in the newspapers? Before that gentleman left Europe he stated that he considered a breach of confidence had been made by the Greenway Government in bringing down their policy on the school question before his presence in this country. Well, if time does not prove that the ablegate's mission in this country is what has been charged on this side of the House, to endeavour to conciliate and get more concessions from the Greenway Administration, then, Sir, I shall be much mistaken. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been unfortunate in their action on the tariff. The other day the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce was singularly unhappy. He was placed in a very unfortunate dilemma. Year after year that hon. gentleman has gone from one end of the province of Ontario to the other reviling and finding fault with the policy that has been in force in this country for the last 18 years. It is only fair to give hon. gentlemen opposite credit for their astuteness in that, in the recent by-elections they cribbed, cabined, and confined, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and was kept safely out of the place. Well, what is the position of these hon. gentlemen to-day on the trade question? After, for the past 18 years, taking up, one after another, the different policies of free trade as it was practised in England, commercial union with the great republic to the south and unrestricted reciprocity, and other fads—because I believe they were only fads which they indulged in at the time—the hon. gentlemen are forced to come before the people in this Dominion and do—what? Make this admission, that either they did not know what they have been talking about for the last 18 years, or else if they did not know what they were talking about for the past 18 years, then they were endeavouring to hoodwink the people of this Dominion. They must take one horn of the dilemma or the other. Every day in this House we hear reasons put forward why it is impossible for this Government to-day to interfere in the matter of the trade question by reason of the fact that the present administration of the United States have changed what was formerly a fair tariff to a too hostile tariff. Why, Sir, the Bill which goes into force into the United States to-day is no more a hostile tariff than was the McKinley Bill; and then hon. gentlemen opposite went around the country deprecating and denouncing the policy of the Conservative administration. They knew and must have known that the McKinley Bill was in force in that country; and yet what were they going to do? If they were placed in power, they declared they would at once change the whole fiscal policy of the country regardless of the fact that the McKinley Bill was then in force. But a new nightmare has arisen before hon. gentlemen to prevent the carrying out of their trade policy. They say that if we attempt to carry out the policy of reducing taxation, it means a diminution in the revenue of this country, and the Conservative party have plunged the Dominion into such an amount of debt that it is impossible we should diminish the revenue and be able to meet the requirements of the public service, and so forsooth, we must return the high protective tariff which has for so many years been in force in the country. The hon. gentlemen knew full well all these years what the expenditure was. They knew then, as they know now, what it was, and when they told the people they intended to make certain tariff changes, they must have had regard to the current expenditure, and must have known it was utterly impossible for them to make the changes. But during all the time during which the hon. gentlemen were in Opposition, there was one thing they did agree upon, and that was the fact that once in power they would practice economy to the bitter end. There was to be an end of travelling about the country in private cars. The private car of the past was to be a thing unknown. No longer was it to be necessary for the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) to rise and ask what was the expenditure incurred in drawing private cars over the railways of the Dominion. I do not think the hon. gentleman will be troubled in that regard this session. He will take it for granted that the Ministers went about the country at their own expense. But was it not disgraceful on the part of those hon. gentlemen, especially in view of the profession made by them, and especially by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) to do what they did. A short time ago in Winnipeg the astounding spectacle was afforded not of three Ministers in one car, but of three Ministers in three cars. There are stories afloat that there is discord and disruption is threatened in the Cabinet; and if those hon. gentlemen travel about in this way and three Ministers have to go to one place in three different cars, there may be some credibility attached to the statements that are being made. But hon. gentlemen opposite are going to reduce the expense. It has always been a bugbear that expenditure has increased. I heard an hon. gentleman make the statement that he did not believe it was a crime to increase the expenditure of the Dominion and the debt of the Dominion, provided the expenditure was of a good and necessary character. And what do hon. gentlemen announce to-day as a platform? Hon. gentlemen announce in the Speech from the Throne that during the next two years the system of canals, known as the St. Lawrence canals, are to be deepened to 14 feet. I do not know what the expenditure in that regard will be; but from time to time I have heard statements made in this House that the amount will go up into the millions. Yet those hon. gentlemen who have preached retrenchment and economy will plunge the country still further into debt to a large amount on that score.

An hon. MEMBER. It is "blue ruin" you are talking.

Mr. BENNETT. It may be that hon. gentlemen opposite seeing the condition of the country and that capitalists are not investing their money here, think the only salvation is to get the country involved in an expenditure on public works. The Estimates will be presented after a while, and an opportunity will be afforded of seeing how much is to be accomplished in the way of economy in the public service. Hon. gentlemen opposite largely indulged in the policy of paring down the Estimates. For instance, it was stated by them that there should be a saving in the number of Ministers. Yet in an apologetic strain the Controller of Customs when visiting the constituency in which he was defeated last June, explained that while he was at present only a Controller he would soon become a full-fledged Cabinet Minister. As regards the Controller of Inland Revenue, his position will also be improved; but the Speech from the Throne contains nothing in that regard. Then we have been told all along that public expenditure has been too high, and yet in order to lessen it hon. gentlemen opposite, for political exigencies, sent Mr. Devlin to Ireland at an expense to this suffering country of $5,000 a year. But hon. gentlemen have got rid of him cheaply, for I give him credit that he kicked over the party traces, and if the hon. gentleman was here to-day he would probably again be a thorn in the side of hon. gentlemen opposite.

I now propose to refer to the Franchise Act for a few moments. I want to say here that I am one of those who believes that the expenditure should be decreased as much as possible both to the provinces and the Dominion in regard to the compilation of the voters' list; but at the same time I am prepared to say that unless the voters' lists are to be fair, honest and above board, I am prepared to endorse the spending of almost any amount of money in order that those lists shall be fair and proper. I am prepared to meet the provinces on this platform, that the provinces should try to do what is right as well as the Dominion Government, and I am prepared to stay here if necessary six months to fight a Franchise Act, which will deprive a number of electors of the right to the franchise simply to give hon. gentlemen opposite a party advantage. It is all very well to ask the adoption of those franchises which exist in the different provinces. But I ask whether it is common honesty that in the province of Nova Scotia hundreds of men should be deprived of voting at provincial elections. Why? Not because they have not intelligence, not because they do not possess proper qualifications, but simply owing to the fact of being employees of the Intercolonial Railway, and having been appointed a few years ago it is assumed that their predilections would be Conservative? Is it right that in every town and village in Ontario where men are postmasters or custom-house officials or hold any position in the gift of the Dominion Government, those men who were appointed some years ago are assumed to have certain political predilections and are supposed to be too Conservative and should therefore be deprived of their votes, but that every indigent, and every employee of the Ontario Government should be accorded the right of voting. As has been pointed out by the leader of the Opposition, there is no pressing necessity to-day in this country for the passing of the Franchise Act. There cannot in all probability be a general election for some three or four more years, and in the meantime let the provinces endeavour to meet the Dominion Government in a fair and just way. Let the provinces say: We will endeavour to assimilate our different franchises for the Dominion.

I know, Sir, that in the constituency which I represent, there has not been one moment's peace lost over the question of the franchise, and there have not been many moments' sleep lost over the Manitoba school question, but I tell the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, that there are hundreds of men there waiting with expectant ears to know what their employers are going to do in the coming summer. I tell the hon. gentlemen opposite that there are men whose capital is lying dormant, and that there are large saw-mills there which are not being placed in order for the coming season, and why? It is because the owners of that property do not know what this Government propose to do in the matter of the tariff. There are interests of different and diverse kinds in that constituency, and all along the line they are waiting with bated breath to know what this Government proposes to do with its fiscal policy. These industries in my riding have not been treated as the coal industry has been treated in the province of Nova Scotia. They have not been informed that their industry is not to be touched. There has been no intimation given to them, as apparently intimations have been given to others engaged in different lines of commerce and trade. In all seriousness and soberness I do say that in that northern country there are expectant men waiting to hear what the tariff policy of this Government is to be. Why should the Government intervene and place as a buffer to the tariff announcement for the next twenty days the consideration of the franchise in this House. The franchise is not a matter of concern to the country, but the question of machinery being set in running order, and busy hives of industry being allowed to proceed as they were some years ago is a matter of the very deepest and gravest interest to our people. I trust that the Opposition will do their duty. I trust that they will insist upon their right to demand that the Government shall bring down their Tariff Bill at the earliest possible day, and so redeem the pledge given by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) a few days ago: that within one week after the meeting of the House the Government policy would be announced on the tariff question.

It would be a lack of loyalty on my part, Mr. Speaker, were I to neglect making a passing reference to that clause in the address which relates to the approaching Jubilee celebration of Her Glorious Majesty Queen Victoria. In this, which is I believe the greatest colony of the greatest Empire that the sun ever shone upon, we enjoy every right and every privilege that free men should enjoy, and the enjoyment of these rights and privileges is in the main due to the fact, that for sixty years Britain has been graced with a sovereign who has been kind to the faults of her people and tolerant in every way. And if Queen Victoria is a woman and only a woman, I believe that to her wise counsel and her sagacious judgment is due the avoidance of many difficulties and dangers which have arisen. I believe that I echo the sentiment that goes up from every Canadian heart when I say, that while we cannot hope to see Her Most Gracious Majesty for many more years sitting on Britain's throne, still we hope that those who come after to rule the Empire, may be to Canadians and to the people of the whole British domain what she has been, a good, a wise and a grand sovereign.

Motion agreed to, and, on a division, debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.30

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 2nd April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from two of the Judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a certificate and report relating to the election for the electoral district of the city of Winnipeg, by which the said election is declared void.

Mr. SPEAKER also informed the House that in conformity with chapter 9, section 46 of the Revised Statutes, he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Russell for an Address to His Excellency the Governor General in answer to his Speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Mr. Speaker, I hope it will not be considered as simply using a trite saying when I state that I did not expect to speak on this question. As a matter of fact it is true, and I would not have spoken except for the extraordinary character the debate has assumed. Of course it might be expected, it always is expected that the attack made on the Government of the day by the Opposition will be in part direct at the opening of the session; but I am sure that not even the followers of the leader of the Opposition himself were prepared for so varied a bill of fare as that presented to the House. It is said among military men that one who is good in leading a charge is a poor man in resisting an attack. If anything could be more true of the condition presented in this House than that, I should like to learn it, for after all we have had speakers presenting a change of opinion since hon. gentlemen opposite came here at the opening of the present session. On the second day this House met we had and we expected to have considerable discussion about the Manitoba school question, and it was all clearly on the line of attacking the Government for not having gone far enough. But not many days elapsed before, from almost every part of the other side of the House, hon. gentlemen who rose to speak changed the whole character of the debate and the whole nature of the position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite. I read in the Conservative newspapers that the party held a caucus, and the fact was most suggestive that at the caucus the Manitoba school question was not mentioned. Why, then, is it mentioned in the House? That is what I should like to learn. Those hon. gentlemen had not the pluck in caucus, from fear of their followers, to mention it, but they seek to pretend before the country that they are still in favour of continuing the agitation, and so they speak of the question in the House. We can easily understand the character of this attack when we go back just one year. It will be within your remembrance, Mr. Speaker, and the remembrance of some other hon. gentlemen who had the honour of holding seats in the last Parliament that when the Remedial Bill was brought down, the leader of the Government spoke on that question with tremendous earnestness. The words are memorable. He was here to push the Bill; he was here to stand by the Bill; he was here to press the Bill to a final conclusion, and if necessary, physically or otherwise, he was ready to die in his place in order that the Bill might become law. It is a very curious fact that the change has been so suddenly made. I was led to believe that truth was truth on all occasions. Why, the poet, if he had foreseen the conduct of the Conservative party, would never have written these words:

Truth crushed to earth will rise again.

Truth has been crushed to earth and so far as the Conservative party is concerned it does not seem to rise again. If the position taken by the late Government on the Manitoba school question was correct, then they must accept either of the two horns of the dilemma; either they were not honest in the past or they are cowards now. If they were sincere in proclaiming the eternal principle of justice for the minority as they viewed it, what has taken place to change that eternal principle during the last twelve months? Should the action of the present Government have changed their views as to the principle, if they were sincere in upholding that principle? Has the action of the Government made that right which was before wrong, or made that wrong which was before right. I never saw such a sad spectacle in my life as that presented by the Opposition in this House. I remember the time when these hon. gentlemen were in power, and when every measure they brought forward was cheered to the echo. Whether they proposed to lower the duties or whether they proposed to increase the duties, or whether they proposed measures against the Catholics or in favour of the Catholics, they all cheered together in the one common purpose and the one hope of reward. Sir, do they cheer together now? Oh, no.

I notice that the versatile member for West York (Mr. Wallace) has only a certain cheerful element in his composition, and I notice also that when the brilliant member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) speaks there are certain men in his own party who do not cheer him. The cheers are divided now. The Opposition members are few enough, goodness knows, and they could hardly give a decent cheer if they were united, but when they cannot get a combined cheer, how dreary and saddening must be their efforts at enthusiasm? Let us contrast for a moment some members on the other side of the House, one with the other. There for example is the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Chauvin) and he has for a confrere the member for West York (Mr. Wallace), and there too is the hon. member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) seated beside the versatile member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) is opposed by East Durham (Mr. Craig), and Kent (Mr. McInerney) is in direct antagonism to Centre Toronto (Mr. Clarke). And the same contrast which members of this party exhibit in the House is presented to the country outside. In Champlain the Government are to be condemned for not doing enough, and in Colchester they are to be upheld. In Champlain county certain auxiliaries of the Conservative party divide the world into two classes: the blessed and the accursed, and of course the Conservatives are the blessed and the Liberals the accursed. The divided action of the Opposition may be very pleasant for themselves just now, but I forewarn them of the dire consequences hereafter. In Champlain, as I have said, the Government are being condemned for not doing justice to the minority, while Mr. Muir the Conservative candidate in Colchester declares that the Manitoba school question is settled, and that he will oppose any government who will attempt to bring it up again. Where is the consistency there? Where, oh where is the compact Conservative party? Where did their disintegration begin and where is it going to end? I commend this sad spectacle of inconsistency to hon. gentlemen opposite who say that the Government have not done enough for the Catholic minority, and to the bishops behind them. Some of those hon. gentlemen blame the Government for doing too much and others blame the Government for not doing enough. What do their lordships the bishops think of that? The truth of the matter is, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservative party who having placed themselves on the shoulders of the prelates, having found they could not carry them into power, now turn around and proclaim a new and entirely different policy for the next four or five years. That conduct is worthy of the party that prepared one set of facts for Protestant electors in Ontario and another set of facts for Roman Catholic electors in Quebec. They found that the ecclesiastical authorities were not able to keep them in power, and so they turn round and try to curry favour with, and obtain the assistance of the very opposite elements in the community. Again, some hon. gentlemen opposite who have spoken have proclaimed that they do not wish to disturb the school settlement, but professing toryism as consonant with their constitution, they are not generous enough to say like men: we commend the Government for the action they have taken. The member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke) while he said that he was not going to vote against the Government, and thus gave a tip to his leader that he had better drop the Manitoba school agitation, announced at the same time that the Government were bringing out here a papal ablegate, and he sought to censure the Government for doing that. Now, it is well known that the Government have nothing whatever to do with that matter, and why is the question brought up in this House? As it is brought before us we have to meet it. I was somewhat edified by what one hon. gentleman said in answer to the charge that Archbishop Taché was sent for by the Conservative party. His excuse was, that Archbishop Taché was a British subject, and the inference from his remarks is that the Pope might lawfully send a British subject to Canada with the identical message that he sent by an Italian or a Frenchman, and it was all right if the British subject carried it. The nationality of the messenger appeared to be everything in his eye, but the message itself seems to be of no importance whatever to him. These hon. gentlemen to be consistent would not listen to a single word of revelation if it came from an Italian or a Frenchman, but if it came from a British subject they would accept it as gospel. How ridiculous it is to contend that the channel of communication is the all-important thing, and that the communication itself is of no consequence whatever. Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, it makes very little difference who brings the message, if the message is a proper one to be brought. I was very much pleased with the lucid explanation given by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Maxwell) upon that question yesterday. We both belong to the only church in this world that has representative government in every part of its organization, and as it is republican in its very essence its members have every recourse for the redress of grievances. The humblest man in the congregation has an appeal to the session, and then to the presbytery, and then to the synod, and from the synod to the representatives of the whole church throughout the country in the general assembly. His appeal is subject to the condition that every clergyman is met there by his peer, a layman, who sits in judgment not only on the laymen but on the clergyman himself. Now, if I took an appeal from one court to another, and the matter was brought up here in Parliament would it be said that the state was injured? If it should happen that a General Assembly—an assembly like the Ecumenical Council, over the whole Presbyterian Church in the world—met outside of the British realm, and I took my appeal there, would hon. gentlemen opposite say that that was wrong? By no means. I went through the various avenues of spiritual authority, until I found in the end where the matter was decided. Now, we have nothing to do with this appeal to the Pope, and it ought not to have been brought up here. But, as it has been brought up, instead of saying a single word against that petition or against the action of our French Catholic friends in the matter, the man on the other side should blush who on gala day talks about Catholic aggression, without having in his heart the kindest feelings towards those who have been asserting their rights, and under an authority that will see that those rights are granted. It is very easy within the four walls of a lodge room to speak about Papal aggression; it is very easy on gala days, under the shade of the trees, while the sun is shining and flags are flying, to talk about Papal aggression; but it is neither manly nor the part of good citizenship to do so when men are effectually working and fighting for their rights in a way that should receive every man's commendation. But hon. gentlemen opposite never learned that generosity. They must have a fling at these men by raising the cry, "Look out, you are in danger; Rome has spoken." Now, as I say, we have nothing whatever to do with that petition. I have read a little Catholic theology, and if I interpret correctly the spirit of that theology, it will be found that the action and conduct of the clergymen of whom these gentlemen complain will receive no sympathy from that church's highest and best utterances.

But hon. gentlemen opposite say, Manitoba did too much. It is neither your business nor mine, nor the business of any member of this House what Manitoba has done. I care not if Manitoba gave separate schools to every denomination in the province; that is their business. My objection to the coercion Bill was that we in this House proposed to step in and dictate to a noble province what it should do in this respect. I believe, speaking modestly, that our fathers erred as to the true temper of the people of Canada, when with fear and trembling they made it constitutional that in certain provinces there should be separate schools. I do not say that separate schools may not be right—I think differently—or that certain people should not have the right to have separate schools; but I am ready here and now to vote that the province of Quebec shall have just such kind of schools as she likes. I am not going to stand up here as a Protestant and dictate what kind of schools any province shall have. I say that as a sister province in this confederation, Quebec should have the kind of schools it likes, because I know that the various provinces will counterpoise each other in that respect. Is not the fact that Mr. Greenway has expressed his desire that the law shall be carried out in the best possible manner, the highest guarantee that our Catholic fellow-citizens in Manitoba can have the right done?

I remember that one of the things hon. gentlemen opposite said last year was that once the remedial order had passed, it was out of the hands of the Government. No hon. gentleman has hinted now that the legislation has passed the Manitoba legislature, the matter is out of the hands of this Government. I believe it is; but I call attention again to the manly spectacle presented by this discussion lasting six days in this House, although there is neither a leader nor a follower on the other side who ventures to move a resolution on the subject. Only yesterday Sir Charles Tupper was ready to bleed and die for the Remedial Bill, and called for the reverence of his followers for it. Now, none so base or low as to do it reverence. One year has made the great change. Where are those who pledged their faith to carry it through? and where are those who have been duped into the idea that it was alone for religious and moral purposes they took their political lives in their hands? They have learned that the whole scheme was to get the votes of our Roman Catholic fellow-citizens; and now, that scheme having failed, they will go on the other tack, and say that the Pope has sent out a delegate to settle the question, and that what he does by another he does himself. I can almost fancy them fearing that the delegate has brought from the Pope a neck-tie or something else that is Popish. I care not, speaking politically, what he has come here for. But every member of this House is interested to see what the outcome shall be for a people composed as we are of various nationalities, languages and religions, and evolved from its best growth.

The hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) last night called on the Government to bring in a Bill to impose pains and penalties upon the priests and bishops of Quebec, and he said he would support it. I think I can see a Bill like that introduced into this House. Then you would hear talk about our bringing in legislation against the clergy, and there is not a real Tory from one end of this country to the other, side, whether he be Protestant, Catholic, or Pagan, who would not be found yelling from one end of the country to the other. "Look at the blow they are striking at the Catholic Church." Sir, having these various nationalities, languages and religions in Canada, we must have this growth. Just as the Bill brought down by the leader of the Opposition would have failed signally in accomplishing that which is best for this country, so any attempt to legislate against any church and to say what shall be done by that church would signally fail. Does the hon. gentleman honestly think that this Parliament ought to pass such legislation? Or is it suggested for the purpose of carrying out a scheme which is back of it, to use both forces for party advantage? It does seem to me that what we have heard both in this House and out of it for the last five years has sadly changed, when we recall the shouts that went up and the cheers that rung in these galleries as we heard the Conservative party boast of being the bold pioneers of all progress, who never went back on their word; and when we see them to-day with drooping heads and almost tearful eyes, each one in his own way playing his part in this little scheme—each one telling the Government, we must vote against you because you did wrong—one saying that they went too far, and another that they did not go far enough—because they find that the better sense of Canada is in favour of the action of the Government. A sorrier spectacle was never presented in a free country. I know not what they ought to do; I will not give them an opinion as to that; but I know that there is not much of the spirit of the race to which I belong in the leaders on the other side of the House, or they would "die game," to use a common expression.

Coming to a few of the utterances of these hon. gentlemen, I wish to speak about my good friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) who addressed us last night just before the House adjourned. He rose to speak about the signal triumph that he had achieved over the combined forces of the Liberal party in East Simcoe. I may feel pleased to think that a young man of promise like my hon. friend did achieve success, and I attribute it to his personal ability and popularity, and because he had to fight a man who, owing to his age, was unable to cope with him in any way. But then I have a shrewd suspicion that the strongest element at his back, all the time, was his vote against the late Government on the school question. So I can imagine Protestants, Tory and Liberal, saying that the man who took his life in his hands when he opposed his Government deserved success. But as I saw him rise and heard him describe his signal victory, I could not help saying to myself: how lonely! He could look nowhere to the right or the left, or the front and find a companion that had come back from the brush of battle. He stood there like the "pelican of the wilderness," or "the owl of the desert," or "the sparrow now alone on the housetop." And I thought perhaps that while, owing to this circumstance, a little self-glorification was pardonable as showing his individual power to do what he did and what so many others failed to do, he was very cruel on the men who had fallen in the struggle elsewhere and whom public opinion had prevented from assisting him in this House. Let us see whether what the hon. gentleman said bears that out. I have spoken about one matter to which he referred, namely, that it was wrong for Manitoba to make concessions. If my views are correct, it was not wrong for Manitoba to make any concession, but rather Manitoba had a perfect right to make all the concessions she liked. Every one of these hon. gentlemen opposite who spoke, whether he voted for or against the Remedial Bill, pitched his conclusion in the same key, and I could not help thinking how the cheerful member for Montmorency (Mr. Casgrain) felt with the hon. member for North York (Mr. Wallace) in front of him, who was down on anything like concessions, and with the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) who was equally opposed to any yielding on the part of Manitoba, behind him. I should like to see the real physical results that ought to be produced by these men embracing one another as being engaged in so good and holy a cause. I should like to see, for example, the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Broder) who thundered against concession, who felt that the honour and dignity of the country was blighted because a Papal delegate had come to our shores, get down beside the hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Quinn) and kindly say to him: "My brother, one in sympathy, one in purpose, one for all that makes for Canada—true, you and I do not think alike; oh, no—but in the main-springs of our actions and in the heart-throbbings of our religious opinions, let us unite for the glorious purpose of assisting the Conservative party. You, in your home, will tell these priests: Well, they have to say something on account of their constituencies, but remember that in order to defeat the Liberals—the foes of all that is good and progressive in this country—we should forget a little of our differences and join together." And then I can hear the hon. member for Montreal reply: "You are a man after my own heart; I was just thinking the same thing. Oh, my good brother, may the Lord bless you in your good works, and when I read the speeches you make elsewhere, I shall wink the other eye to my clergymen, and say it is all for the good cause." Then the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) can find a friend here who will willingly take him to his heart, with all the aspirations of a fond mother—let him come and sit beside the placid, kindly, good-natured, rubicund member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière), who has been struggling with this Manitoba school question ever since I came into this House and during the whole-time his friends were in power, and who went just as far as they let him to make a pretense of doing something for the minority in Manitoba. They, too, will discover that they were a model pair in this noble work of union for the common good, and, after all is said and done, will agree that, in the main, they have one purpose at least, and that purpose they will follow. Why, I was more than surprised when the hon. member for Welland spoke about the hon. Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton). The whole burden of his song seemed to be that Mr. Sifton had said so and so at another time. Did that affect the question? What even a man may have been reported to have said at one time or another—and newspaper reports are so varied and conflicting—does not affect the real question of what was done. What sensible men are concerned with is the result. Why, we have been a week here talking about questions that inevitably must come up again for discussion. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) said that all the mills were idle pending our legislation on the tariff. Why should we not go to business?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I hear my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) say "hear, hear," yet he was so very anxious to speak last night that he could not wait. He was bursting last night with eagerness to speak, and appeared as if he could not contain himself but had to do so there and then. And since these hon. gentlemen persist in their attacks, we are perforce bound to reply or be subjected to the taunt that we are unable to answer. But why has there been all this delay?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I again hear my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) says "hear, hear." The hon. gentleman is still a lone bird on the housetop, and he feels it all the time. There is another hon. gentleman to whom I must pay a little attention, and I am sorry he is not in his place, the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). I will preface what I propose to say in regard to him, by a reminiscence of an incident in that hon. gentleman's career. Some eight or nine years ago, the city of Toronto was all ablaze with glory to welcome the triumphant return of the Grand Old Man, Sir Oliver Mowat. He had won the battle of his native province, and Toronto the good, irrespective of party, turned out to give him a royal welcome. It was a gala day, men left their business, mothers left their homes and brought their children to do honour to the Grand Old Man. Among those who were particularly conspicuous on that occasion was the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes). All down King Street, on a caparisoned white horse, he rode, carrying a flag, and what do you suppose was written on that flag?

Mr. BENNETT. Business is business.

Mr. FRASER. The hon. gentleman again is wrong. There was written on it, "Mowat and victory for ever." And as the hon. gentleman waved that flag over the heads of the people, he felt that he was a prominent figure, indeed, in a grand event. But that was not all. He got tired of that particular flag, he got tired of Mowat and Victory, that was only one phase of the pulsation of his feelings, and as he came to Yonge Street, he changed his banner, he grasped another from one of the promenaders in the procession, and waved that aloft, and what do you suppose was written on the second flag. "Business is business"—oh, no, "Down with Tupper and corruption." Did his honoured leader at that time fill up the measure of his iniquity and corruption? Does the inscription on that flag still represent the opinion the member for North Victoria entertains concerning the hon. leader of the Opposition? I understand that the hon. member for North Victoria is taking lessons in penmanship. At present he does not seem to know the difference between a small letter and a capital, and, in case he should make a mistake he writes "Roman Catholic" with a small "r." Any one can find that by consulting the columns of his paper. Not later than January last he had something to say about his leader. Listen. In an article in which he criticises both parties—for, of course, he is above all considerations of party—he says:

The roman catholic bishops are very clever politicians, but in the present case, their plans are too specious.

An hon. MEMBER. What paper is that?

Mr. FRASER. I am quoting from the Victoria "Warder" of January 1st:

Mark you, gentle reader, we do not condemn them.

Now, this is really very kind to the bishops, Now, here is the hon. gentleman's opinion of his leaders:

The green, gaping-mouthed Tory leaders who put their necks into the noose without having any means of saving themselves.

That was his opinion of them then. When did his conversion take place? Eight years ago "corruptionist" was the word he used, but now he applies a term I would not begin to use concerning the distinguished Nova Scotian (Sir Charles Tupper) who now finds it necessary to leave the room. "Green, gaping-mouthed Tory leaders." Whatever we may say as to their gaping the term "green" is not applicable. Who would ever think of talking of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) as "green"? Neither does he gape, except at times when the hour is late. This may, perhaps, have reference to the year when the Remedial Bill was before this House, for I have often seen the leader of hon. gentlemen opposite gaping and afterwards going away to sleep, leaving his poor deluded followers to fight it out all night. The hon. member for North Victoria, whose newspaper I have just quoted, feels himself justified in denouncing everybody in connection with the Liberal party because of what has been done regarding the Manitoba school question. I trust that his lessons in penmanship will lead him further, and that also, while he is learning he will learn that such attacks as this that I have read should not be made upon opponents, much less upon his leader. Does any man in his senses suppose that in writing in that way he is going to overcome the effects of his own acts? What can he think of his constituency? No more than the hon. member for St. Anne's (Mr. Quinn) thought about the greatest Catholic paper in the world, published in the interests of the Catholics when he hinted that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) has so far overcome the "Tablet" as to induce it to write that which is not correct. I have no such opinion of the "Tablet." Although it does not represent my views, I know that it has a reputation, and rightly so, as a power among its own readers. I think it ill-became the hon. gentleman as a member of this House—and he will pardon me for saying that much—to speak about the "Tablet" as he did. Even if the Solicitor General thought of doing such a thing as he suggests, what reason does he give us to believe that the "Tablet" could be imposed upon? Such a suggestion was irreligious. If he were a Liberal, he would be read out of all the churches tomorrow. Such conduct in the Liberals would have to be wiped out—wiped out, more, burned out. The hon. member for North Victoria talks about the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and his action in the late by-elections. I understood that metaphorically and in fact the hon. member for North Victoria had received a black eye in that county. I suppose he is still smarting under the mental shock and physical strain, and so felt that he must say something against the Postmaster General. Mr. Speaker, the facts are plain so that he who runneth may read, and the lesson they teach is equally plain. That lesson is that no party can live on its past in this Canada of ours, for there is here a far stronger body of sound public opinion than gentlemen opposite thought. But they pitch their tents in the graveyards of dead issues and the people of Canada would have none of them. I rejoice that there was in this people of Canada a determination to show not only that they were ready to treat men fairly and well, but that they had in them the citizenship that makes for and is capable of self-government. I fear not for the future of this Dominion. I care not now what question may arise—we have laid deep the foundations, and in any difficulties of the future, when we are inclined to feel that public sentiment is unresponsive, we can gain inspiration for the struggle in the spirit that sent heavenward the cheers that rose throughout the Dominion on the 23rd of June. The people of Canada showed that, different though they were in race and religion, they had a common aim and purpose—not for them the narrowness that has only a glimpse of the hill-top, but the glorious light of unity and freedom upon the mountain peak. I can tell hon. gentlemen opposite—they may not take my advice, they will not take my advice, no doubt—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. "Hear, hear" says the hon. gentleman. Let the lone sparrow on the house-top say "Hear, hear." But, whether I be a prophet or not, let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I believe the people of Canada are ready to give again the verdict they gave on the 23rd June, and that, if hon. gentlemen think that by keeping before the people this skeleton of an issue which is now seen to be used merely for Tory purposes, they will make the biggest mistake ever made by a party in this world. Hon. gentlemen speak of our French friends. I have only to say, that, in my opinion, last year the laymen among our Roman Catholic friends in Canada did more to lay the foundation of the nation's greatness than all the clergymen of all the denominations who are Tories first and Christians afterwards.

In the Speech from the Throne there is much that gives me pleasure. We are here assured that the plebiscite will be taken. The declaration in favour of a plebiscite was put in the Liberal platform, and Liberals understood that that pledge would be carried out. The question of restraining the liquor traffic is not a party question, and I am sure that hon. gentlemen opposite who are in sympathy with the principle of prohibition will declare with gentlemen on this side in favour of giving the people an untrammelled vote upon this great question. Then there is the question of the canals. I think last night some hon. gentleman, I forget whom, said something about spending money on the canals. Why, if I remember right, we have spent some forty-six or forty-eight million dollars on the canals, and they are not good now. Now, Mr. Speaker, the people of this country draw a distinction between an expenditure by the Conservative party and an expenditure by the Liberal party; they are not afraid of expenditure if it is made honestly and for good purposes. But what the people object to is that one dollar of money should go into anything else except the purpose for which it was voted. I am not afraid that a country with such vast resources as we have, if the money is honestly expended, will not reap the benefit from it. Then we have the Franchise Act. My good friend, of whom I have spoken, and with whom I have had such pleasant relations in this House, is ready to stay six weeks, nay, six months, lest the franchise should be touched. He will not need to stay that long, and the franchise will be changed. He will find that that matter is one that must be taken up in this House, and must be carried out. Of the tariff, I will say nothing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRASER. I just wanted you to say that. I think it very unbecoming for hon. gentlemen opposite to say a word about the tariff, for this reason: When the tariff is brought down, I shall discuss it as freely and as fully as if it were brought down by the Conservatives; but until it is brought down, it is exceedingly unseemly to anticipate what may never happen. If the position of the hon. gentleman and his friends is correct, we have all become protectionists. It is paeans of praise they should be sending up instead of denunciations of the Liberal party. Surely you should rejoice in the repentance of a sinner; and if we come to your views, and you always said they were for the good of the country, should you not be pleased? But still they denounce us for having made any change in the tariff. I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that there is not at all the lingering disquiet in this country that they speak about in regard to the tariff. The people of this country understand exactly that the tariff question is in the hands of a government who will do their best under all circumstances. But in the name of common decency let us wait until we see the tariff before we attack it. There are hon. gentlemen who speak on this tariff in this way, and whose views will be heard by men who are really so beclouded in their party allegiance that they may think there is some foundation for it. That is the disturbing element. Leave it alone until such times as it comes down, and the people of this country are, I am sure, confident that it will be all right. We shall then approach it as sensible men on sensible principles, and decide it as we ought. One word more, and I am done. I am sure we all join hands upon the auspicious occasion of this sixtieth anniversary of our glorious sovereign's reign. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) hinted that we were loyal now perforce, and he was glad of it. Of course, he is glad of any force. Force is the only element known to his nature, and he is glad to find that people are made loyal by force. We did not need to be continually talking of our loyalty, and except for this supreme occasion, there would be no need to speak of it now. The people of this country, universally, are loyal to the core. His leader said so after he came from England before the last election, and the hon. gentleman should have learned a lesson in respect from his leader. The truth of the matter is that it is gall and wormwood for them to know that the country is governed by the Liberal party in this bright year especially, which is the sixtieth anniversary of a Queen who rules the greatest country of ancient or modern times, a year in which Canada will send, as her contribution to help to swell the anniversary chorus, a Liberal as Premier of this country. Glad am I, also, that this contribution comes from Canada in the shape of a French Canadian; glad am I because nothing will show to the nations how united we are in purpose, and how anxious we are that everything that is bright shall prevail in our country. Our Premier needs no apology because he is a French Canadian, for long ago when the Liberals were in a minority, they sought, not a man who was of the majority, but the man who was best fitted to fill the place. I have said, Mr. Speaker, in this House before, and I repeat it, that Sir John Thompson never could have been Premier of Canada until the Liberals chose Mr. Laurier as their leader when they were in Opposition. His appointment paved the way for that. The fight was against Mr. Laurier in the English-speaking sections of this Dominion in the last election. I remember one man who spoke very hardly about French influence and all that, and on the 23rd of June, as the story of the country's revolution was flashed over the Dominion, he found they were in the minority. He had a good deal of shrewd Scotch sense about him, and he felt so bad that he did what no other Scotchman ever did, he went off and partook of a little liquid. Finding him on the street in this rather happy condition, he said that which was philosophical, and that which the leaders of the Conservative party ought to have remembered long before they touched the Remedial Bill. Said he: "If we had known the Frenchmen did not want the cursed Bill, we would not be forcing it on them." Mr. Speaker, on the whole I felt that he was a better leader than the gentleman who was leading the Conservative party. But be that as it may, this state of things exists. Now, it is said that the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition are going to be knighted. I will not say anything about that, because I grant no titles myself, and I cannot speak with any degree of certainty as to others. But I make an humble suggestion, that if the leader of the Government be raised to the peerage, it shall be under the name of Lord Pax. Pax vobiscum in Canada. As to the leader of the Conservative side I suggest that he be called—and I shall not leave the name to the English, or the Irish, or the Scotch, or any other language, I shall still use that language which was used in ancient times, and I would designate the leader of the Opposition as Lord Avena. Some gentlemen may not know what that means; I have no doubt about that. During his election in the county of Cape Breton he helped, so great and swelling was his heart—or rather his friends did—the poor people in that county with two cars of oats. Now, Lord Avena would be a very good title for him at the present time. But whatever title they get, whether Pax for the leader of this Government, or Avena for the leader of the Opposition, or whether neither of them gets a title, it will make no difference in the sentiments of the people of Canada.

Now, Sir, I cannot help saying one word, in connection with this glorious year, about the conduct of our neighbours to the south of us, but if they think they can get on without us, my answer is, I am sure we can get on without them. I want the closest trade relations to exist between us. But I feel this one thing, Mr. Speaker, in this jubilee year, that here we have a nation in many respects more distinctly British than many of the people in the British Isles. The majority of the people of Canada probably never had the good fortune to see our beloved Sovereign, and if I would not be considered profane, I would say, "Who not having seen, they loved." I am sure the sentiment of Canada is this, that whether peace prevails or not, God helping us, as we hope He will, the Canadian people will be a unit in their attachment, not to the Queen as a woman, though that is a strong feeling of attachment, but to the grand central idea of all that the consolidation of this mighty Empire means, with its privileges, its purposes and its results, and that Canada will be found one with the Empire. Sir, in this year we will send to England an envoy. I commiserate hon. gentlemen opposite in not being able to tell Her Majesty the Queen that the only loyal party in Canada is the Conservative party, but I am sure the leader of the Government will say that though they may have gone wrong, and to step aside is human, the Conservatives in this their deep tribulation, are learning the lesson necessary for them, and out of the fiery furnace, involving the loss of office and of supplies, they will in years to come arise, purified and better qualified to be subjects of our Queen.

Mr. QUINN. I wish to direct your attention, Mr. Speaker, to a misstatement made by the hon. gentleman in regard to remarks made by me with respect to the London "Tablet." I did not wish to interrupt his fine periods at the moment; but I could not remember having said what he attributed to me. I hold in my hand the report of my remarks in which I made reference to the "Tablet." My characterization of the "Tablet" was as follows:—

Well, with regard to the somebody who followed him I have here a very interesting article in the London "Tablet," a leading Roman Catholic newspaper, which, I think, will be very instructive to the House, and certainly of great interest to the members of the Government if they will only bear with me while I read a portion of it.

My next reference, and the only reference thereafter I made to the "Tablet" was as follows:—

Now, I wish to draw the particular attention of the hon. the Solicitor General to this article, as I understand—probably I have been misinformed on this point—but I understand that during his visit to England, which was merely the beginning of his trip to Rome, he made the editor of the "Tablet" his particular confidant on public questions.

My hon. friend, therefore, in stating that I had said anything derogatory to the character of the "Tablet," or intimated that it could be approached or purchased or used in any way by the Solicitor General did so, I am sure, under misapprehension. But it was one which I could not allow the House or the country to remain under for any length of time as regards my statement in regard to that newspaper.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). I made no reference to what the hon. gentleman said when he delivered his speech. My reference was to an interruption made by him in the course of the speech delivered by another hon. member, and I answered at once by saying, "Could it be bought?"

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to inflict a speech upon the patience of the House. This debate has been very protracted, and it was not my intention to have taken any part in it at all, but there have been developments of late which have led me to think that if I remained altogether silent, my silence might be misconstrued. In listening to the remarks made by my hon. friend the member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) the other night, delivered with all that trenchant edge and force which are so peculiarly his own, I carried away the impression in my mind that those sentiments expressed very much my own views, except in one important particular, to which I will refer in a moment. So far as the Manitoba school question is concerned, I desire to say that I am heartily glad that that question is settled. I desire to say further that personally I regard the settlement made as the most admirable settlement that could be made. There are some details which I myself would have preferred to see altered, but in the main I regard it as an admirable settlement. I could scarcely regard it as other than a good settlement, because it is the settlement which some of us urged from our places in this House in a previous session of this Parliament. It is the settlement which was urged on the attention of the House and of the then Government by my hon. friend the late member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), with all that eloquence and that deep learning and research and that massive intellect which always commanded the attention and the admiration of this House. Therefore, I say it is naturally a settlement that I could personally approve. But that is not the question. I take it that the question is not whether this is a settlement which commends itself to individual members of this House, but the question is whether it is a settlement that is satisfactory to the province of Manitoba. From first to last I have held that the true motto was "hands off Manitoba." From first to last I have held that the best course for Canada, for the province of Quebec, for the province of Manitoba, for the minority, the wisest, the soundest, the kindest policy was to allow the province of Manitoba to manage her own educational affairs; and therefore, so far as I am personally concerned, if the province had agreed to restore the old system of schools, the system which was in existence in 1890, and was done away by the legislation of that year, I would have bowed to the settlement however much I might have regretted the determination of the province. The question is raised from time to time and remarks are made from time to time, that this is only an instalment we are having. When that remark is made, I ask myself, "What in the world is that to us; what have we to do with the matter, whether this is an instalment or not?" That is a question for the people of Manitoba to determine. If there be further conditions proposed it is for the people of Manitoba to say whether or not they are satisfied with those conditions. The principle has been established once for all by the settlement that has been made that the province of Manitoba is not to be coerced by the Dominion Parliament. I take it that we have now seen the last of any attempt on the part of this House to force its will upon any province in this Dominion in reference to educational affairs. For myself, I would say, that we ought to be thankful here as a Parliament, and we ought to be thankful this Dominion over as a people, that the dangerously strained condition of affairs that existed between the central authority and one of the provinces of this Dominion, has been brought to an end. The lesson that has been taught, the lesson that has once more been instilled I hope into the mind of every member of this House, is, that the British policy of conciliation and compromise is in all such cases as this the only true and wise policy. For my part, I sincerely hope that we have done with the school question in this House for ever. I agree with the remark made by the hon. member for East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) when he said, that the Manitoba school question was dead and buried. It may be said that we hear a great deal about it this session, but, Sir, that is not the Manitoba school question that we have this session ; it is only the disconsolate wailing of the ghost of the Manitoba school question. The Manitoba school question is dead so far as this Parliament is concerned ; I am perfectly satisfied on that point. And if it is dead, it was done to death in this House one year ago, by a few, a very few members, who against great odds met it face to face and fought it face to face in this House, and slew it. Some of us regretted very much the unhappy fate that placed us at that time in antagonism with the leaders of our party. We felt that we owed allegiance to the leaders of our party, but we felt that we owed a still higher allegiance to our own conscientious convictions, and to our own country, and to our plighted faith. And, when I speak of plighted faith, I wish to say this that while I differed from Sir Mackenzie Bowell, and while I differed from Sir Charles Tupper in the course they pursued and in the policy they advocated in reference to this Manitoba school question, yet there was one thing I admired. They were so far as this question was concerned, true to their plighted word. They kept public faith. And I venture to think, Sir, that far above the Manitoba school question and far above any question touching the present peace and prosperity of this young nation, towers the question of the good faith of our public men.

Rest assured, Mr. Speaker, that no permanent peace can reside within the borders, and that no permanent prosperity can come to the people of a country whose public men lightly disregard the public pledges that they have given. Now, Sir, it is not for me to judge whether or not hon. gentlemen opposite have kept faith in reference to the question which we have been considering so much for some sessions past—I mean kept faith with their friends in the province of Quebec. That is a question for the people of the province of Quebec to decide. It is for them to say whether what has been done was what they understood their leaders to promise should be done. It is for them to say whether the better terms that have been obtained—and better terms have been obtained, and I go further and say far better terms have been obtained for the minority under this settlement than could possibly have been obtained under the Remedial Bill—it is, I say, for the people of the province of Quebec to decide whether the better terms that have been obtained are the kind of better terms that they were promised, and that they were informed by their leaders would be insisted upon. To the people of the province of Quebec, and to the consciences of the gentlemen who made these pledges to their constituents in the province of Quebec I leave that question. They know what passed. I do not.

I wish now, Sir, to refer to another matter which came before this House a day or two ago, with reference to the position occupied by the Solicitor General. The hon. gentleman the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) made some strictures upon the course of the Solicitor General ; some strictures which were very strong, which were very severe, but which on the face of it did not seem to me to go beyond what was reasonable and right in view of the condition of things which was presented to us here. On the face of the documents, I thought that what was said by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) was reasonable and fair. I believe that this House ought to be jealous, very jealous of its honour, and the honour of this House of Commons is made up of the honour of its individual members. I listened very carefully to the statement made by the hon. the Solicitor General, and I think it is only right and just that I should say what I believe in regard to that matter. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fitzpatrick) gave a certain pledge, a very strong and solemn pledge as I understand to his bishop, and that pledge was that he would support the mandement of the bishops, and further, I understand he went so far as to say that if separate schools were not provided by this Government, if a measure to establish separate schools (if that were necessary) were not brought down by this Government, he would be prepared to resign his seat. This is how that matter occurs to my mind : If I had given a pledge that I would pursue a certain course provided I obtained political support ; if the understanding was that I should pursue a certain course in Parliament provided I obtained certain political support, and if I obtained that political support I should consider that I was bound to carry out that pledge to the uttermost. But, if on the other hand, I gave a pledge that I should pursue a certain course in view of obtaining and with the understanding that I was to receive certain political support, and if I did not obtain that political support, and if in place of obtaining that political support I obtained opposition from the quarter whence I expected that support, I should not consider myself bound by that pledge. I am not speaking now as to whether or not it was advisable to give such a pledge. I am speaking on the point of personal honour, and, so far as I am concerned, under circumstances of that kind I would not consider that I was bound by the pledge. I have thought it only right that I should make this statement, because I interposed between the hon. gentleman and the House, and also because I had before I heard the hon. gentleman's explanation expressed myself outside the House in very strong terms in reference to this matter.

Now, Sir, as I have referred to the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), there is another part of his speech which I must say I thought by no means so forcible as that in which he dealt with his pledge to the bishop. I refer to what he said with regard to the casting aside of the eminent firm of solicitors in London who had managed the affairs of Canada so ably and so successfully for forty years. The hon. gentleman told us that the relations existing between the Government and that firm of solicitors were quite satisfactory; but he added that that was no reason why we should not make a change. Now, I demur entirely to that proposition. I say that is a very strong reason why there should be no change made. If a gentleman has carried on business for me wisely and faithfully for forty years, if he knows all my affairs, if he understands all my circumstances, if he knows the relations which exist between me and other people, I say that is a very strong reason why I should not discharge him and engage some one else. I suppose it is at this point that my Conservative instincts clash with my hon. friend's Liberal instincts; but that is how I view the matter; and, laying aside altogether the sentimental aspects of the case, I say it is no light thing to tear out of a legal office in London all the business of a great country, with its many ramifications—to tear it out of the hands of those who understand it in all its details, and who have managed it with great ability and skill for forty years, and to hand it over to some other firm. I say it is a grave thing to do; it is a thing that cannot be done without some risk to the interests of the country; it is a thing which it is inconceivable should be done or could be done without a reason; and this House and the people of this country have a right to know what the reason was, and will not be satisfied to have this matter treated in the light and flippant manner in which it was treated by my hon. friend. He assigned no reason for this change; but there must have been some reason, and we have a right to know what it was. I do not know whether it has anything to do with the mission to Rome. My hon. friend could perhaps enlighten us on that matter if he were so inclined. Perhaps I would be asking too much if I asked him to inform us frankly as to that; but it so happened that it occurred at about the time the mission to Rome took place.

Now, with regard to this mission to Rome, I would like to say a word. That an appeal to the spiritual head of the church is the natural appeal in spiritual matters goes without argument. I assume that there is no reasonable man living who would suggest for one moment that it was not a right and proper thing for our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen to appeal to the spiritual head of their church in reference to purely spiritual grievances; and, if it could be shown, if, on the face of it, it appeared in any degree plausible, that that was all the mission to Rome entailed and meant, little fault, I think, could be found with it. That was what was assumed by my hon. friend from East Toronto (Mr. Ross Robertson) and from his point of view he was perfectly correct—when he said he had no fault to find. But was it on purely spiritual matters? I say no. I say that the very document which was produced in this House by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) the other night demonstrates that it was not so. I should like to know how it was that that document was produced. The hon. Minister is here, and perhaps he can tell us. It was a very strange thing, the production of that document, after the strong denials which we had heard with regard to any mission to Rome, so far as the Government were concerned. I wonder if the gentleman who shrugged his shoulders when asked whether the Solicitor General had gone to Rome representing the Government and had heard it said that he had not gone in that capacity—the gentleman who asked what the Government had said in regard to the matter—I wonder if that gentleman had anything to do with the production of this document. I wonder if it was he who said that this document must be produced. I do not know, but I shrewdly suspect that it was. At all events, the production of the document, in the dramatic manner in which it was produced, was a very curious incident. Let us look at this document, and see if there is any foundation for the statement that the mission to Rome was in connection with matters purely spiritual.

We, the undersigned members of the Senate and members of the House of Commons of Canada, and representing therein the Liberal party—

I do not know whether my hon. friend who smiles so kindly upon me accepts that as a correct statement.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I heard the document read and thought it was a very excellent one.

Mr. McNEILL. Then the hon. gentleman admits that these gentlemen represent the Liberal party?

—and representing therein the Liberal party, present ourselves before Your Holiness as respectful and devoted children of Holy Church, to complain of the existence of a state of things which, if allowed to continue—

What is it that this state of things is going to do, if allowed to continue? Just listen for a moment:

—might be extremely dangerous to the constitutional liberties of this country—

Is this purely spiritual? And yet we are told that this mission to Rome had nothing to do with politics. Have the constitutional liberties of this country nothing to do with politics? You go to the Pope of Rome and ask him to defend the constitutional liberties of Canada—those liberties which are entrusted to the keeping of the Government of Canada:

—as well as to the interests of the church itself.

So that they deliberately separate these two questions in this very paragraph. They speak, in one part of the paragraph, of the constitutional liberties of the country, and in the next clause they separate that question from the question of the interests of the church itself—from matters purely spiritual. Again, in the next paragraph, we have the following:—

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy who, during the general elections in this country, in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner in restraint of electoral freedom—

Then these gentlemen went to the Pope and asked him to come to the protection of electoral freedom in this country. That has nothing to do, I suppose, with politics either. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but their laughter does not, in the slightest degree, alter the facts:

—taking sides openly for the Conservative party against the Liberal party—

That is to say you invoke his aid as a party; you, as a party, ask him to come and help you; you, as a party, appeal to him, to begin with, and then you ask his aid for your party in your electoral contests.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You are trying to split hairs, and you are not making a good job of it.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sorry I do not satisfy my hon. friend, the chief whip of the Government, but I do not think I could. I am not making these observations for his satisfaction at all.

—and going so far as to declare guilty of grievous sin those of the electors who would vote for the candidates of the Liberal party.

Then again, this next paragraph:

Sincerely attached to the institutions of our country, which insure to us Catholics the most complete liberty, we respectfully represent to Your Holiness that these democratic institutions under which we live, and for which Your Holiness has many times expressed sentiments of admiration and confidence, can only exist under perfect electoral freedom.

Does any hon. gentleman on the other side mean to say that that is an appeal upon purely spiritual matters? Does any hon. gentleman who has been interrupting me venture to suggest that that is not invoking the aid of the Pope to assist the present Government to preserve political liberty and democratic institutions?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. We want civil liberty, that is all.

Mr. McNEILL. They want the Pope to come to their aid to uphold civil liberty! I am free to say that I believe the cause of the Liberal party, as they set it forth at the beginning of the campaign in the province of Quebec, was the cause of civil and religious liberty as against ecclesiastical domination. That is how they set out their case to begin with, and I recollect very well the utterances of the hon. leader of the Government in this House when he, in tones that thrilled this chamber and stirred the pulses of many a member of the party which is opposed to him, declared that so far as he was concerned, he would not, as a politician, as one into whose hands were committed in some share the destinies of this country, submit to ecclesiastical domination. But how are the mighty fallen? What have we seen since then? Why, we have seen these gentlemen marshal their forces, we have seen their forces placed in battle array, we have seen their banners displayed, and heard their trumpets blown—and what happened? Why, at the very first shot fired from the opposing batteries, which was well directed and demolished a newspaper, the whole Liberal party turned tail and ran for shelter. Where did they run to, these gentlemen who were determined to resist ecclesiastical tyranny and domination and who had taken up arms to defend civil and religious liberty? Why, they ran to the commander-in-chief of the ecclesiastical forces, they grovelled before him and prayed him for God's sake to intervene between them and the generals and the captains of his army whom these gentlemen, in a moment of rashness, had ventured to defy. That is what they did. That is the result of this great struggle for civil and religious liberty of which we have heard so much. Can any hon. gentleman say that the result is anything else? Why, I recollect, or else my memory very much deceives me, reading in the principal organ in Ontario of hon. gentlemen opposite, an article which distinctly implied that a measure would be brought in to defend the liberties of those who were threatened by ecclesiastical tyranny and who were suffering from ecclesiastical domination. If my memory does not deceive me, such an article was published in the "Globe." But all that was cast aside. These gentlemen did not dare do that at all. They were very brave to begin with, but at the first shot they ran away; and in place of defending the liberties of the people of this country, which it was their duty to do, which it is the first duty of any government to do, they betrayed the liberties of the people and capitulated to the very power which they had said they were prepared to defy and whose tyranny they had taken up arms to resist. For twice three hundred years, the British people have been fighting against the interference of that power in their secular affairs. For hundreds of years governments one after another, in the mother country, have held, as a sacred trust, the duty to protect the people of those islands from ecclesiastical domination of this kind. These hon. gentlemen opposite had that trust placed in their hands, and how have they administered it? We have learnt from the Liberal party of Canada, as was so well said by my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Maclean) the other day, that the safeguards of civil and religious liberty are not to be found in the hearts of the people of this country and in the world-famous constitution under which we live, but are centred in the Vatican at Rome. And, Sir, they were not satisfied merely with invoking the aid of the Pope in the manner to which I have referred, but they get that potentate to send here a counsellor in whom he reposes trust to assist the Government of Canada to manage the political affairs of this country. And this gentleman told us in London (and stated after he came to this side of the Atlantic that he had been correctly reported), that it was not a proper thing—I do not remember the exact words—

Mr. DAVIN. Not a respectful thing.

Mr. McNEILL. Exactly—not respectful to the Pope that the free legislature of the province of Manitoba should have dealt with the school question in view of the fact that he, the Papal ablegate, was on his way to Canada. And yet hon. gentlemen would have us believe that it was a purely spiritual matter upon which they addressed themselves to His Holiness. It will be for the people to decide that question. I venture to think that when this matter has been fully considered by the people of this country they will accord to the course that has been pursued by the Liberal party in reference to it their indignant and absolute condemnation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I had no intention of addressing the House in this debate, but it has been lengthened much more than was anticipated when the Speech from the Throne was delivered. I must say that, after listening to the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite since this debate began, and considering the manner in which they are disposed to handle this mission to Rome, I cannot but express my astonishment at their course. The attempt is made to challenge the course pursued by the Liberals in the province of Quebec. I would like to know if any man in this House is so intolerant as to deny the right of any man, no matter to what denomination he belongs, to appeal for relief from what he believes unjust treatment, to the head of his church. Everybody recognized the Pope as the head of the Catholic Church, and I thought that the right of Catholics to appeal for the redress of their grievances as Catholics to the head of their church was recognized and would not be questioned. I would like to know why it is that hon. gentlemen opposite seek to make a mountain of this mole-hill. They seek to make it appear that the civil rights of the people of this country have been assailed, and that, because the head of the Catholic Church has condescended in response to an appeal of some forty-five of the church's adherents in the province of Quebec, to send out an ablegate to investigate the difficulty that has arisen, and, if possible, to settle it, the rights of all the people are in danger. This difficulty is not one between Protestants and Catholics, it is not one between Liberals and Conservatives, but it is a difficulty between the heads of the church in Quebec and their own people. Now, it is said that the political rights and privileges of the Canadian people have been interfered with. I venture to say that that is not the case, for the simple reason that, notwithstanding the appeal, the wild and unjustifiable appeal, that was made to the adherents of the church in the province of Quebec, Mr. Laurier brought to this House a very substantial following. The appeal to prejudice was not successful, and it is not because they were defeated at the polls that they laid their grievances before the Holy Father. The reason they appealed to Rome was simply that they were threatened with the withdrawal of certain rights and privileges which they enjoy as members of that church. They claimed to be entitled to the full and unrestricted enjoyment of their privileges as electors of Canada, without being subjected to disabilities in the church to which they belong; and in order to settle that question, they have asked the head of the church to send out an ablegate to hear both sides and ascertain whether the appeal of the Liberals is one that would justify him in directing that the bishops should not maintain their stand on behalf of the Conservative party in Quebec, or deny the members of any other party any other rights as members of the church. I was amazed to hear the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) state that if the rights or privileges of any individual in Canada were threatened, this House was the place to secure those rights. But these people complain that they have been denied or threatened with the denial of their rights as members of the church, such as confession, burial in sacred ground, the baptism of their children, and so on, because they had voted in favour of the candidates of Mr. Laurier. I would like to know of the hon. member for West York if he will undertake to handle a Bill in this House to right that injustice. I fancy I see him introducing a Bill to secure to the Catholics of the province of Quebec their church rights, a Bill declaring that, notwithstanding that any man during his lifetime shall have voted for a candidate of the Liberal party it shall be not competent for any priest or bishop to refuse his remains burial in consecrated ground, to refuse to baptize his children, or to hear him in confession. I would like to see the hon. member press upon the House the consideration of such a Bill. They want to exercise their privileges as they please, without being threatened by the religious authorities of their church ; and the hon. gentleman says here is the place to adjust that, this House is the place where questions of that kind should be settled, and a Bill should be introduced here to secure to these people the rights they are entitled to

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to say what my Bill would be ? It would just have one clause, making it a criminal act for any person in Canada to intimidate or threaten any elector in any way for voting as his conscience might dictate.

Mr. McMULLEN. My hon. friend is evidently not posted, because that is the law now.

Mr. WALLACE. Then why not enforce it ?

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to see my hon. friend enforce it so as to compel any priest or bishop to admit any of their adherents to confession. I would like him to enforce it so as to secure the baptism of their children. Will he do that ? I would like him to enforce it so as to secure them burial in consecrated ground. Will he do that ?

Mr. WALLACE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then, Sir, he will accomplish more than any other man I ever heard of.

Mr. WALLACE. That was decided in the Guibord case. The courts decided that they are entitled to be buried in consecrated ground.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman does not want it enforced. But I will tell you what is the matter. The hon. gentleman knows that a very important day, upon which he will hold a very distinguished position, is not far off. Undoubtedly he will be called upon to make an eloquent oration, and he is loading up. He has got his text now, and his friends around him have got their text, and when the day comes they will be ready with their speeches. Sir I was amazed to find the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) following in the same line ; but when I came to consider that the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) and the hon. member for West Toronto are rivals for the same position, a very distinguished position I admit, I could understand what it meant. The hon. member for West York went as far as he thought was necessary in order to outline his pronounced opposition to any interference on the part of the Pope or any other person representing the Pope ; and the hon. member for West Toronto went a little further. Now, if the hon. member for West York don't look out, he may lose the distinguished position he occupies, and the hon. member for West Toronto may drop into his shoes. There is a rivalry between these two gentleman for that office, and if the member for West York don't look sharp he may possibly find himself outgeneralled. Now, Sir, I must confess that I have been ashamed at the utterances of some hon. gentlemen opposite in trying to make capital out of this question. But it is along the line of the whole course they have followed in years gone by. A few evenings ago we were reminded of the time when Sir John Macdonald sent for Bishop Taché to go up to the North-west to settle the Riel question, giving him a full commission, sending a despatch to Rome to bring him over. Hurry home, we want your assistance, we cannot settle this difficulty without you. And he was brought here, notwithstanding the fact that the Conservative Government was supported by such distinguished individuals as the hon. member for West York. Did my hon. friend from West Toronto, who conducts the "Orange Sentinel," condemn in unmeasured terms the action of Sir John A. Macdonald at that time ? No, Sir, no fault was found, there was no need of it, and why ? Simply because it was done in the interests of the Conservative party, that is all. It filled the breach, it accomplished the object they had in bringing him over. It seems there are two or three parties on the other side of this House. The fact is that although we have been in session for over a week, we have not yet found out how many parties there are in the House, we do not know but that there may be a fourth. That was the reason the late Minister of Inland Revenue has been mute all the time. On the one hand he has heard the hon. member for West York denouncing in unmeasured terms the church to which he belongs ; and on the other hand there is sitting beside him an hon. gentleman who declares that he was ready to die in the interest of that particular denomination, and of their schools in the North-west. While he has listened to these opposing sentiments in different sections of the Chamber, he has never said a word himself on this question. No doubt he feels exceedingly awkward at being a member of the party to which he belongs. You are a wonderful party, I admit. Although we have been here for eight days, and have heard hon. gentlemen opposite speaking first from one standpoint and then from another, one getting up and denouncing the interference of the Pope, another getting up and denouncing the Government for delay in bringing down the tariff, and another getting up and denouncing the Government for some other reason. But after all, after the caucus they have held, there is not a single man of them with enough political stamina to get up and move a resolution so that we may have a decision upon this question. Now I want to give this House a little bit of information, and I would commend it to the study of the hon. member for West York. I find it in the "Queen's Quarterly," a magazine published by Principal Grant, of Kingston, the Principal of Queen's College. He deals with this very question regarding the right of any church to consult its head in settling any question of an ecclesiastical nature that may arise from time to time, upon which the church has a perfect right to speak. Let me read the article :

The by-elections prove that the country is determined to give Mr. Laurier's Government a fair trial, and the arrival of a delegate from Rome proves that the Pope is inclined to believe that the bishops' representations on the Manitoba schools dispute were not "the whole truth" on the matter. Every church contains reactionary as well as liberal elements, and when one tries to crush the other, there must be protests, and these may end in schism, unless there is a calm, wise and independent supreme authority. The Anglican Church would have been split into three sections in our own day, had it not been for the Royal Supremacy. Let it not be forgotten that Protestant churches in Australia and Canada have found it convenient to appeal to their mother churches for decisions regarding local policy. When the union question in Australia threatened to divide the Free Church there, deputies presented the case to the General Assembly of the Free Church of Scotland, and its decision was accepted in the colony. So, prior to 1875, the Old Kirk in Canada asked for a decision from the Church of Scotland regarding its union policy. If independent churches, or portions of them, found it advisable to do this, how much more imperative is it for the members of a church which glories in being one body all the world over, to take a similar course! The dispute is one with which Protestants have nothing to do, unless the decision should raise the question of who is to rule Canada. It is unlikely that the astute head of the Roman Catholic Church will do anything to force such an issue.

Now, Sir, that is from the pen of one of the most eminent Protestant divines in this country, a man who is acknowledged to be one of the ablest men presiding over educational institutions in Canada, Principal Grant, of Queen's College. Yet, contrary to these sound opinions, hon. gentlemen opposite try to raise religious strife and difficulty, try to make it appear that the Liberal party, through its representatives from the province of Quebec, are in league with the Pope of Rome, if possible to utilize existing circumstances for the benefit of their party. There is nothing of the kind. No person can take up that petition and read it carefully with an unbiassed mind and come to such a conclusion. He may extract clauses that may be construed under the narrow-minded criticism of members like the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) or North Bruce (Mr. McNeill), but such action is like many other things I have heard of before. I heard of a man who undertook to prove out of the Bible that there was no God. He took a sentence and read that portion which said "there is no God"; but he eliminated or held back the portion which said, "The fool has said in his heart." So the hon. gentleman and his supporters can, by extracting a clause here and there and piecing together certain sentences, make it appear that the Pope was asked to interfere in behalf of the Reform party, and to interfere in matters of state in this Dominion. The hon. gentleman gave as one reason why he objected to interference by the Pope that he was a foreign potentate, that he was head of a church which had not its centre in British territory, that he was not a British subject. I should like to know if there are no other denominations the heads of which are not resident in British territory. What does the hon. gentleman say in regard to the Latter Day Saints, who have not their headquarters in Canada, but in Utah? Would he challenge the right of members of that body to take instructions from their heads in the United States. Then we have Jews, who have the rights of citizens as well as Christians. I should like to know whether the hon. gentleman would challenge the right of Jews to take their spiritual instruction from the head of their church, who, no doubt, is in Turkish territory, who, at all events, is not within British or Canadian territory. Then there is the Reformed Episcopal Church, which had its chief seat in the United States for many years, and the hon. gentleman did not raise any objection to that church communicating with its headquarters across the line. For years delegates were sent from Canada to meet and confer and make rules and regulations regarding the rights, liberties and privileges of that particular church. No one ever thought of raising any objection to such course being followed. Then we had the Reformed Methodist Church. For years the head of the church was in the United States. Delegates were sent there from Canada to attend conferences and make regulations and orders for the general guidance of the denomination in Canada. Was any objection raised? None whatever, because they had not a Pope, and there was no interference in politics. Then we have Greeks here. If they became numerous, perhaps it might be necessary, in order to settle disputes, that the people should appeal to the head of their church, who is the Czar of Russia. Hon. gentlemen would be surprised perhaps if the Czar was permitted, as head of the Greek Church, to lay down rules and regulations for the denomination here, of which he is the head. The only reason why a racket was kicked up over this matter was because hon. gentlemen opposite have lost the support of French Catholics in the province of Quebec. So long as those people could be kept in line, and they steadily supported the Conservative party, there was no cause for complaint. If the Pope had sent over instructions as to how the ballots were to be marked, the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), so long as the instructions were in the interest of the Conservative party, never would have raised his voice in opposition to the proceeding; he would have allowed him to proceed, because it would have been in the interest of the party to which he belongs. But hon. gentlemen have lost that influence and that vote has left their ranks, and the French Catholics are casting in their lot, for better or for worse—I think it will be for the better, and I am sure it will be for the better in the end—with the leader of the Reform party, who is now Prime Minister, and they will give him a fair and reasonable opportunity of demonstrating his ability to conduct public affairs. That is what they are pleading for, and they have asked that a representative of the church to which they belong come here and see to it that they are guaranteed their civil rights, and also that the rights to the sacraments of their church should not be withdrawn. These are the reasons, and they are good and justifiable reasons, why the petition referred to was presented. It is stated that the Government and the Reform party are responsible for the presentation of that petition. So far as I am concerned, I knew nothing about it; but I do not for one moment condemn those who have taken such action in their own interest and in the interest of their own religion, as well as of civil liberty. Were I a Protestant placed in a similar position, if the ministers of the denomination to which I belong, which might have its head in some other country, attempted to force me, by refusing the rights of the denomination to me and my family, to vote against a certain party, I would appeal to the highest power on earth to secure to myself and family the privileges, rights and liberties which I believe every Canadian is entitled to enjoy. The hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) stated that if the appeal made to Rome was to secure the French Catholics in their spiritual liberty he would have no objection to it; but the hon. gentleman failed to show there was any other intention, nor can any hon. gentleman who reads the petition through show there is anything else asked or intended to be secured on the part of the petitioners. A certain paragraph may be construed by hon. gentlemen opposite to suit themselves, but they will utterly fail in their attempt to misrepresent the meaning of the document. I am glad that the Manitoba school question is settled, and I believe that eventually the minority will admit that the settlement is advantageous and desirable. I believe that Mr. Laurier secured for his co-religionists in Manitoba all the concessions that he could secure. I believe that he was perfectly right in doing that, and I am glad also that separate schools, as a general thing, do not prevail in Manitoba. We had a report before this House a few years ago, that there were 173 schools in Manitoba with an average attendance of only seven pupils each, and to divide a small population like that into two camps for educational purposes would either make the education of the rising generation exceedingly deficient, or else it would make it very expensive. We know that this difficulty with regard to separate schools existed in regard to Nova Scotia, and that a bitter feeling prevailed there, but we know that Mr. Kenny who was a Roman Catholic representative from that province, stated in this House, that after the experience of the Catholic minority of the manner in which the common school law had been administered in Nova Scotia, the Roman Catholics in the province, if they were offered separate schools now, would not accept them. I do believe that it is the intention of Mr. Greenway and his government to administer the Manitoba school law in a liberal and generous spirit. It is the desire of every Reformer that he should do that, for there is no Reformer in the Dominion who wishes to trample upon the conscientious rights of Catholics. We want to treat our fellow-men with the greatest amount of Christian kindness and liberality, and no man outside of the class to which the member for West York (Mr. Wallace) belongs would like to see them deprived of their rights and privileges. After that school law has been in operation in Manitoba for a few years, and when its machinery is running smoothly, I do believe that even the member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) will come to this House, and, like our old friend Mr. Kenny from Nova Scotia, he will confess that there is peace and harmony in the province, that the Manitoba Government have administered the law with liberality and tolerance, and that he was more satisfied with the existing condition of things than if there was an agitation for separate schools. I trust that the administration of the law by Mr. Greenway and his colleagues will merit that commendation from the hon. member for Provencher, and in view of the pledge given by Mr. Greenway, I believe it is his intention to carry out the law in a broad spirit.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in regard to the tariff. We are threatened that the business of Parliament is to be stopped until the tariff resolutions are brought down, and the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has put several questions on the subject. It is very extraordinary how the conduct of hon. gentlemen in Opposition differs from their conduct when they sat on the Treasury benches. I have in my hand the dates on which the Budget speech was delivered to the House every year since confederation, and I challenge the ex-Finance Minister to state when he ever delivered a Budget speech within one month of the opening of Parliament. In 1878, notwithstanding the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite had declared that the country was languishing, and that it was in a perishing condition, until they announced their tariff under the National Policy, Parliament was in session for one month and three days before the tariff resolutions were brought down. Only once since confederation was the Budget speech delivered within less than a month of the meeting of the House. We have been in session only one week to-day, and the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has twice complained about the delay in submitting the tariff policy. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) must learn to possess his soul in patience. He must give to the man who now occupies the distinguished position he once held, at least reasonable time to lay the tariff resolutions before the House. He can rest assured that there will be no such delay as he was guilty of. He will have the Budget speech within a month and even if it took longer, the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) will readily be excused if he brings it down in a perfect form and has not so many clerical errors in it as had the late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster). We hope that on the present occasion there will not be a clerical error in every item, as there used to be under the old regime. We are earnestly anxious that the business of the House should be proceeded with so as to enable the hon. the leader of the Government to attend the Queen's Jubilee in England. The leader of the Opposition has intimated an earnest desire that our Premier should go to London, and we trust that hon. gentlemen opposite will act in consonance with that desire by hastening the business of the House and refraining from useless and unnecessary discussion. I say this now because I hope that when this discussion is ended we shall get down to business and push forward the work of the session. I am quite satisfied that the Government are anxious for that, and I hope hon. gentlemen opposite are also anxious for it. The ex-Minister of Finance has promised his cordial assistance, and we expect him to implement that promise, and help us to get through with the business of Parliament, so that the distinguished leader of the Government may be able to go to England and take the prominent part which it is intended he should take in connection with the celebration of Her Majesty's Jubilee in London.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak further on this question. I simply thought it well to make these few remarks, and I hope that we have now heard about the end of this miserable, petty challenge of the interference of the Pope, and that hon. gentlemen opposite will find something better to engage their attention. The fact that they are driven to the desperate resort of challenging the action of those gentlemen who sent that petition to Rome on behalf of their just rights and privileges as a Christian people, and the action of the Pope in sending a man out here to inquire into the matter and report, shows very clearly that the Address contains nothing that they can reasonably challenge.

