Now, in connection with the duty on agricultural implements I wish to refer to another industry, and to give you a few facts with reference to the iron industry of Canada. I do so more especially as it has a very important bearing on the duty on agricultural implements. The Canadian duty is $4 per ton (short), or $4.48 the long ton of 2,240 pounds. If the Nova Scotia product were given to the manufacturer free of cost and delivered free of cost, he could not use it, because it is too hard; it lacks flexibility. In order to make a good marketable iron to be used in the manufacture of implements or in general industries, our manufacturers of iron have to import about 40 per cent of their ore: the New Glasgow furnace brings it from Newfoundland, and the Hamilton furnace brings theirs from the United States. This is necessary to obtain a proper blend.

In trying to protect that industry we are protecting an industry, a considerable portion of which is located in the United States. The returns in connection with this iron industry show that this terrifically costly experiment which has been going on since 1887 has not produced any result commensurate with the direct and indirect outlay in bounties paid out of the Treasury and in duties taken out of the pockets of the people. In this age, which is essentially an iron and steel age, there is no industry skilled or unskilled that does not rest primarily on these two fundamental articles. From them are made the machinery in the factories and even the tools employed by the workmen therein. From them are manufactured the vehicles for carrying the product to the market and the vehicles for bringing in the raw material and sending out the finished produce. Take the farmer and consider the amount of steel and iron in various forms which he uses, and there are no two products in his whole economy that occupies so large a space in it. Consider that his stoves, his kitchen hardware, his implements, his fences, his nails, his saddlery, his wagons, and even the shirts on his back which is manufactured in the factory, are all affected in order to keep this industry going.

Let us look and see how this industry prejudicially affects the agricultural implement industry. The contract price per ton of implement iron in Chicago or Pittsburg is $11. The duty is $4.48 per ton, or 44 per cent. The duty is about 40 per cent on steel. The duty on coal and fuel that these manufacturers have to use is 60 cents a ton or 60 per cent ad valorem, reckoning the mine price in the United States. To get that pig-iron from Chicago or Pittsburg to Ontario costs $2 per ton for transportation. Leaving out the bounties, therefore, the Canadian smelter has a natural protection of nearly 20 per cent and an artificial protection of 40 per cent. To import iron from the States costs $17.48 per ton. The American manufacturer of implements and other products in which iron is employed obtains his iron for $11. To get a ton of iron from New Glasgow costs a great deal more than $11; it costs in the neighbourhood of $12. The American people enjoy no bounty, while our people have a bounty of $2.24 a ton. The transportation charge from Nova Scotia to Ontario is $4.75 per ton by rail or water. The only reason why it is so high is that if it were brought by water, they would be unable to take it the entire way; bulk would have to be broken, and this accounts for the high rate.

Mr. RICHARDSON.

There is really no essential difference between buying the stuff at the frontier and paying the duty, and bringing it from Nova Scotia. We pay in transportation 45 per cent of the actual cost of the ton in Chicago. All the other articles that enter into the construction of implements, share in the tax imposed through these iron duties. They might be enumerated as malleable iron castings, nuts, bolts, screws, wire nails, and even the cotton duck that is used for binder aprons is taxed. Then the enormous cost of iron, steel and other machines comprising the plants in all factories must be taken into consideration also, workman's tools, steam hammers and a thousand and one machines used in connection with the manufacture of implements. It is safe to say that it is cheaper by 50 per cent to start an agricultural implement factory in the United States than it is in Canada. The implement manufacturer has to add the extra cost of his plant to the price of his machine.

It ought to be pointed out here that this agricultural implement industry was created and fostered when raw material was absolutely free. The industry took root during the American war when there were no duties on either iron or steel, which were then imported from Great Britain. We secured our iron and steel then on an average of $10 a ton cheaper than the Americans at that time produced theirs. That $10 a ton was tantamount to a bounty to that amount to the Canadian manufacturer. These conditions in Canada which existed in 1876 and later have been reversed, that is to say the Americans have got the cheap material and Canada the dear. Nature, it has been demonstrated, has been kinder to the people of the United States. Providence and not protection did it. We do not want to do any injury to any legitimate industry, but it must be pointed out that the way to modify the high duties on agricultural implements and hundreds of others, is to wipe out this illegitimate industry. It is responsible for very much of the trouble. In the interest of the farmers and of the west generally, the Government has not gone far enough in the reduction of these iron duties. It may be quite true that many millions of dollars have been invested in the iron industry in Nova Scotia, but the question is whether we should go on compelling the taxpayers to support an industry of that kind that will continue to be a deformed infant no matter how long we nurse it, even if we continue to hold the bottle to its mouth till the crack of doom. The true way to cheapen agricultural implements is to sweep the iron duties away altogether even if in doing it the Government had to commit the crime of infanticide. In view of the deformity of the child the country would prove the crime. It is quite evident in view of the facts I have submitted that the agricultural industry would not be fairly treated if the duty were entirely taken off the finished article, thus leaving it exposed to high duties on the raw material, which be it repeated is tantamount to a bounty to the foreign implement maker who gets his raw material at first cost.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not want, unnecessarily, to interfere with the hon. gentleman's speech, but I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the fact that he is reading it.

Mr. SPEAKER. Probably the hon. gentleman is referring to his notes.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Owing to the large number of figures employed in discussing this question and a desire to be strictly accurate, I feel obliged to make copious notes. Another way to cheapen implements and every thing else and to put money directly into the farmer's pocket, is for the Government to see if something cannot be done to secure lower freight rates.

Sir Charles Rivers-Wilson, president of the Grand Trunk, recently announced that the company paid last year $375,000 for duty on coal. That amount capitalized is about three times the amount of aid, which according to report is to be given by the Government to construct the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Now, it is quite clear that it is not the Grand Trunk but the settler of Canada that pays this $375,000. If the duty were taken off coal the settlers would save that vast amount.

The dilemma in which the Government found itself was whether they should kill these deformed infants outright or wean them gradually. They have decided upon the latter alternative. As a North-west member, representing a purely agricultural constituency, I cannot refrain from expressing my great regret and disappointment that such articles as agricultural implements, coal oil, lumber, and other necessities have not either been placed upon the free list or very greatly reduced. I know that my constituents, and the settlers generally of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, will share in the regret and disappointment to which I have given expression, as they have been fondly hoping for years that the principal commodities and necessities of the farmer would be either placed upon the free list or reduced to a minimum. While in justice to myself and my constituents, who trusted me to accurately and honestly represent them, I have felt bound to present the views I have offered, I would not like to set myself up against the united wisdom of the entire Cabinet, for no one recognizes more thoroughly than I do the magnitude of the task they have had to face; the heroic style in which they have grappled with it, and the pretty thorough manner in which the pruning knife has been applied. However, as a representative of a purely agricultural constituency and in view of the pledges I gave and of the confidence which I flatter myself my constituents repose in my integrity. I am bound to say that if it were not for the very general sweeping reductions that have been made if it were not that I see in the changes a strong trend towards ultimate free trade; if it were not that I regard the changes as an instalment only; if it were not that I recognize the tremendous difficulties that beset the path of the Government in rescuing the country at one stroke from the effects of a long in-grained policy of protection, and placing it on a free trade basis; I am bound to say, however, regretfully that I would be forced to oppose the Government if I took cognizance only of the failure to gratify western expectations and demands upon two or three important articles. When, however, I find hon. gentlemen opposite proclaiming that the new tariff is a death blow levelled at protection, and that this that and the other industry is killed, I am greatly encouraged in my purpose to support the Government, for according to my way of thinking, and I doubt not that the west will agree with me, the sooner that many of these so-called industries which cannot exist without the nursing bottle, are slaughtered the better for the country. I don't want any better material with which to campaign in the west than the fact that dozens of these little misshapen, atrophied, pap-fed industrial monstrosities have been sent to the land of Kingdom Come by the operation of the new tariff. If I wanted to buttress myself with an additional reason for supporting the Government I might add that it would be furnished in the prospect of a return to power of the high priests of protection sitting opposite, and I could not justify a vote which might tend to bring about a consummation so devoutly to be deplored. If hostile critics of the Liberal Government were to say that so far as the west is concerned it is chastising us with whips, it would certainly not be stretching the metaphor too far to say that if the Conservatives were returned to power, they would promptly resume the grim occupation of chastising us with scorpions.

Mr. KLOEFFER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reference to the trade policy of the present Government, and at the outset I shall say, that there never has been a time in the history of Canada when our fiscal policy required greater attention than at the present time, and greater caution before interfering with existing conditions. During the last campaign the exponents of the Liberal policy made many promises to the people, and indeed I may say that they made very different promises. One time they pledged themselves to "free trade as it is in England"; another time "tariff for revenue only"; another time "tariff reform" and then they went on to explain, that the farmers were robbed and that the manufacturers were spoon-fed long enough. In the light of all this, it is strange that the Liberal Government should have brought down to this House a tariff practically the same as it existed under the Conservative Government. They have taken the National Policy to their side, and have only put the same hat on another man. Nine-tenths of the tariff they left the same as it was in the National Policy, and one-half which they changed they lowered, and the other half they raised. I contend, Sir, that the tariffs which they lowered have ruined some of the manufacturers, and as the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) pointed out there are any number of manufacturers in this city to-day dissatisfied and disappointed. It is also true, that the industries which the tariff affected are the chief industries of this Dominion, and are the life of Canada, such as carriage hardware, carriage manufactures and I might also add, that this tariff has injured the farmers of the country as well. Let us see some of the industries which have been ruined by this new tariff. Take the belt manufacturers. In the small sizes of bolts which cost 32.49 cents a hundred, weighing four pounds, the old duty was 1 cent a pound and 25 per cent, which amounted to 12.12 cents per 100, while the new duty is 35 per cent, amounting to 11.37 cents, which makes a difference of 6 per cent lower under the new tariff. On two by quarter inch bolts, which cost 35.08 cents a hundred, weighing four and a half pounds, the old duty was 1 cent a pound and 25 per cent, making 13.27 cents a hundred, and new duty amounts to 12.28 cents, or a reduction to the extent of 7 per cent. In the larger bolts, two and a half inches by three-eighths, the duty has been reduced by 20 per cent. The old duty was 22.65 cents, and the new duty 18.65 cents. On the larger sizes the new duty is 25 per cent lower. In the case of coach screws which cost $2.52 for 74 pounds, the old duty was 1 cent per pound and 20 per cent, making $1.24, and under the new duty of 35 per cent it is 88 cents, which makes the new duty 30 per cent lower than the old. Washers are lowered from 15 to 25 per cent according to the size. On buggy springs, inch and a quarter, which cost $2.09 per pair, weighing 33 pounds, the old duty was 1 cent a pound and 20 per cent, making 74 cents, and the new duty is 30 per cent amounting to 63 cents, which is 15 per cent lower. On carriage springs the old duty was 1 cent a pound and 20 per cent, amounting to $1.05, and the new duty amounts to 84 cents, which is 20 per cent less. In axles for buggies, inch, which cost $1.82, weighing 42 pounds, the old duty was 1 cent a pound and 20 per cent, making 78 cents, and the new duty is 30 per cent amounting to 54 cents, which leaves a difference of 35 per cent between the new duty and the old. The new duty on rivets is from 25 to 33 per cent lower than the old duty. Wood screws, which used to cost on the American side 17.95 cents per gross, with a discount of 90, 10 and 5, and 3 off for cash, cost laid down in Canada 28.45 cents per gross under the old duty of 3 cents per pound, while under the new duty of 35 per cent they will cost 24.23 cents.

The following table will show the new duty and the old duty on the articles mentioned as well as the decrease of duty on those articles. I hold that the Canadian manufacturers cannot stand this reduction.

* Old duty. (1c. per lb. and 20 p.c.)

The price charged by Canadian screw makers was 29.76 cents per gross. So the prices were pretty close. On the smaller sizes of screws the price per gross was proportionately less, so that the specific duty amounted to a higher rate; that is where the advantage of a specific duty comes in. The following table shows the cost of American screws under the old specific rates of duty, and under the present ad valorem rate of 35 per cent, respectively, and the prices of the same sizes of Canadian-made screws:

Size.	Cost of American Screws.		Present cost of Canadian Screws
	Und'r Old Duty.	Und'r New Duty.
	cts.	cts.
2 1/4 in. x 14 gauge, per gross	28 45	24 23	29 76

1/2 in. x 11 do	14 52	10 15	12 47
3/8 in. x 9 do	11 38	7 26	9 92

That shows that it will be impossible for Canadian screws under the new tariff to compete against the imported article.

On drop forgings the duty under the old tariff was 32 1/2 per cent, which was too low. With that rate about one-third of the drop-forgings used in Canada were brought in from the United States. Now, the Government have reduced that duty to 30 per cent, which will make matters still worse.

The duty on bar iron has been reduced from $10 a ton to $7 a ton to make the raw material cheaper; but the raw material will not be cheaper, and I will show you why. Some years ago there was only one rolling mill in Canada; that was in Hamilton. Afterwards four more started in Montreal, and one in Guelph, and two rolling mills in Toronto. The competition between these mills has brought down the price of bar iron to $26 a ton, or from $1.30 to $1.35 per hundred. The price of American bar iron at the present time is from 95 cents to $1 per hundred. The new duty of $7 a ton is equivalent to 35 cents per hundred, which would bring the cost of American iron to $1.30 per hundred. Although our iron manufacturers have sold their iron at from $1.30 to $1.35 per hundred, this was less than it actually cost them to make, because they cannot make it for less than from $1.45 to $1.50, and it is only because times are so hard in the United States that American iron can be got at the present low price. When times improve in the United States, the price there will be raised to at least $1.20, which at the new rate of duty would bring the price up to about $1.55 in Canada. Therefore, I say that this reduction in the duty will not enable manufacturers to get their raw material any cheaper than they could get it under the old rate of duty.

The duty on steel billets has been reduced from $5 to $4 a ton. The result will be that the Montreal, Guelph and Hamilton mills will not be able to compete with the American producers. But while the reduction on billets is 5 cents a hundred, the reduction on steel bars is 15 cents a hundred, so that Canadian mills will not be able to make any steel bars at all. The pig iron smelting works are in a different position, because hon. gentlemen opposite, although claiming that they are not protectionists, increase to the smelting works the bounty on pig iron, while the rolling mills men do not get any bounty. The latter make their iron from scrap, and although the duty on scrap iron is reduced from $4 to $1.50 per ton, they will not get it much cheaper than they do at the present time, because it would not pay men to collect scrap iron at any lower price than they are now paid.

Now, what has the new tariff done for the farmer? Hon. gentlemen opposite have always told the farmer that he was robbed by the manufacturer, while not as well protected. But what have they done with the farmer's protection? They have taken off 3 cents a bushel from wheat, reducing the duty from 15 cents to 12 cents a bushel, they let in corn free, and they take 15 cents off flour. Free corn might do very well for large farmers who raise a high grade of cattle, and who of course want cheap feed. But eighteen out of every twenty farmers cannot afford to keep these high-grade cattle. They raise peas and oats for the market, and now that corn comes in free, they will get even less for their peas and oats than they did before. Their heads are cut off, as well as those of the manufacturers.

They cannot manufacture these goods in competition with the Americans. When you take off from 15 to 20 per cent, and then take off another one-eighth from the foreign goods, where will our manufacturers be? They will not be able to resist because they have no protection on their raw material. They cannot buy their raw material any cheaper now than they did before, as iron cannot be manufactured any cheaper than it is at present. Now, we want to protect these manufacturers. If we do not, if we are not loyal to them, this country cannot prosper. And the farmer is just as much a manufacturer as are the others. He ploughs up the soil in order to manufacture wheat just as the baker manufactures bread out of the flour. Let me say further that I am a Canadian, that I am out for Canada first before any other country, and that I am next a British subject; but I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I am here to protect our country strongly, so that our farmers and mechanics may be able to earn a living. If we do not protect the manufacturers, if their establishments are not kept in the country our young men will have to go where manufacturing industries do flourish. The hon. gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Richardson) wants everything admitted free into the North-west, and does not want to give any concessions to the manufacturers here who employ so many hands. The hon. gentleman wants to feed these hands; but if he does not protect the manufacturers, all these hands will have to go to the other side of the line. If these goods are not manufactured in Canada, they will be manufactured in the United States, and our people will emigrate to the United States to seek employment in these factories. It will then be the American farmers who will feed them, and our North-west friends will not have any people here to feed.

Our hon. friends opposite were continually urging that the United States were friendly to them and hostile to the Conservative party, and that if we would only return them to power they would secure better trade relations with the United States than possibly could the late Government. But what have we found since they came into office? Two Ministers went over to Washington to talk trade relations, and they came back and told us that they had favourable reports. But hardly were their backs turned when the Dingley Bill came down and the American tariff went up higher. I do not believe in running after people. That exhibits weakness, and you can never make a success by conduct of that description. Let a business man run after a thing too much and coax too much, and he will never succeed. One requires to be more independent, and by dint of being independent he will get more than he could otherwise.