Mr. McMULLEN.

After Recess.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I have had the honour, Mr. Speaker, of a seat in the Canadian Parliament since the day the doors of that Parliament were first opened. I have seldom troubled the House with lengthy speeches, because I was, perhaps, not competent to interest the House with a lengthy speech. At the same time I claim that I have studied the convenience of the House in not inflicting myself more frequently upon it, and, therefore, I feel that I may rise now and ask the attention of hon. gentlemen for a short time while I say what little I have to say on the subject now before us.

Having sat in this House so long, I am proud to be able to say to-night that my opinion of the happy temper of the Parliament of Canada has not deteriorated. Even looking at the debate that has taken place, irregular in many ways as it is, I am happy to say that nothing has transpired to change my view on that point, and that, while subjects are discussed and references made here which might call forth very strong and very unpleasant expressions outside, no part of this debate has been offensive to any person within or without this House.

I find a difficulty in mapping out for myself the line that I should take in this discussion. But I will try to give expression to my views as they occur to me, and, beginning at the beginning, I may refer, at the first opportunity which I have of doing so, to the fact that I find myself on this side of the House instead of on the other side. On the 23rd of June last the elections went decidedly against the party to which I have so long belonged. The Government of which I was a member was defeated in a very pronounced way. The policy of that Government was sustained as clearly and definitely as it ever was in any previous election. Two principal features of the policy of the Conservative Government in the elections in June last were: first, the general trade policy, the policy of protection to the manufacturing industries of this country; and, secondly, the observance of the constitution of this country so far as it affected the rights of the minority in Manitoba. Now, I might have some difficulty in proving that our policy on the subject of protection was endorsed by the people of this country; but I think it is not beyond even my powers to establish that fact. That policy was clearly defined and laid down and voted upon in election after election during the previous seventeen years; it is confirmed by the commission appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite, which has gone over the country to inquire into the subject; and, so far as I have been able to draw any conclusions from the evidence given before that commission, I take it for granted that the policy of protection is the policy which the Canadian people still want.

Now, with regard to the Manitoba school question, I take the ground that our policy on that question was amply sustained by the electors of this country, and I undertake to prove that assertion, in this way. Take the different provinces; take Manitoba itself, go down through Ontario and Quebec—and “en passant” in Quebec, if you take the fact that every gentleman who was elected to support the hon. leader of the Government was pledged to at least do as much for the minority of Manitoba as we were, and pledged, as a rule, to remedial legislation, if local legislation could not remedy the evil—and you will find that the verdict of the people, on this matter, has been in favour of that policy of which we were, at that time, the honest exponents.

Now, it may be said that the Liberal leader obtained the support of the people on the trade question as well as on the school question. I am not going into that inquiry. He got their support, and, having obtained that support to carry out a protective policy, I am bound in honour to give him all the support I can, in order to carry out that policy. I do not know what the tariff may be. In my own opinion, looking forward, I would be surprised if it did not turn out to be strongly protective, and, so far as I am concerned, in that respect it would be quite acceptable to me.

With regard to the Manitoba school question, I must say at once that I had hoped that the policy of the Government would have been more in accord with what I consider has been the verdict in favour of the policy we adopted, and that a reasonable settlement would have grown out of it. That brings me to the paragraph in the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, in which we are asked to say that we are pleased to learn that after negotiations, a satisfactory settlement has been made. Standing in my place here, entertaining the views I have always entertained, with the record I have made for myself, for consistency at least, in a humble sphere, I could not subscribe to the statement that that was a satisfactory settlement, nor can I subscribe to the assertion that the Manitoba school question is buried. Not at all. There is no funeral, and if it would delight hon. gentlemen to attend the funeral of that question, it will have to be a mock funeral, for there will be no corpse. That funeral cannot take place yet. That question is not settled. There has been no reference in the settlement that I can see to the grievances declared to exist by the Privy Council. There has been no reference in it to the reasonable demands of the minority, and therefore it is a very great mistake for hon. gentlemen on either side to say that this question is dead and buried. You might as well say that the constitution of the country is dead and buried. That question to-day, instead of being dead and buried, is in its full force and vigour. That question to-day is as much alive as the British North America Act itself. That question to-day, so far as the rights of the people are affected, is just as much alive as the constitution itself, and it will last as long if not reasonably disposed of. There is but one way to bury it, so long as the minority are not restored their rights, and that is by burying the guarantees given by the constitution to minorities. There is but one way to bury the guarantees given to minorities, and that is to erase them from the constitutional Act. How can that be done? By the vote of this Parliament? No, thank God. You cannot do it by the vote of this Parliament. It can only be done by the powers that passed that Act. If any portion of the people have reason to think to-day that the fathers of confederation made a mistake when they gave these guarantees in good faith, when they pledged the honour of the country to the minorities in this country—at the demand of the Protestant majority, happily, for the Catholic minority—if they wish to say to-day that the constitution is wrong in that respect, does that give them any right to ignore the constitution? No, it does not; the constitution must be obeyed and ought to be respected while it lasts. If there is any part of the constitution that is inimical to the interests of Canada, then ask for the amendment of the constitution; and if there be good reasons for having it amended, the Imperial Parliament, no doubt, will make the amendment. Otherwise, I am sure it will not. I speak plainly on this subject because I want it clearly understood, from my point of view. There may be a number of gentlemen who differ very widely from me, but if I understand the constitution under which we live, when that little minority was deprived of its rights, when faith was broken with it, when it appealed to Parliament and its attention was called to the constitutional means by which redress should be sought, when it followed, step by step, those constitutional methods which were pointed out, when it went to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to obtain judgment, when that judgment declared that its case came within the operation of the Act of Confederation and pointed out what its grievances were and declared that an appeal lay to the Governor General in Council for a remedy, when that appeal was made, and the remedial order passed, and when that remedial order was not obeyed, then the doors of this Parliament were unlocked to that minority. Then they came to this Parliament, and the Remedial Bill was introduced by a Conservative Government and carried to a second reading successfully by a Conservative Government, with a majority of Conservatives supporting it, which majority was increased by the support of other members of the House, thus affirming the principle of the Bill. From that date, within the limits of that judgment and within the limits of the Remedial Order, this Parliament was seized with the legislation on that subject and no power can take it out of this Parliament. I am not going to say that this Parliament can be forced to exercise that power now. The majority of this Parliament may say it is not wise to exercise that power, as a majority may say that the minority must submit to the settlement and must not ask us to exercise that power here at all, the majority of Parliament can do as they please; but the power and, to my mind, the obligation to legislate is here, and the question is not by any means settled. The question is not by any means settled. But I am not going to argue that point. I have heard different speakers who have preceded me say that the question has not been settled and that what has been granted is an instalment. I do not like the line of argument taken by some of those who have spoken on that subject. Because, I want it clearly understood that on that question I am not speaking for party purposes or as an old Conservative, but that I am speaking as a friend of the constitution. I happen to be a Roman Catholic, an adherent of the same faith as the minority in Manitoba. But I tell you solemnly, Mr. Speaker, standing in my place as a member of this House, that were I a Protestant I would take exactly the same ground. I speak as I feel about it and I speak candidly and honestly, I do not attack the Government or any member of the Government for any expression they may have used in or out of Parliament to show the settlement is not final. I do not find fault with that. I find fault with the settlement because I have reason to know it is not satisfactory to the minority. You may talk about carrying by-elections, but outside of the one principally affected, that does not alter my opinion at all. You may tell me that the French representatives in the province of Quebec, who are as much interested in the question, so far as sympathy is concerned, as I am, are satisfied. That does not affect my position. Well, yes, it does affect because it weakens my position; but it does not change my opinion, nor does it weaken the sense of obligation I feel resting upon me as a man elected to this Parliament and sworn to carry out loyally and truly the constitution of this country. I do not think that that comes well from any of our friends because it might indicate a desire to continue an agitation for the sake of the agitation. I want it to be understood that I am not a party to that. But I blame hon. gentlemen on that side of the House, and I stated clearly and distinctly, for having used double arguments for political purposes, to defeat the Government of the day. For the same reason I condemn that policy as unworthy of honest men, I will be no party to attacking the Liberal Government on the same unworthy grounds. I have never in any political fight I have ever fought, struck below the belt. I have never met an opponent whom I was ashamed to meet again. I have never taken any stock in those double-edged weapons; there is no honesty about them, there is no good to come to the country from their use. I recognize every man's right to his convictions, but I expect to fight fairly and to be fought fairly.

I may be a little irregular in the line of my remarks but I have already prepared the House for that. Let me for a moment touch upon the subject of the mission to Rome. I touch upon that reluctantly, for I feel that too much has been said about it already. In my experience, in discussing matters in Parliament, reference is frequently made and properly made to passing incidents of which we have notice from the public press of the country. But the House of Commons has never yet, to my knowledge, settled down to a prolonged debate upon a subject without some substantial information about it. If any hon. member will rise and tell me what the mission is or why the present ablegate has come to this country, I will be prepared to discuss it if necessary. But, not knowing that, and believing that none of my fellow-members know more than I do about it, I do not see that there is room for prolonged discussion. But, as the matter has been referred to, I desire to say a word about it. I listened to the document read by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) signed by forty-five members of the House of Commons, senators, and members of the Government. The right of the hon. Minister of Public Works who, I know, signed that document and of the other Catholics who signed it, to appeal their grievance to the highest authority of their church, I do not call in question. I do not think that it is the business of anybody to interfere with them in the exercise of this right. With the reason which impelled them to make the complaint I have nothing to do. They have made a complaint, the complaint has been heard, evidently, and an inquiry is to be made into it. But I do find fault that hon. members on both sides of the House, irrespective of party, are carrying on a discussion about the substance of that complaint. I do not think it proper or delicate for members, especially from the province of Quebec, pending the inquiry, and pending the result of the visit of the distinguished Papal representative, to carry on a discussion about it. Now, with regard to an ablegate coming from Rome to this country;—well, there is no wonder in that. It does not surprise the Catholic population of the country; it need not surprise our fellow-citizens of Protestant faith. They have sufficient knowledge of the organization of our church and its discipline to understand that that may be necessary and quite proper in the interest of the church itself. I am quite sure that any ablegate or delegate sent from Rome to Canada will acquit himself in such a manner as not to lower the dignity of the authority that sends him or his own. He comes to Canada as representatives of the Papal authority have gone to the United States and other countries and returned without setting the heather on fire. So that all this tempest in a tea-pot about the ablegate coming here and what he is doing here and what will be the result of his coming here, is mere speculation. And I do not like some of the references made on this subject. For instance, it is said that he is coming here to run this country. Well, that is too old, it is too ignorant a cry to be used in the Parliament of Canada. There is no danger of it, and when I say danger of it, I do not wish to be misunderstood. There could not possibly be any danger. He would be powerless, even if he were so lacking in common sense as to believe that he could revolutionize the constitution of this country, or interfere with the rights of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada. So I think a little too much attention has been paid to that; perhaps I may be reproached with having paid too much attention to it, but I have made my reference as brief as I could. I will simply add to what I have already said upon this school question, that I am precluded from adopting the grounds taken in the complaint made by certain gentlemen in Quebec against the hierarchy, for the reason that I do not want to commit the same error—an error against good taste—that has already been committed in the House. I will go no further than to say that if I wished to discuss that matter, I could make a very strong case. I could quote several gentlemen to show that in appealing to Rome they took a very different course on a not very remote occasion. That does not affect the principle at issue at all. Now, the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) reproached me with being mute on this subject. Well, he and I differ. I have often been silent, I have never been as fond of speaking as my hon. friend. The hon. gentleman paid me a good deal of attention when I was on the other side of the House, though I am not going to make any complaint that he was unfair. But he was very attentive to me as well as to other Ministers with regard to their estimates, and with regard to the management of their departments; and I thought perhaps that he would have allowed the occasion to pass without making any reference to my being dumb. The fact is, we are a good deal in the same position. I can sympathize with him, and I expect him to sympathize with me. I am out, having been in; he is out, not having got in. Now, I want to put myself right, not only myself, but my party, and especially my party. I have been trained in the Conservative party. I was trained under the noblest leader that ever led the Government, and the hon. gentleman sitting opposite who occupies that proud position to-day, I am sure will not consider my remarks as any reflection upon him. I came to this Parliament, Sir, when it was first opened. I was not then allied with the Conservative party. I did not know anything about the Conservative party in Canadian politics. I came here against the combined influence of the Conservative party here and in my own province, and I was under no obligation to them. I allied myself with the Conservative party, not from any personal interests, but on broader grounds. I found at the head of the new Parliament and presiding over this new country, two great men, the late Sir John A. Macdonald, a Protestant, and Sir George Etienne Cartier, a distinguished Roman Catholic French Canadian. These two names will live in the history of Canada, and their memories will ever be cherished by the Canadian people. The policy of the Conservative party enunciated by these two men was a policy broad enough for every man in Canada to support, their platform was broad enough for every Canadian to stand upon. Toleration, peace and harmony, and equal rights for all classes—that was the platform of the Conservative party. It is the platform of the Conservative party to-day, I believe; if I did not, I would not be here. Now, some capital has been made against us on this side, and hon. gentlemen opposite have taunted us as being a party simply in search of votes, and without any sincerity. I resent that. When some gentleman on this side rises and says something differently from what I recognize to be the principles of the Conservative party, it is greeted on the other side with tremendous acclamation as a proof that we are a divided party. There has been no division that I know of in the Conservative party, except the division that occurred on the Manitoba school question. That division was pressed; a certain number of Conservatives could not see their way to support the policy of the Government on that question. I have no means of punishing them; I have no desire to punish them; they were free men to do as they pleased. They attacked the Government, most of them, some of them at all events, on very strong grounds, and pressed the Government as hardly as they could to a defeat—not all perhaps, but at all events on that question many of them certainly preferred to see the Government go down rather than have their policy adopted. That was their business. They are not, however, exponents of what I understand to be the platform of the Conservative party or the policy for which we have fought, and for which I hope to continue to fight. Hon. gentlemen opposite must remember to be careful about applauding them; those hon. gentlemen would not applaud me to-night. They applauded hon.

gentlemen opposite. They were allies of hon. gentlemen opposite during the Manitoba school discussion. An hon. gentleman to-day has boasted that that little band defeated the Remedial Bill. That little band could not have defeated that Bill.

Mr. WALLACE. They could try.

Mr. COSTIGAN. They could try, and I know what they could do. It was because they received efficient help that the Bill could not be carried. I, therefore, say that so far as the Conservative party is concerned, it remains just as it was before. If the Conservative party to-day should say that the constitution of this country must be a dead letter, then I am not a Conservative.

I do not want to go over the whole history of the debate on the school question; I will not be trapped into a discussion of the merits of separate schools, further than to say this, that I have always believed in separate schools, I have always believed in religious teaching in our own schools—I have no right to make a choice for other people's schools. But I lay down as a broad proposition that if you were to poll the votes of the Protestant people of Canada to-day, leaving the Catholics at home, leaving out the question of separate schools that has created a prejudice in many minds, leaving the Pope out of the question, and if you were to ask the Protestant people: Do you want schools in which religious instruction will be given or not.—I honestly believe that four-fifths of the Protestants of Canada would say: Give us religious instruction in our schools, mould the minds of the youth in that way, because from my experience I believe you would thereby bring up Protestant and Catholic children as young Christians; give them religious training when they are young and you will make better Protestant and Catholic citizens than if you send them to godless schools. That doctrine is sound, and it is acceptable to Catholics and Protestants in this country. But a cry is raised against separate schools. Mr. Speaker, that cry has no foundation from beginning to end. An hon. gentleman speaking the other night said that if it were something new to ask Parliament to force separate schools on Manitoba—and I believe this argument will have some influence on the sympathies of some Protestants—he would not support such a measure. I think that is a fair interpretation of his words. This Parliament could not be called on to interfere; it has nothing to do with deciding as to whether a province shall have separate schools or not. All we have to do is to see that the schools which were granted to Manitoba, as they were granted in Quebec to the Protestant minority and in Ontario to the Catholic minority, are maintained and respected according to the guarantee. We are not compelled to argue and prove our case that separate schools are better than common schools; we do not shrink from the argument if necessary, but it is not required. We remember the cry of coercion that went up to the effect that the Dominion was coercing the little province of Manitoba. Did it ever strike hon. gentlemen that the little province of Manitoba has been coercing the Dominion, has been violating the constitution and declaring to the people of Canada that the constitution so far as it regards that province, shall be a dead letter? That is exactly the position; constitution or no constitution, they say, you shall have no separate schools here. They will not say, of course, that we have broken that compact, that they have taken away the separate schools and will not restore them. No, they try to cloud the question, and make it appear that this country was coercing that little province and forcing on it a system of schools to please the Pope and the Roman Catholic hierarchy. When the people of this country understand the true issue, when they understand that the rights guaranteed by the constitution are being withheld, the Canadian people, irrespective of religion or nationality, will say: Keep faith with the compact, respect the constitution and carry it out. I shall be very glad to see the hon. member for Toronto West (Mr. Clarke) take that position. I know what his views are upon this question, but it would be a generous and noble position for the hon. gentleman to take. He does not believe in separate schools, but in a national school system. No one wishes to do violence to his belief, and if this was the first effort made to establish separate schools in Manitoba, I could understand the hon. gentleman saying, No. I do not believe in separate schools, and I consider that under the circumstances they will not work well. But what I would expect the hon. gentleman to say, under present conditions, would be: You have had separate schools established there; I would not have voted to give you separate schools, but I belong to the Protestant majority in this country which boasts of giving fair-play and of its willingness to give freedom to every human being, and we recognize the guarantee given in our name; we will vindicate our honour in Canada and uphold the rights that were guaranteed to you, which must not be sacrificed no matter whether I believe in separate schools or not. I do not expect to live many years to see a change that may take place similar to the change that has occurred during the past quarter of a century or even less; but if I were a young man like many I see on both sides of this House, young men beaming with intelligence, coming fresh from their constituents, some of them just entering the political arena to battle for their country and to contend for right against wrong, I should say that this settlement is an instalment and that justice will be done as surely as the sun will rise in the Heavens to-morrow. I believe that justice will be done. I have no more to say with respect to this question, except to answer an argument used by the Minister of Public Works which staggers some people who sympathize with the minority in Manitoba. The hon. gentleman took a number of schools in Ontario where Catholic children attend and said: There are so many Catholic children attending the public schools in Ontario, and they do not establish separate schools where they have the power to do so. Do hon. gentlemen not see that after all this is a farce. I do not dispute the accuracy of the hon. gentleman's figures, for I suppose he got them from a return. Let me present to the hon. gentleman my view. If he will look a little more carefully, he will find that in many districts in Ontario the population is divided and Catholics are so situated that they can have a school under the common school system and working under the common school law, but administered so that Catholic teaching can be given as it is in separate schools, and that while it is classified as a common school, yet on account of the distribution of the population there, so far as their religious training is concerned it is to all intents and purposes as good for them as if it were purely a Catholic school attended only by Catholic children. That is one of the conveniences that in Ontario arises out of the distribution of the population, and a broad and liberal administration of the Act. The position of education in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick has been quoted by the friends of this settlement. Those who opposed remedial legislation have quoted Mr. Kenny of Nova Scotia, and they cite the New Brunswick settlement, and they tell us to look at the harmony that exists in these provinces. Well, Sir, there is no parallel in these cases to the Manitoba case. Why is there harmony in New Brunswick? In New Brunswick the minority lost their separate schools just the same as they did in Manitoba, and under about the same circumstances. The Government there swept away the separate schools which the minority thought were guaranteed them by the constitution of the country. The New Brunswick minority appealed to this Parliament, they appealed to the Supreme Court and they finally appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the verdict there was, that according to law the minority had no case. As loyal citizens of Canada the minority in New Brunswick bowed to that decision. We thought it a severe decision, we thought it deprived us of rights that we believed were guaranteed as they were guaranteed to the older provinces, but nevertheless we bowed to the judgment. We are told now by gentlemen opposite that a happy condition of things exist in that province. Why? It is because in the administration of that law which swept away separate schools, compromises had been made in some of the cities and in most of the rural districts, by which the law is so broadly administered that separate schools are carried on in purely Catholic districts. But is that a constitutional right? We had in New Brunswick an agitation for three years and an attack upon the Government led by the present Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), because these concessions were given outside of the law. That shows you the position we are in. In Nova Scotia, to the credit of the province be it said, that while our constitutional guarantee was swept away, while we had not a vestige of protection under the constitution in Nova Scotia any more than in New Brunswick, yet the law has been administered by the Government of the day in such a way that harmony prevails upon that question, and the Catholics there accept the concessions made to them for the time being. If to-morrow the administration in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia on some wave of prejudice or religious excitement were to close up every Catholic school in these provinces, is there anything in the law there or in the constitution here to prevent them from doing so, or to afford the minority any relief? Not the slightest. Then I say that while we are thankful, and while we cannot help paying a tribute to these men for their liberal treatment of the minority in their provinces, yet we are dependent solely upon their good will for any concessions given. So will Manitoba be dependent. But is it the same case? Manitoba says no. The minority in Manitoba say: We felt afraid to go into confederation without this guarantee. We felt that the majority might swamp us and that we might lose these rights. They have been swamped, and they now say: Give us that which you promised us at the time of confederation; give us that which the highest tribunal in the land declares is ours. Sir, their demand is a reasonable one. I heard a distinguished barrister in the province of Quebec quoting the judgment reciting the grievances that are found to exist, state that it is not absolutely necessary for a restoration of these rights that the law which was repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted. That is true. It is quite clear that all the grievances could be removed if the existing law of 1890 were supplemented by such legislation as would restore these rights or remove the grievances. The judgment lays down what the grievances are, and in proceeding to show how the rights of the minority might be restored, it points out two ways. One is by re-enacting the old law itself if necessary, and the other by supplementing the Act of 1890 by such legislation as will meet the wants of the case. This does not require them absolutely to re-enact the old law, and on that point there is no argument in saying, that the Catholic children who are attending the public schools in any part of Canada is an evidence at all affecting this Manitoba case.

Of course, Sir, a great deal can always be said on the subject of clerical influence. Some people have a holy horror of the influence exercised in political matters by members of the clergy, especially clergymen of the church to which I belong. I have run a good many elections, and as a rule in my own constituency I have had a majority of the clergymen politically hostile to me. I have never made any complaint about that, and I do not complain now. I respect these gentlemen. I call on them when I visit my county, and I recognize their perfect right to oppose or support me just according as their conscience may lead them. With regard to the clergy outside of my own county, I have no hesitation in stating that the English-speaking Catholic clergymen of my own province are largely Liberal. Now, I do not see why there should be a great deal said about this matter by hon. gentlemen opposite. In the province of Quebec, I do not know what the grievances are, but I do know this: that in the election that took place on the 23rd of June last—I heard it remarked all over the country—the people were surprised, and said, "This is a snub to the clergy and hierarchy of Quebec; they have been routed; they have been defeated." I never gave the result of the election that interpretation. It appeared to me that so far as the hierarchy and clergy of Quebec were concerned, the electors adhered very strongly to the principles laid down by them prior to the election. They were neither Liberal nor Conservative; they were as neutral in their united action as it was possible for any set of gentlemen to be. Their mandement left every elector in the province of Quebec free to vote for any man he chose. On one question they asked him to see that the candidate he voted for would do justice to the minority of Manitoba. They did not say, vote for a Conservative candidate because he will do justice more surely than a Liberal candidate. I do not pretend to judge of particular grievances which hon. gentlemen opposite may happen to have in individual cases; but it will be hard to convince me that it would have been possible for him to have turned that province, which was generally and largely Conservative, into what it is to-day as the result of the election, a largely Liberal province. Therefore, I am bound to believe that that mandement did neither the hon. gentleman nor his supporters any harm politically, but left the latter as free as air to vote for the candidate they preferred, Liberal or Conservative, having the assurance from the candidates on both sides that the case of the minority of Manitoba would receive their full sympathy and support. I want to endorse the sentiments uttered by some hon. gentlemen here, Protestant gentlemen, who say that there is no reason in the world why any clergymen in this country should not exercise, not only his franchise, but his legitimate influence in any election, or with any elector in the country. I want to endorse that sentiment on this ground, that if there is anybody in this country unqualified to advise their fellow-citizens in such matters, it is not the clergymen of any church, who are a body of educated gentlemen. From their education and from the dignity of the position they hold, it would be monstrous to say that they have not the right to advise an elector how he should vote; it would be presuming too much. You pay a man five dollars, and hire a cart and horse for him to go out and canvass for you. It is the custom of the country, not confined to one political party. Every candidate seeks to influence this voter or that voter, and you find men going throughout the length and breadth of the land canvassing, all exercising some influence, whose standing, whose integrity, whose intelligence, and whose education fits them much less to exercise an influence upon their fellow-citizens than the clergymen of this country, irrespective of creed. Therefore, I say that that is a legitimate exercise of citizenship even for a clergyman. Now, we have often heard that it was only our priests who have done this. I have before me to-night the report of a delegation, composed entirely of clergymen, and clergymen belonging to one church, that called upon the government at Toronto, Rev. Dr. Carman was the gentleman who introduced the delegation and spoke for them. He spoke as strongly about his church as any mandement that I have ever read. What did he say:

Speaking of the confidence they felt that the government would bring down a measure that would reasonably meet the expectations of the temperance people, and especially of the body he represented, he said that, unless there was a genuine intention on the part of the government to protect the sobriety of the people in the country, the Methodist Church must hurl its phalanxes at the polls against the men in authority.

That is as strong language as can be found in any of the mandements that were issued. I do not wish to be understood as finding fault with that statement. I quote it simply to show that it is a legitimate exercise of a right claimed by all denominations in this country. Why, my revered friend beside me here (Mr. Wallace), who has a very large following, will tell you in this House or on the public platform that if this thing or that thing is done or is not done, according to what he thinks is constitutional and right and just, the whole people he represents will vote solidly one way. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement.

An hon. MEMBER. What is the statement?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman says I am perhaps going further than the fact. I am not going to discuss the point. That is my understanding of it. Now, on that question I have no more to add. I did not know that I would speak at all upon it. To my own mind it was not necessary that I should speak upon it. I required no speech to tell men who knew me where I stood upon the question; but my silence might have been misinterpreted if I had not spoken. I am prepared to vote for any amendment that may be moved to that particular paragraph referring to the school question, that would simply negative that statement congratulating His Excellency upon the settlement of this question. That amendment is not moved. No amendment is to be moved, as I understand. I do not think it very necessary that any should be moved, for the simple reason that the question is not affected at all by this settlement which is announced in the Speech from the Throne. The negotiations between the two governments have ended. If the Manitoba minority accept that settlement, I do not suppose anybody here will rise to exercise the power which I contend still rests here. If the Manitoba minority accept that as a final settlement, I am not going to make any noise or to say that I am more interested than the people who are principally affected.

Now, I cannot sit down without a short reference to the Queen's Jubilee, and it must be short, because I am sure I could not add to the very eloquent expressions that have been given from both sides of the House on that paragraph which refers to Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee. I will simply say this, that I join in and endorse to the fullest extent, all that has been said by the two leaders in this House and the gentlemen who followed and spoke so eloquently on this paragraph, and while I, in my humble way, look with pride, as a loyal subject of Her Majesty, to the great development that has taken place all over the world, and particularly in that part of the world, which is considerable, that is enclosed within the limits of Her Majesty's Empire, when I consider the expansion of that Empire and extent to which civilization has been promoted within her reign, what can I say but that it is the most wonderful Empire in the world, that it gives evidence of a wonderful amount of intelligence in the people specially of that little island, which, compared with the rest of the Empire, seems to be a speck in the ocean, and that no one can help admiring—one need not be a British subject to admire—the British constitution, the British Empire, and its history and its noble Queen. If we look too at all that had been done in her glorious reign, there is gratification for every subject. There is one little corner within the shadow of the Throne itself, that little green isle, and while I do not hesitate to raise my voice and join my fellow-Canadians in a just tribute of pride to that great and successful sovereign and the Empire over which she has presided so long and with such distinction, still when I think of that little island, I say that if, in that great monument that is to be raised at the celebration of this Jubilee, you could add but one tablet more, and say that freedom had been given that little island which had suffered so long, with what an outburst would voices be raised from thousands of corners all over God's earth to join you still more heartily, but if that little tablet be not there, let no man say that an Irishman will not join in his best wishes for the success of the Empire. And let me say this, that the monuments that will be raised, in every form, to the glory of that great Queen and that great Empire will attract the attention of the civilized world, and I pray that Her Majesty may yet be spared still longer than that sixtieth year, and that before she descends from the Throne, which she has graced so long and so well, she will have the pleasure—for to her I know it will be a pleasure—to sign a bill giving to Old Ireland home rule as we have it in this country.

Reference has been made to the tariff. I would not attack that until we get it down, and I do not know that I will then very strongly, but I join all those gentlemen who have preceded me in saying that I think it would be in the interests of the Government, as I believe it would be in the interests of the people, that no time should be lost in bringing it down.

With regard to the Franchise Act, let me say this. The announcement is not clear to my mind as to all that is intended. The paragraph reads: "That the franchises of the different provinces are to become the Dominion franchise." I can see some difficulty in that. First, as to the principle of this Parliament divesting itself of one of its most important rights, the right to frame and control its own franchise; but even if you adopt the provincial franchise, what franchise would be adopted? The provincial franchise of to-day, which would imply, of course, that any time any province amended its franchise, you would have to come back and amend yours, because I cannot believe it is the intention to adopt the provincial franchise, whatever it may be in the future. It is an objectionable enough proposition to adopt the franchise which we know exists in every province, but if you declare that whatever franchise any province may at any time adopt will be ours, there will be a considerable objection, because you would be committing this Parliament to something they know nothing about.

In conclusion I want to make a very short reference to a matter that may not be very interesting to the House, but inasmuch as some reference has been made to it in the press, it is just as well that I should state very clearly where I stand. During the last few years I have been placed in a great many different positions. I found myself appointed sometimes to a collectorship, sometimes to something else, recently I have been transplanted into the arena of politics, and so on. I told my provincial constituents when I went to them last, that it would be likely the last time I would appeal to them. I am getting pretty sick of politics. I do not want it to be implied that politics are getting too hot for me or anything like that. I still retain, thank God, the confidence and esteem of my constituency as firmly and as fully now as at any time through the long years I have represented it, and if I do not go back, it will not be because I have shown the white feather, because I do not think there is any gentleman in the county or out of the county who enjoys the confidence I have enjoyed so long and still enjoy in it. This, of course, indicates that I am getting tired of politics and that I do not intend to continue much longer in it. I am sorry to see the Superannuation Act changed, because I would claim the maximum allowance on retiring. I do not want it to be suggested, either, that, in retiring, I am looking for any position. I am on the wrong side of the House for that; gentlemen opposite are under no obligation to me. They would not offer me an office, nor would I think of asking for one. I am not inclined that way. My ambition is reasonably satisfied, and you will see how easily it is satisfied when I tell you that after thirty-six years I am, financially, just about where I started. So I do not owe much to politics, and politics do not owe anything to me, I suppose. During this Parliament I do not know whether I shall be considered an out and out party man, an out and out Conservative or not. I should be sorry that any wrong impression should exist among my old friends. When I look about and see yet a few of the old guard, a few of the men with whom I have fought for a long time, I should be sorry to think that, because I was getting old and because I see that the time is coming when I might retire from politics, I was getting careless. Not at all; I am just as good a Conservative as ever I was. I was always an honest one and a true one, and I am that yet. And a consistent one, and I am that yet. I will fight as a Conservative every day that there is a fair fight to be given. But I will fight with legitimate weapons or not at all. I am speaking now, perhaps for the last time on this subject—it is the last time I shall make any reference to it in Parliament at any rate—and I want to be fairly understood. I do not wish to be considered as offensive when I say that I am just as independent of one party as of the other. The Conservative party never constructed or built me up. I came here having carried my county. I became a Conservative and got my county to endorse the Conservative policy, largely, I think, myself; and I have contributed my humble share to the success of that party. In my own province I have done the little end of the work, perhaps, but that little was important and well done and honestly done. Now I am not going to take the same active part in politics as before. If any proposition ever comes before this House which I have advocated as part of the Conservative platform or policy, I will stand by it: I shall be bound to stand by it for my own self-respect. If I say that I am as independent of one side as of the other, the hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) will understand that I have no reason to be under obligation to those on his side, as they have fought me always. The hon. gentleman himself came down to my county and fought me pretty hard. I think he will say that I struck back as well as I could, speaking in French when necessary; and, though he is an orator and I speak broken French, I think he will say that I hit back as hard as I could, but never dishonestly. I will pay the hon. gentleman one compliment—I can afford to do so, seeing that I carried the county. I can tell him that he was mistaken in his man, that he was unfortunate in his selection of a candidate. If he had not taken hold of that candidate, that candidate probably would not have saved his deposit. The compliment I pay the hon. gentleman is to say that every vote over 150 or so, nominally, given to the candidate who opposed me—a renegade Conservative—was actually polled for the Prime Minister himself. Any man whom he endorsed would have got the same vote at that time. I have said—there is no necessity for saying it, but it is just as well to be plain about it, it is well that I should not be misunderstood—that I never looked to be shelved by my own friends, and I do not expect to be shelved by the hon. gentlemen whom I have opposed. I do not know of any vacancy I could apply for, and if there were a dozen I would not apply for a position. I am not of the retiring kind in that sense. I intend to finish up this Parliament, to do my duty as a Conservative, and when the Parliament is at a end, unless my people absolutely think my services are required, I do not intend to trouble Parliament any longer. I have always said that if my people wanted my services, while I was living or able to render them service, they could count upon me. This, perhaps, is a little irregular, but, for the reasons I have stated, and in view of the fact, that, in my long connection with this Parliament I have not taxed the patience of the House very frequently, even though I am doing so to-night, I trust I shall stand excused.

I presume that the Address will pass without a vote, but not without protest, particularly with regard to the point which I have raised, the paragraph with reference to the settlement of the school question. If that Address passes on a division I will be satisfied, having given or tried to give my views in the few remarks I have offered. I will say this before I sit down—that, notwithstanding all the attacks that were made upon the Conservatives that introduced this legislation upon that question and went to the country, there has been no evidence, there can be no evidence produced to show that they did not act strictly in accordance with the pledges made to this Parliament, and endeavour to carry them out to the best of their ability. They failed; some said they pursued a mistaken policy which has been denounced by a prominent member of this House on the ground that looking after minority rights is not a paying business. Well, from a material point of view that may be true, but I do not, of course, share that view. I do not think that a man who represents a constituency and has the honour of a seat in the House of Commons of Canada, should weigh exactly the paying side of a question of right in any stand he takes on a matter of principle. The position the Government took on that question of the Manitoba schools, I felt myself was the right one. Even though we saw defeat staring us in the face, still, believing that we were performing a duty, an obligation imposed upon us by the constitution, we would not have been worthy of our positions if we had not gone straight to defeat, and defended what we deemed to be right. I think yet the day will come when that policy will be vindicated; but to argue that any more would be to repeat what I have already said, and weary the House, which I have no desire to do. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank you, and through you the House, for listening to a very uninteresting address from me. I want the House to understand the difficulty in which I found myself when I began to address you; I want the House to understand that it was not so much as to what I would say, but I had to study very carefully what I should not say—not that I wanted to withhold any of my own views, but I wanted to make no unfair charge against any man on either side of the House. I did not wish to break, in this last Parliament which I may attend, the good feeling that has existed between myself and the gentlemen with whom I have worked so long. I wished to retain from the other side of the House that friendly courtesy that I have found in many quarters from gentlemen with whom I could not act, and in that way end a public life, a little stormy at times, in peace and quietness, so that I may take away with me the most pleasant recollections, and leave behind no very bitter ones against me.

Mr. BRITTON. Were it not that another hon. gentleman has copyrighted the phrase that he did not intend to address to the House any remarks on this occasion, I would like to use it myself, because, until a comparatively short time ago, I had no intention of troubling the House with any remarks upon the Address. However, having made up my mind to say a little, I shall endeavour to compass it within a very few minutes, and to give it, at all events, the one merit of brevity, if it has no other. Sir, there can be no doubt as to the loyalty and affection of the Canadian people, without distinction of race, or creed, or sect, or sex, towards Her Majesty the Queen. There is no doubt that the invitation of the home government to our Premier to take part in the Jubilee celebration, is one that, I am sure, we all appreciate, and I am only repeating what has been said by nearly every member who has spoken, in saying that much in reference to it. All would be glad to see the Premier go, and there present the homage and affection of a loyal and united Canadian people to Her Majesty on this Her Diamond Jubilee of a reign of sixty years. That, Sir, it seems to me, will be the very best homage that we can pay, and it will be the very best representation that the Canadian people can make on this momentous and important occasion. I see by the newspapers that there is some talk of sending a Canadian regiment, or a representation of our militia, or a part of either the permanent staff or of the volunteer staff, as guard of honour to the Premier. Well, if, on consideration, it is thought best that such a representation should accompany the Premier, I for one would not in any way oppose it. But I would suggest that before it is done the Government should think twice, and consider the proposition well. We must remember that in a display of that kind there will be representations of all the crack regiments in the British Empire, and perhaps detachments of foreign troops coming from old and warlike nations. While we may send men who are an honour to the service, who are honoured for the services that they have rendered, men who are bedecked with medals, and who wear worthily the gold lace, I am afraid that our own troops would be somewhat eclipsed in the great procession of that day. I fear that, worthy as our men are, and good as the representation would be, there might be some trouble in making a selection, and some heart-burnings might result, and the Government might meet with a little difficulty of that kind. On the whole, I think that the very best representation we can make, will be a representation on the part of our Premier of the feelings that the people of Canada, of all sorts and conditions, entertain for Her Majesty and the Empire, expressed, as it will be, so felicitously, by the Premier. Now, it seems to me that such an expression, based on the unanimous opinion of this country, will afford an excellent answer to such articles as we see from time to time in the American newspapers. Sometimes we see in the American press things that annoy and irritate us a good deal ; for instance, the following article I saw the other day in the New York "Sun" :

A certain series of recent events, the last being a strong British anti-American speech delivered in London by a Canadian statesman, Sir Charles Tupper, has called new attention to the British preparation as a basis for hostilities against the United States. A correspondent of the "Sun" who had enumerated the various features of this preparation, is thus controverted by a leading Tory organ of the Dominion, the Toronto "Globe" :

Perhaps it is hardly worth while quoting from a paper that knows so little about our Canadian press as to call the Toronto "Globe" a Tory organ, but such is the case in this quotation :

"Sir Charles Tupper's speech cannot be regarded as evidence of Canadian hostility, still less as evidence of British hostility to the United States. The re-arming of the militia is the only measure that can be connected with our relations with our neighbours, and it was certainly due largely to the Venezuelan trouble."

So, when the United States roused itself to protect a sister American republic against oppression and conquest by a grasping transatlantic power, the Canadian militia was armed anew for readiness against Venezuela's friend. Such a sentiment is unnatural to American soil. The idea of the people of Canada maintaining a political relation that could by any circumstances whatsoever, bring them, as the ally of a European power, into conflict with the American republic is the extremity of folly. The "loyalty" that can uphold such servitude to a foreign country is disloyal to the American land of Canada.

While the British flag and British destiny rule Canada, its people will remain in fact and in feeling a people without a country.

When we see such an article as that published we feel that we are citizens of no mean country, that we have in Canada a grand country—a country of great possibilities. But besides Canada and beyond it, we are part of the millions ruled over by our beloved Queen, that we have an interest in, and have our part and lot with the British Empire. That is why I am glad the Speech from the Throne, unanimously as that feeling has been expressed in this Parliament, embodied that sentiment.

As to the tariff, surely the tariff needs revision. If it needed revision in 1878 and 1894, much more does it need revision in 1897. No one can find fault with that part of the Address which refers to the revision of the tariff. I will, however, follow the course adopted by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Costigan), and will leave the discussion of that topic until the tariff is brought down, because from the beginning to the end we shall have an educational discussion going on in the House from both sides, so that every hon. member will have an opportunity of saying his say in regard to it.

The Franchise Act will be repealed. The Franchise Act will die an unlamented death, unless, perhaps, lamented by the revising officers and printers, to whom it has been a source of no little profit during the years it has remained on the Statute-book, but during the last campaign no one had a single word to say in its favour. Everywhere and whenever it was brought up in discussion on the hustings against the late Government, the supporters of the Government never pretended to justify the Act, but declared they would assist whatever Government came into power in repealing it ; and it was promised by the then Opposition that it would be repealed, and on the very first opportunity afforded to the Government to redeem their promise they stated it would be repealed. I, for one, can rather sympathize with what was said by the hon. member for Victoria, N.B. (Mr. Costigan), in regard to the difficulty of giving over our franchise to the provinces. There may be difficulty about that matter. One would like that hon. gentlemen were elected by a franchise applicable to every province, and one that would be entirely within the control of this Parliament. But any law cannot be worse in its working than the Franchise Act under which we have lived for the last ten or twelve years. an Act which allows to remain on the list names of men who have been dead for twenty years, as in some cases within my own knowledge, cannot be any benefit to any party, and the sooner it is repealed the better.

Then as to the other matters mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. It was said in the early part of this debate that the Liberals were never known to fulfil their promises. After the first sentence in the Address, which refers to the Diamond Jubilee, and which of course is a new matter, every sentence in the Speech refers to measures that the present Government when in Opposition had promised, and in bringing them down they are simply doing so in fulfilment of their promises, and as soon as possible the fulfilment will be made complete by the enactment of Parliament. One would be tempted, if time permitted, and if I had a more sympathetic audience than members of this House afford at the close of a debate of this kind, to say something in regard to each of these items as they appear in the Address ; but I shall confine in the main my other remarks to one question which has occupied so much of the time of this House during the last few days. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) only emphasized, as it seems to me, what has been apparent during the whole of this debate, and that is the difference prevailing in the opinions of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman stated that he considered he was a good Conservative, while those who have been acting with him in the past are not now Conservatives, and this difference has perceptibly widened since this debate commenced. The hon. gentleman made two points. He said that the principles of the late Government were fully confirmed by the results of the late elections; the National Policy was sustained; the views of the Government in regard to the Manitoba school question—although I must confess it is rather difficult to see how they were sustained by the result of the elections on 23rd June last—were sustained. If that be so, I can hardly see why the hon gentleman now takes such a gloomy view, because like a good Conservative, as he says he is, one who prefers principles to men, if the principles are sustained it makes no difference who the men are who are the embodiment of those principles. If his principles are established, why does he not cut loose from his old associates, and come over to this side of the House and make one more supporter of the Government, and we will try to make him as comfortable as possible for the rest of the Parliament. That should be the plain duty of an hon. gentleman feeling as he does in regard to this matter. He said the province of Manitoba has been coercing the Dominion instead of the Dominion coercing Manitoba; at all events, that is the way he looked at this question. I can hardly see how there can be any coercion by Manitoba if the province has been acting throughout in a constitutional manner. If I read the decision of the Privy Council aright, the Act which Manitoba passed in 1890 abolishing separate schools has been declared constitutional. If so, Manitoba has been acting in a constitutional manner, whether there has been coercion or not. The Act of 1890 was either constitutional or not. It was constitutional according to the decision of the Privy Council. But suppose there has been some mistake and that Act was not constitutional, then there was only one plain course for the hon. gentleman and the Ministry of which he was a member at that time to adopt, and that was to disallow the Act. As he did not disallow the Act then, he can hardly turn around now and say that the province of Manitoba, by acting in a constitutional manner has in any way coerced or attempted to coerce this Dominion. It was conceded by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan), that there is no obligation on the part of this Parliament to restore the schools as they existed before 1890, and Manitoba being master of the situation, did only what was perfectly right from the first to the last; taking the last as the concessions that were made on the representation of the present Dominion Government. I am not very familiar with the procedure of this House, but it seems to me that this question should be left by this Dominion Parliament just where it is left in the Speech from the Throne. The position of the leader of the Government, it appears to me, is logical and consistent. Accepting the judgment of the Privy Council, admitting that the minority had a grievance, that the minority had the right of appeal, that, in obedience to the judgment of the Privy Council, the Governor in Council required the provincial government to pass a remedial measure which the provincial government refused to do, and by reason of that appeal the Parliament of Canada was fully seized of the question and could, as a matter of jurisdiction, have passed a remedial law which the provincial government would have been bound to obey; admitting all that, and that is going the whole length the hon. gentleman (Mr. Costigan) went, then, according to his argument, and according to the argument of the majority of members in this House, it simply became a question of policy. I am perfectly free to say that the late Government did not wish to force a Remedial Bill on Manitoba. It was only what they believed either to be their duty, or the last resort open to them, that they pressed a remedial measure; but it was not their wish to pass it and that is evidenced by their negotiations and their attempt to achieve a settlement of this dispute between the province and the Dominion. And so they sent up their commissioners in an attempt to get a settlement. We all know what followed and the bitter discussion that there was in the last session of the old Parliament. The present leader of the Opposition tried to pass his remedial legislation, and he was fighting for the constitution, as he said. The old Government insisted upon Parliament passing a remedial measure, and they brought down a Remedial Bill which everybody must admit was a bad one. The present leader of the Government said that that Bill should not pass, and his closing words in moving the six months' hoist were:

This power of the Dominion Parliament should not be exercised until all the facts bearing on the case have been fully investigated, and all means of conciliation have been exhausted.

Parliament did not agree to the six months' hoist, but Parliament did not pass the Remedial Bill. Then there was an election and the results of the election sustained the position of the then leader of the Opposition, and on the memorable 23rd of June the electors declared that this power of the Dominion Parliament should not be exercised. They said, at least, that, and perhaps they said a great deal more in reference to this question. Then the Liberal Government came into power and then came the negotiations which the hon. the Premier set on foot for the settlement of this question, and the leader of the Opposition in his speech of the other day says—I quote his words from "Hansard":

Who authorized that settlement?

He further said, that this settlement was unconstitutional. He was very properly answered, that if it was unconstitutional, what was the object of the present leader of the Opposition and his then Government undertaking negotiations. Surely, if these negotiations had resulted in success, and if there had been any agreement come to between these commissioners and the representatives of the provincial government, the only way in which these negotiations could have been carried out would have been by an Act passed by the Manitoba legislature, and then the Remedial Bill would have been withdrawn. If that had been constitutional for the late Government to do, it was just as constitutional for this Government to do it, and so that argument falls to the ground. The question as it is, has been put by the hon. the Premier, and I do not remember that it has been quoted in the House. I shall read a few lines from it, because, as part of the discussion, it seems to me it ought to be put on record. What I shall read to the House is from a Memoir of the history of this case by the Prime Minister, published in the Montreal "Herald" on the 18th February last. The document is entitled "Memoir on the question of the Manitoba schools, with an explanation of the reasons which have led the Liberal party to adopt the policy of conciliation which has been finally accepted by the government of that province." The following is the quotation:—

In order to properly understand the conduct followed by the present Government in the settlement of this question, it is highly important to thoroughly understand all the constitutional points raised in this discussion. Manitoba is one of the seven provinces which constitute the Dominion of Canada. These provinces have exclusive jurisdiction over certain matters, among which is included that of education. This jurisdiction is subject to certain restrictions in the provinces (in those provinces only) where the right to separate schools existed before confederation.

The agitation caused by that question had lasted for more than six years, and a strong Protestant feeling had been aroused in all the provinces, except Quebec, against the extension of special favours to Catholics. Peace and harmony, which had reigned between Protestants and Catholics heretofore throughout Canada, were seriously affected to the detriment of the Catholics, who are in the minority in all the provinces except one.

The Conservative party had been in power during those six years, and the Government, instead of promptly putting an end to the agitation before popular prejudices had been aroused, allowed the matter to drag from 1890 until the present time. It then became evident that the province of Manitoba had determined to resist federal interference. The manifest interest of the minority from that moment was that the question should be settled on such a basis that the settlement should win the approval and good-will of the Protestant majority, not only in Manitoba, but also of the whole of Canada.

The importance of an amicable arrangement will be better appreciated after the following facts have been duly considered:—

The population of Manitoba, when the last census was taken, was 152,506, of which 20,571 were Roman Catholics, distributed in 59 different municipalities. The total number of Catholic schools in 1890 was only 97, and 28 of these schools were in the city of Winnipeg, at St. Boniface and St. Norbert. In all the other parts of the province there were but 69 schools.

The number of children attending the Catholic schools of the province was 3,316, but the average attendance was only 2,267. It is, therefore, apparent that one-half of the Catholic children of Manitoba were, through force of circumstances, obliged to attend the common schools, or else be deprived of the education given in those schools.

Considering all these circumstances, the Liberal party became convinced that the policy of coercion which had been adopted by the preceding Administration, was not a wise one, and destroyed the peace and harmony which had existed formerly between the different Christian denominations in all the parts of Canada, and, moreover, the Liberals were of opinion that if the population of Manitoba was approached in a spirit of conciliation, that population would grant the wishes of the Catholic minority and would make such concessions as to satisfy its just demand.

The Liberals, consequently, resolved to adopt a policy of conciliation as the basis of their programme when the time came to appeal to the people. And the electorate, by a significant majority, approved its attitude.

The new Liberal Administration, of which Mr. Laurier is the leader, which came into existence at the defeat of the Conservative party, is supported in the House of Commons by 45 Catholics, out of a total of 66 Catholics in the House. Immediately after the formation of the new Cabinet, negotiations were opened with the Government of Manitoba, and concessions were secured which it can be reasonably hoped will satisfy the minority and restore peace in that province.

That is the record, as far as I care to read it. The supplement of that is that the settlement, having been arrived at, has been ratified by the Act which the Manitoba legislature has passed, and that in the Speech closing the legislature, Lieut.-Gov. Patterson made this statement:

The amendments to the Public Schools Act, embodying the settlement arrived at between the Dominion and my advisers, adopted during the session, will, I am convinced, put at rest a prolonged and vexing controversy. It now remains for the law as amended to be so administered that the advantages of the provincial education system may be freely enjoyed by all classes of the community. I feel assured that this will be done, and that the most complete harmony will be re-established between all sections of our population.

That being the end of the matter, let us all hope for such fair-play from Manitoba as will win the confidence of the minority, and, from what the hon. gentleman said in reference to New Brunswick and in reference to the attendance of Roman Catholic children in the public schools of Ontario, we have every confidence that the law will be so administered as to win the confidence of the minority, and that we shall hear no complaint from this time forward in reference to this matter. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) said in his speech yesterday that if this settlement had been made by the Conservatives instead of by the Liberals, the leader of the Liberals would have carried his torch from one end of the Dominion to the other inciting sectarian strife. All I can say is that the Liberal leader is not the kind of a man nor are the Liberal members the people to carry lighted torches or to enkindle sectarian strife. It is well known that torches were once enkindled, and as a result the Parliament buildings in another city were destroyed; but the party that enkindled those torches was not the party from which these Liberals are descended. I am glad to say that no party at present would desire to do what members of that party did in 1849; but that, on the contrary, all are now more inclined towards a policy of conciliation and peace and good-will which ought to characterize all the members of a community. Nobody now wants to light any torch or carry it from one end of the Dominion to the other, and I hope that the hon. gentleman who spoke in that way will not attempt to light either torches or rushlights, or do anything that will hinder the peace and good-will which we seem to have entered upon. With regard to the mission to Rome which has been so often referred to, I agree entirely with the remarks made by the hon. member for Burrard (Mr. Maxwell). It seems to me that we have no business, in the main, with that matter; but I do ask, in all sincerity, to whom should Catholics appeal in matters relating to the conduct of their church authorities except to the highest authority in the church? This case is settled; but the ablegate is here, and he is a man of education, piety and tact. He is here to inquire into the differences between members of the great church he represents, and to right those differences if he can. He has a right, if he thinks proper, not to appeal to this Parliament, for this Parliament is not seized of the matter; but he has a right to go to the provincial government, and influence them in any way he can, by reason or argument, to grant greater concessions if he desires greater concessions, to the Roman Catholic minority in that province. If it would not weary the House, I would like to read again certain parts of the petition to the Pope, to emphasize the fact that this gentleman has been sent out only for the purpose of dealing with differences among members of the same church. In that respect he is only doing what is done every day in Protestant churches. There are, no doubt, a great many members of this House who are adherents of the Methodist Church; and I would like to know what would be said if any one of these gentlemen would say to the Rev. Dr. Sutherland what right have you to promise to hurl the phalanxes of the Methodist Church against the Ontario Government if they do not do what you ask them to do in the matter of temperance legislation? If some member of the Methodist Church were to bring him to book, by laying the matter before the Methodist conference, would anybody say that was unconstitutional or was bringing in some foreign power to whom allegiance was given, instead of to the governing power of the country? No; all would say that he had a perfect right to bring the matter before the church. The ablegate is brought here for a similar purpose, and there is no ground whatever for the statement that his presence here is the result of an appeal to Rome to grant civil rights to citizens of this country. I am sure that that argument will fail when the petition to the Pope is carefully read and the matter is considered in the light of common sense. I am glad the document has been brought into Parliament and has been read in this House. Why was it brought here? hon. gentlemen opposite ask. It ought to have been brought here. If it had not been brought here and read, many men throughout the country would have said that it was something different from what it now appears to be. Men cannot trust to their memory, they cannot trust to the repetition of a discussion that is only oral. But when we have the document itself, when we have the very words of that petition published in the records of Parliament, then it cannot be misconstrued, and the argument cannot be successfully made that the papal appeal is something else than what it really is. I hope that every member of this House will agree that, in this long debate on the Address, we have said all that need be said in this Parliament on the Manitoba school question. If that question is to be agitated any more, as was suggested by the hon. gentlemen who has just spoken, let it be agitated in another place and let us have done with it here. It is dead, so far as this Parliament is concerned, let us bury it, and let its epitaph be "requiescat in pace." I believe that is the sincere desire of the great majority of the members of this House and of the people of this country.

We have had in this discussion reference made to the Government work, and the question of the dismissal of Government employees has been made the most of. I venture to say, without fear of successful contradiction, from facts within my knowledge regarding Government employees in different parts of this Dominion, that the Government have acted with wonderful leniency. From the first to the last, they have acted as men who desire to be fair and to give to those against whom complaints were made the benefit of every doubt. The insinuation has been made, with regard to the change of solicitors in England, that there must be some motive beneath which does not appear on the surface, which prompted that change. I should like to know by what right it can be urged that any man who acts as a solicitor for this Dominion Government stands in any different position from the solicitor of any individual or corporation. If any private individual thinks proper to change his solicitor for one reason or another, for the purpose of giving a young man a chance, or for any other reason, what objection can there be to his doing so? and should not a like discretion be given to the Government? We know that when the late Government came into power, they changed every legal agent of the Government all over the Dominion. The legal gentlemen who acted for the Government in the matter of claims for compensation for lands damaged by the rising waters of the different canals and claims of other kinds, were changed all over the Dominion, and the men who acted for the Mackenzie Government from 1873 to 1878 have not been called upon to act in the same capacity since. I do not know what the policy of this Government may be, but I suppose that in Canada as in England they will naturally give their patronage, assuming the work can be done just as well, to those they favour rather than to those who have been the agents of the former Government, and I can see nothing wrong in that. A word or two with regard to what was said by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Quinn) whom I am sorry not to see in his place. For some reason or other he dragged into this discussion the commission that has been at work inquiring into penitentiary matters. Well, as to the personnel of that commission, the present Government appointed Mr. Meredith, who is a Conservative but who once had something to do with a penitentiary and would naturally be supposed to know something about the work; they also appointed another gentleman who has had a great deal of experience in prison matters and I suppose it was on that account he was appointed; they subsequently appointed another gentleman, who was of the same faith as the hon. member for Montreal Centre, and these three have been doing the work. The work is completed and we are only waiting for their report which I hope we will soon have. The impression has gone abroad—I do not know whether it is well founded, that a good many things in connection with the penitentiaries have taken place that ought not to have taken place and that some persons who are now, or who have been connected with penitentiary work will be found to have been guilty of very irregular practices. For the purpose apparently of discounting the effect of this report, when it appears, the hon. gentleman thought proper to say that these commissions were nothing more than Liberal emissaries and spies sent out by this Government, and he quotes instances of their conduct or conversation with people at Montreal. I venture to say that when the real facts are known it will be found that a good deal of what the hon. gentleman said was due to his lively imagination and the poetic license to which perhaps he is entitled rather than to the bald and naked facts which actually took place down there. No doubt the hon. gentleman, fearing that the report of this commission would affect some of the friends of the late Government, endeavoured, in advance to decry the character of these commissioners and their conduct and thus depreciate the value of their work.

I shall now close my remarks and am very sorry that in my attempt to be as brief as possible, I have presented my views in such a feeble manner. I am very much obliged to my hon. friends at this late hour for listening to me as patiently as they have done. I can hardly take my seat, however, without referring to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Costigan). I am sorry that he showed so much disappointment with political life, and I hope that the speech he made will not be his valedictory address. I hope that the plaintive tone in which he made his remarks is not indicative of his early departure from this House. He was listened to with that attention his remarks deserved, and I am sure we will all be glad to hear from him again, and all the more glad if, consistent to principles as he says he is, owing nothing to the Conservative party among whom he now sits but willing to support good measures from whatever side they may come, he will remain and support the good measures that will come from this side before this Parliament closes.

Motion (Mr. Russell) agreed to, on a division.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That the said Address be engrossed, and presented to his Excellency the Governor General by such members of the House as are of the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved :

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider the Ways and Means for raising the Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from two of the Judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a certificate relating to the election for the electoral district of Macdonald, by which the election was declared void.

Mr. SPEAKER also informed the House that in conformity with chapter 9, section 46, of the Revised Statutes, he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 5th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DRAINAGE ACROSS RAILWAY PROPERTY.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 14) respecting drainage on and across the property of railway companies. He said : Some of the older members will recollect that I have introduced a Bill under this same title during the two last sessions of Parliament, but this differs materially from the former Bill under the same name. My former Bill proposed to subject Dominion railways to the drainage laws of the different provinces as far as these apply to railway companies. The objection was made, and perhaps fairly, that there should be a uniform law all over the Dominion for the governance of railway companies, and last session the then Government expressed their willingness to allow the passage of a proper Bill applying uniform conditions to all Dominion railways. This Bill is intended to meet that view. It provides in the first place for giving the right to all land holders and municipalities to drain across the property of railway companies subject to the provisions of this Act, to the same extent as they have the right across the property of any other land holder. It goes on to provide machinery for securing this right in a way that shall be fair both to the railway company and to the land owner. There is a system of notices to be given to the manager of a railway company by the person desiring to have drainage works completed, and on the company receiving notice the engineer of the railway company and the engineer of the other party interested shall try to agree about the proposed works. If they cannot do so they may appoint a third engineer as umpire, and if they cannot agree on that, the Minister of Railways and Canals shall have the right to appoint a competent engineer as umpire. These three engineers are to go on the spot where the work is to be done and settle the matter finally and without appeal. The main object of the Act is to avoid the expense and difficulty, and I should say unfairness, of compelling persons to appear before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council at Ottawa, in connection with every small question of drainage. The municipalities and the farmers interested have felt it a serious grievance that they had to come to Ottawa and engage a lawyer to combat the railway lawyers before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council. They felt that under the circumstances, they could not expect to get full justice in some cases, and in no case could they get justice without incurring an expense which they could ill afford. This Bill is intended to remove these difficulties.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, NAPANEE.

Mr. WILSON asked :

What is the name of the collector of customs in the town of Napanee ? When was he appointed, and who recommended him to the Controller of Customs for the position ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). Thomas Edwin Anderson is the collector of customs at Napanee. He was appointed on the 10th December, 1896.

Mr. WILSON. You did not answer the latter part of the question. Who recommended him for the position?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I do not know that the hon. gentleman would be entitled to an answer on that point. I have no objection whatever to say, that a great many people spoke in his favour.

Mr. FOSTER. You might answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. the Controller of Customs can answer the question or not; as it is fully understood.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a new objection.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) need not have given any explanation.

Mr. FOSTER. He need not have given any answer at all.

CUSTOMS OFFICER AT STRATHROY.

Mr. CALVERT asked :

1. What is the name of the customs officer in the town of Strathroy, in the county of Middlesex?

2. What was the amount of customs dues collected for each of the years 1894, 1895 and 1896?

3. What was the salary of said officer during each of said years?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). James Ferguson Taylor is customs officer at the outport of Strathroy. The revenue at the outport for the three years named was as follows:—1893-94, $5,214.33; 1894-95, $5,138.48; 1895-96, $5,653.83. The salary of the officer for each of said years was $300.

INLAND REVENUE OFFICER AT STRATHROY.

Mr. CALVERT asked :

1. What is the name of the inland revenue officer at the town of Strathroy?

2. What was the amount of revenue collected for each of the years 1894, 1895 and 1896?

3. What was the salary of said officer for each of said years?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). 1. The name of the inland revenue officer at the town of Strathroy is James F. Taylor. 2. The revenue collected in 1894 was $8,282.43; in 1895, $6,954.25; and in 1896, $6,560.13. 3. The salary paid in each of the years 1894, 1895 and 1896 was $850.

POSTMASTER OF MARSH HILL, ONT.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

1. When was the post office at Marsh Hill, Ont., filled by the appointment of George G. King?

Mr. PATERSON.

2. What caused the vacancy to which Mr. King was appointed?

3. When did Mr. King cease to be postmaster at Marsh Hill?

4. What amount has been paid to Mr. King for services as postmaster of Marsh Hill?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). The post office at Marsh Hill, Ont., was filled by the appointment of George G. King on the 4th of August, 1896. The vacancy was caused by the resignation of John Howsam on the 16th of October, 1895. Mr. King ceased to be postmaster at Marsh Hill on the 8th of December, 1896. There has been nothing paid to Mr. King for services as postmaster at Marsh Hill.

POSTMASTER OF BEAMSVILLE.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

1. When was W. D. Fairbrother appointed postmaster at Beamsville?

2. Was he appointed by Order in Council?

3. Has the said W. D. Fairbrother been dismissed from said position?

4. If dismissed, what was the cause, and were any charges made against him?

5. If charges were made against him was an investigation of the truth of such charges made?

6. Has a successor been appointed to Mr. Fairbrother? If so, who is he, and what is his age?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). W. D. Fairbrother was appointed postmaster of Beamsville on the 11th of April, 1895. No Order in Council was passed appointing him. The following charges were made against him:—That, from the time he took possession of his office until the 23rd of June last, every possible means was taken to sell and give away Conservative literature through the office, and that he held back literature that was in the interests of the Liberal party; that, during the last campaign he repeatedly absented himself from the office in order to attend political caucuses in the interests of the Conservative party; that he endeavoured to utilize the office rather for profit to himself than for the public convenience; that he would keep a lobby full of people waiting for their mails whilst he parleyed over the sale of papers through the wicket; that he changed the general delivery from a convenient arrangement of fifty boxes to that of 21, which made the office so crowded as to occasion nearly double the necessary time for the distribution of papers, circulars, &c., the public being thus kept waiting; that this change in the system of delivery was such as to greatly delay the delivery, involving a handling of from twenty to fifty pieces of mail matter for almost every person calling for mail; that when asked by the assistant why he so inconvenienced himself and the public in keeping them waiting so long, he replied: "I do not care how long they have to wait, let them purchase boxes. If you make it more convenient for them than they have it, they would never rent a box." That the postmaster would stand by the half hour reading the contents of ingoing and outgoing postcards passing through the office; that the assistant cautioned him against this practice without avail; that he took an active political part in the last general election, that during the whole of the election day he acted as outside scrutineer and took an active part in bringing voters to the polls instead of attending to the duties of his office; that satisfactory evidence was furnished as to the postmaster having taken such political part which rendered any further investigation unnecessary, and he was accordingly removed from the position and Alex. Allan appointed in his stead.

Mr. McCLEARY. The hon. gentleman has not answered that part of the question about the age of the gentleman appointed.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will furnish that to the hon. gentleman tomorrow, if he wishes.

POST OFFICES IN ANNAPOLIS COUNTY, N.S.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Was there ever a post office established in the county of Annapolis called "Young's Cove" ?
2. Was James Kearns made postmaster of that office ?
3. Is there such a post office now or such a postmaster ?
4. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). There has not been a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., under the name of Young's Cove.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Was there a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., called "North Perott" ?
2. Was Alfred Spurr appointed postmaster of that office ?
3. Is there such a post office now or such a postmaster ?
4. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). There has not been a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., under the name of North Perott.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Was there ever a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., called "Virginia" ?
2. Was Ezekiel Banks made postmaster of that office ?
3. Is there such a post office now or such a postmaster ?
4. If not, why not ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). There has not been a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., under the name of Virginia.

OBSTRUCTIONS—BEAR RIVER.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Does the Government realize that the remains of the piers of the old bridge at the mouth of the Bear River, between the counties of Annapolis and Digby, lying north of the new bridge lately constructed by the Nova Scotia Government, are an impediment to navigation, and at certain times of tide, a hidden danger to life and property ?
2. Is not the Government of Nova Scotia responsible for the removal of said piers ?
3. Is it not the duty of the Federal Government to see that the Government of Nova Scotia does its duty in this regard ?
4. Has anything been done by the Government towards obtaining the performance of the obligation of the Nova Scotia Government in this regard ?
5. If so, what ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The Government some years ago was advised that the remains of the piers of the old bridge formed an obstruction to navigation. The late Minister of Marine called the attention of the provincial government of Nova Scotia to this alleged obstruction, but that government repudiated any responsibility in the matter. A legal question has arisen as to where the responsibility lies, whether with the provincial government, the municipalities where the alleged obstructions are or the Dominion Government. That question has been lately submitted to the Department of Justice for its opinion. When that is obtained the proper steps will be taken to have these obstructions removed.

ANNAPOLIS, N.S., PIERS.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Is the Government aware that the pier at Hampton, in the county of Annapolis, needs repairing and is rapidly going to ruin, and that it is, in its present state, almost useless ?
2. Has the Government a report from its engineer on the present condition of this pier ?
3. If not, will the Government ask its engineer for such report ?
4. Will an appropriation be made in the Estimates this session for the repair of this pier ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The Government regrets very much to learn from the hon. gentleman that the piers of the county of Annapolis, which he has so long represented, were left by him and the several governments he has for years past supported, in such a lamentable condition of delapidation and ruin. The attention of the Government has been pointedly drawn to the alleged delapidated condition of these piers by Hon. Mr. Longley, and steps have been already taken to have their real condition reported on by the engineer of my department. Proper means will be taken to put those works in good state of repair.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. Is the Government aware that the pier at Port Lorne, in the county of Annapolis, needs repairing, and that a comparatively small sum expended now would save said pier from rapid delapidation and ruin?

2. Has the Government a report from its engineer on the present state of this pier?

3. If not, will the Government ask its engineer for such report?

4. Will an appropriation be made in the Estimates this session for repair of this pier?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The same answer applies to that.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to have an answer to paragraph 2 of this question.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Reports have been received and steps have been taken to obtain fuller reports.

INDIAN SUPPLIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

What supplies were guaranteed to the Indians of Manitoba and the North-west Territories under treaty stipulations? What provision is the hon. the Minister of the Interior making for the purchase of these supplies? Does the hon. the Minister of the Interior intend to call for tenders for these supplies?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Treaty No. 3 guaranteed ammunition and twine to the value of $1,500 yearly, and the following supplies to be given once for all. For each family actually cultivating the land (at the date of treaty, 1873) or who shall hereafter commence to cultivate land, 2 hoes, 1 spade, 1 scythe. For every ten families, 1 plough. For every twenty families, 5 harrows. For each band, 1 axe, 1 cross-cut saw, 1 hand saw, 1 pit-saw, necessary files, 1 grindstone, 1 auger, 1 chest of tools. For each band, enough of wheat, barley, potatoes and oats to plant the land actually broken up for cultivation by such band. For each band, 1 yoke of oxen, 1 bull, 4 cows. For each chief and subordinate officer, 1 suit of clothing once in every three years. Treaty No. 4 guaranteed for each chief and headman, not to exceed four in each band, a suit of clothing once in every three years. Powder, shot, ball and twine to the value of $750 each and every year; and the following supplies, once for all. For every family actually cultivating the soil, at the date of treaty, 1874, or who should thereafter settle upon the reserve: 2 hoes, 1 spade, 1 scythe, 1 axe, and enough seed wheat, barley, potatoes and oats to plant such lands as they have broken up. For every ten families, 1 plough, 2 harrows. For each band, 1 yoke of oxen, 1 bull, 4 cows, 1 chest tools, 5 hand-saws, 5 augers, 1 cross-cut saw, 1 pit-saw, necessary files, 1 grindstone. Treaty No. 5 guaranteed ammunition and twine to the value of $500, each and every year. For each chief and subordinate officer, 1 suit of clothing every third year, and the following supplies once for all. For every family cultivating the soil at date of treaty, 1875, or who should thereafter commence to cultivate, 2 hoes, 1 scythe, 1 spade, 1 axe. For every ten families, 1 plough. For every twenty families, 5 harrows. For each band, 1 cross-cut saw, 1 hand-saw, 1 pit-saw, 1 grindstone, 1 auger, necessary files, 1 chest of tools, 1 yoke oxen, 1 bull, 4 cows, and enough of wheat, barley and oats to plant such land as they have broken up. Treaty No. 6 guaranteed ammunition and twine to the value of $1,500 each and every year. For each chief and subordinate officer, 1 suit of clothing every third year, and the following supplies once for all. For every band cultivating the soil at the date of the treaty or which might hereafter commence to cultivate the soil. For each family, 4 hoes, 2 spades, 2 scythes, 1 whetstone, 2 hay-forks, 2 reaping hooks. For every three families, 1 plough and 1 harrow. For each band, 1 hand-saw, 1 pit-saw, 1 grindstone, 1 auger, necessary files, 1 chest of tools, 4 oxen, 1 bull, 6 cows, 1 boar, 2 sows, 1 hand mill, 2 wagons or 2 carts. Treaty No. 7 guaranteed ammunition to the value of $2,000 each and every year. For each chief and councillor, one suit of clothing every third year. There is no statement in this treaty to the effect that certain supplies are to be furnished once for all, but the department takes it that the following supplies which are stipulated for are only to be furnished once for all. For each band, 10 axes, 5 hand-saws, 5 augers, 1 grindstone, necessary files and whetstones, 1 bull. For every family of 5 and under, 2 cows. For every family of more than 5 and less than 10, 3 cows. For every family of over 10, 5 cows. If any band desires to cultivate the soil as well as raise stock each family shall receive one cow less, and in lieu thereof when settled on their reserve and prepared to break the soil, 2 hoes, 1 spade, 1 scythe, 2 hay-forks. For every three families, 1 plough and 1 harrow. For each band enough potatoes, barley and oats and wheat to plant land actually broken up if such seed be suitable for the locality. Tenders for the supplies required are being called for.

SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

To whom has the contract for sections 4 to 7 of the Soulanges Canal been awarded? Was he the lowest tenderer? If not, why was the lowest tenderer passed over?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The matter of the contract for these sections of Soulanges Canal has not yet been concluded, and until it is it will not be possible for me to furnish the information asked for.

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

To whom has the contract for section 12 of the Soulanges Canal been awarded? Was he the lowest tenderer? If not, why was the contract not given to the lowest tenderer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Contract for section No. 12, Soulanges Canal was awarded to M. J. Hogan, contractor, and the contract has been executed. He was the lowest tenderer.

COLLECTOR OF CUSTOMS, MORRISBURG.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Broder) asked :

Has an Order in Council been passed since the 23rd of June, 1896, cancelling the appointment of David Halliday to the position of collector of customs at the port of Morrisburg? If so, when?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). No.

WHARF AT IONA, VICTORIA CO., N.S.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to pay the balance due James C. McDonald for repairs made on the public wharf at Iona, Victoria county, N.S., early last summer? If so, when? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). No, an investigation was held, and Mr. McDonald has already received the amount shown on investigation to be due for the repairs referred to.

VICTORIA RAILWAY BRIDGE.

Mr. FOSTER asked :

Has any Order in Council been passed by the Government granting any sum of money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in aid of extending, repairing or rebuilding the Victoria Railway Bridge at Montreal? If so, what was the amount granted, and will the papers be laid upon the Table of the House in due course?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It would be premature until negotiations between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government respecting the Intercolonial Railway terminal in Montreal are concluded to furnish partial information on this subject. All papers will be laid on the Table of the House in due course.

APPOINTMENT OF MR. F. L. CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether a gentleman named Cartwright has recently been appointed Inspector of the North-west Mounted Police? If so, whether he is a relation of the Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright, Minister of Trade and Commerce? If so, what relation? If such appointment has been made, what has been, up to the date thereof, the business or profession of the aforesaid Mr. Cartwright?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Francis Lennox Cartwright was appointed inspector of the North-west Mounted Police, his appointment to date from 15th of February last. He is a son of Sir Richard Cartwright and is twenty-three years of age. He has been hitherto qualifying for a military, or semi-military, profession. He held a commission as Captain in the 14th Battalion of Active Militia. He has taken courses of instruction at the Infantry School, London, and the Cavalry School, Toronto.

CLAIM OF EMMANUEL CHAMPAIN.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Has Emmanuel Champain, of Batoche, in the district of Saskatchewan, a claim against the Dominion Government for losses caused by the rebellion of 1885? If so, has the claim been paid? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Emmanuel Champain made a claim for a very large amount, about $16,000, for goods said to have been taken by the soldiers. Defence was that he was a rebel, that if the soldiers took the goods their action was a tort for which the Crown was not responsible. A valuable gray horse was said to have been taken for and used by General Middleton. It was subsequently sold with other military supplies at the close of the rebellion. Messrs. O'Connor & Hogg, solicitors for the Government, advised that payment of $200 be made for the horse, if Champain would accept it in full of his whole claim. A cheque was drawn but Champain refused acceptance. The cheque was subsequently cancelled. No other payment was tendered or made.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, WINNIPEG.

Mr. CAMERON asked :

1. Who is the manager or superintendent of the Industrial School, Winnipeg?
2. When was he appointed?
3. What was his former occupation and where did he live at the date of his appointment?
5. What is his salary or allowance?
6. Is the school denominational? If so, to what denomination does it belong?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. The Rev. John H. Fairlee is the Principal of the Industrial School. 2. He was appointed on the 15th September, 1886. 3. He was formerly a master in the Mohawk Institute, Brantford, and at the date of his appointment he resided at Meaford, Ont. 5. His salary is $1,000 a year with free quarters and rations for himself and wife. 6. The school is denominational. The school does not belong to any denomination, but is conducted by the Department of Indian Affairs as a Church of England school.

REVISING OFFICER, TERREBONNE.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

How much has Bruno Nantel, Revising Officer for the county of Terrebonne, received from the Government, in the form of salary and travelling expenses since the date of his appointment?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The payments made to Mr. Nantel, revising officer for the county of Terrebonne, amount to $3,696.80, the details being as follow :—

PREVENTIVE OFFICERS, PRINCE EDWARD COUNTY.

Mr. PETTET asked :

How many collectors of customs, landing waiters and preventive officers have been dismissed in the county of Prince Edward since the present Government attained power? What was the salary of each per annum? What amount of revenue was collected by each officer each year during the last four years?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The outports of Milford, Prinyer, Weller's Bay and Wellington, and the preventive stations of Black River Bridge, Northport, West Point and Consecon, all under the survey of Picton, in Prince Edward County, having been abolished, the services of the officers stationed at such outports and preventive stations were dispensed with. The names of such officers, and the salaries paid them are as follow :—

Mr. SIFTON.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows :—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Honourable Sir Richard Cartwright, K.C.M.G., Minister of Trade and Commerce ; the Honourable Louis Henry Davies, Minister of Marine and Fisheries ; the Honourable William Stevens Fielding, Minister of Finance, and the Honourable Joseph Israel Tarte, Minister of Public Works, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the 13th Chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled : " An Act respecting the House of Commons."

Government House,
Ottawa, 30th March, 1897.

REPORTS.

Annual Report of the Department of Railways and Canals.—(Mr. Blair.)

Annual Report of Indian Affairs.—(Mr. Sifton.)

List of Shareholders of Chartered Banks.—(Mr. Fielding.)

Abstract Statement of the Insurance Companies for the year ending 31st December, 1896.—(Mr. Fielding.)

PUBLIC BUILDINGS ERECTED.

Mr. LISTER moved for :

Order of the House—Return giving (a) the name of every city, town or village in Canada having a population of 12,000 and under in which public buildings have been erected by the Government or in which public buildings are in course of erection ; (b) the population of each of such places according to last census ; (c) the cost of each of such public buildings ; (d) the gross revenue received by the Government from each of such places from (1) post office, (2) customs, (3) inland revenue.

He said : At the request of the Postmaster General, I move to amend that motion by striking out after the word "Canada," the words "having a population of 12,000 and under."

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

ADMINISTRATION OF POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Order for :

1. Copies of all correspondence and other documents relating to the creation of post office inspectorships at Stratford, Barrie and Kingston, and the appointment of inspectors and other officials connected with such inspectorships.

2. The number of employees connected with each such office and the salaries paid, and all other expenses of each office.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Mr. CAMERON. I desire to give a little fatherly advice to the Postmaster General as to the conduct and management of the great department over which he presides, but as the hon. gentleman is not in his place to-day, that advice would be thrown away. I ask that the motion be allowed to stand until the Postmaster General is in his seat.

Motion allowed to stand.

DISALLOWANCE OF PROVINCIAL ACTS—BRITISH COLUMBIA SOUTHERN RAILWAY.

Mr. McINNES moved an Address setting forth :

1. That an Act passed by the legislature of British Columbia in the 59th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, entitled "British Columbia Southern Railway Aid Amendment Act, 1896," extends the grant formerly made to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company of an enormous amount of public wealth and extraordinary privileges.

2. That in the opinion of this House (a) the grants and privileges so extended are unwarranted and grossly extravagant, they are made without the interests of the public being properly safeguarded, and include rights the alienation of which from the control of the people will retard the development of the country and prevent a general enjoyment of its advantages ; (b) the said Act, if continued in force, would create such a monopoly in land, coal and transportation as would prove dangerous to the development and prosperity of the said province and to the interest of Canada generally.

And praying, therefore, that His Excellency will be pleased to disallow the said Act.

He said : I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that this motion may appear to some hon. gentlemen as a peculiar motion to emanate from this side of the House. It may seem to some hon. gentlemen opposite that this motion is another evidence of what they have been pleased to call during the last few days, "A variance between Liberal principles and Liberal practice." But, as I understand the principles of the Liberal party, there is no conflict between them and this motion. It is true that Liberals, in the past, have had occasion to defend the provinces from an aggressive, arbitrary and unwarranted abuse of federal power by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in office. It is true, also, that Liberals generally have declared their opinion that it is unwise, and, in some cases, where the provinces are determined on their line of action, absolutely dangerous to interfere with the provincial legislatures. It may also be true that some prominent members of the Liberal party have declared that in their opinion the power of disallowance should never be exercised by the federal authority. But, notwithstanding all that, I do not think that the Liberal party ever intended to lay down a cast iron rule with respect to this matter of disallowance. It seems to me in the very nature of things that this is one of those questions upon which a hard and fast rule cannot be laid down. Circumstances will always alter cases ; different conditions will require different treatment and, in a case like this, where it is impossible to conceive beforehand the different conditions that will arise round different cases that come before the federal attention, it is absolutely impossible for any hard or fast rule to be laid down ; consequently, I claim that it is the duty of the federal authority whenever a piece of legislation is brought before their attention from the legislature of a province, and is seriously objected to, to scan that legislation and see if it is proper legislation, to inquire into its merits and demerits and disallow or not, according to their judgment. But, so far from there being any inconsistency in asking the Liberal Government to disallow this Act, Mr. Speaker, it is for the very reason that Liberals in the past have defended the rights of provinces, that we in British Columbia call on them to disallow this Act in question and protect the rights of our province. For I can conceive of no reason why the Liberal party or the Liberal Government, having in the past defended the provinces and protected the rights of the people in the provinces when attacked from powers from without, should be less disposed to protect those same rights when they are attacked by enemies from within the province. But fortunately, in this case, there are circumstances which make the exercise of this power of disallowance anything but an arbitrary act. And the first circumstance which bears out that remark is this, that the people of British Columbia want this Act disallowed.

Mr. PRIOR. No.

Mr. McINNES. The hon. the senior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) says "no." I was quite aware that he would say "no," for, it is said, that he has an egg in the nest which he expects to hatch out after awhile. It is quite true that the government in Victoria will say, "no," for they are also interested. It is quite true that the monopolists and the land grabbers of British Columbia will say "no." It is quite true that all those out there, and all those in other parts of the country who are under the influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway will say "no"; and these will no doubt make a furore over this motion and call out for us to safeguard provincial rights. But, Sir, the great majority of the people in British Columbia, the people who make that province and who are going to be its bone and sinew are almost unanimous in asking for disallowance. The monopolists, the land grabbers, and the chartermongers will cry out "hands off British Columbia," but the people who are interested in the welfare of that province demand that this Act shall be disallowed. They too cry out: "Hands off British Columbia," but direct their cry to those who have improperly trafficked in the province's resources, and I submit, Sir, that there is a great deal more in the cry of the latter class to commend it to this Government than there is in the cry of the monopolistic faction of that province. It may be thought that this House does not represent the feeling of the province of British Columbia as well as does the legislature of that province, and that if the Act be disallowed the British Columbia legislature will re-enact it. Sir, I doubt it very much. It is true that a year ago they passed this Act, but I doubt very much if the members of the legislature in that province would follow the Government in re-enacting it to-day. But, Sir, if there is a doubt that the people of British Columbia are in earnest in asking for the disallowance of this Act, look about you in this Parliament, I think I may be permitted to say, that the hon. members from British Columbia on this side of the House are a unit in demanding disallowance. On the other side of the House it is true that there are the hon. the senior member for Victoria (Mr. Prior), and his colleague (Mr. Earle), one of them interested and the other I do not know whether he is interested or not in the matter; but at all events the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House represent the whole of British Columbia outside of the city of Victoria, and at best those two hon. gentlemen only represent one city. But I am credibly informed that on this matter they do not even represent the feeling of that city, because if the discussion is given to this question which its importance demands, before that discussion is concluded there will be resolutions sent to this Government from mass indignation meetings throughout the province insisting on disallowance of this Act.

There is another circumstance which would rid disallowance in this case of any arbitrary appearance. It is true that the Act is within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, but it nevertheless deals with a matter which is of national importance. I shall not dwell now upon the national aspect of the Act, but I will for present purposes lay down the proposition: that if that legislation is of national concern and if it affects the commercial interests of the Dominion at large, then I say we are justified in scrutinizing it. And, if after scrutinizing that legislation we are of opinion that it has been passed recklessly, and hastily, and rashly, without properly safeguarding the rights of the people, then we are justified in exercising the power to annul it which is given us under the constitution.

I am quite aware that there are some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have a very high regard for the doctrine of non-disallowance of provincial legislation, but I would remind them that the doctrine of non-disallowance is not the only doctrine which is held dear by the Liberal party. It is not the only tenet of the Liberal creed; it is not the only plank in their platform. There are other planks around which we have rallied and for which we have fought that are of a great deal more importance than that comparatively insignificant principle of non-disallowance of provincial legislation. It must not be forgotten that we have fought in the past for equal rights to all. We have fought for the land for the people, we have opposed monopolies, and we have decried systems because they created monopoly. Sir, these latter principles are of the very essence of liberalism, and they must not be set in the background and a rather secondary principle given precedence when we are considering a matter of this kind. Whenever there is an apparent conflict between the principles of the Liberal party, I submit that there is one final test to guide us, and that is, the common good of the country and the greatest good to the greatest number. If the Liberal party act in a way consistent with that final test of liberalism, they need not be afraid of any taunts or sneers as to inconsistency, let them emanate from whatever source they may.

I shall now, Mr. Speaker, briefly review the history of this legislation and subsequently point out the objectionable features of it. In 1888 a charter was applied for to the British Columbia legislature by a number of politicians and government officials out there, and some other gentlemen of lesser importance. Among the applicants was Colonel Baker, who at that time was a member of the legislature and who has since become Provincial Secretary of the province. The company as incorporated at that time was called the "Crow's Nest and Kootenay Lake Railway Company," and it acquired the right to build a line from the summit of the Crow's Nest Pass to some point in the centre of Kootenay; probably Pilot Bay. They were to build their road within a certain specified time, but before that time expired there was an Act engineered through the legislature called "The Railway Aid Act," passed in 1890, which gave enormous grants to this company as well as to some other company. The promoters found that their time was going by, and in 1890 they asked for an extension of their franchise, and it was accordingly extended. In 1891 they applied again for new rights and larger privileges, and in that amendment of their charter the name was changed from the "Crow's Nest and Kootenay Lake Railway Company" to the "British Columbia Southern Railway Company," the name which it now bears. In 1893, finding they were still unable to dispose of their charter with the enormous privileges which have been granted them, they again applied to the legislature to have all their rights under the charter extended, which was accordingly done. In the same year, by another Act, their privileges were largely extended, and their land grant was enormously increased. In 1894 they again appealed to the legislature to extend their charter, and to show the utter recklessness with which the legislature allowed such legislation to pass, let me tell you, that in that year the legislature of British Columbia gave away eight million acres to this company without knowing that they had done so; and it was not discovered that they had given away this eight million acres in addition to the other large grants, until about six months ago when some of the Ministers of the present Dominion Government were out there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) passes away from that point I would like to ask him: Whether the Act has not been amended so as to correct that mistake?

Mr. McINNES. The Act has been amended in that respect. During the session which is now sitting in Victoria they brought in what they called an "Ambiguity Bill" which revoked that grant, claiming it appeared in the Bill by some clerical error. In 1894 they consolidated all the rights they had, under a new Act. Before I come to that, let me say that in that Act of 1893, by section 23, a peculiar privilege is given to the promoters of that company, and that privilege is: to sell out to any company that they saw fit and which would in any way connect with their line. Now, these parties got the charter away back in 1888. I do not think I reflect on them when I say that as individuals they had no means whatever of constructing this line. Their sole purpose was to acquire this charter, to hawk it about the country, and to make a big thing out of it. They accordingly hawked it about the country, but they failed to dispose of it. They applied to the provincial legislature time and time again for extensions, and, in order to be enabled to dispose of the charter more effectually they had this peculiar privilege put in their Act of 1894. In 1896 they came again before the legislature, and they asked to have the time limit, within which they were to construct this line by sections, extended, and it was accordingly extended; and it is the Act passed in 1896, being chapter 4 of the British Columbia statutes, that we ask the Government now to disallow. The Act was sent to the Department of the Secretary of State here, and it was received by that department on the 4th of June, 1896, and accordingly, under the constitution, it is within the right of His Excellency, up to the 14th of June next, to disallow the Act.

Having given this brief history of the legislation, I wish to point out to you some of its objectionable features—features which I think will make it repugnant to you, and explain why it is obnoxious to the people of British Columbia, and why they are desirous of having the Act disallowed. In the first place, it creates an enormous monopoly in land. Section 1 of chapter 40 of the Act of 1890 grants 20,000 acres of land per mile to this railway company, in alternate sections; and, as the length of that line will in all probability be 325 miles, you will see that the company will receive 6,500,000 acres. That land is situated right in the centre of the Kootenay mining district, a district which is attracting the attention of the world to-day, and which is bound to go ahead. People will flock in there, and without a doubt that land will become immensely valuable. For one corporation to hold within its grasp such an enormous quantity of such very valuable land, is a thing which I think should not be tolerated for a moment. In the district which I have the honour to represent, similar legislation has gone into effect. Half of Vancouver Island is held by the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, and has been held by it since 1887. Of all parts of British Columbia, that section has progressed the least, and there is no explanation for this except that the company holds the land as a monopoly, and will only alienate it on conditions which are very unfavourable to settlers. Not only is there an enormous land monopoly established, but with the grant of land goes all the base minerals. Now, as you know well, the Kootenay country has received a great amount of fame on account of the gold and silver which it has produced; yet, if the truth were told, Rossland is really rather a copper camp than a gold camp. The base metals in that district are of enormous value, and there is no doubt that it is rich in all kinds of minerals; so that the mineral grant to this company is necessarily very important. But it has a still more serious feature. In the great majority of cases the gold and silver in that country are not found native, but are mixed with iron, copper and other elements. So that, except in those cases where the gold is free-milling or where the silver is native, the miner will have to approach this company before he can mine gold or silver at all. The case I cited a few minutes ago in my own district is exactly analogous to this. There are very valuable mineral bodies in Vancouver Island within the railway belt, but they cannot be worked and are not worked today, although many of them are a great deal richer than those in the Kootenay country—why? Because when a prospector goes out and finds a lead, if it does not contain free-milling gold, he has to deal with this Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company, because that company has a monopoly over the base metals which are alloyed with the gold and silver, and the company exacts terms and conditions which it is beyond the power of the poor prospector to comply with. Not only is this company given the base metals, but the grant of land carries with it the timber, which is of enormous value.

But the mineral of the greatest value which goes with this grant is the coal. The coal basin which has been discovered in the Crow's Nest Pass, or that immediate vicinity, as I think the geological experts will affirm, is unequalled by any other coal basin on this continent. Now, you will readily understand that if the Kootenay country goes ahead, as we all believe it will, there will be enormous reduction works, smelters, and such like works established there. Coal is an absolute necessity to the working of these establishments, and their economical working is an absolute necessity to the working at a profit of many of the mines there; because in the Kootenay district at the present time it is unfortunately the fact that the ore has to run from $20 to $25 a ton to be worked profitably, though under ordinarily favourable circumstances ore that runs from $7 to $8 a ton can be profitably worked. One reason why the gold ore in the Kootenay district has to be so high-grade to be profitable is the high price of coal. It will surprise you to learn that a great deal of the coal and coke used there at present is imported from Wales, being carried around the Horn a distance of 15,000 miles. This coal bed in British Columbia is no more than 200 miles from the locality where there will be the greatest demand for it; and if that coal is to be held by any single corporation, and if, as is the case, it is the only bed of coal there, that company will have a degree of control over the development and the prosperity of that country the danger of which you can readily realize. But that you may properly understand the true extent of that coal basin, let me give you some figures in connection with it. Professor Selwyn, in the Summary Report of the Geological Survey for 1891, volume 5, No. 1, page 14A, says that he passed through the Crow's Nest Pass, and examined briefly the coal formations there. He says he found 20 seams exposed, having an average thickness of 132 feet. He says he saw, from a cursory glance at the country, that there must be at least 144 square miles of that coal. He also estimates that with that thickness of 132 feet, each square mile would average a production of 50,000,000 tons of coal. At these figures, therefore, the possible tonnage of that coal basin amounts to 7,200,000,000 tons. Prof. Selwyn tells us, however, that he hurried through the pass and did not examine it carefully, but others have examined it very carefully, whose interest it was to do so, and I shall give you some of their figures. Mr. Fernie, who it appears is engineer for the British Columbia Southern Railway or the Crow's Nest Coal Company, says that the area of coal is thirty-five miles long and ten miles wide. He has been on the ground, and he has examined it carefully, and that is his estimate, and he says, in some directions, the area actually exceeds those limits. At the same figure of thickness of the coal, 132 feet, which Prof. Selwyn gives, and with the area that Mr. Fernie estimates, you would have a tonnage there of coal of 17,500,000,000 tons. But the Canadian Pacific Railway have become interested in this matter, and have, in a recent pamphlet upon the resources of British Columbia, stated that the thickness of that coal runs from 132 to 448 feet. If the Canadian Pacific Railway's statement be correct, and we can only conclude that it is, then with an average thickness of 290 feet (the mean between the Canadian Pacific Railway's figure, and with the area given by Mr. Fernie) you will have a total tonnage of 39,375,000,000 tons. This is part of the subsidy, which is to be given this British Columbia Southern Railway for constructing this line. If you value that at one cent a ton, it amounts to a bonus of $393,750,000, practically as much as the national debt of Canada, and sufficient to build a railway almost round the earth. But if that coal be worth a cent a ton, it will be, with the enormous demand that there must be for it, worth a dollar a ton when worked, to the company, and at that rate, it would give a return of $39,375,000,000. To show you that the company knew what they were about, let me refer to the Act. It was their intention, evidently, from the first, to get a monopoly of those coal lands, and this is the way they accomplished their object. They had a clause inserted in the Railway Aid Act, chap. 40 of the statutes of 1890 of British Columbia, providing that where the 20,000 acres could not be obtained along the line of their railway, on account of previous alienation or of the twisting route which the railway would have to take, the deficiency would be made up to the company right in the heart of this coal basin. Col. Baker, who was prominently connected with this company, happens to represent the district in which all this coal is situated. He understood the conditions thoroughly, and came before that legislature and got it to supply the deficiency in land along that part of the line which would run through the coal fields, which he knew all about, but which probably, at that time, there was not another man in the legislature knew anything about.

But there is another extraordinary feature in connection with this matter. The company can acquire all that enormous quantity of coal, not for supplying a line through Crow's Nest Pass into the Pilot Bay or the centre of Kootenay, but for merely building a narrow gauge line for a distance of only seventy-five miles. The authority for this statement is section 9, chap. 53, Act of 1894, which says that as soon as the company has completed certain limited sections, they will be entitled to the land grant connected with those sections. You will see, therefore, that for building that one section, the eastern section, which runs through these coal lands, they will be entitled to that enormous wealth.

Not only is there an enormous monopoly in base minerals and in coal, but this company also have many special privileges. They can run saw-mills, open up mines, run smelters, run tramways, operate petroleum works and do a thousand other things. Therefore, I say that on account of these extraordinary privileges and these enormous grants there is ample justification for this Parliament advising the disallowance of the Act.

But you would naturally ask me, if this property is so valuable, how is it that these men who went round hawking that charter, were unable to dispose of it till last year. Well, there are reasons for that. One is that some of the people who have been connected with this charter, were connected with other schemes and have hawked other property, in connection with which there were transactions which were not creditable to them. There is also another thing to be considered. Hon. gentlemen in this House do not know these gentlemen as well as we in British Columbia know them, or they would know that these gentlemen are not the class of men who would readily gain the confidence of capitalists. There is also another reason why they did not succeed sooner in selling this charter, and that is the dullness which has afflicted the financial world the last few years. That explanation itself is sufficient, but there is still another explanation which will commend itself to hon. gentlemen. These coal mines, while enormously valuable now, were of no more value two or three years ago than if they were at the North Pole. Coal is of no value unless there is a demand for it, just as railways are of no value where there is no trade, but now the people are flocking in to settle the country, it has acquired enormous value. You will understand that the Kootenay country has been going ahead with giant strides, and the value we now attach to these things is enormous compared with the value they had a few years ago. If the charter and all the enormous grants that are given that company were offered for sale in the country to-day, you would find capitalists crawling over one another to acquire them. There is no doubt of that.

But there is another serious aspect in connection with this question which I approach with some little diffidence, but which I hope I do not approach in any spirit of bitterness, and it is this, that the enormous grants and privileges given this company and the dangerous monopoly thereby created, are as nothing compared with the condition imposed upon the people of British Columbia by the sale of all these rights to the Canadian Pacific Railway. These charter-mongers finally succeeded in their efforts and sold their charter to the Canadian Pacific Railway. That puts a very serious phase on this question for British Columbia. It would have been bad enough had that monopoly been created and stood by itself. It would have been a danger which would have threatened the progress of that district. But when you remember that the Canadian Pacific Railway is another monopoly, possibly a greater monopoly, and that we have to confront a union of these monopolies against which there can be no competition, you can understand the importance that this question has for us.

Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway, as you know, has had a monopoly in the past of railway transportation in the west. Unfortunately, notwithstanding the enormous grants that they received from the Dominion and provinces, they have not shown the interest in the development of the country, they have not shown good intentions towards the people and, particularly, towards the settlers of that western country, that we had the right to expect. On the contrary, they have pursued a policy which has tended to make farming and settlement in that country unprofitable and undesirable. They have had in force freight rates which have been most excessive, which have taken the last cent from the struggling settlers and farmers and those engaged in every pioneer industry in the west. And this is not talk that cannot be proven. The commercial boards of the west have often taken this matter up and have often protested against the high and excessive freight rates. And the Government of Manitoba, in 1895, made an elaborate statement and presented it to the commission appointed by the Dominion Government at that time, showing beyond a doubt, that the rates charged by the Canadian Pacific Railway are excessive, and higher than there is any reasonable excuse for. And, Sir, if you think that they do not ask extortionate rates, you have a splendid opportunity, in the circumstances that are now transpiring, to size up their greed. Not only have they now, since they purchased the rights of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company, enormous subsidies in coal and lands towards the construction of the proposed line from Lethbridge to Kootenay, but they are appealing to the Dominion Government for more assistance still. Can you imagine anything that bespeaks more gall, stupendous gall and insatiable greed. There are special reasons why the people of British Columbia are opposed to this road being built under monopoly at all, and by the Canadian Pacific Railway, above all others. The commerce of British Columbia demands that there should be an independent line running from the east into that country. At present the producers and traders are at the mercy of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Let the Canadian Pacific Railway control the railway through this Crow's Nest Pass, and there is no relief that can ever be given to the commerce of British Columbia and the west. But let me say that the people of British Columbia are desirous, not only that a road should be built from Lethbridge to Kootenay, but also that that road should be extended from Kootenay to the coast, and that construction should be begun at both ends simultaneously. There are many reasons that make this work imperative. We all acknowledge that the trade of the Kootenay country, as it now stands, and particularly as it will no doubt be developed in the future, will justify the construction of railways necessary to secure competition in trade. We also admit that the country from the Crow's Nest Pass to Rossland and Pilot Bay is a rich country and amply warrants the building of a railway to open it up. But the fact is not generally known in the east that the district from Rossland to the coast is a richer country in mineral than that to the east. Through the Tulameen and Granite Creek country, Fairview Boundary and Kettle River districts there are claims which, I believe, without reflecting upon the splendid development of the Rossland and Kootenay districts, are really of more value. Now, the people of the coast of British Columbia claim that road should be pushed from the coast into the Kootenay country in order, in the first place, that a valuable country should be opened up, and, in the second place, that they may have the opportunity of sharing in the trade of the Kootenay. Whatever turn this matter may take, I hope that the Government will see to it that the interests of the commerce of the coast are properly safeguarded and that the line will be built from the coast to the Kootenay. Whether the whole line from Lethbridge to the coast is constructed as one line, or whether the situation is past relief, and the Canadian Pacific Railway will build from Lethbridge to Kootenay, we hope that, at all events, construction will be begun either by the Government or under Government control immediately from the coast into Kootenay. There is another reason why the Canadian Pacific Railway, of all companies, should not have the right to built this railway, and this is that they have already the right to go through one of the passes which pierce the Rocky Mountains. As you are well aware, there are but four passes, four possible means of access, by railway to British Columbia from this side. Of these, two, the Pine Pass and the Yellow Head Pass, it may not be known to most people, are already alienated, a charter having been given to a company to construct through them. The Trans-Canadian Company received a charter from this Parliament two years ago to build through both these passes. The Kicking Horse Pass is already monopolized by the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Crow's Nest Pass is the last available route by which railway communication can be carried through from the east to the coast of British Columbia. Now, if any company is to have the exclusive privilege of running through that pass it surely should not be the company that already has means of access to that country. This pass should be held for an independent line, and I hope that the Government will see their way to retain it as a Government pass for the general advantage of the people.

But there are those who contend, notwithstanding that the Canadian Pacific Railway has bought this charter with its grants, and intends to build the line, that this Government can, by some means or other, extract concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway as to through rates, and that, notwithstanding that the Canadian Pacific Railway may build this line, the concessions that will be obtained from that company will make it advisable to leave the present arrangement alone. To my mind, this is a gross delusion. There is no possible means by which this Government or this Parliament of Canada can enforce concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway. Under their charter, which you will find in chapter 1 of the Dominion statutes of 1881, by sec. 14 of the appended agreement, they have a right to build in any part of Canada. This right they possess independent of this Parliament and this Government. Now, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have enormous concessions from the British Columbia Government, having purchased the rights of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. Through this latter company they have a subsidy that will warrant them in building this line a thousand times over. It is true that they are coming to this Government and asking for aid. But, Sir, do you think for one minute they will give up the enormous, the extraordinary privileges which they now enjoy of extorting whatever rates they like from the people in exchange for the mere pittance that they would get from the Government in aid of this road. If this cannot force concessions from them, what means can this Parliament and this Government use to extract these concessions? I say absolutely none. But there are those who say: We will put conditions upon the Canadian Pacific Railway as to their running rates. Mr. Speaker, you cannot do it. That matter was sealed when you gave them their absolute charter years ago. But some say again: We will appoint commissioners who will have control over the freight rates. Well, Sir, that cannot be done, for reasons previously given. Now, I might at one time have believed that these concessions could have been obtained; I might have believed that conditions could have been enforced upon the Canadian Pacific Railway which would have produced satisfactory results; I might have believed at one time that commissioners could have been appointed who would have faithfully performed their duties. But after what we have seen in this country since this question became a matter of controversy, I am precluded from believing that any longer. Sir, we have seen a shifting, and shuffling and somersaulting by leading newspapers and by public men, which, I say, is dishonourable and disheartening. Take the attitude of the "Globe" in this matter. Why, Sir, judging from its past you would have supposed that it would have stood up firmly for the people, in favour of securing to the great masses of the people their rights, that the attitude upon this question of the men who control it, would have had a clear and certain ring of "neverism" about it. What is the fact? I have no hesitation in saying that from the time, some months ago, when they took up this matter with extraordinary, sudden and intense interest, their attitude has been characterized by cant and deception.

Mr. MILLS. That is nothing to the somersaults that you will see in a few months.

Mr. McINNES. Sir, they have been beating about the bush month after month suggesting what they dare not openly state. They have dealt in a profusion of arguments that has been ingenious at times, but invariably unprincipled. Now, after all these months of pretended discussion, and unfair statement of facts with regard to this matter, they finally pretend to come to a conclusion which is definite in nothing but that the Canadian Pacific Railway, their masters, should build the proposed line. Now, Sir, we have not only seen the attitude similar to this taken by other newspapers from which we expected different treatment, but we have seen public men turning somersaults in the same way. We have seen public men who at one time were prominent in the political life of this country, who owed their positions in this Parliament even, and the confidence which the people had in them, to their strenuous efforts against the Canadian Pacific Railway monopoly. Today they go about the country trying to pacify public opinion, trying to persuade the people to remain quiet until this new yoke of bondage is fastened securely upon them. I make no mention of names; names will occur to you without my mentioning them. But when we see men like these, when we see papers like these, advocate the extraction of concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and dwelling upon the probable faithfulness of commissioners, we are entitled to regard all their suggestions with the utmost suspicion. What does it mean, then, if this Act is not disallowed? It merely means this, that the whole trade and commerce of British Columbia, of that whole western country, is handed over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. There will be no possibility of any relief from it; it will be impossible to extract concessions from the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that western province, with all its promise of glorious future possibilities, will be handed over to the tender mercies of a corporation that, unfortunately, in the past has been characterized by corruption, extortion, tyranny and greed.

Now, Sir, I come to another reason why this Act should be disallowed. If this Act is not disallowed the Government can never build this road, and can never have a proper control over railway transportation in the west. What I mean by that is this: If this Act is not disallowed, the Canadian Pacific Railway have ample warrant to build that line under the subsidy they now have from the British Columbia legislature and aid from the British Columbia Southern Railway Company, and if they build the line under them, as they undoubtedly will, whether assisted by this Parliament or not, then it passes out of the hands of this Parliament and this Government for ever. Now, I understand that in order to make that argument valid, it is necessary to prove, in the first place, that the road is necessary; and in the second place, that no other parties than the Government could build the road. As for the necessity of that line, there can be no two opinions. The Canadian Pacific Railway themselves, in their late annual report, have stated most emphatically that the trade of that district amply warrants the building of the line. The trade at the present time is of such importance that it is keeping up a prosperous American district to the south. It has built up one or two large cities there, and there can be no doubt at all that the road is necessary from the standpoint of trade, and for the purpose of opening up a new and rich country. The second proposition is that no other parties than the Government could build that line. I will not discuss at length at this time the advisability of the Government owning the road, further than to say that I believe that all these great systems of transportation, these great means of public convenience, should be held by the public, and should be controlled by the Government for the benefit of the people at large. Especially that is the case in a new country like British Columbia, a country that gives such brilliant promise; and I hold that if it is at any time right for governments to own railways and operate them in the interests of the people, it is especially desirable in a young country where the right step can so easily be taken at the start.

But there are fortunately several reasons why the Government should build this road. The first one is that it will undoubtedly be a paying investment. Now, I know it is the experience of this country in past years that government railways are not very profitable. Naturally the Intercolonial Railway will loom up before your minds, and you will think of the losses incurred by the country in the working of that railway. But, Sir, there is no comparison at all between the Intercolonial Railway and this proposed line. The Intercolonial Railway was built more or less as a national necessity, it was the creation of political expediency at the time; and since it has been built it has been operated, not so much as a commercial institution on commercial and business lines, as a political machine. But notwithstanding that fact even, there was a year in which the Intercolonial Railway was operated at a profit; and I am given to understand that there are prospects that under the able administration of the present Minister of Railways and Canals, that line will, in future, be a paying rather than a losing concern. But I say there is no comparison at all between that line and this proposed line. The country through which the Intercolonial runs is nothing like as rich, the possibilities of trade are nothing like as good. It must be remembered also, that there is a keener competition with the Intercolonial Railway than there would be to this proposed line. But there is another good reason why the Government should build this line, namely, that it is a matter of national concern. It is not a line that is going to be altogether to the advantage of British Columbia; the advantages which will accrue from the building of that line will necessarily be shared by the whole of Canada. Now, my first ground for saying that, is the industry to which it will give rise, and the character of the country which it will open up. There can be no one so dead in national spirit that he can contemplate the progress which is being made in the development of mineral wealth of British Columbia, without national pride.

We have been told, and I think properly so that in the west lies the hope of Canada. I believe that. In order to give some idea of the progress made out there, I will read a few statistics. In 1887, in fact up to 1892, there was no production of gold in that province from lode mines. In the last year, however, the production of gold from lode mining was $1,244,180. The gold produced in British Columbia at the present time amounts to three-quarters of that produced in the whole of Canada, and the rate at which it is going ahead is something astonishing. The silver production of British Columbia in 1887 was only $17,331; last year it reached the enormous figure of $2,100,689. We produced last year all the silver produced in the Dominion of Canada. The lead produced in connection with silver amounted last year to $721,000; whereas in 1887, 1888 and 1889 we had no lead production at all in that country. The value of copper mined last year amounted to $190,000, whereas up to three years ago, there was not one ounce of copper mined in the whole country. These figures will give hon. members some idea of the progress made; but this progress in the mineral development of the province is but the beginning of what it is going to be. Capital is pouring in there now, because the mining industry has been placed upon what you might call a permanent basis, and is an assured fact. Up to last year the people might have looked upon the mining prospects of the country as altogether speculative and uncertain; at the present time, however, their richness is assured, and with that assurance there is not the slightest doubt that capital will pour in from eastern Canada, the United States and the old country, and the development will be tremendous. With the development of the mines, population will come in, and with increased population the revenue which will accrue to the Government will enormously increase. A few years ago there was no such place as Nelson in the Kootenay country. It was made a port of entry three years ago, and last year the amount of duty collected there amounted to $187,631. In the Kootenay country during last year there were not more than 15,000 people, and they contributed that amount of revenue named. With the enormous increase of population which will necessarily pour in there, the revenue which will accrue to the Dominion will become enormous. Here I might point out a fact, that may seem strange to hon. members, that the amount of revenue contributed by British Columbia to the federal exchequer is larger by half than the total revenue paid into the treasury of the province for provincial purposes. I, therefore, contend that the further revenue from the province, warrants the Government in undertaking this work which will assuredly swell that revenue. There is still another reason, and I press it on the Government, why the Dominion should build this road as a national undertaking, and that is that thereby they would retain the pass. It is the last available pass and the only remaining means of access to British Columbia, and it is the duty of the Dominion Government to retain that last available pass in the interest of that province and in the interest of Canada generally.

But there are those who will contend that the Government has nothing to do with this line, that the line is a local undertaking, that the road if built would be on behalf of and to the advantage of ten thousand or fifteen thousand miners in British Columbia and that therefore British Columbia should build it. I have heard that contention put forward, and I have regretted to hear it. British Columbia is doing more to-day towards railway construction than any other province in the Dominion. It has given enormous assistance to the British Pacific Railway, to the Burrard Inlet and Fraser Valley Railway, to the Columbia and Western, to the Slocan and Kaslo Railway, and Nakusp and Slocan, and other railways I could mention; the people of the province are doing more to-day to aid in railway construction than the people of any province, exclusively by provincial assistance. But even if we were asking that this undertaking be carried out as a provincial matter, if it were admitted to be altogether to the advantage of the province, if there were not a surplus advantage that would accrue to this country, I say we would be amply justified in asking that this be done by the Dominion Government. I base that statement on the fact of the enormous revenue contributed by British Columbia to the Dominion exchequer. This matter has been referred to previously by hon. members who have represented British Columbia in this House; but I have made a statement which is a little more comprehensive than any made previously, and which I believe will place the matter in a clear light before the House. I have made a statement in the first place, as to the amount paid by and received by British Columbia during the last ten years. I am averse to reading figures, but I hope the House will indulge me while I read these statements. I have had returns furnished by the deputies of all the departments, and the figures are undoubtedly correct. They are as follows:—

STATEMENT showing Amount paid into and received from the Dominion Treasury by British Columbia during last ten years.

Year.	Amount paid in.	Amount paid out.	Surplus paid in.
	$	$	$
1887	1,061,771	666,218	395,553
1888	1,064,727	716,807	347,920
1889	1,253,512	738,283	515,229
1890	1,388,214	814,595	573,719
1891	1,770,476	911,804	858,672
1892	1,903,601	1,104,361	799,240
1893	1,771,669	1,096,528	675,141
1894	1,681,387	1,310,181	371,206
1895	1,513,423	1,261,864	251,559
1896	1,841,206	1,188,812	652,394
Total surplus..	5,440,633

In the columns of amounts paid out to British Columbia, I have included not only every item for carrying on all branches of the federal service altogether, with the provincial subsidy and special appropriations, but I have also included a statement of the amount which, as a rule, in these computations, has been omitted, and that is the amount which British Columbia should properly contribute towards the interest on the national debt of this country. That amount runs from $240,000 to $270,000 during these years from 1887 to 1896. In the amount which I claim as having been paid out to British Columbia I have not included the grant of $750,000 which was given to the E. & N. Railway Company as a subsidy for building that line, and for the very good reason which will occur to all British Columbians, that that $750,000 given, it is true, by the Government here, was met by a quid pro quo from the province of British Columbia, which gave 3,500,000 acres of valuable land in the Peace River country to the Dominion Government. Now, this table shows a serious state of facts. It shows that the total amount of surplus which has been paid in by the province of British Columbia and for which it has not received one cent in return amounted, in these ten years, to $5,440,633. I say, Sir, that is a serious matter. British Columbia is a young province; the people of British Columbia have many obstacles to encounter, and it is a grave matter that that enormous amount of money should be drained from that province without giving her the slightest return. We expect different treatment. A province with such promise as British Columbia, should be dealt with in a generous spirit; at least in as fair a spirit as the other provinces of the Dominion are dealt with. Instead of that, we find that during the last ten years, $5,440,000 has been extracted from it without the slightest advantage. But there is a more serious matter still, and that is, that while we have paid in more than we have gotten back, we have at the same time been actually taxed more, and a great deal more, than the people of any other part of this country. I have prepared a statement which I think will show this conclusively. I have prepared a statement in detail for the year 1896, and then I have prepared a similar statement for the last ten years, but as these statements are somewhat comprehensive and extensive, I will first give the one for the year 1896 in detail, and afterwards a summary for the other years. This statement is calculated upon the estimated population in each given year. The estimate as to population I have received from the Dominion statistician, Mr. Johnson, and I have no doubt it is approximately correct. It is as follows:—

I wish also to submit the following statement to the House:—

When similar statements to these I have given have been made in this House on previous occasions, it has been charged that the high rate of taxation per capita which British Columbia claims to pay is derived from customs duties on goods which are not consumed in British Columbia at all, but in other parts of Canada. That statement has been refuted many times; but I think the figures I have presented to-day will furnish an absolute refutation of it, for this reason, that they show not only that does British Columbia pay more in customs revenue than the other provinces, but that the same high proportion is maintained in every other source of revenue. The inland revenue we paid last year amounted to $2.09 per capita; the balance of Canada paid about $1.40. Of public works revenue we paid 8 cents per capita, whereas the highest paid by any other province, the province of Quebec, was only 3 cents. So with the postal revenue; we paid $1.11 per capita, while the highest paid by any other province, the province of Ontario, was 90 cents. All the other sources of revenue show a similar state of things—that British Columbia contributes per capita a great deal more than any other provinces. It could be shown further if absolute justice were done in this matter, that British Columbia pays even a still larger proportion. In that province we have about 25,000 Indians, forming practically about 20 per cent of the population, who contribute nothing to the revenue; so that these statements should in reality be calculated on figures reduced by the Indian population, namely, 50,000 to 115,000, which would of course greatly increase the proportion.

Now, these statements show that if the railway which is contemplated to be built from Lethbridge to the Kootenay country were pushed through to the coast, the revenue which British Columbia has contributed in the past has been amply sufficient to pay interest and sinking fund on the amount of money that would be necessary to build the road. If it cost $25,000,000—and it would not cost one cent more—the amount of excessive taxation contributed by British Columbia would amply justify that province in asking the Government to build that road as a Dominion or national undertaking.

There are those in the east—I hope there are none in this House—who persist in thinking that British Columbia has been getting a fat thing out of the Dominion treasury. They persist in looking upon the people from British Columbia who make demands for railways and other public works as most importunate persons who are continually nagging for appropriations, and who in the past have been dealt with most liberally; and in support of that they will tell you that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built for British Columbia. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Pacific Railway was not built for British Columbia. It was built as a national necessity, without which the Dominion would be politically impossible. It would be impossible to have a united country without an inter-oceanic railway. If we were to believe some hon. gentlemen, that railway was built not for the Dominion of Canada alone, but in the interests of a united Empire. In any event I can show you by facts and figures that it has been of enormously greater advantage to Ontario in particular than to the western part of this Dominion. As a matter of fact, the Canadian Pacific Railway was built under an agreement. The province of British Columbia came into the confederation on the distinct understanding that a western railway should be built. It was accordingly built, after a number of delays which I think were inexcusable. But, Sir, it was not built as a special appropriation for British Columbia. It was built as the necessary result of an agreement between the Dominion and British Columbia previous to that province entering the Dominion. That agreement required that the Canadian Pacific Railway should be built within ten years from the date of the entrance of British Columbia into the confederation, which was in 1871, that the construction should be begun within two years and should be started from both ends, but, as a matter of fact, we know that the construction was only begun about ten years later, and then it took a number of years to construct it, much longer than was necessary.

But what I am coming to is this. There seems to be the opinion that the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway has been of immense advantage to British Columbia, and that eastern taxpayers have contributed that benefit. Well, Mr. Speaker, it has not been of that advantage it should have been. In the first place, it was not built speedily enough, and at the time it was completed, the British Columbians had other means of access to the eastern world. They had railway communication over the American lines, and, as a matter of fact, a great number of the merchants and the travelling public in British Columbia actually prefer the American lines to-day to the Canadian Pacific Railway. The Canadian Pacific Railway was not built in a way to conduce to the development and advantage of British Columbia. We all know that the company imported hordes of Chinese labourers to construct that line. That was their first great mistake. These people have remained with us ever since, and have become a curse to the country. They have kept out white settlers from coming in and filling up our lands and engaging in our industries. Not only was the Canadian Pacific Railway indifferent to our prosperity in having the line built by Chinamen, but since the line has been built, it has not been run in the interests of the country. When British Columbia agreed to enter confederation and demanded, in consideration of doing so, the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, they contemplated a railway which would be run from one end of the country to the other, and be of enormous value to the province. They did not imagine for a moment that the Dominion Parliament would grant enormous subsidies and franchises to a company without retaining over that company some whip by which we could compel them to operate their line to the advantage of the country. The Canadian Pacific Railway has been built by means of enormous subsidies from the country, and yet the company are absolutely independent of Parliament or anybody else as regards their obligations to satisfy the public demands.

But, Sir, I prefer not to discuss this question in a miserable sectional spirit, but to revert again for a moment to the national aspect of the question, for I do not believe there are many in the House or out of it who look upon the proposed road as any other than a great national necessity.

There is another last reason why the Dominion should build this line through the Crow's Nest Pass, and it is this: In the next few months there will be an enormous influx of population into that district. As a matter of fact, the country has not yet been opened up sufficiently to give adequate employment to the people who will pour into it, although in a year or two undoubtedly the mines will have developed to such an extent as to accommodate and occupy a large population, possibly to the extent of half a million of people. But during the coming summer, it is likely there will not be sufficient employment for all the people who will rush in there, and the matter is of national concern in this way. If the Canadian Pacific Railway build this line and repeat their old policy of importing the worst class of labour to build it, the Chinese coolies, the result will be that the white settlers who will pour into that country will have no means of making a living, and they will simply have to leave it again. If the Government would take hold of this enterprise and build it, as it should be built, by white labour, in the course of a year or two, after the road is constructed, the people who are engaged in its construction would become permanent and profitable settlers.

I have endeavoured to advance a few of the reasons why it is desirable to disallow this Act. I do not know if I have convinced hon. gentlemen, but I submit that I have adduced some reasons that should convince this House that there is a calamity impending on that country unless this Act is disallowed. In conclusion I have only this to say: British Columbia is a province of enormous wealth. It has natural resources which are not exceeded, if equalled, by any country of the same extent in the world. But while we have natural resources within that province sufficient to make millions of people happy and prosperous, yet the fact must be apparent that if we are going to allow legislation of this kind to stand it will create monopolies not only on the wealth but in the prime necessities of the settlers, we will be withholding from the people the opportunities of benefiting from the wealth of that country, and will destroy the brilliant future which awaits it, if its natural possibilities are allowed to become developed in a free, natural and liberal manner. The question is, what is this Parliament going to do in the matter? Are you going to strike the shackles off the young western giant or leave it fettered by making a fad of the principle of non-interference? You cannot escape responsibility in this matter. It has been brought before your attention, and it now rests with this Parliament either to make or mar the future of that country. I am a British Columbian, and proud of that province, and I would be among the first to resent and the last to suggest any unwarranted interference with the constitutional rights of that province; but it is because I have unbounded faith in the future of that country, it is because I am a Liberal, that I believe the only course open to me, as a Liberal and as a British Columbian, is the one I have taken. I hope the Government will take the matter in hand and deal with it in a broad spirit, such as will show their faith in the future of that country, such as will make manifest their desire to do what is right, fair and just, and relieve that country of an incubus which threatens its ruin. I hope, therefore, that the Government, as a preliminary to building this line and operating it for the general advantage of the people as a whole, will disallow this Act, and disallow it also as a necessary first step to give back to the people of the province the enormous part of their heritage which has been wrested from them by the gang of plunderers, for we can call them nothing else, who now unfortunately control the destinies of that great province.

Mr. PRIOR. I wish to say a very few words in reply to the motion of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). Some of his remarks I perfectly agree with. I am heartily with him as to the necessity that exists for the present Parliament doing justice to British Columbia in giving greater grants for public works and other things. I have brought that matter before this House year in and year out for some time past, but it was very hard indeed to make either side of the House believe that British Columbia was paying so much into the Dominion treasury and getting so little back. However, I am in hopes, now that the former Opposition is on the Government benches, they may look at things in a better light and that we shall find more money spent in British Columbia than there used to be. But the principal portion of the gentleman's remarks applied to the charter that has been given by the British Columbia legislature to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway Company. I may say at once that I am one of the men to whom that charter was given, and I am not ashamed of it, nor is any man ashamed of it who was named in that charter. There was nothing done by us or by the legislature of British Columbia that was underhand or that we were afraid to have seen in the light of day. The hon. gentleman may call the charter members of the company boodlers and a few other choice names, but still he cannot show that anything out of the ordinary was done in making application for that charter and securing it. When the charter was obtained the land grant that was given was not supposed to be of any particular value; but the Kootenay mines having turned out so well, these coal lands have become more valuable. I do not intend to take up time with an argument on that question. I do not see what this House has to do with it at all. If any discussion is to take place upon the matter it should be in the local legislature of British Columbia and not in the Dominion Parliament. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) who has just taken his seat, is always trying to make out that the Liberals stand out for provincial rights in other matters. Why, then, should they not do so in this case? That charter was given by the provincial legislature of British Columbia, and they should know what is good for their own province. They were not all Conservatives who gave that charter; there were as many Liberals as Conservatives on the Government benches in the local House when it was given, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) knows it. As to the charter being hawked around, as he says, I defy him to show me any company with a project of such magnitude as this one is that has been able to get capital within the last few years to construct even works of imperative importance to the country. Everybody knows that it was impossible to get capital either in England or in New York. We did our best and offered the best terms we could, but there was no party of men who could finance that road either on the English or the New York market, even with the huge land grants which the hon. gentleman talks about; and it is only lately, since the development of the gold and silver mines in British Columbia that the Canadian Pacific Railway has seen fit to take hold of the charter. Now as to what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to these being the only beds of coal in that district, I beg to say that that is not the fact. I refer to the authority of Dr. Dawson that there are other coal beds of equal value in Alberta on this side of the mountains. As to that being the only pass by which access can be had to British Columbia, I would say that the Dominion Government sent an engineer to report on that some years ago. His report will be found in the Railway Department, and it shows that there is room for four lines through the narrowest portion of the Crow's Nest Pass. So there is no monopoly, even if the building of the road goes to the Canadian Pacific Railway or to any other railway. I quite agree that it is highly necessary that we should have an independent road from the coast. I believe that is what the people of British Columbia want and think it desirable that the Dominion Government should assist that road. I do not see that it is necessary for me to say more. There were no statements made by the hon. gentleman that need refuting, in regard to the Crow's Nest Pass. The charter was granted by the British Columbia legislature, and I believe that hon. gentleman's leader has stated that it was not the intention of the Dominion Government to disallow it.

Mr. BOSTOCK. As the member representing that part of the country which is most interested in this question, I should like to add a few words to what has been said by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). As the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) has just said, it is owing to the great increase of the output of minerals throughout the Kootenay district that this question of the grant that has been made to the British Columbia Southern Railway, has been brought into such prominence. We have had a large development in the mineral resources of West Kootenay, which has led to the putting up of smelters which are a great addition to the wealth of the country and give a great deal of employment to men in that part of British Columbia, thus tending to bring a large number of people in from different parts of the world. Now it would materially affect the smelting industry in that country to have cheap coal and coke for the purpose of carrying on that industry, and it will be a very grave question indeed for the smelters in Kootenay, if the whole of this coal is to be put into the hands of any company that can make a monopoly of it. At the present time, the smelters in Kootenay are paying as high as $15 a ton for their coal, bringing it sometimes from Wales and sometimes from the coast. The dearness of this fuel brings the cost of smelting very high. It is much in the interest of the Kootenay country generally that they should be able to get their supply of fuel cheaper. If they cannot get their coke in at a lower rate it will mean that the low grade ores with which that country abounds cannot be smelted for a long time to come. Therefore, it is to the interest of the country generally that the smelters should be able to get cheap fuel, and it is very necessary that we should guard very carefully the interests of our country in this way. I must say that I view with some hesitation the disallowance of any Act passed by our provincial legislature; but I think that this particular Act is one that warrants very careful looking into, and that there are occasions when the Dominion Government should exercise their right of control over what is done by provincial legislatures. The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) thinks that the discussion should take place in the British Columbia legislature. I think that we, in this House, are perfectly at liberty to discuss questions of this kind. The provincial legislatures have been too free in the grants that have been made.

After Recess.

Mr. BOSTOCK. When the House rose at six o'clock, I was saying that in my opinion the legislature of British Columbia had been rather too free in the way they have dealt with the natural resources of the country, and that they have given away more of those natural resources in subsidizing railways than a large number of people in that province consider justifiable or warranted, under the circumstances. It is only now when we are beginning to ascertain the value of our land and mineral resources that we realize how important it is they should belong to the people, and should have been kept for the benefit of the country, instead of being given away and alienated from the people so that they can derive no benefit from them. The hon. member for Victoria, B.C., (Mr. Prior) referred to the coal deposits in Alberta. What we are particularly dealing with in this case is the coal in the province of British Columbia; it is no answer to this question to say that they have coal in other places; what we want is that the coal of our own country shall be reserved for the use of our own people, and for the use of the smelters which are being put up, and which will be put up in the future. It is well known, and it was stated in the report made by Dr. Selwyn, in 1891, that the coal in this Crow's Nest Pass district and in the Kootenay country is a very good coking coal, and one that will certainly be of great value in the development of the minerals of that country. Therefore we are specially interested in seeing that we keep control of those coal deposits, and that they shall be available for the use and benefit of the people. The development that has been going on in the erection of smelters is shown in the returns that have been lately published in the report of Mr. Carlyle, the provincial Mineralogist. The Miner also states that the ore sent out from the Nelson smelter between the 1st of January and the 20th of March, 1897, was 499½ tons, and that the Trail smelter turned out 856¼ tons, of the total value of $973,210. Every month we hope to see these returns largely increase, because, as the country develops, it will be easier to bring the ore from the mines, and as the mines are opened up, we shall see larger returns from the smelters, and we hope to see other smelters built up over that country. I do not propose to say much at this time on the question of handing the Crow's Nest Pass Railway over to the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think that my hon. friend from Vancouver has dealt with that matter very fully, and that what he has said fairly represents the views of the people of British Columbia. Those on the mainland, especially, feel the danger of allowing any corporation to get hold of a monopoly that will give them power to dictate to the people the rates which they shall pay for carrying freight. That is a serious matter in a new country, and care should be taken that no such power is given to any corporation. The people of British Columbia are deeply interested in this matter, and they are anxiously watching to see what course the Government will adopt; although they do not desire to interfere in any way, or to increase the difficulties of the Government in dealing with this matter. They realize, however, that it is a very serious question for the country, and they think that if the Government was aware of the feelings of the people throughout the province, and indeed of the whole North-west, their wishes and their interests would be consulted, and the Government would grant no monopoly to any corporation which would give it control of the development of that country. The development of the country depends largely on the course pursued by the Government in this matter. The North-west, and especially Alberta, will be more and more interested every year in the development of the Kootenay country, because at the present time the people in the former districts are drawing their supplies from that part of the country and will do so to an increasing extent especially after this Crow's Nest Pass Railway is built. At the present time, owing to the fact that the railway from Revelstoke only goes down as far as Arrowhead, it is necessary in the case of the supplies to break bulk and transfer the produce from the train to the steamer at Arrowhead; and this increases the cost of carriage into Kootenay and makes it heavier than it otherwise would be. A case was brought before me some time ago in which a mining company in the Rossland camp had ordered some eight carloads of machinery for the purpose of developing their mines, and they found that they could bring it in much cheaper over the line from the south than they could over the Canadian Pacific Railway. This is explained by the fact that if it was brought in over the Canadian Pacific Railway they would have to break bulk at Arrowhead and again at Trail; and consequently the cost of handling heavy machinery being so great it was not possible to bring it in over the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they had to bring it in over the line to the south. Now, the people in British Columbia do not wish to see all the resources of the province used for the purpose of building up towns in the states to the south, and they are exceedingly anxious to see this Crow's Nest Pass Railway built. They feel, also, that it is not merely a provincial matter, it is not a matter that concerns the province of British Columbia alone, but it concerns the whole Dominion. It will indirectly benefit the people of Ontario and Quebec, because I find from inquiries that a great deal more machinery is now being purchased from manufacturers in Ontario and Quebec than has been purchased heretofore. The manufacturers of the east are beginning to realize the importance of mining development in British Columbia, and if proper railway communication is given, they will be better able to supply the machinery that is required, and the wants of the miners in other respects. And consequently the only thing that stands in the way at the present time is really this question of transportation. The building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway is an important matter to the whole of Canada, and I hope hon. members in this House will not look upon it simply as a matter which concerns the province of British Columbia, but will realize that it affects the interests of the whole of this great Dominion, and that the opening of the Kootenay country, especially East Kootenay, will have a great effect in settling up the lands of the North-west and in carrying out a successful trade policy. There was one point in regard to the resources of that country which I think the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) either omitted or only lightly touched upon. There are included in the lands covered by this grant in question very rich and valuable oil deposits, that are found in the rocks there. Dr. Selwyn, in his report of 1891, mentions having travelled through this country and found oil in four or five different places close to the river, and that he was able to obtain a considerable quantity of it in its different degrees of purity, and that he did so with very little trouble; and he suggests in his report that tests be made by sinking wells for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of the deposits in the country. That is another valuable product that we will be giving away under this grant to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. I do not propose to occupy the attention of the House any longer on this question. I think the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) covered the whole subject very well, and I hope that the Government will pay careful attention to this matter, and that this debate will place before the House and the people of the country generally the feelings and wishes of the people of the province in regard to it.

Mr. DAVIN. Before this question is put, I wish, without entering into the merits of the subject from the British Columbia standpoint—which has been so exhaustively and so ably dealt with by the hon. gentlemen who have thus far taken part in the debate—to say that the North-west Territories are deeply interested in having a railway built through Crow's Nest Pass as quickly as possible and on conditions that will secure to the North-west as low freights as possible. I must say that when it was indicated to the public by a great authority that arrangements had been made with a great railway company to build a railway through Crow's Nest Pass, conditions being exacted that would greatly relieve the settlers in the North-west Territories as regards freight rates. I was rejoiced; but if that project has fallen through, then I say the Government itself should turn its attention to the building of the road as a Government work; and if it be a 'sine qua non,' as the mover of this motion has contended, that in order that the Government may be free to build a road through Crow's Nest Pass, or a road that would be controlled by the people of Canada through that pass, that the Act of the provincial legislature should be disallowed, then I say that a cogent and conclusive case has been put before the Government for taking that course. I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that within the last few years we have run a little wild in regard to the rights of the provinces. It seems to be considered now by a great many and in high quarters that anything a province does, provided it can be held to be technically within its rights, the Dominion Government, whatever Government may happen to be in power, must allow it to pass, and take no consideration whatever of the general interests of the Dominion that may be involved. But it is a truism that this great ocean-walled Dominion of Canada has interests that must overshadow the interests of every province; and if the interest of any province, or the 'amour propre' of any province clash with the interests of this great Dominion, then they must go by the board, and we must look to what are the interests of the people of Canada at large and feel that the interests of the people of Canada at large and what is best for them must be the guiding stars in any patriotic Dominion Government. I was sorry indeed when I heard it a few days ago indicated that Government would not so much as consider whether they ought or ought not to interfere in this matter. I will not go into the cloud and scandal that have gathered over this Crow's Nest Pass.

Mr. PRIOR. What is that scandal?

Mr. DAVIN. It is a scandal, not connected with Victoria, but connected with Toronto—it is more central than Victoria. The scandal I speak of is one put forward by one of the most influential newspapers in Toronto, which connected the name of a very prominent man and the name of one of our prominent legislators. I am not going into that—I do not want to go into it certainly at this time. The argument that has been put forward so ably by the hon. gentleman who has made this motion seems to me to be the argument that ought to commend itself most strongly to the Dominion Government. I am afraid from the fact that there is no mention of a Crow's Nest Pass Railway in the Speech from the Throne, and also of the way that the Government has indicated its regard for this matter, and also because of the strong indictment—shall I call it so?—that has been brought against the Government by one of its most distinguished and able supporters, although I believe the youngest member in this House, who in a well elaborated argument made as strong a case as I think could be made for the proposition that he wanted to enforce—I say when an hon. gentleman known to be so strong a party man as the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) feels compelled to speak so strongly, it looks as though the Government, at all events, were lying on its oars in regard to the important matter of giving the Dominion the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, which as long as we are without, you are only building up foreign cities, which as long as we are without, you are doing great harm to the commercial as well as the mining interests of the west, which as long as we are without, you are injuring not merely Alberta but the mining districts of Roseland and the Slocan, and you are injuring Assiniboia also. I, therefore, am glad that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) has brought this matter forward, because if there is any intention whatever on the part of the Government to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, the speech of the hon. gentleman may "prick the sides of their intent" and so possibly lead them to act when they otherwise would not. Mr. Speaker, I have only to say in regard to this, that probably it is not too late for the Government to take a step in regard to the Crow's Nest Pass Railway which will redeem them from the charge which I laid at their door earlier in the session, of having met this, their second session, without doing anything whatever for the North-west Territories.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks which I purpose making to-night I shall endeavour to confine myself to the notice of motion before the House. That notice of motion, the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has either not seen or has forgotten, and it may not be inoppor-tune to read just what this notice of motion is. It is for an address :

Setting forth : 1. That an Act passed by the legislature of British Columbia in the 59th year of the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, entitled "British Columbia Southern Railway Aid Amendment Act, 1896," extends the grant formerly made to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company of an enormous amount of public wealth and extraordinary privileges.

2. That in the opinion of this House, (a) The grants and privileges so extended are unwarranted and grossly extravagant, they are made without the interests of the public being properly safeguarded, and include rights the alienation of which from the control of the people will retard the development of the country and prevent a general enjoyment of its advantages ; (b) The said Act, if continued in force, would create such a monopoly in land, coal, and transportation, as would prove dangerous to the development and prosperity of the said province and to the interest of Canada generally.

And praying therefore that His Excellency will be pleased to disallow the said Act.

That, I conceive to be the matter before the House and I shall crave leave to refer very briefly to it. In dealing with this motion I am not unmindful of the fact that by the British North America Act the control of the Crown over the provinces is exercised through the instrumentality of the Dominion Government, and in the exercise of that constitutional supremacy the Governor-General must not ignore, and must have regard to and respect for the rights of the provinces as set out in our federal constitution. I am not unmindful either of the fact that that great charter of our constitution recognizes the right of each province of this Dominion to local self government, and unless these respective provinces contravene their jurisdiction and go beyond their provincial authority, then I contend that this Federal Government ought not and constitutionally cannot interpose and interfere with the acts of the various provinces. I am not unmindful of that, Sir, and unless the respective provinces go outside the bounds of their jurisdiction or assert a principle, or make a claim which might, not which "does" but which might injuriously affect the interests of the Dominion at large, then I say that the jurisdiction of this Government should not be exercised. It is not incumbent upon me to impress upon the House the necessity of keeping these principles constantly in view when discussing such a serious question as the one now before us. The notice of motion in appearance may be quite innocent, but underlying it is a very important principle the invasion of which would be a most dangerous precedent for this House to adopt. In the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I admit that the feeling is very strong indeed in respect to this so-called, rightly or wrongly, monopoly of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company, and equally strong is it in the constituencies contiguous to my own.

At the same time I am pleased to say, that strongly as my constituents feel on this question they are intelligent and liberal-minded, and if I can as their representative justify the course which I shall endeavour to adopt in this instance in not going headlong for a disallowance of this Bill, I know that my constituency will not in any sense feel dissatisfied with the action of this House should they feel disposed not to exercise that prerogative of disallowance which is now solicited by this notice of motion. The constitutional authorities available are full of precedents enunciating the principle of non-interference on the part of the Dominion Government with the action of the local legislatures, when these legislatures are acting within the purview of their powers. I have endeavoured to read the authorities very carefully, and I find there are at least two grounds of objection which may lie against the Acts of a provincial legislature. The first is, where the objection may be because the Act is in excess of the constitutional power of the local legislature, or where it contravenes or is at variance with Acts of the Dominion Parliament. That is the first ground of objection which may lie against a provincial Act. The second ground is, where the provincial Act contains provisions contrary to the sound principles of legislation, and is, therefore, likely to prove injurious to the interests of the Dominion at large, or in short, on the ground of public policy. Now, this Act of the British Columbia legislature must necessarily fall under either of these categories; either the British Columbia Southern Railway Act is ultra vires of the legislature, at variance with some Act of the Dominion House, or it is against public policy. I rather conceive that the ground of objection to this Bill is that it is against public policy, that it is against the interest, or invades some rights of the Dominion at large. In so far as it may do so, to that extent, of course, it is reprehensible, and may be the subject of disallowance. Then, the question following from that would be, whether the exercise of the prerogative of disallowance is a matter of policy or not. It is needless for me to point out to the House, for it is axiomatic, that no legislature has the right to deprive a person of his property, at least not without adequate compensation; but it may not be so generally known that, by the theory of the constitution, the legislature has the power to do so; and it has been very tritely said that, as a consequence, the legislature is the judge of the morality of its own legislation. This motion before us pretends to touch the morality of this piece of legislation on the part of the legislature of British Columbia. That legislature is the judge of the morality of its own piece of legislation; to that extent, interference with existing rights is a question of policy and not of power; and it will be for this House to decide whether it is good or bad policy to exercise the prerogative of disallowance in this case. I may go further and say that, in deciding as to the disallowance of an Act, the Government is not confined to considering solely the validity of the Act. The power of disallowance is very general and, in arriving at a conclusion as to its exercise, it is quite admissible to take into consideration other matters than those affecting the validity of the Act in question. For instance, a particular Act within the competency of the province might include portions involving unsound or objectionable principles of legislation. In that case, if the local legislature did not remedy the grievance, then I take it the onus would lie on the Dominion Parliament to remedy it, and that Parliament would have to be responsible to the electorate for its action. Now, all the authorities advocate the most extreme caution in exercising the prerogative of disallowance. On reference to the statistics, it will be seen that the instances in which disallowance was resorted to from confederation up to 1891, the latest year for which I could find the figures, have been very few indeed; and I regret to say—because I think it is a reflection to some extent on our legislature—that, excepting Manitoba, British Columbia has had the largest number. Of some 800 Acts of the legislature of British Columbia, from 1871 to 1891, twenty were disallowed. In Manitoba, twenty-four were disallowed; whereas in New Brunswick only one out of about 2,000 Acts were disallowed; and in Ontario and Nova Scotia only comparatively few. However, twenty out of 800 is a very small ratio, indeed, which goes to show the extreme care and caution with which the prerogative of disallowance has always been exercised.

Now, the aspect of this case which, to my mind, is the most serious, is this. We are asked to disallow an Act of the legislature of British Columbia, and the remarks which have been made by the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Davin) would incline me to believe that he took the view, although he did not state it explicitly, that the local legislatures are somewhat inferior in their functions and powers, and that this House, having superior scope, ought to have no hesitation in recommending the reversal of any legislation passed by a local legislature. The hon. gentleman, who, I believe, is a member of the legal profession, has not apparently looked up his material—at any rate, not his law: and he does not appear to be familiar with the recent cases affecting this matter. In the case of the Attorney General of Canada against the Attorney General of Ontario, in 1892, reported in volume 3, Ontario Appeal Reports, 1896, the analogy existing between the federal and provincial executives is laid down. This is a synopsis of the case as decided: that the whole mass of executive authority is divided into two parts—that portion of which is capable of being exercised with relation to the government of the Dominion being placed in the hands of the Governor General, and that portion which is capable of being exercised with relation to the government of the province being vested in the Lieutenant-Governor; and the executive authority which goes to the latter is of the same nature, of the same origin, of the same even higher antiquity, because it was practically continued from the old provinces. Therefore, the provincial executive authority has not any subordinate or inferior nature or quality. Of just the same nature as that possessed by the Queen's direct representative acting in her name in Canada is the executive authority possessed by the Lieutenant-Governor as the Queen's representative for the province. Therefore there is some perplexity in a case of this kind. This House is asked to deal with a piece of legislation passed by a body equal in standing and prestige to the executive of the Dominion Parliament to which we come for its disallowance, and having even greater antiquity; and it does not do for us lightly to say that inasmuch as the particular piece of legislation in question is provincial legislation, therefore it must be inferior and open to suspicion.

As a member of the legal profession, and pretending to understand somewhat cases which are applicable to questions of this kind, I must say that I have great diffidence in asking this House to vote in favour of the disallowance of this Act, particularly if I desire this House to proceed on constitutional grounds. However, as representing my constituency, in the first instance and, of course, the province and Dominion at large generally, I cannot ignore the overtures that are being made from time to time against this piece of legislation on the part of the people of the province of British Columbia. On all sides there are evidences of dissatisfaction, which I cannot ignore; and, although I cannot go so far as to say that this House cannot ignore them, at the same time, they are evidences which I think justify me in making use of them on this occasion, and then leaving the House, after hearing the facts as supplementary to those already given by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) and the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Bostock), to decide whether it shall vote in favour of disallowance of this Act or not. Now, we have the "Province," a paper of a great deal of influence in British Columbia, in its last number, stating this:

If the Dominion Government will exercise its prerogative and veto the British Columbia Southern Railway charter, it will make more friends in this province and do more for the cause of Liberalism than it possibly wots of.

That is really the gist of the feeling throughout the province of British Columbia. The Kamloops "Sentinel," another influential and ably edited paper, has a three column editorial urging the Government to disallow this charter. Very long resolutions are set out in that paper, very ably drawn, which express, no doubt, the opinion of the majority of the electorate in the vicinity of Kamloops. On every hand, we find these murmurings against this piece of legislation. The Victoria "Daily Times," one of the leading papers of that city, also holds very strong views on this matter. In the last number which has reached us, I find the following:—

The disallowance of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company's charter, the remedy proposed by Mr. McInnis, would simplify the situation; and if that remedy can be justified on grounds of public policy, British Columbia will be in a position to act generously with the Crow's Nest Railway, having its terminus at the Pacific Coast.