In my opinion, it would have been much better if the present Government, instead of travelling through the country hearing what the people had to say, had stayed at home and written to the manufacturers and got their views. If they had done that, we would have a much better tariff than we have to-day, and you would not see so many deputations running to Ottawa as we now see. I am sure that none of these factories can stand if the duties are not changed. The least little change in a tariff will help goods in from other countries. I believe that the old tariff was all right, except that it was rather too low, and instead of reducing it where the duty was 32½ per cent, we should have made it 35, and where it was 35 per cent we should have made it 40 per cent, and kept the home market for our own farmers. If we cannot keep our people here, our farmers will not have a home market. There is no use expecting that we can ship any manufactured goods to the other side because if any did enter England, the English merchants would soon drive them out. The United States are protectionists from the infant in the cradle to the great-grandfather, while in our case our duties are actually too low and the consumers do not benefit. In the time of Mr. Mackenzie, when the duty was 17½ per cent, goods sold for twice the price in Canada that they do now. Therefore, 35 per cent duty is not too much on all goods, and it will be found that fifteen or twenty years ago the prices were much higher. I have known goods which sold at $4.50 in Mr. Mackenzie's time sell at $1.85 to $1.90 now. Why should a country like this have a tariff only averaging 30 per cent when our neighbours have a tariff of 40 per cent, which tariff they are about to run up to 50 per cent. That is a policy which is suicidal on our part. Instead of reducing the tariff, we ought to raise it. Hon. gentlemen opposite have only reduced the tariff here and there, but where they did reduce it, they hit the best industries we have in Canada. Now, I shall go on to sewing machines.

Mr. GIBSON. Your own factory?

Mr. KLOEPFER. Well, I have an interest in it, and I have not had it very long either. Before 1894 sewing machines were charged $3 specific duty and 20 per cent, but in 1894 the late Government made a mistake by reducing that tariff down to 30 per cent. What happened? From 1894 out, American machines came in, and the poor manufacturer in Guelph struggled along as best he could until at last his business went down and he stopped.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). He was dead long before that.

Mr. KLOEPFER. You do not know anything about it. That man made money before. He had a plant there which must have cost him $350,000, and which, after his business went down, would not fetch $50,000, and the hon. gentleman would be the last man to buy it. He would not have courage enough.

The man in Guelph made money, as everybody knows. In 1894 the duty was reduced. The result was that the importation of sewing machines increased from $80,000 to $113,000, crippling his industry. The citizens of Guelph did not wish to see the industry go away, and some citizens put up money and kept the thing there. We do not know whether we are going to make any money or not under the 30 per cent tariff. A specific duty ought to have been put on, or the ad valorem duty greatly increased. If we had the market, and were called upon to supply all the machines used in Canada, instead of having a portion of it come in from the United States, we could run that shop full time. At present the workmen are only getting four and a half days a week. We could then pay the mechanics for six days a week, and, running the factory full, we could make the machines cheaper. It is well known that, at certain seasons when times are hard in the United States, the American manufacturers send over goods and slaughter our markets, thus crippling our manufactures. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Wood) knows that.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I know all about it.

Mr. KLOEPFER. I always find that a wholesale man does not want to see high protection. He likes to get his goods as cheaply as possible, because then he can sell to the local dealers. When he has large capital he can import largely and thus make a profit even if he has to sell at low prices. But when the goods are manufactured in Canada, the goods come more direct, and these wholesale men are cut off. That was the result in the case of Mr. Crathern in Montreal. He made a fortune on bar iron. He would get large quantities in, and when it reached Montreal would distribute it to buyers throughout the country. Then, when navigation closed, he could make an extra price. When the iron mills started in Canada the goods went more direct and he lost his trade—and he is kicking about it. When a mechanic gets full time he need not be so very careful of his expenditure, and the additional money put in circulation is a benefit to all. It is a hard thing for a man to be given only four and a half days in a week. When he has the money to spend he will spend it, and it is better for everybody. In the same way, when the price of wheat goes up to $1.50 per bushel, even in towns they are tickled over it, for there is more money in circulation, and it is a benefit all around. I do not believe in too cheap goods; they are the ruination of any country. In this tariff Nova Scotia gets the best of it. They have the duty on iron and also the bounty on both the pig and the billets. Then they get flour reduced and free corn. I suppose that while the election was on it was found desirable, from the Government standpoint, to give them some concessions. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House for your patient hearing.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

DISMISSAL OF MR. P. J. WILLIAMS.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Is the statement made in the Winnipeg "Tribune" of April 17, that P. J. Williams, Indian agent at Battleford, has been dismissed, correct?
2. If so, why?
3. Is it true that C. M. Daunais succeeds him?
4. Is this the same Daunais who was instructor on Red Pheasant's Reserve, Battleford, in 1885-86?
5. Why did Daunais leave the service of the Indian Department?
6. Was he not dismissed for immorality?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The statement that Mr. P. J. Williams has been dismissed is correct. He was dismissed on account of his incapacity and gross neglect. The cattle of the agency were allowed to get into a most wretched condition and about 150 head of them were lost. Mr. Charles M. Daunais succeeds Mr. Williams. The department does not know whether he is the same Daunais who was instructor on Red Pheasant's reserve, Battleford, in 1885. The Daunais who was employed as instructor on Red Pheasant's reserve was dismissed by the then Indian Commissioner, Hon. Edgar Dewdney. Information reached the department that he was accused of immorality, and the then Indian Commissioner ordered an inquiry on the 25th February, 1886. But on the following day, the 26th February, 1886, the then Indian Commissioner dismissed the said Daunais without inquiry.

CIVIL SERVICE—COUNTY OF GASPE.

Mr. CASGRAIN (for Mr. Chauvin) asked :

1. Who was appointed, by the present Government, to hold inquiries in relation to the civil service in the county of Gaspé? ;
2. The number of such inquiries?
3. Salary and expenses of commissioner?
4. Duration of his mission ; its object and nature?
5. At whose request, and on whose recommendation was the said commissioner appointed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Charles A. Lebel. 2. Three inquiries held in Gaspé for Marine and Fisheries. 3. Salary allowed by Order in Council : $4 per diem and living and travelling expenses ; $200 paid on account of salary and expenses. 4. Employed thirty-six days in investigation. The object and nature was to investigate charges against Government officials of political partisanship on the occasion of the last Dominion election, or of inefficiency in the discharge of their duties. 5. Mr. Lemieux, M.P.

MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

Mr. LaRIVIERE asked :

By whom was the settlement of the school question signed, after the same was agreed upon by both the Federal and provincial governments, and why are not the names given in the copy brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have already stated to the hon. gentleman that the negotiations which took place between the Canadian Government and the Manitoba Government were confidential. When they were concluded, the terms of the agreement were communicated to the press and taken back to Manitoba by the commissioners of the Manitoba Government, and afterwards embodied in the Act of that legislature.

FISHERY GUARDIANS, NORTH VICTORIA.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Who were fishery "guardians" in the waters of North Victoria, including Sturgeon, Cameron, Balsam, Mud Turtles, Moore's, Gull, Kushog, and other North Victoria lakes, and Fenelon Falls and Gull River, last year, under direction of Fishery Overseer Fitzgerald?
2. Are these guardians yet in the service of the Government?
3. Have others, or any, been appointed since July, 1896?
4. If so, what is the name of each?
5. Why were the former officers, guardians, or any of them, removed?
6. When were they retired?
7. By whom were the new men appointed?
8. What is the date of the authority or appointment of the new guardians by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?
9. Had the department, at Ottawa, anything to do with the retirement of the former guardians or with the appointment of the new ones?

Mr. LAURIER.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. J. W. O'Brien, Sturgeon Lake and Goose Lake ; Thomas Johnston, Cameron Lake ; Wm. Wellwood and Dougald Sinclair, Balsam Lake ; Wm. Batty, Mud Turtle Lake ; Thomas Leary, Moore and Gull Lake ; John Mortimer, Bohs and Deer Lake ; George Hewitt, Gull River ; A. Martin, Burnt River. 2. No. 3. The parties mentioned in answer to No. 1 were employed since July, 1896. 4. Answered by No. 1. 5. The time of their engagement having expired, they are no longer in the employ of the department. 6. The time of their engagement expired on the 15th April inst. 7. No guardians in this riding have yet been engaged, but they will be appointed at once. 8. Answered by No. 7. 9. Their time of engagement had expired and new guardians will be named to the fishery officer by the department.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS. N.W.T.

Mr. DAVIS asked :

Are the collectors of customs at the ports of York Factory, Moose Factory and Churchill officials of the Hudson's Bay Company? When were they appointed, and do they receive any salary? If so, at what rate are they paid?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The Department of Customs understands that the customs officers at York Factory and Moose Factory are also officers of the Hudson Bay Company. There is no customs officer at Churchill. The present officer at York Factory was appointed on the 1st of July, 1893, and his salary is $200 per year. The present officer at Moose Factory was appointed on the 1st September, 1892, and his salary is $200 per year.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would like to mention to the hon. members that I have directed a little change or addition to be made to the Votes and Proceedings which are laid on the tables of hon. members every day, by adding to them a statement of the meetings of the committees of the House, which I think will be kept up as completely as possible by the clerk of committees. Unless they are very suddenly called by a notice from the chairman, the places and times of meetings will be placed in the Votes and Proceedings.

RAILWAY EXPENDITURES.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish again to call the attention of the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) to an order that was agreed to last session calling for a statement of the expenditures on railways in the different provinces. It is very necessary to have this statement laid before the House at an early day. I have a notice of motion on the Order paper in regard to the building of branch railways in Prince Edward Island, and it is very necessary that this statement should be brought down before that notice of motion is reached. I want to bring before the notice of the House, and for the guidance of the Minister of Railways in preparing this statement an error that I think occurs in the report of his department.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am afraid the hon. gentleman cannot go into a discussion of a subject like that at this stage of the proceedings.

Mr. MARTIN. I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. If there is a notice of motion by the hon. gentleman on the paper covering this subject, it is not possible to anticipate the discussion with a motion to adjourn the House. The hon. gentleman has risen to ask for information about returns which have been ordered, and I do not think that he can go beyond that.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The hon. gentleman says he wishes to call the attention of the Government to an error in the report.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood him to say that he wished to discuss matters in the report of the Minister of Railways, in connection with a return to be brought down. I do not possibly see how we can allow that. I wish to give every latitude that the rules of the House will allow, but I do not think we can permit that.

Mr. MARTIN. I say I think it would help the Minister of Railways in preparing the return to be brought down. I find a statement here—

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot see how the hon. gentleman is in order. He cannot refer to a motion which is on the Order paper.

Mr. MARTIN. I wish to call attention to a statement which is on page 12.

The PRIME MINISTER. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have decided that the hon gentleman is out of order.

POSTMASTER AT BEAMSVILLE.

Mr. McCLEARY. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to draw the attention of the House to what must be considered by all fair-minded and unprejudiced men an outrage in every respect against a free-born Canadian citizen, an outrage not committed by any power of Government unfriendly to Canada and Canadian institutions.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier).

If my hon. friend intends to conclude with a motion, he will be in order, but not otherwise.

Mr. McCLEARY. I propose to conclude my remarks by a motion to adjourn. I was going on to say that this outrage had been perpetrated by a Canadian Government, upon a Canadian citizen, debarring him from his civil rights, and his privileges as a British subject.

The Sultan of Turkey has for the past months perpetrated most atrocious outrages on the Christian Armenians. Cold-blooded and heart-rending have been those nefarious outrages that have been perpetrated. There is, however, excuse to be made for the Sultan of Turkey; there may be something said in palliation of those terrible offences and awful crimes that have been carried out in his domains. But the Sultan of Turkey is a Turk—he is without the pale of ordinary civilization. Therefore there can hardly be a comparison instituted between the conduct of a Government such as Canada possesses, which enjoys the light of civilization, with the conduct of a despot who does not enjoy the enlightened environments of the Canadian people, a despot who knows nothing whatever of the great principle laid down by that greatest of teachers who ever trod the sands of time,—“Whatsoever you would that man should do unto you, do ye even so unto them.” While we characterize such acts as most abominable by the Turks, what shall we say of this Government which stoops not only to take away the means of livelihood of a Canadian citizen, but also to destroy his ability to make a livelihood in the future, even to take from him what is dearer to him than any position he occupies, namely, his character and his honour. It is because I consider this a most important matter, affecting primarily the individual to whom I have referred, but which if carried out to the extent that hon. gentlemen who sit behind the Government wish to carry it out, will affect a very large proportion of the citizens of this country. I beg leave to call the attention of the House to it.

In the early part of this session I placed on the Order paper of this House certain questions relative to the dismissal of W. D. Fairbrother, postmaster at Beamsville. The Minister of the Interior, acting for the Postmaster General, whom I regret is not in his place, answered the question. The inquiry I made was as follows:—

1. When was W. D. Fairbrother appointed postmaster at Beamsville?
2. Was he appointed by Order in Council?
3. Has the said W. D. Fairbrother been dismissed from said position?
4. If dismissed, what was the cause, and were any charges made against him?
5. If charges were made against him, was an investigation of the truth of such charges made?

6. Has a successor been appointed to Mr. Fairbrother? If so, who is he, and what is his age?

The Minister of the Interior, for the Postmaster General, replied as follows:—

W. D. Fairbrother was appointed postmaster of Beamsville on the 11th of April, 1895. No Order in Council was passed appointing him. The following charges were made against him:—That, from the time he took possession of his office until the 23rd of June last, every possible means was taken to sell and give away Conservative literature through the office, and that he held back literature that was in the interests of the Liberal party; that, during the last campaign, he repeatedly absented himself from the office in order to attend political caucuses in the interests of the Conservative party; that he endeavoured to utilize the office rather for profit to himself than for the public convenience; that he would keep a lobby full of people waiting for their mails whilst he parleyed over the sale of papers through the wicket; that he changed the general delivery from a convenient arrangement of fifty boxes to that of twenty-one, which made the office so crowded as to occasion nearly double the necessary time for the distribution of papers, circulars, &c., the public being thus kept waiting; that this change in the system of delivery was such as to greatly delay the delivery, involving a handling of from twenty to fifty pieces of mail matter for almost every person calling for mail; that when asked by the assistant why he so inconvenienced himself and the public in keeping them waiting so long, he replied: "I do not care how long they have to wait; let them purchase boxes. If you make it more convenient for them than they have it, they would never rent a box." That the postmaster would stand by the half hour reading the contents of ingoing and outgoing postcards passing through the office; that the assistant cautioned him against this practice without avail; that he took an active political part in the last general election, that, during the whole of the election day, he acted as outside scrutineer and took an active part in bringing voters to the polls, instead of attending to the duties of his office; that satisfactory evidence was furnished as to the postmaster having taken such political part, which rendered any further investigation unnecessary, and he was accordingly removed from the position and Alex. Allan appointed in his stead.

Any single one of those charges that were stated by the Minister would, I presume, be considered sufficient by the members of the Government to dismiss Mr. Fairbrother from his position. The only ground of complaint I have is, that Mr. Fairbrother was not given an opportunity of meeting those charges, notwithstanding the fact that the Prime Minister from his place in this House, at the first session of this Parliament, declared that no officer or civil servant would be dismissed without an inquiry being instituted. There is not one single point of proof adduced.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I rise to a point of order. I thought the hon. gentleman was merely calling the attention of the Postmaster General to some one fact. I see, however, that the hon. gentleman is opening up a very wide discussion on a motion on the Order paper connected with this very dismissal, and I submit that the discussion cannot be anticipated.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman point out the motion.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The motion stands in the name of Mr. McCleary, and is for copies of letters and correspondence referring to the dismissal of W. D. Fairbrother, as postmaster at Beamsville, with a copy of the charges, and by whom such were made.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member has not the right to anticipate a notice standing on the Order paper in regard to this very matter.

Mr. McCLEARY. I have no intention of bringing on a general discussion. I am now referring to the answer given to me on behalf of the Postmaster General.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it would be perfectly in order, if the notice of motion were not on the paper in the name of the hon. gentleman, to refer to a past answer given; but as the hon. gentleman has chosen to place the motion on the Order paper, it is impossible for him to anticipate it, because it would be inconvenient and contrary to the rules and practice of the House.

Mr. McCLEARY. I will have to bow to your decision, Mr. Speaker, but I certainly think it is a strange procedure, that I have not the right to reply to an answer given to a question by the Postmaster General.

THE RECIPROCAL TARIFF.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, if he has yet determined whether the tariff of Belgium is "on the whole" as favourable to Canada as our schedule "D" is to Belgium?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I have not so determined.

Mr. McNEILL. Might I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson), if he has determined yet whether the tariff of Germany is "on the whole" as favourable to Canada as the offer made in schedule "D" of our tariff is to Germany?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I have not so determined.

Mr. McNEILL. Then we must understand, that the Government have placed this resolution upon the paper, in blank ignorance as to whether—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. McNEILL. Surely, Mr. Speaker, I am in order—

Mr. SPEAKER. By the practice of the House, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is allowed, at this stage, to ask questions relating to important matters of public business, and I apprehend that the questions which the hon. member (Mr. McNeill) asks are of that nature. However, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) should not now indulge in comment upon the answers given.