I just refer to those to show the feeling that exists in the province of British Columbia with regard to this matter. Of course, as I said at the outset, the only ground that can be raised against this piece of legislation in my opinion is that it may be contrary to public policy.

I shall give a resume of the legislative steps leading up to this last act, and in doing so I shall be as brief as possible in order not to weary the House. It will be then for the House to decide, having regard to the constitutional aspect of the question and with the facts before it—facts which are not and cannot be contradicted—whether it is advisable to exercise the prerogative of disallowance or not. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) went rather briefly over the ground of the different acts passed since 1888. I am sorry he did not go more fully into this aspect of the case and have obliterated the necessity of my doing so, but I shall endeavour not to take up too much time in supplementing what my hon. friend has said on this point.

The first Act passed by the British Columbia legislature with regard to this franchise was in 1888, when the Crow's Nest and Kootenay Lake Railway Company was incorporated. The gauge of their railway was not to be less than 3 feet and the capital was to be $4,000,000; $100,000 of stock to be subscribed, of which 10 per cent was to be paid before the directors could be chosen. The company was authorized to pay in stock the contractors and engineers and other persons who might be engaged in promoting the undertaking. You notice now the terms running all through this legislation, terms which were persistently ignored, and it is nothing but fair—notwithstanding the opinion I hold on the constitutional aspect of the question—to point out the extent of the terms imposed by the legislature in passing these respective pieces of legislation. I would like very much if hon. gentlemen would listen closely and observe the extraordinary course of action of that local legislature in British Columbia :

The company shall commence construction on or before two years, that is, by the 28th of April, 1890, and complete and equip before five years from the passage of this Act, that is, April 28, 1893.

Land granted, 90 feet right of way and also for terminal purposes, sidings, stations, &c.

The Act of 1888 was rather innocent and harmless in appearance, but you will see how it has been developed. In 1890, by Chap. 63 of the British Columbia Statutes, the time was extended for the commencement of this undertaking to three years from 26th of April, 1890, which brought it to April, 1893, and for the completion and equipment five years was allowed, which would be April, 1895.

In 1890, by Chap. 40, the company were granted 20,000 acres per mile, to be paid on the completion of each twenty mile section, provided the gauge was 4 feet 8½ inches, but if less than that, the grant was to be 10,000 acres per mile, and the company was to be allowed a royalty of 5 per cent on the value of all gold and silver, over and above working expenses, mined on the company's land grants.

It will be seen how the thing was developing. In 1891, by Chap. 56 of British Columbia Statutes, the name, Crow's Nest and Kootenay Lake Railway, was changed into the British Columbia and Southern Railway, and the new company was given the same power to construct a line from the Crow's Nest to Lake Kootenay. Some hon. members perhaps do not know that the Crow's Nest Pass is not altogether in the province of British Columbia, but quite a portion of it is in the Territories. This British Columbia Southern Railway's franchise began on the very summit of one of the peaks in the Crow's Nest Pass, on the boundary between British Columbia and the North-west Territories, or, in other words as far east as it could possibly go. Thus in 1891 the same power was given to this British Columbia Southern road to construct through the Crow's Nest Pass to Kootenay Lake, and in addition from Lower Kootenay River to the Columbia River, Fort Sheppard, with a branch line to Nelson via Salmon River, and also to construct a railway from Columbia River, near Fort Sheppard, to Hope, which is a town on the confines of my constituency in New Westminster district, thence to New Westminster, and Burrard Inlet, also a branch line from Elk River to Tobacco Plain near the 49th parallel.

In 1891, when the name was changed, the charter at that time, which began so obscure in 1888, swept the whole gamut, as it were, from the summit of the Crow's Nest Pass Mountain, on the boundaries of the North-west Territories, down to the Gulf of Georgia on the extreme western boundary of the constituency of New Westminster.

In 1891, the 5 per cent in gold and silver ores was struck out.

In 1893, the British Columbia Southern Railway Company was permitted, as an alternative route to the line from Cranbrook to the Lower Kootenay River, authorized by former legislation, to construct from Cranbrook to Pilot Bay, on Kootenay Lake, or to the Lardo River by way of St. Mary's River.

These names may mean little or nothing to hon. gentlemen, but if any one will take the map of the Kootenay district and trace out these different places, Lardo, Tobacco Plains, Kootenay Lake and Crow's Nest Pass, he will find that this charter will cover a vast extent of valuable mineral and agricultural portions of British Columbia. Now, this Act of 1893 repeals section 4 of the Act of 1890, which reads :

"That this company shall commence the construction of the work on or before three years, and shall complete and equip the same on or before five years from passing of this Act; time being declared material and of the essence of the contract under which this Act is passed," and enacts in lieu thereof that the company shall construct and equip the eastern section of the railway on or before 31st December, 1896, the central section by 31st December, 1897, and the western section by 31st December, 1898.

The 31st of December has come and gone and nothing has been done by this company. The 31st of December, 1897, is approaching, and doubtless it will pass without anything being done and probably the same may be said for the 31st of December, 1898. The schedule of the Act defines what portions of the railway are contained in each section. They are :

A.—The eastern section is to commence "at the junction of Summit Creek with Michel Creek, thence by way of Michel Creek, Elk River and the Upper Kootenay River to the 49th parallel and the Tobacco Plains.

B.—The central section is to commence "at a point on the Elk River near the junction of the Elk River with the Kootenay River, thence in a northerly direction to a point at or near Cranbrook, thence by the Moyee Pass to the Lower Kootenay River, or by the alternative route from Cranbrook by way of St. Mary's River to Pilot Bay on Kootenay Lake or to Lardo River."

C.—The western section shall consist of "that portion of the railway commencing from the western terminus of the central section to the coast by the most convenient route, to a favourable place for crossing the Fraser River to the city of New Westminster, thence to a suitable terminus on Burrard Inlet, and shall include the branch line to Nelson via Salmon River."

This 1893 Act also grants the company many additional powers, the most important of which are operating lumber mills, working mines of all kinds, erecting and running smelters, operating tramways, electric plants, petroleum works, etc. In 1893, by chapter 36, further provisions were made for a land subsidy in aid of the British Columbia Southern Railway, namely, 20,000 acres for each mile of railway to be constructed in the Eastern and Central sections, that is to say, from Crow's Nest Pass to Pilot Bay, Kootenay Lake, or to the Lardo River. This land to be taken in East and West Kootenay. It will be observed that the Act in effect doubles the land grant if gauge of railway is less than 4 feet 8½ inches, as the Act of 1890, chap. 34, gave the company 10,000 acres for any gauge less than 4 feet 8½ inches. The Act which is most attacked and which was the most important in this matter is the Act of 1894. The title of this Act is "The British Columbia Southern Railway Aid Act, 1894," from 1888 to 1894 they were getting concessions and extensions of time ad lib. In 1894 the capacious maw of these people had not been satisfied, and in 1894 they had this Act passed which enacts :

That the grant in favour of the British Columbia Southern Railway authorized by the Railway Aid Act, 1890, as amended by an Act to make further provision for a land subsidy for and in aid of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company, is hereby extended and applied to the several sections of said railway, as described in subsections A, B and C of section 8 of the British Columbia Southern Railway Act, 1894.

This application of the land grant to subsection C, grants 20,000 acres to the company from Pilot Bay or the Lardo River to Burrard Inlet, and in addition 20,000 acres for a branch line to Nelson via Salmon River. That made 9,000 miles at 20,000 acres per mile, a total of something like 18,000,000 acres. It is true as the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) reminded the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), this was amended subsequently, but that does not alter the fact that the legislature, in passing such an Act was culpably, if not criminally negligent. What was their answer to the discovery of the fact that this land grant extended from the Crow's Nest Pass to the Coast? It was that they did not intend that it should have such a scope, that it was a clerical error. It was not discovered until the press and the adherents of this Administration had pointed out to the amazed public of British Columbia the tremendous concessions granted—not in the dark, I admit, for these things were done with usual notice to the public; but in some inexplicable way nobody had commented on the concessions made until last year. Then the Government came up and said in the blindest way: We have no intention whatever of acting upon our powers under this Act. We are too moral, politically, for that. This is a clerical error and we will amend it. But not until they were coerced into it under threat of public opprobrium, did they amend the Act which, I am sorry to say, together with other legislative vagaries, is making the legislature of British Columbia the laughing stock of the Dominion of Canada to-day. That was in 1894. Though they have rectified that clerical error, still the concessions made to that company are very great indeed, and it will be for this House to decide whether they are so monopolistic as to justify this Government in supporting a policy of disallowance. Now, in 1894, by the chapter 53, these Acts and amendments were consolidated, and all former Acts referring to the company were repealed except those granting lands, and section 25 of 51 Victoria, chapter 44, which deals with belts of timber from the Dominion Government. In this consolidated Act the capital of the company is fixed at $4,000,000, with power to increase. Of this capital an unlimited part, paid up, can be issued to "persons who have been and are engaged in promoting the undertaking." It is made a matter of comment that a member of the local legislature is interested in the promotion of this charter, and the fact is used against that gentleman that under this clause this paid up stock can be given to persons engaged in promoting the undertaking. The people of British Columbia fear, inasmuch as members of the Government of British Columbia are interested in this company's concessions, that unless this Government steps in and protects what they conceive to be public interest, their rights will not be conserved. The Act further goes on :

A.—The eastern section is to be completed by 31st December, 1896.

B.—The central section is to be completed by 31st December, 1897.

C.—The western section is to be completed by 31st December, 1898.

But the failure to complete any more of the said sections within the time limited for the completion of the same respectively, shall not prejudice the rights, powers or privileges of the company in respect of such part or parts (if any) of the section or sections as to which such failure shall be made as shall at the expiration of such limited time be made and completed. Unrestricted power is given the company to lease or sell out to any railway company whose line connects with the railway of the company.

I direct special attention to this :

Unrestricted power is given the company to lease, or sell out, to any railway company whose line connects with the railway of the company.

I am not specifying any particular company which will be given this privilege, but it is quite obvious to the House to which company the allusion is made :

This consolidated Act does not require any portion of the $4,000,000 capital to be subscribed and paid up, other than that each of the directors shall hold ten shares of $100 each, on which all calls due are paid.

In 1896 comes the Act which is referred to in the Notice of Motion. You will see that from 1888 to 1894 these amendments and additions were being made without interruption. In 1893, Chap. 55 recites :

That the British Columbia Southern Railway Company has petitioned for an extension of time, and section 1 enacts that the company shall construct and equip the eastern section by 31st December, 1898, the central section by 31st December, 1899, and the western section by 31st December, 1900.

It will be observed that the company is not required to commence construction of the different sections at fixed dates or to expend a certain sum annually. The Act only deals with the dates for completion of the different sections.

1896. Chap. 4.—Confirms the right of the company to 20,000 acres per mile for a 3-foot narrow-gauge railway from Crow's Nest Pass to Burrard Inlet, if constructed and equipped within the extended times granted for the several sections by Chap. 53, 1896, but free miners' rights are reserved to search for minerals and acquire claims in the company's land grant in accordance with the mining laws of the province.

Now, Sir, those are the facts. Those are the pieces of legislation against which the people of British Columbia are to-day crying out. That Act of 1896 extending the time for doing these certain works under this piece of legislation, is the Act which it is asked to have disallowed. As I said before, having regard to the constitutional aspect of it—and personally I cannot ignore that—it is for this House to consider whether these facts as stated by my hon. friend from Vancouver and as recapitulated by myself, are sufficient to justify this Government in exercising the prerogative of veto. I have no doubt that the Government will carefully consider the matter, and will pursue a policy which would have been characteristic of them had they been in power in the past, and which will still characterize them now that they are in power. Whether this Act is disallowed or not, the country will doubtless consider that the Government will have done the best they could in the premises; and I have no doubt that in whatever action they take they will refrain from invading any principle of the constitution.

Mr. SPROULE. Public attention has lately been directed very keenly to this British Columbia Southern Railway charter, and the scheme or schemes connected with it for building up that section of the country; and I would not consider myself as faithful to my duty as a public man, or as a member of this House, were I not to say something on the question now that it has come before the House. If we believe but a fraction of what we have seen in the press lately, we must come to the conclusion that manipulations are going on in connection with this scheme that will not be for the benefit of either British Columbia and the North-west Territories, or of Canada as a whole. Now, while saying that, I am well aware that, according to our understanding of the constitutional right of the Dominion Government to veto provincial charters, we could hardly expect the Dominion Government to veto this charter. We have had some sharp controversies as to the power of provincial governments in chartering railway companies within their own domain, these questions having engaged the attention of Parliament a few years ago, and engaged it very strongly. Feeling became so strong in the province of Manitoba that it was stated the province was almost on the verge of rebellion when the Dominion Government disallowed their charter. For the Dominion Government to do the same in British Columbia would certainly be objectionable in the same way. But I do not apprehend that it is essentially necessary for the Dominion Government to disallow that charter in order to secure the rights of the people of that country; because, while that charter was given by the British Columbia legislature it could only give the right to build railways within its own domain, and that railway could not connect with any other railway outside its domain, nor could it traverse any portion of the North-west Territories without coming to this House for authority to do so; and, therefore, when they do come, as I understand they are about to do, the Government have it in their power to make such restrictions as will compel them to do what is right, or else refuse to grant them the powers which they ask in the charter before this House. Now, this motion advises the disallowance of a charter of the British Columbia Southern Railway. I say if we believe a fraction of what we have heard lately, we would feel that the Dominion Government were justified in disallowing that charter if it was constitutional to do so. Is it a fact that one of the great daily papers of Toronto, the organ of one of the great parties in this country, is hypnotized, as has been alleged by some of its prominent stockholders being so directly interested in this British Columbia Southern Railway Company and another railway company, that they are endeavouring, through their paper, to control the policy of the Government with reference to that great question? Now that has been affirmed, and I have seen nothing in that great organ of the Reform party to disabuse the public mind of the impression that there is something concealed, something that we don't understand, something that the public ought to know and the Parliament of Canada ought to know before they can deal intelligently with this question. The history of this railway is sufficient to make us suspicious about it. It was stated by one of the members from that province that various charters had been granted from time to time for commencing and completing the railway. But as the company were then unable to raise capital abroad, that was given as a reason why there was nothing wrong in this charter being renewed from time to time. In answer to that it was stated that it was only within the last few months that the interest in that country has become so great, and the mining development is so rapid that the attention of the capitalists of the world has been directed to it, and now they are willing to invest their money in an enterprise which they would not have been willing to do a few years ago. Now it is an easy matter to raise the money. Well, I believe that is a fact, and as an evidence, I need only read a small portion of the last report of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Speaking of their intention to build a road in that country, they say :

Your directors are strongly of the opinion that any delay in securing your interests in that direction will be extremely dangerous—that unless your company occupies the ground, others will, the demand for shipping and travelling facilities being most urgent. The directors feel that they cannot too strongly urge the immediate construction of a line from Lethbridge to a connection with your Columbia and Kootenay Railway at Nelson, a distance of 325 miles, and anticipating your approval, they have already taken steps towards commencement of the work on the opening of spring.

It is quite evident they have gone carefully over the ground before coming to this conclusion, because if they did not do so, some other railway would occupy it. While they appear to be so anxious to occupy the ground and appear to be prepared to make a large expenditure for the purpose of reaching that section of country, at the same time they are applying to the Government and the country for a very large subsidy, I am told, for the purpose of assisting in building that railway. It is for this House to consider whether that subsidy when proposed is excessive, as the hon. gentleman states it would be in his resolution, which sets out :

The grants and privileges so extended are unwarranted and grossly extravagant.

If we can believe what we have heard, we must come to the conclusion that they are grossly extravagant. It continues :

They are made without the interests of the public being properly safeguarded, and include rights the alienation of which from the control of the people will retard the development of the country and prevent a general enjoyment of its advantages ; (b) The said Act, if continued in force, would create such a monopoly in land, coal, and transportation, as would prove dangerous to the development and prosperity of the said province and to the interests of Canada generally.

If we believe what we hear, we must come to the conclusion that the true policy for the Government to pursue is to examine all phases of the question before deciding whether they will ask Parliament and the country to grant subsidies of large sums of money or extensive areas of land. We have had an experience with respect to monopolies in the great west to cause us to be extremely careful either in regard to extending monopolies or giving control of large areas of land. If it be the fact that this is the only pass through the mountains by which a railway can be successfully run, it is all the more important on that account that we should be very careful whether we extend that monopoly or not. It is a fact that if the railway is built by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and they exercise the same influence over the traffic of British Columbia as they have done over the traffic of the country through which the road is at present operated, it will be found to be in British Columbia, as it was in Manitoba, a burning monopoly, which the people will be very glad to get rid of before very long. The Government are therefore amply justified in moving very carefully and slowly before they give that company the power which will enable them to extend their monopoly, which is already stated to be very injurious to the country. Is it in the interest of the country that what has so often been declared to be an injurious monopoly should be extended? That is a question for the Government and the House to consider. Is it in the interest of the country that it should be extended; is it in the interest of the country that the people should be burdened with debt to supplement what is claimed to be a very extravagant offer made by British Columbia for the building of the road? Since the mining development in British Columbia has become so extensive and so interesting, a keen demand for coal for mining purposes has arisen, and if the large and extensive deposits of coal have become more interesting and valuable, and what might not have represented to capitalists much value a few years ago may represent an immense value to-day, the Government should scrutinize the matter before we take a step in the dark which may lead to binding up the resources of the country, retarding development and thus doing injustice to the people of that country. An hon. gentleman who spoke against the motion asked, Has the Government constitutional power to disallow that Act? Having regard to the principles which the Government have always followed in regard to the disallowance of provincial charters, I do not think they have power to disallow that Act. But if they have not the power to disallow it, they have the power in their own hands of preventing the amalgamation of the company with any other company that would give them a monopoly over the trade of the country for all time, because while the British Columbia Southern Railway Company has power to amalgamate with another company, no power to amalgamate with it is possessed by any other company, and before Parliament pass an Act permitting the amalgamation, the Government would be amply justified in exercising caution in that regard and going very slowly. The hon. gentleman said there are more coal beds than one. There may be; but this coal bed referred to may be very much enhanced in value on account of its location. The reports in regard to this extensive coal area are almost fabulous. If one-fourth of the area reported really exists, the coal beds should pay for the building of the road ten times over, without calling for any assistance from the country. Then, the grant of 20,000 acres of land per mile is a very important consideration. We know what has been the effect of such grants in the North-west. We know that although much has been done for the country in the direction of development, very large tracts of lands are held by railway companies and other corporations, and this fact has largely tended to deter new comers from settling there. Although that country consists of alluvial soil and fertile plains, and you would naturally imagine it would be an El Dorado for farmers, they are not settling there in as large numbers as might be expected. When a stranger visiting the country sees the land for a distance of 20 miles from the railroad still unsettled, he naturally commences to reason with himself as to the cause. When he finds a settler is compelled to go back beyond the railway belt in order to obtain free land, he begins to think there is something radically wrong as he has to go so far back to get a free homestead. It is claimed by some people that the Government would be justified in buying up all the land now vacant and throwing it open for free homesteads, and that this must be done before we will be able to settle up the country. If that is our experience in the North-west, we must be very careful before we allow any company to get control of a grant of 20,000 acres of land per mile for building the railway. It is true that the Dominion does not give the land. British Columbia gives the land, and if it desires to make that grant to a railway company for such purposes the province can do so. But the Dominion Government can exercise such control over that railway corporation as will in a large measure safeguard the rights of the people beyond the extent to which they may be affected by that charter. The hon. member stated that there are four other passes through which a railway can be built. It may be so. But when two railways are constructed through that country they will prove ample for the trade for some time to come, and that fact would be sufficient to deter capitalists embarking their capital in the construction of other roads through that expensive country for railway building. It is not an argument that because there are other passes available, this Parliament should allow this road to go through the Crow's Nest Pass and not raise its voice against it. Under these considerations the Government should look into this question carefully, and not allow the country's interests to be bartered away for the advantage of people who are ready to do whatever will bring money into their own pockets. The very fact, as appears from the public press, that some members of this honourable House and the Senate are directly interested, and that some members who control public organs have either muzzled or hypnotized those organs, so that they have not come out boldly on this subject, leads me to express the opinion that the Government should be very careful before they hand over this undertaking to a corporation and extend a monopoly already declared to work injuriously, and which if extended will be injurious to the extent of the power placed in its hands.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, as the constitutional phase of this question concerns principally the members from the province of British Columbia, I did not wish to speak until they had delivered their views on the subject. But I may say that this matter eminently affects the interests of the constituency that I represent, and it is my duty, representing the interests of my constituents, to express my views on this motion. I can assure the House that however strong the language that has been used by hon. gentlemen speaking on this motion, that language does not express to the full the sentiments of the people I represent. These hon. gentlemen have not in any way exaggerated the strength of the feeling in the western country against this British Columbia Southern Railway. Speaking as to the constitutional side of the question, I shall be brief. I entirely appreciate the fact that the leaders of the Liberal party have always taken ground in favour of what we call provincial rights, and I wish to say that I am a supporter of provincial rights. I believe that to be one of the strong points in the policy of the Liberal party, and I believe that it is one of the guarantees of confederation. Inasmuch as the party on this side of the House is in favour of provincial rights, and in so far as I am in favour of provincial rights, I am bound to understand that the Liberal party is against provincial wrongs, and this is a provincial wrong. There have been agitations hitherto in regard to the disallowance of railway charters. The Government of Canada has in times past disallowed certain railway Acts, but that disallowance was for the prevention of the building of railways, whereas this disallowance, if the Bill is disallowed, would be calculated to promote the building of railways as has been very well shown by hon. gentlemen who represent the province concerned. Those who ask for the disallowance of this Act do not so ask because they are against railway development, but on the contrary, because they are in favour of railway development. It would appear, then, that it is a necessity for the development of railways in that territory that this charter should be disallowed. There is a geographical feature of the case which has not been touched upon by gentlemen who have spoken, and to which I desire to refer. A certain section of this proposed Crow's Nest Pass Railway will develop not only the coal area that has been spoken of, and the petroleum area that has been spoken of, but will also develop a gold-bearing area which has not been referred to and which it is absolutely certain is at least equal, if it is not superior, to Rossland and Cariboo. I refer to the East Kootenay or Fort Steele gold-bearing region. That district is at present practically unworked, and it must necessarily remain unworked, if it is not reached by a railway. It is to develop the gold mines of that district that this railway is absolutely necessary. Let me emphasize the statement of the hon. member for Westminster (Mr. Morrison) that a certain grant of land goes with the construction of a certain portion of this railway and that a certain section of that road can be built from the Crow's Nest Pass to the boundary line which would develop the coal and petroleum areas and the gold-bearing area as well, and which would carry the whole traffic from those regions across the line into the United States. That can be done and for all we know will be done under this charter of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. Hon. gentlemen in this House who may be inclined to look upon this as a question affecting British Columbia alone, ought to take note of that fact. As in the case of Rossland and as in the case of Slocan, our trade from this district is liable to be carried across the line, and the wealth of our mines may possibly be diverted so as to build up the commercial interests of United States cities, and to afford a market to farmers. The prospective position in this case is exactly the same as the actual condition of things existing in Rossland and the Slocan. I care not how thoroughly any hon. member of this House may consider this to be a provincial question, I ask him to consider whether it is not in the interests of his locality that the trade of this richest portion of the Dominion of Canada, and probably the richest mining region in the world, should be done in his country. It is a long way from Ottawa to Slocan, a long way from Ottawa to Rossland, and a long way from here to Fort Steele. These are merely geographical expressions to a large number of members in this House; but let me put the case before hon. gentlemen in this way: The debt of the Dominion of Canada runs into the hundreds of millions, and the taxation is a considerable number of dollars per capita on the people. The gentlemen who perpetually turn that side of the question outwards seem to think that there is no remedy. They seem inclined to sit down and cry about the existing state of affairs. They blame somebody or something for the cause of this, but they do not propose any remedy. Now, what is the remedy? If you and I to-day are paying more taxes than we ought to pay, the easiest and the only remedy is to get somebody to develop the undeveloped wealth in this country, so as to increase the number of our tax-paying population and so help us to pay the taxes. In this way benefit will come to every citizen of Canada by the development of the mining region of British Columbia. It will increase the number of taxpayers, and so will lighten the burden on those who are now paying the taxes.

The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) read a large number of figures setting forth the revenue that was derived directly from the province of British Columbia, chiefly from customs duties. Although he made out a most excellent case from the figures he read, those figures were entirely misleading, if he will pardon my saying so, as to the facts of the case. They did not represent by any means the actual amount of customs duties collected by the Dominion of Canada on behalf of the people of British Columbia, because the duties upon the trade of British Columbia with eastern Canada are paid in eastern Canada to a very great extent, and are credited to the cities of eastern Canada. You can put the case in either the one way or the other. You can say if you like that the eastern cities of Canada do not do business with British Columbia, and that, therefore, they do not collect the duties that properly arise out of that trade. In that case I say that above everything it is necessary that provision should be made so that those cities may be able to do the trade. Surely none of our eastern cities or our eastern manufacturers or commercial houses are doing so much business that it would not be good for them to do more. Surely the same trade that builds up the city of Spokane in a few years and makes it to-day one of the most prosperous, if not the most prosperous city in the United States, would be good if distributed amongst the cities of eastern Canada. I do not say this because British Columbia needs my championship. She has able champions here. I speak on behalf of the west at large, which, because of the small amount of duties collected at its customs ports, is held to be a burden upon the Dominion. If the customs duties from the whole of that western country do not pay its expenses, I have only to point out that it is not the amount collected at the customs ports of the west that has to be considered; it is not the amount which they import direct or the amount which the eastern houses import direct and send to them; but it is also the amount manufactured or produced in the east and sent to the people of the west. In all these ways the wealth of the country is increased, so that the development of any part of the west, the turning to account of something that has hitherto been of no account, is of direct as well as indirect financial value to every man in the whole Dominion, whether he lives at one end of it or the other. It is of value to him in lightening his burden of taxation. It is of value to him in the widening of his business.

As to the right of the Government of the Dominion to step in and disallow this provincial legislation, I agree with the last speaker that if the tenth part of what has been stated here to-night is true, the Government would not be justified in doing anything else than procuring some change in the present arrangements. A great many hard words have been used against the British Columbia legislature for its action in this matter. I do not altogether agree with those hard sayings. The British Columbia legislature was in a certain position and acted under a certain condition. That condition I hope and believe was changed on the 23rd of June last—this chartering of railways, and this granting of land and bonuses of one kind and another, when there did not appear to be any possibility of inaugurating any other system for the development of the country by means of railways. The British Columbia Government, we may suppose, was earnestly desirous of developing the country, and the only way of doing so which appeared possible up to that time was to grant its lands, its minerals, its anything and everything, to any company or body of men who wished to develop the country. It is my hope, at any rate, that there was a change in the conditions on the 23rd of June last, and that a new idea took precedence in this Dominion on that date. I hope that the idea that it was necessary to grant away every right and privilege that belonged to the people in order to get railway communication died on that day, and that the new idea became paramount that the people of this country were entitled to all the benefits and resources of the country—that no longer were the people to work for the railroads, but that the time had come when the railroads had to work for the people. The British Columbia legislature, having passed this monopoly legislation under what appeared to be an irremediable and irrevocable system of monopoly, may now, and in all probability will, be willing to reconsider their legislation, and to meet the Dominion Government half-way, at any rate on new lines, in conformity with the new idea which I hope took precedence on the 23rd of June last.

I said in the beginning that I was in favour of provincial rights. I have supported the Liberal policy of provincial rights against the policy of provincial wrongs. So, while I hold that the Dominion Parliament has the power of disallowance, and the right if need be to exercise that power, still in this case I am in favour of applying the idea of the hon. leader of the Government in favour of the sunny ways of conciliation rather than coercion. This is another case in which I believe negotiations might well be entered into between the Dominion Government and the provincial Government for the advancement of the common good. I think it is well that the case should be presented here as strongly as it has been to-day, with the view of showing to the country and to the Government of the Dominion how strongly the people of the west feel on this matter. Not that there shall be any wrenching of the constitution, not that there shall be any violence done to the feelings of any province, but that the Government, appreciating the gravity of the situation, and the necessity of action in the case, shall forthwith take such action as shall lead to the conservation of the rights, not of British Columbia, not of Alberta, but of the whole Dominion of Canada. Mr. Speaker, if we had Johannesburg situated within a few hundred miles of Ottawa, how fortunate we should be. What would we not give to have such valuable mines at our doors; and is it not a fact—it is a fact, an established fact—that in the Kootenay country we have mines far richer and more extensive than those of Johannesburg. Then, are we to stand still while our good friends—our commercial rivals, and, I am sorry to say, not our commercial friends in any way—in the United States are reaping the benefits of the natural resources of our own country. It is a position that appears to me intolerable; and certainly we who live in the west cannot understand that such a position can continue or have the support of any Government in this country.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise for the purpose of supporting the motion that has been moved by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes). I think it necessary that each member from that province should express himself with regard to this motion, and lest it might be suspected that I was not in sympathy with it, I feel obliged to say a few words in indorsement on what has already been so well said by my hon. friends who have spoken. It is particularly pleasing to us who come from that far off province to see how deeply interested the members of this House are in a question particularly affecting that province, and I am sure that we are indebted to those hon. members who have supported us in this matter. It is very noteworthy that the only voice which has been heard in this House against this motion is that of a gentleman who is deeply interested in its passing, and I think it would have been better for him, it would have shown a finer taste, and considerable common sense, if he had held his tongue, instead of rising to support what we all regard as a thing which is detrimental to the well being of our province. It may be asked, why have we come here at all? I believe, in common with other speakers, in provincial rights, and I am willing on all occasions, in which the province expresses its will in a fair and just manner, to abide by the decision of the province, but this is the position in which we are at present in British Columbia. We have had a considerable fight out there for a just and fair representation. At present the people of that province are not represented at all in a fair or just way. We have constituencies so cut up, that places with 200 electors send a member to the provincial Parliament, while constituencies made up of 18,000 send only three members, so that at the present time, in order to suit the purposes of a sort of a family who have been governing that province for a number of years, the province has been put up in just such a way as will suit their interests when questions such as this comes before the local House. Now, it is because the voice of the people has not been expressed, it is because the people have not had a fair chance of expressing themselves with regard to this question, that we have felt compelled to bring this matter before the Government here and to ask them to disallow an Act which is detrimental to the future prosperity of British Columbia. An hon. member suggested a policy of conciliation. Now, if there were the slightest hope or prospect of anything being done by conciliation, I would at once say: go on with that policy; but I tell you, Sir, that the present Government in British Columbia is too far steeped in this particular policy to do anything that will interfere with the material interests of its friends at present. They know that their end is very near, and I believe they will stick to this legislation for the purpose of benefiting those who have stood at their backs so loyally in the days of their prosperity. I am glad that this question has been brought up, and I tell the Government frankly that it is the desire of all their friends in British Columbia that they should disallow this legislation. But if the Government feel that because of the policy which has been more or less accepted and acted upon during the past, it would be unwise on their part to interfere in provincial matters, I hope that they will at least give us their sympathy, and assure us that if it had not been for this policy they would have supported our demand on this question. If there is no hope that we can do anything at present, I hope that, if not here, at least in the Railway Committee or in some other way, we will yet have the opportunity afforded us of doing something to obstruct this policy which will be ruinous to all that we hold so dear, so far as our province is concerned. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the interest taken in this matter, and I hope that, while we have made this a sort of British Columbia day, from the picture which has been presented to you by my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes), you will realize there is something at stake, that a grievous wrong has been committed, that something has been done that should not have been done, and that we, as representatives of the people, ought in some way to bring the matter before you, and if the Government is not able to do what we desire, we will not exactly blame them for it, but at the same time it will be a comfort for us, who are fighting the battle of the people out there, to know that we have the sympathy of the House and especially the sympathy of the Government, and that they will do all that in them lies to preserve the interests of the people of that enterprising and prosperous province.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I do not seek to minimize in the slightest degree the great importance of the question which the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) brought before this House so ably this afternoon. I had the pleasure of hearing the first half of his address, but, to my great regret, was called away during the latter portion. The hon. gentleman asked the House to adopt a resolution calling upon the Government to disallow the British Columbian and Southern Railway Act of 1896, on the ground that the legislation was of a very improvident character. While we have had a great many discussions in this House as to the circumstances under which the central Government can be justified in disallowing an Act of a provincial legislature, there are certain rules which, I think, are tolerably well understood by hon. gentlemen on both sides with reference to the exercise of such a power. We all agree that where there is a clear invasion of Dominion jurisdiction by a provincial legislature, a fair case is made out for disallowance by the Dominion Government. And it has been asserted, and I think it is pretty well established and is now received as the better authority, that in all cases, even when the subject matter is within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislature, if there is a clear interference with Dominion interests or if the vital interests of Canada as a whole, clearly and imperatively call for interference, that interference ought to take place. But it is perfectly clear that the Act of the local legislature of British Columbia was within their powers. Nobody doubts that. In order that we might be justified in interfering at all with a legislation of that kind, we must be satisfied that there is a great and manifest necessity pressing upon this Dominion Government to interfere and disallow the Bill. Well, I am not going to say whether that state of facts exists or not. I listened with very great pleasure to the constitutional definitions of my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Morrison) and the limits he placed upon the exercise of this power by the general government, and, to a very large extent, I agree with what he says. I was pleased to see that he devoted himself, to some extent, from his standpoint, to show that this legislation does come within the class that the Dominion Government is justified in interfering with. But we must draw a clear distinction in this matter. Mere improvident legislation, I care not how improvident it may be, when it is clearly within the scope of the powers of the local legislature, does not call for nor justify interference on the part of the Dominion Government, unless vital interests of the Dominion are at stake which we are imperatively called upon to protect. It can be shown in this case that the legislature acted clearly within their power. No one denies that. The granting of 10,000 acres or 20,000 acres of land per mile to promote railway extension is purely a provincial matter over which they have exclusive jurisdiction, and, before we can exercise the prerogative of disallowance, we must be clear beyond the shadow of a doubt that there are vital Dominion interests of a paramount character at stake, that justify this interference.

I am sure that the Government will take the facts that have been laid before the House so ably to-night into their sympathetic consideration, and will look at them from all sides. I may say that there has not been a whisper to the Government in favour of disallowance until my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) made his speech to-day. There has not been a petition from any public body or from a single individual in British Columbia asking the Government to exercise its power of disallowance. Hon. gentlemen will see, under these circumstances, that the matter calls for very grave and careful consideration before the Government can assume to interfere. Hon. gentlemen know that, the history of the past with reference to disallowance by the Dominion Government by provincial legislation has not been such as to induce us to go one inch further than we have gone. The party I have the honour to belong to have made themselves hitherto the champions of provincial rights in this respect. We may be trusted not to go back on our record in this regard. This subject having been brought to the attention of the Government for the first time to-day, I will ask that it be allowed to rest until the Government have an opportunity to consider their attitude. As to the very important question of a railway through the Crow's Nest Pass, I will not say a word further than this, that it will not be very long before the policy of the Government on this matter will be announced, and it would be exceedingly imprudent for me to anticipate the announcement of that policy. Expressing my thanks to the hon. gentleman who made the motion and his hon. confreres who supported him so ably, I would venture to say, and I think I am expressing the general opinion of the House, that this debate should be adjourned so that hon. members may have the opportunity of reading the statements made in the "Hansard," and when it comes before the House we will be in a better position to deal with it than we are at present. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all calls for tenders and specifications for the same and detailed answers thereto made since the last session of Parliament in respect of the printing of Government notes, stamps, &c., of all correspondence in connection therewith had with the Government or any member thereof and with the Minister of Finance or the officers of his department, copies of all reports made thereon to the Minister of Finance and to Council, together with all minutes of Council passed in relation thereto, and a copy of the contract entered into between the Government and the successful tenderer.—(Mr. Foster.)

Return giving the names of all commissioners appointed by the Government or any of the Ministers to hear charges and make investigations into the conduct of civil servants and employees of the Government or any of the departments since July, 1896, together with the rate of pay and allowances of each and the length of time each has been employed, and the full amount paid; also copies of all reports made by them to the Government, or any member thereof, and copies of the authorization and instructions under which they acted.—(Mr. Foster.)

Return giving the names of all postmasters and other persons in the employ of the Government in the counties of King's and York, New Brunswick, who have been dismissed since July, 1896, and all correspondence in connection therewith.—(Mr. Foster.)

Return showing how many convicts were liberated from the different penitentiaries in Canada since the month of July, 1896; giving their names, why they were convicted, and showing why they were liberated, and the names of those who obtained their pardon for them; also the names of those whose sentences were commuted.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Copies of all correspondence relating to the retirement of Messrs. Bompas, Bischoff & Co., and the appointment of Mr. Charles Russell as solicitor for the Dominion Government in London.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all memorials, statements and other documents from the Government of the province of Manitoba in relation to an unsettled claim resulting from that province being charged with the cost of the erection of public buildings; with copies of all correspondence in connection therewith.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

Copies of all correspondence, papers, petitions, &c., in connection with the dismissal of Angus McPhee as postmaster at Hopefield, in the province of Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Martin.)

ADJOURNMENT—FRANCHISE BILL.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman who leads the House to-night what position the Government have arrived at in reference to the suggestion that I made as to the desirability of postponing the consideration of the Franchise Act. It is very important that the House should have a general idea of what is coming before it, and what measures are to be pressed. I took the opportunity on a former occasion of drawing the attention of the hon. the First Minister and his colleagues to the fact that no member of this House pretends that there is any immediate pressing necessity for a Franchise Act, and that no person doubts that the measure is one of very great importance and one to which it is not undesirable that a great deal of attention should be given. I hope, Sir, that the suggestion that I ventured to make, that the consideration of so contentious a measure as that undoubtedly must be, if submitted to the House at this time should be deferred to a more convenient season. If there had been any necessity for pressing this measure, if we were on the eve of a general election or anything of that kind, I could quite understand that hon. gentlemen opposite would naturally wish to put a law upon the Statute-book in conformity with the strong opinions and feelings which they on various occasions expressed in relation to the matter. But this is not the case. Moreover, a question waits solution at the hands of the Government which is of most vital importance to the whole people. This is demanded in the interests of a suffering country. We have now reached that season of the year when it is most necessary to the commercial classes of this country that they should have a basis of certainty for their transactions. They must make purchases for the season and they are losing most valuable time and being greatly embarrassed. It is consequently of the first necessity to the country that the Government should at least take the House and the country into their confidence as to what is going to be the fiscal policy of this country. I cannot understand how it is possible those gentlemen knowing and appreciating as I am sure the hon. members of the Government must appreciate, and as, I am certain, every member of this House on either side, and every intelligent man in the country appreciates the vital importance to Canada as having as early as possible an uncertainty which has been so prejudicial, and so damaging, which has so greatly injured the condition of the country from end to end, removed, should still prolong that uncertainty. And I must again ask my hon. friend opposite whether the Government will not take into consideration the suggestions I have ventured to throw out, with the desire to facilitate in every possible way from this side of the House of dealing with the questions of vital importance to the country and to postpone the consideration of questions that will not for a moment compare in pressing importance, until a future period. I should be very glad if my hon. friend was able to give any assurance that these suggestions, thrown out in the best possible faith, with the desire of assisting the Government and facilitating the consideration of measures that are absolutely indispensable in the public interest, will receive such favourable consideration as will enable us to deal with this great question upon which the interests of the country depend in so intense a degree.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I sympathize fully with the desire the hon. gentleman expresses that at the very earliest possible, reasonable time the policy of the Government with respect to the tariff should be announced. I had the pleasure of hearing the hon. gentleman's appeal to the Prime Minister, made the other day, pretty much in the line of the remarks which the hon. gentleman has made to-night. For myself I fail to see the signs of suffering which, in his mind, exists throughout the country because the tariff has not already been brought down. The hon. gentleman, I think, will do the Government the justice of saying that it would have been quite impossible for them to bring down the tariff already, even had they desired to do so. They did not lose a single moment of time in proceeding with the Government business; but the Opposition, in the exercise of their perfect rights—I do not question it at all—chose to debate the reply to the Address from Friday, when it was introduced, until late Friday night, when the House adjourned. The hon. gentleman knows that whatever disposition the Government might have had, and however ready they may have been to introduce and push forward any one of their measures, it was utterly impossible up to the present moment, absolutely and constitutionally impossible, that they could have taken the first step in that direction. Now, I may relieve the hon. gentleman's mind by telling him that which he knows—no man knows better, from the vast experience he has had in these matters—that in introducing a policy of this kind the Government, unless they have entirely lost their heads, and I do not think they have, desire to proceed with reasonable prudence and caution. They desire to consult from time to time, on some matters, with their leading friends. They are doing so, and it is their intention as soon as they can get it ready, which will be, I hope, at an early day, to lay that policy before the country. That may take some days yet, the hon. gentleman knows necessarily must take some days. But in the meantime, public business can be proceeded with, and one of the first measures which the Government thought it necessary to lay before the House and the country, was the proposition which they have advocated continually and consistently for so many years in Opposition, to abolish the late Franchise Act and introduce the one of which the hon. the Solicitor

General moved the first reading the other day. In the opinion of this House, Sir, it is highly important that that measure should be pressed to a speedy conclusion. I myself did indulge the hope, and I think that I have had the best grounds for indulging the hope, that upon this matter, whatever might have been the differences between the two parties in times gone by, these differences had all been healed. I recollect not very long ago that the gentlemen who then occupied these benches announced their conversion to the policy we had advocated; and when they themselves declared that there was an immediate necessity for the repeal of the old Franchise Act and going back to the provincial system, I thought from that time forth this question had ceased to be a contentious one. Well, Sir, it appears not; but however that may be, I understand that it is the Prime Minister's intention to press forward that Bill as speedily as the constitutional rules and usages of the House, and paying the greatest respect to the desire of the hon. gentleman from time to time for delay, if he wishes it, will permit. Therefore, I believe the second reading of the Bill will be moved to-morrow, and I suppose the next stage will be taken when the hon. gentleman has had the proper time for which he may ask, that of going into committee. But I regret to say that I am not able to give him any assurance that the Prime Minister has changed his mind from that which he declared the other day. At any rate, the leader is not here to-night, but I know I am expressing what his views were a few hours ago.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before putting that motion, I would like to remind the leaders on both sides of the House that when a motion is made to adjourn for the purpose of closing the business of the House, it is certainly not regular to make remarks as extended as those which have been made to-night by both hon. gentlemen. Questions and replies about the business of the House are of course in order; but I ask hon. members to endeavour to avoid discussing questions of policy, if possible, on a motion to adjourn the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 6th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE RATE OF INTEREST.

Mr. QUINN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 15) further to amend the Act respecting Interest.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain, please.

Mr. QUINN. This Bill provides that, whatever rate of interest is agreed upon, no greater rate than 6 per cent per annum shall be recoverable. In the Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 127, the Act respecting Interest, it is provided that any rate of interest may be exacted. We have had cases throughout the country, particularly in the city of Montreal, in which a rate of interest equal almost to 3,000 per cent per annum has been collected. There was one notable case in Montreal within the last few days, in which a man obtained a loan of $150, and was sued for, and was compelled to pay, in interest, the sum of $5,000 for the loan of $150. This Bill is to prevent the infliction of such a rate of interest upon persons needing money, and, at the same time, to protect persons lending money by providing that they shall be allowed interest at the regular legal rate of 6 per cent per annum. It would compel persons who wished to exact an exorbitant rate of interest to take it in the form of a discount, and deduct it from the face value of the note that was given. For example, if a lender wished to charge 75 per cent per annum for four months on a loan of $100, he would be obliged to deduct from the face value of the note $25, and give the borrower only $75; but if he allowed the term to expire, and was obliged to sue for the money, he could only collect the $100 with 6 per cent interest added. I think this is a very wise and necessary measure, and ought to be enacted.

The PRIME MINISTER. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question? Do I understand that under his Bill such a contract cannot be enforced except at the legal rate of interest, 6 per cent?

Mr. QUINN. That is the intention. At present, any rate of interest stipulated in the Act can be collected. The intention is to limit the collection to 6 per cent per annum, no matter what rate may be stipulated for.

Mr. McMULLEN. This appears to be rather a singular Bill. If we are going to have a usury law, and it is intended to apply to the whole Dominion, it is well that we should fully understand it. I have no objection myself to limiting the rate of interest. I quite admit that a great many people are subjected to great loss by notes being drawn at very heavy rates of interest. I notice that in the city of Montreal recently there was a case of from 2½ to 5 per cent per month being charged on a note which had been in existence for some time, and the judge felt himself compelled to give judgment for the entire amount, including the exorbitant rate of interest. I think it is well that there should be some law to reach cases of that kind; but whether it is wise or not to adopt a general usury law in Canada is another question. We know that there are usury laws in almost every state of the United States, but in every state they are over-ridden and evaded. In the state of New York there is a usury law, but it is not obeyed. It is found that these laws, in place of being of advantage to the borrowing public are, in many cases, a decided curse and nuisance. In Canada our people have a great deal, in my opinion, to be thankful for. Money, on good security, can be obtained as cheaply here as in any other colony of the British Empire, and it is questionable whether it is wise or prudent to disturb that condition of things. I do not for a moment challenge the sincerity of the hon. gentleman, and his desire to accomplish something in the right direction; but this is a very large question. The banking institutions of the country, as well as the money-lenders and money borrowers are interested in the question; and, in view of past experience in this country as well as in the United States, I question if it is wise at this time to disturb present arrangements by a measure of this kind. I presume that if the Bill goes to a second reading, we shall then have full explanations of it and a more extended debate upon its provisions.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved that the House resolve itself into committee to-morrow to consider the following resolution:—

That it is expedient to provide, with respect to the Bill now before the House intituled "An Act to provide for the abolition of the Civil Service Superannuation Act and for the retirement of members of the Civil Service:"—

(1.) That from the salary of every person to whom the said Act applies there shall be made a deduction of 5 per cent, which deduction shall form part of a "retirement fund," bearing interest, compounded half-yearly at 5 per cent per annum;

(2.) That in the case of every person now in the Civil Service whose salary has been subject, for less than ten years, to the deductions provided for by the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and of any person whose salary has been subject to such reduction for over ten years, but who elects to accept the provisions of this Act

instead of those of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, there shall be placed to his credit in such retirement fund a sum equal to the amount of the deductions so made from his salary, with interest, compounded half-yearly at 5 per cent per annum;

(3.) That upon the retirement, dismissal or death of any person to whom this Act applies the amount to his credit in the retirement fund shall be paid to him or to his heirs.

Motion agreed to.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock) moved second reading of Bill (No. 9) to provide for the abolition of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and for the retirement of members of the Civil Service.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. This Bill is not printed in French.

Mr. SPEAKER. That being the case, I am afraid, if the objection be persisted in, that I must rule the motion out of order.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I hope my hon. friend will not persist in his objection. Of course he is technically correct, and if he persists, it will be impossible to go on with the consideration of the Bill, and practically that will interrupt the business of the day. In former years, it was not considered any derogation or giving up of any right, which we have in this House, to have the Bills printed in the two languages, when, in order to expedite business, bills have been proceeded with which were printed in the one language only.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If this were the measure which the country is longing to see placed before it, if the proposal were to deal with the Budget, no technicalities could possibly be allowed to intervene, and we would be only too happy to meet my hon. friend opposite in any way we possibly could. But with regard to the measure which the hon. gentleman says is not going into operation for three or four years at least, I cannot understand why the salutary rule which has been adopted in this House should be waived.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. By way of explanation, I would say that I have not raised the point with a view of prolonging the business of the House, but simply because this Bill and the Bill relating to the franchise are two very important measures, which it would be unfair to ask us to discuss, without having them printed in both languages. Of course I can readily understand that, with regard to ordinary private Bills, we might allow the rule to be overlooked, but when two of the most important Bills that may be brought before this House, with the exception of the Supply Bill, are proposed for discussion, it is but fair that we should have them in both languages in order to be enabled to study them more thoroughly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not catch the title of the Bill of which the hon. gentleman moved the second reading. I thought it was the Franchise Bill and not the Superannuation Bill, but I may say with reference to the latter measure, that the extreme activity of the Government in relation to the matter of superannuation has disposed of any immediate necessity for that measure.

The PRIME MINISTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman wants to encourage further that activity of the Government and therefore does not want the Superannuation Act amended at all. The Opposition are quite within their rights, and if they choose to obstruct the business of the Government they can do so.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

The PRIME MINISTER. They are commencing very early. I may say that there has never been a session since confederation when business was so promptly brought before the House as this session. There has never been a session yet when, in the second week of the session, the Government was ready to proceed with the business for which Parliament was called and the measures announced in the Speech from the Throne ready for discussion. It is probable that, in the course of a few hours, perhaps a few minutes, this very Bill will be distributed in French. At all events, it is not now distributed, and if hon. gentlemen opposite choose to obstruct the business of the House they will take the consequence.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. I did not rise as a member of the Opposition at all. I simply rose to oppose going on with this Bill, until it was printed in both languages, as a member standing on his rights and prerogatives.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I may be allowed to say a word in reply to the assertion just made by the hon. Premier. I refer to his statement that there never was a session in which Government work was so advanced as it is this session. He has evidently not looked carefully into the records. I happened to-day, for the purpose of comparison, to be looking over the two years 1894 and the present year, and it so happens that in 1894 the Estimates were on the Table of Parliament one day and the Budget Speech was ready three days after the Address was disposed of, and would have been delivered but for an objection from the then Opposition. In spite of that objection, however, it was delivered, and the tariff was brought down eight days after the Address was adopted.

The PRIME MINISTER. With regard to the Estimates, I have to say this that but for the illness of my hon. colleague the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) the Estimates would have been laid on the Table to-day. I expected my hon. colleague to be here, but unfortunately, when he reached Boston, he was unable to proceed further. The Estimates will be down either this evening or to-morrow.

Mr. McMULLEN. While on this subject, I may give the dates on which the several Budget speeches were made from 1879 to the present, and the dates when Parliament met :

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend keep that under his hand, and after the Budget speech of this year is finished, he can complete the comparison.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have no doubt that all the hon. gentlemen who have spoken intend to confine themselves strictly to the point of order, and for that reason I did not interrupt them. If the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. LaRivière) persists in his point, we cannot go on.

ADJOURNMENT.—PUBLIC BILLS, ETC.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In that case I beg to move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would draw the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that it is quite unnecessary to adjourn the House for the want of public business. We have before us a large number of public Bills and orders, one of very pressing importance known as the Alien Labour Bill. It has been printed in both English and French. Last session, when this Bill was up, the hon. the Prime Minister asked me not to press the business further, but to leave it over, and I should be offered every opportunity of introducing it and should have his assistance in having it enacted into a law at the present session. I am prepared now to proceed with this measure. I think the House and the country demand the immediate passing of this Bill. I notice by the press that a friend of the Government has been put up to move a Bill similar to the one that stands in my name. That Bill is not yet printed in French. I have a copy of both Bills in English, and I notice that the Bill for my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) is word for word the same as the Bill I presented for several years, up to the eighth clause. Clauses 8, 9, 10 and 11 are additions, but there is a provision that these sections shall come into force only on the proclamation of the Governor General. I am quite willing that these four clauses be added—

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. member not to go into details of any Bill or measure on this motion to adjourn the House.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am arguing that we should not adjourn but should proceed to take up this Bill which is on the Order paper and which is printed in both languages.

The PRIME MINISTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has stated, and stated truly, that he has several times already presented the Bill to which he refers. It is within the memory of gentlemen who were in the last Parliament and the Parliament before that, that he brought this measure before the House almost every year. If my hon. friend had shown then, when he was on this side, the same diligence that he has shown to-day, his Bill would already have been made into law. But when his friends were in office he was not at all willing to press the Bill and he allowed it, again and again, on the suggestion of the Government not to press it forward. I told my hon. friend last session that this session I would help him with his Bill. I am ready to do so. But there are three or four Bills of the same nature before the House at this moment, and I suggest that it would be inadvisable to take up any of them at this moment. I suggest to my hon. friend, as I believe he has this subject at heart, that it would be conducive for the best interest of the cause he supports that all these Bills should be in possession of the House before one is taken up. I suppose my hon. friend will agree with me that the time is not opportune at present for pressing his Bill. There is also another consideration. This is a Government day, and we had intended to press the business of the Government, but we are prevented from doing so by a mere technical objection. My hon. friend can hardly find fault with the Government if there is reciprocity in this matter and if the Government does not see its way to help him along since we are met on the other side with so scant courtesy as we find.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that my hon. friend has been so short a time on that side of the House that he has hardly discovered yet that he is not still the leader of the Opposition. I think in the recollection of members of this House this is the first occasion on which the leader of the House has ever moved an adjournment of the House at this period in the session, and under the circumstances in which he has done it to-day. I do not believe in the records of Parliament you can find a single case in which such a step has been taken. Now, I think the House is entitled to know from the leader of the House his reasons for adjourning. If he says that a technical objection has been interposed, that is not strictly correct. It is one of the most fundamental and well-established rules of this House that an important Bill shall not be proceeded with unless it is printed in English and in French. I do not know that it is the position to-day, but on many occasions I have seen hon. gentlemen, very able and influential members of the House, who could not understand a word of the discussion in English. Therefore, I say that in case of an important measure—and this is a most important measure, affecting, as it does, the vital interests of a large body of the people of this country—I am sure the House would be disposed to consider it on its merits, and in the most candid and dispassionate way. I think hon. members of this House should have that important Bill before them in a condition in which they can more readily understand its purport than many of them can do if it is confined simply to the English language, because in such a case they are not in a position to give it that full and complete discussion and examination that is absolutely essential. I think that before asking this House to adjourn, as there is a large amount of private business on the paper which it is most important should be removed out of the way as early as possible, the hon. gentleman ought to take the House into his confidence and tell us why it is that for the first time in the history of this Parliament, the leader of the House, the First Minister, moves that the House adjourn immediately upon its meeting, and without assigning any reason whatever.

Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman has not done justice to my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) in relation to this Bill. He ought to remember that at the last session of this House, when my hon. friend moved this Bill, I joined with the leader of the House in asking him to allow it to remain over, and I did so for the purpose of enabling my hon. friend opposite to exercise those sunny influences, of which he is known to be a great master, with the Government of the United States, in the hope that no such Bill as this would become necessary, and in the hope that the hon. gentleman might have an opportunity of seeing what diplomatic intercourse would affect the Government of the United States before we resorted to such an extreme measure, on which we were so unwilling to adopt, but one which my hon. friend opposite and myself are equally pledged under the present conditions of things to pass. The hon. gentleman will remember that I joined with him in asking my hon. friend who moved the Bill not to press his measure until every opportunity had been given to the Government of the day to exhaust diplomatic intercourse for the purpose of avoiding the necessity of bringing such a Bill forward. I think my hon. friend is hardly right in taunting my hon. friend who is moving this Bill with not having been as desirous in pressing his measure at a previous session, when it is remembered that at the last session of this House that hon. gentleman refrained, at our joint request, from pressing his measure. I trust the hon. leader of the House will withdraw his motion for adjournment, and allow the business of this House, a great deal of which is before us, to be proceeded with.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). It is just as well that we should thoroughly understand the position in which we are, and how utterly futile is the technical objection which the hon. gentleman has taken. It is just as well that we should understand that this is a deliberate attempt on the part of at least one hon. gentleman opposite, and I think concurred in at least by the leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES—to prevent—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. What is the point of order?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman has accused a member on this side of the House, who has an equal right to his opinion with himself, with a deliberate attempt at obstruction because in order to—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. Allow me to finish my statement—because an hon. gentleman has attempted to act in his own right, and under a well-understood rule of the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman, as usual, has jumped before he came to the wall. I never made any charge of obstruction, or referred to obstruction at all. The hon. gentleman stopped me when I was at the beginning of my sentence, stopped me when I was at the beginning of a sentence of which he could not know the purport or the meaning, stopped me before he had heard one-half of the sentence uttered, and imputed to me that which I have no doubt he would have said had he stood in my place. I do not intend to charge what he says I did, I do not intend to charge an hon. gentleman with obstruction. I charged him with deliberately attempting to prevent the Government to-day from proceeding with the business which they have in hand. Now, that is not obstruction. It is just as well that the country should understand why the Government are not proceeding with their Bill. The hon. gentleman, the leader of the Opposition, attempted to insinuate that it was desirable in the case of important Bills of this kind that they should be printed in both languages in order that the House should fully understand them. Why, Sir, the Government were not asking the House to go into committee on these Bills; the Government were simply asking the House to discuss the principle of each of these Bills, the Superannuation Bill and the Franchise Bill; and after the House had discussed the principle of these Bills, then, in the ordinary way, a motion would have been made at a future day that the House go into committee, so that the details of the Bill might be thoroughly understood and discussed. No advantage was sought to be taken of the House or of hon. members. They might have had a week or ten days, or whatever reasonable time they asked, before discussing the Bills in both languages, and to look at the details, and to compare the clauses if they desired. Surely the motion which my hon. friend the Postmaster General made was simply for the second reading of the Bill, and a motion which every hon. gentleman knows is one which invites the House to assent to the principle of the Bill only, leaving the details over. But, curiously enough, while a Bill affecting our internal arrangements must, according to the hon. gentleman's argument, be printed in both English and French before it can be considered at all, the hon. gentleman gravely asks us to pass this by and not to do any Government business, and to proceed to the discussion of a private Bill affecting international relations between this country and the United States, while similar Bills of a cognate character are before the House, and not printed in the French language at all. How is it possible for his friends to understand the character of these two Bills, or of their relative importance, if they have not seen them in French? Why, take the hon. gentleman's own argument, and it is conclusive. The Government should not proceed with their Bills because they are not printed in both English and French; but here is a class of Bills which are printed, one of them at least, in only one language, and the Opposition asks us to proceed with these and leave the Government Bills alone.

Mr. McDUGALL. What about the Bill for the Better Observance of the Lord's Day?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not heard anybody except the junior member for Cape Breton (Mr. McDougall) pressing very much for that; I do not know that he has been interested in it heretofore. He has voted against it, and I suppose it is from a desire of voting against that Bill that he wishes it to be brought up. But I simply rise for the purpose of putting this matter straight, as I understand it, and answering the argument which the hon. gentleman attempted to make, and which seems to me excessively foolish.

Mr. IVES. Before the hon. gentleman sits down will he allow me to ask: Whom does he consider responsible for the dilatoriness of printing, the Government or the Opposition?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman's question. I suppose the officers whom the hon. gentleman appointed when he was in office for translating the Bills from English into French, are mainly responsible for the delay.

Mr. IVES. They are all superannuated.

Mr. DAVIN. I have a two-fold suggestion to make to the Prime Minister. Sir, the hon. Prime Minister—I do not know whether it is parliamentary or not to say it—in a fit of irritation decided to move the adjournment of the House. There is no sound reason for that except it be that the rule that Bills, before the second reading is taken, shall be printed in both English and French is an unreasonable rule, and not only that, but that it is useless, and that the printing of Bills in French at all is unnecessary. If that be the case, then we must go further. We should ask for a revision of the rules and excise that rule which provides that a Bill is to be printed in French as well as in English. Now, this is the first suggestion. If, however, the Prime Minister holds that it is important that that rule should remain, I respectfully suggest to him that he should withdraw his motion. There is but one alternative. He must choose one horn of the dilemma or the other. Either he must hold that the rule that Bills be printed in French is useless, or else—and this is a horn I should be sorry to see him impaled upon, because the character of our Prime Minister is part of the heritage of Canada which she cannot forego and would desire to be proud of—he must admit that his motion to adjourn the House is made merely in a fit of irritation. So that I suggest to my hon. friend either that the rule be expunged or else that he withdraw his motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I must rise to enter a most earnest plea on behalf of the progress of the business of the House and the country. Here are nearly 200 members who have been brought here, I must say, at a very late and inconvenient season of the year, in total opposition to the very strong strictures, and I had supposed, the strongly held principles of the hon. the Premier and his colleagues, that the House should be called together not later than January, so that it could get at the business and get through the business in good time. But, called together at so late a season of the year, we find hon. members very anxious to get through with the business of the session so that they may get home to their business. What is the position of the Premier? A most lamentable position for a Premier to be in, a most sorry position for a Premier to be in, a position that is not creditable to the dignity of this House, and one which my hon. friend had much better have avoided. Have we rules for the governance of this House or have we not? Are these rules necessary for the proper transaction of business or not? Are they the result of years and years of assent and consent by all parties as being necessary for the proper and orderly conduct of business? Who is responsible that these rules shall be carried out? You, Mr. Speaker, in the Chair, are responsible, but if any other person has a responsibility, it is the leader of the House, for the Government itself is responsible for the good conduct of the House under the Speaker, and ought always to be on the side of order and rule. One of these rules is No. 93, which is as follows:—

All Bills shall be printed before the second reading in the French and English languages. That is as plain and well understood a rule as any to which this House is subject. That is a rule that has been repeatedly invoked in this House. When I was a member of the Government it was invoked time and time again, and the members of the Government at that time, when it was pressed that that rule should be waived, and was not agreed to, accepted and bowed to the rule as Governments always should. What is the position of the hon. the Premier? He who is responsible for the law and order of the House and for its good conduct is the man who wants to play, not my Lord Pax, as the hon. member for Guysborough said the other day, but my lord High-master. If the rule goes against what he desires to have carried out, he wants the rule broken. He appears to believe that it should be broken, and when my hon. friend, standing on his rights, refuses to have it broken, then the hon. the Premier gets angry, and, in effect, declares that we shall not do any business if we do not break the rules and if we refuse to carry out what he desires. I put it to the House that this is not a proper position for the Premier to occupy. We want to do business. Her Majesty's Opposition is here to see that business is done; we want to proceed now with the business of the day. Looking at the eager faces behind me, it cannot be said that there is one which is not instinct with activity, and anxious to do business as soon as possible. I plead with my hon. friend not to get into a pet, just because he cannot have his will as regards the House, and because when he seeks to act contrary to the rules of the House, because an hon. member refuses to agree with him, he forthwith declares that he will not allow the rest of the business to be proceeded with. There is ample business on the Order paper. I do not quite see that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), while he may have been ingenious, made a very clear explanation as to why the Bill was not printed in French. He jumped at a conclusion, he went over the whole stile before he came to it, suggesting that the fault rested with an officer of the House, and that the officer was probably guilty because he was appointed by my hon. friend's Government.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). A very good reason for thinking so.

Mr. FOSTER. So the hon. gentleman jumped the stile before he came to it. I believe Mr. Coursolle is responsible for the translation of the French.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Do you know that?

Mr. FOSTER. And I believe he is an old employee, one who was appointed by Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. My hon. friend jumped the whole hedge before he came in sight of it, and with all that abandon and reckless disregard of the truth that generally characterises him he made that statement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman should scarcely use that expression "disregard of the truth."

Mr. FOSTER. I was picturing an hon. gentleman who is taking a leap in the air.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. You had better take it back, and act honourably.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should withdraw his statement.

Mr. FOSTER. I will take it back, of course. It was not a statement made the hon. gentleman in disregard of the truth, but it was the result of an unusually vivid imagination. According to the argument used by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, we should not proceed with the regular order of business because, forsooth, several Bills appear on the Order paper relating to the same subject under the names of different members, each one of whom is an independent member of this House and has a right to propose his Bill and see to have it carried through; and because one member had his Bill in a position, under the rules, by which it was ready to be taken up and other members had not their Bills so ready, and so had not been printed in French, that my hon. friend is asked to forego the advantage which he properly possesses to bring up his Bill at this time. This is not fair; it is not fair to the Opposition, or to any independent member of the House, and it is not a just position for the Government to take. My hon. friend has a right to have his Bill occupy this position on the Order paper, and he has it under the rules of the House, and this motion should not be allowed to interfere with my hon. friend securing advantage from the place which his motion holds on the Order paper to-day. It does not follow that because the hon. gentleman takes up his Bill to-day, it has to be disposed of at this sitting of the House. It does not follow that if the Government wishes all the Bills of this nature to be taken up together, after my hon. friend has made his explanation, the Premier may not, as leader of the House, propose that all these Bills be referred to a special committee, or adopt some other plan to carry out his views. Besides there is other important business that may be taken up. There was a speech made yesterday of unusual length, and with unusual fervour—I was going to say of unusual ability, and perhaps that statement would not be out of the way—and that motion is ready for debate to-day. It would come on after public Bills and Orders. That could be properly taken up, and no doubt the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. McInnes) would be very glad to make progress in the discussion towards attaining the end he has in view. Then there are questions to be put by members, and notices of motion sufficient to occupy several days. What reason has been given, what reason is there why the House should not go on with business? Has it never occurred in the history of this House that when Government business has been exhausted, the House has proceeded to consider public Bills and Orders and notices of motions. I have seen that occur over and over again. Why should it not? Private members have rights. The Government often take away private members' day on account of urgency of business; but if the Government has no business ready, what can be more fair than that private members should have a chance of occupying the unexpired portion of the day? I hope my hon. friend will not persist in his present opposition. If he expects thus to throw the onus of opposing public business on the Opposition, he will fail to realize the intelligence of the House and the country.

Mr. CASEY. The leader of the Opposition is labouring under a slight misapprehension in one or two directions. In the first place, he tells us that the leader of the House does not seem to realize yet that he is Premier. We have all of us held the opinion that the hon. gentleman has realized the fact and acted in a very Premier-like manner during the whole of last session and during the expired portion of this session. It has often occurred to me, on the other hand, that the leader of the Opposition has not realized that he is no longer Premier. Of course he was Premier for a very short time, only thirteen weeks; but the habit, which is so congenial to his disposition, seems to have impressed that brief span of power on his mind to an undue extent. He still appears to think that he is an oracle on questions of procedure, and that hon. members should be guided by what he says as to what should be done in the House. I now come to the second point on which he is perhaps under a misapprehension. He may not be the actual leader of the Opposition even. The hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. Foster) seems to dispute that place with him. When the first dictator rises and lays down the law, the second dictator never seems to feel content that the matter has been properly placed before the House, and he has to re-explain what his leader explained. I do not know that he always makes the matter clearer, but he has the satisfaction of occupying a little of the time of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. They are both there to stay, anyway.

Mr. FOSTER

Mr. CASEY. Then the question may arise whether the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) is not the leader of the Opposition on this occasion, for the whole of this debate has arisen from an attempt to prove that some unfairness has been done to my hon. friend the whip of the Conservative party (Mr. Taylor). He is apparently in a vast hurry to get on with his Bill this time, but the older members of the House recollect how session after session, that Bill used to be on the paper and how it used to be called out day after day until it sounded like an echo "Bill respecting Alien Labour (Mr. Taylor)," and echo answered "stand," and that echo came from the voice of my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor). He is now in a great stew to get it on this very day, for it is a point worth mentioning for the outside public, to whom this debate has been addressed by members opposite, that the hon. gentleman has only to wait until to-morrow evening, when public Bills will be the first order. The chief trouble seems to have been well illustrated by a recent cartoon in a Toronto paper, picturing one man at the top of a ladder and another at the bottom, and certain names are used which it may perhaps be parliamentary to quote as coming from a newspaper. Little boy Taylor at the foot of the ladder is crying and saying "Boo, hoo. Cowan is carrying my flag;" and Miss Canada says to little boy Taylor: "It is all your own fault, Georgie, if you had not been so ready to drop that flag before, you might have been carrying it still." I am sure my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) feels his false position in having dropped that flag so often, that he is not thought worthy to carry it any longer. The situation of the constituency of my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) is quite sufficient reason for his taking up the Bill with energy and pushing it. The hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) wished to insinuate that that Bill of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) was ready and printed before the other. He must know that both Bills had to be ready before they were introduced and that the Bill of the member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) was introduced before the other Bill. Why it was not printed sooner is a question that cannot be decided by any one who does not know the mysteries of the printing office. One Bill might have been in printed form already, and the other may have been manuscript, and so on. But, Sir, hon. gentlemen have overlooked another reason which may exist for the adjournment of the House on this occasion. It may not have occurred to the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) that the present Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) would be very glad of a little extra time to consider the tariff which he will have to so shortly present to this House. No doubt Ministers are very hard worked in attending to that, and I should not wonder at all if they would be glad to have the afternoon and evening to utilize in this way. I am sure that the present Finance Minister does not want to have so many clerical errors in his tariff as there were in the tariffs brought down by the ex-Finance Minister. The present Finance Minister does not want to bring his tariff down in a hurry and have to spend three or four months correcting it when it is brought down. I hope the House will adjourn immediately.

Mr. TAYLOR. Just one word or two in reply—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has already spoken.

Mr. TAYLOR. I want to reply to a personal remark of the Prime Minister.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor) desires to make a personal explanation he can do so.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is all. The Prime Minister made a statement that when I sat on this side of the House I had not shown the same anxiety to press this Bill as I do now. I wish to state that while I sat on that side of the House I was just as anxious about the Bill as I am now, and I took every opportunity to press it. If the Prime Minister and those associated with him, and sitting close to him, will read the "Hansard" and see the remarks they made at the time ridiculing the idea of my presenting such a Bill, I am sure he will withdraw the statement. I wish to make another explanation in reply to my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey). He said that in previous sessions when that Bill was called I said "stand." He cannot find on the record where I ever requested that Bill to stand.

Mr. CASEY. It is not put on the record when a member calls "stand."

Mr. TAYLOR. Then you think yourself safe.

Motion to adjourn agreed to, on a division, and House adjourned at 4.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 7th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. CASEY moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 16) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This Bill is one I have been requested to introduce by the Canadian Wheelmen's Association, through Mr. E. B. Ryckman, of Toronto, Chairman of the Rights and Privileges Committee of that body. The Bill is briefly to the effect that bicycles belonging to passengers traveling by rail should be carried free as personal baggage. I may be pardoned for saying a few words more in introducing this measure than is usual on the first reading of a Bill, because the subject is probably as new to many members of this House as it was to me when my attention was first called to it by this organization. In the first place, I may say that the wheelmen of Canada have become a very large and important body of men, numbering certainly over 100,000. Those who have joined the Wheelmen's Association number over ten thousand, I understand from the officers of that body, and I am quite sure that not one in ten of those who own wheels especially in the country, belong to that association. Until within a year or so, bicycles used to be carried free by railway companies as personal baggage, and in former days they weighed twice as much as they do now. But when their weight became reduced from something like 50 to 25 pounds, the railways began to charge extra for carrying them. This is a grievance which is particularly felt in suburban neighbourhoods where a man may run out on his wheel for a ride into the country and be caught in a storm and take the train back. He may only have to pay 15 or 20 cents for his own ticket, while the lowest charge for carrying the bicycle is 25 cents, so that in many cases he pays more for the bicycle than for himself.