Mr. McNEILL. I, of course, abide by your decision, Mr. Speaker, but—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has the right to ask questions on important business. Whether the Government are ready to answer them or not is their affair, but comments on that are out of order.

Mr. McNEILL. I know, Mr. Speaker, that you will allow me to make an observation. You know that I would not for a moment desire to say anything disrespectful to the Chair. But, I must ask you, Sir, to consider whether you are not pressing that rule a little hardly upon me now.

Mr. SPEAKER. The greatest respect an hon. member can show to the decision of the Chair, is to abide by it.

Mr. McNEILL. Under the circumstances—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman may have some important matter to mention which is not out of order. I will be glad to hear it if he has, and I am sure he will not again be out of order.

Mr. McNEILL. When I was interrupted by that somewhat unseemly noise from the other side of the House, I was about to say, that as this is a matter of the very greatest moment to the country, I think it right to conclude with a motion. If it is necessary I shall do that, but you know, Mr. Speaker, that I have hardly ever done it before. It was only one sentence I wished to utter, and that was—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

Mr. McNEILL. I am going to move—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is entirely in order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has said that he will conclude with a motion, which, of course, will be a motion to adjourn the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That has been moved already.

Mr. SPEAKER. It was not put to the House. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) does that, and confines his remarks to the point he has raised, he will be in order.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to pursue the matter any further, or to take up the time of the House intentionally; but the one remark I was about to make is: that if it has not yet been determined; if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Paterson) has not yet made up his mind, and the Government have not yet made up their minds, whether or not the tariff of Belgium is as favourable to us as schedule "D" is "on the whole" to Belgium—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman is now discussing the tariff.

Mr. McNEILL. I must protest, Mr. Speaker. I ask the hon. Minister (Mr. Davies) to be bound by the decision of the Chair.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will take a point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) cannot anticipate a discussion on a question relating to the tariff which is now before the House. He is plainly and palpably anticipating that discussion by expressing an opinion as to the action of the Government in respect to these resolutions. That is my point of order.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has asked for information, and he has the right to that.

Mr. McNEILL. It was well understood, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may be wrong, but I understand that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is not discussing the resolutions, but as to whether the Government has taken action upon these resolutions or not. I do not think the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) should go into a discussion of these tariff resolutions which are the next order upon the paper.

Mr. McNEILL. What I propose to do is, to make a remark as to the conduct of the Government, and that, I gather from your ruling, Sir, to be quite in order.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I submit, that if my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) is ready to state to the House, that the subject is not connected with the matter now before the House and not connected with the tariff resolutions, of course he would be in order. I am sure, however, that my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) would not be able to state upon his honour to the House, that the comments he is about to make are outside of the tariff resolutions. His remarks clearly have reference to the resolutions.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) wishes to imply by the word "outside," that my remarks have no relation to the resolutions, of course I cannot say so. It is in reference to the resolutions that I am about to make the remark, and it is in reference to the conduct of the Government in relation thereto, which I understand you have ruled I have a right to refer to, that I wish to make the remark. Now, I say, that if the Government have not—as the hon. the Controller of Customs has told us they have not—if the Government have not yet decided whether the tariff of Belgium is as favourable to Canada "on the whole" as schedule "D" of our tariff is to Belgium; and if they have not decided yet whether the tariff of Germany is as favourable "on the whole" to Canada as the offer contained in schedule "D" is to Germany, then, I say, their conduct in placing this resolution upon the paper—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. I am speaking of the conduct of the Government, and the hon. Minister (Mr. Davies) should be controlled by the ruling of the Chair. The Chair has ruled, that I have the right to refer to the conduct of the Government, and it is most unfair of my hon. friend (Mr. Davies)—and I am very sorry to have to say that to him—it is most unfair that he should continually interrupt me in this way. He desires to intervene between the observation I am about to make, and the country, and he is afraid of the observation.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker, I accept your ruling if you have so ruled. If the hon. gentleman is allowed to make a speech now instead of when the tariff debate is resumed, I accept that ruling. The hon. gentleman has no more right in the House than anybody else—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Surely I have the right to say this—and if he is allowed to discuss the tariff resolutions now, other hon. gentlemen can do so.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, you have made your ruling, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will have to obey.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; sit down.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order; Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Neither the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. McNeill) nor the

Mr. LAURIER.

hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) seem to quite apprehend my ruling, and, therefore, I shall be glad to state it again. If the hon. member (Mr. McNeill) is discussing a subject which arises from these resolutions and relates to these resolutions, he would not be in order to do so, now, on a motion to adjourn. If the hon. gentleman confines himself to a subject which has arisen since these resolutions were placed on the Table of this House, and which can be discussed apart from these resolutions, I do not see how I can prevent him doing it.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, I am about to call attention to what I believe is the improper conduct of the Government. It has reference to these resolutions, but it arises from a question which has been answered in this House since the resolutions were placed on the paper. I wish to say again—and I hope I shall be allowed to finish one sentence, just one, without interruption—that the conduct of the Government has been culpable, and very culpable, in so far that they have made a proposal which may have the result of bringing in here, in competition with the products of Canadian industries, the goods of those great productive countries, Belgium and Germany, and that they made that proposal by the admission of the Controller of Customs in crass ignorance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member refers, I am afraid, to the tariff proposals.

Mr. McNEILL. Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. That puts the hon. gentleman out of order.

Mr. McNEILL. I have finished, Mr. Speaker.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman has not concluded with a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. The motion to adjourn is to come.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Then he has spoken under false pretenses.

Mr. FOSTER. Not under false pretenses, because the hon. gentleman said that he would conclude with a motion, but he was called to order before he could do so.

Mr. McNEILL. I was prepared to move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for East York (Mr. Maclean) has the floor.

THE BELGIAN CONSULATE, MONTREAL.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to call the attention of the Government to the following advertisement in the Montreal "Gazette" of yesterday:

The Belgian Consulate in Montreal gives notice to importers of Belgian goods that a protest has been entered to the Imperial Government, in London, against the non-application by the Government of the Dominion of Canada of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1862, which guarantees, without any restriction, the most-favoured clause to Belgium in all the British colonies.

In consequence, importers of Belgium goods will be instructed to pass their customs entries under protest, and to forward a copy of the same to the Belgian General Consulate in Ottawa.

Montreal, April 27, 1897.

I would ask the Government what is their intention in regard to this announcement.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The answer of the Government is what has already been stated, that the Government do not admit that the German and Belgian treaties apply to the resolutions now before the House.

BRITISH GOODS AND CUSTOMS TARIFF.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I want to ask the Controller of Customs or the Finance Minister whether or not it was to be understood that, when an order was given to the customs officials to allow British goods in at one-eighth reduction, that included or excluded the British colonies?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). The decision of the Controller of Customs is that the only country at present entitled to the privilege of the reciprocal tariff is the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. There may be other countries which may become entitled to those privileges upon representations, but the decision of the Customs Department is to apply that tariff at present to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and to no other countries.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I have another question to ask, if my hon. friend will allow me, and that is, whether, up to the present time, any report has been made by the Controller of Customs, in accordance with that clause, to the Governor General in Council, and whether they have acted formally upon that report?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. The judgment of the Government is that the Controller of Customs has ample authority, under the terms of the resolution, to act for himself, subject to any later action which the Governor in Council may be pleased to take, and therefore no report from the Controller of Customs was necessary to immediate action, and I think I am correct in stating that, while the Controller of Customs has discussed the subject, no formal order has been passed up to this moment on the subject.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he has yet brought down those bank note contracts, which he promised so long ago: he has not been half as prompt to fulfil that promise as he was to fulfil the promise he made to the coal men in Montreal.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. Perhaps I found the coal men more reasonable. I had an opportunity to run through the papers for the first time to-day, and I think they will be completed and possibly laid on the Table to-morrow.

Mr. FOSTER. I also want to ask for the returns I moved for very early in the session as to the commissions and the commissioners appointed in reference to partisan offences. We want them very particularly.

Mr. IVES. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I want to ask one question supplementary to those which my hon. friend has asked. I want to ask if British goods are now being admitted at the different customs ports at one-eighth off the ordinary tariff; if so, what proof of British origin is required by collectors; and whether the Controller of Customs or the Minister of Finance will lay on the Table at a very early moment the regulations which have been made for the proof of British origin of the goods admitted under the preferential arrangement?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I presume that the hon. gentleman would like me to lay on the Table the instructions sent to the different customs officials on that point?

Mr. IVES. Yes.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Controller of Customs, in view of the fact that it is not yet determined whether Belgium and Germany have the right, irrespective of any treaty, to send their goods into our market on the strength of this resolution on equal terms with England, where the preference to England comes in.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. May I be permitted to answer? The preference to England operates in this way, that to-day British goods are being admitted at the preferential rates, and the goods of the other countries are not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. Will my hon. friend say that if it is shown that under the clause Belgium and Germany have a right to come in, he will endeavour to prevent their coming in, or that he can prevent their coming in?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. My hon. friend may safely assume that whatever we decide is right shall be done.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not at all refer—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. McNEILL. My hon. friend will, I am sure, allow me to say that I did not at all refer to what my hon. friend might think was right. I wish to ask him whether he thinks he would have any power at all under this resolution to exclude the goods of those countries.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think that any question, even if proper notice has been given on the paper, would be in order which calls for an expression of opinion. The hon. gentleman's question would not at any time be in order.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. DOUGLAS. As a representative from one of the agricultural districts of the great North-west, I desire to address the House on the tariff in its relation to the farming interests of that country. My position perhaps is a little peculiar. In the west, the people were accustomed to call me a Patron Grit; and by and by, when we found that our presentation of policy secured a large support from the Liberal-Conservatives, I was wont to claim the title of Liberal-Conservative and Independent Patron Grit. I thus speak, as you see, for a mixed multitude in the far west, and I wish to draw your attention to the condition of the people there under the old tariff and their prospects under the new. Our people in the North-west have but little sympathy for the principle of protection. We have come by experience to learn this fact, that whatever protection may have done for the cities of the east, it has done very little for the wide prairies of the west, and is not of a nature to be of any benefit to our settlers out there in their particular calling. In making this statement, I am convinced that I have the support of a large number of Liberal-Conservatives in the country. Have we not had ample proof of this statement? The empty pockets of our people, their want of credit, the fact that they are handicapped by monopolies of various kinds—all these things have led them to change their faith and to look for help in some other direction. Under the old system, it was supposed that there should be a home market for the products of the people, but we have found by experience that the home market is a fallacy and a delusion, and to-day we find ourselves out in the wide world competing in a free trade market, so that the duty upon wheat and flour is no protection to the farmer whose market is not at home, but in free trade England. We have then to put to ourselves the question, who are our opponents in this free trade market? In the production of grain and beef and dairy products, who are those with whom we have to compete in this great market? They are the producers of Europe and of Asia and the Argentine Republic and the United States. Under these circumstances, the western farmer is submitted to special difficulties. He has to stand shoulder to shoulder with the cheap labour of the world. I have some knowledge of the production of wheat in the far east, and I know that men can be employed there for sixpence a day, and such is the nature of the climate that they scarcely need a house to sleep in or clothing to protect them. In fact, six yards of cloth at 10 cents a yard would clothe half a dozen of them. In these countries, therefore, the farmer, who is producing grain for the British market, has a decided advantage over the western producer, living as we do in such a climate as we have in the North-west. I could easily show that at the prices in the North-west for clothing, it requires at the very least 120 bushels at 50 cents a bushel to clothe one of our farmers respectably. So that the eastern labourer has an advantage in the matter of clothing as well as in the expense of living. Clothing is more expensive in the North-west than it is even in Ontario, and the people of the east are better clothed than our people in the west.

Again, the odds are against the farmer in the west because of his great distance from the seaboard, which is a difficulty that cannot very well be overcome. The average haul for grain in the Argentine republic, now a strong competitor in the production of wheat, is only 50 miles, while we have a long and expensive haul, so that it really takes one bushel to pay for another in putting it on the market. It is a common thing for the farmers to say, when asked what a certain one is doing—Oh, he is farming on shares with the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Massey-Harris Company. And this is a difficulty that cannot easily be overcome.

Then, if you look at the cost of freight from Asia. Last October wheat was being brought from Bombay and from Guzzerat, according to the Bombay "Gazette," at 60 cents per ton, so that it is impossible, under these circumstances, for us to compete with people who enjoy such advantages in a great open free trade market. After the freight is paid and all the charges, the balance is exceedingly small which is left to the producer in the North-west.

I also wish to say a little about the disadvantages under which we labour in the grain trade. The fact is that the producer in the North-west to-day is very much in the position of a dumb beast of burden. He produces his grain, and he takes it to the market. He knows very well that he must be exceedingly civil and take precisely what is offered him or he may fare worse in consequence. We have combines in the buying, and we have also the mixing of grain, which is a grievous wrong inflicted upon the trade. Buyers generally buy on a lower grade, and if the farmer produces a superior article, say sixty-four or sixty-five pounds to the bushel, he does not receive the commercial value of his superior article; but the buyer finds that after he has given the farmer the highest price, it may be, for No. 1 hard, he has an article that he can manipulate. He can mix inferior grades with this superior article, and if the mixture comes up to the Government standard he has made money by the mixing of the grain, and often it occurs that the grain is bought upon the one grade and sold upon another. This is a source of great anxiety to the farmer of the west. The wheat goes into the elevator at Port Arthur on one grade and it is shipped to Europe on another grade, and we have good reason to believe that England knows very little of No. 1 hard as it is produced by the farmer of the west. This works decidedly to his disadvantage; it destroys the reputation of the grain in the British market, hence reduces the price, and the loss comes back upon the producer. We hold that there is great room for investigation into this whole business, that the farmer may have the just reward of his labour, and the fair advantage of his superior grain. Now, there is another difficulty under which the farmer labours—I refer to the freight rates, which are bushel for bushel—it requires one bushel to place another upon the market. We hope that in due time, with our deep waterways improved, freight rates may be reduced.

Then, again, perhaps the chief difficulty that we have to contend with is the difficulty and expense of getting the machinery that it is necessary to employ. Considering the position, the North-west farmer occupies in relation to his competitors in the British market, we have reason to fear that the high prices of former days have gone by, and that we cannot hope to receive the prices we realized five or six years ago.

What, then, is to be done to relieve the people under these circumstances? The people have met together and discussed the question themselves with empty pockets and no credit, and with difficulties staring them in the face, they have asked what is wrong. Many of them do not understand the situation, but they have asked what is wrong, and have studied the question carefully; and have arrived at the conclusion, which they expressed on the 23rd of June last, that there was need for a change in the whole fiscal policy of the Government. I think, Sir, we are exceeding happy in appearing as the representatives of the people under a new Government whose fiscal policy is largely in accord with the principles that we have been wont to support. What we chiefly want is tariff reform, but not tariff reform on the principles upon which it has sometimes been asked. We are not here to clamour for everything that the farmer needs in the production of his grain to be put upon the free list. No, Sir. We want to say to the Government and to this House that we are willing to bear our share of the public expenses; but we wish simply to see to it that every man shall do the same thing. We believe, then, in tariff reform upon the principle of equity and justice; we have no sympathy with class legislation; we believe in the great principle that it should be the object of a Government to secure the greatest good to the greatest number. This being the case, then, we want to say that the idea of protecting certain industries in the country to the extent to which they have been protected in the past was a wrong inflicted upon the agricultural classes of Canada generally, and upon those of the North-west in particular. Let us, then, come to the point that is specially interesting to the North-west farmer. In the new tariff there are many things to encourage him. We have got rid of the forty and fifty and sixty and eighty per cent duties in the new tariff. This must be a relief to the agricultural classes generally. However, as representing the people and the opinions of the people in the west, we are bound to say that we would have been glad if the Government had been able just to do a little more along the same line. We know very well that it is difficult for any Government to make such a revolution on the fiscal policy as to strike out altogether the protective principle, that this would cause serious injury to many who are engaged in manufacturing interests, and that it might produce panic in many quarters. We are glad, however, that such changes have been made, and we believe that the Government have gone as far as they possibly could go, in view of the general interests of the Dominion. But we hope that they had given the manufacturers such a hint as to show them that they have only a taste of that which is to come in future years. They have, in my opinion at least, only administered a homeopathic dose to the manufacturers of the country. We hope it will stimulate their growth and that the infant industries will advance as soon as possible, so to take care of themselves. I know that some hon. members have said that it is not a wise thing to keep the manufacturers or the business interests of the country in any uncertainty, that the mere fact that uncertainty exists will do an injury to all trade. I do not think, looking at the new tariff, that the Government is likely to keep manufacturers in any uncertainty, or the business of the country in any uncertainty. They have declared that they believe it is not to be a perfect tariff, not to be an ideal tariff, but it is all that they can do under the circumstances in which they find themselves placed to-day; and we hope that by and by they will be able to carry out their pledges and their promises to the people and travel still further in the same line. So we regard the new tariff as a very gentle hint to the manufacturers of the country that the time must come that they will be required to do without the support they have enjoyed for so many years past. Why should such a state of things be perpetuated? Looking at the matter from a western standpoint, we regard the manufacturing interests, especially those of machinery in this light: If our manufacturers cannot, to-day, after eighteen years of special advantage, give us as good and as cheap an article as we can get elsewhere, we feel that we are not justly dealt with when we are called upon to support them any longer.

Now, there are many things in the tariff Bill which we would be disposed to accept as a fair instalment of what the Government is likely to do, and we shall be able to return to our people, I hope, with a good deal of encouragement arising out of what has been done in their favour. Yet there are a few things which we must bring under the notice of the Government, and we are not, I am sorry to say, in a position to adopt without dissent all that has been done. One point to which we take exception is the duty on agricultural implements. If we hold, as we do, that the protection principle has not done the west any great service, then we regret that the new Government, in the new tariff, should do more for the manufacturer than the old Government did, because the duty remains the same as under the old Government on agricultural implements, but they have increased the privileges of the manufacturers. I understand why it is that they have conceded to the wishes of the manufacturers. To-day they find themselves not able to compete with the Americans in the production of machinery of the best grades. They needed some reduction on steel and iron to put them on an equal footing with their American competitors. Now, we would like to go back to our people and be able to say that under the new tariff the oppressor has not been strengthened, that his privileges are not greater than they were formerly, I would be better pleased to be able to say that the duty remains unchanged. But we shall be obliged to state that the manufacturer of agricultural implements has greater privileges under the new tariff than he had under the old, without any consideration being given to the consumer. Well, there is a way out of this difficulty. We have been reminded by the members of the Government that this is not an ideal tariff. If it can be shown that an injustice has been done, they will be ready and willing to repair it; if a change is necessary, they will take it into their serious consideration. We would like to get out of the difficulty in this way. A large business in machinery is being done by the United States in the west, and when the duty is imposed upon the machine, it is not the duty upon the invoice price, or the commercial price of the American machine, but is a duty imposed by the customs-house officer according to his judgment in the case. A machine that can be bought in the United States for $65 or $80 is valued at $100, and the people of the west have to pay a duty on $100 instead of a duty on $65 or $80. Now, I would like to throw out a hint this afternoon, that if the Government will see fit to alter their law in reference to the valuation of those articles, and allow them to come in, not at a reduced price, but upon the price at which they are sold to people in the United States, it would very largely assist the farmers of the North-west in procuring the machinery which they specially desire. I want also to say here that the preference is largely in favour of American machinery. That may have arisen out of the way in which the manufacturers have dealt with the people during the past years, and I mention here especially the Massey-Harris Company. No better campaign literature could be used in the North-west Territories than the will of the late Mr. Massey. It opened the eyes of the people: they felt that while they were struggling with difficulties, paying to that company, in many instances, not only 12 per cent, but sometimes 24 per cent, that while they had been subject to great hardships, and hundreds of our settlers had been turned out of home, many being obliged to leave and go elsewhere, this company had made the money, and oppressed the settlers of the West. This question of machinery, therefore, has caused considerable dissatisfaction; the duty upon smaller implements has been reduced, but this is of more importance perhaps to the farmers of Ontario and of Quebec than it is to us. Scythes, hay knives and such articles are not very largely used. It is true the duty has been thrown off various smaller implements that are a necessity, and hence a ground of encouragement. There is, however, another question that we wish to bring under the attention of the Government in the hope that they may yet, remedy the matter, that is the question of coal oil. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not in the position of one who has a by-election hanging over him, and I am not in the position of one who has clamoured for coal oil to be put on the free list, when speaking to the people. But I feel that something ought to be done in this matter to relieve the people of the North-west generally. This is a question of rates rather than of duty, the duty is a small matter, but the rates upon coal oil are a very serious matter. Now, I will read in your hearing the rates as given by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the figures that are here given can be fully substantiated. Freight rates per gallon from Petrolea, Ontario, to the following places in the North-west: To Winnipeg, 7·24 cents; to Portage la Prairie, 8·23 cents; Brandon, 8·88; Moosomin, 9·43; Broadview, 10·25; Regina, 10·99; Moose Jaw, 11·28; as near as we can make it; these are the figures of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Medicine Hat, 13·03 ; Calgary, 13·86 ; Revelstoke, 16·54 ; Lethbridge, 15·39 ; Manitou, 8·51 ; Killarney, 9·06 ; Deloraine, 9·43 ; Carnduff, 9·51 ; Prince Albert, 14·13 ; Edmonton, 16·64 ; Rapid City, 9·06 ; and so on. I need not occupy the time of the House by reading further, but you will see this is a very serious matter. At present, coal oil may be sent in tanks by rail to Winnipeg ; there it is put in barrels and distributed over the west. This also adds to the expense of coal oil in that country. The cost of barrelling the oil, warehousing and re-shipment will be about 5½ cents. Now, I wish to elaborate this a little further and show what the result is when looked at in another light. The rate on coal oil from Petrolea to Lethbridge, for example, per hundred pounds is $1.66½ ; according to their own rates it is 15·39 cents per gallon, making the freight rate per ton $33.30. At this rate the freight per carload of twenty tons would be $666. The distance from Petrolea to Winnipeg is about 1,500 miles, and from Winnipeg to Lethbridge 777 miles. Now, it is generally acknowledged by railway companies the world over that half a cent per ton per mile is good pay. Proceeding upon this principle, half a cent per ton per mile for 2,277 miles would be $11.38, or per car of twenty tons, $227.60. The rate charged, you observe, is $666 instead of $227.60, or $438.40 in excess of the generally admitted paying rate. The railroad rate of 15·39 cents per gallon is three times what it should be, three times a paying rate, and should not be more than 5½ cents per gallon on the cargo.

Here, then, you see the freight rate is a very great difficulty. This is not a matter perhaps that the Government can rectify, but they can allow the coal oil transported by railway companies to be examined and permitted to pass on to points in the west, where it can be handled and distributed, thus saving the expense of barrelling the oil which will be 5 cents more, and in this way the difficulty could be to some considerable extent overcome. My contention was when I came to this House this session that we should have at least a 3 cent cut on coal oil. We were met here with this difficulty, that this would seriously affect the business in western Ontario. Well, Sir, I am not so selfish, and I hope the people of the west are not so selfish that they would desire to injuriously affect parties interested in this business. But here is a way out of the difficulty, one which would relieve our people and promote the interests of gentlemen engaged in the business in western Canada, and I hope it will receive the careful consideration of the Government before the House closes, inasmuch as a 5 cent per gallon advantage might be realized by the people.

We would like to see some change made in the new tariff—(1) in regard to agricultural implements, (2) in regard to coal oil, (3) in regard to fruit.

It is well known that the North-west is not a fruit-growing country. The Territories can produce the best of wheat and of beef, and the people are prepared to purchase their fruit. But a serious difficulty is met with in the new tariff, especially as regards grapes and strawberries. There is a duty of 2 cents per pound upon both these articles, which simply means 200 per cent. In California grapes can be bought for $20 per ton. The duty on those grapes is $40 per ton, the duty on packages being extra. Last year it was possible to buy Concord grapes in Michigan at $7.50 per ton, with the same duty of $40 per ton, or nearly 500 per cent. We see no reason why the people in the west should be debarred by the tariff from purchasing fruit, and it is desired that lower rates should be granted than those in the new tariff. We are simply throwing out hints and stating reasons why in the interest of the people of the North-west changes should be made, and I hope the hints thrown out will be taken into serious consideration by the Government and that they will give us some relief along those lines.

I believe this Government has at heart the well-being of the agricultural classes. They have given evidence of this in regard to the dairying question and cold storage, and those interests will be largely strengthened by the attention already given them, and our people, having in view what has been done already along those lines, are taking new heart. I am glad also to observe from letters I have received from the North-west that the new tariff is already taking pretty well there. I have pointed out these difficulties, which I personally feel, and I consider it is incumbent on me to speak of them in the interests of the western country. So we accept this tariff as an instalment of what the Government will do. I know it is impossible to remove this principle of protection which is obnoxious to the people of the west—it cannot be done in a year or two. You cannot take the smell out of a fish barrel by one scouring, it needs to be repeated, and so I hope that as regards the tariff, after it has passed under the revision of the Government, the people of the west will find they have supported a Government that is looking forward to the adoption of free trade principles.

I desire to say a word about our relationship to the motherland. As farmers we send many of our surplus products to the mother country, and she receives them gladly ; at the same time we are pleased to have access to her markets, and we feel it a hardship that we cannot be allowed to purchase in an unrestricted market. If she takes our surplus products, it is only just and fair that we should take her manufactured goods, if they are better and cheaper than we can produce at home. I rejoice in the step taken towards lowering the duties between Canada and the mother country, and I rejoice at the adroitness with which the present Government have tackled that question in view of all the difficulties that surround it. I think we may hope for great things that shall result to the country's good. I can fully understand why hon. gentlemen opposite have a great deal to say on this question, because virtually this was a tid-bit with them in former years, and the Government of the day has literally scooped the whole thing out and left them nothing to talk about along that line. We desire, then, to leave these matters with the Government and hope that the measures which have been taken will do much to strengthen the hands of the producers in the North-west and to give us new encouragement and new strength to cope with difficulties of climate and general living.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House has listened with much interest to the hon. gentlemen who have spoken as representing the Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia. I think it must strike every one as strange that those gentlemen's campaign speeches should have consisted largely of a general cry that the people of the North-west were being ground down by an exorbitant tariff which was unbearable. But the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has told the House that members of the Opposition must feel pretty uncomfortable because they have been scooped out and nothing has been left them on that line. If we have been scooped out, it must be because the tariff, according to that hon. gentleman, is substantially the same protectionist tariff which was in force under the Conservative Government. While I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in that regard, I think the general proposition and statement made here that nine-tenths of the tariff is the old tariff is true, and it indicates that hon. gentlemen opposite have been afraid to adopt that policy which, when in Opposition, they declared they would adopt. They do recognize one fact, that it was not the policy of the Liberals when in Opposition that returned them to power, but that it was the mistakes of the Government of that day, who adopted a policy in respect to separate schools in Manitoba which did not meet with the approval of the Conservative party, nor of the people of Canada. I must say in addition—and I do not wish to say it in any hurtful sense—that the late Prime Minister had surrounded himself by Ministers, some of whom did not receive the full confidence and support of the Conservative party. For these reasons, and not because the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite commended itself to the country, the Conservative party went into Opposition and the Liberal party were placed in power.

Mr. DOUGLAS.

Now, the first thing that has struck me in connection with this tariff proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite, is its omissions. They have told us nothing about their policy on the export duty on logs and pulp wood, a question that is agitating the people of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec, and a question upon which the future prosperity of a large portion of these provinces depend. For my part, I have no hesitation in saying, that in face of the conditions at present existing, the true policy for this Government to adopt is to impose an export duty upon saw logs and upon pulp wood. I believe that such a policy would restore a large measure of prosperity to portions of Canada that are not prosperous to-day; portions of Canada that have been deprived of the wealth nature has given them. I believe that the Government would be consulting the best interests of the entire Dominion by adopting such a policy. Then, Sir, we were told that the Government might have another policy, some time in the future, about coal; and they foreshadowed that they are going to put a duty upon anthracite coal, an article from which the late Government removed the duty. Sir, this Government have not been able to give us any evidence that would justify the re-imposition of that duty upon anthracite coal.

We heard a great deal on the stump from hon. gentlemen opposite, and we heard a great deal from the Prime Minister, as to what the Liberals were going to do when they got into power. The Prime Minister told the people: We will enlarge the free list and give the manufacturers free raw material. Sir, have they done so? Can they point to a single instance in which they have given free material to the manufacturer, to enable him to produce more cheaply? No, Sir, they cannot. They have discovered since they came into power that the Conservative Government had already done that for the manufacturers of Canada. A protective policy looks after two important features, first, to make the raw materials of the manufacturers free of duty where these raw materials are not manufactured in this country, and second, that the necessaries of life for the people should also be free of duty, when these necessaries are not produced within the Dominion. The late Government adhered to these two ideas closely, as a necessary portion of their policy of protection; and, Sir, the new Government, in spite of all their pledges about raw material have commenced their career by putting a duty of 92½ per cent upon uncleaned rice, which is the raw material of the rice manufacturers of Canada. That, this Government has done without any justification whatever. I find that there were over 13,000,000 pounds of uncleaned rice imported last year at a cost of $108,000, or 81 cents per hundred pounds, and this Government in their wisdom have put a duty of 75 cents per hundred pounds on an article that cost $1 cents per hundred pounds.

I would like to hear the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson) or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) justify such an extraordinary imposition of duty upon an article which is the food of the people. The result of it will be without doubt, that not only will the rice not be cheaper, but that it will be dearer, because under this tariff it cannot be cleaned in this country and will have to be imported. Most of the rice importations consumed in British Columbia comes direct from China, but for the greater portion of the eastern provinces the rice is cleaned or manufactured in Canada, and they sell it cheaper than it can be imported, or else they would not be able to sell it at all. Henceforth the rice will have to be imported, and the result is, that the people will not have that superior article which is produced in our Canadian factories to-day. We never had a satisfactory article of rice produced in this country until we adopted the plan of cleaning the rice ourselves. Another disadvantage of this increased tariff on the raw material of rice, is, that British ships will not in the future be employed in carrying the uncleaned rice to Canada.

Now, Sir, this Government have adopted a policy of giving free corn in this country. In my opinion that is a disastrous move. In 1878 when corn was free of duty, there were about 7,300,000 bushels imported from the United States; while last year, there were only 2,750,000 bushels imported, and I am told that most of that corn was either used by the distillers or by the starch and glucose factories, and that while a little was imported for human food, a very small quantity was imported for cattle feeding. What will be the result under this new tariff? The result will be, that instead of having 7,300,000 bushels imported as we had in 1878, the importations will very largely exceed that amount, and will correspondingly displace the production of coarse grains by the Canadian farmers. To-day we are exporting large quantities of these coarse grains. Last year we exported nearly a million bushels of barley, nearly a million bushels of oats, and the product of another million bushels of oats in the shape of oatmeal. We also exported 1,500,000 bushels of pease, 139,000 cwt. of bran, 400,000 bushels of buckwheat, and 214,600 tons of hay. The prices of all these products will be lowered to the Canadian farmer by the free importation of Indian corn. The total value of these articles of which we produced a surplus for export was over $4,500,000. Yet I venture to say that next year the Canadian market for these products will be lost to the Canadian farmer, and will be supplied by the American farmer in the shape of free corn. So that I do not apprehend anything but loss to the Canadian farmer from the free admission of corn. The proposition made by the late Government was, I think, the fairest one this country could adopt; that was, that we would permit the free importation of corn into Canada if in return the Americans would give us the free importation of barley into their country. But the Government of the United States declined that proposition, and to-day we find the Government of Canada giving them this advantage without obtaining any reciprocal advantage in return.

Now, Sir, we have heard a good deal in the last two days about preferential trade with Great Britain. For myself, I may say that I would be most strongly in favour of any proposal of that nature that would be satisfactory to both countries. But as the discussion proceeds, and as questions are asked across the floor of the House, the question becomes still more confused, and the course the Government has taken becomes more unsatisfactory. I was much pleased myself to hear a general proposal to give preferential treatment to Great Britain; but that proposal should have been carefully considered, and should have been one that could have been strongly justified, and one that would not leave the business with loose ends, as the proposal of the Government undoubtedly does. If, in giving preferential trade to Great Britain we are also giving preferential trade to Belgium and Germany, as appears somewhat probable, we Canadians will be committing a very great mistake in giving trade advantages to both Belgium and Germany without getting any corresponding advantages from them in return. And, from what we heard from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), we have some reason to believe that such a proposal would delight him and delight the members of the Government; and if that preferential trade could be extended to the United States as well, that would please them still more. While I would give preferential trade to Great Britain, I would not give it to any other country unless we got substantial and equivalent advantages in return. We have been told that the Government are not very certain what the outcome may be. I think they should have ascertained exactly the position in which this preferential arrangement with Great Britain would place Canada. We heard an hon. member to-day read an advertisement which has been inserted in the press by the Consul General of Belgium to Canada, in which he announces that he is going to enter a protest at once, and demand from the British Government that the same advantages be given to Belgian goods coming into Canada as are given to British goods. So that we shall be at once confronted with that question; and if it is decided that Belgium is to receive the same privilege as Great Britain, it follows, I am told, that Germany will get it as well; and then the people of this country will find that by the legislation now before us we are giving preferential trade to Belgium and Germany without receiving any corresponding advantage whatever in return.