Two or three gentlemen to whom I have mentioned the subject said it would be just as reasonable to make a railway company carry a man's horse and buggy home, if he chooses to put them in a baggage car. My reply to that is that when a horse and buggy can be shown which will only weigh 25 pounds, and will behave themselves in a baggage car as a bicycle generally does, there may be a parallel between the two cases, but not until then. I have mentioned the minimum charge imposed by railways for carrying bicycles. I understand that for long distances the charge is on the basis of 6 per cent of a first-class fare, so that when a first-class fare is $30, the charge for carrying a bicycle is $1.80. On the other hand, when a bicycle is put in a box or crate, the railways carry it free like any other personal baggage. The objection made by the railway companies to the handling of bicycles free is their liability to claims for damages. Well, the Wheelmen's Association have suggested a plan which seems perfectly feasible, by which, at very slight cost, baggage cars might be prepared for safely carrying bicycles in the space not usually occupied by other baggage, namely, by putting hooks into the ceiling or wall from which the wheels might be hung. At a later stage, I propose to lay the ideas of the wheelmen on this part of the subject before the House, and I only make these rather full preliminary remarks, in the hope that between now and the second reading of the Bill the members of this House may give their earnest attention to the question. I believe that the wheelmen's organization throughout this country intend to bring this question specially before the members of this House who have wheelmen amongst their constituents, and I think that will include nearly all of us. I hope hon. gentlemen will give this question their attention and be prepared to discuss it on its second reading. The principle on which the Bill is based is that the bicycle is the wheelman's baggage. I hope that the House will entertain the Bill favourably.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CHATEAUGUAY AND NORTHERN RAILWAY—BRIDGE OVER RIVIÈRE DES PRAIRIES.

Mr. GAUTHIER asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to give aid towards the construction of the railway of the Chateaugay and Northern Railway Company, which is intended to connect together Montreal, L'Assomption and Joliette?

Is it also the intention of the Government to help the said company to construct a bridge over Rivière des Prairies, between Bout de L'Isle and Charlemagne?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may say to the hon. member, as to both the enterprises referred to in his question, that the Government is not yet in a position to announce its intention with respect to these, as the whole subject of giving aid to railways and other undertakings of this character is under consideration.

POSTMASTER AT ANNAPOLIS, N.S.

Mr. MILLS asked :

1. When was H. A. West appointed postmaster of the town of Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia?

2. Has the said H. A. West been dismissed from the said position? If so, when?

3. Was any complaint preferred against the said H. A. West of malfeasance in office or offensive partisanship? If so, by whom?

4. If any complaint was made, was the said H. A. West apprised of such complaint, and was any investigation held? If so, by whom?

5. If said H. A. West has been dismissed and no complaint made, why has he been dismissed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). After the defeat of the late Government but whilst they were still in office, it was represented to the then Postmaster General, the Hon. Mr. Taillon, that Mr. A. H. Corbitt, the then postmaster at Annapolis, was prepared to resign his office on condition that Mr. H. A. West was appointed in his stead, such representation being contained in a certain telegram dated the 27th June, 1896, sent by John B. Mills,

Mr. CASEY.

M.P., to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper then Solicitor General, in the following words :—

Annapolis, N.S., 27th June, 1896.

Annapolis postmaster, Corbitt, will resign, if Harry A. West can be appointed in his stead. Do this if possible. Important. They won't disturb West. I have resignation for Ottawa.

(Sgd.) JOHN B. MILLS.

Such representation was then communicated to the late Postmaster General by a letter dated 29th June, 1896, from the said Sir C. H. Tupper by letter in the following words :—

June 29th, 1896.

My dear Mr. Taillon,—Pray initial inclosed papers, and ask Colonel White to put them through. Corbitt resigns, and Mills of Annapolis recommends Harry A. West as successor.

Yours sincerely,

(Sgd.) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

To Hon. L. A. Taillon, Postmaster General.

Thereupon the Hon. Mr. Taillon did on the 29th of June, 1896, six days after the defeat of his Government appoint Mr. West to said office. That it having been brought to the knowledge of the present Government that Mr. Corbitt's resignation was not unconditional, but was only given in consideration of the office being given to Mr. West, and it appearing that such action came within the spirit of section 137 of the Criminal Code, which declares that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who sells or agrees to sell his resignation of any office or any consent to an appointment or resignation or agrees to receive any reward from the sale thereof, the Government deemed it their duty to vacate an appointment made to fill the vacancy thus improperly brought about, the making of which vacancy under such circumstances, appears to come within the class of evils sought to be remedied by the Criminal Code. Hence Mr. West's appointment was cancelled.

CROW'S NEST PASS RAILWAY.

Mr. MACLEAN asked :

Has the Canadian Pacific Railway yet begun the construction of their line through the Crow's Nest Pass?

Does the Government intend to allow that company to begin the work of construction without first completing the negotiations now going on for the modification in the clauses of the company's charter in the matter of the construction of branch lines, and the regulation of the rates and tolls charged by the said company?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). As to the first clause of the question I may say that the Government is without information as to whether the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has yet begun the construction of a railway through the Crow's Nest Pass, except that it was understood that some grading had been done a couple of years ago in or ad-jaacent to the Pass. As to the second clause of the question, I am afraid I shall be obliged to ask the hon. gentleman to modify or amend the question so as not to contain a statement which I should have to either accept or challenge in answering. If the hon. gentleman will put the question again without the objectionable clause, I shall be pleased to answer it.

Mr. SPEAKER. In looking at this question I held that it contained a statement of fact, and I referred to the hon. member who had given notice of it. He assured me that the statement of fact was based upon an answer to a question given on the 29th March in the House, and for that reason, I did not ask him to modify the question. The point now arises whether the Minister and the hon. member agree that that is a statement based upon the answer referred to. If it was not strictly so, it would not do to put the question in this shape, because questions of fact must be either in explanation of the question or entirely indisputable. I think, if there is any doubt about it whatever the hon. gentleman had better modify his question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think the hon. member (Mr. Maclean) must have misunderstood the tenor of any reply he received from me, because there certainly was none by me implying that negotiations were going on for the modification of the company's charter in regard to the construction of branch lines. I think my answer will not be found, on further examination, to contain any such imputation. It certainly was not so intended.

Mr. MACLEAN. I tried to frame this question in the light of an answer already received from the Minister. I understood that answer to be to the effect that the Government was negotiating with the Canadian Pacific Railway for the modification of this clause. I believe the country so understood it, as it has been commented on in the press—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Maclean) has the question there. Will he be good enough to read it?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think it will be found—

Mr. MACLEAN. I believe I have the floor, Mr. Speaker—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS—that the hon. member was answered—

Mr. MACLEAN. I believe you asked me to read the question, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. No; Mr. Speaker had asked me to read the answer.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member is going to read the answer.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Very well; that is what I was going to do.

Mr. MACLEAN. On March the 29th, I put the following question to the Government:—

Whether it is the intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the abrogation or modification of the following article in the contract and agreement made between Her Majesty and Mr. George Stephen and others, as set out in chapter 1, 44 Victoria:—

"14. The company shall have the right from time to time to lay out, construct, equip, maintain and work branch lines of railway from any point or points along their main line of railway to any points within the territory of the Dominion: Provided always that before commencing any branch they shall first deposit a map and plan of such branch in the Department of Railways, and the Government shall grant to the company the lands required for the road-bed of such branches, and for the stations, station grounds, buildings, workshops, yards and other appurtenances requisite for the efficient construction and working of such branches, in so far as such lands are vested in the Government."

2. Whether it is the intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the modification or abrogation of the following clause of chapter 1, 44 Victoria:—

"20. The limit to the reduction of tolls by the Parliament of Canada, provided for by the 11th subsection of the 17th section of the Consolidated Railway Act of 1879 respecting tolls is hereby extended so that such reduction may be to such an extent that such tolls when reduced shall not produce less than ten per cent per annum profit on the capital actually expended in the construction of the railway, instead of not less than fifteen per cent per annum profit as provided by said section, and so also that such reduction shall not be made unless the net income of the company ascertained as described in such subsection shall have exceeded ten per cent per annum as provided by the said subsection; and the exercise by the Governor in Council of the power of reducing the tolls of the company, as provided by the 10th subsection of said section 17, is hereby limited to the same extent with relation to the profit of the company, and to its net revenue, as that to which the power of Parliament to reduce tolls is limited by said subsection 11 as hereby amended."

Then my question was:

3. What steps, if any, have been taken by the Government to ascertain the capital actually expended in the construction of the said Canadian Pacific Railway as referred to in the above quoted clause?

The Minister's answer was:

I may say for the information of the hon. gentleman, that the subject is under consideration, but no conclusion has yet been arrived at; I refer to the two first questions. As to the third question, we have no intention at present of making the inquiry to which the hon. gentleman refers.

These first two questions deal with the extension clause, and the other with the regulation of tolls ; and I understood the Minister to say that negotiations were in progress for the modification of these two clauses ; and on that answer I based my third question.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I am sorry the hon. member should have so completely misapprehended the meaning of my reply. He asked whether it was the intention of the Government to enter into negotiations with the Canadian Pacific Railway for such a purpose, and he received a reply to the effect that the subject as to entering into negotiations was under consideration, but no conclusion had been arrived at. That is very far from implying that negotiations had been entered into ; and therefore I find it quite impossible to answer the hon. gentleman's question in the form in which he has put it. I will have no objection to answering it, of course, if he will put it in such a way that I can do so without making admissions or implications which cannot properly be made.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be better, under the circumstances, for the hon. gentleman to reconstruct his question after the Minister's explanation of his former answer. There is evidently a misapprehension.

Mr. MACLEAN. I can move it now, Mr. Speaker.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. With the consent of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman can move it now—

The PRIME MINISTER. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. But I think it would be better to reconstruct it.

Mr. MACLEAN. Mr. Speaker, I can put it this way—

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. MACLEAN. The Speaker says I am in order, I am abiding by what the Speaker has already decided.

Mr. SPEAKER. The first part of the hon. gentleman's question has been answered. The second part, after the explanation he has received, can be modified.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In any case, I would ask the hon. member to allow his question, even if he were to modify it, to stand until to-morrow.

Mr. MACLEAN. All right ; I consent to that.

Mr. MACLEAN.

GEORGE BROWN, MAIL CARRIER.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Is the Government aware that George Brown, the mail carrier from Clementsport to Clementsvale, in the county of Annapolis, carried the mail over three months, once per week, from Clementsvale to "Virginia" post office?

2. Has the said George Brown received pay for such services?

3. If not, why not?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The Government is not aware that George Brown, the mail carrier from Clementsport to Clementsvale, in the county of Annapolis, carried the mail over three months once per week, from Clementsvale to "Virginia" post office. Inquiry will be made into the matter.

POSTMASTER AT BEAUHARNOIS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

When was Octave Laurin appointed postmaster at Beauharnois? By whom was he recommended for the position?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Mr. Octave Laurin was appointed postmaster at Beauharnois on the 16th of January, 1897, upon the recommendation of the Hon. Mr. Tarte.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

When was Alexis Doutre appointed postmaster of the town of Beauharnois, P.Q.?

2. Has the said Alexis Doutre been dismissed from the said position? If so, when?

3. Was any complaint preferred against the said Alexis Doutre of malfeasance in office or offensive partisanship? If so, by whom?

4. If any complaint was made, was the said Alexis Doutre apprised of such complaint, and was any investigation held? If so, by whom?

5. If said Alexis Doutre has been dismissed and no complaint made, why has he been dismissed?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Alexander Doutre was appointed postmaster at Beauharnois on the 8th of June, and whilst such postmaster to the personal knowledge of the Hon. J. Israel Tarte, took a most active and violent part in the last election, using the post office building as a most active committee room. Under such circumstances, it was deemed advisable to free him from the trammels of office, which was accordingly done.

IMMIGRATION AGENTS.

Mr. SPROULE asked :

1. How many officers in the public service have been superannuated from the 13th July, 1896, up to the 5th of April, 1897? What are their names? What is the age of each? How long in the service, and what is the amount additional charge on the superannuation fund?

2. Has Mr. Jno. Dyke, Dominion Government agent at Liverpool, England, been superannuated? If so, who was appointed as his successor, and what is his salary?

3. Have the services of Thomas Grahame, Canadian agent at Glasgow, Scotland, been dispensed with? If so, who is his successor, and what is his salary?

4. Have the services of John W. Dunn, Canadian agent at Bristol, England, been dispensed with? If so, has a successor been appointed, and what is his salary?

5. What agents, residents of Canada, have been appointed to or engaged for work as emigration agents in Great Britain or Ireland, since the present Minister of the Interior took office to date? In what field of labour have they respectively been assigned? What salaries are they to receive?

The MINISTER OF INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. One, in so far as Department of Interior is concerned, Henry Hall Smith, late Commissioner of Dominion Lands, Winnipeg. Age, 50 years. Service, 13 years. $1,590 per annum. 2. Mr. John Dyke, Dominion Government agent at Liverpool, England, has not been superannuated. 3. Mr. Thomas Grahame, Canadian agent at Glasgow, Scotland, services have not been dispensed with. 4. As to Mr. John W. Dunn, there was no such agent at Bristol, England. Mr. John W. Down, late agent at Bristol, England, services have been dispensed with from 28th February, 1897. No successor appointed. 5. Alfred F. Jury, England, $150 a month; W. L. Griffith, Wales, $100 a month; H. M. Murray, Scotland, $2,000 a year; Thomas Duncan, Scotland, $100 a month; Charles R. Devlin, Ireland, $2,000 a year; Edward O'Kelly, Ireland, $150 a month; John Webster, Ireland, $75 a month; Thomas Roberts, return-man to North Wales, has had his expenses paid.

INDIAN AGENT CROWE.

Mr. McNEILL asked :

1. What are the irregularities in connection with the duties of his office of which Mr. Crowe, late Indian agent on the Saugeen Reserve, has been adjudged guilty, and which in the opinion of the Government rendered him unfit for the position he held?

2. Was Mr. Inspector Macrae instructed to inquire into charges of this nature, or were his instructions to inquire into political charges preferred against Mr. Crowe?

3. Has Mr. Crowe been asked if he has a defence to these charges?

The MINISTER OF INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The file containing the official report of Mr. Inspector Macrae has been temporarily mislaid in the moving of the department by the officials of the department. The information will be furnished as soon as the file is found.

MR. JOHN McIVER, INDIAN AGENT.

Mr. McNEILL asked :

1. Have representations been made by supporters of the Government to the Minister, or to the late acting Minister, that Mr. John McIver is unfitted for the position of Indian agent at Cape Croker, to which he has been appointed?

2. Has Mr. McIver furnished to the Minister the necessary financial securities?

3. If so, when were the securities furnished, and who are the sureties?

4. Have the Indians of the Cape Croker Reserve received their March quarterly payments for 1897? If so, when? If not, why not?

The MINISTER OF INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No representations have been made by supporters of the Government that Mr. John McIver is unfitted for the position of Indian agent at Cape Croker. 2 and 3. The necessary financial securities have not yet been furnished. Sureties have, however, been named by Mr. McIver, and accepted by the department, and bonds have been transmitted for execution. 4. The Indians of Cape Croker have not yet received their March quarterly payments for 1897. It is not usual to pay the March quarterly interest money until after the 1st April. Last year, however, by special request the money was sent on the 31st March. This year it will be paid before the 15th instant.

Mr. McNEILL. I desire to call your attention to the fact that part of the question has not been answered. I asked what were the names of the sureties.

The MINISTER OF INTERIOR. I did not notice that that part of the question was omitted in the answer. I will furnish the answer to-morrow.

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN THE DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the notices of motion are proceeded with, I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to a matter of some importance, and in order to do so, I shall put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. The question to which I wish to call the attention of the Prime Minister is this. A few days ago I asked the Prime Minister across the floor of the House whether he would answer off-hand or not if there was any truth in the rumour current in the papers that an Order in Council had been passed agreeing to pay the Grand Trunk Railway a sum of money, which rumour placed at some $300,000. My hon. friend was not able to say whether an Order had passed Council or was not willing to answer the question off-hand, as he had a perfect right not to do. I then put the question on the Order paper, and on 5th April I asked as follows :—

Has any Order in Council been passed by the Government granting any sum of money to the Grand Trunk Railway Company in aid of extending, repairing or rebuilding the Victoria Railway Bridge at Montreal? If so, what was the amount granted, and will the papers be laid upon the Table of the House in due course?

The Minister of Railways and Canals answered that question as follows:—

It would be premature until negotiations between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government respecting the Intercolonial Railway terminal in Montreal are concluded to furnish partial information on this subject. All papers will be laid on the Table of the House in due course.

That would have been quite a fair answer to have been given presuming the information which was denied to the House off-hand and by the Minister of Railways, had been as zealously guarded elsewhere as it has been by the Minister of Railways from the knowledge of the House. But taking up yesterday's papers, I find an announcement largely in detail has been made in another quarter, and that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, at a meeting of shareholders of that great carrying concern, had congratulated the shareholders of the railway and the public interested in that railway upon certain action which he says has been definitely taken by the Government of Canada. The paper goes on to say—this is from the "Star's" special correspondent in London:

In moving the adoption of the very favourable report, the essentials of which have already been transmitted to the "Star" in my special cables, the president touched upon the chief topics of importance in connection with the great railway system. A most interesting announcement was that touching upon the new arrangement between the Canadian Government and the Grand Trunk respecting the Victoria Bridge, which crosses the St. Lawrence at Montreal. The new plans were only given in outline, Sir Charles Rivers Wilson stating he would withhold the details until the announcement had been made in the Canadian Parliament. Connected with the announcement of the bridge agreement, was given a statement regarding the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal.

The Grand Trunk, said Sir Charles, had agreed with the Ottawa authorities that the Government having extended the Intercolonial Railway to St. Hyacinthe, the Grand Trunk would grant the Government road running powers into Montreal over the Victoria Bridge on terms which, he believed, would enable the bridge to be double-tracked and practically reconstructed without a cent's cost to the company. The announcement of these favourable terms was greeted with applause long and loud. When it had subsided, Sir Charles proceeded, stating that in addition to what he had announced, he hoped the Dominion and Quebec governments would each contribute 15 per cent to the actual cost of renewing the bridge.

It does seem to me that the House of Parliament assembled as it is here has a perfect right to the first information with respect to these important matters. This is not the first announcement that Sir Charles Rivers Wilson has made. I remember seeing in the papers not a long while ago a statement made by that gentleman after he had visited this country and seen the Ministers—a statement made, I think, to his company or on behalf of his company—that he had interviews with the Dominion Ministers and he was pretty certain from the tone of the conversation with them, the Dominion Government would be prepared to take off the coal duty, and he went on to talk of the great assistance that would be given to his extended system of railway if free coal should be given. We will let that pass. This is, however, a matter that is definite, one which involves financial considerations apparently of very great importance. The statement is made that the Intercolonial Railway has actually made its arrangements to extend the road to St. Hyacinthe, and having extended it to St. Hyacinthe, it has made arrangements with the Grand Trunk Railway Company for running powers, and in connection with that there is an arrangement by which the bridge over the St. Lawrence will be materially altered and enlarged and double-tracked, and that the arrangement is so favourable and the money consideration is so large that all this immense work has been done without it costing a single cent to the exchequer of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. I am not going to press this matter in a party spirit or in a heated spirit. I simply say that the Government when it had come to these conclusions, ought to have laid these papers on the Table of the House at the opening of the session, that it ought to have given Parliament the first information with respect to these matters, and it comes to us rather as a shock that the president of a great railway company should have prior information and should make that information public to his constituency before the Government condescends to give Parliament the information to which it is certainly entitled. A large financial consideration outside of other points arises on this proposed arrangement if the hon. gentleman had led an important railway at some previous time, it may be through great stress of circumstances, to believe that an arrangement would be made and that coal would be made free and that certain arrangements would be entered into; or if a result has been arrived at recently, or if negotiations even very lately have taken place, that information should have been given to the House, which has been sitting since 25th of March. And yet it has been impossible for the House to get any information either from the Premier or the Minister of Railways, or to induce them to adopt the better course of laying the papers on the Table of the House. I desired to call attention to this matter—and I place myself in order by now moving the adjournment of the House—and to call the attention of the House to a state of things which I do not think is consistent with the dignity of Parliament or is altogether in line with the position occupied by hon. members of this House which is sitting here as the High Court of Parliament, the Government being after all simply an executive or administrative committee of this Parliament.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). As I understand the complaint made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster), it is that an arrangement has been completed between the Government and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, under which the Government is to take over certain interests and rights from the Grand Trunk, and that this arrangement, having been concluded, is withheld from Parliament, but that the president of the Grand Trunk has felt himself justified in making the matter public; and the hon. gentleman concluded that there is some reflection cast on the dignity of Parliament because the Government has withheld this information and allowed it to become public through another channel. Mr. Speaker, I would not complain of the fact that the hon. gentleman has called attention to this fact if he had conclusive evidence. If he had evidence which really ought to be sufficient to satisfy himself that arrangements had been definitely and finally concluded between the Grand Trunk Company and the Government, and that having been concluded, those arrangements were withheld by the Government from the knowledge of the House. But, I think the hon. member (Mr. Foster) ought to have believed from the statements which have already been made to the House in answer to his inquiries, that the arrangements were not and have not been concluded. It is a matter entirely within the discretion of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as to, at what stage he may feel warranted in telling his shareholders about these negotiations, and as to whether he may state or not, that such an undertaking will be carried out or that these arrangements will be concluded. That is entirely in his discretion; but, Sir, because the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company feels warranted in assuming that these negotiations will finally reach a satisfactory result, or because he has deemed it well to make that statement, it does not at all follow that there has been such an arrangement concluded as will warrant the Government in advising the House to that effect. I want to repeat what I said the other day: that the matter is still under negotiation between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government. It may be that these arrangements will come to nothing; it may be that while we are finally settling the conditions they will not be agreed upon, and in that case all that has been done will avail nothing. That is the position in which this matter stands now, and I do not feel that the Government would be warranted in making any partial statement as to what terms have been partially agreed upon, until they all have been agreed upon and until we are in a position to inform this House that a satisfactory arrangement has been concluded—not that it is under discussion, not that one instalment of it, or one feature, or some features of it have been agreed upon, but that all have been agreed upon. I want to inform the House now that such is not the case. The House may rest assured, and it is a material fact, that nothing will be done which will not be wholly and absolutely subject to the sanction of this Parliament. We will not hamper Parliament by any act that we will do or any course which we will take. We will leave Parliament entirely free.

Mr. MONTAGUE. We are very much obliged to you for that.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Montague) says: we are very much obliged to you, implying that we could not do otherwise even if we wished to. Well, we do not pretend to bind Parliament. It is known to the other parties to the negotiations, as the agreement may be reached at each step, and at the various stages of it, that what we agree upon is all subject to and must be submitted to Parliament. When we have reached such a stage as that we can say that this whole matter has been agreed upon between us we propose to lay that before Parliament and to ask the assent of Parliament, and until then we do not think we ought be expected to make any partial announcement, the effect of which might be to defeat entirely the negotiations which are pending. Notwithstanding the fact that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company may have felt warranted in assuming in advance that arrangements would be satisfactorily agreed upon, feeling compelled perhaps to make this announcement because his shareholders were having their annual meeting, and in order to make as favourable a showing as possible, he probably desired not to delay giving them this information. But Parliament is in an entirely different position. We are not now concluding our session; many weeks must elapse before it is over and we expect to be able to reach a satisfactory understanding with the Grand Trunk Railway Company in all its details before this session of Parliament is concluded, and at the earliest possible moment we will acquaint the House with the details of that arrangement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The House will hardly be disposed to accept the statement of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) as meeting the very grave point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. Foster), in reference to this House being dependent upon the press, and upon outside statements of irresponsible persons, for information as to the policy of this Government in regard to a very great and important transaction. I have no remark at all to make upon the question, as to whether it is wise or unwise for the Government of Canada to conclude the proposed arrangements for extending the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal; but I do say: that until arrangements are concluded, and until negotiations are brought to such a point that this House when in session can be informed of what is being done, the Government have no right to give to private individuals, or to the representatives of companies, or to the press of this country, statements that are calculated to have a most serious effect, and before the Government is in a position to state to this House what they propose to do.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What do you allude to now, Sir Charles?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To the statement that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) alluded to as having been made by the Government. I say that the statement made by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company in London, is a statement in respect to which probably hundreds of thousands of pounds have changed hands in regard to the stocks of that company. Now, Sir, I want to know what would be the position of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair), suppose these negotiations are not brought to a conclusion, and if at the next meeting of the shareholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company the president is obliged to inform some 25,000 shareholders in England, that the statement he made that he had entered into an arrangement with the Government of Canada under which these great advantages were to be obtained by that company which would be of enormous value, and which would raise the stock and lead to large operations in it had fallen through; I ask what would be the position of the hon. gentleman and of the Government if such a condition of things should arise? The president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company leaves no doubt upon the minds of the shareholders that these negotiations have been completed, and he says he is not in a position to give the shareholders the details until he has the authority of the Government of Canada. It appears, however, that he is in a position to hold out to the shareholders, that he has made a deal with the Government of Canada enormously advantageous to that company. Statements of that kind cannot be made without involving the credit and reputation of the Government of Canada to a large extent; and for this reason: the parties who acting in good faith upon the declaration of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company will be in a position to throw back upon this Government a great deal of obloquy provided these arrangements are found not to have been carried to completion. The Minister of Railways, instead of confirming the statement of the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, intimates that he is in a position still on the part of the Government to recede from any promises or pledges that have been made. Well, Sir, these pledges either exist or they do not. If the Government is in a position to recede, then the statement made by the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is most unwarranted; and if the Government be not in a position to recede, then this House is entitled to at least as early information as the stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, as to what this Government propose to do in regard to this important matter involving a great expenditure of public money.

Now, Sir, this does not stand by itself. It is not an exception, but it has become the rule for this Government to give to private individuals, and to private corporations, information which they refuse to this House. What is the position of the hon. Minister of Finance on this question? Why, Sir, I brought before the House on an important occasion the different statements of different members of the Government in regard to the policy of the Government on a most important matter, that is, the coal interests of Canada. The Prime Minister had given a pledge to the people of this country in the most emphatic terms that the duty would be taken off coal. My hon. friend beside me (Mr. Foster) has referred to the fact that the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, at its last half-yearly meeting, stated to its shareholders that after his interview with this Government, he was in a position to assure them that the duty would be taken off coal. Now, I want to know if a question as to the policy of this Government in regard to a great public interest should be answered here, or have we to learn it either from the press on the other side of the Atlantic or from the press in various parts of this Dominion? I say it is treating Parliament with contempt; it is violating the fundamental principles of the constitution; it is doing that which the Minister of Finance declared it would be infamous for any Government to do—to make a statement touching the tariff of the country to private individuals, instead of on the floor of this House, where it would be known equally to all interested persons. What has happened? While we have been unable, by questions put in a constitutional manner on the floor of this House, to get the slightest information as to how these irreconcilable statements were to be reconciled—as to whether the policy of the First Minister or the policy of other members of the Cabinet was to prevail in regard to the duty on coal—the Finance Minister, sitting down, not with the representatives of the coal interests of Canada, but with a single section of it, imparted information to them in advance of information he would give to this House or even to the other coal interests of the country. Was that right? It was a matter of tariff; it was a matter on which the enormous amount of stocks held by persons connected with the coal interests of this country would be instantly affected. I ask the Minister of Finance—for I can hardly believe that he has fully estimated the importance of this matter—how he can justify himself to the other coal interests of this country for having sat down and listened to the statement of one single coal company, and having given them information as to what the policy of this Government was to be in regard to coal? If he wanted to act in accordance with the constitution and in accordance with the best interests of the people of this country, if he wanted to maintain the character of the Government of which he is a member, for dealing fairly and justly with all men, without respect to persons, he would have made the statement here, where no person could take special advantage of it, and where the information would be given at the same moment to all interests in the country. I happen to hold under my hand the evidence that this information was given in advance to one company, and that other coal companies, whose representatives were within reach of the hon. gentleman's summons in the city of Montreal, were not afforded the same opportunity. This is what Mr. Budden says on this point:

To the Editor of the "Gazette":

Sir,—In your issue of Saturday, you refer to the coal duties, and say that the representatives of the coal-mining interests waited on Hon. Mr. Fielding, Minister of Finance, at the Windsor Hotel, on Friday last.

We beg to inform you that the delegation that interviewed the hon. gentleman on that occasion, was composed solely of gentlemen representing Cape Breton mines, which are controlled by non-residents of Canada, and that the mainland mines of Cumberland and Pictou were not represented at that meeting.

The representatives of these companies were in Montreal—the Hon. Mr. Drummond representing the coal mines of Cumberland, and Mr. Budden representing the Intercolonial Coal Mining Company of Pictou.

Although advised that such a meeting was in contemplation, and that they would be notified of the hour, no such notification was given them.

Now, Sir, here is the representative of one of these companies saying that this information—information of the most valuable character, information that would enable persons to operate on the stock exchange, if they relied on the accuracy of the information—is given to the portion of the coal mining interests and not to another. But I deny the right of the hon. gentleman to meet even the whole of the coal mining interests, and give them information as to what he proposed to do with regard to the tariff. I say that the place to give that information was on the floor of this House, and there was abundant opportunity for him to do so, because the hon. gentleman's opinions were invited, and he evaded giving any reply, but treated the subject with the utmost levity. Sir, it is not a subject for levity. It is a subject that touches the honour of the Government of Canada, and that which touches the honour of the Government of Canada touches the honour of Canada itself. I am sorry to say, Sir, that that is not the worst of it. I believe that the meeting held between the hon. Minister of Finance and the Dominion Coal Company at the Windsor Hotel, and the outcome of that meeting, which is reported in the "Globe" newspaper, was the result of a deliberate attempt to take an unfair and dishonourable advantage of the position that the hon. gentleman occupied, in the interests of a party, and not in the interests of the country. The hon. gentleman is reported by the "Globe" newspaper of 13th March to have said:

If, however, your view is correct, and it turns out that the United States duty is raised to a high figure, then we shall claim and exercise the right to revise our views respecting the Canadian duty, and we shall feel bound to impose a duty not only on bituminous coal, but also on anthracite coal, which at present comes into our market from the United States free of duty.

The United States duty had already been raised to 75 cents a ton by the Dingley Bill, which has passed the House of Representatives; and here is a positive, solemn and emphatic declaration of the Government of Canada, by the mouth of its Finance Minister as to what the Government of Canada would feel bound to do in a certain event, which event everybody had reason to believe had already occurred. I want to know, had the hon. Finance Minister the authority of the Council of Canada when he declared what the Government, in a certain contingency, that there was no reason to doubt had already occurred, would feel bound to do? Had the hon. gentleman the consent of his colleagues to declare to anybody that a duty would be imposed upon anthracite coal, which is now free under the tariff? I say, if the hon. gentleman was in a position to make that statement, the place to make it was not in a private parlour in the Windsor Hotel, but on the floor of this House, where all men interested in the great coal mining industry of this country, in which millions of capital are invested, would have been upon an even footing, and one would have had just as much information as the other. I may be told that this was given to the press. Why is it that when they submit a tariff in this House, the Government take possession of the telegraph lines and will not allow any message to be sent by any person, member of Parliament or not, from the moment the tariff resolutions are on the Table until they are passed? The reason is because a single hour's advanced information would enable individuals to make large fortunes. That is the principle that lies at the foundation of that sound policy, and imposes upon the Ministers, and, above all, upon the Minister of Finance, the solemn obligation not to give a particle of information as to what this Government will feel bound to do unless on the floor of Parliament, and in such a way that the whole country may obtain the information at the same time.

But this is not all. What is the history of this transaction? It is this, that an hon. Minister, engaged with his colleagues in settling the tariff of the country, suddenly called upon his successor, the leader of the Government of Nova Scotia, to close up, in inconvenient haste, the business of the legislature of that province and dissolve the local House for an immediate appeal to the people. What more? After the people of this country had waited long and weary months for the hour to come when this ruinous uncertainty under which we are labouring as to the financial policy of the country should be set at rest, and rejoiced to know that the Government had called Parliament to meet on the 11th of March, what did the people find? They found that simultaneously with this party movement in Nova Scotia, simultaneously with this dissolution of the Nova Scotia Legislative Assembly, this Parliament was prorogued for a longer period and not allowed to come together until the 25th of March. Has there ever been any explanation or any reason given on the floor of this House, or anywhere else, by the Government for that extraordinary movement? Sir, the reason is plain. If Parliament had met on the 11th of March, it would have been next to impossible, with all the finesse, all the adroitness of hon. gentlemen opposite, to postpone the hour when the people of this country were to know their fate with regard to their fiscal policy. But by that postponement to the 25th March, it would be possible, by such devices as we now have to meet with from day to day, to have the elections of Nova Scotia before bringing down the tariff policy.

And that is not all. Why, the hon. gentleman's successor brings forward, as his tariff policy, a duty on coal. It is a spectacle unprecedented in this country, of finding the leader of a local legislature suddenly dissolving the local House long before its term expired by efflux of time, because its term does not expire until the spring of 1898, and doing this as the evident result of a combination with the Dominion Government. The two acts are practically simultaneous—the one, the dissolution of the Assembly of Nova Scotia; the other, the extension of time for calling the Dominion Parliament together for the despatch of business from the 11th to the 25th of March. And then we have the leader of the Nova Scotia Government coming out and declaring that he makes this untimely appeal to the province in order to settle the question of the duty on coal. If this were not a matter of such serious moment, it would be properly characterized as a farce, and if the hon. gentleman wants to know what the opinion of his own friends is, let him read one of his most steadfast supporters in this country, the daily "Witness," of Montreal, and in that paper he will find the Finance Minister taken to task in terms not usually applied to members of a Liberal Government by that paper, and ridicule cast on this attempt of the Government of Nova Scotia to make an appeal to the country on any such question.

What else have we as the result of this private arrangement made between the Minister of Finance and the coal companies of Montreal? It is well known that for eighteen years, aye, more, for twenty-five years, one of the questions in controversy between the Liberal party and the Conservative party of this country has been the policy of the duty on coal. Every person knows that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) could find no language strong enough to denounce the imposition of a duty on coal, and some of the members of this House may not know that there was no man more hostile to that duty than the present Minister of Finance. Let me read from a special despatch to the Halifax "Chronicle," the organ of the hon. gentleman in the province of Nova Scotia, a report of what the hon. gentleman said at Sydney, in the county of Cape Breton:

Mr. Fielding then took up the failure of the National Policy and the dismal efforts of the Government to keep the people at home. Referring to the coal trade, he said the Liberal party would not preach one doctrine in Cape Breton and another in the rest of the Dominion. If the coal business could not be carried on without protection, then it was better not to carry it on at all. The coal business was not a pauper business.

Those were the sentiments of the hon. gentleman before he found himself seated in a parlour of the Windsor Hotel at Montreal with the members of a private company engaged in the coal trade, and there settled the fiscal policy of this country on this important question. The hon. gentleman has had the satisfaction of finding that this conspiracy—for I can call it nothing else—entered into, in defiance of every principle that has hitherto been held to govern the conduct of the Governments of Canada in the past—a conspiracy that is in antagonism with every principle of right and justice and fair-play—has had its effect. The hon. gentleman has reaped, to a certain extent, the fruit of his policy. He makes this declaration which is subsequently published, and then, Sir, the coal owners are placed in this position: You must support Mr. Murray in the local elections of Nova Scotia and the Liberal party in that province or have the protection you now enjoy on coal taken from you.

That is the position. And, Sir, if the hon. gentleman thinks that I am straining that point, if he thinks I am going too far, let him read in his own organ, the Halifax "Chronicle," an account of the Pictou nomination, when Mr. McDonald, one of the Liberal candidates in that province, declared on the hustings that they had secured the support of the coal interest. Look at the great heading, which says "McDonald throws a bombshell into the Tory Camp." What was the bombshell? It was a bomb manufactured in the Windsor Hotel by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), and for the purpose of doing to the Conservatives what Orsini intended to do to the Emperor of the French. If the hon. gentleman wishes to be handed down to posterity as a manufacturer of bombshells, I think he has taken the right way to secure that end. But he has taken it at too great sacrifice of his own character and the character of his colleagues.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They may laugh, Sir, but I tell them there is not an intelligent, there is not an honourable, there is not an honest or high-minded elector in this Dominion that will sanction the carrying out of a scheme such as we see here attempted. The "Chronicle" says:

On the coal question, he took the stand that the Government of Canada should not allow the United States to stamp out the coal industry of Nova Scotia, and, in reply to the charge that Premier Murray was not sincere in his manifesto on the coal question, he read an important letter from Henry A. Budden, vice-president of the Intercolonial Coal Company, Montreal,—

The same gentleman who complained over his own signature of the treatment he had received at the hands of the Minister of Finance, that after being notified that he would be called upon to attend, he was left in the dark while this information as to the policy of the Government was given to other parties.

—to Charles Fergie, manager of the company's collieries at Westville, urging him, in view of the firm and important stand taken by Premier Murray,—

On a question which, the Montreal "Witness" tells him, he had nothing to do with——to frustrate the return of the Murray Government to power, and adding that the miners should now see that their and the owners' interests are already safeguarded by Mr. Murray's manifesto. This letter sounded the death-knell of the Tory candidates, and Mr. McDonald said that, for the first time for twenty-four years, Pictou would go solid for the Liberals.

Hon. gentlemen opposite, no doubt, accept that as a very considerable compensation. But I say that if this bombshell manufactured by the Minister of Finance and thrown in a crisis of this kind, and under the circumstances, accomplished its intended work—and I do not believe it will, because the people of this country are too intelligent not to spurn with indignation an attempt thus to hoodwink and mislead them—the advantage would be short-lived. Why, the hon. Minister of Finance knows that his policy with reference to coal is diametrically opposed to that propounded by the rest of his party. Every man in connection with the coal mining industry and every citizen knows that all the protection that has been given to this coal mining industry, all the prosperity it has enjoyed for the last eighteen years, greatly to the advantage of the whole country, has been secured through the determined, unflinching battle fought by the Conservatives in Canada for the protection to coal; and they all know that the battle has been won in spite of all the opposition and the hostility that the Liberals could show. The leader of this Government on the floor of this House, declared that a coal duty, even for revenue, was an indefensible duty. The hon. gentleman went further, and, in the most solemn manner that a great party leader could do it, declared to the electors, and to the great manufacturing industries in Montreal especially, that he had decided that raw material should be made free, and that coal and iron were those raw materials. No one would rejoice more than I if, at the eleventh hour, the hon. gentleman should be converted from the error of his ways, because I believe it would be a very serious mistake for the hon. gentleman to carry out the opinions he then expressed. But, considering that the protection to the coal interests has been given in spite of the hostility of the Liberals, I regard this as a most unfair attempt on the part of the Government to subordinate the very highest function that the Government in Canada possesses, that of dealing, honestly, fairly and justly with all classes of the people, irrespective of individuals, to party interests. These hon. gentlemen were bound not to give to any single individual or any number of individuals the policy of this Government which had been demanded from them on the floor of this House, in advance of its being given on the floor of this House. Therefore, I am bound to say, when I put together the fact of the private meeting in the Windsor Hotel parlour in Montreal where this policy is propounded, the fact of the sudden dissolution, at the instance of the hon. gentleman, of the legislature of Nova Scotia long before its time, the farcical appeal made by Mr. Murray, the Premier of Nova Scotia, to stand solidly at his back to promote the coal industries of the country, and the further fact of the postponement of the meeting of this Parliament, and the refusal of this Government to give even at this late hour a declaration of what their policy is on this subject so that the whole country may know it—when I put these facts together I cannot but see that they indicate one of the basest political conspiracies ever attempted by any Government or any party in Canada. If hon. gentlemen think they can win with loaded dice and marked cards, I tell them that theirs will be a short-lived game. They are face to face with the great, intelligent, independent electorate of this country, an electorate that will not, for party purposes, long suffer the great fundamental principle of government to be trampled under foot for the purpose of carrying out these miserable party objects. For they are miserable. It is of very little consequence to the people of Canada whether Liberals or Conservatives are in power. What is of vital importance to every man, whether Liberal or Conservative, throughout the country, is that the Government of the country shall be so administered that every man shall feel that the fundamental principles of good government will not be ignored for miserable party purposes. I do not believe now that coal is to be protected; I believe that when these elections are over in Nova Scotia, and there is no further party purpose to be subserved, the pledge which the First Minister gave to the manufacturers and to the great railway interests of this country, that coal would be made free, will be fulfilled. But, Sir, I say it is unfair to all parties, it is unfair to the people of this country, it is unfair and unjust to this House in the last degree, that we should not be able to get a plain authentic statement; and that the policy of this Government should be to prevent the tariff being laid upon the Table of this House, or the Budget speech being made, until the local elections in Nova Scotia are over, and that the party interests for which they have made such tremendous sacrifices shall, as they hope, be subserved. I do not believe their object will be accomplished. I believe that the country is too intelligent; but I say that if they were to succeed by such means, their victory would be so discreditable as to make it a very dangerous one for themselves.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Mr. Speaker, busily engaged as I have been on the somewhat arduous duties of my office, I must confess that I have not had as much time as I could desire to devote myself to a study of the provincial politics of Nova Scotia during recent weeks, and I am not as well informed as I should like to be, I have not hitherto been as well informed as I should like to be of the political situation in that province. I confess that after having so many years of my life taken an active part in provincial affairs, I should like to be able to be down there now and raising my voice in support of the Liberal friends with whom I have worked for so many years. But my duty requires me to be here, and whether my hon. friend is willing to believe it or not, I must honestly say that I have not been giving as much attention to the election in Nova Scotia as it might reasonably have been expected I should give. Let me say that I have heard the hon. gentleman's speech to-day with a considerable degree of pleasure, because the violence of that speech and the manner of the hon. gentleman show me that which I did not so well know before, that the news has come to him and to his friends that once more the dying if not dead cause of Toryism and Tupperism in Nova Scotia will meet with a disastrous defeat. I venture to say that if the hon. gentleman had any hope of carrying the provincial elections in Nova Scotia, he would not have made this very ill-tempered speech to-day. The hon. gentleman has announced that the Conservative party are going to attack the Liberals at the provincial election; he has sent his missionaries throughout the length and breadth of the provinces, he has sent a distinguished member of his own family down to Nova Scotia to take part in the campaign; and he seems to have so little confidence in the prospects of the election, that he is prepared to-day to confess, as he virtually does before the world, that when the polls close on the 20th day of April—if that is the day when the elections are to be held—once more the Liberals will succeed, and once more my hon. friend will discover that in the province which it was his pride to claim that he ruled, his name is no longer one to conjure with, and his party no longer has any considerable number of supporters. This debate began with a reference to the Grand Trunk Railway. I suppose it was well understood that that was merely a gentle opening of the debate, and that the main purpose was to allow my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition to indulge in this explosion on the coal question. We are not deeply interested in Nova Scotia, not locally interested, in the question of the Grand Trunk Railway, and I do not suppose anybody imagines that this coal discussion has been raised to-day merely to ascertain if a certain arrangement has been made with the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, here is the whole story in a nutshell. Negotiations have been conducted with the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, here is the Railway Company. These negotiations have not yet been completed, and the hon. the Minister of Railways has said that he is not in a position to lay the matter before the House. If the president of the Grand Trunk Railway Company makes a speech in London which is designed to influence—though I do not suppose the hon. gentleman meant to suggest that, or which did influence the stock market, that is a question between Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson and his stockholders and the London market, and they can settle it among themselves. This Government is not concerned in anything that Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson may say; it is concerned in submitting to Parliament at the right time, after matters have been fully discussed and have been brought to a conclusion—this Government is then concerned in submitting those matters to the High Court of Parliament ; but until they have been so concluded, it would be preposterous to bring them down and lay them on the table. That is the whole story of the Grand Trunk Railway. Now, with relation to the interview which it was my privilege to hold in Montreal a few weeks ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Before the hon. gentleman leaves the Grand Trunk Railway—as he is, of course, well posted with regard to the matter, and the House as well as the country is anxious to know the facts—will the hon. gentleman tell us whether any Order in Council resultant from the negotiations with the Grand Trunk Railway has taken place in regard to it ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I hope my hon. friend knows me well enough to know that I will not tell him, because I think it would be exceedingly improper. Orders in Council, Mr. Speaker, are frequently passed and wait for a long time before being submitted to Parliament, because the public interest so requires. Coming back now to the question of this coal interview, the leader of the Opposition began with a somewhat remarkable statement that I had given to a private corporation information which should only have been given upon the floor of Parliament, information which, he said, we had refused to give on the floor of Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman emphasizes it by saying “hear hear.” Well, now, whatever may be the merits of that information, whether good or bad, I could not well have refused to give it to Parliament at a time when Parliament was not in session. When the interview which I had the honour of holding in Montreal took place, it was a considerable number of days before Parliament opened ; and, therefore, when the hon. gentleman says that I gave them information which I had refused to bring down to Parliament, he has forgotten the important fact that Parliament was not in session. Now, Sir, as to whether there were reasons why that information should not have been given, I grant you that might be a fair matter of debate ; but before the hon. gentlemen are in a position to determine that question, they must be as fully informed as I was of all the facts which led me to make that statement. It is one of the disadvantages to which public men in official positions must submit, that at times they have to make statements without fully disclosing all the facts upon which they base them ; and I venture to think that if it were in the interests of the country that I should lay before Parliament now all the facts that led to my making that statement, there are very few members of this House who would not say that I was fully justified in taking an exceptional course in relation to it.

Mr. FOSTER. A little retaliation, was it ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. There was very little retaliation, I think ; nothing of retaliation in it. I think the whole tone of the remarks was not of a retaliatory character ; but I am willing that the hon. gentleman shall differ with me on that point. What I wish to say is that the Government had good reason for making that statement. I hope the hon. gentleman is not serious when he asks me to state whether I have the authority of my colleagues for making the statement I did. I had hoped I had been long enough in public life to be known as one with a little knowledge of public affairs and of the constitutional principles of government, and I cannot imagine the hon. gentleman to be serious when he wants to know whether I spoke in the name of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. How about Mr. Dobell ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find, when Mr. Dobell is here, that he is generally able to take care of himself. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman seems now to be very much concerned as to whether that statement is to be adhered to. I am going to take him into my confidence and tell him that the statement that I made at Montreal is the statement of the Government to-day, as it will be when the Budget speech is made. If there is good or bad in it, you have it now before you, and hon. gentlemen are free to make whatever use of it they can. But did I give it to a private corporation or not ? What does the hon. gentleman mean when he says that I gave the information to private parties ? How was this information given ? To a delegation representing the coal interests ; and he said, quoting the letter of a gentleman in support, that it was a delegation representing the mines of Cape Breton owned by outsiders. Who were these outsiders ? The hon. gentleman is himself one of them, for he is a director of the General Mining Association.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Let me say that on the day that I accepted the position of a member of the Government, I resigned any connection with the General Mining Association.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The point is not important ; but if it is important, I understand when the hon. gentleman at a by-election went to the county of Cape Breton—after he had induced, by a pleasant arrangement, an excellent gentleman to accept a position in the Senate and allow the hon. gentleman to run for his seat—he pretended before the electors that he was a director of the General Mining Association, and that he was so at that time. The hon. gentleman now tells me it is not so; I am bound to accept his statement, and I do not attach much importance to the point.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My statement was that when I became leader of the Government I resigned my position.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. That was not the main point. The main point was that a deputation representing several coal companies, I am not sure that I can now tell the House how many there were, waited upon me. But what has the number got to do with it? The hon. gentleman talks of giving away private information, he uses words that were used a few days ago in regard to giving private information with respect to the tariff, an act which I said would be one of a shameful character. Sir, it would be a shameful act to give away any information in regard to the tariff to any private individual for his advantage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman say whether there was more than one company represented?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Budden denies that distinctly in the letter I have read.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Mr. Budden could only say that he was not there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He says that other companies were not notified to be there.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. He says that the companies intended to be present, but were not notified. I cannot help that; I did not notify them. Gentlemen came to me and talked with me on the question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. One company.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. It was represented that other companies would come; I cannot tell how many companies were present. But I may say that the hon. gentleman's own company, the General Mining Association, was represented at that deputation. I do not, however, attach much importance to this matter. The point of importance is, in the first place, that there should be good and sufficient reason for my action, and I shall be in a position at a future day to offer full explanations and vindicate myself before Parliament and the country. In the second place, the important point is whether information was given privately; but instead of such being the case, it was given to the public and to the world at large, and within half an hour of the interview information was given to the reporters of the press and was sent on the wings of electricity over the continent to all parties interested. If, therefore, the hon. gentleman wishes it to be understood that any information was given to any company or to any person connected with any company under conditions which permitted them to take any advantage in the matter, there is not a shadow of foundation for such statement. I want to say a word in regard to the hon. gentleman's championship of the coal interest. The hon. gentleman has told us that for a long time there has been a great fight waging between the two parties in Nova Scotia on the coal question, and he has quoted some observations of my own; but he has not quoted any observations made by me that are inconsistent with the view I now hold. He has shown that I went into Cape Breton, and in the presence of the coal miners, and that at a time when I was asking votes for my friends, I told them they had no right to demand exceptional treatment for the coal interests, but that they must stand or fall with other interests. I am afraid that would not be the method pursued by the hon. gentleman, that he would be prepared to say to the coal miners that he thought a certain policy would suit them, but when he went off in another direction he would not be prepared to hold up the flag in the same way. But what is the history of this question? It is time the hon. gentleman ceased to masquerade as the defender of the coal interests of Nova Scotia. Let the hon. gentleman go back in his memory a few years. Let him not go back to the beginning of the National Policy, not to 1878, but to 1870, when there was a National Policy question in this House. The hon. gentleman was a member of the House at that time, but not a member of the Cabinet, if my memory serves me correctly. He came before this House, and declared almost as strongly as he has spoken to-day, that in the interests of the Dominion of Canada, it was necessary to have a great National Policy, which would include duties on coal, flour and various other products. He persuaded the House to agree with him. This National Policy was carried out in 1870. In 1871 something happened and something had happened in the meantime. The leader of the Opposition to-day had passed from the ranks of a private member to the position of a Minister of the Crown, and if he was the protector of the coal interests in 1870, surely he would be more powerful in defending those interests in 1871, when he had taken his place in the Cabinet. Well, Sir, the Government brought in a tariff at that time which included a duty on coal. The hon. gentleman stood up for that tariff at first, but after a while he discovered something which led him to understand that if he were to continue a fight for coal he might lose his office. He saw it was imperilled, that his friends in Ontario and in some other provinces did not want a coal duty. And then, what? Did he stand by his colours and fight the battle, determinedly and unflinchingly, of the coal industry? No; but when he saw that a firm position on that great question—because he himself had declared the coal question to be a great question, and one involving great principles—might lead to a loss of position and defeat of his government, the hon. gentleman sacrificed the coal industry and took the duty off coal. There were some protests made on the Conservative side of the House of that day, for some hon. gentlemen were not so heartless as was the hon. gentleman himself. He was the father of this infant, the National Policy, but when the critical time came he was willing to let it be kicked out of doors. There was, however, an hon. member, I think from Ontario, who moved to restore the coal duty and the duties on flour and other articles which made up the National Policy. The vote was taken in this House, and the name of the hon. leader of the Opposition is recorded as voting against the coal duty and as having kicked the National Policy out of doors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find in "Hansard" a full and complete refutation of the statement he has made, which will fairly silence any such arguments, which indeed he is only repeating.

An hon. MEMBER. There was no "Hansard" at that time.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I will not rest on the point that there was no "Hansard" at that time; there were, no doubt, newspaper reports. In those reports we will find some of the hon. gentleman's finely spun arguments, such as he delivers when he seeks to make black appear white; but he will find in "Hansard" and in the Journals of the House the vote he gave when he took the duty off coal and strangled his baby, the National Policy. No amount of explanation will ever wipe out that record, and it must not be expected that the people interested in Nova Scotia coal mines are going to forget it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman strangled a babe eight years before it was born.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I have already shown the hon. gentleman that there was an older National Policy than that of 1878, that the National Policy was born in 1870 and not in 1878.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find he is altogether mistaken. The proposition to levy a duty was brought down by the Government, and the Government was defeated on the occasion, and the duty was not imposed.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman is quite right in a certain sense. The Government brought down the proposal, they were defeated on it, but they did not resign. The hon. gentleman must know that if the National Policy involved the great principles which he has always contended it embodied, if it were essential to the good government and welfare of Canada that duties should be imposed on those articles in question, then there was a great issue at stake, and he who tells us now that he fought a determined and unflinching battle for those principles, in dealing with that great question—I do not say that this applies in all minor questions, but it applies to a question of such vital importance to the Dominion and above all of such vital importance to the province of Nova Scotia—he should have gone down with the wreck rather than have submitted. The hon. gentleman brought down the tariff, and found difficulty in carrying it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not in the Government.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The hon. gentleman will find that in 1870, when they put on the coal duties he was not in the Government, and perhaps should not claim much credit, but in 1871, when they took the coal duty off, he was in the Government. It is, I say, too late for the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to masquerade before the people of this country as the great champion of the coal industry.

There was one point in the coal question wherein I differed from some of my friends in Nova Scotia. I took the view, which the hon. gentleman himself once entertained, and I hope even yet entertains, that the best thing that could happen for the coal trade of Nova Scotia would be that we should have free trade in coal with the United States. I believe it would be the true policy, to let New England buy her coal from Nova Scotia and to let the province of Ontario buy her coal from across the line. I believe, that if that were done by both countries it would be the true policy, and the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) once talked in that way. He went down to the end of the pier at Sydney Harbour, and he pictured to the people the great future they would have when his party brought about a reciprocity treaty with the United States, which he pledged he would get within two years if the electorate adopted the National Policy. He pictured the great future before that harbour and that town from the development of the coal trade—not the coal trade of the upper provinces, but the coal trade of New England. By and by, when the elections were coming on again, the hon. gentleman went back on his declaration in favour of reciprocity, and he sent his agents up and down through the Dominion, into every coal mining electoral district, to tell the people, that if the Liberal policy of reciprocity in coal were carried out, the mines would be closed up. He was then going back upon the declarations of a lifetime; but that was not all. At the time I made that speech in the town of Sydney, from which he quotes, I was face to face with an audience of coal miners, and I told them that free trade in coal between Canada and the United States was the best thing that could happen them, but many of them would not believe me. I did not blame them for that. The managers of the coal mines came up and joined the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and said they could not stand that sort of policy, and they joined him in declaring that this Grit policy of free trade in coal was going to shut up the mines. Well, Sir, who will believe it? At that very time, when the Government of which the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) was a member sent their Ministers and their speakers throughout the coal districts to say that the Liberals were going to shut up the coal mines by advocating reciprocity with the States; there was on the files of the Committee of Ways and Means at Washington a letter of Sir John Macdonald, offering reciprocity in coal. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) talks of having one policy in one place and another policy in another place, but what are we to think of that? Picture, if you can, the scene, when my Liberal friends and I were going up and down through the coal mining districts telling the people frankly that it was our policy to have reciprocity in coal, and my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) and all his associates following us around and declaring that that policy would shut up the mines, when, at that very moment, his Government had a proposition before the Government at Washington offering reciprocity in coal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

THE MINISTER OF FINANCE. Does my hon. friend deny it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do. The hon. gentleman has asked me if I deny it, and I tell him that there is not the slightest foundation for the statement that the Washington authorities had a proposition of the Government before them; unless the proposition of a single member of the Government given to an individual, binds the Government? I say this emphatically: That the letter which Sir John Macdonald gave to Mr. Ritchie, without any communication whatever with his colleagues, did not bind the Government in any shape or form and never had been authorized or assented to in any way whatever.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. In a famous transaction a few years ago, a phrase was used, "the inferior members of the Government." The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) would have us believe, if he could, that he was an inferior member of the Government and did not know what was going on. I refuse to believe that an hon. gentleman occupying the high position that he did as a Minister of the Crown, did not know what Sir John Macdonald was doing.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding) allow me to correct him again. I was not in the Government then.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Well, considering the manner in which my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) has been slipping in and out of the Government for years one may well be pardoned for not knowing whether or not he was in the Government at a certain period. However, we are not likely to make any further mistake in that direction, for we know that he is out of the Government now, and with a fair prospect of staying out. But the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) knows, and the House knows, and every one who knows anything of constitutional government knows, that when the Prime Minister of a Government writes a letter on a public question in the name of his Government—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Yes, and more especially when he writes that letter to a public man in another country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, to a private individual. The letter was to Mr. S. J. Ritchie, a private individual.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) is not going to escape on any such plea as that. Sir John Macdonald wrote the letter to Mr. S. J. Ritchie, of Akron, Ohio, and he told Mr. Ritchie to take that letter to Washington. He authorized him to show it to the Committee on Ways and Means, as the basis of their action, and he only exacted one condition: Don't say anything about it just now. The Nova Scotia elections were coming on, the Dominion elections were coming on, lots of elections were coming on, and the coal miners' votes were required. Don't say anything about it now, because, if you do, we won't be able to go down to the county of Cape Breton, and tell the coal miners that the Grit policy of reciprocity is going to shut up their mines. I say that, in the whole history of the coal trade; in the whole history of tariff questions in this country, there never was a more scandalous exhibition of duplicity and double-dealing, than when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) and his colleagues went throughout the length and breadth of the coal districts in Nova Scotia, declaring that the Liberal policy of reciprocity would shut up the mines, while at that very time, they themselves had made a proposition to Washington to have reciprocity in coal.

I do not wish to labour this discussion, Mr. Speaker, and I think I have said all that is necessary, barring a single word on another matter. I do not deem it necessary to say anything about the provincial elections in Nova Scotia. I am not indifferent to them; I am naturally desirous that my friends down there shall win, but I say, Sir, that, in my connection with this coal question, in the interview that I had in Montreal—and I state this now with the expectation that those who know me will believe me—I had no communication whatever with the Government of Nova Scotia on the subject. The hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) speaks of doing these things with a party purpose in view. That, I take it, is an illustration of the homely adage in reference to measuring other people's corn with your own half bushel. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that they never made a move in these great questions in which they did not endeavour to turn it to some mean party advantage, and, therefore, they naturally suppose—and knowing them I forgive them for it—that we would do the same. Well, Sir, we are naturally human; we are far from perfect, but I hope we are not going to follow in their footsteps, and I hope we are not going to turn anything to the lowest and meanest party advantage. If it were necessary to say anything to help my friends in Nova Scotia, I would be willing to do so in a manly fashion, but the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) has shown me to-day that there is no necessity for anything of that sort, because he has thrown out the flag of distress, and he has declared that the provincial elections in Nova Scotia, soon to be held, will be one more of the many triumphs of the Liberal party.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). From what has transpired in the House this afternoon, in our endeavours to get information from the Government, it is quite clear that the Ministers intend to be very reticent. The efforts of my hon. friend the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) have only resulted in eliciting the bald information that the Government are negotiating with the Grand Trunk Railway Company. With regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway, all the information I can get is that the Government are considering whether they will negotiate or not; and on other questions we have seen the same thing. The other night we tried to learn from the Government what their intentions were in connection with the mission to Rome. The Minister of Public Works, in the celebrated document which he read to the House, said:

Your Holiness has already been made aware of the conduct and attitude of certain prelates and of certain members of the secular clergy, who, during the elections in this country in the month of June last, intervened in a violent manner.

We asked the Minister of Public Works at that time if he would put us in possession of that information. He declined. From what has occurred here this afternoon, it is quite evident that we must take the same means to get that information that we have had to take to get the information with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway. We had to go to the Grand Trunk meeting to find out what was the intention of the Government with regard to that railway. It is quite evident that we shall have to go to the ablegate himself to get this information, unless hon. gentlemen opposite bring it down. I think they are showing bad policy in not taking this House more fully into their confidence. They ought to give the information in regard to the Grand Trunk Railway which has been properly asked for; they ought to give me the information in regard to the Canadian Pacific Railway which I have repeatedly tried to get; and the Minister of Public Works ought to give us this information in regard to the ablegate. All I can say is that the newspaper men—and I hope they are enterprising—will have to send and ask the ablegate to give that information which the Government have declined to give to the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite should not forget that they have a record in this House. The hon. ex-Finance Minister commenced this discussion by drawing attention to a quotation from the "Star," and finding very serious fault with the Minister of Railways for not at once giving information regarding the proposed arrangement between the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Government. Allow me to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to an instance in which a quotation was read to this House from the same paper from which he has quoted to-day. He was then the leader of the House, and occupied the position of Finance Minister. It occurred on March 21st, 1893:

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a statement made in the Montreal "Star" of yesterday. An interview is reported with Sir Charles Tupper, in which he said that the treaty was essentially a Government treaty, which they were obliged to carry through the House, or resign. Has the hon. gentleman taken notice of this paragraph, and has he information to give the House?

Mr. FOSTER. I have not taken notice with regard to that paragraph, and do not propose to criticise it.

Mr. LAURIER. Nor to give information?

Mr. FOSTER. At the present time, not.

This was in connection with the French treaty, a matter of vital importance to this country. It is well known that the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) negotiated that treaty, and questions were asked across the House as to what the Government intended to do with regard to it, and from day to day they declined to give the information; but in the Montreal "Star," the very paper from which the hon. ex-Finance Minister quoted to-day, the leader of the Opposition declared that the treaty was complete, and that the Government would have to ratify it or resign; and the ex-Finance Minister refused to give the House the information. Yet he gets up to-day and finds fault with the hon. Minister of Railways because he does not give information on a question on which the Minister of Railways declares that the negotiations are not yet complete.

Mr. IVES. Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion, I would like to ask the members of the Government present if any Order in Council has been passed by the Government with respect to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to St. Hyacinthe or to Montreal, or with respect to the arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to which the president of the company referred at the meeting in London the other day; and if so, whether that Order in Council will be brought down and submitted to the inspector of the members of this House.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I am sorry that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is not in his place. My impression is that the Order in Council will form part of the record, which is not yet complete; but I would rather not give a definite answer to the hon. gentleman's question, but would ask him to repeat it when the hon. Minister of Railways is present.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I would like to see the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) in his place before I proceed; but perhaps the hon. Minister of Finance can explain the matter I complain of. The hon. gentleman has stated that owing to engagements in his department, extending over a number of weeks, he has been unable to give that attention to the election in Nova Scotia which he would like to have given. I have reason to believe that if he has not been able to give the attention he would like to have given, he has been able to delegate that duty to another member of the Cabinet. A few days ago I had information from the county of Cape Breton that an officer of the Fisheries Department was distributing fish bounties in that county last week, and was at the same time canvassing the people to whom he was distributing the bounties on behalf of the Liberal candidates. I want to know if this gentleman was doing so under authority or instructions from the Government?

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will please recollect that the debate should be reasonably confined to the points raised by the hon. member who moved the adjournment of the House. A general discussion of the policy of the Government on motions of this kind is not in order.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am sorry that I cannot get this information at the present time, because it is important. However, I wish to say a word or two on the coal duties. Representing as I do a constituency where there are ten thousand people largely dependent on the development of the coal mines, it is natural that I should on their behalf feel anxious to know what the policy of the Government is with regard to that particular industry. We have had from the hon. Minister of Finance what his own organ at Halifax, the "Chronicle," characterizes as a distinct statement that not only will the duty on coal be maintained, but a duty will likely be placed on anthracite. We have had declarations year after year, extending over sixteen or eighteen years, made by hon. gentlemen who to-day occupy the Treasury benches, and by men who support them, that such a policy was legalized robbery. I take for granted that the influence of these hon. gentlemen will not allow the duty on coal to continue. It is therefore of importance not only to the capitalists who have their money invested in that industry to the extent of from $12,000,000 to $15,000,000, but to the people whose livelihood depends upon the prosecution of that industry that the intention of the Government with respect to this question should be made known at an early day.

There are a number of young people who, if they are unable to get employment in the mines, which they have been in the habit of getting in the past, will have to seek employment elsewhere, and the season now is getting so advanced that these people have to come to a decision one way or the other. A week or even a day is of great importance to them now. If the duty be reduced or repealed, the coal industry will suffer, and that will mean that these people will have to leave the country. It will mean that not one-half of the people will be employed in that industry who have been given employment in it during the past few years. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance that they should know, at the earliest possible date, what the Government definitely intends to do in that matter. These people must seek employment elsewhere if they cannot get it in the coal mines. They cannot continue idle any longer. I do not remember a year, during the last fifteen years or more, when there was idleness prevailing in the coal mines for the length of time it has prevailed during the present season. It will be very disappointing, if, after that industry has arrived at its present stage of development, owing to the policy of protection, these people's plans should have to be changed and all their hopes frustrated by any interference with the duty, because any such interference will compel them to leave the country or engage in some other industry or employment. I do not wish to detain the House, but am so anxious on this question that I would urge upon the Minister of Finance the importance of bringing down this tariff at the earliest possible date. We were promised by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), a few days before the House met, that within a week the Government would be prepared to bring down their tariff, and he further gave the assurance that the Government were going to adhere to the principles they had advanced in this House, year after year, while in Opposition. These statements have caused a great deal of anxiety among our people, and it is on their behalf that I take the liberty of addressing the House on this question.

Motion (Mr. Foster) to adjourn, negatived.

THE BUTTER TRADE.

Mr. REID moved :

That the production of cheese in Canada has reached a very high and most satisfactory point, and any expenditure for the further development of this product alone, might be detrimental to the best interests of our dairy industry as a whole.

That Great Britain imports immense quantities of fine butter from foreign countries of which Canada as one of her most important colonies, at present furnishes a very small portion.

That proper cold storage facilities are now promised by our Government.

That the governments of other countries have expended large sums of money in fostering their butter industry by means of bonuses, &c., with the result that their butter industry has prospered and assumed large proportions as is shown by the official returns of butter imported by Great Britain.

That Canada is specially adapted for and has so many natural advantages for the production of finest butter.

That whereas a large export butter trade would benefit not only the farmers as a whole, but the millions of money it would yearly bring into the country would do incalculable good to the whole community.

That in view of the foregoing facts our Government should take immediate steps to do something more to assist in the development of our butter trade, and this House is of the opinion that the Government should place in the Estimates for the present session an amount to be paid to the farmers direct by way of a bonus of one cent per pound on a specified quantity of our finest creamery butter to be exported to Great Britain while fresh and in condition to secure a reputation for itself and establish a lasting demand, and that this bonus be continued for three consecutive years. This bonus to be increased at the discretion of the Government on butter made during the winter months. All such butter to be subject to a rigid Government inspection.

That this bonus be paid only to those farmers who will furnish for export regular supplies.

He said : Before asking the House to vote on this motion, I wish to offer a few remarks in explanation of it. In the first place, I wish to refer to the growth of our cheese industry in Canada during the past few years. A few years ago Canada supplied but a very small quantity of cheese to Great Britain. At that time the farmers in the older provinces depended entirely on the raising of grain, hay and horses, but as our great North-west developed, Manitoba and the Territories were able to raise these products so much cheaper that they came into direct competition with those of the older provinces, which were compelled, therefore, to look to some new field. The Government in power at that time saw that England was purchasing very large quantities of cheese, and spent a great deal of money in developing this industry in Canada, with the result, we are proud to say, that our cheese industry has been growing from year to year until now Canada is able to supply Great Britain with 60 per cent of the quantity of cheese they now import. We are all glad to see this great growth of the cheese industry, but in our efforts to advance this industry, the great industry of butter has been lost sight of. England to-day imports 340,000,000 lbs. of butter, of which Canada only supplies the very small quantity of 9,000,000 lbs. The colonies of Australia, a few years ago, also saw that they had something to do for their farmers, who, at that time, only supplied a very small quantity of butter, and granted them a bonus direct, with the result that in a few years Australia increased her product very rapidly and is to-day supplying some 30,000,000 lbs. to Great Britain per annum. Our little province of Quebec, a few years ago, saw that it too should do something for the farmers, and adopted the plan of giving them a small bonus, with the result that in 1890 they had 111 creameries in operation, turning out 2,779,000 lbs. of butter, and some four years later they had 256 creameries in operation producing 7,704,000 lbs. of butter.

With reference to England's supply of butter, I wish to point out that the United States supplies her with 15,000,000 lbs., or very nearly twice as much as Canada. From Denmark she gets nearly 137,000,000 lbs.; from Holland, 26,000,000 lbs.; from France, 52,000,000 lbs.; from Germany, 12,000,000; from Sweden, 36,000,000 lbs.; from the Australian Colonies, 25,000,000; and from other countries, 25,000,000 lbs., making a total of 340,000,000 lbs., of which Canada only supplies 9,000,000 lbs. This goes to show that there is a chance for Canada to supply a much larger quantity than we do at present, and anything that can be done by this Government for the purpose of developing that trade, should be done. The first thing to be done in order to develop this industry is to induce the farmers to take an interest in it, and nothing will encourage them more than a little assistance from the Government. I believe if a small bonus were paid, they would at once take hold of this industry. The owners of creameries must also take an interest in it and should add creameries to their cheese factories, and it is necessary that they should be encouraged by the farmers supplying them with milk. Now if the factories were made so that they could manufacture both butter and cheese, during the winter months the farmers could make butter and thus we would be able to help the farmers during the whole year. I believe, now that the Government are, as I understand, trying to encourage the manufacture of cheese in the North-west Territories. When they get this industry further developed there, the result will be it will interfere with the cheese industry in the older provinces, for the large amount that will be shipped from there will have the effect of reducing the price here. But in these older provinces they are better able to compete in the way of making butter than they are in the North-west Territories, for the reason that in these older provinces the cattle are stabled during the winter and well fed, and so they are milked during the whole year, while, in the North-west Territories they are allowed to run on the range and are not milked during the winter. In order to make this a success it should be understood that the butter is shipped each and every week direct through to England, so that it will be fresh when it arrives on the market, and thus the reputation of our Canadian butter will always be first-class. The Government have adopted a system of cold storage, a system which, I believe, was arranged and almost completed by their predecessors. As I understand it, this Government is simply carrying out what was arranged by the late Government. I am glad of this, as I believe it will be a great help to our Canadian farmers. Now, our Government are spending large sums of money, or at least intend to do so, on the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, the Crow's Nest Pass Railway and the canals. They will have no trouble to raise millions of dollars to carry on these works. So, when I ask them to put a small amount, say ten or twenty or thirty thousand dollars in the Estimates for this industry, I think there should be no trouble in finding the small amount, as a start, to encourage our farmers. I ask this on behalf of the farmers of this Dominion. I believe that the members on the Government side of the House have, for years, been promising to do something for the farmers. There is no way by which they can do it better than to pay them a direct bonus and so encourage them to go into this industry and take a great interest in it. Therefore, I move this resolution.