But, Sir, when you examine more closely what these proposed preferential arrangements with Great Britain are, I think you will find that they are not so great as has been supposed. I imagine that the British Government and the British people are being imposed upon these few days, because, while they have been told that we are going to decrease the duty on British goods one-eighth this year and another eighth next year, they have not been told that before we reduce those duties, we did what they say is done in those "fake" stores. These stores, in advertising bargains, first raise the price, say from 16 cents to 25 cents, and then advertise them as bargains at 20 cents. That is pretty much what this Government has done? In the case of linen goods, what have they done? On the greater portion of the linen imports they have put on an additional duty of 25 per cent, and they then announce that they are going to reduce the duties on these goods from Great Britain 12½ per cent. Last year, of linens, brown or bleached, we imported $71,000 worth; of linen duck, canvas, huckaback or other manufactures of flax, $492,000 worth; of linen thread, $119,000 worth; and of other manufactures of flax, hemp or jute, or these combined, $180,000 worth; making a total importation of these goods of $863,000 worth. But on all these goods the Government, before decreasing the duty 12½ per cent to Great Britain, added 25 per cent to the old duty. Of another large class of linen goods, damask of linen, including napkins, tray cloths, stair linen and diaper, we imported $270,000 worth; of linen handkerchiefs, $110,000 worth; and of towels, $122,000 worth; making a total importation of these articles of $1,366,000 worth. On all these goods the Government have increased the duty from 16⅔ to 25 per cent, mostly 25, before reducing it 12½ per cent to Great Britain. They may say: If we have increased the duty on these articles, why do you protectionists complain? I complain because of all these goods there is not a dollar's worth made in Canada to-day, and there will not be for the next seven years. Great Britain has the complete control of that trade, so far as Canada is concerned. The duty on these goods was placed at 20 per cent by the late Government, because, as they are not made in Canada, the duty affords no protection to Canadian manufacturers, and therefore the articles should be brought in at the lowest possible rate.

They talk about giving this preference to Great Britain. Why, Great Britain has the preference in these articles to-day. Our importations of linen goods amount to about $1,366,000. How much do you think of these goods come from Great Britain? $1-

Mr. WALLACE.

292,000, or a little over 95 per cent, showing that the preferential trade given to Great Britain can not help her at all, since she has the whole trade practically to-day. Now, with reference to cottons, the same remark applies. Of cottons, printed, divers colours, we imported last year to the extent of about $2,560,000. Of this amount we imported, in round numbers, to the extent of two million dollars from Great Britain, so that all other countries supply less than 20 per cent of our importations of these goods. We cannot therefore expect, by giving preferential trade to Great Britain, to increase her trade in that commodity, because there will be always special lines of which the American manufacturers and others have the control and which we will continue to import from them. What more has been done in this matter of preferential trade? Before these hon. gentlemen took off the 12½ per cent, they took the precaution to add 16⅔ per cent to the duty on these articles. I venture to say that had they said to Great Britain: We have given you a preference over all other countries, but before we took off the 12½ per cent we added 17, the case would have presented a different aspect. With regard to other cotton goods, we imported $4,230,000. Of this, $3,130,000 worth came from Great Britain, or more than 75 per cent, and, as I have said, there will be special lines in the manufacture of which some countries are sure to excel and of which Great Britain, even with preferential trade cannot expect to send us a larger proportion in the future than she has done in the past. Then we come to the question of woollen goods, on which these hon. gentlemen have changed the duties from specific to ad valorem. And, Mr. Speaker, one after another, these gentlemen on the other side who got up to sing the praises of the new tariff made it one of their strongest points that they had abolished these specific duties very largely, and, as the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) said yesterday, they will not rest until the last vestige of these specific duties is abolished. You would think that specific duties were something indefensible, something very improper, and yet I may say that in every case where they abolished it, these hon. gentlemen have destroyed a Canadian industry. Such, no doubt, was their object in abolishing specific duties. But to-day, what have they on their tariff? Why, the most of the duties they collect in Canada to-day, under their new tariff, are specific duties. I have here a long list of the articles on which specific duties are charged. Most of the products of the Canadian farmer are protected by a specific duty. If these duties were wrong, why did not hon. gentlemen opposite change them? They dared not do it. I have a list of five articles on which were paid $11,750,000 duty, and the duties on which in every case are specific or specific and ad valorem combined. We get from the customs on spirits and wines $2,140,000 specific duties, or, what the hon. gentlemen opposite say is worse still, specific and ad valorem combined. On tobacco imported we collected $267,000; on sugar, $1,250,000, all specific duties or specific and ad valorem combined. From excise I think we get $7,950,000, making on these five items $11,630,000 collected of these objectionable duties of which hon. gentlemen opposite complain. Not only that, but I have a long list here, which I shall not trouble the House with reading, of goods that are to-day, under the new tariff, subject to specific duties only or specific and ad valorem combined.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce a few days ago, in speaking of specific duties, said that under them the people could not tell what they were paying. Why, the only way in which you can tell what you pay is by charging specific duties. You charge 35 per cent on British goods, do you know the cost of these goods in England? Not at all, you have no means of knowing it. The only way, therefore, in which you can tell exactly what you are paying is by paying specific duties. If you abolish specific duties, then you will not know what you are paying. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce again said:

Let me say, speaking from experience, that it is a far harder thing to inflict a heavy protectionist tariff under ad valorem than under specific duties, and therefore it is a matter of some practical importance that we have succeeded in purging the present tariff to a large extent from specific duties, which had the pernicious effect to which I have alluded.

Nothing of the kind. In every case in which specific duties were abolished, as in the case of these woollen goods, they will have the effect of destroying a Canadian industry. What are the facts with reference to woollen goods? We imported last year $2,674,000 worth of woollen goods under the old tariff which imposed a specific duty of 5 cents a pound and an ad valorem duty of 25 per cent, and the duty collected amounted to $873,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite said that was too high a duty. It means 50, or 60 or 70 per cent on the goods. But what does it mean? It means exactly 32½ per cent, and the duty these hon. gentlemen have put on is 35 per cent. Then they say to us: Well, if we have increased the duty, why do you protectionists complain? I shall tell you why. Because all these goods worth over 60 cents a yard will pay an increased duty. On these, under the old tariff, the duty was 18 1-8, and under the new tariff it will be 21. That is, you are giving more protection to the finer classes of goods. To the coat of the rich man, you are giving nearly 3 per cent more protection than you did before.

Then you are giving protection to the finer class of goods, to the goods of the rich man nearly 3 cents more than was given before. On goods at 50 cents a yard, there will be 15½ cents protection, or nearly 2 cents more than under the old tariff, which gave a protection of 18 5-8 cents. But what about the class of goods bought by the poorer man, goods that are produced from Canadian wools? The result of this tariff is that our goods that are sold under 40 cents a yard, and weigh twelve ounces to the yard, the protection is less than before. On goods at 40 cents a yard the protection is about the same. Goods at 20 cents are given 25 per cent less protection than before. And what is the result? The result is that the manufacturer who imports all his raw material, the fine cape wools and merino wools, has a larger protection than before, while the manufacturer who uses wools produced by the Canadian farmers has a lower protection than before, and, as a result, we are told, will be wiped out of existence. We had already reduced the duty to such a point that we had gone a little too far. In my opinion, as regards these lower classes of Canadian cloths, tweeds, blankets and flannels. We touched the lowest point to which reduction could go, without wiping out the manufacturers. This reduction means the death of this industry. But hon. gentlemen opposite tell us: We will give the poor man cheaper goods. Not a bit of it. You may give him lower-priced shoddy goods from England in place of our own goods made from the pure Canadian wool. To prove what I say, I have a telegram here which says:

Cobourg woollen mills shut down early in the year and offered for sale yesterday.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They failed under the old tariff.

Mr. WALLACE. I said that we had got the duty down to the lowest point at which the manufacturer could live. This proves that we did cut the duty down to such a point that it could not be further reduced without injury. The Government make a further reduction on these goods, and the result is that these mills were offered for sale yesterday and no bidders.

Now, with reference to the trade with Great Britain. I said that last year we imported of these woollen goods, $2,674,000 worth, the duty upon which was $873,000, or an average of 32 per cent. It is now made 35 per cent. But what I wish particularly to call the attention of the House to is, that of this $2,674,000 worth imported, $2,583,000 worth were imported from Great Britain—that is to say, 96 per cent of those woollens imported are produced in Britain. How much more can you expect to import from Great Britain under any preferential tariff? She may send in a larger proportion of our imports, but I do not believe she will. The effect of that tariff combined with the preferential arrangement will be to import a much larger proportion of our whole consumption. And what does that mean? It means that for every hundred men employed in England to make these goods, a hundred Canadians will be walking the streets without employment. That will be the effect in my opinion, of the change from a combined specific and ad valorem duty to an ad valorem duty with a reduction of 12½ per cent on that class of goods. The manufacturer of the finer class of goods who imports the raw materials, will be benefited by this tariff, but the manufacturer of the Canadian wools or Canadian shoddy, if you like, will be wiped out of existence and the Canadian farmer and the Canadian artisan will both be injured. I think it just to call the attention of the House to another error, as I think it, made by the Government with respect to the duty on cheap yarns. They have reduced the duty to 15 per cent, while the manufacturer who uses this raw material is given 35 per cent. Now, there is a great fallacy in this regard. It is said: Here is a manufacturer who pays 20 per cent on his raw material, while there is a duty of 20 per cent on his manufactured article, and so he has no protection. But that does not follow: he may get a very substantial protection, because the material upon which he pays the duty may be only one-quarter of the value of his finished product. If his raw material costs $100, and he pays a duty of 20 per cent, the amount he is charged for duty is $20: but if he sells the manufactured product for $400 and has a protection of 20 per cent, he has a gross protection of $80, or a net protection of $60, after paying the duty on his raw material. The carpet manufacturers of this country, as I am informed—in fact, I know—do not make the yarn themselves, but buy it from men whose only business it is to make it. We have a large number of yarn manufacturers in this country who supply not only the carpet manufacturers but the woollen manufacturers and the manufacturers of other products, who all now get protection to the amount of 35 per cent. With a reduction of duty on these yarns to 15 per cent these yarn manufacturers will be wiped out of existence. I do not see any reason why yarns of this cheap quality should not get as much protection—and we gave, and I think properly, a little more—as is given to the manufacturers of the finer yarns. If it is said that the finer yarns require more labour, I answer that the price is higher in proportion, and to be consistent you will have to give at least as large a percentage of protection on the low-priced goods as on the high-priced.

Now, there are other things, the duties upon which have been raised. For instance, the Government has increased duty on linen goods 25 per cent. Linen goods are not made in this country to the amount of a single dollar. The duty on guns, muskets, rifles, pistols, revolvers and firearms in general are increased 50 per cent—from 20 per cent to 30 per cent. I think I am right in saying—I speak subject to correction—that there is not a single factory of these articles in this country. What is the reason for this increase of duty? None that I know of. I would like the Ministers to state why they have increased the articles 50 per cent, when none are made in Canada, and probably will not be made in Canada. Then there are musical instruments not elsewhere specified which are imported to the amount of nearly $100,000. The duty has been increased 20 per cent. I do not know why. We had a little higher duty on those instruments that were produced in this country, on organs and pianos, and by that means we had built up an enormous industry and gave employment to hundreds, yes, to thousands of skilled artisans; but we kept those instruments that were not made in this country, down to the lower rate of duty, 25 per cent. Now, without reason, not for the purpose of promoting any industry, the rate has been raised to 30 per cent. I do not believe that it will be for the benefit of the people of Canada, nor a benefit to Great Britain, because of the $96,000 worth imported, less than $5,000 are imported from Great Britain, $34,000 from the United States, and $50,000 from Germany. I believe Germany will have the advantage of this manufacture, because they have devoted themselves more to that kind of industry than they have done in Great Britain. So I say that the Government has made a mistake with reference to those articles. I am reminded at this moment, Mr. Speaker, of the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), how he raised his voice last year, and every year in fact, about the diamond duty. Why, he said, the unset diamonds of the rich man are brought in free of duty, while the necessities of the poor man are taxed from 25 to 35 per cent. Now, he says he approves cordially of the present tariff, but diamonds are free just as they were before, and I suppose that the hon. member for North Wellington is quite satisfied, because he is going to invest in diamonds.

Mr. MILLS. Is there any duty on ice?

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Put some on your head.

Mr. WALLACE. Now, Sir, the Government have thought fit to increase the duties upon liquors and cigars, and they say, perhaps many people say, that these are proper articles upon which to raise a revenue; there is not much sympathy for the consumers of these articles. A portion of the people, at any rate, are very glad to impose a tariff upon these articles. Well, Sir, while these gentlemen were revising the tariff, I think I could have pointed out a way in which they would have very much improved their finances. It may be said, and can be said, that when I was upon the other side of the House I did not advocate this; but even so, a general revision is taking place now, and those genlemen are reforming everything. Now, Sir, they might have gone in the direction I will point out. The customs duty, according to the new tariff, is $2.40 per gallon on proof whisky; the excise duty is $1.90 per proof gallon, leaving a difference between the customs and excise duties, of 50 cents per gallon. Now, what is the cost price of this article? I do not know whether the hon. gentlemen have looked into the matter, but the cost is not excessively large. A bushel of corn will make a fraction over three gallons of proof whisky—that is the estimate of the Department of Inland Revenue. The bushel of corn costs in Toronto now about 25½ cents, the duty additional is 7½ cents. But it was contended by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), and I think very properly, that the Government will not be able to collect that duty from the distiller. Suppose the distillers undertook to buy Canadian corn, which they can do to-day, and no duty can be imposed upon it; would the distillers have to pay duty then? I would ask the Controller of Customs if they would have to pay duty. I am sure they would not. Then they can buy Canadian corn, or they can buy American corn either, and what is to prevent the farmer from buying a carload of corn, and teaming it in on his wagon, and bringing it to Gooderham & Worts's distillery, or Seagram's distillery, or any other distillery in Canada—what is to prevent them from doing that and selling his American corn there, without paying duty, and nobody paying duty? Can the inspector tell Canadian corn grown on one side the St. Clair River, from American corn grown on the other side? They cannot do it. Therefore, I say that the proposed imposition of 7½ cents per bushel on the Canadian distiller will be ineffective, you will not be able to collect it. Now, even if you add the 7½ cents to the 25½ cents, the cost of the corn, and you have 33 cents for a bushel of corn that makes three gallons of whisky, that is, at the rate of 11 cents per gallon of proof whisky that has to be kept several years. There is the cost of manufacture, which I think the value of the offal will about meet; but at any rate, allowing a liberal margin for the cost of manufacture, keeping it two years, interest and insurance—the whole put together would not bring this whisky up to a cost price of 15 cents a gallon. Then you are going to have the protection. A protection is the difference between the excise and the customs, which is 50 cents a gallon to-day, and you are giving on an article that cost 15 cents, a protection over the importer of 50 cents a gallon, or 333 per cent.

Mr. McMULLEN. You gave them 55 cents.

Mr. WALLACE. I said that. I said of course we might be open to that imputation. The hon. gentleman is not stating anything new.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is new. You want the House to think it is higher now than it was before.

Mr. WALLACE. I did not say anything of the kind. I said that the charge might be made that when I was on that side of the House, I did not call attention to this fact. I am calling attention to it now, at any rate, I am putting it on record; and the only question is, not whether I have been derelict in my duty, but whether the Government, when the facts are brought to their attention, are going to adopt any measure in order to raise more revenue. I think in that way they could have protected the revenue better, because, in my opinion, they have exceeded the limit of making the duty on whisky, revenue producing. The excise duty in the United States is $1.10 per wine gallon, which makes the duty $1.32 per Imperial gallon. Now, if they pay excise duty in the United States, they still have $1.08 protection on every gallon as an inducement to smuggle it into Canada. If they bring in a 40 gallon barrel, they will have $40 clear after paying a cost of 8 cents a gallon to bring it in under ground. So I say I think the Government have gone beyond the limit; we had reached the limit ourselves in making the duty $2.25, and the Government have gone beyond the limit of the revenue producing powers of this customs duty. Now, with reference to tobacco. The excise duty was 25 cents a pound, they have added 14 cents per pound, making it 39 cents per pound. Without doubt they have made a great mistake. Why, Sir, what is the history? If they look back at the returns of 1884, they will find that when the duty on tobacco was 12 cents a pound, there were eleven millions pounds of tobacco imported for manufacture here. In 1886, the Government in the meantime having increased the duty to 20 cents per pound, the quantity fell to 8,500,000 pounds, or 2,500,000 pounds less were imported. Do hon. gentlemen opposite mean to say there were 2,500,000 pounds less consumed? Not at all. The increased duty could not make very much difference, a difference perhaps to the extent of half a million pounds; so 2,000,000 pounds are to be accounted for, and the only way to account for them is by stating that they were smuggled into this country.

I desire to say a few words with respect to the present duty. The excise duty, as the Finance Minister explained, is 39 cents per pound. The Americans pay an excise duty of 6 cents per pound, and accordingly on tobacco smuggled across to Canada the smuggler makes the difference between these two amounts, or a profit of 33 cents per pound. On a 20 pound caddy he accordingly makes a profit of $6.60. The Government here made a great mistake in increasing the duty, and at the end of the year they will not show that more revenue has been collected, but the results will exhibit even a falling off of revenue. The Controller of Customs knows very well the difficulties that occur in preventing smuggling along the frontier; but when there is a temptation to the extent of $6.60 for every caddy of tobacco brought in under the arm, smuggling operations will not be confined to the frontier, but will be scattered all over the country, and the revenue instead of being increased will be largely decreased by the imposition of this increased duty. That is the opinion I have formed on this subject.