Mr. FISHER. Before the motion is gone on with, I would like to say a few words in reply to the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Reid). I can agree very heartily with some of the propositions in this motion, certainly in the first, the second, and the third. That other governments have been successful in stimulating the export of butter to Great Britain by means of bonuses, I am not quite so sure as the hon. gentleman seems to be. That Canada is specially adapted for the production of the finest butter, I most certainly concur in, and emphatically declare; and that a large export butter trade would benefit the farmers and other people of this country is also a self-evident fact. Having thus cleared the ground as to the things to which we can agree, I must venture to take a little exception to the manner in which the hon. gentleman proposes to stimulate our butter trade. He wishes to stimulate by bonus butter making and the export of butter from this country, and quotes in support of this the experience of Australian colonies and of our own province of Quebec, and then goes on to point to the increase of butter-making and the export of butter to England from Denmark, France, Holland, and other countries. I wish to point out, in the first place, that one Australian colony, Victoria, for six years, did give a bonus for the export of butter. During that period the butter exports from Victoria very considerably increased, as I find from the figures under my hand. But immediately upon the cessation of the bounties, the export of butter from the colony to Great Britain dropped enormously, showing that the stimulus was not sufficient to encourage and to create a proper and legitimate trade. There is no doubt from the experience of that Australian colony that the stimulus given was of a hot-bed nature, and that the trade cannot stand without it, although it had had for six years a large bonus given for the export. This does not encourage me to adopt that plan; on the contrary I look upon it as a warning against following it. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the experience of the province of Quebec. I know something about the experience in that province, probably more than the hon. gentleman does. I would point out, first of all, that a bonus was given by the province of Quebec, but none was given by the great province of Ontario from which the hon. gentleman comes; but notwithstanding the fact that Quebec gave this bonus and Ontario did not give one, the increase of butter exported from Ontario has been far larger than the increase of butter exported from Quebec; in other words, the butter-makers of Ontario, without the stimulus of a bonus, have been able to improve their trade, to increase their exports and to establish their business on a firmer basis without a bonus, than the farmers and butter-makers of Quebec have been able to do by means of the stimulus of a bonus. But I must point out to the hon. gentleman, that this is done, notwithstanding the fact which I have stated on many occasions in both Quebec and Ontario, that the province of Quebec is probably better adapted for the manufacture of fine butter. The trade in that province has increased wonderfully during the last few years; still Ontario has increased its butter output and export without the bonus in a larger ratio than the province of Quebec. I want to point out further to the hon. gentleman, that a bonus was given in the province of Quebec to stimulate winter butter-making, and that winter butter-making, as a consequence of that bonus, was somewhat stimulated; but the province of Ontario did not give a bonus for winter butter-making, and yet winter butter-making has increased in Ontario in as great a ratio as in Quebec, if not greater. Then, Sir, from these facts I deduce the conclusion that it is not necessary to give a bonus to increase the trade in butter or to establish on a firm basis our export trade in the first quality of butter. Now, I will say another word about this bonus given in Quebec, as the hon. gentleman wishes that a bonus should be given to the farmers. The bonus that was arranged for by the government of Quebec was ostensibly to be in favour of the farmers, it was to be given to encourage the production of milk and butter in the winter, but afterwards it was for the production of fine butter for export purposes. But what are the facts? To my certain knowledge the last year of that bonus not one dollar was paid to a farmer in the province of Quebec; every dollar of that bonus was given to the butter buyers in the city of Montreal. The farmers did not reap the benefit of the bonus, but the buyers did. Now, Sir, I do not believe that that is the way to encourage our farmers to increase their production of butter, or to place their business on a firmer basis. In reply to that, it may be said that in consequence of the bonus these buyers gave higher prices to the farmers for their butter. Now, I happen to know a good deal about the way in which these buyers have bought butter in the province of Quebec; I know as a matter of fact, that the buyers of these firms who got the bonus, gave exactly the same price for the butter which they bought, that the buyers of other firms in Montreal gave who did not get any of the bonus. That is conclusive proof that in giving these bonuses we are running great risk that the farmers themselves, those for whose welfare the hon. gentleman is solicitous, those whom he represents to a certain extent in this House, coming as he does from a county in which butter-making is an important industry—I say these things show that the farmers themselves are not the ones who are likely to be benefited by a bonus. Now, Sir, there are other matters which the hon. gentleman has alluded to, and which I will deal with briefly. The hon. gentleman asks in his motion that we should give a bonus for the export of butter. I have in my hand a report of a meeting of the butter trade of Montreal, which report is taken from the Montreal "Gazette." That meeting was a large one, and representative of the trade, and they find that the plan of fostering the butter industry by granting a bonus, has been detrimental to that industry. I find it stated that:

Outside of one instance, there had not been a pound of butter manufactured in this province as a result of the bonus. It appeared that the persons here who manufactured butter from cream and milk sent from Ontario, got quite a goodly proportion of the bonus, and by this means they had built quite a little business at, as he claimed, the expense of the legislature.

Mr. Brice, who is one of the leading butter buyers in the city of Montreal, and who is very high up in the business, states distinctly here that the bonus had not fostered the butter industry, but on the contrary had been detrimental to it. This is the tone of the whole meeting. It wound up by Mr. Hodgson, a well known butter and cheese buyer in Montreal, moving:

That a committee be appointed to draft a resolution strongly advising the discontinuance of the system of granting bonuses to creameries, and also the advisability of applying whatever money has been voted for that purpose to the increasing and improving of refrigeration accommodation both by water and land.

Then Mr. Ayer moved in amendment:

That this association, having heard that the province of Quebec proposes this discontinuing the bonus to creameries, heartily concurs in the same, and recommends that any further grants be given towards the increasing of refrigeration accommodation.

We find therefore that the experience of the province of Quebec, instead of supporting the hon. gentleman's motion, rather condemns it, because the gentlemen who reap the benefit of that bonus in the province of Quebec, declare that it is time to put an end to it. I may say further that even supposing that in the early stages of the butter industry in this country it was advisable to stimulate it by giving a bonus, that stage has long since passed away. Today the butter industry in Canada is on a firm basis. True, it has not attained such grand proportions as the cheese industry; but at the same time our butter industry in this country to-day is growing rapidly, our exports in butter have increased enormously during the last two or three years. During the season just passed we exported more than double the amount we did the year before; the year before that we exported more than double what we did the preceding year; in other words, our butter exports have been increasing by over double for the last three years; and I venture to say from the knowledge that I have of the business, and from considerable inquiry made throughout the country during the last few months, that there is a fair prospect that, without giving any bonus but by the natural increase of the trade, and by the growing efforts of the men engaged in this business, the butter export of Canada during the coming season will again double the quantity exported last year. The hon.

gentleman spoke about encouraging winter butter-making. Let me tell him, if he does not already know it, that during the winter just passed we have been exporting every week a large quantity of butter to England, a thing which has never before been known in the history of our butter export trade. This export trade has usually ceased along with the closing of navigation in the St. Lawrence; but every week during the past winter there have been quantities of butter shipped from the maritime ports and from Portland. That will go on until the spring trade opens, and for the first time in the history of the butter trade of this country, Canada will export butter every week in the year. The hon. gentleman has alluded to the cold storage arrangements which, he says, are accomplished. I am happy to be able to take this first opportunity of informing the House, as I have informed the country on various occasions, that the arrangements for a cold storage system by which our butter and other perishable food products can be carried to the English market by a continuous chain of cold storage, are perfect and complete. By that means, according to the information which I have received from those who are most largely interested in the butter trade and those who are concerned in its manufacture, an enormous increase to the butter trade, which a few months ago I foreshadowed, is almost sure to come about. The only difficulty we have experienced in the past in England is that our butter has arrived there in a different condition from that in which it was produced in the factory. Now that has been changed, and we have arranged that our butter shall be shipped here in as fine condition as when it issues from the creamery, and I have no fear of the result; but, on the contrary, I feel perfectly satisfied that the dairymen of Canada will be able to take the same position with our butter that is taken by them with our cheese, and that in the near future we shall be able to say in regard to Canadian butter, as we are able to do in regard to Canadian cheese, that it stands at the head of the market. Under the circumstances, I hope my hon. friend will not press his motion. He made it, no doubt, in the interests of his constituents and in what he believes to be the interest of the trade; but from my knowledge of the trade—and I can say without boasting that, owing to information obtained from the position I occupy, and from my large connection with the trade, that I possess a little more information than does the hon. gentleman—I can assure him that this proposed arrangement is not necessary in the interest of the butter trade, while, at the same time, it might become an enormous charge on the revenue of the country, which I do not think it is necessary for us to ask, although, if necessary, I would not hesitate in the interest of the trade and of our dairymen to ask for anything that might be necessary to stimulate their trade. I have taken that position in regard to cold storage. I asked last year to be given a comparatively free hand to make arrangements to secure the object which the hon. member has in view. The House gave me a free hand, and I have accomplished that object at a reasonable expense to the country, and at such a reasonable expense that I am satisfied that the House will be ready to endorse propositions which I am going to bring before it this session; but, having undertaken that step, I do not think it is at all necessary in the interest of the butter trade that this increased expenditure proposed should be incurred, and, at the same time, that it will be better in the interest of the whole community if we rest satisfied with what we have done.

Mr. DAVIN moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

SAFETY OF RAILWAY EMPLOYEES AND PASSENGERS.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 2) further to secure the safety of railway employees and passengers. He said: Mr. Speaker, in rising to move the second reading of this Bill I shall have to repeat some matter that will be familiar to those members of the House who sat here in previous sessions, but I think the importance of the subject justifies me in doing so for the sake of those hon. members who are new to the question. In the first place, I may say that I was first induced, a couple of years ago, to introduce a Bill on this subject by my own observations, and by information gathered from railway employees in my own neighbourhood. Since that time, the question has been taken up by the railroad organizations of Canada generally, and the Bill, in the shape in which I now introduce it, has been compiled from a former Bill by the executive committee of the joint board of government of the railway organizations—I forget the exact name of the organization, but it is the one with which all the subordinate orders of locomotive engineers, trainmen and so forth, are affiliated, and it represents the whole body of railway employees in Canada. The Bill which I introduced last year had been compiled after consultation with the officials of that board, but they held an inquest on this Bill during the last few weeks, and sent me a copy exactly as they wished it to be presented to the House, and the Bill as introduced is exactly as they want it. Some provisions in my Bill, as drafted, have been omitted, which, perhaps, I would prefer to have retained, but I think it is preferable to present the Bill in the form in which the railway men desire it, and if amendments are considered desirable they can be introduced at the committee stage.

It is perhaps necessary to point out that Parliament has a right to regulate the dealings between railway companies and their employees. There is not a railway in Canada which has not received public aid in some shape or other; there is not a railway company which does not possess a valuable franchise given to them free of cost by the people. These reasons alone would justify the Government and Parliament of Canada in passing laws as to how these companies should deal with their employees. But, beyond that fact, there is the point that the occupation of a railway man is one of special risk and one requiring special qualifications. The safety of the employee's life and limb does not depend upon his own carefulness or sobriety to the same extent to which it does in many other occupations, for it depends very largely on the condition of the roadbed, of the engines and cars with which he has to deal, and therefore he is, to some extent, at the mercy of the companies that are responsible for the condition of the roadbed and rolling stock. Under all these circumstances it has been admitted by the House on a previous occasion when this Bill passed the second reading, that we had the right to interfere, and to provide how railway companies shall deal with those who work for them.

The number of those interested is worthy of the consideration of this House. I am not in a position to state exactly how many railway men are in Canada, for we have no late statistics directly on the point, that I am aware of. But we may guess the number with some degree of accuracy from the consideration of the extent of railways in operation, and the number of engines and cars which the men have to handle. For instance, during the last year, according to the report which was laid before the House a few days ago, there are 16,270 miles of railway in Canada. The different companies own 2,044 engines; of passenger cars, including mail and baggage cars, there were 3,744. The other cars numbered 57,000 odd. These figures show the enormous number of cars to be handled, besides the unrecorded thousands of cars which are not Canadian but are handled in transit by Canadian trainmen. To estimate from these figures the number of trainmen employed, we can figure that each engine requires two men, which would give at least 4,100 who are employed as engineers and firemen. If we assume that the average passenger train comprises five cars, we know that each train employs three men in addition to those on the engine, and this would make over 2,000 trainmen on passenger trains, besides those on the engines. This is the very lowest calculation, and I am sure that I have put that figure too low by assuming rather a larger number of passenger cars for each train than would be justified by the average. Supposing that there were 18 to 20 cars in an average freight train, the 57,000 other cars would make about 3,000 trains employing five men each, which would give 15,000 employees at this work. The total, therefore, of this grand army of trainmen would be somewhere between 20,000 and 25,000, and in addition to this you have the men employed in or about the railway yards and workshops. From these figures we can make a pretty fair guess at the number of men actually employed on Canadian railways during the last year. Of course, I might have taken the figures from the census, but railway work has grown since that time, and the number of employees has largely increased.

Then, as another means of estimating the number and importance of these men, we find that the working expenses of the railways last year amounted to over $35,000,000, the greater part of which doubtless went in wages to the employees. This class of men run special risks, and they require special qualifications. When you remember how far the life and limb of the trainman himself and the life and limb of all who travel by trains are at the risk of his good conduct, you will recognize that the men who operate our railways must be specially sober and intelligent and painstaking. Strong physique is required, good judgment, and above all, honesty and sobriety. When you consider that the class of men to which I have referred are as numerous as they are, and when you consider what attainments they must possess, I think you will agree with me that a great deal of consideration ought to be paid by this House to their claims. The Bill which I am introducing, is in all its particulars supported by that class unitedly from one end of Canada to the other. They are taking means, they inform me, to ask every member of this House to support this Bill, and they will give their reasons for asking for that support. I hope that when hon. gentlemen receive these petitions they will not drop them into the waste paper baskets as such things are sometimes dropped, but that they will give them their very serious attention.

Now, Sir, as to the Bill itself. In the first place, it contains provisions for the greater safety of the employees; and in the second place, it contains provisions which are intended to secure jointly the safety of passengers and trainmen; and in the third place, it contains provisions intended to secure greater general safety of transportation for freight and passengers on railways. The provisions intended for the benefit of the trainmen are few. They call for the putting on of outside ladders on opposite sides of the ends of each car, so arranged as to be convenient for the trainmen to climb up by means of them, and for arched iron rails on top of each car to assist the man who has climbed up the ladder in getting on to the running board. The Bill also provides that all box freight cars built for use on Canadian railways shall be of uniform standard height, and of capacity not to exceed sixty thousand pounds, and of a pattern to be approved by the Minister of Railways and Canals. The subsequent clauses provide penalties for infraction of these provisions, and make it the duty of the Minister of Railways and Canals to proceed against any company violating the Act, by failing to put these attachments on the rolling stock.

Then, Sir, there is a provision intended for the safety of all concerned, namely, that all cars fitted with air-brakes shall, within two years from the passing of this Act be provided with an automatic device in the hose coupling of such air-brakes, or in the train pipes, so arranged that, after the cars are coupled, the connection between such brakes and the air-pump on the locomotive cannot be broken, or the couplings deranged, accidentally or otherwise, without the knowledge of the engineer. To some this may not appear to be an important provision, but its importance is brought home specially to those who live in my part of the world by an awful accident that occurred at St. Thomas fifteen or sixteen years ago, just for the want of such an appliance as this. An excursion train coming north from Port Stanley tried to slack up at the usual point after entering the city of St. Thomas. The engineer applied the brakes, but the brakes which he had supposed to be in perfect order, did not work. The train could not be stopped, and it rushed along to the crossing of another railway, struck a train of coal oil cars, cut it in two, set fire to the coal oil, which burned for some time, and then exploded, and the result was an awful conflagration of cars and human beings, which produced a very dreadful impression upon the minds of the people, and is not forgotten to this day. Since that time many similar accidents have occurred, one, I believe, within the last week or two, which I have heard of but have not been able to trace in the papers. Any railway man will, of course, see at once the tremendous importance of the engineer knowing whether the air-brakes are in a condition to work or not. This section has been objected to on previous occasions because it was thought to be introduced for the purpose of booming some particular device or contrivance for this purpose. As more than one device is known by which this desired end can be accomplished, and the compulsory direction to put an arrangement of this sort on cars does not involve the using of any particular patent. It only provides that some arrangement of that kind must be put on these cars within two years after the passage of this Bill.

Coming to the provisions which refer generally to transportation, I will quote the last clauses of the Bill :

8. (1) Every railway company shall at all times employ a sufficient number of telegraph operators, train men, section men and other employees and workmen to safely carry on its business, and to keep its bridges, track, roadway, rolling stock and plant in good condition.

2. (2) If it fails to do so, it shall be held responsible for all injury to life, persons or property in connection with its operations.

This I consider one of the most important clauses of the Bill. It protects the general public against the undue economy sometimes exercised by railway managers in letting the road run down until it has become in an unsafe condition. Almost every one of us must have travelled at some time in his life over a railway which had a pretty decent alignment, on which the grades were not steep, but yet on which the cars bumped around and the rails rattled in a manner which proved that that part of the road was not properly looked after. There was not a sufficient force of section men, and something slightly wrong with a spike, or a tie, or a rail, was allowed to get worse, until the road was really in a condition not fit to be travelled on. This Act provides that if a road is allowed to run down in that fashion, the owners shall be responsible for any damage that may happen.

I have left, however, perhaps the most important part of this Bill, as regards railway men, to the end. It provides that when a railway employee is injured, or killed, or disabled for life by an accident which happens to him in the discharge of his duty, and which is not caused by his contributory negligence, he or his heirs shall be entitled to a fixed compensation from the railway company. The Bill fixes the compensation in the case of a man who is laid up from work because of injury, at 60 per cent of the current rate of wages for his class of workmen, but not more than one year. It fixes the amount to be paid for total disablement at $3,000, and the amount to be paid to his legal representatives in the case of his death at the same figure. I do not care to stand on these particular figures of percentage or amounts, but I want to establish by the Bill that there shall be some fixed amount payable to a man who is disabled or laid up on account of accident, or to the representatives of a man who is killed. In the case of manufacturers using dangerous machinery, legislation has always interfered to protect the employee. In the case of railways, I think there is much more reason why legislation should interfere. There is this particular reason in the case of railways, that although, as the law now stands, an employee may be entitled to damages for injury sustained, he can only get those damages by means of tedious lawsuits which may be carried from court to court, until the employee is worn out by the litigation, while the railway company does not mind the cost of repeated appeals, since it may save litigation in other similar cases. I want to illustrate that point by reading a brief account of a case which actually occurred in Montreal some years ago, and which I quoted last year :

One Mr. Flynn, an employee of the Canadian Pacific Railway, was killed in the yard at Hochelaga by an accident caused by the negligence of a fellow-employee. His widow sued for damages, and, after going through a lot of preliminaries, she got the case to trial, and obtained a verdict of, I think, $5,000 from the jury. Then the company took the case up to the Court of Review for interpretation of judgment, as I believe the phrase is in the province of Quebec. The judgment having been confirmed in favour of the widow, they went further, to the Court of Appeal, and asked for a new trial. The Court of Appeal refused a new trial. The company went from there to the Supreme Court at Ottawa, and that court granted a new trial. So, after the fourth step, the extremely expensive one of an appeal to the Supreme Court, the widow was obliged to go again before the jury and prove her case from the beginning. A new trial was held. The jury gave a verdict for rather larger damages than the first time. In the meantime, in some of these proceedings—I do not know at what stage—it was decided that the company was liable when an employee was killed in the manner in question, and so this issue was really already decided ; but the company went on fighting, in the hope of tiring out the poor widow. They went back to the Court of Review, and the decision was again favourable to the widow. They went to the Court of Appeal again, but that court decided against the company. They went to the Supreme Court again, and this time the Supreme Court did not grant a new trial. Then they took the case across the sea to the Privy Council, and the Privy Council finally confirmed the judgment of the first court, and the widow got her damages, and the railway company had to pay the costs.

There was a very elaborate series of twelve or thirteen steps before the poor widow of Mr. Flynn got the damages from the railway company to which the court in the first instance decided that she was entitled. If it had not been for the generous assistance of the fellow-employees of Mr. Flynn, and the kindness of Mr. T. Cassie Hatton, a lawyer in Montreal, who assisted in carrying on the case, this poor woman could not have got what she was entitled to in equity, and, as it finally appeared, in law also.

I do not say that the railway companies invariably pursue heartless conduct of this kind. I do not say that even in this case the solicitor of the railway company was inspired by heartless feelings, or by a desire to defraud the poor woman ; but you know that it is a principle of all corporations—in fact, they feel it to be their duty—to fight to the last any claim for damages, no matter how well founded it may seem in the first instance. Railway companies do constantly fight all such claims whenever there is the ghost of a chance of tiring out the litigants by repeated appeals. It is to save the railway men from such a necessity, and to give them, or their legal representatives in case of death, a fixed rate of compensation for injuries that I have introduced this clause of the Bill.

I further provide that the employee shall not be able to surrender these rights to fixed compensation, by any bargain he may make with the railway company ; for, if he were allowed to so contract himself out of the obligations, it would always be made a condition of employing a man that he should surrender them by his contract, and the Bill would have no effect. The Bill provides sufficient safeguards in the way of medical certificates, &c., in all cases in which these damages are claimed.

Now, I shall not detain the House any longer on the details of the Bill. When I brought it up last year, it was allowed to pass the second reading, but the Government of that day insisted upon sending it to the Railway Committee. I hope and expect that the Government of to-day will take a more reasonable view. It is quite impossible that a Bill of this kind should be fairly discussed in a large committee, like the Railway Committee, consisting of over a hundred and fifty members, most of whom would necessarily be ignorant of the technicalities in a Bill of this kind, and also unable to hear and study all the evidence adduced. I propose to ask the Government and the House, if this Bill passes the second reading, to allow it to be referred to a special committee of nine members, to which also, no doubt, a subsequent Bill that will be moved in this House will be referred. I shall ask that this committee hear both sides, the railway workmen and the railway employers, and decide what particulars should be in this Bill and what left out. I take the ground that those who accept places on the committee are favourable to the principle of the Bill, and will merely use their judgment in the maturing of the Bill, to the best advantage, after the principle is accepted.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. CASEY moved :

That Bill (No. 2) be referred to a special committee of nine members, composed of Messrs. Maclean, McGregor, Ingram, Choquette, Stubbs, Belcourt, Powell, Ellis and the mover, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and report from time to time by Bill or otherwise.

Mr. TISDALE. I do not propose to take up the time of the House in discussing the principle of the Bill, but I see no good cause for referring it to a special committee. The argument of the hon. gentleman was rather against that reference, when he said that many members of the Railway Committee would be ignorant of the technical matters involved. I do not think there are many technical matters in the Bill. The main principles are two. One is whether we shall adopt the principle—a very large and serious one, in the circumstances in which our railways now stand—of forcing them to adopt appliances of this sort. The second is whether we shall depart from our usual course by taking this matter out of the hands of a large committee, especially appointed and qualified, and refer it to a special committee. The hon. gentleman asks that it be referred to a special committee favourable to the Bill, but I submit that what we require is discussion before a body that is neither favourable nor unfavourable until they have examined into the matter. The hon. gentleman selects a committee favourable to the Bill. I do not think that is the sort of tribunal it has been the practice of this House to choose. I hope the Government will not establish the principle of taking an important matter like this out of the hands of the Railway Committee specially appointed to deal with such matters and which, I am sure, will impartially inquire into it, and put it in the hands of a special committee. The Government, of course, have discretion in the matter, and they must assume the responsibility. Then, as regards the question of saving time, my experience is that, in matters of principle such as this, the report of the committee, whether the Railway Committee or a sub-committee, is sure to be fully discussed by the House. It is only when questions are technical or local, when they deal with matters peculiarly of a family or personal nature, that they are referred to special committees. But when great principles are involved, the Railway Committee is the proper body to which to refer them.

Mr. CASEY. The principle of the Bill is not referred to the committee. That principle has been endorsed by the House in giving the Bill a second reading. What the committee has to do is to consider the details of the Bill, and to decide how best to carry out the intention of the House, and it has invariably been the practice of Parliament, when a Bill is referred to a special committee to refer it only to a committee which is in favour of the principle adopted by the House. The decision of the committee is subject to revision by the whole House. It is useless to bring a Bill of this kind before the Railway Committee because only a few of the members stay there to hear the arguments, and the great mass only come in to vote. That is not the way to perfect a Bill or to construct one Bill out of the two or three that may be referred to the committee.

Mr. MACLEAN. I have had a good deal of experience before the Railway Committee in connection with a Bill of a similar nature which I introduced in preceding sessions and with which I made very little headway. I am glad to join the hon. gentleman in asking for a special committee to consider his Bill. Such a committee would bring out the facts to the House, and the House, having accepted the principle, we will speedily come to a conclusion. That committee will have nothing else in charge but this special legislation. It will be able to tell the railway employees, who are very anxious for this Bill but who cannot afford to lose any time, on what day they will be heard here, and will be ready on that day to hear them and also the railway companies. And the Bill in my name also, no doubt, will be referred to this committee and considered at the same time. I am very much in favour of a special committee having charge of this matter, and I think that this House should do something to remove a great abuse and protect the lives of railway employees and the public.

Mr. IVES. This is purely a business question, and my experience in the Railway Committee is that it is par excellence the business committee of the House, and one would suppose that a committee of business men of the House, composed of 160 odd members, who are in the habit of dealing with these questions from session to session—many of them old members who have been on railway committees for the last eight or ten years—would be a more suitable committee to refer this question to than any possible small special committee. I have heard the names of those proposed for the special committee, and although they are all estimable men, and men of good judgment no doubt, still none of them, so far as I know, are railway men, none of them have any special technical knowledge to fit them for dealing with this particular case. There are in the Railway Committee several hon. members on both sides of the House who have a very intimate knowledge of railway subjects, and it does seem to me that there would be nothing whatever gained by referring this important measure to a special committee composed of a small number of members as proposed. The matter must come back to the House. The hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) knows very well that though his Bill has had a pro forma reading, it is not fully born yet; it will have to stand the ordeal of a great deal of criticism in the House, and probably, of a division, before it becomes law. The hon. gentleman had better go to the Railway Committee; it would be better in his own interest, because if he succeeds in getting through the Railway Committee, he will have a better chance of getting the Bill through the House. The Railway Committee may appoint a special committee and refer the Bill to it, if they think it best. Now, this question is not a new one; it is one that has been before Parliament for a number of sessions, and it is met with the very vigorous opposition of all the railway companies, and will, no doubt, again. Why? You may say, for the selfish reason that it involves the railway companies in a very large expenditure. The Government itself is interested in two ways. Of course it is interested in the safety of citizens who are railway employees, and it is also interested as the owner and operator of the Intercolonial and other railways which would have to submit to the provisions of this Bill just the same as other railway companies will. I may be mistaken, but I think that this Bill, innocent though it may appear, will involve the expenditure of a great deal of money, of an enormous amount of money, and it is quite certain that the matter must be considered by the House more fully than it has been to-night, it must be considered by a much larger number of members than this small select committee to which it is proposed to refer it. There is another matter to which I would call the attention of the hon. the leader of the House and the Minister of Railways, and that is that this motion proposes to give the committee power to send for persons and papers. That is a very wide power and one that may involve a large expenditure. It may mean an investigation reaching over the whole Dominion. This is a question for the Railway Committee, and I certainly think that the hon. Minister of Railways and the leader of the House will be taking a serious responsibility if they allow this question to be referred to a select committee as proposed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think there is a great deal of force in what has been said by my hon. friend from Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives). The Railway Committee as constituted last session, and as, no doubt, it will be arranged this session, is a very strong committee, and will be able to examine this question more fully than it will otherwise be examined. Moreover, when they have examined it and come to a conclusion upon it, the decision at which they arrive will much more likely be accepted by this House than a report of a special committee. In the interests of the measure itself, I think it will be better to have the report of the Railway Committee. The object of my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) is not to get the report of the committee, but to get the Bill carried in the House; and unless he is able to carry a large portion of the Railway Committee, which, I think, consists of something like 169 members, there is no prospect of a report even in favour of the Bill receiving the approval of the House. But if it is decided to refer to a special committee I would suggest the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals should be a member of that special committee, so that the Government may have an opportunity of hearing any testimony that may be introduced upon the subject. There is no question that this is a very important measure. Anything that can be done to protect the lives of railway employees deserves the most careful and kindly attention of this House. There is no body of employees in the public service or in the service of private companies that deserve more the careful attention and consideration of this House in regard to do everything that will protect life and limb than the railway employees, and I am quite sure that, the feeling of hon. members on both sides of the House will be in favour of doing everything that possibly can be done, with any justice or propriety or advantage, to secure that important object. Therefore, I trust that my hon. friend will consent to refer this Bill to the Railway Committee, or, if this is not done, that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals will be appointed a member of the special committee to which the Bill is referred.

Mr. INGRAM. As I have been named as a member of that special committee, I desire to say a word. I differ from some of my hon. friends as to referring this Bill to the Railway Committee. I believe it to be in the interests of railway companies as well as of railway employees that this Bill should be referred to a special committee. It is not correct to say that the members of this proposed select committee have no practical or technical knowledge of the subject dealt with in this measure. I pretend to have both practical and technical knowledge of this matter as complete as that possessed by any other member of this House. My practical knowledge of legislation of this kind leads me to the conclusion that there is a very great misunderstanding between the railway employees and the railway managers as to what is to the best interest of the employees and management of the railways of this country. So far as I know, the management of the different railways are doing their best to introduce the latest improvements on their railways because it is less expense to operate the roads when they have the latest equipments. Now if the representatives of the employees and the representatives of the officials managing the roads assemble together and discuss this question, I am satisfied that the railway employees will be less eager in their demands upon the railway companies. For that reason, it is in the interest of the railway companies as well as of the railway employees, that they should assemble and that a special committee should be appointed to hear the grievances or complaints of all parties concerned. Now, if I may be permitted to refer to a similar Bill introduced by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) last year, I desire to say that I took exception to certain sections of that Bill. I was told then that the committee which prepared the Bill understood what they required, and for that reason, I should not differ from them. But what is the fact?

The sections that I objected to last year have been left out of this Bill entirely, and what I stated then has proven to be strictly correct, that they were not in the interests of the railway employees or of the railway company.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should avoid discussing the merits of the Bill.

Mr. INGRAM. I was going to refer to another section, but in obedience to the Speaker, I will pass it over until the Bill comes before the special committee, if it ever does. As to the matter of cost which has been referred to, I may state that so far as railway managements are concerned, I think they would not object to coming here to give their evidence before this special committee. I do not think that would be a reasonable objection to the appointment of a committee. Now, it has been said that the railway companies are put to large expense. This Bill, if it passed, might involve them in large expense. I think the employees in this country are not fully posted as to the extent of the improvements which the railway companies are putting on their railways. Last year the Canadian Pacific Railway put $300,000 in their estimates for the purpose of equipping their cars and engines; and this year they are also going to expend a considerable sum in the same way. The Grand Trunk Railway is doing the same; and the Canada Southern Division of the Michigan Central have scarcely a train passing over their road that is not controlled by these latest improvements.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to say one or two words in support of the reference to a special committee, and also in support of the suggestion that the Minister of Railways should be on that committee. Those who think as my hon. friend from Norfolk (Mr. Tisdale) seems to think, that all we should desire, those of us who are interested in legislation of this kind, so much desired and so necessary—that all we should desire is to have it go before the Railway Committee, probably have not watched as closely as those of us who are interested in this legislation, what the fate of such measures is when they go before the Railway Committee. Let me point out what happened in 1890. I introduced a Bill in this House with provisions somewhat similar to these, and with other provisions of importance, and specially relating to the North-west Territories. That Bill passed its second reading here, but when it went up to the Senate it was emasculated there. In 1891 I had the Bill again put on the paper, and Sir John Thompson agreed that it should be put on the Government Orders. It passed the second reading, and I naturally thought, after Sir John Thompson had agreed that it should be put on the Government Orders, that the moment it passed the second reading the Bill was safe. But when it went up to the Railway Committee, why, you could not get a red herring into that committee room. The Railway Committee room was crowded with members on both sides, and although that Bill had passed its second reading in this House and had received the imprimatur of the Government, when I divided the committee upon it, I only got four members to vote with me. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we cannot trust to the Railway Committee in legislation of this sort.

Mr. IVES. How are you going to escape them when you come back to the House?

Mr. DAVIN. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker. If they vote in the House they vote in the public eye, they vote in the eye of the newspapers. What they do here is known; but what they do up in the Railway Committee is not known, is not reported, and the yeas and nays are not taken. Now, I believe, as my hon. friend has just suggested, that the railway magnates of this country are greatly mistaken in supposing that the reforms we seek to carry out in the interest of the employees, in the interest of the life and limb of those men on whose alertness the lives and limbs of tens of thousands of people every day depend—I say the railway magnates are mistaken in supposing that the reforms we seek to accomplish are not also in their own interests, and in the interest of their shareholders. Now, with regard to one of the main provisions in the Bill of my hon. friend—I believe the great railway company that runs through the North-west Territories probably felt that its interests at the time I brought forward those measures of which I speak, were opposed by my Bill. But what have they done, Sir? Year after year they are gradually bringing in the couplers that I sought to compel them to bring in; and that shows that they think it is to their interest, whenever they make new cars, to carry out such provisions. I think it would be very important, and add to the weight of that committee, and add to the confidence of this House in the committee, to have the hon. Minister of Railways upon it, and I therefore move that his name be added.

Mr. CASEY. In speaking to the last amendment, I beg to say that I should be only too happy to have the Minister of Railways act as a member of the committee. I had asked him whether he thought he would have time to do so, and he was very doubtful on that point. If he can reconsider that point and act as a member of the committee, I should be very happy indeed to have him upon it.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think if the Bill goes to a select committee it would be well to have the late chairman of the Railway Committee act upon it, I mean the hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Tisdale). He has had a great deal of experience in railway legislation.

Mr. TISDALE. I decline, Mr. Speaker.

Amendment (Mr. Davin) agreed to.

Motion, as amended, agreed to, and Bill referred to a special committee.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MACLEAN, in moving the second reading of Bill (No. 3) to amend the Railway Act, said: This Bill is exactly on the same lines as the preceding Bill, although of somewhat narrower scope. I do not intend to take up the time of the House in urging anything in its favour, having spoken on the subject several times heretofore. I will simply content myself by moving the second reading.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and referred to Special Committee on Bill No. 2.

IMPORTATION AND EMPLOYMENT OF ALIENS.

Mr. COWAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 5) to restrict the importation and employment of aliens. He said: Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable timidity that I rise to move the Bill which I am going to ask the House to adopt. I quite readily understand that it is entirely contrary to the trend of modern legislation and to the ideas of the Canadian people to place any restriction upon labourers from any country entering the Dominion of Canada. At the same time, I feel, coming as I do from a border constituency, immediately facing upon the great republic to the south of us, that I would be derelict in my duty and to the labourers and artisans, not only of that constituency but to the labourers and artisans of every constituency in the Dominion of Canada if, under all the circumstances, the state of affairs, and in view of the legislation that exists in the United States of America to-day, we did not put forward an honest effort to protect Canadian artisans in the labour market at home. I do not propose to go into particulars and enter into the details of this Bill at this juncture. Bills of a similar character have been before this House on previous occasions, but I am going to content myself with reviewing, during the short time that I propose to occupy the attention of the House, some of the legislation of the American republic respecting the employment of aliens in that country, and which operates exceedingly harshly against the labourers and artisans of this country. I believe, Sir, that somewhere about 1875 or 1876 they passed a law which, if it had been put in force, would have had the effect of restricting, to a certain extent, Canadian labourers and artisans obtaining employment in that country. The lines were gradually drawn tighter until, in 1885, and by subsequent amendment in 1886, a law was passed which prohibited labourers and artisans from any country, entering into a contract outside of the United States to perform labour in the United States. But those restrictions were not put into force as against the Dominion of Canada, as they were intended by the leaders of that time to apply to the importation of Chinese and Italians. That legislation was passed, not on the ground of protecting the labouring men of the great republic, but on the ground that it would restrict the importation of objectionable labourers that would lower the moral, social and physical status of the citizens of the country, and the institutions of the land of the free and the home of the brave would thereby be endangered. That policy was continued, and somewhere about 1887 or 1888 those laws were enforced against the Dominion of Canada, until to-day all along the frontier which divides this country from the United States, Canadian labourers and artisans, whether going to visit that country or secure employment, are turned back into the Dominion, and are refused entry into that country. There have been previous discussions in this House on the subject, and a good deal has been said and articles read and documents quoted to show the treatment meted out in certain instances to our citizens. A short time ago, I picked up the Windsor "Record," and I found the following article:

Another outrage was committed on a young Canadian this morning by Detroit customs officials.

W. J. Sutherland, a young man of about twenty years, from Wallacetown, Elgin county, came through on the Michigan Central Railway this morning, to visit his uncle, Mr. F. Offer, at Detroit.

He was met on the other side by one of the immigration agents of the United States, and asked to explain himself. The young man said he was going to visit his uncle. This did not satisfy the officers, and they proceeded to overhaul his baggage and open his letters found in his valise. Among them was one received some time ago from a firm in Detroit to whom Mr. Sutherland had applied for a situation. The letter was a refusal. The officers then assumed that he was again looking for a situation, and, after the usual compliments to Canada and Canadians, the young man was fired back over the river.

After reading that article, and being desirous of securing information on the subject and the true circumstances of the case, I sought out the young man and took from him a declaration, which I will read to the House. It is as follows:—

Dominion of Canada, County of Essex.

To Wit:

In the matter of W. J. Sutherland and his return to Canada under order from American customs.

I, William J. Sutherland, of the hamlet of Wallacetown, in the county of Elgin, do solemnly declare that, on the eleventh day of January, A.D. 1897, I was on a M. C. R. train, travelling on a ticket purchased at Dutton Station, where I took the train for Detroit. My baggage was examined, and the officer asked me my age, where my home was, and how much money I had. I gave him the information, and had about $8.50. He then asked me what I was going to Detroit for. I replied: to visit my uncle in Detroit, and gave him his address. I had some private letters in my valise. He opened them, and one was an answer to an application I had made for a situation several months before, stating they had no opening. And I was ordered back to Canada, and they refused to permit me to enter the United States. I had no contract with any person to enter into or engage in any employment in the U. S., but was on my way to a friend's. I after crossed on another ferry and went to my friend's, and am to-day on my return to my home in Canada.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

W. J. SUTHERLAND.

Declared before me at the city of Windsor, in the county of Essex, this 19th day of January, A.D. 1897.

M. K. COWAN,
A Commissioner.

The young man made that declaration before me and I signed it as a commissioner for the county of Essex. I have read it in order to show that not only the existing law in the United States is stretched to its utmost limit, but even a man's finances are inquired into for the purpose of endeavouring to find an excuse under the Pauper Immigration Act to refuse respectable citizens from Canada entrance in the republic. I have just one more case to cite. I have here a letter written on December 19, 1896, to Mr. A. McNee, editor of the Windsor "Record," as follows:—

Windsor, December 19, 1896.

Sir,—The following are the facts relative to the action of the customs official and immigration inspector, in refusing me the right of admittance into the city of Detroit on the evening of December 15th (Monday), from off the ferry boat plying between this city and that of Detroit:—

I left my home (Toronto, Canada) at 10.10 p.m., December 5th, and came over the Grand Trunk Railway, through the tunnel, arriving in Windsor at 9 a.m., the next day. As I have friends on both sides of the line, I concluded, at their invitation, to stay a short time. I had intended going on to Cleveland, and possibly on to Chicago. I endeavoured to secure employment on both sides of the line, but failing, was on my way to Cleveland, when stopped, baggage examined, and held myself, put through a series of questions as to my intentions and destination. To their query as to whether I was seeking employment or not, I replied: I have friends in Detroit with whom I purposed staying for a time, intending to go on my way as soon as I should get a remittance I had written for. A customs officer named Flummerfelt asked me what money I had. I told him, about five dollars ($5), but I expected to get more from Chicago in a day or two. He seemed to regard my statement as untrue, and said so, and did not hesitate to state on every possible occasion that I had prevaricated throughout.

I took exception to these remarks, and he would then take advantage of occasions afforded to emphasize the fact that I was an alien—perhaps, more properly speaking, a Canadian—and he an officer of the American Republic. In brief, I was parolled, after being debarred, and remained so for over forty-eight hours, my baggage held, and thus putting me to an unnecessary expense. On the morning of the 16th, I went to the county clerk's office and made application for papers declaring my intention to become a citizen. I was asked if I resided in Detroit for any length of time. I told him, only a week this time, but on a former occasion I had worked in Detroit for nine months, then left for Rochester, N.Y., and being explicit, did not understand that it must be six consecutive months before making application. The clerk (Mr. Oldfield) then stated that I would require no witness, and accordingly administered the oath, which I accepted in good faith. On presenting these papers to Flummerfelt, who said that they were of no use, and he alleges misrepresentation, seized and held said papers. And the clerk refused to refund the 50 cents I had paid for them. This same officer, in his zeal, did his best to have me punished for perjury, and had it not been for chief inspector, Mr. McLogan, I might, and most probably would, have had to stand trial on this charge. I then left Detroit with my baggage and crossed the river to this city. In the evening, acting as an escort to a lady friend, I again crossed the river, and was called in and held at the customs, while this friend had to proceed alone and attend to her business, while I awaited her there. This constitutes my grievance.

Respectfully,

D. LEWELLYN IRVINE.

I read these letters, Mr. Speaker, simply for the purpose of putting on record the actual facts as they exist upon the frontier, and as seen every day by myself and my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. McGregor), and I feel there is no chance, that there is no hope of securing a removal of the restrictions that at present exist against Canadian citizens entering the United States. I sincerely trust that in the discussion of this question, I may be able to deal with it with that dignity which becomes a member of this House. I have no desire to say anything harsh against any Government which sees fit to enact legislation of such a character; but at the same time, as a Canadian citizen, I must say that while that might possibly be proper treatment to deal out to the citizens of a country whom they fear might lower the moral, social and physical status of the people of the United States, I object, Sir, that the labourers and artisans of the Dominion of Canada should be treated in such a way.

This is not a party question, Mr. Speaker. This is not a question in which any of the principles of any of the great political parties of the Dominion of Canada are involved. This is not a case into which one single party principle enters, but, Sir, as an humble member of this House, I say that in my judgment it is a question in which the self-respect and the national honour of every Canadian is at stake. I believe that our Canadian labourers and Canadian artisans stand unsurpassed to-day in the world. In their veins mingle the best strains of the best blood of the flower nations of the earth. They have all the power of application, all the thrift, frugality, independence and industry of the Anglo-Saxon blood, mingled with the sweet, the genial, the poetic and contented nature of the people of proud imperious France. Sir, the Canadian labourer and the Canadian artisan need not, neither does he ask for, protection in the open field of competition, but if any country is going to protect her citizens, and to debar the Canadian labourer and the Canadian artisan from enjoying the fruits of honest toil, then I say that the Canadian artisan and the Canadian labourer should be protected in the labour markets of home against the labourers and artisans of that country, unfettered, unhampered by restrictive laws of foreign countries. The Canadian labourer and the Canadian artisan would scorn the folding around him of the solicitous wings of legislative enactments to protect him or his in the workshops of this continent against the scions of any flag that floats over it. Too honest, too proud, too manly, to seek for more than an open field, he was never known to run to cover, or to ask for legislative aid to protect him in the unrestricted fields of competition. He never asked any Government to protect him by legislative enactment which declared that his neighbour from a foreign nation had to renounce the flag of his country and to sever the ties of his home that he loved, before he could secure the vantage-ground in life's broad field of action that pledges the inevitable to final victory. I admire the spirit of the man who says: Try me, let my honest merits be my own certificate, let the results of my honest toil be their own recommendation or carry with them their own condemnation. Sir, I have no admiration for the man who asks for an unfair advantage, or who seeks to be placed in a position better than the man against whom he is pitted. I admire the spirit and the flag of a country which says: Let your honest merits be your safeguard, we will never be the first to cast a stone at the goddess of liberty and freedom. I have no admiration for the institutions of a country that demand as a certificate to the securing of a situation, the expatriation of the applicant, and I have little confidence in the fealty of the citizenship so obtained. At the same time, the toiling masses of Canada are entitled to our first consideration, and if by force of the narrow-mindedness of the politicians of other countries, the Canadian labourers and the Canadian artisans are debarred from competing in the labour markets of the world, and are debarred from exercising their honest vocation wherever honest toil can earn an honest dollar; then I feel that we as members of this House would be derelict in our duty to our constituents and derelict in our duty as Canadian citizens if we did not put forth an honest effort to protect the Canadian labourer and the Canadian artisan in the labour markets at home against the labourers and artisans of any country which places upon its statute-books a law restricting the citizens of this Commonwealth from enjoying the fruits of labour wherever they may chance to roam. I object to the labourers of any country enjoying the labour markets of Canada when that country is not ready to extend equal privileges to our own people. It was incidentally remarked in the speech on the Address delivered by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. MacPherson) that legislation of a retaliatory character was unwise, injudicious and retroactive. I agree with that sentiment. I am not so narrow-minded as to endeavour to take up the time of this House in enacting legislation of a retaliatory character pure and simple. I am quite free to admit that the idea of retaliatory legislation for retaliation's sake is repugnant to the generous principles that pervade the breast of every true Canadian. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, if our carrying out of the first law of nature, namely, self-defence, should have the effect of protecting Canadian labourers in the labour markets of Canada, and barring out labourers from the foreign field where the greatest restriction against Canada exists, then I am willing to go as far as this Bill goes, or farther, if need be, even if the carrying out of that principle should smack, and smack hard, of retaliation. I object to a Canadian citizen having his letters ransacked at an American port, and himself being barred from that country, unless a citizen from that country meets with a similar fate at a Canadian port. I am an advocate of the freedom of the subject, with all its most valued privileges; but, Mr. Speaker, it is the principle I object to, that an embargo should be fixed against a Canadian labourer while that Canadian labourer is not protected at home against the artisans and labouring men of the country which imposes that embargo. I have that confidence in the Canadian labourer to believe that in the unrestricted field of competition he asks for no protection; and if in the fight he gets a bloody nose, he is not coward enough to ask the man who inflicts the blows to wash the bloody handkerchief. Coming as I do from a frontier city in a border county, representing, as I do, a constituency whose shores are washed by the international waters that divide both countries, I know whereof I speak when I say that constituents of mine have had indignities heaped upon them, their private correspondence searched, their breeches pockets gone through, as in the case of young

Sutherland, to see what money they possessed, as if they were moral lepers or Chinese highbinders. I say that the initiation, the inauguration, the enforcement and the perpetuation of that policy is an insult to the citizens of the country initiating and enforcing it. It is a foul stain on the legislative enactments of the 19th century, and its retention on the Statute-book is a disgrace to any country over whose domain the flag of freedom floats. At the same time, Mr. Speaker, I am willing to go on record as being in favour of the principle that the labourer from no country shall slide down the cellar door of Canada unscratched, if they are going to drive tacks in theirs. I believe they should find it mighty slippery work climbing up our apple tree if they are going to make a greasy pole of theirs. Occupying as we do the northern half of this great continent, with a climate unsurpassed, with fertile fields teeming with a power to produce, abounding in mineral wealth beyond compare, and with a population intelligent, industrious, enterprising and frugal, there is no portion of the American continent to which the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson more fittingly apply than to the Dominion of Canada when he said that "America was another name for opportunity." Our future is bright; our prospects as boundless and as limitless as the horizon of human hope. With possibilities such as these, let it be understood once and for all that we will not swerve from the strict line when duty calls, that no bribe, or no threat, or no coercion can or will swerve or sway the citizens of this Dominion from their allegiance to the British Crown, whose flag is the emblem of freedom and under whose protecting folds security is ours. Mr. Speaker, I move the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, it is very refreshing to me to hear a speech like the one we have just been favoured with, coming from gentlemen now sitting on that side of the House. I had the pleasure of introducing a Bill in this direction in 1890, and the Bill introduced by my hon. friend to-day is word for word for eight clauses a copy of the Bill I then introduced. A few years ago I introduced a Bill into this House to prohibit the importation of oleomargarine into this country. I fought for that Bill session after session, and had the satisfaction of educating public opinion, not only on the side of the House on which I then sat, but on the Opposition side; and during the last election, when my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain) came into my constituency, he said that Mr. Taylor deserved no credit for having introduced that Bill, but that Mr. Paterson, the present Minister of Customs, was the gentleman to whom all the credit was due for having introduced the legislation which finally prohibited the importation of oleomargarine into this country. I am satisfied that my hon. friend will now take some credit for this Bill. The only fault that may be found with me is that I introduced this Bill several years before its time; but I have this proud satisfaction of knowing that I have not only educated the members of this House but the people in the country, so that to-day I may challenge any member of this House to get up and say that he will vote against this Bill. It was not so when I first introduced it. I hold in my hand evidence that when I was fighting for the Bill in the House I met with some strong rebuffs from gentlemen on that side of the House; but I finally succeeded in getting the Bill referred to a special committee composed of some seven or nine members representing the different provinces of the Dominion. That committee called witnesses from one end of the Dominion to the other, and after having fully investigated the matter, it made this report:

Your committee find, on examination, that this Bill is similar in all respects to a Bill passed by the Congress of the United States in 1885 and amended by that body in 1886.

Your committee have had before them witnesses from different points along the frontier, and find from their evidence (copy of which is annexed hereto) that the American Alien Labour Law has been enforced in such a way as to compel many of our people to relinquish their employment in the United States, or to remove with their families, and reside there permanently, while citizens of the United States are permitted to work in Canada every day, and to return to their homes on the American side of the frontier at night, without interference from the Canadian authorities.

Your committee recommend that the attention of the authorities in Washington be directed to the oppressive application to Canadians of the American Alien Labour Law, and to allow such representation being made, and to afford time for its due consideration, recommend that further consideration of this Bill be postponed until next session; and if some suitable measure for granting relief to Canadians from the grievance complained of be not passed in the interval by the American authorities, then your committee recommend that a Bill dealing with this question be introduced next session and taken into consideration.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

GEO. TAYLOR,
Chairman.

After this report was printed and distributed throughout the country, petitions came in from different organizations throughout the country, year after year, asking for the passage of this Bill. I introduced it the following session, and then was met by the First Minister stating that there was to be a conference at Washington when this matter would be discussed. The charge has been made that I did not endeavour to fight this Bill through as vigorously as I might have done. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have, as best I could, endeavoured to have it passed every session, and all the time, although I failed to succeed, public opinion was being educated up to the proper point by my agitation on this question. I have here a copy of the Bill of my hon. friend who has just spoken; I have also a copy of a Bill which appears next on the paper, and which is in my name, and if hon. gentlemen will examine these Bills, they will find that the hon. gentleman's Bill is a verbatim copy of the one which stands in my name, and that the only changes are the addition on his Bill of three or four other clauses, and the provision that these clauses of his Bill from 8 to 12 shall only come in force on proclamation of the Governor General. I do not think that either the House or the country is willing to wait for a proclamation to issue, but wish this Bill to become law at once if the House approves of it. Then I would go further than the hon. gentleman's Bill goes. I wish to add another clause providing that the public contracts of this country shall be given to Canadians only. I do not think it is fair or right that Americans should come over here and compete for public contracts offered by the Government of this country. The hon. First Minister mentioned to me, just before dinner, that all the Bills dealing with this alien labour question would be referred to a special committee. If I am on that committee, I will insist on having a clause inserted into this Bill that all public contracts given by the Government must be given to residents of Canada.

In order to disprove the charge made by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) that I did not press my Bill through as vigorously as I might have done, let me inform the House what I did when I introduced, in three different sessions, my Bill into this House, and I think this will show that if the Bill did not become law the fault was not mine but will show that the country was not then prepared for a measure of this nature. In 1890 I brought in a Bill to counteract the effect of the American Alien Labour law, but the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) who sits at the right of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) did not give me the support I expected from an hon. gentleman living in a border constituency, every time I introduced this Bill. That hon. gentleman found no grievance existing in his part of the country, but I did in my constituency, and, labouring under a sense of that grievance, I introduced this measure. I was charged with having issued a proclamation. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did issue a proclamation, and it had this effect, so far as my constituency is concerned, that the Alien Labour law has not been enforced along its border since 1890. We have had since then practically free trade along the border of my constituency but, nevertheless, I introduced my Bill in the interests of the labouring classes of the Dominion, and the evidence brought before the committee which had charge of the Bill proved conclusively, that down in Nova Scotia and thence to the Pacific Ocean, our labourers were being driven back from the United States. I could read by the hour clippings from newspapers to show how cruelly our people were dealt with by the American authorities when they migrated into that country. I shall not, however, occupy the time of the House in doing so, but shall just refer for a moment or two, to some of the utterances of hon. gentlemen opposite on this subject, in order to refresh their memory. I am sorry the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) is not in his place, because it would be interesting to him to recall what he said in 1890, when I introduced my Bill. He then said:

I am sure that we all desire to promote friendly relations with the United States; but that is not to be done by passing a Bill of this kind, but is to be accomplished by friendly negotiations. I think it would promote good feeling on both sides of the line, if a large majority of this House refused to give this Bill a second reading. That is what the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in 1890. Will he rise in his place to-day and refuse to give this Bill a second reading. I do not think there is an hon. gentleman on either side who will do so, because the public opinion of the country has come to the conclusion that although, a few years ago, I was in advance of the times, to-day my views ought to prevail. Later on, I asked the House to print 500 extra copies of the Bill for distribution. In the discussion on my motion to that effect, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) said:

This Bill met with very general disappointment when it was first introduced. It contains, to my mind, very objectionable principles and very objectionable legislation, which I cannot approve of in any sense or way. * * * The present Bill will meet with greater disapproval outside of the House than it has met with in the House, and, in view of what is transpiring in the House of Representatives at Washington, I know of nothing which could be more injurious to Canadians than the publication of this Bill in the country, or the leading of the workmen of the country to believe that we are going to adopt such a measure. I, for one, will not give my support to this proposal.

And I could not get the House to go to the expense of printing 500 copies of this Bill to distribute among the workmen of this country. Now, let me read to the House what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) then said on that question. I am quoting from the Official Debates of March 19, 1890. The question was put whether the Bill should be read the second time, and no one objecting, the Speaker declared it carried. Then Sir Richard Cartwright interfered and the report reads as follows:—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did I understand you to say "carried," Mr. Speaker? By no manner of means.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, unless a division is called for.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I call for a division on that Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was declared carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a Bill which was most strongly objected to, and which ought not to be passed without division in this House. It is taking quite an unfair and unusual advantage. I had thought that the thing had been withdrawn by mutual consent.

Further on in the debate the hon. gentleman said :

What I objected to mainly was what I supposed to be an attempt to rush this through, without regard being had to its great gravity and importance. I cannot at all assent to the principle of the Bill, because it commits us, as far as it goes, to a direct policy of hostility and retaliation towards the United States.

There was another gentleman who spoke on this subject and who has been since transplanted from this Chamber to the Senate. The Hon. Mr. Mills said :

I do not wish my name to appear on the committee,—

I was asking for the appointment of the committee to whom this Bill should be referred :

—as I am opposed to the reference. I hold that it is a matter for executive action, and that the Government should assume the responsibility of dealing with an international matter ; and, further, that the committee will not have before it the necessary information to enable it to act properly. I, therefore, decline to serve on the committee.

So you will see the hon. gentleman says that this was a matter the Government should take charge of. Hon. Peter Mitchell, leader of the third party, was also named on the committee. He said :

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has taken the words I was about to utter, out of my mouth. I decline to serve on the committee for the same reasons which have been so clearly stated by my hon. friend.

And my hon. friend from West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who charged me yesterday with having been insincere in pressing this Bill upon the attention of the House and the country said :

Under all these circumstances, I am satisfied that the Government should take the Bill into their own hands and mould it so as to suit themselves, or substitute another Bill for it, or otherwise choke it off right here. Of these three alternatives, I think the proper one should be that they should substitute a Bill of their own.

And he went on and moved a motion that practically killed the Bill. I think there have been a great many conversions since then. The Prime Minister of that time, the late Sir John Macdonald strongly advocated the reference of the Bill to a committee to make full inquiry and report to this House. In 1891 (I quote from page 200 of the "Hansard" of that year) :

The Order being read for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

Mr. TAYLOR. Before proceeding with that

Mr. TAYLOR.

Bill, I would like to inquire what correspondence has taken place between the Government of Canada and the Government of the United States in reference to this subject. We had a special committee, who reported, after taking evidence, last year, that a Bill should be introduced at the next session dealing with this question.

And I spoke further on the subject:

Sir JOHN THOMPSON. In reference to the report of the committee adopted last session, some representations have been made at Washington—I think, through the Department of Agriculture. I am not prepared to say, of course, that the amelioration which has taken place, and to which the hon. gentleman has referred, has been the result of that correspondence ; it may have been rather with a view to the better administration of the Act itself relating to the importation of alien labour into the United States. I think that, under the circumstances, it would be unwise to proceed with the Bill, at any rate at present, especially in view of the circumstances which the hon. gentleman himself has mentioned, that negotiations covering practically all the questions between this country and the neighbouring country are fairly on the way to discussion next autumn. For that reason, I think it would be very desirable that the hon. gentleman should not press the passage of this Bill, at any rate for the present time. I am hardly in a position to assure the hon. gentleman that it will be one of the subjects of discussion at Washington, because that could only be done with the concurrence of the Washington authorities. Of course, it is in their power to say that any particular subject shall not be one of the subjects of discussion at the conference which is expected to take place. But I can say, and I feel bound to say, out of deference to the report which was adopted last session, that the subject it dealt with will be certainly presented for the consideration of the authorities at Washington, with a view either to the amendment of the Act itself, or, at any rate, a more reasonable execution of the Act than that which was brought to the notice of the committee last year.

Mr. TAYLOR. After the remarks of the Minister of Justice, I beg to move that the order for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the importation and immigration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada, be discharged.

Motion agreed to, and Bill withdrawn.

Then, in the next session, that of 1892, I introduced the Bill again.

Mr. COWAN. And you agreed to the six months' hoist, as you will see on page 2458 of the "Hansard."

Mr. TAYLOR. We will see what it says.

Mr. COWAN. Sir John Thompson moved the six months' hoist and you agreed to it. You will see it first mentioned at page 295.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will find first at page 295 what my hon. friend's friends said on that occasion.

Mr. COWAN. Speak for yourself.

Mr. TAYLOR. I speak for myself on this Bill. I fought for this Bill as consistently as any person could have fought, from the time I introduced it until this session, and many hon. members in this House will corroborate what I say, and moreover the record will prove it. The hon. member for Guysboro' (Mr. Fraser), whom I am sorry not to see in his place, said on page 297 of "Hansard":

Mr. Speaker, I wish to enter my protest against this Bill, in the first place on general principles, and secondly, because of special cases that I know of myself.

And he went on and made a long speech, in the course of which he said:

Although, even then, it would strike at our industries in New Glasgow, and I would still be opposed to the measure. I do not believe that this Parliament should follow the wrong methods of any country. I do not believe that we, with our broad views, should pass any Bill because another country is shortsighted enough to enact in the interests of factions within the country itself, upon which the party in power depends for its political existence. Therefore, I am opposed, with all my heart, to the passage of this Bill.

And the hon. gentleman who now presides as Speaker of this House (Mr. Edgar) said—page 306:

I think this Bill is a very extraordinary one. For instance, in the sixth paragraph, to which no reference has yet been made, I find that it is proposed to make the collector of customs at every port in Canada a judge, and a juror, and a policeman. The Bill says:—

And I ask my hon. friend who has introduced this Bill to take up clause 6 and read it line for line with the clause that Mr. Speaker quoted then as being the sixth clause of my Bill and see if it is not the same:

—"The collector of customs of any port in Canada, in case he shall be satisfied that an immigrant has been allowed to land in Canada contrary to the provisions of this Act, shall cause such immigrant, within the period of one year after landing or entry, to be taken into custody and returned to the country from whence he came, at the expense of the owner of the vessel."

The idea of coolly proposing in this Parliament legislation of that character I cannot understand. To place it into the power of any collector of customs at any port in Canada, upon being satisfied of certain conditions, to arrest an individual and place him in custody and expel him from Canada—why, Sir, I think the hon. gentleman cannot have been serious in asking the House to pass a clause of that kind.

And yet that is the very clause my hon. friend (Mr. Cowan) is asking the House to pass to-day. Why? Because it is a copy of the clause in the American statute, which I copied, simply substituting the collector of customs for the official who in the United States has charge of operating the Bill against Canadians. Now, my hon. friend spoke about the six months' hoist. The hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Ives) spoke on that occasion, he took my side of the question, and he said this:

I think the time will eventually come when the motion for the six months' hoist for a Bill of this kind will not prevail in this House.

When some person suggested the six months' hoist, the hon. member for Sherbrooke prophesied that the time would come when such a motion would not prevail, and to-night he can see his prophecy fulfilled. The time has come when you cannot get an hon. gentleman to rise in this House to move the six months' hoist, nor to make, as was made then, an objection to going to the expense of printing 500 copies of the Bill for distribution to enlighten the people of this country as to its sion opened. I thought the rules of the Government to promote this Bill. I may say that some person has charged me with not having attended to my duty in failing to introduce this Bill at the opening of the session. I was here the day before the session opened. I thought the rules of the House were that no Bill could be introduced until the session opened, and I properly lodged my notice, but I was informed that my hon. friend from Essex had taken the ground from under my feet, and had sent his notice down here two weeks before the House opened.

Mr. COWAN. No, you have taken the ground out yourself.

Mr. TAYLOR. How?

Mr. COWAN. When you voted against that Bill in 1892.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman makes a statement that is not true. I never voted against the Bill. I fought for the Bill. I fight for the Bill to-day; I don't care whether you call it the Taylor Bill or the Cowan Bill. I think I am the father of the thought anyway. I want to see the labouring men of Canada protected, and I am glad to see that my hon. friend has become a protectionist, as this Bill is aimed at protecting the labour interests of this country. I do not care who gets the credit for the Bill. I presume the Government will take it under their wing, as the Prime Minister promised me last year that next session I would have ample opportunity of pressing my Bill to a conclusion. As long as the Government take charge of it, as I presume they will do, I do not care whose Bill is adopted. I presume both Bills will be referred to a committee where they can be whipped into shape. They cannot take any bad out of one that is not in the other, because one is a copy of the other, so far as that goes. But there are three or four clauses of new matter which, perhaps, are owing to amendments made by the United States. I have already suggested one amendment that I think should be made in the Bill when it comes before the committee and that is dealing with contractors from the United States for public works in Canada. As I said before, I do not care who gets credit for the Bill; all I want is that the workingmen of this country should be protected against competition from the United States, unless the United States allow our people to go over there and have a fair show in the labour markets of that country. I have here a great many documents that I could read, like those that my hon. friend has read, showing the indignities that have been placed upon our Canadians when crossing the line; but the "Hansard" is full of quotations of that character that I have read year after year in the course of educating the people of this country up to the necessity of a Bill of this kind. I am glad the agitation has had effect, and now hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House are willing to stand up and fight for the Bill. I hope the Bill will be put into proper shape and become the law of the land, and not be left to a proclamation of the Governor General to bring it into force, but that it shall take effect the next day after it receives the assent of the Governor General at the close of this session.

Mr. CRAIG. I think every one who has been some time in this House will admit that we owe a debt of gratitude, so far as this Bill is concerned, to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor). I think also that we ought to be able to say with the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Cowan) that this is not a party measure, although I must confess that it looks a little as if our friends on the other side were trying to make it one, or to claim credit for this Bill. Of course, I suppose everything is fair in politics. Now with reference to the fact that in time past some have opposed this Bill, I may say that I myself have felt heretofore a strong repugnance to a measure of this kind, and in fact I may say that I feel so still. I look on legislation of this kind as very objectionable indeed, and as legislation which should not be passed by the House of Commons except the case is very extreme. Sir, this Bill will not be passed, this Bill is not brought forward, I am sure, in any spirit of retaliation against the United States. Our motto on this occasion is not defiance, but defence. We are compelled to introduce a measure of this kind, we are compelled by the course of the Government of the United States to pass a law which shall protect the workmen of Canada, inasmuch as they are excluded from the United States. Now, Sir, I need not say any more about retaliation, nor about the desire we have in this country to hold the most friendly relations with the United States. I am satisfied that the course of the late Government and the course of the present Government are evidence enough on that point. Sir, I think the United States are especially blameable in not listening to the Government now in power. This Government have always been particularly friendly to the United States, their policy up to the present time has always been in the direction of friendly relations with the United States; and I may say that I did hope last year when the Premier stated that an opportunity would be taken to go to the United States to get them to modify their course in this matter—I did hope that his efforts would be successful. I suppose we may take it for granted that the present Government have made efforts to that end, I suppose we may take it for granted that they have endeavoured to induce the United States to modify their conduct, and I suppose we may take it for granted that in that effort they have failed, inasmuch as they have allowed a supporter and perhaps encouraged him, to introduce this legislation. Now I notice one thing about this Bill, that is objectionable, and that is, that while it aims at the United States it applies to all other countries in the same way as it does to that country. I think if we aim this Bill at the United States, it should apply to that country and no other. But as I read it, I find it applies equally to France, to Great Britain, I suppose, and to Germany, and to all other countries in the world. I think this Bill should be made to apply to that country alone which applies a similar measure to us. Now, while supporting the principle of this Bill, there are some things in it which I think should be modified. I am strongly of the opinion that this ought to be a Government measure. I agree with the remarks made some years ago by the Hon. David Mills, as quoted by the hon. member for South Leeds, that in an international matter of this kind, a matter of such great importance, this Bill should be a Government Bill. I think the Government should take charge of this Bill and be responsible for all its provisions, and I hope this will be done yet, because there can be no doubt that the Bill may be advantageously amended. Besides if it came from the Government it would have more effect and weight with the United States than when introduced by a private member of this House. I would only repeat, that while I support this Bill, I do so with reluctance, but I am compelled to do so in defence of the workmen of this country, and I must say that the workmen where I live are almost without exception in favour of the Bill, in fact I have found no exception. While it must be admitted that such legislation is objectionable, I think the time has come when we cannot further delay legislation; we have already shown our desire to be friendly and have done everything possible to induce the United States to modify its conduct, and the time for peace has now ended and the time for action has come. I have much pleasure in supporting this Bill.

Mr. BENNETT. I think, Mr. Speaker, the passage of the Bill now before the House will be disappointing in the extreme to the mass of labourers and artisans in the Dominion of Canada, for if I am correct in my opinion of the Bill, it will resolve itself into this, that if it does no harm, it will not do much good, and vice versa. Divested of a great deal of the verbiage which surrounds the first clause, it reads to this effect :

After the passing of this Act it shall be unlawful for any person to prepay the transportation, or in any way assist or encourage the importation or immigration of any alien or foreigners into Canada, under contract or agreement made previous to the importation or immigration of such alien or foreigner, to perform labour or service of any kind in Canada.

Under that clause it seems to me, to place the matter in a nutshell by way of example, that it will be quite competent for a man wishing to employ say 20 carpenters in Windsor to cause an advertisement to be placed in a Detroit newspaper, and 20 carpenters might come over from Detroit and seek employment on the Canadian side, because there is no contract made on the American side and no encouragement or assistance rendered to those men to come over there. I quite agree with the hon. member for East Durham (Mr. Craig) that throughout the country there will be some disappointment at the Government not having taken up this measure. I know that in my constituency during the late contest the announcement made there by Ministers of the Crown that the Government would cause to be placed on the Statute-book an alien labour law did not convey to listeners an idea that the Bill was to be a Bill of this limited and very trivial nature. If an alien labour law is to be passed in this country, let the law be a sweeping one, made to meet the case completely. On the north shore of the Georgian Bay year in and year out for the past ten or fifteen years we have seen Americans coming from the other side and being employed in lumber camps and also Americans employed in mills owned by Americans on the Canadian side, these men finding employment to the detriment of Canadians who are looking for employment. I shall certainly support the Bill going through committee, but I hope and trust that when it comes back it will be quite different from the Bill drafted by its original sponsor, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and that it will be a Bill to prevent the entry of this country of Americans or foreigners from any other country and to compel them, if they wish to come here to have employment to become citizens of the country by taking the oath of allegiance pure and simple. The Bill as at present drawn, if it does no good will certainly do no harm, but by its reference to a committee I hope it will come back strengthened and fortified so as to meet the demands of the Canadian working-classes. Let us pass a Bill to prevent Americans coming in and working here, and taking wages and wealth out of the country, but if they desire to come let them at the same time become Canadians not only in the matter of employment but become Canadians in every sense of the word by taking the oath of allegiance and remaining here permanently.

Mr. SPROULE. I think this House will willingly award its meed of credit to the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who has so industriously followed up this subject from the time he introduced a Bill of this kind up to the present time, and I do not think any hon. member can properly refuse to give him credit no matter how disagreeable it may be to do so, because to my personal knowledge he has always endeavoured to the best of his ability to get some such Bill crystallized into law and be made effective. We are entitled I think to congratulate the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) for one thing at least, and that is that his action has dispelled the illusion in the minds of members of the House that he is a free trader, for he has become an ardent protectionist, because if there ever was any Bill introduced in this House for several years past that bore on its face the principle of protection, it is the present Bill. I congratulate the hon. member on his conversion to protectionist principles, for I always understood he was a free trader before he entered this House. I am willing to give him assistance to pass this Bill, because it is a good one, and I have always favoured a measure of this character whether introduced from the Government or the Opposition side of the House. I believe it is a step in the right direction, and is justified by the fact that Canadian labourers, not only men but also women, seeking employment, should be protected by such a law as is proposed being placed on the Statute-book. I have noticed from time to time that Mr. DeBarry, in Buffalo, has sent back not only men in search of employment, but also women, and in many instances Canadians visiting their friends. When a great country like the United States goes to that extreme it is right that we should in self defence introduce such a measure as the present Bill, and pass it. I need not say anything in regard to what has occurred from year to year on the north shore of Georgian Bay, because there the Americans come in by hundreds, they bring in their own supplies, they bring over contract labour and they supplant Canadians employed in that district. But when this portion of the work is finished, and the raw material, the saw-logs, are sent over to American mills, Canadians are met by American agents at the frontier and are sent back by virtue of the legislation which they have adopted in the United States. It is time we made some effort to protect Canadians. I believe this Bill to be a good enough one, and if it does not go far enough, it will be the duty of the committee to amend it to cover the whole ground, but so far as it goes, I am heartily in accord with the views sought to be carried out by the hon. mover, and I am willing to give all the assistance in my power to enable him to crystallize it into law.