Another objection I submit in regard to the duty is this. In 1876 eight and a half million pounds of tobacco were imported into Canada, most of the product being manufactured here; and in 1896, twenty years afterwards, with a large increase of population and enhanced consumption, the quantity was only 10,000,000 pounds. This shows conclusively that the duty of 25 cents we imposed curtailed the production of the manufacturers. When we add 56 per cent, as hon. gentlemen opposite have done, there must be only one result, that tobacco will be smuggled into the country, and the Minister of Inland Revenue, instead of having, as the Finance Minister stated, $1,000,000 more revenue from that source, will find the revenue very largely decreased.

The effect of the increased duty on cigars will be that all 5 cent cigars will be made in Quebec by cheaper labour. The 5 cent cheap cigar, the one which is ordinarily consumed, must be made by cheaper labour than that employed to-day. The vendors will have to make their profits and the cigar makers must turn them out so as to be able to sell them at 5 cents each at retail. As cheaper labour will be required, this will involve the transference of the manufacture of 5 cent cigars to the province of Quebec, where labour is cheaper than in the province of Ontario and in the western portions of the Dominion. I am quite satisfied that the effect will be, first, the transference of the manufacture of this class of goods from the other provinces to Quebec; and second, the employment of cheaper labour than the manufacturers employ to-day.

Some hon. members, and especially an hon. gentleman who addressed the House last night, have expressed gratification because the Government inserted a "combines" clause in the tariff. I think the country will be very grateful to the Government if they will strike it out, for it will be found to work injuriously. I should like to ask hon. gentlemen opposite, how they are going to put that clause into operation. I was chairman of a committee that investigated the subject of combines in trade, in 1888. That committee made a report to this House. The committee was composed of members of both sides of the House, of members many of whom were engaged in trade, and some of whom were in favour of such combinations to a moderate extent. The report of the committee was unanimously adopted, when it had been prepared after long investigation. One of the clauses of that report show that "the Canadian Iron Founders' Association now numbers eighteen firms; outside of the association, however, there are about forty manufacturers of the same goods, some of whom are large manufacturers but the majority are small firms." The proposal submitted by the Finance Minister gives arbitrary power to the Government, without collecting evidence, to say "whenever it shall appear to the satisfaction of the Governor General in Council" certain action shall be taken in regard to the firms forming a combine. In the case now under consideration those manufacturers number eighteen. But what about the forty manufacturers who were not in the combine? A gross injustice and wrong would be done by the Government if it were to say that they would wipe out those forty Canadian firms who had nothing whatever to do with the combine. The Government may conclude that those special manufacturers in the combination have acted wrongly, or they wish to bring pressure to bear on them, especially at by-elections or general elections. The Government is given that extraordinary power, which no other body but Parliament should possess. It is an outrage not only upon the manufacturers, but upon the whole Dominion.

An important fact ascertained by the committee to which I have referred, and on which the hon. member for North Westworth (Mr. Bain) and the hon. member for West Northumberland (Mr. Guillet) were active members, was that the most objectionable combines in this country, those which did most injury, were not combines of manufacturers at all. There was the Wholesale Grocers' Guild. We examined and investigated their proceedings, and we found that to be a most objectionable combine. In their case, what could the Government do? They might say they would take off the duties. The duties off—what? The Wholesale Grocers' Guild would, no doubt, be delighted to have the duties removed on certain articles; but those who have built up special industries would not be as well pleased. The committee showed that there was a combination among fire insurance companies. How can we apply this clause to them? It cannot be applied any more to them than to the Wholesale Grocers' Guild. Then we made a most exhaustive examination of other industries, and we found that the dealers in coal had a combine. But there is no duty on anthracite coal, which was the principal article in question. The only action the Government could do would be to impose a duty on coal; but they could not do so without the assent of Parliament. Then the committee found that dealers in eggs had a combine. Of course they were not the manufacturers, but the dealers. Then the undertakers had a combine. They did not manufacture the coffins, but they bought them from the dealers, and there was a combine to prevent manufacturers selling them to other people. How is the Government going to deal with such cases? This clause of the tariff will be inoperative, and it cannot be applied to any of these combines. You cannot punish them by this Act; but the Government would be able to put screws on the manufacturers at a critical period. They could threaten them; they could say: We have heard, and there is no investigation, and no evidence taken. Can these hon. gentlemen opposite give any reason why the illegal acts of combines should not be taken before the courts? If the law to-day is not strong enough and long enough to reach them, then make the law strong enough and leave it for the courts of the land to decide. That is the only proper course to adopt in regard to that matter. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Government should reconsider this clause referring to combines, and that they should withdraw it, because they cannot point to one good result that will come from it.

I wish now to refer to another matter in connection with preferential trade. According to the resolution introduced, the countries that are to have preferential trade with Canada are to be selected by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council; and we were told this afternoon, that the Controller of Customs has full power to do all this himself. Sir, I do not think such power should be placed in the hands of any man. The power of making treaties, which is not so great a power as you propose to confer upon the Controller of Customs, has been most jealously guarded by all parliaments, and here in Canada the Government is not given power to make a treaty. It must come to this House, and be discussed, and be ratified, before it becomes the law of the land. Then, why does this Government seek for this great power to be conferred upon one member of the Government. I am free to admit, that if it is to be conferred upon any one member, the Controller of Customs is the proper officer on whom to confer it; but I hold that it is a great mistake to confer that power upon a single member of the Government, or even to confer it upon the whole Government. We in Canada want to decide that question upon the floor of Parliament, and we as representatives of the people have a right to be heard upon that matter. On every question that comes up with reference to preferential trade, the people's representatives on the floor of Parliament have an indefeasible right to be heard. Therefore, I say, that the proposal is entirely wrong in principle and should not be adopted by this House. Mr. Speaker, there are some other matters that I might refer to, but it is just about 6 o'clock, and I thank the House for having listened to me so patiently.

In conclusion I wish to say, that taking the tariff as a whole, I believe it to be injurious to the people of Canada. I refer to those items in which the Government have made changes. Where they have left the tariff as it was, of course we on this side of the House, as well as gentlemen on the other side, must admit that it is pretty good. I contend that in every single instance where changes have been made these changes are indefensible, and that they will wipe out the industries of this country which are affected by them, and which industries have been built up under the tariff of the Conservative Government. We can recognize in the construction of the tariff, that there was an attempt made to please everybody, but the consequence is they have pleased nobody. The hon. the Premier can say to the free traders behind him: You say we have not a free trade tariff, but did you listen to our speeches on the floor of the House; did you hear the Finance Minister; did you hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce; would you desire to have better free trade speeches than they made? And then, he can say to his protectionist friends behind him: You object to our free trade programmes, but look at the facts, why nine-tenths of the articles are left where the protectionists left them. He will please one party by quoting the speeches, and he will please the other party by referring to the large number of articles that have been left at the same tariff as the Conservative Government left them.

The PRIME MINISTER. Then it is pleasing everybody?

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is what he is mad about.

Mr. WALLACE. Sir, I am delighted to know that to such an extent have this Government recognized the fact, that protection is the policy for this country, that they have left 90 per cent of the articles at the same rate of duty as under the old tariff. I have too much consideration for the welfare of the people of this country to be displeased with such action as that. I believe that the prosperity of Canada is bound up in a protective policy, and I say that in every case that the present Government has departed from that policy, they have made a very serious mistake.

— OF DEBATES.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, in rising to make a few observations on the questions which have been discussed before this House for the last few days, I wish at the outset to offer my congratulations to the Government on the tariff they have brought down. It is not possible for everybody to be satisfied with all the items of the tariff. Very many of us view the tariff from our own particular environment; but the Government must take a higher position and judge what is best for the whole country, for they do not govern for a locality, but for the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Therefore they must take a wide, broad and liberal view of all the industries with which they have to deal. Although I cannot agree with all the items in the tariff, I congratulate the Government upon accomplishing with such success the difficult task they had before them. They have presented to this country a tariff which I believe will be generally accepted by all the industries of this country, and by people outside of the industries, with a degree of favour which has not been accorded to any other tariff since confederation.

Hon. gentlemen of the Opposition at times try to make out that the Liberal party have stolen their clothes. It brings a smile across the face of everybody who knows the history of the two parties to suppose for one moment that the clothes of the Liberal-Conservative party are large enough for the Liberal party of this country, and more particularly so, when they have worn those clothes for the last eighteen years, and now we find them out at the elbows, out at the knees, and out at every other place where you would expect to find them out if you understood the anatomy of the human frame. In fact, the clothes of the Conservative party are made up of shreds and patches; patch after patch has been put on them for eighteen years, until they are speckled and spotted like the animals that Jacob agreed to take from Laban as his share of the herd. And it is absurd to suppose for one moment that we are going to accept garments of such a character, garments across which the electorate of this country wrote on the 23rd of June last, "Mene, mene, tekel upharsin." No, Mr. Speaker, we have garments of our own; they are up-to-date, made after the latest fashion, and they are of the colours, red, white and blue. Upon these garments are buttons which are stamped alternately, the beaver and the maple leaf on one, and the lion and the unicorn on another, and underneath the whole is written "Dieu et mon droit"—my God and my country. Now, that means a great deal. When we say "My God," it means purity with the Liberal party; and when we say "my country," it means patriotism to Canada, for which the Liberal party has long been noted.

Sometimes hon. gentlemen opposite will say we are drifting towards free trade. That was just the way England obtained free trade as she has it to-day. She did not take one big, bold step towards free trade. Free trade went on developing from the year 1842, when the duties on some articles were reduced, until 1885, when she removed the last vestige of the duty on sugar; and if the Liberal party are retained in power, as I hope they will be, for the next forty years, and if I am living at that time, I may be in a position to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that we have free trade as it is in England.

Then, again, we are told that we are going to destroy the industries of this country. Now, Mr. Speaker, do you suppose for one moment that the Liberal party of this country have any desire to destroy the industries of their own friends? A majority of the manufacturing industries of this country are conducted by supporters of the Liberal party, and a majority of the workmen engaged in those industries to-day are Liberals. Therefore, while we require a revenue tariff so high as we do, it will give an incidental protection which, in my opinion, will sustain and support any industry that is adapted to this country. The hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Wallace) said that the Government made a great blunder in increasing the duty on rice, claiming that that was detrimental to the rice users of this country. But, Sir, the plainest calculation, if he had made it, would show that the Government realize about $59,000 a year for the exchequer by that simple change, without charging the people of this country one solitary cent in addition, but taking this contribution out of the large profits of the manufacturers or cleaners of rice. Let me give you a simple illustration which proves this to a demonstration. Last year we imported into this country 7,249,000 pounds of cleaned rice, invoiced at $122,000, on which a duty of $89,614 was paid, making a total cost of $211,806, which was equal to $2.92 per hundred pounds. Of uncleaned rice we imported 13,311,000 pounds. Allowing a loss of 20 per cent for cleaning, which is a very large reduction, this represented 10,648,872 pounds of cleaned rice. Now, how much did that rice cost the importers? The invoice price of it was $108,477, and the duty paid was $40,538, or a total cost of $149,015. This made the cost to the cleaners of rice $1.39 per hundred pounds. Now, the difference between $1.39 and $2.92 per hundred is $1.53 per hundred, which went to the cleaners of rice. Now, if you multiply the 10,648,872 pounds by $1.53, it will give you $162,987 which the cleaners of rice in Canada made out of the transaction. Now, there are only two rice mills in this country, one in British Columbia and one in the city of Montreal; and, according to the statements made by the late Finance Minister, they employ seventy-five hands, though others say not forty. But taking the higher figure, if we paid $1,000 to every man employed in the mills, it would leave $87,987 of clear profit to an establishment which only employs seventy-five men. We contended in the past, and we contend now, that these profits were far too large, and that there should be a reduction of them, either in the form of decreased prices of rice, or of an increase in the duty which would go into the exchequer of Canada. Now, we shall have a new order of things under our new policy, and that policy I shall christen the Liberal National Policy. By it the Government has taken out of the hands of the manufacturers $59,000 of their profits, by increasing the duty on uncleaned rice from three-tenths of a cent to three-quarters of a cent, and have placed that sum of $59,000 into the exchequer of this country to be used to meet the general expenses of administration. Yet that is the very thing for doing which the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) tried to condemn the Government. If by that change, we do not reduce the price of rice, we at least obtain $59,000 additional for our exchequer, and to that extent will require less revenue than we did in previous years, and thus lighten the burdens of the people.

Now, we are charged with not having fulfilled our promises. I remember that when I sat on the other side of the House, we made many promises to the electorate which we said we would carry out if returned to power, and I think I can prove to you before I sit down that we have done so to a very great extent, and that where we have not carried out our promises, we are going to do so just as soon as the proper time arrives, and is at our disposal. Now, what did we promise? Every hon. gentleman opposite remembers that we promised to settle the school question. Every one remembers how, day and night, we fought the late Government on that question. Every one remembers that when the late Government was determined to coerce Manitoba by forcing upon that province a school system against which the people of that province rebelled, and sought to thrust upon them a Dominion education law, we, as the Liberal party, while not denying to the Catholics what they were entitled to receive, maintained that any legislation to relieve them from the grievances which they claimed the Manitoba Act of 1890 had imposed upon them, should come from the Manitoba legislature. And we promised that if we came into power, instead of settling that question by coercive means, we would settle it by conciliation. Did we not accomplish our object? To-day that question is settled, and settled amicably and satisfactorily, and you will never hear more of it inside this chamber. For this the Liberal party deserve the gratitude and commendation, not only of the Liberals of this country, but of every free man, let his politics be what they may.

We made another promise and we made it frequently. We made it by resolution, by voice and by vote. We declared in this chamber repeatedly, year in and year out, that if the Liberal party came into power, the extravagance then prevailing in the management of the Government departments would cease. We promised to reduce the expenditure as rapidly as we possibly could. Many of us said we could reduce it by two millions, other more sanguine said we could save an expenditure of three millions a year, and others still more sanguine, said: Give us time, and in a few years we will cut down the expenditure of this country, without affecting the efficiency of any department, to the extent of $4,000,000. What have we done in the space of one short year? Let me tell you. We have saved on the following items the following amounts:—

Charges on management of Public Debt, nearly	$ 15,000
On Civil Government.....	36,000
On Penitentiaries	67,000
On Legislation	83,000
On Quarantines	16,000
On Militia	330,000
On Railways and Canals, chargeable to income	140,000
On Public Works, chargeable to income.	176,000
On Ocean and River Service.....	48,000
On Lighthouse and Coast Service.....	40,900
On Fisheries	74,000
On Indians	46,477
On North-west Mounted Police.....	145,000
On Post Office.....	150,875

We owe a debt of gratitude to the hon. Postmaster General for the efficient and able manner in which he has administered that department during the past year. By withdrawing contracts which had been given extravagantly by the late Government to friends of their own and re-letting them, he saved $70,000 to the country.

Mr. CLANCY. Is the hon. gentleman referring to the estimates or to what has been passed?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). My hon. friend will know that this is a cut on last year's estimates. The hon. gentleman may laugh, but men sometimes laugh who cannot argue, and I think that is the position in which my hon. friend is. He must know that we are only in office about a year. When we came in there were large engagements entered into by the late Government which had to be carried out in good faith by the present Government, and when an hon. gentleman—an intelligent gentleman also—pretends that we could cut down in the first year of our office as much as we could in the second, he is begging the question entirely. I might mention some other items, but shall confine myself to saying that, on the whole, we have saved $1,722,642 or in the neighbourhood of two million dollars, and by the time we reach the end of this Parliament, I am sure that the most sanguine expectations will be nearly realized through the economy prevailing in the various departments of the Government under the present Liberal Administration. It is evident therefore that the promised reductions have largely been made, and that we are not open to the charge of having stolen at least that part of the Liberal-Conservative programme.