Mr. CLARKE. I am in favour of this Bill, although I regret very much the necessity of introducing and passing it. It cannot possibly be said, however, that the responsibility for enacting such legislation rests with the authorities of this country or this Parliament. The hon. gentleman who has introduced the Bill and moved its second reading has briefly reviewed the character of the legislation which has taken place on the other side with respect to the prohibition of workmen entering that country, and as each succeeding measure is introduced into the United States Congress, its provisions are found to be more drastic than those of the one preceding it. The object and effect of such legislation can only be to cramp, confine and prohibit Canadian workmen from finding employment on the other side of the line. It seems to me that legislation of this kind will deface our Statute-books, but at the same time I believe that if this Parliament desires to retain the respect of the great body of toilers in this country, it is its duty to act. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has said that this Bill if it does not do much good will not do much harm. I believe that if it does not render measure for measure in accordance with the legislation which has been passed by the Congress of the United States, it will be very little good, and I think the most valuable parts of the Bill are contained in the last three clauses. I regret very much to see that these clauses are not to come into effect, until a day to be named by the proclamation of the Governor General. If the time be ripe for the passage of legislation of this kind, I know of no good reason, in view of the determined action of the authorities on the other side of the line, why Parliament should not pass these three clauses as well as the other eight, and have them come into operation as soon as they have received the assent of His Excellency the Governor General. In view of the pledge given by the hon. the Premier at the last session of this Parliament, and in view of the subsequent action taken by the United States authorities, it is the bounden duty of this Parliament to express its opinion with no uncertain sound as to that legislation, and to enact for Canadian workmen the fullest measure of justice and protection that this Parliament can possibly give them. Organized labour in Canada has had its attention drawn to the condition of things that exists in the United States, and it has given its opinion regarding it. I notice, in the report in the proceedings of the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada held at Quebec in September last, that the matter was under consideration there. It was brought up, I believe, through the presentation by the secretary, Mr. Dower, of a letter which he had received from the president of the American Confederation of Labour, Mr. Samuel Gompers, in reply to a communication which Mr. Dower had sent him respecting this matter. On pages 15 and 16 of the report of the proceedings of that Congress, Mr. Gompers's letter appears, and he says :

I have the honour to acknowledge your valued favour of the 24th instant, contents of which have been carefully considered and noted. Of course, I can see the apparent justice of the complaint you made against the operations of the Alien Contract Law of the United States and its application to our fellow-workers, and particularly our fellow-unionists, of Canada. Beyond doubt, there are some cases of hardship and injustice resulting from the application of that law, but I think you will agree with me, when I say that the wage-workers of the United States were compelled to adopt some method by which their interests could be protected, not so much against our fellow-workers of Canada, but of those who come to the United States under the contract, either written or implied. * * *

I recognize the difficulty confronting us to-day, and the justice of the complaint of members of local unions attached to their international unions if their cards should not secure them the rights of work and membership everywhere. I believe with you, that men finding employment in our respective countries should make their abode therein. You say that your Congress is to convene at Quebec on September 15th, when the subject matter will be discussed. I do hope that grave consideration will be given the matter, and that no ill-advised action will be taken.

This communication of the president of the American Federation of Labour was referred to a special committee, and I see on pages 29 and 30 the report of the special committee which was adopted by that Congress :

That the executive of the congress be, and they are hereby, instructed to consider the subject referred to in the said letters, along such lines as may be deemed best to secure the end in view.

It is also recommended that the congress hereby records itself in favour of the adoption of federal legislation prohibiting, under heavy penalties, the importation from any country of persons under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

That is an expression of opinion by the representatives of organized labour in this country at the Congress held at Quebec in September last.

In view, Mr. Speaker, of the repeated insults that are being given Canadian workmen when they attempt to cross the border to seek employment, I think we would be derelict in our duty as a Parliament, if we did not adopt legislation treating American workmen who come to this country, just exactly as Canadian workmen are treated who go to the United States. There seems to be a consensus of opinion in favour of the passage of legislation of this kind; and whilst we must all regret it, it is a gratifying thing that we are seized with the importance of the subject, and that we desire to give fair-play to our own people, in our own country. It seems to me, too, that there need be no further time lost in passing this legislation, for I have carefully read as many of the speeches as I could lay my hand on, of the gentleman who occupies the distinguished position of President of the United States, and I have yet to see in one of these speeches the slightest sentiment, given utterance to by that distinguished gentleman, of a desire to promote friendly relations with this country, or to alleviate in any way the harsh lines which have been drawn by American legislators against Canada. For these reasons, and for other reasons, which might be advanced if I trespassed on the time of the House, I strongly support the passage of this Bill, because I believe that under it a great deal more employment will be found for our labourers and artisans than can be found at present. I believe that hundreds, if not thousands, of citizens, who owe their allegiance to the United States now find employment in Canada for the whole, or for the greater part of each year; and under the operation of a proper Alien Labour Law these people would be compelled to assume the responsibilities of British subjects in Canada, or return to their own country, and their places would be taken by many Canadians and British subjects who are now out of employment.

The most regrettable feature of legislation of this kind to me is, that it is an indication that there is something wrong in the social and economic conditions of the people of both countries. It seems to me that with such great possibilities and resources as exist on both sides of the line, and especially on this side of the line, it should not be necessary, in order to find employment for all who are willing and able to work, that legislation of such a reactionary character should be enacted by both countries. But for the reasons I have briefly stated, I cordially approve of the propositions in the Bill, and I hope that when it goes to the special committee, the last clause will be eliminated and the Act come fully into force as soon as it has passed the House and received the assent of the Governor General.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Mr. Speaker, every time this Bill has been before Parliament it has not only received my very cordial support, but I have said a few words in its favour. I have never gone quite so far as some have in my approval of the Bill itself, and I regret exceedingly the circumstances under which this Parliament finds it necessary to take any action on the subject. During the last session when the Bill was under discussion, I had the honour of suggesting to the First Minister, that in any negotiations which might take place between this Government and the Government at Washington, it might be well that care should be taken to find out whether something could not be done to lessen the grievances which existed on account of the action of certain United States authorities with regard to the enforcement of this Act. I dare say that if you were to meet that distinguished gentleman (the President of the United States) who has just been referred to by the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Clarke), and were you to say to him, that the legislation of the United States was discriminating against Canada in the so-called Alien Labour Law, you would be told: that that was not the case; that you might search from the beginning to the end of that law, and that you would not find one single letter which discriminated against this country. And, when he told you that, he would be telling you what was strictly within the letter of the law. But unfortunately its operations extend to Canada, and although it does not discriminate against this country any more than it discriminates against any other country, yet, owing to the geographical position of the two countries and the exchange of labour that is going on between them, the operation of the Act against Canada is not only unfriendly, but is in every respect such as should be avoided as between two neighbouring nations.

Now, I do not know whether this Parliament has any power to enact an Alien Labour law discriminating in its operations against any one particular nation which by a similar law does not discriminate in name against us. I merely throw out that suggestion to those who are thoughtful, and will give it that attention which I think it deserves. I heartily approve of the suggestion that the Bill should be sent to a special committee, whatever may be my doubts as to the ultimate ability of this Parliament or the desire of the greater Parliament which still has jurisdiction over our deliberations, to put any such measure into operation. I thoroughly approve also of the provision in the Bill which postpones its operation for the purpose of ascertaining whether the Bill, if it becomes the law of this country, can ever be put into force. I certainly agree with what has been said, that this Government should act with all due haste. It is true, previous Governments have had this measure before them session after session. It is true, my hon. friend the member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has shown commendable diligence in bringing it up session after session. It is equally true that governments preceding this Government have requested that the measure stand. This Government requested that a similar measure which was brought in last session by the same hon. member should stand. They have delayed it once, and they were justified, in my opinion, in delaying it then. They are not justified, in my opinion, delaying it six or seven years more, simply because their predecessors did. Whatever may be the report of the special committee to whom the Bill is to be referred, I desire to put it to the workmen of this country, on whose behalf so much has been said, that the time has arrived when they must know whether this Parliament intends to enact such legislation, if it is within their power so to do. I do not think that fact has ever been fully ascertained as yet. The Bill itself has my full sympathy, though it is an unfortunate measure, and the occasion should never have arisen to make it necessary. But the necessities of the case have forced this Parliament to do something, and, without asking any questions formally in that direction, I should hope that whatever negotiations may have taken place between the Government of this country and the Washington Government, some request has been made that the operation of the law should in some way be made less rigorous so far as Canada is concerned. Several years ago I had some communication with the then First Minister on this subject, and I know that some communication did take place with the Washington authorities, but nothing came of it. The simple question which I wish to press upon the House and the country is that the time has come when, if we can enact legislation on this subject, we ought to do so.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I entirely approve of the principle of this Bill, and I agree with my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) who indicates that when it goes to a special committee, it will require a very thorough overhauling. The hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading of the Bill (Mr. Cowan) in a speech full of eloquence, described it as retaliatory. I think my hon. friend is mistaken as to the legislation in the United States. For instance, I find that the 9th clause, which is one of those which my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Clarke) regarded as doubtful of being brought into operation by the 12th section, says :

No person shall employ an alien coming into the Dominion of Canada in violation of this Act : Provided that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to the employment of sailors, deck-hands or other employees on vessels, or to railway train hands, such as conductors, brakemen, firemen and engineers, whose duties require their passing over the Canadian boundary to reach the termini of their runs.

I think my hon. friend who moved the second reading of the Bill is under the impression that in the legislation of the United States there is a similar clause, but he is entirely mistaken. At the present time railway men living in Moosejaw, and going down to the line, are prevented from carrying out their runs ; and I think my hon. friend has hastily taken the Act as it was introduced into the American Congress on January 28, and has failed to look at the Act as it passed the American Senate on December 18, 1896. The Act as introduced had a clause precisely like section 9 of this Act ; but you will find that the Senate excised that clause, and at the present time deck-hands, sailors, deck-hands and employees on railways are not allowed to do what this Bill would allow sailors, deck-hands and railway men coming from the United States to do. If I remember rightly, the hon. Premier himself said last session that if this question were to be dealt with, it would be dealt with by the Government, and the measure would be entirely retaliatory. Certainly, if we are to deal with the question at all, the measure dealing with it must be retaliatory to the fullest extent. My hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Wood, Brockville) has pointed out a difficulty from an imperial standpoint ; but I apprehend—and at present without further inquiry I think I am right—that we can frame a clause that will enable us to deal out precisely the same kind of generosity to the sailors, the deck-hands and the railway men of the United States that the Senate of the United States has dealt out to these classes of Canadians. My hon. friend who has charge of this Bill I rather think made a mistake in not being generous to my hon. friend the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor). Nobody can doubt for one moment that my hon. friend from Leeds brought this question before Parliament when prominent and influential men on both sides were not ready to receive it in any friendly spirit. In doing that he did the pioneer work of this question, and I think it was a mistake on the part of my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan) not to be ready to give him the credit of a Bill which, with the exception of the vicious clause to which I have just referred to and three other clauses, he has taken holus bolus from my hon. friend. In fact, although he is not in the Government he has been, to some extent, contaminated by the great men he follows. These great men have inscribed on their banners at present, "We glory in purloined policies." There is not a shred of their policy at present that they have not, in the most calm and unabashed manner stolen, and the only description that I can think of which will apply to the pirate king who leads these thirteen bandits is that which Lord Byron applies to another celebrated gentleman.

Now, Lambro was the mildest-mannered man that ever scuttled a ship or cut a throat.

I believe we have in this House, at this moment, at once, in his own person, the most audacious rifier of the policies of his opponents, and, at the same time, one of the most courteous and accomplished men I have even seen, and that goes a long way ; but I wish to point out to the Prime Minister why the Government must really take this Bill up. Here I have a picture by that great genius who daily puts before the people of Canada his graphic cartoons of the great policies that are being pursued by the leading men of the Liberal party. Here he has depicted a bicycle race. Let me say, at the outset, as one who has felt it a great honour to have been for the past ten years a member of this House, and whose sense of the obligation has been enhanced by the fact that a distinguished member of this House all that time has been my hon. friend the member for Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Now, I complain of Mr. Bengough placing a statesman of the dignity and gravity of the hon. member for Oxford in the attitude in which he is placed here. Why, we have him and the First Minister on a bicycle built for two. I object to that, in the first place, because it is not suited to the gravity and dignity of the great statesmen who are represented, but I object to it still more for this reason, that from all I can hear, the two great statesmen are very inaccurately represented as riding in harmony on a bicycle built for two. And what have we described here? Here we have the description; promises kept; the pacemakers breaking the record. Here is the hon. member for Quebec East, the First Minister, occupying the first seat on the bicycle built for two, marked "promises fulfilled," and behind him is the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and the inscription "pledges kept." What are the pledges? They are the Alien Labour Act, in the first place, and how have the Government kept this pledge? By having the Bill introduced by a very recent, but a very clever and able member, as we must admit, my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan), one of the most promising members of the Liberal party, one of the most promising of the young buds that have come in, the brightest jewel, I believe, in the new crown of the Prime Minister, but after all but a recent importation; and if the Government want to claim the honour of fulfilling any pledge with regard to alien labour, they must bring in the Alien Labour Act themselves. Then there is the Act to abolish the superannuation system and the Act to abolish the franchise law. Farmers of Canada, these are the promises kept by this Government, who made the welkin ring for seventeen years with their denunciations of a policy that was bleeding you white, to use the elegant language of my hon. friend (Mr. Lister) who is sitting behind the Prime Minister and looking as handsome as usual. These are the promises they have kept to the farmers who have been bled by the tariff, with which now, it seems, these hon. gentlemen have fallen in love. Here are little fringe questions, little, petty questions comparatively, which are put forward by this great artist, who has attempted to represent the Government as fulfilling their promises. He depicts them as breaking the record, and the way they break the record with regard to the alien labour law, which is the principal measure by the way, is to put it into the charge of one of the recent members of this House. And here it is a Bill that is, of course, entirely ineffective, because, as I have pointed out, the Bill as it passes the House was deprived of the clause which is represented by the ninth section of this Act. But I may say in regard to my hon. friend the member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who was accused, I think, rather mistakenly and hastily by my hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Cowan) of having voted against his own measure in 1892, that, if the hon. gentleman will look at the "Hansard" he will see the exact state of affairs, he will see that my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) did not vote against his own measure:

ALIEN LABOUR IMPORTATION.

On the Order to resume the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Taylor, that the Bill (No. 4) to prohibit the importation and migration of foreigners and aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada, be read a second time: and the motion of Sir John Thompson in amendment thereto, "that the said Bill be read a second time this day six months." Amendment agreed to.

Of course my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) did not vote, and the statement that he did vote against his own measure is calculated to mislead the public. I do not believe that my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Cowan) would persevere in that. Sir, I merely rose to point out the necessity that exists for the Government to take this matter into their own hands. Moreover, I think, that, as they are taking up a policy, that was the policy of one of the leading members of the Conservative party, they should take it up in an open and above board manner. I confess that this seems to me a very ineffective and very unwise way of carrying out the policy of stealing the Acts and Bills and catch-words of the Conservative party. I think the best way is to do it in the most open way possible. The best way is that taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) whom I greatly admire. I think he is frankness itself. I think that while these hon. gentlemen proclaim, as they do in the most open manner, that they are honourable gentlemen—Brutus is an honourable man, and his colleagues honourable men. Brutus, you will remember, Mr. Speaker, after killing Cæsar, went to Athens to study philosophy; he was a man after the heart of a Prime Minister—they should keep the bold road followed by the Minister of Public Works, the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick), the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) and proclaim to the world: We are all honourable men, thoroughly honourable men, and think that is a righteous thing to plunder, provided it is a civil servant that you plunder and a venial sin, if it be not a cardinal virtue, to lie, provided the person you lie to, is a Catholic bishop.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It was not my intention to take part in this debate, having spoken some years ago on the same subject, but that my hon. friend from South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) said that I asked him to withdraw his Bill. Now, Sir, the case stood somewhat in this way: My hon. friend from South Leeds was pressing this Bill. I said that the law on the American side had not been used to any great extent against the people in Canada. Where I live, we are not more than 2,000 feet from the American shore. On the American side is the city of Detroit with a population of 300,000 while we have a population of 12,000. Labour is free between these two cities and has been for many years. We have some 500 or 600 crossing from our side to the American side, and they have from 300 to 400 crossing from the American to the Canadian side, and there has been no difficulty. Now we are placed in a different position to-day from what we were in then. To-day we have to face a Bill known as the Corliss Bill.

Mr. DAVIN. No, no; it is the same Bill as this.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Take your time. Let me finish. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that the Bill was passed by the two Houses of Congress—that is the Corliss Bill and the Lodge Bill engrafted together—almost entirely cutting off the labouring portion of the people of Canada from working in the United States. We found that this would be very oppressive; but, fortunately, President Cleveland disallowed this Bill. That being the case we must wait for a short time to see what the new Administration in the United States will do. Now we hope that the Government of Canada will have sufficient influence to negotiate with the Government of the United States so that we may have reciprocal trade between the two countries in labour at least. If not, we must place on the Statute-book a law similar to the law placed on the Statute-book in the United States; and, if between one session of Parliament and the next it should be found necessary to bring that law into operation, we want the Governor General in Council to bring it into force at once. We say, therefore, it is well to have the last clause so as to hold the Bill until we are satisfied that the Americans have passed a Bill that affects us so materially as we believe that measure would do. Sir, we want to be neighbourly with our American cousins; we want reciprocity with them on every point on which it is possible to have it; we want to have commercial relations with them if such be possible. The hon.

Mr. DAVIN.

gentleman (Mr. Taylor) has said that we were entirely opposed to his Bill. We were not opposed to the Bill, but he was pressing the Bill at a time when it was not in the best interests of the people of Canada that it should be enacted—the time was inopportune. We feel that the time has come now when, if the American people place on their Statute-book a Bill such as the Corliss and Lodge Bill, people of this country will have to adopt a reciprocal measure. If they determine that the people of this country shall not get employment on the other side of the line—and you must remember that we have 4,000 miles of border fronting on the United States, and the people are constantly crossing—we must keep our own labour market for our own people and keep the Americans out. That being the case, I hope this Bill will pass so that the Government can make use of it if it should be required at any time. Sir, I was amazed and somewhat amused to hear it said that one hon. gentleman had taken the Bill of another. Why, Sir, the hon. member for Leeds took, word for word, the American Bill of 1891, with necessary verbal changes, and my hon. colleague (Mr. Cowan) who spoke so nicely on the subject, copied exactly the same Bill, but added four clauses. So he could not come very far from using the same Bill as the hon. member for South Leeds. We hope that before we meet again our Government will be able to bring in a reciprocal arrangement for trade and allow us to do away with such petty laws as between two such great countries as Canada and the United States. For I agree with many gentlemen who have spoken that it is beneath the dignity of Canada and the United States that such laws should be enacted; and I hope that the day will soon come when all such laws will be wiped out and reciprocal trade established between the two countries.

Mr. GANONG. I am in somewhat the same position as the hon. gentleman (Mr. McGregor) who has just taken his seat. I represent a county bordering along the United States for 60 or 70 miles. Not only that, but owing to the conditions there, our population is centred near the American border, so that among our towns along the American border, among the fishing stations along the coast and the country adjacent, the inhabitants come more directly in contact with the United States. We have a population of about 20,000 souls. During the investigation of this matter some years since, referred to by the hon. member for Leeds, voluminous correspondence and evidence was recorded, I believe, in our section, at the instance of the late member for Charlotte (Mr. Gillmor). And while I did not agree with all the statements that were filed at that time, perhaps, as to the expediency of enforcing a similar law to that of the United States, in so far as it affects our interests pecuniarily, I do not purpose discussing that question here. That question I consider, may be a debatable one, but I do not purpose following it further. I take entirely separate grounds from any pecuniary advantage to our country. Whatever may have been the intent of the original labour law in the United States, there can be no question that after its passage it was enforced especially against Canada, and more particularly is this true of other similar Acts that have since been passed. This had the tendency, undoubtedly, to obstruct our Canadian workmen going into the markets of the United States. But I do not consider that the alien labour question of to-day stands alone. In this, perhaps, I take a different view from the members of this House, but I cannot dissociate it from many other questions that have come up, and more particularly from the trade question. Any intelligent man who has travelled in the United States or who has read carefully the records of that country to learn the opinions of individuals, must know that there has been a feeling in the United States that we were not in a very good condition in this country, and that all they had to do was to exert a little pressure and Canada would drop in as a part of the Union. And why not this impression? The older citizens of the United States obtained this impression through their education. Some hon. gentlemen here to-night may remember their old school text-books; I do very well. There was Morse's geography, which was used throughout the country, and how was Canada represented? Simply by a picture of a beaver-dam, and some remarks were made in connection therewith that would indicate that we were nothing but a barren waste to the north of them. Since that time the education given in the schools of the United States has not tended to give the people of that country a very intelligent idea of their northern neighbours. Their school books are prepared almost wholly for the purpose of describing the United States, and pay very little attention to other countries. Then, Sir, the history of our own country from 1873 to 1878 has not tended very much to give them a favourable opinion of this country. Since that time they have been told, and have had reason to suppose, that this country is not as rich as we had an idea ourselves it was. I believe there is scarcely an hon. gentleman occupying a seat on the Government benches who has not some time within the past twenty-two years decried this country in one way or another. Their statements have gone broadcast, not only over our own country, but through every state in the union; and considering the few opportunities they have had of knowing us, what else could we expect than that they should misjudge us? I consider, as I have already said, that the Alien Labour Law does not stand by itself, but is one of a series showing the results of statements made by some of our own public men giving them the idea that with a little more pressure they might drive us into the union. Now, Mr. Speaker, with your permission I will read one of those romances, one for which I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce is responsible, as I believe it was given at a banquet to his leader down in Montreal. In view of this, how can we expect much more from our neighbours than we are asked for ourselves?

A Canada impoverished, depopulated, debauched, over-taxed, over-burdened, and under-peopled; a Canada in which, I say it with extreme regret, three important provinces were reduced to a state of almost absolute stagnation, and the two greatest provinces of all, as we know to our sorrow, increasing at a rate far below that common to the most thickly-populated European countries; a Canada in which we find to-day that of all the adult male population of our country, who ought to be with us here, aiding and helping us to build up a country inferior to none on this continent, one man in three are to-day exiled from their native land.

Such, Mr. Speaker, are the statements that have gone broadcast. I do not purpose wearying some of these hon. gentlemen, or worrying them, perhaps, by reading similar statements. They know full well how many such have been made, and for what purpose. I anticipate that they are having just trouble enough about this time as to the future; because, if we can judge from the twenty-two years of chronic political dyspepsia they have had, and the numerous nostrums they have had recourse to, we can safely conclude that they are already shaking in their boots in view of the dose they are going to get pretty soon from our great eastern tariff doctor. Sir, I am satisfied that after all the crow that has been eaten during the past twenty-two years, this will be the biggest dish for some of them they have ever sat down to. Now, this Corliss Bill has been mentioned, and I would like to refer to it for a moment or two. Let me remind the House that the Corliss Bill was not intended for the border towns. We have an idea that this friction and this agitation only exists along the border, but the Corliss Bill was not intended for the border towns. Let me read to the House a statement made by Mr. Corliss himself in regard to this matter. In answer to an inquiry, he states:

In the first place, I introduced a Bill providing that no alien retaining his home in a foreign country, should come into the United States and engage in the mechanical trades or usual labour in competition with American labour, with no intent to make this country his home or permanent abiding place. This would, of course, affect Windsor and other points just across the border to some extent, but not as much as it would under the way Senator Lodge amended the measure. My Bill was aimed principally at 50,000 or 100,000 men who came into this country in the spring, and, after working all summer, carry their money home in the autumn. Mr. Lodge insisted upon putting in the words "regularly and habitually," which caused the Bill to directly apply to Windsor people, and made a law which no one could enforce against aliens who come to this country for a season and then go home, because they may only come once.

I never meant to make this direct attack upon people who live in Canada adjacent to the American border, and I tried to devise an exception for them, but found it could not be fairly done. I have since considered the advisability of excepting all Canadians who now live within two miles of the American line, and if I find such a provision will be legal and constitutional, I will make an amendment to my own Bill in Congress to that effect. You will remember that President Cleveland, in his veto, referred to no portion of my part of the Bill, except the words "regularly and habitually," and he very justly asked what they meant. In reintroducing my measure this time, I left out those words, and I shall fight all attempts of the Senate reinserting them. I have nothing against the people who live across our northern borders. I have no desire, for instance, to interfere with a man whose farm may lie partly in this country and partly out of it; but I do believe we should give our labourers as much protection as we give our producers.

Such was the provisions of the Corliss Bill. It must be borne in mind that this Bill was not passed by a moribund Congress, but by a Congress fresh from the people, and by an overwhelming majority; so that if there is any possibility of ascertaining the sentiments of the American people upon an Alien Labour Law, that Bill expresses those sentiments. Now, Mr. Speaker, we know that some members of the Government have been down to Washington for the purpose of interviewing members of Congress with regard to this matter, and of ascertaining the feeling of the Government and Congress upon it. It is true that they were preceded by a great forerunner from the wilderness of Canadian pine; but notwithstanding all this, they have come back with results not very encouraging to us. Now, Sir, without underrating the ability of the Government, I cannot think they were wise in choosing their deputation to Washington. They might expect to be confronted with some of their own statements made here at home derogatory to their own country. These statements were of a character to induce the American press and members of Congress to believe that Canada was getting nearer and nearer to the parting of the ways. The purpose of the Corliss Bill, without any doubt, are antagonistic to Canada. Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall support the present Bill, but not because I have any desire to create a cause of friction with or annoyance to our neighbours to the south of us, who themselves have been so unneighbourly. I will not support it either as a retaliatory measure, because I believe that this country cannot be coerced by the adverse legislation of any foreign state. But standing on our rights and the dignity of our position as one of the arbiters of this North American continent we should take this means of resenting legislation which is evidently directed against us. In so far as reciprocity is concerned, I am in favour of it; but when it comes to a reciprocity that involves that the American eagle shall perch on the North Pole, I decidedly object to it in this year of grace 1897.

Mr. INGRAM. As one of those who has supported this proposed legislation every year it has been submitted to this House, I wish to say a few words in regard to it. I think we should approach this question from a non-party standpoint. It seems to me that as two political parties we have ample to divide us and to discuss without discussing a question of this character, from a party standpoint. I do not, therefore, intend to approach it in that spirit, but I hope to straighten out a few of the assertions unjustly made for what I believe to be party purposes. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has certainly introduced this Bill session after session. He has not been successful, it is true; but he has been charged by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) with having voted against this Bill in 1892. I ask any hon. gentleman whether, taking into consideration the spirit in which this Bill was received in that year, when he found the Prime Minister of that time moving the six months' hoist, backed up by the then leader of the Opposition, as well as that prominent member, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), is it to be wondered at that the hon. gentleman, finding so many opposed to the Bill, did not divide the House upon it? These are the facts. I therefore say it is unfair to accuse the hon. gentleman of having voted against his Bill. The hon. member for North Essex I remember at the time, was heartily opposed to the Bill, and he has given a very forced explanation of the reason why he changed his opinion. He says that circumstances have changed. Certainly they have changed sufficiently to justify the hon. gentleman in changing his opinion. But there is one thing I cannot understand, and it seems to be very inconsistent. The mover of the Bill we are discussing represents South Essex. In South Essex there are very few manufacturing industries, very little labour is employed, but North Essex, which is represented by the hon. member for Windsor, employs a large amount of labour, and it is chiefly Windsor and Walkerville that this Bill, if it becomes law, will benefit. How the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. McGregor) should ask, request or even suggest that the operation of this Bill should be postponed to a late period, I cannot understand. Instead of taking that step, we should do something of this kind. Section 12 says:

Sections eight to twelve of this Act, both inclusive, shall not have force or effect until a day to be named by the Governor General by his proclamation.

Instead of suggesting that section, I would suggest something of this kind: That a clause be attached to the Bill which would state in effect that whenever the United States feel like withdrawing their legislation, or withdrawing it so far as regards Canadians, then the Parliament of Canada will withdraw this legislation, or drop it from the Statute-book. We should have immediate legislation, instead of postponement, because several Canadians have been subjected to very grave annoyance in crossing the line. It has been said that the Bill would not be effectual. It may be that it would not be so effectual as it should be. But I see on the Order paper that the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Cowan) will introduce a Bill to amend the immigration laws of Canada, and I presume when he introduces the Bill it will be found that he will suggest something in the direction of the laws of the United States. Mr. DeBarry, of Buffalo, and some others who have enforced the law there, have taken advantage of the immigration law of the United States for the purpose of keeping Canadians out of their country, the Act relied upon being the Pauper Immigration Act. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) mentioned section 9 in particular, and he found fault with it because railway men at Moosejaw had not been allowed to go into a contiguous state of the United States. It may be that that state has some state law against railway employees entering it when employed in a foreign country. But if we pass such a law and apply it to Maine, Michigan and New York, and to railwaymen, we will be doing very great injustice, and it is quite proper that this particular section should be embodied in the Bill, because, taking the constituency of the hon. member for North Essex there are three lines running there, the Canadian Pacific, the Grand Trunk and the Michigan Central passing from Windsor to Detroit, and the railway men complete their runs at the latter city. At Welland we have different railways passing into Buffalo, where Canadian men complete their runs, and no opposition has been offered to the men entering the United States there. But there is one thing that should not be tolerated in this country, and that is this: We have a railway in this country which employs a large number of railway men. These men in certain lines of service are compelled to wear uniforms, and orders have been given these men that they must wear cloth sold in the United States, they are not permitted to wear cloth made in Canada. Those men have told me they can buy superior cloth in Canada and get a suit of clothes made for less money; yet the company insist that the men should buy their clothing on the other side of the line, even though they are obliged to pay increased prices. That is unjust, and if the company persists in that course, the Government should take some action to stop them. I should have liked to hear from the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), as Sarnia and Point Edward are two very important points, and I should have been glad to have had the opinion of that hon. gentleman as to the necessity of passing a law of this kind in the interest of the railway men whom he represents very largely there.

Mr. WALLACE. I think this is a very opportune time for the introduction of the Bill now before the House. I am sorry that the hon. the Premier has not yet declared his opinion in respect to it. I remember very well, that during the last session of Parliament the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) expressed full sympathy with the Bill, and from the tone of his remarks then we might fairly have expected that the Government would have introduced a measure at this session of Parliament. The hon. the Premier went so far as to state then, that if, after looking over the correspondence that had taken place between the late Government of Canada and the United States there seemed to be no way of settling the question satisfactorily to Canadians, then this was a measure that should receive the endorsement of this House, as well as his own sympathy and support. We might fairly have expected that the Government should have assumed the control of this Bill, and given us a measure commensurate with that which the United States have enacted. This Alien Labour Law has been enforced against Canadians for a number of years. The hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) took the matter up several years ago and persistently brought it to the attention of this House. I remember that Sir John Thompson thought, that because of the international character of this Bill, and in view of our relationship with Great Britain, it should not become law. The present Prime Minister of Canada agreed with Sir John Thompson in that, so that at that time the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) had neither of the leaders of the parties in sympathy with him. But, circumstances have changed, and the United States Government from year to year, either by new legislation or by a harsh and strained interpretation of the Act, have made this law exceedingly obnoxious to Canadians along the border, and to those citizens of Canada who choose for any purpose to visit the United States. I have in my hand a letter written a short time ago, detailing the treatment of two young men who were going to Buffalo for the purpose of attending an entertainment.

They say:

In crossing the Suspension Bridge on the Grand Trunk Railway train, and near the American side, we were approached by a customs-house inspector, who asked if we had any baggage, and we replied that we had none. He then informed us that we would have to go with him to the United States Immigration Office and be inspected by Mr. O'Brien, of that office. We naturally objected to such proceedings, but were compelled to go. Upon entering the office, we were questioned by Immigration Inspector O'Brien as follows:—Q. Where are you from? A. St. Catharines. Q. Are you Canadians? A. Yes. Q. What are you doing on this side? A. Going to Buffalo on a pleasure trip. He said he did not believe this, and that we looked like a couple of young fellows looking for work, &c.

That is the kind of treatment accorded to citizens of Canada who may choose to cross the border. More serious than that is the fact, that those living on the Canadian side are precluded from working on the American side, under a harsh interpretation of the law, if the law itself does not practically sanction such a course. I believe that this Bill now before us should be amended in several particulars. In the first place, you cannot enact this Bill at all against Great Britain, and by the reading of the Bill as at present, I assume that it is general in its character.

Mr. POWELL. It does not apply to British subjects.

Mr. WALLACE. Then, the next feature in it is this. It was stated by the member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) that it would not prevent men coming from the United States on American vessels to lumber in the Canadian woods during winter. My own opinion is that the first clause will, but if not, special attention should be paid to that clause, and it should not be permitted that men holding timber limits in Canada can bring across large crews of men in the fall to work in Canadian woods during winter, thus depriving Canadians of work to which they are entitled. These men should not be permitted to work here in the winter and then to return to their own country in the spring. The United States do not permit Canadians to do that.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, yes. I do not think they go so far as to exclude Canadians from that work. I think the hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) will find that a very large number of Canadians go every winter to the State of Maine and work in the lumber camps there.

Mr. INGRAM. And there was a great outcry made about it.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have never known a case where they were stopped. I think we had better proceed cautiously on that point.

Mr. WALLACE. There are restrictions under which they may go, and stringent conditions under which they must return to Canada at a fixed period. At any rate, the effect of the United States law has been, that in the border towns of Windsor and Walkerville on the Canadian side, they are preventing the citizens from going to

Mr. WALLACE.

Detroit to their daily labour, to return in the evening.

Mr. MCGREGOR. That is a mistake. They go backwards and forwards three times a day. They come over and get their dinner.

Mr. WALLACE. Where?

Mr. MCGREGOR. In Detroit and Walkerville. Five or six hundred each day. They come from Detroit to Walkerville and Windsor, and they go from Windsor and Walkerville and Sandwich to Detroit.

Mr. WALLACE. And no interference with them.

Mr. MCGREGOR. About five or six hundred go from Canada to the United States daily to work, and about three or four hundred come from the United States to Canada to work.

Mr. WALLACE. On the Niagara frontier it is quite different, and the law is being put stringently in force. We are informed that the same interpretation of the law would be enforced on the Detroit River. Now, Sir, there is another very important matter closely connected with this question, and it is this. Under the American law, Canadian contractors cannot go to the States and obtain contracts from the American Government. The very opposite is the case in Canada. American contractors come over here, and if they are the lowest tenderers they obtain Canadian contracts, just as we saw the other day when an American company came over and got the Government lithographing contract.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are committing the further crime of spending $60,000 to erect a building here.

Mr. WALLACE. They are committing the public crime of depriving many Canadian workmen of employment by doing a large portion of the work in the United States.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, no.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, yes, but I will not discuss that further now, because it will come before the House in connection with a motion for the papers and then we will have a complete discussion on it. I say that under our law, American contractors can come to Canada and compete with Canadians for Government contracts, while a similar privilege is not permitted our contractors by the law of the United States. On the other side of the line the contract must be obtained and carried out by American citizens, and I believe that we in self-protection must enact a similar law here. Why should we permit Americans to come over here and obtain contracts, competing against our Canadian contractors, when reciprocity in this is not permitted by the United States. If we are going to have an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth, let us carry it through all these ramifications of business, and enact that, as one of the clauses of the Alien Labour Bill. A case came under our notice in the papers yesterday. In the city of Toronto, where there are unfortunately many mechanics out of employment, a store has been rebuilding, and we are told that a Buffalo architect has come over and brought his Buffalo workmen with him to carry out the alterations. Such a thing would not be permitted in the United States under the Alien Labour Law, and it should not be permitted here. If we are not to have reciprocity in labour, we should prevent American workmen from having privileges in Canada which they deny to our workmen in the United States. With regard to postponing the operation of this Act until it is proclaimed by the Governor in Council, I do not think that should be done. I think the time has arrived when we should put this law into force. They have had it in force in the United States for many years, and we are only enacting the same law which they are enforcing strictly and rigidly.

Mr. COWAN. Pardon me a moment. The first seven clauses of the Bill are the American law as it is on the statute-books of the United States. The remaining clauses are the objectionable clauses of the Lodge Bill or the Corliss amendment, which passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, but were vetoed by the President. These were put in so that, if they should be re-enacted in the United States, we would be able to bring them into force in Canada immediately without waiting for a session of Parliament. But the other portion of the Bill will go into force word for word with the American law.

Mr. WALLACE. A law similar to the 9th clause of this Bill was, I understand, enacted by an overwhelming majority of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

Mr. COWAN. In the Senate it only carried by three, with some twenty-seven members absent; but it was re-enacted by a very large majority over the President's veto in the House of Representatives.

Mr. WALLACE. And I have no doubt that the new President will not take the same view of it that President Cleveland did.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). We do not know that. We hope he will.

Mr. WALLACE. The hopes of hon. gentlemen opposite in that respect have been disappointed. All the hopes they entertained of securing some reciprocal legislation have been disappointed, and I do not suppose they have any stronger hopes in regard to this legislation. While we are enacting a law to-day, we should put all necessary provisions on the Statute-book. We have refrained all these years from doing so, and the Premier expressed his hope that after the Government had gone over the correspondence, they might find some means by which the necessity might not arise for the enactment of this legislation. I presume that the Government have looked into the question and have gone over the whole of the correspondence. I presume also that members and friends of the Government by their visits to Washington, have brought this very important and live question before the attention of the American authorities; and if they have done so, I presume that they are prepared to state to-day either that the negotiations have proved abortive or that the Americans have come to terms in some way. We have not heard that they are prepared to come to any terms in regard to this matter, and we are forced to the conclusion that the Government of the United States are not going to relax either the interpretation or the carrying out of the law, or the law itself. Therefore, it becomes the duty of us Canadians to consider our own case, to legislate in our own interests, and to protect the interests of our Canadian workmen, railway employees, mechanics, labourers and all classes of the community affected by this legislation, amended and perfected as we hope to have it in committee, so that we shall have an efficient law for the protection of Canadian workmen of whatever description they may be.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, I have not thought it advisable to take any part in this debate before this moment, because there cannot be any doubt as to the position of the Government upon this Bill. In fact, I do not know that it is at all advisable to prolong the debate any longer; because, so far as I can interpret the sentiment of the House, there is a unanimous feeling at this moment, whatever may have been the opinions held by members in the past, that the persistence of the American Congress in keeping upon the Statute-book these very obnoxious clauses, leaves no alternative to the Canadian people but to apply the same law themselves. For my part, I can only repeat what I stated during last session, that I have come to that conclusion with very great reluctance. I am in no sympathy whatever with the principle of this legislation, and it is with extreme regret that I have come to the conclusion that we should follow so unfortunate an example. But the course adopted by our neighbours seems to me to leave no option to us but to apply to them the same measure of justice, or of injustice, as they applied to us. I would not care, however, to go one single step further than is absolutely necessary in order to maintain not only our dignity, but the possibility—I look to that more than to anything else—of having this obnoxious law removed at some time or other. I stated my conviction during last session, and it is my conviction to-day, that in framing such legislation, we should simply adopt the American law, such as it is, word for word. My hon. friend the mover of this Bill has embodied in it the text of a Bill which, luckily for us, did not become law. It is true the Corliss Bill was passed by Congress, and, being vetoed by the President, it failed to get the requisite majority in the Senate, perhaps only for want of time, although it got more than the requisite majority in the House of Representatives. Therefore, the Corliss Bill is not the law of the United States to-day; and that being the case, for my part, I do not think it would be advisable to make it the law of Canada. I would strictly limit the law that is to be enacted by this Parliament to a copy, word for word, of the American law as it exists to-day. I offer this suggestion to the House. With regard to the proper course to be taken on this Bill, I have conferred with my hon. friend from Leeds (Mr. Taylor), who, it is only his due to say, has taken a deep interest in this matter for many years; and he has agreed with the mover of this Bill that it would be proper to have it referred to a select committee. With regard to the powers of the select committee, I have consulted both friends and opponents of the Government from all parts of the country, and I think that it would be conducive to good results if this committee were clothed with the power to hold an investigation. The effects of this law have been confined to certain portions of the country. It has been limited chiefly to the town of Niagara and Windsor and the Thousand Islands. In so far as my information goes, this law has not been applied in Maine or Vermont or other parts of the Eastern States. Therefore, I think the committee should be empowered to hold an investigation and ascertain what are the effects of this law, in so far as they can apply to one section of Canada or another, and I propose that, when read the second time, the Bill should be referred to a committee which has been agreed on between the two sides of the House.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). Will the Bill of the hon. member for South Leeds (Mr. Taylor) be referred to the same committee?

The PRIME MINISTER. Certainly.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

Mr. LAURIER.

That Bill (No. 5) to restrict the importation and employment of aliens, be referred to a Special Committee to be composed of Hon. Messrs. Davies, Sifton, Wood, Langellier, and Messrs. Casgrain, Taylor and Cowan, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses under oath, and to report from time to time.

Mr. CLANCY. I would like to ask the hon. First Minister if it is intended that this should become law during this session. To report from time to time means that the Bill may be delayed for a very considerable period and possibly not become law this session.

The PRIME MINISTER. The hon. gentleman, being an old parliamentarian, knows that when a Bill is referred to a committee it is in the hands of the committee and not of the Government, but I may say that the Government has no intention in referring the Bill to a committee, to have it killed by the committee.

Mr. TAYLOR moved second reading of Bill (No. 6) to prohibit the Importation and Immigration of Foreigners and Aliens under contract or agreement to perform labour in Canada.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have no desire to open up the discussion again on this Bill, as the two measures are very nearly the same. I said nothing on the former occasion, and desire simply to reiterate what has been said by many members of this House. I regret that we are pledged to enact legislation of this character. Representing an industrial county, where there is a great deal of labour employed, I may say that in that section of the country in which I reside, the sentiment in favour of this legislation is very strong indeed, and I have no hesitation whatever in supporting the very strongest measure that I believe the First Minister will be willing to give his approval to. I think that the legislation we should enact along this line should be, word for word, letter for letter, the American legislation. This, at any rate, is the character of the legislation called for by the section of the country I come from, and I trust this Bill will become law this session.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The PRIME MINISTER moved :

That Bill No. 6 be referred to the committee on Bill No. 5.

Motion agreed to.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 8th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

LIBRARY COMMITTEE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved :

That a Select Committee composed of Messieurs Bain, Borden (Halifax), Bourassa, Caron, (Sir Adolphe), Clarke, Davies, Davin, Flint, Foster, Fraser (Guysborough), Laurier, Lount, McNeil, Monk and Scriver, be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the Library of Parliament so far as the interests of this House are concerned, and to act as members of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the Library; and a Message was ordered to be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved :

That a Message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House will unite with them in the formation of a Joint Committee of both Houses on the subject of the Printing of Parliament, and that the members of the Select Standing Committee on Printing, viz. :— Messieurs Bergeron, Bourassa, Charlton, Dupont, Ellis, Foster, Gibson, Hughes, Landerkin, LaRivière, Macdonald (Huron), Maclean, McMullen, Montague, Oliver, Parmalee, Préfontaine, Richardson, Somerville, Sutherland, Taylor and Tisdale, will act as members on the part of this House on said Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Militia and Defence of the Dominion of Canada, for the year ended 31st December, 1896.—(Sir Richard Cartwright.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY— THE ESTIMATES.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

The Governor General transmit to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending on the 30th June, 1898, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

Government House,
Ottawa, 1897.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE moved:

That the Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

SHERIFF OF PRINCE ALBERT.

Mr. DAVIS asked:

1. When was Harold E. Ross appointed sheriff of Prince Albert, Saskatchewan?
2. When did he cease to act?
3. Was he dismissed, or what was the reason he ceased to be sheriff?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). 1. Harold E. Ross was appointed sheriff of judicial district of Saskatchewan by Order in Council of 4th April, 1887. 2. 24th May, 1887. 3. By Order in Council of 24th May, 1887, O. E. Hughes was appointed sheriff in the place of H. E. Ross, to be appointed inspector of weights and measures. The records of the department show no reason for the change.

SUPERANNUATIONS.

Mr. SPROULE asked:

How many officers in the public service have been superannuated from the 13th July, 1896, up to the 5th of April, 1897? What are their names? What is the age of each? How long in the service, and what is the amount additional charge on the superannuation fund?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In answer to the hon. gentleman, I beg to read the following list:—

Mr. LAURIER.

Name.	Age	Service. (Years.)	Annual Superannuation Allowance		Gratuity.

14 retired on gratuities.

The superannuation of these officials makes their allowances a charge on the superannuation fund, but there is a large saving to the treasury. In some cases the officials had to be superannuated on account of age or infirmity, and their places have been filled. But in the majority of cases the offices have been abolished.

IMMIGRATION AGENT TO IRELAND.

Mr. TAYLOR asked :

1. Has Mr. Edward O'Kelly, late of Pembroke, been appointed immigration agent to the North of Ireland?
2. If so, when was he appointed?
3. What salary is he to receive, exclusive of travelling expenses?
4. Is Mr. Kelly a British subject?
5. Has he not been a hotel-keeper at Duluth, Min., U.S.A., and at West Superior, Wis., U.S.A., for a number of years past, and until within a few months previous to his appointment?
6. Was he recommended by Mr. T. Murray, ex-M.P. of Pembroke?
7. Is Mr. Kelly a half-brother of Mr. Murray's?
8. What are Mr. Kelly's duties? Will he keep an office in Ireland, or will he have a roving commission?

The MINISTER OF INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Mr. Edward O'Kelly has been appointed Immigration Agent to Ireland, but not particularly to the North of Ireland. 2. He was appointed on the 1st day of April, 1897. 3. His salary is $1,800 exclusive of travelling expenses. 4. Mr. O'Kelly is a British subject. 5. So far as the Government is aware Mr. O'Kelly has not been a hotel-keeper at Duluth, nor at West Superior, or any other place. 6. He was recommended by Mr. T. Murray, ex-M.P. of Pembroke and many others, competent to give reliable opinion upon his qualifications. Mr. O'Kelly's recommendations were of the very highest order, and he was appointed exclusively on account of his peculiar qualifications for the immigration work in Ireland which had for some time been entirely neglected under the late Government. Mr. O'Kelly had for over nine years been an official valuator and commissioner for the Imperial Government under the Irish Land Act, and holds the highest testimonials from persons of prominence as to character and capacity. His great knowledge of the country to which he has been commissioned and of its inhabitants, and the experience which he has gained in the employ of the Imperial Government is expected to be of especial value in his work, and the Government considers itself most fortunate in being able to secure the services of a gentleman who is so well equipped for the important work which is placed in his charge. 7. Mr. O'Kelly is not a half-brother of Mr. Murray. 8. His duties are to endeavour to procure the best available class of settlers for Canada. He may or may not have an office from time to time, but his position is that of a travelling agent.

COAL TRADE IN NOVA SCOTIA.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Does the despatch in the Halifax "Morning Chronicle" of 11th December, 1894, represent correctly the utterance of Mr. W. S. Fielding, the then Provincial Secretary and Premier of the province of Nova Scotia and now Minister of Finance, who in company with Mr. L. H. Davies, now Minister of Marine and Fisheries, at a public meeting at Sydney on the 10th of December, 1894, is reported in said despatch as having stated as follows :—

"Referring to the coal trade, he said the Liberal party would not preach one doctrine in Cape Breton and another in the rest of the Dominion. If the coal business could not be carried on without protection, then it is better not to carry it on at all : protection was not a necessity for its welfare."

2. Does the report in the Montreal "Herald" of the 13th March, 1897, represent the Minister of Finance correctly when waited upon at Montreal on the 12th March by representatives of the coal interest who urged upon him the necessity of maintaining if not increasing the present duty on coal? The Minister is reported as having stated as follows :—

"If, however, your view is correct and it turns out that the United States duty is raised to a high figure, then we shall claim and exercise the right to revise our views respecting the Canadian duty and we shall feel bound to impose a duty not only on bituminous, but also on anthracite coal, which at present comes into our markets from the States free of duty."

If reported correctly in both cases, how does the Minister of Finance reconcile these two conflicting statements?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I do not remember the despatch in the Halifax "Chronicle," to which the hon. gentleman refers, and I am not in a position to make any statement respecting the accuracy of a report which I have not seen for several years. I have advocated the free exchange of coal between Canada and the United States, but otherwise I have not advocated free coal. Whether speaking to the coal miners of Nova Scotia or to the people of other sections of the country I have always held that the article of coal could not be considered alone, but must be dealt with in connection with others, with regard to the interests of the Dominion as a whole. The words quoted from the Montreal "Herald" are a correct report of a single sentence of my Montreal remarks.

L'ARDOISE BREAKWATER, N.S.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

Is it the intention of the Government during the present session to provide in the Estimates for the repairs and extension of the L'Ardoise Breakwater, county of Richmond, Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). This subject is under consideration.

PROPOSED SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAY COMPANIES.

Mr. LANGELIER asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to disallow the Act passed at the last session of the legislature of Quebec, authorizing the government of that province to pay to railway companies entitled to subsidies in land converted into money, seventeen and a half cents in lieu of the last thirty-five cents to which they are entitled?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The provincial statutes of the province of Quebec are not yet before the Department of Justice, and have not yet been reported on.

BREAKWATER AT THE MOUTH OF THE RIVER NICOLET.

Mr. BOISVERT (Translation) asked :

Whether the Government is aware that part of the breakwater of the port of refuge constructed at the mouth of the River Nicolet was carried away by the ice last spring ?

Is it the intention of the Government to place in the Estimates this session an amount sufficient to provide for needed repairs to the said breakwater ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). (Translation.) In reply to the question put by the hon. member, I may say that my attention was called to the extent of the damages done to that breakwater. As to the second part of the question put by the hon. member, I may inform him that it is now being taken under consideration by the officials of my department.

SOUTH SHORE RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. BOISVERT asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to afford assistance this year to the South Shore Railway Company, so as to enable the company to construct its line from Sorel to Lévis?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I can give the hon. member no other answer than I gave to a similar inquiry yesterday, that the whole subject of the giving of bonuses or subsidies to railway companies is under consideration, and has not been determined upon by the Government.

FISHING LICENSES IN BONAVENTURE, P.Q.

Mr. McALISTER asked :

Has notice been given to James Robertson, of New Richmond, in the county of Bonaventure, province of Quebec, that license for his salmon fishing stand would not be renewed this year?

If so, why is such renewal refused?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I am not aware personally, and I am advised that the department is not aware, that any such notice has been given.

Mr. LANGELIER.

POST OFFICE AT BEAR ISLAND, N.S.

Mr. GILLIES asked :

1. Who is postmaster at Bear Island, in the county of Richmond, Nova Scotia, at the present time?

2. When did Michael Morgan cease to be postmaster?

3. For what length of time did he fill the position of postmaster at Bear Island?

4. Was he dismissed from office?

5. If so, for what cause?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). As the answer from the department has been delayed, I am able at the present moment only to give the hon. gentleman a summary of it, but I will furnish him with an additional statement if he desires more particular information. The postmaster at Bear Island was Mr. Michael Morgan. He was appointed in September, 1892, and on 1st March, 1897, the office was abolished as being of no real public utility, the revenue for the whole year having been only $11.97. Under these circumstances the office was abolished, and with that of course the postmastership came to an end; but in no other respect was there a dismissal.

HOUSE OF COMMONS RESTAURANT.

Mr. SPEAKER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to mention a matter to the House. I am informed that a gentleman outside of the House stated that he had been informed and believed that the Order passed by the House of Commons was not enforced—that is the Order as to the non-sale of liquor in the restaurant—and that members of the House could obtain what they want on this side without going to the Senate. I think it just as well that this statement should be formally and distinctly contradicted. I can hardly believe that any gentleman can have stated exactly what is reported, because the facts are so absolutely contrary to the statement. Ever since the Order was passed by this House the instructions have been that there shall be no sale within the precincts of this House, and these instructions have been absolutely and strictly enforced by me. They have been not merely nominally enforced, but I have taken every precaution in my power to see that the rule was thoroughly carried out. To-day I sent for the restaurant-keeper and questioned him, and he utterly and entirely denies that any sale has been made by him of beer, wine or spirits, or that any is kept within the precincts of the House. I furthermore instructed the serjeant-at-arms to make an investigation, and I have this report from him to-day :

In compliance with your instructions of this day, I have made a careful examination of the restaurant premises, and have the honour to report that no wine, beer or spirits is being kept therein by the caterer.

This report shows that liquor is not only not on sale, but that it is not kept on the premises.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I am anxious to avail myself of the very earliest opportunity of correcting a statement which I made, speaking on the spur of the moment, in reference to transactions of a public nature that occurred more than a quarter of a century ago. I was under the impression that the Government brought down, in 1870, a proposal to impose a duty on coal, and that that portion of the budget was defeated in the House and withdrawn by the Government. I find upon referring to the Votes and Proceedings of that date, that the Government brought down the duty and it was imposed in 1870; and in 1871, the Government being defeated by a large vote of the House, yielded to that determination on the part of a large majority of the members, and withdrew that impost from the tariff. I wish to take the earliest opportunity of explaining to the House this mistake which I made in reference to matters which occurred more than a quarter of a century ago.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). Perhaps the hon. gentleman's colleague (Mr. Foster) will also correct his statement, that the child was strangled eight years before it was born.

Mr. FOSTER. Not at all. I will not retract the truth.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. GIBSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 8) in further amendment of the Railway Act. He said: There is very little to be said in reference to this Bill in addition to the remarks which I made upon its introduction. The Bill was framed by myself as a layman and not by a lawyer, and I have had some suggestions sent to me by the members of the legal profession with the object of rendering more perfect the object sought by this legislation. When the Bill reaches the committee stage I shall move some amendments, and explain them to the House. The first clause of the Bill says:

Notwithstanding anything in the Railway Act, all debts due for work done, wages due, or material supplied in the construction of a railway to which the said Act applies, shall be the first lien upon such railway.

When this Bill comes before the committee, I shall add to that clause so as to make it apply to promoters and other agents to whom the company is indebted during the construction of the railway, and I shall also move to add at the end of the Bill,

That this Act shall apply to all railways now under construction.

The object of the Bill, as I have already stated, is to protect our Canadian contractors against persons coming in from a foreign country and engaging in railway construction, persons who have no money of their own, and who come with high sounding titles and form a construction company within the promoters, or perhaps more particularly speaking, in the name of the railway corporation itself; nay, by putting up a bogey or stool pigeon in the shape of a contractor who takes his contract from the construction company. This results in many cases in a loss to our Canadian contractors. In one particular instance within the knowledge of the members of this House, instead of the construction company or the railway company bearing the expense of building the road, the whole cost of construction was borne by our Canadian sub-contractors and they are still at a loss for their money. I might also say, Mr. Speaker, that the two most important railways in this Dominion, the Grand Trunk Railway Company and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and in fact all Canadian railway companies who are doing an honest and legitimate business are not opposed to the passage of this Bill, for the reason that they are willing at all times to pay their just debts, not only to their main contractors, but also to the sub-contractors. Legislation of this kind should have been on our statute-books years ago, and many of our Canadian contractors are to-day suffering because of the want of it. I trust that when the time comes for the Bill to be discussed in detail, it shall receive due consideration from the members of this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. SPEAKER. When shall the House resolve itself into committee on this Bill?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Now.

Mr. HAGGART. Had not the Bill better be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals? All these Bills go, as a matter of course, to that committee.

Mr. GIBSON. I have no objection to send the Bill to any committee of the House, and I will gladly adopt the suggestion of the ex-Minister of Railways and move:

That this Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

The Bill is a just one, and I am not afraid of it before any committee.

Motion agreed to.

OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.

Mr. CHARLTON moved second reading of Bill (No. 10) to secure the better observance of the Lord's Day, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest. He said: Mr. Speaker, I shall not detain the House at any length upon this Bill, and I beg the ear of the House while I present matters which I think are of sufficient importance to be worthy of its careful consideration.

I do not stand here to advocate a religious measure. The Bill does not propose to say what a man's faith shall be, what his religious usages shall be, where he shall go to church, whether he shall go to church at all or not, or what his conduct in a religious sense in any manner whatever shall be. The Bill deals with the question of the Sunday rest from the civil standpoint alone. It presumes that Sunday rest to the labourer is a civil right, and that this Parliament has the right, and should exercise the right, to secure to labourers rest on Sunday—rest which, in many instances, they are unable to enjoy without the intervention of the law, and the enjoyment of which is not with them a matter of free choice, for they are often compelled to labour upon this rest day against their wishes and in violation of what ought to be under the law a privilege and a civil right. There need be no fears of religious legislation in connection with this Bill. I do not know that I can even say that the Bill is earnestly promoted or sustained by the religious sentiment of this country, so far as the laity of the various churches are concerned. It seems to be to a large extent a matter of indifference to professing Christian people in Canada whether or not a law is enacted for the purpose of securing to labourers their right to the Sunday rest. We do occasionally have resolutions passed by synods, conferences, assemblies and presbyteries bearing upon this matter; but we have no indication of any great degree of popular feeling on the subject. If some section of the country wants to impose a duty for the purpose of bleeding one class for the benefit of another, if some material interest is at stake, we shall have delegations visiting Ottawa to impress upon the Government the necessity of acceding to their wishes; but so far as I am aware, no delegation of professing Christian people has ever visited this capital to urge upon this Government or upon any other Government in power, the propriety of enacting a Sunday rest law. Therefore, I think I am warranted in saying that religious fears may be dismissed, and that, so far as any purpose may be supposed to exist on the part of Christian communities to force upon the people of Canada an obnoxious religious measure, such fears are not well founded.

I repeat that this Bill deals with the question of the Sunday rest from a civil standpoint only. While it affirms that the right to enjoy that rest should be deemed on the part of the labourer a civil right, and asks for a cessation from labour on the Lord's Day, the personal conduct of all individuals is left perfectly free. They can go to church or refrain from going to church, or spend the day in any other way they choose, so far as any enactment of the law is concerned; the law merely providing that the labourer shall have the right of rest and the enjoyment of religious privileges on that day, if he chooses to exercise that right. The law will step in and prevent his being deprived of the exercise of that right, which should be one of the most precious of all rights in the eyes of a Christian man.

This Bill is no novelty in legislation in civilized and Christian countries. As long ago as A.D. 958, under King Edgar, a Bill was passed in the British Parliament with regard to Sunday observance; and since that time not less than thirty enactments relating to this matter have been placed on the Statute-books of Great Britain. Every American state, save three, has laws on the subject. Within the last decade, France, Holland, Belgium, Austro-Hungary, Denmark, Sweden and Norway have passed laws with reference to the observance of Sunday as a day of rest, and laws with regard to this matter are in contemplation, and I do not know but consummated before this time, in Russia and Spain. So, I repeat, that legislation in this line is not a novelty, and when I present this Bill to-day, I do it sanctioned by precedent and usage in England and other countries for ages past.

The Bill, of course, proposes to impose certain restraints. It proposes to impose restraints with regard to labour. It may be urged that this Parliament is exceeding its proper jurisdiction and its proper functions in saying that that which is a natural right, the right of labour, shall be restricted or in any wise curtailed. But it often becomes necessary to curtail what are properly natural rights, for the purpose of promoting the public good. For instance, it is held to be perfectly proper to pass enactments for the compulsory education of children. The parent is the natural guardian of the child, and naturally has the right to decide what the child shall do and what he shall not do; but the law steps in and overrides the parent's natural guardianship and the exercise of what appears to be a natural right, and says that the child shall go to school and be educated. That interference on the part of the state is made because it is desirable in the interests of the state that the child should receive education. The law may and does sanction the selling of liquor; but the same law provides that liquor shall not be sold on Sunday. It abridges the right of the man who has the privilege of carrying on a legal business, to carry on that business on the Lord's Day. The law makes provision with regard to sanitary needs and regulations. The agent of the law can go to your house or mine and command the abatement of any nuisance that may exist on the premises, although under the law the house is the castle of the subject. The law imposes restraints and limitations upon the exercise of personal and property rights, and it does all these things because it assumes that the action taken is taken in the interest of the great mass of the people, and is for the public good.

It is upon that basis that we justify the enactment of a Sunday rest law. The purpose of the law is to secure the good of the great mass of the people, to secure to those, who perhaps otherwise would be unable to secure that boon, the right to exercise the privilege of Sunday rest upon the seventh day of the week. Sunday rest is, of course, the outcome of modern or Christian civilization. It is not asserted that it was a feature of the Greek or Roman civilization, it is, of course, the natural outgrowth of Christianity, but when we admit that Christianity strengthens the demand for Sunday rest, we assert that it does so merely because it strikes hands with every demand made in the interest of humanity, and this qualification relieves us from the charge of defending here what is exclusively a religious usage or right. We simply find Christianity in touch, in sympathy and in alliance with everything that makes for human good, with everything that tends to uplift mankind, and for that reason Christianity sanctions what this Bill asks of this House—an enactment to secure the labourer in the enjoyment of his civil and religious liberty and in the right to enjoy uninterrupted the exercise of the privilege of rest upon the seventh day of the week.

Now, it may be said that this argument is ill-founded. It may be said that the requirement which I am advocating to-day is one that is contained in the Decalogue, that it is simply the fourth Commandment, part of a religious code, which I am seeking to have embodied in the civil law. I reply that the fact that it is embodied in the Decalogue does not militate against the assertion that it is a proper subject for legislative action. There are other commands embodied in the Decalogue that are proper subjects for legislative action. There is, for instance, the Commandment "Thou shalt not kill." It might as well be argued that that should be left as a matter of conscience, and that the law should not interfere to enforce that Commandment. There are the Commandments: "Thou shalt not steal," "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour"—all these Commandments, in their enforcement, are supplemented, and properly supplemented, by legislation. These Commandments cannot be made binding without the intervention of human legislation. It is for that reason this legislation is asked for, it is in order to secure to the labourer the right to enjoy his day of rest.

But it may be said that this law is unnecessary. It may be said: leave the labourer to judge for himself whether he will rest upon the seventh day of the week or not; allow him the privilege of being a free moral agent in this matter. But unfortunately, in the condition of society that exists to-day, hundreds of thousands of labourers are deprived of the power of exercising their own choice in the matter. Men working for railway companies, men working for corporations, men whose employers demand that they shall work on the seventh day of the week, are powerless to resist that demand. If they do, they lose their situation, and these men ask for the intervention of law to secure to them this right, which otherwise they would not be able to secure or enjoy. Selfish greed and disregard of the rights of others stands in the way of those men securing the right to which they are entitled and which by this Bill it proposes to give them.

I might be asked to point out, as a justification for the enactment of this law, some beneficial fruits or results of rest from labour on the seventh day of the week, and I shall very briefly refer to a few facts, which, I think, warrant me in asserting that beneficial results do follow from Sunday rest. One of the great economic evils of the day is over-production. We have too much food produced, too many textile fabrics, too much of everything. Our markets are glutted, prices are cheapened, the whole course of business is deranged from over-production, and the employment of labour during seven days in the week is calculated to make this evil greater. The employment of labour seven days in the week is calculated to enlarge the volume of over-production, which in six days in the week is already too great. And for that reason, on economic grounds, the adoption of this system of securing a rest day for labour would produce important and beneficial results.

Another reason for this enactment is that without Sunday rest, in all cases, we find among people physical deterioration. It is said by travellers that when you go into countries in Europe where there is no Sunday rest you scarcely ever see an old man, you find the labourers wan and worn and lacking that stamina and vivacity which characterize the labourers in other countries who have their Sunday rest. One of the fruits of Sunday labour is to lower the moral tone of the people, another is the increase of drunkenness and social disorder, another is the decline of public virtue, and the most lamentable of all, and the summing up of all, is national degeneracy. Some of the fruits of Sunday observance, on the contrary, are most commendable and desirable. One of the fruits of Sunday observance, secured by legislative enactment, is protection to the labourer from the greed of capital, from the greed of those who would deprive him of this right for the purpose of swelling their own dividends and the dividends and gains of corporations.

We have as fruits of Sunday observance, better sanitary conditions in society, better public health, a greater degree of cleanliness, a greater degree of self-respect among the people. This is admitted on all hands to be one of the fruits of Sunday observance. We have, as another fruit of respect for the Sabbath, an increase of Christian homes which are graduating schools of Christian citizens, and without which we cannot hope to have a free and independent electorate in this country or a population that will maintain their civil and religious rights. The Christian home is a matter of great importance to the continuance of the liberty of the people and the security of the state. If we do not secure to the people rest from labour on that day, Christian sentiment in the country will gradually and continuously diminish and with it the number of Christian homes.

Another effect of the observance of the Sabbath is the promotion of temperance and of regard for law and obedience to law. These reasons that I have enumerated are of themselves sufficient, from a material standpoint, totally without regard to religious considerations at all, to justify the enactment of this law. The law is calculated to secure good morals, to promote social purity, both matters of the utmost consequence to the statesman who desires to see his country prosperous and its institutions stable. The law is one which is calculated to secure the rights of conscience. The labourer who is deprived of his right to go to church on the Sabbath because a corporation demands that he should go to work, the labourer who cannot join his family in going to church or Sabbath school—that labourer has his conscientious rights trampled upon. He is deprived of the rights of a free citizen, he is deprived of the rights that appertain to civil and religious liberty in a free land. No greater outrage can be imagined than that perpetrated on the labourer who is required to work on the Lord's Day and is too poor to throw up his situation, and who can appeal to no law to protect him in the enjoyment of the right which he ought to enjoy, as a free citizen, of going to church with his family. This law of Sabbath observance is admitted on all hands to be one which aids materially and directly our national development. And this assertion is borne out by the fact that the nations that do regard the Sabbath and observe the requirements of the rest day are the nations that are making the most rapid progress, nations that enjoy the greater stability and greater freedom and have a more desirable condition of affairs as regards material matters than nations that disregard the requirements of this law. I deduce from these statements two conclusions: first, that from the religious standpoint, a law designed to secure to the labourer the right of Sunday rest is a law which tends to secure men's moral and religious advantage; and, in the second place, viewing this question from the civil standpoint that the law is one which is calculated to make for men's social, temporal, and worldly interests. If these deductions are correct, certainly nothing more is necessary to prove that the enactment of such a law is desirable.

Now, it might be well to inquire what authorities favour the enactment of a law of this kind. I have pointed out already that this kind of legislation is not a novelty, but that it has existed in England for more than 900 years, and that Sunday legislation finds a place upon the statute-books of nearly all civilized nations.

I desire now to name a few of the authorities—jurists, statesmen, and ecclesiastics—who favour this regulation. And first, with regard to ecclesiastics, I hardly need to say that scarcely a Protestant clergyman is found who is not in favour of a Sunday rest law. Some two or three years ago, I gave a list of Catholic authorities favourable to an enactment of this character, among them Pope Leo XIII, Cardinal Taschereau, Cardinal McCloskey, Cardinal Gibbons, Archbishop Ireland, and other eminent ecclesiastics of the Catholic Church. Among the jurists who have declared in favour of such enactments as this, I would name, Blackstone, Sir Matthew Hale, Field and Webster. I might multiply the list indefinitely, but I choose only a few of the most prominent names in order to show that this principle is upheld by good authorities, by the highest legal as well as the highest ecclesiastical authority. Among these statesmen who have expressly declared themselves to be favourable to Sunday rest enactments, are Disraeli, Gladstone, Shaftesbury, Bright, Lincoln, Garfield, Blaine and Cleveland. Not only is the principle favoured by ecclesiastics, jurists, and statesmen, but it is favoured also by almost all the labour organizations on this continent at least. Among the labour organizations that have explicitly declared in favour of Sunday rest enactments, not from any religious principle at all, not because they are influenced by religious considerations, but because they realize the importance of securing to the labourer his weekly day of rest, are the Locomotive Engineers Association, the Knights of Labour, the Brotherhood of Railway Brakemen, the American Federation of Labour, and the Telegraphic Association of America. So much for the authorities that may be quoted. I might indefinitely extend this branch of my remarks.

Now, Sir, as to the Bill itself. The Bill does not profess to cover the entire field of Sunday observance requirements. It confines itself to matters of national jurisdiction, leaving to the various provinces of the Dominion the care of such branches of this question as pertain more properly to provincial jurisdiction. The Bill confines itself to four separate clauses. The first provides that Sunday newspapers shall not be issued; the second relates to the opening and closing of the Dominion canals; the third pertains to railway traffic, and the fourth also to railway traffic—that portion of it connected with excursions. Now, these are all matters, with the possible exception of Sunday newspapers, that come exclusively within the jurisdiction of this Parliament, and that would be ultra vires of any provincial Parliament in the Dominion.

And, with regard to the Sunday newspapers, while the provincial legislatures might act upon this question, I hold that it is more desirable that it should be acted upon by the central Parliament. The Sunday newspaper is an evil that confines its baleful operations to no locality, to no city, to no state, but spreads itself over the nation. And, inasmuch as the Dominion Parliament has charge of questions pertaining to the importation of literature, to the transmission of literature through the mails, of copyright and other things having to do with kindred matters, I have always contended that this was the proper source of authority from which legislation should proceed with reference to the Sunday newspaper. And I was borne out in this position by the eminent jurist and statesman, who once led the Government in this House, Sir John Thompson. That eminent gentleman was a supporter of the first two clauses of this Bill. He voted for them, and gave me his active assistance and sympathy in prosecuting this measure, and securing its passage through the House. Two sections of the Bill actually did pass the House of Commons, but were lost in the Senate. The rise of the Sunday newspaper in the United States and the present condition of affairs as affected by the Sunday newspaper there is a matter of very great interest indeed. During the war of the rebellion, one or two newspapers published Sunday editions, one of them being the New York "Tribune." After that edition had been continued for three or four months, it was stopped; and, in an editorial, Horace Greeley stated, as his reason for discontinuing it, that experience had proven to him that it was a step in the wrong direction—that he was entitled, that the compositors in his office and all the men connected with his establishment were entitled to Sunday rest, and he clearly foresaw that to persist in the publication of the Sunday newspaper would be to let loose in the United States a social demon. The Sunday newspaper was afterward resuscitated. At first it had to struggle along and not many were issued. But they received the support of the people, and, one after another, newspaper establishments were swept into this vortex of Sunday publication, because they were placed at a disadvantage with their rivals, who had Sunday editions, unless they followed their example. To-day there are 700 daily newspapers published in the United States on Sunday. Now, these newspapers have had their effect upon the newspaper literature of the United States.

When I ask the question: Has the newspaper press of the United States deteriorated? Every man conversant with the subject will say unhesitatingly, Yes, it has deteriorated. It does not begin to occupy the moral standard or the literary standard that it did occupy in that country before the introduction of the Sunday newspaper. The Sunday newspaper press, its influence upon the social life of the country, its influence upon the moral life of the country, is debasing and disastrous. It begets at the very best a trivial literary taste, and it banishes solid reading. It publishes a Sunday edition of twenty, thirty or forty pages, mostly gossip and scandal, material which ought never to go into the family circle. It banishes religious reading, it banishes solid literature of all kinds, and is an unmitigated literary curse, social curse and religious curse in the United States. The natural attitude of the Sunday newspaper upon all moral questions is hostile, or upon all religious questions at least. It is a violation of God's command, and it naturally scorns at the idea of obedience to those commands. It naturally becomes the enemy of all influences that are calculated to secure in the nation regard to or respect for those religious commands which are so essential to the well-being of the nation and to the continuance of the national life. The natural outcome of the Sunday newspaper evil is what is known in the United States as the foul press, a class of newspapers that are unfit to read. At last the nation is beginning to wake up; and reading-room managers are banishing from their reading-rooms this class of newspapers. The other day the New York "World" and the New York "Journal" were denied admission into the reading-room of Newark, New Jersey, and into the reading-rooms of other cities. They are simply unfit to read. They are unfit to be placed before men, much less to take into families. The natural outcome of entering upon the downward grade introduced by the Sunday newspaper is this foul press, this bestial press, which is the name by which you may characterize a very large percentage of the newspapers of the United States. This is telling most disastrously day after day upon public life, upon society, upon public morals, and is sapping the foundations of national prosperity and strength in that country, sapping public virtue, and rendering the outlook as to the future of that country most dubious and pessimistic. Well, Mr. Speaker, this Bill proposes that we shall avoid the introduction of this peculiarly characteristic American institution, that we shall prohibit the publication and sale of Sunday newspapers in Canada, that we shall not wait until this evil has acquired the magnitude and the volume that it has acquired in the United States, and has got beyond control; but that we shall throttle the monster in its cradle, and prevent its obtaining a foothold in this country so as to pollute our public life and endanger the stability of our institutions. This is the reason why, in my estimation, we should go for national instead of local control in dealing with this matter of Sunday newspapers.