But there was another promise we made. We promised our farmers free binder twine, and I remember well, in days gone by, how the charge was thrust in our faces that we were not sincere, that we were simply moving resolutions and making speeches in order to compromise the position of the Government on the trade question, and that if we came into power we would never crystallize these promises into law. Well, fortunately, we came into office. Fortunately for the country we are here, and fortunately for the farmers we carried out the promises which we then gave, and have placed binder twine on the free list. How much did the farmers realize from that? It is estimated that the farmers of Ontario used, in the last harvest, 6,000,000 pounds of binder twine, and by taking off the duty, you will find that we have effected a saving of nearly $40,000 to the farmers of Ontario alone. And in the North-west Territories there is a large quantity used, though I have not the means of ascertaining what the number of pounds is. But, undoubtedly, very large sums of money will be saved to the farmers of the North-west and Manitoba as well as other parts of the country through this policy. But this did not end the promises of the Liberal party. The Liberal party promised to place corn on the free list. This afternoon an hon. gentleman (Mr. Wallace) took fifteen minutes to prove that we are all wrong upon the corn question. True, there are differences of opinion upon it even among farmers themselves in different localities as to the wisdom of placing corn upon the free list. But you will understand that when the Government is called upon to frame a policy, they do not frame a policy for one section of the country, but they form a policy which they believe is, on the whole, in the interests of the whole Dominion. I claim that free corn is in the interests of the whole Dominion. Why is free corn advantageous to the farmer? Because the farmers of Ontario particularly, and of other parts of the country also, go largely into the raising of cattle and into dairying, and in order that they may feed their cattle and fit them for the foreign market in which they have to compete with corn-fed cattle, it is admitted by the best authorities in this country that corn is an absolute necessity. It is asserted that free corn will reduce the price of the coarse grain produced on the farm. It cannot do so because the prices are fixed upon the export prices of these articles. We send a large quantity of pease to the old country and the price in the English market regulates the price here. We sell a great quantity of oats in Great Britain, and it is the price obtained there that rules the market in Canada. Therefore, if the farmers find it more profitable to use corn for the feeding of their animals they will sell their pease and oats and their other coarse grains and buy corn. The advantage is very easily proven. I was told to-day that corn could be purchased in Windsor at 18 cents, and oats at from 16 cents to 18 cents per bushel. Supposing a farmer in the neighbourhood of Windsor wished to feed his cattle, would it not pay him to sell 34 pounds of oats from 16 to 18 cents and buy 56 pounds of corn at 18 cents? Will not 56 pounds of corn go further to sustain and fatten an animal than 34 pounds of oats? It is thus plain that it is of advantage to the farmers of the country to have the food which is their raw material as cheap as possible, so that they may make their finished articles as low as possible, and thus realize the highest profit in the British market.

But the Liberal party made other promises. We promised that we would remove specific duties, and we have largely succeeded in doing so. I am sorry that they were not all removed, but, no doubt, that would be difficult to do. We have always contended that the specific duties bore heavier upon the cheaper goods purchased by the poorer classes of people than upon the goods used by the rich. Let me give you an example: Take the case of a shoddy blanket. The old duty was 20 per cent and 10 cents per pound. The blanket I refer to would weigh about 8 pounds and would cost at the factory about $1. The specific duty at 10 cents per pound on 8 pounds would amount to 80 cents and the ad valorem duty of 20 per cent would amount to 20 cents, or a total of $1. That is 100 per cent on that blanket. Now take a fine French blanket that weighs 5 pounds and which you buy for $5. The specific duty amounts to 50 cents and the ad valorem, at 20 per cent, amounts to $1, a total of $1.50, or 30 per cent, as compared with 100 per cent on the fisherman's or lumberman's blanket. That is how the principle worked. Take any article on which there is a specific duty, not wines, spirits, beer, and tobacco, with which I have no concern, but take the articles used by the people—and apply this principle and you will find that the specific duties bear very heavily upon the goods used by the poorer class. The Liberals promised to remove this form of duty, and I am glad to say that in the resolutions before us they have been removed to a very large extent, showing that the Liberal party has carried out reasonably well the promises it made, its action thus far being an evidence of what is to be done in the future.

We also promised that luxuries should be taxed higher than they were before. From the public platform we proved to the people that many luxuries were imported into this country which bore a lower duty than many of the necessaries of life, and we contended that taxation should fall more heavily upon those parties who were willing and ready and able to buy the luxuries they wanted. And what has been the result? On silk velvets, and all manufactures of silk, embroidery, laces, jewellery, gold and silver-plated ware, liquors, tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, &c., &c. the duty has been increased by this new Liberal tariff, thus vindicating the promises made by the Liberals to the people.

We promised, further, when we were in Opposition—and I remember some resolutions we put upon the records of the House on the subject—that barbed-wire should be given to the farmers of this country at a much reduced rate of duty or placed on the free list. The Liberal party has fulfilled that promise by placing barbed-wire on the free list and has given to the farmers of this country some great advantage, and particularly given an advantage to the farmers who went to the west, that greater Canada, to work out their destiny. The Government has come to their assistance in this way, and this change will leave in the pockets of the farmers thousands and tens of thousands of dollars which was formerly paid to the manufacturer.

I wish now to draw a comparison between the duties under the National Policy, so-called, of the Conservative party and the Liberal National Policy, the policy now in vogue and which will continue in vogue, probably, for the next fifty years. I want to show the duties under the old policy compared with those that will be charged under the new policy a year from 1st July next. The present duty will be between the two figures I shall read. In this respect I think a large benefit, a most extraordinary benefit will come to the consumers in this country. Now let me read you a table giving a comparison between the Conservative National Policy and the Liberal National Policy, or reciprocity tariff, in respect to a number of articles :

One-eighth reduction, which goes into effect at once. The duty will be midway between the above rates.

And yet our hon. friends on the other side say that we have stolen their clothes ; and they say that we have made no change in the interests of the consumers of this country. Why you know, Sir, that the large importations which will take place under the new tariff must of necessity come into this country a great deal cheaper than they came in under the old tariff. And who is to receive the benefit of this treatment ? The hundreds, and thousands, and millions of people in this country who are consumers of these articles which are imported from abroad. And yet these gentlemen say that nine-tenths of our policy has been stolen from them. In iron, too, there has been a reduction which is going to be an important benefit to the products of the various factories of this country. The duty on pig iron per ton was $4, and under the new reciprocity tariff it will be $1.87½. Iron and steel ingots per ton, under the old tariff paid $5, under the reciprocity tariff they will come down to $3 per ton. Bar iron per ton under the old tariff was $10, it will come down under the new to $5.25. Cast iron pipes under the old tariff were $10 per ton, under the new reciprocity tariff they will be $6 per ton. One-eighth of the reduction is made now, and the figures which one-eighth will make, stand equi-distant between those ranges of figures, which I have given you above. Now, I ask if they have not carried out the promises that were made, not that we would put iron upon the free list—no such promise was ever made ; and I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite to quote one sentence or one paragraph from any Liberal who was speaking on behalf of the Liberal party, in any section of the country, from Vancouver to Cape Breton, who said that the Liberal party would put iron on the free list. We said we would give the manufacturers freer iron, and so we did. We told the consumers of this country that we would give them freer goods, and so we did. We did not promise them free trade, it was beyond the limits of our power to give them that ; but we gave them all that we believed would be in the interests of these industries, and at the same time enable us to raise sufficient revenue to conduct the affairs of this country. Now, I want to show you how much we have paid for the higher duties on iron for the last five years. We paid no less than $413,858 in bounty for the protection of pig iron from 1891-92 to 1895-96. We paid no less than $993,405 duty on the 248,352 tons imported from foreign countries. Now, Mr. Speaker, you know that when a duty is placed upon any particular article, it gives an opportunity to the manufacturer in this country of the same article to increase the price to the consumer by reason of the duty. I do not suppose that the manufacturer in this country puts the whole duty on. Therefore, taking $3 instead of $4 as the increased price on the Canadian iron, it amounts to $667,056 which the manufacturers in Canada were able to place upon iron by reason of the $4 charged as duty against imported iron. Then, Mr. Speaker, you know that the duty on iron or any other material becomes a part of the original cost to the importer, and he places the profit, whatever that profit may be, upon the duty as well as upon the original cost of the article. Therefore, the consumer not only pays the duty, but he pays the percentage placed upon that duty by the importer or the dealer, and that has been $248,351 during the last five years. Therefore, we have paid in the form of bounty duty, and increased price by reason of the duty, and the profits on duty by importers, no less than $2,322,676; and that was for the protection of the manufacturer of 222,352 tons. The cost to the country was $10.16 for every ton of pig iron manufactured in this country. Now, I ask if that was not an extraordinary duty. I say the Government deserve credit, great credit, right in the very teeth of powerful organizations, for putting iron freer in the hands of the manufacturers and others who use it to so large an extent in many ways and thus benefit the consumers. Now there is another thing that I want to bring before you. What saving do we make on that calculation under the Liberal tariff? Taking the same number of tons as we imported in 1896, and making exactly the same calculation, we find that we have saved to the people of this country no less than $54,000 a year, even paying the increased bounty which the Government has promised to pay. It has been a saving to the country of no less than $54,000 on the basis of that calculation.

The Liberal party promised to reduce the duty on coal oil. It is said that some people ran their campaign on the coal oil can. I never did that, although in this House I took an active part during two sessions in urging on the Government to a reduction of the duty, and I repeatedly told my constituents that it was an imposition to ask them to pay 100 per cent on any products that could be manufactured here at reasonable cost; and I also stated it was a heavy burden, and that we demanded from the Conservative party a reduction of duty, and that if we came into power we would reduce the duty. I never advocated the placing of coal oil on the free list. I was accused the other day of having stated during my speech, I think in 1892, that I advocated free oil. I suppose few hon. members in this House remember the speech, and in order to refresh their memories I will read some quotations. The speech was delivered on 30th May, 1892. I said:

I am not opposed to the National Policy in respect to coal oil, but I am opposed to the excess—

sive duty of over 100 per cent in favour of the coal-oil interest, because this enables them to control the whole industry of refining oil.

Further on I said:

Although I am favourable to extending to this industry a reasonable protection, it is wrong, I think, in the interest of the consuming population of this country, to extend to the refiners a protection of 100 or 125 per cent.

This was the case at that time. I further said:

If the Government should reduce the duty from 71-5th cents to, say, 5 cents a gallon, it would relieve the people of at least one-third of the burdens which they are now obliged to bear in this matter. I hope the Government will reconsider this question—not upon the basis of free trade, because I do not contend that coal oil should be put on the free list, for, so long as we have the National Policy in this country, it is only right, and just, and equitable that protection should be given to the oil producers, as well as to every other industry along the line of justice. I trust that the Government will try to see their way clear to reduce the duty upon coal oil to 5 cents a gallon.

I was accused here the other day of having preached free trade as regards that article. The Government and the Liberal party have fulfilled their promises to reduce the duty on coal oil to 5 cents, and I must say that I would not be sorry to see the reduction carried a little lower, and in my opinion it would be better in the interest of the consumer to have greater freedom in regard to the distribution of coal oil in tank cars. Oil in tank cars can only be distributed at 78 points in the Dominion, 39 in Ontario, 13 in Quebec, 10 in New Brunswick, 7 in Nova Scotia, 5 in Manitoba and the North-west Territories and 4 in British Columbia. I think the points at which coal oil should be distributed in tank cars should be increased, so as to give the people an opportunity to bring the oil in as cheaply as possible and thus save at least one cent per gallon.

The Liberal party also promised to reduce the duty on agricultural implements. Hon. gentlemen opposite say we have not fulfilled that promise. There were a few agricultural implements on which hon. gentlemen opposite made a deep cut in 1894, and it was made for a purpose—either 35 per cent was an extortionate rate, or the rate was reduced to meet the demands of the people on the eve of an election. They made such a deep cut on eight articles that now, under a revenue tariff, we find there is a reasonable duty to produce revenue from that particular source. But we constantly urged the Government at that time to reduce the duties on numerous other articles used by farmers throughout the country. Let me say that under this new Liberal tariff we have reduced the duties on twenty-four articles largely used by farmers. These articles are as follows: Axes, scythes, reaping hooks, hay or straw knives, hoes, rakes, pronged forks, snaths, farm or field rollers, post hole diggers, all reduced from 35 to 25 per cent. Barbed wire and binder twine have been placed on the free list. Horse powers, threshers, steam engines, separators, feeder or feed cutter or machines, potato diggers, farm wagons, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, wind mills, pumps, &c., have been reduced from 30 to 25 per cent. Here are 24 articles which farmers largely use, and on all these important reductions have been made.

Another promise made by the Liberal party has been fulfilled. We promised to do our very best for the people, not only for the farmers, but for the whole people of the Dominion, to secure reduced transportation rates. Although we cannot increase the prices of agricultural products in England by any legislation enacted here, we can adopt measures to enable the farmers to get their products to market as cheaply as possible. The Government have adopted two or three methods by which to accomplish this result. One is to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. I believe this is a bold stroke of policy and one in the interest of the country, because when this extension is carried out, it will become an active competitor of the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway at the point of reception of products from the great west, and if a combination were entered into between those two great private interests, the Government railway would modify that combination by giving proper rates to people on their products sent from the west to the sea. In that way, the Government has adopted a wise policy in extending the Intercolonial Railway to the city of Montreal, the great centre of the trade of the west.

Sir, we promised to repeal the Franchise Act, one of the greatest iniquities ever placed upon the Statute-book of the country. Nothing so abominable in principle was ever crystallized into the law of this land. It was conceived in iniquity, and begotten in sin, and it was enacted for a political purpose. In 1884, when the Conservative party met in caucus to talk over the effects of their so-called National Policy for four or five years, Sir John Macdonald was at their head. That astute statesman, that man who in my opinion was one of the greatest leaders of men who ever appeared in Canadian politics, that man who could take his Conservative friends by the nose and lead them as easily as you could an animal to the market; he was astute enough to fear the coming elections, and out of his fertile brain he evolved the Franchise Act, hoping that the revising officers of his own pick and choice would so stuff the list as to return to this House a majority pledged to support him. Our friends fought that iniquitous Act for six long weeks in this House, and I am almost sorry they did, for if it had passed into law as introduced, the indignation of the people would have been such that it would have to be repealed within a year. The Liberal party promised as soon as they got into power, that they would repeal that Act which legislated Conservative members into this House, in spite of the votes of the people. Every person who has had his eyes open during the last ten years knows, as well as he knows he has a nose on his face, that it was an Act for the purpose of legislating into the councils of the nation persons whom the electorate refused to send here. We have introduced a Bill to repeal that Act, and by doing so we will reduce the taxation on the people of this country. The Franchise Act cost the treasury of the Dominion $1,250,000, although we had only four revisions. It has cost the people of this country, both parties contributing, at least half a million more for revision, and now this vast expense will be wiped out as we promised it should be, and our franchise will be placed upon a more equitable basis.

The Liberal party promised more than that. We promised preferential trade with Great Britain, and we are now carrying out that promise. The Conservative party are very meek and humble now, because they were obliged to eat humble pie by the electorate, but for years they claimed that they were the loyal party, that they were the men who had associations for the purpose of bringing around preferential trade with Great Britain. What a change has come over the spirit of their dreams. To-day one speaker after another on the Conservative side of the House rises in his place to throw cold water upon this loyal and patriotic National Policy which our Government has proposed. Let me bring this matter in a more tangible form before hon. gentlemen. Let me point out that in 1892, the Liberal party foreshadowed this policy of preferential trade with Great Britain. We offered this policy to the Conservative party by resolution, but the Conservatives would not accept it. Let me show how loyal and how British these men opposite are. Why, the most British and the most loyal man in this House—or at least he supposes he is—was the author of the following resolution. In April, 1892, Mr. McNeill moved:

That if and when the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland admit Canadian products to the markets of the United Kingdom upon more favourable terms than is accorded to the products of foreign countries; the Parliament of Canada will be prepared to accord corresponding advantages by a substantial reduction in the duties it imposes upon British manufactured goods.

Notwithstanding the fact that every product of our country is permitted to go into the English market without a single cent of duty being charged, and notwithstanding the fact that in 1892 England gave preferential treatment to our cattle over that which she accorded to the United States; in the face of all this, the most loyal man in the Conservative party asked for more advantages, before Canada would give anything to the motherland. These are the men who call themselves loyal. In contradistinction to that, we had the Liberal party then showing true loyalty. The present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) moved this as an amendment to that resolution:

Inasmuch as Great Britain admits the products of Canada into her ports free of duty, this House is of the opinion that the present scale of duties exacted on goods mainly imported from Great Britain should be reduced.

Now, this is not exactly the policy we have foreshadowed in our present resolution, but it is the same principle. We were under deep obligations to Great Britain for allowing our goods in free to her markets, and because of other advantages we have received from her during many years. Notwithstanding that, the resolution of Mr. Davies was voted down by no less than 99 Conservatives who sat in this House, and not a single one of them voted for preferential trade with Great Britain. Yet, they tell us to-day that in bringing in this preferential policy we have borrowed their clothes. It is no such thing. In 1892 the Conservatives wanted England to reduce her duties, or give some preference before they would do anything for her, while at that day we offered her preferential trade. I am proud to see to-day, from the various communications which come from the old land, that both the Conservative and Reform press there are united in lauding the Liberal party of Canada which has taken this beneficent step, not only in the interests of Great Britain, but alike in the interests of Canada and the Empire.

Let me tell the House how this preferential resolution will be advantageous to Canada, and probably I will quote some figures which will astonish hon. gentlemen opposite. I take no stock at all in the argument that this preferential offer to Great Britain is going to involve her in difficulty with Germany and Belgium. The Government after taking the whole matter into consideration, and after consulting probably the very best lawyers in the country, have announced boldly and above-board in this House, that it is not to be extended to Belgium and Germany and that in their opinion the most-favoured-nation clause does not apply in this case. Even if it did, that is a matter which has yet to be decided by the highest court in the land.