The second section of this Bill provides that the Dominion Government itself shall not be a Sabbath-breaker, provides for the closing of the Dominion canals which are exclusively under the control of the Dominion Government on Sunday from six o'clock in the morning until nine o'clock at night. It may be possible that conditions exist on some of our canals which would render the strict enforcement of this regulation of doubtful advantage or propriety; and every person in favour of Sunday rest who takes an intelligent and liberal view of the question, of course recognizes the necessity of permitting what are legitimate works of necessity or works of mercy. I say it may be that a strict adherence to the provisions of this section would not be in the public interest. However, this is a question that can be considered later on in committee, and if it is impossible to close such canals as the Sault Ste. Marie Canal throughout the whole of Sunday, why the matter might be left with the Governor General in Council to regulate it in exceptional cases. But the principle is a sound one, and should be embodied in the Bill.

Sections 3 and 4 of this Bill relate to railway traffic. Of course, it is unnecessary to say that the matter of the regulation of railway traffic is one beyond the jurisdiction of provincial legislatures, and that it must be dealt with here if dealt with at all. I felt so great an interest in this matter, and was so anxious to avoid prejudicing the interests of railways, that on Sunday last I visited Montreal for the purpose of interviewing the general manager of the Grand Trunk Railway and the president of the Canadian Pacific Railway with regard to the provisions of this Bill as they might affect railway traffic. I first saw Mr. Hays, of the Grand Trunk Railway. I had sent Mr. Hays a Bill last session, so he was not unfamiliar with its provisions. He informed me that he had no objections to the provisions of the Bill, would offer no objections to its becoming law; that he thought the Bill was one the provisions of which were justifiable, and would meet with the acceptance of railway authorities. The Bill, of course, makes no attempt to curtail through business, it would be ruinous to the interests of the roads to do so. But it has a proviso that whenever the United States Government shall prohibit the running of freight trains upon the Lord's Day, the same provisions shall at once go into force in Canada, under the operation of this Bill. I then went to Sir Wm. Van Horne, and practically he made little objection to the Bill. He said with regard to the Sault Ste. Marie Canal that he would like to see embodied in that section a provision that the arrangement with regard to that canal might be suspended by Order in Council if it was found prejudicial to the public interest at any season of the year. That, and one minor matter about making up freight trains, were all the objections that he offered to this Bill. So I may say to the House that the managers of these two great railway corporations are quite willing that this Bill, with these provisions in regard to railway traffic, shall become the law of Canada; and in committee we will see that Sir Wm. Van Horne's suggestions with regard to the Bill receive due consideration.

I promised when I commenced, that I would not detain the House long. I have endeavoured to present briefly and as pertinently as possible the reasons which, in my estimation, warrant this House in giving its assent to the provisions of the Bill now under consideration. I feel very deeply that this is a matter of vital importance to this country. We cannot afford to treat this matter as one which is of very little consequence to us. The course which this country make take in reference to this matter will tell very seriously upon our future. It is time that the Government of Canada should place itself upon record in recognizing the soundness of the principle of Sunday rest. It is a civil right which should be secured to the labourer so far as the enactment of the provisions of this Act can secure that right to him. Labour, Sir, should be protected, the labourer should be protected—should be protected in his rights of conscience, and can be protected in those rights of conscience only by the intervention of law, and by the kind offices of those who make the laws in this Parliament. Broad considerations of public welfare should govern our action in this matter. We should divest ourselves of prejudices. We should never for a moment allow ourselves to think that we are enacting religious laws, when we are merely securing for the labourer a right to enjoy what is a civil privilege, the right to rest from labour upon a day which not only we are told in the Decalogue is a day of rest, but a day which it is admitted is a necessary day of rest by all authorities that have dealt with the question. The state in this matter should be upon the side of justice. It is a matter of mere justice that the labourer should be protected in the enjoyment of this right, that the state should be on his side. The state should protect him, the state should secure him from being deprived of that right which is so essential to his material, his moral, his social and his religious well-being, and which has also so important a bearing upon our national life, Who, Sir, shall be able to tell us what the importance of that bearing is? We have the future before us. We are a small country in point of population, we are a mighty country in point of resources. We have a million square miles of arable land; we can furnish 6,400,000 farms of 100 acres each to tillers of the soil; we can accommodate a population of from 75,000,000 to 100,000,000 and afford them the means of sustenance in this Dominion. We have not only this vast public domain of fertile area, but we have fisheries of boundless value, we have great timber resources, great mineral resources—we have all undeveloped resources that are necessary to build up a first-class power, and we are engaged to-day, in the business of laying the foundations of that future nation. Do we realize how important that function is? Do we realize what the future has to ask of us, to expect from us? Shall we quarrel here over little matters concerning division of spoils and railway subsidies, and whether we give two or three per cent more or less of protection to this man or that, and neglect laying the foundations of the future, on truth and justice, broad and strong in building up a great nation in Canada; and should we not stop to consider whether the provisions of the Bill now before the House are not provisions essential to secure the stability, the prosperity, the growth of the nation that we hope to build up on this northern half of the American continent? Sir, I solicit from the House the favourable, the candid consideration of this question. I ask the House to divest its mind of all prejudices in regard to this matter, to look at it, not from the standpoint of party politics, not to consider whether the promoter of this Bill has been on one side of the House or the other side of it, but to look at the measure itself, to weigh the consequences that will result from the adoption of this measure, to weigh the consequences that will result from the lack of a law of this kind, and, having considered these points, having arrived at a conclusion, as hon. members must necessarily do, that it is necessary to respect and stand by the safeguards of justice and truth, and to remember that the law which has been given for the good of man cannot be safely disregarded—remembering this I trust, Sir, that the House will give to the measure which I now propose not only its consideration, but its support.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, I am not going to detain the House very long on this question, but I have a few words to offer. We all admit that this is an important question. Of course, it might be argued that sometimes when this matter is up for discussion, hon. members do not pay very much attention to it; but there may be reasons adduced for that attitude, and good reasons. As I look at this Bill, which is one presented to the House year after year, the first question that comes to my mind is this, is it necessary? Now, I may say that I believe a great many members of this House think it is not necessary, and that it is one of the reasons why they pay very little attention to it. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the argument that this Bill is not necessary. There is no country on the face of the earth, and that is putting it strongly, and yet it is not putting it too strongly, where the Lord's Day is better observed than it is in the Dominion of Canada. We need not refer to the United States, because we all know about that country, and we need not refer to the countries of Europe; but I would venture to say that if we go to England and Ireland, or even to Scotland we would find that the Lord's Day is not as well observed in any of those countries as it is in this Dominion. That is a matter of great pride to us as Canadians; but, at the same time, that is, I admit, a strong argument in the mouths of those who say that a Bill of this nature is not necessary. But another question occurs to me—is this Bill practicable? That is to say, can a Bill be framed which will be workable? Now, what has been our experience in this House? A Bill for the better observance of the Lord's Day has been presented year after year, and has passed the second reading on almost every occasion, perhaps on every occasion, and yet when the Bill has got into Committee of the Whole, objections have been raised to one point and another which could not be answered by those who were in favour of the Bill, objections which could not be surmounted, and so the Bill has fallen through on account of those objections. It is not enough to say that the object of the Bill is a good one, but we have to ask ourselves whether a Bill can be framed that will not do injustice to any one and that will accomplish the objects aimed at. The expression of the House so far has been that it has been impossible to frame a Bill of that nature. So I think we may say that, so far as experience goes, we have not been able up to this time to frame a workable Bill on these lines.

Mr. CHARLTON. We have not tried one; we have not had such a law.

Mr. CRAIG. There is another point, a very important point, and it is as to the duty of this Parliament to pass such a measure. I have heard high authorities express the opinion that it is not our duty to do so. On one occasion, desiring to obtain some advice on this point, I asked an hon. member—and if I mentioned his name he would be recognized as a high authority—if it was the duty of Parliament to pass measures of this character, and he said the duty of passing such a Bill belongs to the provincial legislatures. I think in a great measure that is true. It is said there are some points touched upon by this Bill that are not under the control of the provincial legislature, but I think it will be found that a Bill to carry out the better observance of the Lord's Day can be more properly passed and executed by the provincial legislatures than by the Dominion Parliament. I must give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) credit for his perseverance in the face of, I was going to say, opposition, but I will say objections that have been urged against this measure which he has introduced year after year. I also give the hon. gentleman credit for being quite sincere in what he is doing. If he has not the satisfaction of seeing this Bill become law, he has the satisfaction of knowing that all over the country a great many people give him credit for his action in this matter. There is one misapprehension, however, which I desire to correct, and it is this: a great many people have the impression that the hon. mover is almost the only man in the House who is anxious to have better observance of the Lord's Day. That is an entirely false impression. I believe the great majority of hon. members are willing to do anything in their power to accomplish the object in view. The hon. gentleman has said that this is not a religious Bill. We admit that contention. The hon. gentleman says the object he has in bringing it forward is for the better protection of the workingmen of the country in the enjoyment of the day of rest. That is a good object, and we all sympathize with him in seeking to attain it, but it is a most difficult result to accomplish. I find that there are four sections in this Bill: the first relating to Sunday newspapers, the second to the canals, the third to railway traffic and the fourth to excursions. Well, now, if we wish to protect the workingmen of this country in the better enjoyment of this day of rest, it occurs to me that this Bill ought to be broader and wider, and ought to touch more subjects than it does. I suppose the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) thought that at the present time it was going as far as practicable, but nevertheless, it seems to me that it discriminates against a great many men who would have no protection in this matter and who are not included in the provisions of the Bill. I sympathize with the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) in what he says about Sunday newspapers. They are objectionable, and I trust the day will never come in Canada when we shall see Sunday newspapers spread broadcast throughout the country as they are in the United States. I believe, Sir, that the strongest protection to this day of rest is the moral sentiment of the people. If that is gone the day of rest will be gone also, but as long as we have such religious sentiment in this country, and as long as we have as high a moral tone as exists now, there is no danger of the Sunday newspapers getting a foothold in Canada. I see no reason at all for making a law with regard to the closing of the canals. That matter rests with the Government of the day. They are the servants of the people, and are supposed to do what is wanted by the people, but I presume that there are occasions on which the canals must be opened on Sundays. I, for one, am satisfied to leave that in the hands of whatever Government may be in power. I believe they will exercise all due caution, and will see that canals are not opened on Sunday except in case of absolute necessity. I am in favour, Mr. Speaker, of anything which will tend to the better observance of the Lord's Day. I believe at the same time, that we have great reason to be proud of the manner in which that day is observed in Canada. The workingmen of this country are to-day protected by provincial laws, and they are also protected by the moral sentiment of the people in the enjoyment of this day of rest. From my own observations in looking around, I have not seen that their rights in this respect are infringed upon, and if the hon. member (Mr. Charlton) will show to this House, that the rights of workingmen in this respect are not protected then I am sure that the House will only be too glad to assist him in accomplishing his object. While I am in sympathy with this measure, and while I am quite satisfied that the Bill should have a second reading, I am at the same time afraid that its fate shall be what it has been in the past, that it will not be able to run the gauntlet of the committee, and that we shall not be able to frame a Bill which shall accomplish the object which is aimed at.

Mr. CASEY. There is a great deal to admire and agree with in what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) has said in moving the second reading of this Bill. He has told us very properly of the beauties of the due observance of the seventh day of rest, called in the Bill, the Lord's Day or Sunday, and he has told us very truly that we should approach this question in a spirit devoid of religious prejudices. In all that I thoroughly agree with him. On the other hand, there is a great deal in many of the points which have been raised by my hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Craig), and I am inclined to doubt seriously whether this House is within its rights in even passing the Bill, as it stands, to a second reading. I propose to enlarge a little on some of those points, because the subject is one which requires to be cleared of the mists which appear to cling around it in the public estimation.

Now, the title of this Bill would lead us to believe that it contained general provisions for the better observance of the Lord's Day, and that it was in effect an attempt to provide for the people of Canada the only legislation that there is on this subject. If the popular mind accepted that view of the case it would be mistaken. The Bill does not make general provisions for the observance of the Lord's Day, but, as its author tells us, it deals only with the publication of Sunday newspapers, the closing of canals, the prohibition of way traffic upon railways, and excursions by rail or steamboat. These cover only a very small part of the ground, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) wishes to secure a general observance of the Lord's Day as a day of rest, he will have to apply his Bill to all classes of the population. Let us hear something about a day of rest for cab drivers, livery men, coachmen, domestic servants, and a great many other classes which might be mentioned. In my opinion, domestic servants are subject to a great deal more imposition in this respect than the servants of railway companies, for there is a very elastic interpretation of their duties involved in laws and precedents. They may be called upon, at the risk of losing their position, to work at almost all hours of the day and night, Sundays and Saturdays, and if there is a case for providing legislative relief for railway men, there is a still stronger case in regard to domestic servants.

Why are not the employees of electric railways included in this Bill? We know that in many cities in Canada the trolley cars run on Sunday just as regularly as they do on any other day of the week. We know that in the cities of Toronto, Hamilton and Ottawa, the question whether Sunday cars shall run or not is an extremely live one, and one bitterly debated between different classes of the population. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Charlton) believes that he has a right to deal with the matter at all, why does he not deal with this phase in his Bill?

But let me come at once to the main objection to the adoption of this Bill by the House. With the exception of the one clause relating to the closing of canals, I do not believe there is a section of this Bill that is within the powers of this Federal Parliament. The British North America Act provides distinctly that property and civil rights shall be within the jurisdiction of the different provinces; and, Sir, if the operation of railways upon Sundays is not a question of property, and if the status of the railway labourer in regard to being compelled to work upon Sunday is not a question of civil rights, then I do not understand the meaning of that classification at all. If any endorsement of this opinion of mine were needed I find it in the fact that in the province of Ontario, under the leadership of the hon. gentleman who is now Minister of Justice in this Government, there has been ample and widely observance of Sunday, with regard both to railways and other matters.

It was under the premiership of Sir Oliver Mowat, the Christian statesman, as we are all happy to call him, that the legislature of Ontario enacted broad and comprehensive Sunday legislation. That hon. gentleman no doubt believed then, and no doubt believes now, that the province had the right to deal with that question, and I think the plain wording of the British North America Act bears him out. But even if his opinion were contrary to mine on the subject, I would be undoubtedly bound to accept his view, on the ground of his superior constitutional knowledge. I claim, therefore, that we have the authority of the Minister of Justice of this Government for the contention that Sunday observance is a question purely within the limits of provincial authority.

It was not without reason that the British North America Act provided this classification. The observance of Sunday is a question upon which the people of all Canada are not unanimous. We have a very Protestant province in Ontario—in some parts of it a strongly Presbyterian province. In my own constituency, I may say, that religious view almost entirely prevails; the people there keep the Sabbath, or the Sunday strictly, according to their conscience. In the province of Quebec, on the other hand, a different view is taken of the obligations of that day. There the restrictions imposed by the Mosaic law are less regarded. The Sunday is looked upon more as this Bill proposes to look upon it, as a day of rest, and perhaps a day of recreation. I am not going to discuss the propriety of one or the other of these views. My Presbyterian constituents look upon Sunday not only as a day of rest, but as a day to be kept holy from worldly concerns and to be devoted to their spiritual welfare. Our friends in Quebec believe in keeping holy that day according to their own views and their own consciences. They do not believe they desecrate it by what they consider innocent amusement and recreation. Now, how is it possible to ask two populations, so different in their views of the obligations of Sunday, to come under one rigid law regarding the observance of that day? It was for that particular reason amongst others that the subject of civil rights was assigned to the different provinces, to decide according to their own will, and that the different provinces have assumed the special right to legislate on Sunday observance.

I think the provision in the British North America Act was thoroughly justified by the differences in our populations. I think the provinces which have taken advantage of that provision of the Act are thoroughly justified by the law and equity of the case. We need not go outside of the province of Ontario to find a different standard of Sunday observance. Go among our German friends in the county of Waterloo, and you will find that they do not look on the Sunday in the same light that our Presbyterian people do. I do not say which view is right or which is wrong. I say it is the civil right of every man in Canada to observe the Sunday according to his own conscience, so long as he does not in so doing interfere with his neighbours, outrage their feelings of decency, and thereby make himself a public nuisance. All this is outside of the provisions of the Bill. I am not saying that these provisions are too stringent, or that they are not stringent enough. I am merely arguing that they are provisions which should not be enacted by this House, but should be brought before a provincial parliament.

Let me call the attention of the House to the completeness of the existing legislation of Ontario on this subject; I am not so familiar with that of the other provinces. Chapter 203 of the Consolidated Statutes of Ontario is called "An Act to prevent the profanation of the Lord's Day." It provides that no sales shall take place on Sunday, that no ordinary work shall be done, with certain exceptions, that political meetings, tipping, and so forth, shall be prohibited on that day. It is rather a queer collocation of words to place tipping and political meetings together; but so it seemed good to the wisdom of our provincial legislators, and we shall have to accept it. It is not lawful for any person on that day to play at skittles, ball, foot-ball, rackets, or any other noisy game, or to gamble with dice or otherwise, or to run races on foot, or on horseback or in carriages or in vehicles of any sort. Is not that pretty comprehensive legislation? and its constitutionality is not disputed. Except in defence of his property from any wolf or any other ravenous beast or a bird of prey, it is not lawful for any person on that day to go out hunting or shooting. It is not only forbidden to a man to catch fish on Sunday, but to go out fishing, which some members of this House may realize is a very different thing. It is not lawful for any person on that day to bathe in any exposed situation in any water within the limits of any incorporated city or town, or within view of any place of public worship, or private residence. Sunday excursions by steamboats plying for hire or by railway or in part by any such steamboat and in part by railway, and having for their only and principle object the carriage of Sunday passengers for amusement or pleasure only, and to go and return on the same day by the same steamboat or railway, or any other, owned by the same persons or company, shall be unlawful. This is legislation on one of the very points embraced in the Bill of my hon. friend from North Norfolk. It has stood for years as the legislation of the Ontario legislature, and has been enforced time and again; its constitutionality has never been disputed, and I think it fills the Bill with regard to Sunday excursions. The owner of any steamboat or railway by which any such Sunday excursion is wholly or partly made, is liable to a fine of $400. Then provisions are made for the mode of enforcing the provisions of the Act and collecting the penalties. So far as Ontario is concerned, I think the Sunday observance ground is pretty well covered. Subsequently, I think last year, an Act was passed in regard to the running of electric cars on Sunday, and it applies to all electric railways which have been constructed since that Act. On these grounds alone, I think we ought to hesitate before giving this Bill its second reading.

At the same time, if there is anything in the Bill which the majority of the House consider to be within our jurisdiction, and which they think could be worked into practical shape in the Committee of the Whole, I have for my part no objection to see it pass the second reading, with the distinct understanding that its second reading shall not be taken as a precedent or an endorsement of the principle that this House has the right to legislate generally on the question of Sunday observance.

Coming down to particulars, I will take first that clause which is undoubtedly within our powers and which provides that no canal belonging to Canada shall be open for traffic on Sunday. I beg to point out that this is utterly inconsistent with the clause which permits through traffic over our railways on Sundays. Why should this Bill provide for the stoppage of through traffic by vessels when it does not provide for the stoppage of through traffic by rail? It provides that vessels shall be laid up every Sunday, while through trains of cars are allowed to continue their journey. What would result from this provision in the case of the Welland Canal, the hon. gentleman must know, from his knowledge of the locality. He must know what a tremendous blockage of freight would occur, what difficulty there would be getting that blockage started again on Monday, and what loss of time, and perhaps of markets and money to shippers would result. I am afraid he will find it difficult to advance reasons for the stoppage of vessels and the enforced idleness of sailors, who would not be doing anything while going through the canals on that day, and who would be simply wasting time on the Sunday, while he allows through railway traffic to continue.

As to the publishing of Sunday newspapers, I fully agree with my hon. friend in his detestation of the sort of Sunday literature that is published in the States. I fully agree with him that if such Sunday literature as that became common in Canada, it would have a most disastrous effect on our young Canadian population. But it is not only on Sunday that such literature is published, and what is required is a law which will prohibit its publication on every day of the week. I do not know why it should be a special crime to publish immoral matter on Sunday and not on any other day. In my opinion, it should be an offence to publish such literature on any day, and I will go as far as anybody in providing legislation to prevent it. I do not like to see a new crime, a new indictable offence, created under the terms of this clause. Who wants to see a little newsboy chased by a policeman down the street, kept in the cells Sunday night, and brought before a magistrate on Monday morning for the offence of selling newspapers on Sunday? Would not such a law tend more to the demoralization of the newsboys than anything they are apt to see published in any Sunday newspaper in Canada? As to the importation of immoral matter from abroad, we have a law against that, and it should be enforced.

Then there is an exception made in favour of the gratuitous publication of religious papers on the Lord's Day. I know, as a matter of fact, that a great many people who subscribe to church papers, have them distributed some time on the Lord's Day, either after service at the church door, or to the children at Sunday school, or in some other such way. These papers are not gratuitously distributed, but distributed to subscribers who have paid for them, and this clause would utterly prevent the distribution of such papers in that way. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wishes to accomplish that, but his Bill certainly would have that effect. Then, how are you to define "religious publications"? I asked for that definition on a former occasion, and have never yet had a clear explanation. We have amongst us some colonies of Mormons. Those of us who are not Mormons do not look upon propagandist literature of the Mormon church as being very good Sunday reading, but the Mormons no doubt will claim that it is religious literature and as such entitled to be circulated on Sunday. I do not know but that such literature might be as bad reading for our young men and maidens as, let me say, the Sunday "World." Then there is a sect in Canada, whose tenets I do not intend to dispute at all, who believe that the day we keep as Sunday should not be kept as a holiday at all. They keep the Saturday instead, and make it a point of doing as much worldly work on our Sunday as they can without scandalizing their neighbours, and, in some cases, they do it rather ostentatiously. In the western end of my county a man was put in jail for that offence, and a great deal has been said and published about it, which has been circulated by the press of that Seventh Day Advent Church, under the head of religious literature, although its object is to destroy the obligation of keeping the Sunday. I do not think that a better observance of the Lord's Day would be promoted by the circulation of such literature.

As this Bill is not what its name would lead us to expect, a Bill for securing a better general observance of the Lord's Day, as it is a Bill which I believe to be beyond the powers of this Parliament and within the powers of the local legislatures, as it concerns a matter which has been amply dealt with by the local legislatures, I think the House should hesitate very much before passing it to a second reading. I submit my views on this point to those who lead the House in matters of law and policy, and shall submit to their ruling in the matter, but that is my personal and strong opinion on the subject.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). If I were to follow my own judgment in this matter, I would have no hesitation in saying that, with the exception of clause No. 2, the whole of this Bill is ultra vires of this Parliament. All the other clauses seem to me to come clearly within the purview of the provincial legislatures, but I remember that, on a former occasion, the late Sir John Thompson, when Minister of Justice, held the view that clause No. 1 came within our jurisdiction. I confess that I could not see very clearly then, nor can I yet, the force of that opinion, but I am disposed to yield now, as I was then, to the opinion of such an eminent authority. On that occasion, Sir John Thompson agreed to accept this Bill, in so far as the two first clauses were concerned, but would not entertain the other clauses. I am disposed to adopt the same view, but I must say to my hon. friend that when the Bill comes to the committee, I think the whole of section 1 will have to be reconstructed. If we adopt the view held by Sir John Thompson, that we have the right to legislate, in so far as newspapers are concerned, I have no hesitation in saying that the sale of newspapers should be prohibited on Sunday. I cannot see any good reason why an exception should be made in favour of newspapers to the general law prohibiting selling on the Lord's Day, but while I have no hesitation in coming to this conclusion, I submit to my hon. friend that there are, perhaps, strong reasons for recasting the clause, because, if it were to go as it is now, it might be construed to mean that the proprietors or managers of newspapers cannot engage in any work on the Sunday, even for the purpose of preparing the publication of their newspapers on the Monday. This, perhaps, would be straining somewhat the moral obligation, which rests upon all Christians, to observe the Lord's Day, but I imagine that in this age, with the extension the press has taken, every one must admit that newspapers have to be published on the Monday morning, and that necessarily the labour of publication must commence some time during the Lord's Day. That has become necessary by the condition of our civilization at present. Therefore, when in committee, I shall be obliged to ask my hon. friend to reconsider that section so as to make it operate only in so far as the sale of newspapers is concerned.

As to the rest of the Bill, I think that the objections which were raised by Sir John Thompson himself are still good, that there are very strong reasons, indeed, why the Parliament of Canada should not interfere with the traffic by railway. The traffic by railway has assumed such proportions that a measure of this kind might be so onerous and so damaging to shippers generally, that I must, for my part, adhere to the opinion that Parliament at that time expressed, that it would be unwise to interfere with that traffic. With regard to the excursions on the Lord's Day, I must say frankly to my hon. friend that I am perfectly clear and positive that this Parliament has no possible jurisdiction over that subject. I cannot conceive how the Parliament of Canada could have any more power to prevent steamboats or railways carrying passengers on the Lord's Day than they would have to prevent a cabman carrying a passenger on that day. Parliament would not undertake to legislate upon that subject. This is one of the civil rights which must be left to the provinces, and which each province had better determine for itself. In my province, it is not an offence to have these excursions, while in some other provinces they would be looked upon with disfavour. This is a case in which the morals, education and habits of the people must be considered. I claim for the province of Quebec that, though the observance of the Sabbath is not so rigid as in other provinces, it is as religious as others. It is altogether a matter of opinion. I remember the case of a good Scotchman who happened to live in one of the settlements in my province in which Scotchmen and Frenchmen live contiguous. He expressed the opinion that the French Canadian people were good people, obliging, civil, good Christians and good neighbours, but they played cards on the Sabbath, and he could not understand it. Playing cards is an inoffensive pastime, and is indulged in on Sunday evening in my province. No man would think of not going to church faithfully in the morning. But he allows himself some recreation in the evening. My hon. friend must allow some latitude of habits and manners in observing the day. I think he ought to be satisfied if his Bill, on this occasion, as on the former occasion to which I have referred, is passed with only the first two clauses.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RAILWAY RETURN FARE TICKETS.

Mr. McLELLAN (Glengarry) moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) respecting railway return fare tickets. He said: I do not feel that it is necessary that I should offer a lengthy explanation of this Bill. It was before the House last session, and I think that the reason it did not pass then was that it was referred to the Railway Committee and, owing to the large amount of business that came before the committee at the last part of the session, my Bill was one of those left over. This Bill is intended to extend justice to men who find it necessary or prefer to travel second class. At present many railways that run second class cars do not issue second class return tickets on proportionately favourable terms with the return first class tickets, so that they discriminate against the class of people that are least able to pay for their passage. The object of the Bill is to compel the issue of second class return tickets at the same percentage of reduction as in the case of first class tickets. Of course this applies only to railways that run second class cars. From this the House will clearly see that it is not my intention by this Bill to put the railway companies to any inconvenience. Suppose two passengers from Ottawa to Montreal and return. One asks for a first class return ticket which is given him. The other asks for a second class return ticket, but is refused. He must then pay full second class fare to Montreal and, on returning, pay the same fare back to Ottawa. By the time he comes back to Ottawa his railway fare will have cost him nearly the same as that of the man who rode first class, in a car that costs very much more money to construct than does a second class car. The objection was raised last session that this would interfere with excursion trains. That is not necessary. Excursions are specially arranged by the companies, for special purposes only, and the Bill can be so modified in committee of the whole as to meet these exceptional cases. I consider that this is a measure of justice; it will prevent discrimination against the poorer class of people, many of whom would enjoy a ride in a second class as much as in a first class car. This is not a party matter or a matter of politics, and every hon. member in this House should be willing to do this measure of justice to the classes of people who desire to take advantage of these rates.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. LISTER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman a question. Can he give us any precedent for the legislation he is asking for? Does he know of any country in the world which has a statute such as he proposes here?

Mr. McLELLAN (Glengarry). I know there are certain restrictions placed on the railway companies in regard to the carrying of passengers and the percentage of profit they make upon the capital invested. Then again, a few sessions ago, certain members on the Government side claimed that it should be made compulsory upon railway companies to issue passes to members without any payment at all. If the members of the Government and other hon. members who sit in this House consider that they themselves are entitled to free passes, I think surely the poorer classes of the people of this country, when they are willing to pay a fair and proportionate amount, are justly entitled to privileges that are similar to those which are enjoyed by those who are better able to pay their fare.

Mr. LISTER. I hardly think that my hon. friend is serious in the legislation which he proposes here. There is hardly a session of this House but that some hon. gentleman feels it to be his imperative duty to introduce some legislation that may have, in his judgment, the effect of popularizing him with the electors of the country. It may be, Sir, that railway companies are not always just. That may be true; but I think it would be inexpedient at the present moment, with the information which this House has before it, to propose this legislation—because I do not believe that my hon. friend really expects this Bill to pass—which might have the effect of impairing, to a certain extent, the earning power of the railway companies. The hon. gentleman must not forget that in Canada, a sparsely-settled country, we have as great railway facilities as are to be found. I believe, in any other country in the world. He must not forget that in days gone by when transportation was difficult, the capitalists of England and of other countries invested enormous sums in the building of railways in Canada in the hope, no doubt, of getting a profitable return; but these investments have proved to be very unprofitable. These railway companies are bonded for enormous sums of money, and the constant agitation that is taking place in Parliament, year after year, must of necessity prejudicially affect the securities of these railway companies, not only the securities that have been floated, but the possibility of getting further loans to improve their lines, and borrowing further sums of money. I do not think that a Bill of this kind should be passed without first being well considered by a committee of the House. These railway companies have invested their money in these lines, their property is there; yet hon. gentlemen feel justified in getting up in this House, over and over again, and treating the property of these companies as if it did not belong to them at all, but really belonged to the people of this country. When we gave them charters we gave them certain rights, and amongst these rights was the collection of tolls. Parliament has control of these tolls. Parliament has the right to say how much should be charged, at least the Railway Act provides that the Governor in Council should fix the tolls. If the hon. gentleman's Bill was an amendment to the Railway Act, placing it in the power of the Governor in Council to provide for what the hon. gentleman seeks here, one could readily understand it. But the hon. gentleman proposes, not to confide in the Governor in Council, which is the forum before which these railway matters must come; but he wishes absolutely, without investigation, without seeing how it would affect the revenue of the companies, without seeing whether it would impair that revenue so much as to make the working of the lines impossible on account of reduced tolls, without inquiring whether it would have the effect of preventing them from paying interest on the bonds; in fact, Sir, by a leap in the dark, he proposes to impair, it may be, very seriously the revenue of the railway companies in Canada. The hon. gentleman, I do not think, intends to do any such thing. I rather believe that the hon. gentleman does not desire that the earning powers of the railway companies should be so diminished as to justify them in withdrawing from their work in this country. My firm conviction is that the hon. gentleman has introduced this Bill without that thought and consideration which usually characterize most things which he does in this House. The hon. gentleman talks about passes. I do not remember that the statement he made a moment ago, is strictly accurate; I do not remember that hon. gentlemen now on this side of the House were in favour of abolishing railway passes. I think that if it came to a vote, probably he would find that these passes would be abolished altogether. But that is a question by itself, it is not germane to this discussion at all. That is something that must be considered by itself. The question may arise in future whether, in the interests of the country at large, it is right and proper that the members of this House should have the right as members to travel upon these railways in attending to their public duties. It may be a question whether it would not be proper that no member should accept a pass from a railway company. It may be that that question which has been so long agitated, and which so many people are in favour of resolving affirmatively, may be adjusted in the same way as has recently been done in the Ontario legislature, namely, that the members of the House should surrender to the railway companies their mileage, and in return for that they should receive a certificate which would entitle them to travel free upon railways. In my judgment that would be a fair solution of this much vexed question—to give the railway companies the mileage of hon. members, and then these would be under no obligation to the companies, if they are now, which I do not believe. I do not think any member of this House is under any obligation to any railway company, or would act in respect of railway legislation any differently than he would if he had not received these passes. I do not think, Sir, there is any House in the world more independent of railway companies, and of other corporations, than the House of Commons of Canada. I have had much experience as a member of important committees of this House, the Railway Committee and the Committee of Banking and Commerce, before which all corporation Bills must be presented, and I have no hesitation in saying that it would be impossible to find in all the world a more independent set of men than those who sit upon these committees; and the country has no right to complain, it cannot complain because there is no reason for it. No wrong or injustice has ever been done by Parliament to either the people or to the companies. The members of this House have always tried, to the best of their ability, to do what is right and just for the companies, while always safeguarding the rights of the people. I think that in dealing with my hon. friend's Bill, all these matters should first be considered. We have no right to confiscate the property of these people, we have no right to confiscate the property of railway corporations, or to pass railway legislation that may impair to any extent the contract which this country has made with them. The honour of the people of this country is involved in the treatment of this question. When my hon. friend suggests that railway corporations should be compelled to grant second class tickets, on one fare and a return fare basis, why does he not make the Bill apply to steamboats, and stages, and other transportation companies throughout the country? Why should it be directed against railway corporations alone? I believe my hon. friend, on reflection, will come to the conclusion that this Bill has been introduced without sufficient information, and that he will decide, either to refer it to a committee, or to withdraw it altogether. In any case he should be in a position to furnish information upon the points I have alluded to before he asks Parliament to enact such a law.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Lister) stated at the outset of his remarks that in the past many Bills had been introduced in this House largely with a view to effect. Surely the hon. gentleman cannot complain of legislation of this kind without his mind taking him back to motions made by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House when they were in Opposition. There was our old friend the Bill which was constantly being introduced by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock), setting forth that it was a great abuse for members of the House to accept positions under the Crown. Yet we see hon. gentlemen opposite at the very inception of their term of office breaking that rule. Then there was the measure for the abolition of the duty on binding twine. That, too, has been buried with other Bills of the past. Then, again, there was the proposition put forward that a reduction should be made in the salary of the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER. I desire to ask the hon. gentleman to what section of the Bill he is addressing himself. I think he should confine himself to the Bill under discussion.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The hon. gentleman is talking on railway fares, and I think we can take a ride.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is taking a ride too far.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the examples I have already given will justify the statement made by the hon. gentleman that too often legislation is attempted in this House for the purpose of effect alone. I do not, however, view the proposition of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) in that light, and the answer put forward by the hon. member for Lambton is against any interference with the rights or privileges of railway companies on the ground that it may affect or interfere with their earnings or possible dividends to stockholders.

Mr. LISTER. They pay no dividends—no railway companies here pay dividends.

Mr. BENNETT. It may happen that they may do so in time to come. Parliament interferes with railway companies by an Act providing that they shall not charge more than 3 cents per mile to those who may wish to avail themselves of the opportunity of or privilege of riding over them. If Parliament can interfere so as to prescribe a 3-cent-per-mile rate as a fair remuneration, I believe Parliament is, to that extent, interfering with the rights and privileges of the railway companies.

Mr. LISTER. That is in their charters.

Mr. BENNETT. If necessary, perhaps you might insert this proposed change in every charter and make it retroactive.

Mr. LISTER. It would be ex post facto legislation.

Mr. BENNETT. Parliament has often considered this fact, that railways may be interfered with to this extent, that they shall not be allowed to exercise their own free will as to apparatus in connection with their cars, for coupling purposes and otherwise, and Parliament intervenes and provides that at very great expense, regardless of the feelings of the railway companies, that they shall have automatic couplers and other arrangements which must result in putting the companies to great expense in making such changes. A railway company has a perfect right to conduct their business as they please, and it is the privilege or right, at all events, of Parliament to interfere, and declare that the company shall do this or that for the protection of the lives of their employees. Although, at any time, in the event of an accident occurring to an employee a right of action exists against the company. Then, again, I believe that the law respecting common carriers would hold this, that he who proffers to a railway company his goods to be carried has a perfect right to have them carried on that railway, and in the event of the destruction of goods, through refusal, a railway company is liable in an action for damages. Surely these provisions must be all in the same line as that on which the hon. gentleman has argued, and must operate as an interference with the rights and privileges of the railway company. I am not aware of any case in point in Canada, but I believe on the other side of the line there have been cases brought by men of colour, negroes, who have been refused admission to trains, and in such cases there must have been a strong interference with the rights and privileges of the railway companies, because they were forced against their will to accept passengers whom they did not desire to ride on their lines. If, however, it is good law for the Government of this country to intervene, and say that no railway shall carry a passenger at a higher rate of fare than 3 cents per mile, surely it must be an interference with the profits and earnings of railway companies for if there were no statutory enactment of that kind, they might have power to charge what they wished, which would result in a considerable advance in their earnings. On the principle of reason and common sense, if these cases afford examples of the fair exercise of parliamentary power, even though they do conflict with the rights and privileges of the railway companies, surely it is only fair to say to the companies that second class passengers must have the same rights and privileges as are accorded to first class passengers. The hon. gentleman makes the complaint that the law is only applicable in the present case to railway companies and not to steamboat lines. Well, that is only one of many reforms desirable, but every reform cannot be secured at once. If the hon. gentleman's Bill goes to committee, and comes back and is moulded into legislation, the effect will be such, I trust, as to compel some hon. gentleman to feel that it is his duty in the interest of the travelling public that they should have the same rights accorded them in regard to steamboats as, I trust, this Bill will accord over lines of railway.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not agree with the provisions of this Bill. I think it is small for Parliament to legislate in a matter of this kind. I do not consider this House has any right to dictate to railway companies what they should charge for carrying passengers, any more than it has the right to regulate the rates of freight, except so far as that is provided for in the company's charter. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has referred to the fact that we make laws that railway companies shall apply automatic couplers to their cars. That is in the interest of public safety, and it is our right and duty to protect life and limb, and, therefore, Parliament has wisely taken action in that direction, and I believe during the present session a measure will be placed on the Statute-book which will largely protect and safeguard the people in that respect. But here is a Bill providing that railway companies shall issue second class return tickets at reduced fares because they issue first class tickets at reduced fare. I think it is beyond the duty of Parliament to pass this Bill, that it has no right to interfere in these matters, and that if it possesses such powers, it should go further and provide that steamship companies, stage coaches, and other conveyances carrying passengers should be placed under like provisions to those applying to railways. But he has not gone that far, and he has only introduced this Bill for the purpose of affecting railways alone. To my mind the public has very little to complain of, because second class tickets are generally issued at a very low rate indeed. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have never heard any request from the public for a Bill of this kind. In no other country that I know of has such legislation been passed, and I believe that the less we interfere with the internal affairs of a railway company the better it will be for all concerned. As has been pointed out, railway corporations are not so flourishing in this country that we need to hamper and obstruct them in every way we possibly can. When we have protected the safety and convenience of the public, I do not think we should go any further. This law might have more effect upon the financial standing of railways than the hon. member (Mr. McLennan) has probably foreseen, and it should be remembered that passenger rates at the present day are down to the lowest point ever known. The railway companies, no doubt, see for themselves that it is in their own interests to reduce rates as far as they can. There has been no grievance pointed out in this matter, and there has been no public demand for such legislation, so that I believe the Bill is not one which should receive the sanction of this House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Mr. Speaker, the House I am sure, readily appreciates the motive which impels my hon. friend from Glengarry (Mr. McLennan) to again introduce this Bill. The reason which he gave is in itself a very commendable one, his object being, as he says, to come to the help of the poorer classes who travel second class on railways. I do not see, however, that the ground which he has taken can meet with the acceptance of this House. As the law exists at the present time, there is no injustice so far as I can see, done second class passengers. If the law compelled railway companies to issue first class return tickets, then the argument of my hon. friend would be irresistible, and railway companies should give the same privilege to second class passengers, but there is no law at present to compel railway companies to issue return tickets at all, and if they do so it is because it is a matter of business. They do it from no spirit of philanthropy, or from favouritism to the wealthier class of people, but they do it because they believe that it will be an inducement to travel and that they will get more returns into their coffers. We may assume, that if the railway companies were not gainers by that system they would put an end to it, and so, as a matter of business the railway companies find it to their advantage to continue the system. Why is it that they afford the privilege to one class of passengers and not to another class? It is evidently because the same business reasons would not apply to second class passengers as apply to first class. Under these circumstances, I ask my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), if it is advisable to attempt to curtail by legislation the manner in which railway companies should carry on their business. It seems to me that it is a most vicious principle to attempt to interfere with what is the legitimate business of any class of citizens of this or any other country. It is quite clear to my mind, and it must be apparent to everybody, that if the railway companies have not afforded this privilege to second class passengers, it is not through any want of courtesy, but simply because the interests of their business prevent them from so doing. If the Bill were to pass, the probable consequence would be that rather than have their business interfered with in this manner, the companies might think it advisable to refrain altogether from issuing return tickets. The arguments are altogether against the Bill of my hon. friend (Mr. McLennan), but I will not depart on this occasion from the procedure which was adopted formerly. On looking over the debates when this Bill was discussed last year, I find that it was allowed to go to a second reading and then referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals, where probably the discussion on it would be more adequate than it could be on the floor of this House. I think, therefore, that the Bill should be read a second time and go to the committee.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. McLENNAN (Glengarry) moved :

That the said Bill be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Motion agreed to.

BUILDING SOCIETIES AND LOAN AND SAVINGS COMPANIES.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton) moved second reading of Bill (No. 12) further to amend the law respecting Building Societies and Loan and Savings Companies carrying on business in the province of Ontario. He said: This is a very short and simple Bill, and explains itself possibly much better than I can. The principal object of the Bill is to give confidence to parties who lend money to building societies. Up to the present time the law has been such that a building or loan society might be organized, and the capital paid in, and a board of directors elected who might re-lend all the capital back to the shareholders upon their stock. This has been found to be an obstacle when these building societies went to the foreign market to borrow money. We purpose by this Bill to do away with that. The first clause reads as follows:—

Mr. LAURIER.

No permanent building society or loan and savings company incorporated under the Act of the legislature of Ontario respecting building societies, or carrying on business in the province of Ontario thereunder, shall make loans or advances to its shareholders upon the security of their stock in the said society or company to a greater amount than one-tenth of the aggregate amount of the fully paid-up capital of the said society or company.

This is a step in advance, and I am quite satisfied it will give such security to the foreign lenders of money that they will have much more confidence in our building societies in the future than they have had in the past. I purpose to add a proviso to this clause, which will still further restrict the lending powers of a company. It reads as follows:—

Provided that, subject to the above limitation, any loan corporation may pass a by-law prohibiting absolutely the lending to shareholders upon the security of their stock, or limiting the aggregate amount which may be so lent, and it shall not be lawful for any corporation to repeal such by-law until the liabilities of such corporation be discharged.

This I think is a very necessary safeguard in connection with the loaning powers of these societies. Another point: Under the old law, shareholders, no matter how many shares in the company they were responsible for, were permitted to have only so many votes as would be represented as fully paid up shares by the aggregate amount they might have paid up on all their shares. We purpose to do away with that, and to give the shareholder a vote for every share he is responsible for. Then, we provide :

No shareholder who is in arrear with respect to any call on his shares, or is in default to the society or company, shall be eligible to be elected a director.

This, I think, is a very necessary provision. The third section provides :

Subsection 2 of section 1 of chapter 24 of the Statutes of 1882 is hereby repealed.

That subsection must be repealed, so that it will not clash with section 2 of this Bill.

Subsection 2 of Chapter 24 of the Statutes of 1882 reads as follows :—

Provided further that, with respect to any new shares issued under the provisions of this Act which have not been paid up in full, the holder thereof shall, in respect thereof, be entitled to as many votes at general or special meetings of the society or company as the amount paid up on such new shares held by him would represent in fully paid-up shares of the society or company, issued irrespective of this Act.

This subsection we purpose to repeal by this Bill. Clause 4 of the Bill is, I think, a very important one. It exempts executors and trustees from personal liability to the company for shares that may be uncalled or unpaid-up. I think it would be unfair if executors and trustees who do not own the shares they hold, were called upon to pay up such shares when in arrears, as they are liable to be under the old law, simply because they are acting the part of a friend to a widow or orphans. Clause 4 is as follows :—

No person holding stock or shares in such society or company as executor, administrator, guardian or trustee of or for any person named in the books of the society or company as being so represented by him, shall be personally subject to any liability as a stockholder, but the estate and funds in his hands shall be liable in like manner and to the same extent as the testator, intestate, ward or person interested in such trust fund would be if living and competent to hold the stock in his own name ; and if the trust is for a living person, such person shall also himself be liable as a stockholder or shareholder ; but if such testator, intestate, ward or person so represented is not named in the books of the society or company, the executor, administrator, guardian or trustee shall be personally liable with respect to such stock or shares as if he held it or them in his own name as owner thereof.

If the executor or trustee holds these shares, and those for whom he holds them are not named on the books of the company, it is taken for granted that he is the owner of the shares, and should be held liable for them, and responsible to the company for all calls made in respect of them. The next clause also, I think, is an important one.

5. No person holding stock of such society or company, as mortgagee or pledgee shall be personally subject to liability as a shareholder, but the person pledging such stock as such security shall be considered the holder thereof and shall be liable as a shareholder with respect thereto so long as he is entitled to redeem the said stock.

That means that if any shareholder pledges his stock or if any person holding stock pledges it to a third party, the person who pledges the stock is the one who shall be held responsible and not the party who lent the money upon it. I think that is a very important clause which those engaged in lending money will appreciate and understand. Another very important clause is the sixth, which provides :

6. If any such society or company issues partly called shares at a premium, and the reserve fund is afterwards reduced, the rate of premium payable to the society or company upon any subsequent call may be reduced in the proportion of the reserve at the time of such call to the reserve at time of issue,—the amount of the reserve in each case being taken to be the amount shown by the next preceding yearly audit.

It is well understood that societies of this kind have frequently increased their stock and at a premium. Some years past the capital stock of these societies sold at a very high premium, but unfortunately, of late years the premium has not continued as it was in former years. Therefore we think that it would be unfair that a man who subscribes stock when it was at a premium of 30, 40 or 50 per cent should be called upon to continue paying calls on the same basis.

There are further clauses I wish to add to the Bill, of which I gave notice in the Votes and Proceedings, on page 68. These additional clauses I propose to add to the Bill when we go into Committee of the Whole. I think that the Bill is one which this House should seriously consider and pass to its second reading and then refer to the Committee of Banking and Commerce, where, I have no doubt, it will receive proper attention.

At this late day I need not refer to the advantages which these loan societies have been to the country at large. In days gone by, when these societies did not exist, the farming community particularly had very great trouble in raising small loans from banks or individuals and had to pay very exorbitant rates of interest. Happily for the borrowing public, these days have passed away, and to-day, in consequence of the large amount of capital brought into this country by these loan societies, we can now borrow money on good security from most of them at from 5 to 6½ per cent. That is a very great improvement on the old days when you had to go to a private borrower and pay ten or twelve per cent. and then were required to have two or three endorsers. To-day a man can go to a loan society and if he has good security, he can get money at a reasonable rate of interest.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 8.50 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved the adoption of the first report of the Committee to supervise the official report of the Debates of the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this report has just been sent to the Clerk's table, and read. I have heard no reason given as to why the quorum should be reduced. The proper course to pursue is to place the report on the records, and let it be moved on another day.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. The only question involved is a reduction of the quorum to five members, which is the usual number.

Mr. FOSTER. We have heard no reason given for the reduction. The rule is to allow the adoption of the report to stand over until the next day.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. Stand.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the point is insisted on, the hon. gentleman will have to give notice.

THE ESTIMATES—A TYPOGRAPHICAL ERROR.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to draw attention to a typographical error in the Estimates which have been laid on the Table of the House. While I understand fully that this cannot be corrected at the present moment, I should like to have it understood that as regards items 83 and 84 the figures opposite those items have been interchanged in the printing of the Estimates. Item 83 should read $80,000, and item 84 $100,000; instead of item 83 reading $100,000 and item 84 $80,000. The items are connected with advances in connection with butter making in the North-west and in connection with cold storage.

Mr. FOSTER. You cannot change the latter one.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Not now.

EASTER ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire from the First Minister, if any statement can be made as to the time that is likely to be covered by the Easter adjournment. Those of us who live a long distance away would like to get some information as to this, if it is possible for the Government to give it now.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The usual adjournment is generally from Thursday of holy week until the following Tuesday, and therefore the Government propose to ask the House to adjourn from Thursday next to the following Tuesday.

An hon. MEMBER. Inclusive?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, not inclusive. We will meet on Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. HUGHES. From the close of the session of Thursday?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Mr. ELLIS. May I make this observation? Those of us who live five hundred miles from here, and remain on Thursday, have to travel half the day of Good Friday in order to get home.

The PRIME MINISTER. The intention of the Government is as I have announced. We have no particular wish in the matter, and we are in the hands of the House, so far as that is concerned. If the general wish of the House were to the contrary, that the House should adjourn from Wednesday to Tuesday, we have no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. I have been asked, as one of the whips of the party, what the intention of the Government is on the matter brought up by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis). I wish the First Minister could say now, that we might go home on Wednesday night so as not to do violence to our conscientious scruples by travelling on Good Friday. It should be remembered that Holy Thursday is also a holiday.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. GIBSON. I am not speaking now as a Presbyterian, but as the whip of the Liberal party. I would like the First Minister to decide this question now. If the House should adjourn from Wednesday night until the following Tuesday, it will, I believe, meet with the approbation of gentlemen on both sides of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIBSON. Except, perhaps, those who live in Ottawa.

The PRIME MINISTER. If the tenderness of the conscience of my hon. friend (Mr. Gibson) is shared generally by the members of the House, the Government will have to yield to that, and adjourn on Wednesday instead of Thursday.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a few remarks on a question of privilege. It appears that the remarks which I made last Monday in support of a motion asking for the disallowance of a British Columbia statute, have not pleased the Toronto "Globe." On the contrary, that paper has taken exception, and violent exception, to some of my statements. The portion of my speech which they object to is as follows:—

Take the attitude of the "Globe" in this matter. Why, Sir, from judging its past, you would have supposed that it would have stood up firmly for the people, in favour of securing to the great masses of the people their rights, that the attitude upon this question of the men who control it, would have had a clear and certain ring of "neverism" about it. What is the fact? I have no hesitation in saying that from the time, some months ago, when they took up this matter with extraordinary, sudden and intense interest, their attitude has been characterized by cant and deception. Sir, they have been beating about the bush for month after month, suggesting what they dare not openly state. They have dealt in a profusion of arguments that have been ingenious at times, but invariably unprincipled. Now, after all these months of pretended discussion and unfair statement of facts with regard to this matter, they finally pretend to come to the conclusion and that conclusion is definite only in this that the Canadian Pacific Railway, their masters, should build that line.

They have seen fit, on account of my using that language, to write editorially in the "Globe" of April 6th, as follows:—

Let him carry his rhetoric to Victoria if he wants to manage the local affairs of his province. And let him abuse the "Globe" to his heart's content. He has perhaps the right to lie and slander under the protection of the privileges of Parliament, and we cordially agree that he is an expert at the business.

In the issue of the same paper of yesterday it concludes an article in the following language:—

If the "Globe" made an attack upon Mr. McInnes, it was in reply to a scandalous charge against this paper made deliberately on the floor of Parliament, a charge that we brand as a falsehood, and its author as a liar and a slanderer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say that, in the first instance, when this matter was brought to my attention, I had not the slightest idea of bringing it before the House, but after the "Globe" has reiterated the statement, and after it has repeated the insult, I feel that were I to allow it to pass by with that contempt which I would like to give it, my silence might be construed into an acknowledgment, that possibly I did make statements which were either untrue or unwarranted. I have nothing whatever to detract from what I stated last Monday. What I said, I believe, was true. I believe that I was altogether warranted in making the statement which I did, by circumstances which are within my knowledge, and within the knowledge of most hon. gentlemen present.

And, Sir, I can say that I am more inclined to believe in the absolute truth of every statement I made, on account of the extraordinary exhibition which the "Globe" has made of itself in regard to this matter, and the bald denials it has given without a scintilla of argument in refutation of what I stated. I felt that I had a duty to perform in connection with this British Columbia question. The matters which I brought forward, and the statements which I made in support of my motion, were not made either to please or displease the "Globe." I did not bring the matter forward, or speak as I did to either please or displease the Canadian Pacific Railway or any person else. I conceived that I had a duty to perform towards my province, and that it was my duty to ventilate a condition of affairs which certainly, in my opinion, demanded prompt and firm action on the part of this Parliament. I am not at all overcome by the attack which the "Globe" has made upon me, feeling that I have simply done my duty in this matter. I say again, Sir, that it is only because further silence on my part might be construed into an acknowledgment that I had misstated facts, that I wish to call your attention briefly to the statements I made, and to give you some reasons which I think will amply justify every statement that I have made.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McInnes) stated that he rose to a question of privilege. In that case, the hon. gentleman will understand that he should conclude with a motion, but if the hon. gentleman rises to a question of personal explanation, that is a different thing. The hon. gentleman himself stated that he rose to a question of privilege. May I ask, is it a personal explanation or a question of privilege.

Mr. McINNES. Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently familiar with the rules of this House to know exactly what I should do, but I certainly wish to have an opportunity afforded me of showing that the remarks which I made in my speech of Monday last were absolutely warranted.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman is making a personal explanation he can proceed. I merely wish to have it in proper parliamentary form.

Mr. McINNES. Then, Sir, I rise to make a personal explanation. I said, among other things, on Monday last :

I have no hesitation in saying that from the time, some months ago, when they took up this matter with extraordinary, sudden and intense interest, their attitude has been characterized by cant and deception.

There can be no doubt about it, Sir, that the "Globe" did take this matter up with a sudden, extraordinary and intense interest at the start. Why, Sir, it surprised people in eastern Canada to see the "Globe" taking such an interest in this undertaking. It was a new scheme to the people of the east. No person in the east seemed interested in it five or six months ago ; but notwithstanding that fact, the "Globe" came out in the early part of November of last year and dealt with this matter editorially. It published strong editorials day after day and week after week, and it has continued that course up to the present time. We did not know at that time what was the reason for that sudden and intense interest ; we had no clue ; but I am going to show that subsequent events proved that there was a very good motive, from its standpoint, for the "Globe" dealing with this matter with such intense interest. I say that its attitude has been characterized by cant and the grossest deception. It is not my purpose to go through the files of the "Globe" to show that this has been so. Time will not permit, but no person can look through the files of that paper without coming to that conclusion. A case has occurred, however, in the past week which I think will show hon. gentlemen that there is ample justification for the statement I make. In its issue of April 1st, dealing with this matter, the "Globe," amongst other things, has this to say editorially :

Whatever it may have parted with, it, the province, retains royalties, which will enable it to reap a considerable benefit from the working of the mineral resources of the country. It is estimated that the 5-cent royalty on coal would yield in the Crow's Nest Pass region $1,248,800 per square mile, or $179,827,200 in all, the area being estimated at 144 square miles.

In the issue of April 7th, the "Globe" reverts to the same argument, and after quoting my figures with regard to the enormous amount of coal in that coal basin, it says :

Whichever price we take, we know that the provincial royalty on coal is 5 cents a ton, and this, on the second estimate quoted by Mr. McInnes, would give a total royalty of nearly two billion dollars to the province, whose railways we are asked to build ! Figuring on the more moderate estimate of the Geological Survey, Mr. Elias Rogers estimates that the royalties coming to the province will aggregate $179,827,200. For the Dominion to build the road while the province receives all the revenues by way of royalty or taxation is, we think, out of the question, and it is chiefly upon this ground that we oppose a disallowance which is evidently sought merely as a step towards Government construction.

This statement is absolutely incorrect, and it comes either from designed deception or from an ignorance which is inexcusable in regard to this matter. The province has not retained the right to collect any royalty at all on coal in the lands alienated to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. It is true, in the case of lands taken up under the British Columbia Land Act, the coal, should there be coal, is reserved to the Crown, with the right of the Crown to exact a royalty from it, when worked, of 5 cents a ton. That provision applies only to such lands as are taken up under the Land Act of the province. There is not a scintilla of truth in this statement in the "Globe," which has been reiterated on several occasions, that the province still holds the right to place a royalty of 5 cents a ton on the coal which has been alienated to the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. It may be said that the province has the right to tax anything in the province. Undoubtedly it has ; but it could never and would never put a tax upon that coal, for this reason, that if it now imposed and exacted a royalty on the coal worked in that region, it would have to exact a royalty on the coal now worked in the province, and the unfortunate fact is that the coal trade in British Columbia will not at the present time stand any such royalty. The result is, that the province could not discriminate between the coal mines in the interior and the coal mines on the coast. Therefore, this whole argument of the "Globe," based on this idea, is utterly fallacious; yet it states that this is the chief ground on which it opposes disallowance. You would have thought that the "Globe" would have been actuated by higher principles; and, indeed, from the former part of the editorial of that day you would have thought that it would have agreed with the Hon. Mr. Davies, and would have supported the policy of the Liberal party in regard to disallowance. It stated, however, that this was its chief reason for not supporting disallowance. That reason is now swept from under its feet, and I am going to wait and see whether it will now come out and support a motion for disallowance. Sir, it will not support it, and for a very good reason. It is not for the reason that it assigns in this editorial, or because it believes in the Liberal principle of non-disallowance. It is because if that Act were disallowed, some of the prominent directors of the "Globe" would fail to make the big haul which they are now making because of their interest in the charter of the British Columbia Southern Railway Company. I have stated that for months past the "Globe" has been suggesting what it dared not openly state. There can be no doubt about that. So apparent has that been that one of the prominent Liberal papers of Ontario—a paper which I do not think takes a second place even to the "Globe"—a paper which has been consistently Liberal, whether it pleased the people in Quebec or anywhere else—the Hamilton "Times"—took occasion on the 26th of February to make the following remarks on the "Globe's" attitude on this subject:

The onus rests with the "Globe" to show that the interests of the people will be better served by handing the railway over to the C.P.R. than by allowing the control to remain in the hands of the Government. So far, the "Globe" has lamentably failed to make out a case in favour of C.P.R. control. Its arguments are all on the defensive. It does not attempt to show how the country will be benefited by allowing the C.P.R. to control and operate the road. Its argument in favour of C.P.R. control takes the form of an apology. It excuses the proposed deal. It does not champion it.

That language is almost identical with the language I have used; and, coming as it does from that high Liberal authority, I do not think any exception can properly be taken to my remarks in that regard. Sir, I said that the conduct of the "Globe" in this matter had been characterized by lack of principle, and I said it advisedly; for we cannot forget that the time was when the "Globe"—

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. member allow me to make a suggestion to him? So far as personal explanations are concerned, I certainly think that the limit has been somewhat passed; but I would suggest to the hon. member that he should state to the House now, if he proposes to go on, that he intends to move a motion that will put him in order; because I do not want a precedent established that personal explanations may be accompanied by such a lengthy argument. If the hon. member wishes to continue in the same line, he will be good enough to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McINNES. Then, Mr. Speaker, I give notice that I will move the adjournment of the House. I was proceeding to say that I charged, and charged advisedly, that the action of the "Globe" in this matter was characterized by lack of principle. I say that because we cannot forget that for years past the "Globe" was the avowed opponent of the Canadian Pacific Railway. To-day we find it the greatest friend in the country of the Canadian Pacific Railway. We see it advocating subsidies being granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway for bogus concessions in return. In the past the "Globe" has always opposed monopoly and everything which partook of the nature of monopoly; but, Sir, we see the "Globe" to-day supporting a policy which will create the greatest monopoly that has ever existed in this country. The "Globe" in times past has appeared to be very much interested in the progress of that western country, but its attitude at this time will have the effect, if effect is given to it, of placing the future of that country in the hands of a grasping monopoly the like of which has never before existed in this country. I say again that the "Globe" has been unprincipled in this matter, that it has been a mere political weathercock, that it has acted more like a nickel-in-the-slot machine that is prepared to do any turn or take any stand that is lucrative to its owners.

I said further:

After all these months of pretended discussion and unfair statement of facts with regard to this matter, they finally pretend to come to a conclusion, and that conclusion definite only in this, that the Canadian Pacific Railway, their masters, should build that line.

It is evidently to that statement, above all others, that the "Globe" takes such strong exception. Sir, I have not one syllable of that to withdraw. There are circumstances which amply justify it. True, I come to a conclusion from circumstantial evidence, but, as hon. members know, many a man has been hanged on circumstantial evidence, and evidence nothing like as strong as that which can be adduced to show that the "Globe" is implicated in this deal. There are several circumstances which point to that. The first is that the "Globe," although in the past has been the avowed enemy of the Canadian Pacific Railway—none stronger in the country—is yet, at the present, pleading for the Canadian Pacific Railway to construct that railway as against every other line. Sir, if the "Globe" were not interested in this matter, why should it not, at all events, pursue a policy that would give to the people of British Columbia an independent means of exit? On the contrary, they not only pooh-pooh the idea of a line independent of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but they are not even in favour of the good Liberal principle of the Government owning that line, notwithstanding it can be shown that the line would be a paying concern and would cost the taxpayers of the country not one cent. There is another fact which shows that the "Globe" and the Canadian Pacific Railway are a unit in this matter, which shows that there is a mutuality of interest, and gives us reason to conclude that its attitude is dictated by the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is a peculiar coincidence that at the very time the Canadian Pacific Railway became interested in this line in the North-west, the "Globe" took it up. We did not hear a word about it before in that organ, but the very moment the Canadian Pacific Railway became the purchasers of the British Columbia Southern charter, with all the grants included in it, the "Globe" took the project up and boomed it for all it was worth. There are other facts in this connection that are very suggestive. Two of the prominent directors of the "Globe" undertook to sell the British Columbia Southern Railway charter to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Canadian Pacific Railway thus became interested in that charter and in the maintenance of all the grants given to the British Columbia Southern Company by the province of British Columbia. We know further that prominent members of the Canadian Pacific Railway are shareholders in the "Globe." Put all these facts together, and you have a mutuality of interest between the "Globe," the Canadian Pacific Railway and the British Columbia Southern Railway, which necessarily forces on us the conclusion that the course of the "Globe" in upholding the purchase of the Canadian Pacific Railway, in advocating subsidies to the Canadian Pacific Railway for bogus and empty concessions in return, is not disinterested, but, on the contrary, characterized by deception and fraud.

Notwithstanding all this, the editor of the "Globe," in last night's issue, comes out and says that he is above all these things which are going on in the directorate of his company. He would have us believe that he is immaculate in his sanctum and utterly uninfluenced by what is going on among his directors, that he knows nothing about it, and is not actuated or influenced by it in the least. Sir, I cannot accept that. There is not a man in this House who will believe that when the president and one of the most prominent shareholders in the "Globe" company are interested in a scheme, their organ will be absolutely disinterested and unprejudiced. There is not an hon. member who will believe that if the Canadian Pacific Railway has shareholders on the "Globe" directorate, who are interested in this matter, as I have shown they are, the "Globe" will pursue that disinterested course which, under ordinary circumstances, it might be expected to pursue. That is too much to expect. No business is transacted in that way. There is not a newspaper office in the country that would be worked that way. We all know that the man who pays the piper can select the tune. We also know that by the tune which is played we can very often tell who is paying the piper, and when the editor of the "Globe" comes out with his Brobdingnagian blast, the great majority of the people will be more inclined to believe that it is but an echo of the wishes of the great mercenary owners of that paper.

Now, I wish to point out that if the statements which I made the other day in this House lacked point, if they were not incisive, if they did not hit the nail on the head, why in the world did not a straight argument come from the "Globe" repudiating them. Surely if what I said were absolutely incorrect, if there was not a scintilla of truth in it, there would be some reply to it besides the cry: "You are a liar and a slanderer." The people of the country will not be satisfied with that. They have a right to insist that the "Globe" should come down with some definite statement to disabuse the mind of the public regarding the connection of that paper with this scheme, or else they will accept the statements which have been current and which I reiterated in the House last Monday. I would say to the editor of the "Globe" to come down off the perch a little. I would ask him to rid himself of this assumed spirit of indignation. I would ask him to get rid of that appearance of injured innocence which he assumes and come down to facts. Let him deal in facts, because that is what the people want in this matter. There is no use in dealing in recrimination and offensive language, for that serves no purpose at all. Let him explain if it is a fact that the directors of the "Globe" are interested in the British Columbia Southern Railway and coal lands out there. Let him state if, through the instrumentality of the directors of the "Globe," the Canadian Pacific Railway were induced to purchase that charter when previously they could not be induced to do so. Let the "Globe" explain why it was that, just as soon as the Canadian Pacific Railway and just as soon as the directors of the "Globe" became interested in this matter, the "Globe" came out editorially in support of the scheme? Let them explain, furthermore, why, in connection with this matter, they have abandoned principles which are undoubtedly Liberal principles; why they are opposing the Government construction of that line, when it would, beyond a doubt, be a paying investment to this country. Let them explain why they are not opposing monopoly in regard to this matter as they have denounced it in the past. Let them explain why they are turning their backs upon the west and abandoning us to a stupendous monopoly. And let them explain, above all, why when their conduct is questioned, they have only torrents of abuse to turn upon the person who thinks it his public duty to call attention to the matter. Sir, until these matters are cleared up, I have no fear in standing in this House or any place else in public and stating what I have stated; and I am perfectly willing that the general public should judge who is the liar and the slanderer.

I can tell the "Globe" that I do not intend to be prevented from doing my duty by any methods of blackguarding that they may indulge in. If vilification coming from the hirelings of monopolists and a corrupted press could have deterred me from speaking out in matters of this kind, I should not be here to-day. I have opposed monopoly hitherto and I will oppose it and denounce all who, to my mind, are coquetting with it. During the elections of last June, I fought for what I thought to be best for the monopoly-cursed masses of the west. I have their confidence, and do not intend to betray it even in the altered atmosphere of this Parliamentary chamber. Whatever I might be inclined to do under ordinary circumstances, these are most extraordinary circumstances; when I see that fair western province with all its wealth threatened with complete subjugation to monopoly, I consider I would be unworthy of a seat in this House, I would be untrue to the interests of the people I represent if I did not cry out against the impending calamity and denounce those who are endeavouring to profit by the ruin of my province. My duty is clear; I have taken a stand and I intend to keep it, whether it pleases the "Globe" or any person else or not. I take the stand that seems to me to be dictated by my duty in the interest of my constituents, of my province and of the country generally; and I am ready and willing at any time that my constituents should have an opportunity of saying whether they endorse my action and conduct upon this matter, or whether they prefer the despicable attitude taken by the "Globe." I beg to move the adjournment of the House.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the leader of the Government, as I do not see the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) here, if he can take the House into his confidence for a moment and tell us when the tariff will be brought down.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In the absence of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance, I may say that I have reason to believe that he will be in a position to make that announcement on Monday.

THE FRANCHISE ACT.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick) moved second reading of Bill (No. 7) to consolidate and amend the law relating to the election of members of the House of Commons. He said: In my explanation at the time of introducing this Bill, I stated that the object was, in the first place, to consolidate the present law with reference to Dominion elections, and that in the consolidation will be found certain amendments. When I state that at the present time one who wishes to understand the law with reference to Dominion elections finds it necessary to consult fourteen or fifteen different statutes, hon. members will be impressed with the necessity and wisdom of consolidating the law upon this subject. This Bill provides for the repeal of the Franchise Act of 1885 and the substitution of provincial franchises, provincial lists and provincial polling divisions. With reference to this particular part of the Bill, I take it for granted that it is almost universally admitted that the time has arrived when it is necessary to make some changes in the franchise law. That appears to have been admitted on all sides and the only question which it was at all necessary to discuss is as to the direction that these should take. The Franchise Act of 1885 was found to be cumbersome and expensive, expensive not only to the state—and that will be accepted by hon. members when I say that since that law came into force in 1885 an expenditure of over a million dollars has been incurred under it by the state—but also to those who had occasion to take part in political matters. I think I can venture to assert that each revision of the tariff that took place involved an expenditure of from $200 to $300 by every member of this House. Not only were the public subjected to this inconvenience and expense, but we also found that we were deprived of a real genuine voters' list at the time of elections. I think it will be found the three elections that have taken place since 1885 were held on voters' lists that were two years old. I think, though I am not positive, that in one case it was found that the voters' list was almost three years old when the elections took place. It seems, as I have said, to be universally admitted that some change is necessary. What we have now to consider is what system shall be adopted in place of the cumbersome and expensive system to which I have referred. The present Government have decided that the best way is to revert to the system which existed from confederation until 1885. And not only did they think it proper to revert to the system in existence during that series of years, but when we attempt to find what conclusion was arrived at as to the amendment of this Act of 1885, we see that those who took part in framing and carrying out that law also thought it better to revert to the system in existence before 1885. We find that in 1894 the late Sir John Thompson, the Minister of Justice of that day, having made up his mind that it was proper to alter the law as it then stood, came to the conclusion that the best system he could substitute for the Franchise Act was the system which we have here adopted, that is to say, the provincial lists.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to interrupt him at that point for the sake of clearness? He has made a very broad statement which, so far as my recollection goes, is not quite correct. I would like the hon. gentleman to make that clearer.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. I will make that quite clear. My way of making it clearer would be to read from the speech made by Sir John Thompson at the time he introduced the Bill in 1894. In introducing the Bill on the 20th of May, 1894, as I find in the House of Commons Debates, page 3367, he said:

We propose important changes in the Franchise Act, and, without making a speech upon them or giving reasons, I would briefly state that we propose to adopt, as the basis of the franchise, the franchises of the various provinces of Canada.

Mr. INGRAM. Read it through.

Mr. HAGGART. You have not finished the sentence.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Yes, I finished the sentence, but I did not finish the speech. I hope that is the distinction that my hon. friend wishes to make.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me—I do not wish to interrupt him unnecessarily—my view of it is this, and I think the speech will carry it out, that Sir John Thompson proposed to adopt the provincial franchise lists as the basis of the Dominion list, but that he continued to keep the two cardinal principles of a control over those lists by the Dominion authorities, and an execution of the law by the Dominion authorities.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. Quite true, I never said the contrary.

Mr. FOSTER. It is clearer now than it was before.

Mr. FITZPATRICK.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. No, it is not, but I will make it quite clear. When introducing the Bill, Sir John Thompson said:

The change is also proposed in this Bill which I indicated a few days ago: that the questions upon which so much difference has arisen in the past, as to the basis of the franchise, shall be adjusted by adopting the franchises of the several provinces. While I admit that this is a new departure, I deny what has been so widely asserted, that it is, in any important or practical degree, a surrender of any principle that we have contended for in times past. The number of differences which exist between the provincial franchises and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act, are so few as not to be worth the contest and the expense which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply both to the local and Dominion legislatures, has recommendations as regards simplicity and facilities for economy, which cannot exist under a dual system such as we have been keeping up for the past few years.

Now, I have here the law of 1894. There are differences between the Bill of Sir John Thompson and our Bill, and I think these differences were fairly pointed out by the ex-Finance Minister, that is to say, that in addition to the provincial franchises, Sir John Thompson provided that, under certain conditions, parties who would not be on the provincial lists, may be added. The second point of difference between that system and ours is that the revising officers appointed by the Federal Government remained in office, so that the revision of the lists would be made by them. We suppress the revising barrister. These are the only two differences.

Mr. FOSTER. That is about right.