Mr. PRIOR. Did the hon. gentleman hear what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said in regard to that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Yes, I did, and I heard what Mr. Laurier said this afternoon, that in the opinion of the Government this privilege was not to extend to Belgium or to Germany. Now, that means just this, that after due consideration that was the conclusion at which the Government arrived; and, therefore, they are of opinion that when this matter is tested before the proper tribunal, it will be found, that this offer, made in the manner in which it is made, does not violate in any way the favoured-nation clause in the treaties of 1862 and 1865. But supposing it did, may not this policy bring about the final settlement of this question more quickly than if we had left it alone altogether? Are we to be hampered in the making of our tariffs by those treaties, when England's opinion is that we should be released from the burden of them, if we are under them, and when the most eminent statesmen of England have said time and again that if we find that these treaties compromise our tariff policy, they will take the first opportunity of denouncing them and letting us free in that respect? And this departure may bring that question to a conclusion faster than that could be done in any other way.

We are told that this arrangement is going to be of no benefit. But those who have paid any attention to our shipping know that a large number of our ships crossing the ocean and carrying our produce come back in ballast. Therefore, if we can increase the trade between this country and the old country, we will give labour and profit to these ships and thus bring about a reduction in the transportation rates across the Atlantic. Because everybody knows that if a ship goes over loaded and comes back in ballast, she must charge higher transportation rates than if she brought back goods. Out of 1,541 vessels which left the ports of Halifax, Montreal and Quebec last year, only six left in ballast; while during the same year there came into those ports 1,414 vessels, out of which 358 came in ballast. Now, if we can increase our trade with the countries across the sea, some of these 358 vessels will come back laden, and will be better able to carry the products of Canada across at lower rates than at present. Therefore, there will be more work for Canadian shippers and lower prices for Canadian consumers. In this way we shall be benefited from both sides.

Now, I have placed before you no less than fifteen promises that we made to the people of this country, and I have proven that in every case these promises have been fairly and reasonably carried out. Although this Government has been only ten months in power, no other Government that ever existed in the country could have done more or done better. Nor has there ever been a Government in this country with a personnel of more honour, more integrity or more economy. They are men whose characters are above the least suspicion, either in private or public life. And when I say that our noble leader is the best leader the Liberal party ever had, I do not mean to disparage the great leaders we had before. The Hon. George Brown was a great man; the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie was a great man; the Hon. Edward Blake was a great man; yet in my humble judgment we never had in this country a man with broader views, greater statesmanship or a better grasp of the affairs of Canada than the man who now leads the grand and noble Liberal party of Canada; and I believe that when he goes to England in a few weeks to represent this great colony at the coming celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, he will receive a greater ovation than any other man from any foreign country or British colony. As the Koh-i-noor is the brightest diamond, and sparkles more brightly in the crown of the Queen than any other diamond in it, so Canada is the Koh-i-noor of the colonies of Great Britain; and what is more fitting than that we should send the Koh-i-noor of colonial statesmen to represent Canada in the great Jubilee year of the Queen's coronation? Now, Sir, not one word of the praise I have given to the hon. gentleman is flattery; but from what he has accomplished during the last ten months, with the aid of the Liberal party behind him and the wisdom of the men surrounding him in the Government—men of ability, integrity and character—how could you expect from him anything but what is good and great and noble, in the interest of the country of which we are all so proud?

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, if there ever was a financial crisis in the affairs of Canada, I think we may say from a perusal of the daily press that the present is that time. A perusal of the daily papers from one end of the province of Ontario to the other, and also in the province of Quebec, will prove that many factories are being closed in consequence of the changes which the Government of the day have made in the tariff now before the House. Little wonder is it, therefore, that the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), and who has for a long time been a constant advocate of free trade, should have seen fit to avoid the tariff measure which is now before the House and the country. The hon. gentleman has nimbly gone over the wide field of Canadian politics. He has dealt with the Manitoba school question, though what it has to do with the tariff is something I fail to understand. Then, in closing, he has endeavoured to make a comparison on the subject of honesty between the gentlemen who now occupy the Treasury benches and their predecessors. It must be a matter of regret to the hon. gentleman that they are minus one gentleman, and that is their representative in the county of Terrebonne, the famous author of the "business is business" letter. When hon. gentlemen opposite boast that they have all the honesty of this country, I ask them to call to recollection their colleague in Terrebonne and fancy what a pity it would be had he been among those innocent nurslings, for fear he might have polluted some of them. Now, I cannot follow the hurried remarks of the hon. gentleman in reference to all the tariff matters upon which he has touched, but this I have to say, that in the ordinary pursuits of life we are accustomed to judge a man's general reputation by his special and particular acts. And if I can show by the statements of the hon. gentleman that he has been simply a wayfarer by the side of the path of truth, I need only say: By one statement judge of the others. The hon. gentleman said, and he defied contradiction, that the Liberal party had never been pledged to the removal of the duty on iron. I think I caught correctly the words of the hon. gentleman. True, it may be that, in the hon. gentleman's estimation, his declarations must have more weight than even those of the leader of his party; but if he will refer back to the columns of the Montreal "Herald" of the 23rd of June, 1895, he will find that the hon. the First Minister is there reported to have said in a speech delivered in Montreal:—

There are two articles which are the raw material of every manufacture in this country, and these are coal and iron. Are they free? If you have a revenue tariff, our object will be to develop the country, and under such a tariff all raw materials will be free.

Yet the hon. gentleman has told us that his leader never led the people to believe that the duties would be removed on iron. Coming down to some of the other matters on which the hon. gentleman touched, he endeavoured to show that this tariff was framed almost exclusively in the interests of the poorer people, that it was the case of the masses against the classes, and he illustrated his statement by a reference to the duty on silk. The hon. gentleman should know that there is nothing half so dangerous as a half truth, and while I do not imply any intention on his part, he certainly lapsed into a half truth. He said that the new tariff imposed a higher duty on silks. Well, Mr. Speaker, he is altogether in error. He will find that while in the old tariff there was a duty of 30 per cent upon silks, there is only a duty of 26½ per cent in the new. And so on, if you will compare the record with his utterances you will find that the both are very wide apart.

What is the question to-day before the people in this House, for after all is said and done, this House is in reality the people of Canada. We are here as the representatives of the people of Canada, sent here to obey their behests and do what they have instructed us to do. And while it is quite true that hon. gentlemen opposite are in possession of the Treasury benches, I allege that they have no warrant from the people to interfere in the fiscal policy which has been in force the last twenty years and has produced a great amount of prosperity and content. What is the National Policy? There was a time in the annals of Canadian politics when lines were fairly and squarely drawn, when either upon the public platform or on the floor of this House or in the public press, each party could be told by its colours—the one unswerving in its devotion to the policy of protection, while the other, while giving unyielding opposition to that tariff—alas, for the frailty of human hopes!—never was able to adhere to any fixed line of principle or policy. There have been since the inception of the National Policy a number of general elections. I ask any hon. gentleman if he can show where the Liberal party in this country has ever, during the past eighteen years, adhered to the one and the same policy. In the last campaign, their appeal was made, not on the platform of the National Policy with a preference for continental trade, but was made on the plea that they were in favour of a tariff for revenue alone. In the preceding elections, their appeal was made on the ground that the interests of Canada were tied up altogether with those of the great republic to the south, and that the only hope for the future prosperity of Canada lay in a treaty of commercial union with the United States. Are they to-day the advocates of commercial union? Not at all, and the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat is forced to admit that they have appropriated to their own use the fiscal policy which has been in force during the past eighteen years, with a few changes and conditions.

But what have these hon. gentlemen attempted to do? The hon. the Finance Minister, the other night, said that his party was at the great disadvantage in being asked to raise a superstructure on a poor foundation. Well, all I can say is this, that hon. gentlemen opposite were certainly at their wits' end when they devoted their attention and energies to framing a protective tariff policy in this country, and the reason was that year in and year out, for the past fifteen years, they have been the advocates of free trade and commercial union and reciprocity with the United States, and therefore is it to be wondered at that the measure they present to-day bears unmistakably marks of botched mechanism.

What has the National Policy done for this country in the past eighteen years? No better proof could be given of the advantage of this policy than the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite are compelled to accept it almost in its ent. ety. It has given to the people vast manufacturing interests and given work to Canadian labourers and workingmen, and enabled them to earn higher wages than the same classes are earning in the countries of Europe. What are the wages paid to men in this country as compared with those paid in Europe? The wages paid in Belgium are admitted to be the cheapest. In Germany the wages are about one-half what they are in this country. In England they are five-eighths, and in France the wages are about a medium between those in England and Germany. What this country needs at present is not any tinkering with the tariff, but rest, in order that our people may have restored those energies which have been severely tried in the past five years. But where are the hon. gentlemen to-day? They are, as I have said, admirers of the National Policy—the policy which they have for years denounced in the strongest language possible. They remind one of the lines:

Vice is a monster of such frightful mien
That to be hated needs but to be seen.
But seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

For a number of years these hon. gentlemen endured the National Policy. After that they began to pity it, and to-day, the National Policy, by reason of the firmness of their embrace, stands in a fair way of almost being strangled. And of all those who are embracing it, whether it be the Knight of the Rueful Countenance (Sir Richard Cartwright) down to the last admirer of that policy on that side, each one is vying with the other to prove to the people that the National Policy as tinkered by them is the tariff policy which should prevail in this country for years to come.

Looking back eighteen years, the question is, not whether the National Policy has come up to our expectations, but whether Canada has been a gainer or a loser by that policy, and whether we would have done better under the policy which hon. gentlemen opposite used to advocate in past years. There will come a time, I suppose, when the history of the Liberal party will be written, and it will be found hard to believe that such a party could have departed as it has done from its principles, and they will be looked upon as nothing but the remnants of a once great political party.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), who has just resumed his seat dealt with some matters to which I wish more particularly to refer. One was the coal oil industry. If there was one plank in the platform of hon. gentlemen opposite in which they affected to have an especial concern, it was in the tariff relative to coal oil. And yet to-day, after all their professions what changes have been made in the tariff? There has been a paltry reduction of 1 cent a gallon. It is true that some regulations have been made by which coal oil may be taken in vessel tanks. But this will not give one cent advantage to the people of the North-west. It may give an advantage to the people of the maritime provinces, but the farmer of Ontario and the farmer of the North-west will be forced to pay as high prices as they have paid in the past for coal oil. The hon. gentleman went on to deal with the question of the farmer's interests and he brought up the subject of corn. I am here to say that in my humble opinion it is not in the interest of the farmer of Ontario to remove the duty on corn coming from the United States. It may be an advantage to the feeders of cattle, but it will not be an advantage to the farmers as a rule, because the farmers are not sellers of beef, but sellers of coarse grains. But the hon. gentleman lightly and airily says: All you have to do is to ship your oats and coarse grains to England and feed your cattle on American corn. The hon. gentleman must know that the greater the quantity of any article forced on the market at any time the greater must be the reduction in price, and the farmer who has coarse grains to sell will, by the competition of American corn—for it can be landed at points in Canada at from 17 cents to 20 cents per bushel during the summer months—be forced to accept a less price for his coarse grains. With the Ontario farmer the problem is not so much in what he has to pay for any article; the problem with him is how he will procure better prices for the articles he has to sell.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Huron), dealt at some length with the woollen goods duties. I did not follow him in all respects, but I have to say that the farmers of Ontario and the farmers of other provinces will be vitally interested in the changes made in the duties on woollen goods. The other night when the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was dealing with the Budget he drew a pleasant pastoral picture of Canada one hundred years ago. He longed for the days of stage-coaches and little mills at the cross-roads. He painted a picture that, to be complete, required only the presence of a highwayman. The hon. gentleman said that the world moves, but he forgot to say that it does not move backwards. If we in Canada are to move with the world we must move forward. I am glad to say that hitherto the movement has not been backward but forward, and under the defensive policy we adopted eighteen years ago, we have had the satisfaction of seeing the mechanic of a few years ago develop into the manufacturer of today and the small manufacturer of a few years ago grow until he is in control of immense works. But the hon. gentleman expressed, and I believe he was sincere in it, great regard for the small woollen men.

Let me tell him that I have assurances from men in woollen mills that the passage of the policy now before the House will result in the closing up of every small woollen mill such as he pictured the other night. Take, for instance, the matter of coarse tweed manufactured in the mills. In my constituency there are four such mills. I have received from men in the business strong and solemn protests against the change proposed in the tariff in this regard. Take an article that weighs two pounds to the yard. Under the old tariff there was a duty of 5 cents a pound, making a straight duty of 10 cents per yard. The ad valorem duty in addition would be 12½ cents, being 25 per cent on the value which would be 50 cents. This made a protective duty on this article of 22½ cents per yard. Under the tariff now proposed, if it goes into force, instead of a duty of 22½ cents per yard, there will be a duty of only 13½ cents per yard. I say that the small woollen mills which are scattered all over the country cannot exist under such a duty and will be under necessity of closing up. Now, let me ask what effect will this have upon the farming community. Hon. gentlemen who are conversant with this business must know that these mills are the best customers the Canadian farmer has for his coarse wool, which is not wanted in England and which cannot be exported to the United States by reason of the hostile tariff of 12 cents a pound. I call the attention of the Finance Minister earnestly to that point and I tell him that by lowering the duty on this line of goods he is imperilling the life of every factory of that nature throughout the country.

The duty on wheat has been reduced as also has the duty on flour. The result must be that we shall have the mortification of seeing introduced into this country year by year large quantities of American flour. This must result to the detriment of the Canadian farmer. But, while these hon. gentlemen have stated that they are giving the farmer fair play all round, they have frequently said that fair-play means to give him advantages in the articles he has to buy. I would ask the hon. Finance Minister: Where is the reduction on agricultural implements? Reapers and binders are the articles which the farmers wish to purchase, and the duty of 20 per cent on these remains. On every hustings in Ontario the farmers were told of the Masseys' and these other large combines having been made wealthy under the fostering influence of the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen opposite assured the farming community that if they came into power they would give the farmers great advantage by removing the duties on iron and coal. The hon. leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) stated without reservation that the duty on coal would be removed. The duty is not removed, but the duty on iron has been lessened. And who are to be the beneficiaries of this change? The agricultural implement manufacturers, of whom they have a representative on that side of the House in the hon. member for Leeds and Grenville (Mr. Frost), are to have the advantage of the reduced duty on iron, while, at the same time the duty on agricultural implements is kept up in the interests of the hon. gentleman and of the Messrs. Massey & Co., who are strong admirers of hon. gentlemen opposite. The Government had the opportunity to give to the farmers a real advantage in connection with the reapers and binders, and the petty advantage of 1 cent per gallon on coal oil is nothing compared with the advantage they could have given the farmers on the larger article of agricultural implements. But they say: We have done something as much to the advantage to the farmers by reducing the duty on binder twine. All that I have to say is that the figures prove that for the past two or three years binder twine has been sold as cheap in the province of Ontario as in the United States. If it is such a boon to give the farming interests of this country binder twine without duty, why did they not give that boon this year? If it is such a boon to the farmer, why was it not permitted to go into effect at once? The fact of the matter is that hon. gentlemen have been trying to break their fall, and while they have refused to carry out the pledges that they have made to the farmers, they are endeavouring to break their fall with these paltry and trivial reductions on coal oil, binder twine and barbed wire. Now, there is in my riding an industry of great importance, an industry that has grown under the fostering care of the National Policy. In the town of Orillia, the manufacturing concern of Tudhope Bros. employ 100 men all the year round. They are making there, and have made for the last eight or ten years, carriages which have found a ready market not only in the province of Ontario, but even in the maritime provinces. Yet under the policy of the hon. gentleman, as contained in this tariff, a blow is being struck at the carriage industry of this country, which, in my humble opinion, it cannot possibly survive. There was a specific duty of $5 on each manufactured article valued at $20—and a large number of so-called carts are brought into this country from the United States, paying a duty of $5 specific—so that duty of $10 on each article is under the present tariff reduced to $7, as against $10. And why is this change made? It is not made as being warranted by what hon. gentlemen have done, because to the manufacture of carriages they have given little or no advantage; for while the duty on iron is reduced, the duty on malleables, which is the most expensive part of the carriage apart from the workmanship, has not been reduced one iota.

Mr. BENNETT.

This afternoon the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) asked the Government, or pressed upon the Government, the necessity of placing an export duty upon logs, and in that connection I would ask the indulgence of the House while I address a few remarks to the Finance Minister and to any other members of the Government who may be present relative to that great question. To-day we are haggling in this House about matters, and hon. gentlemen opposite are importuning Cabinet Ministers to preserve and to retain customs duties upon certain articles the manufacture of which employ a few hands, while they are entirely overlooking what is to-day one of the greatest industries, or could be made the greatest industry in the whole province of Ontario, namely, the manufacture of lumber. Sir, fifteen years ago, standing in the Legislative Assembly in Toronto, appeared a large number of American buyers, who openly announced their intention to purchase Canadian limits, and having purchased them, to remove the logs to Michigan, and to use them there in the manufacture of lumber. That was the time and the occasion when the Government of Ontario, with their eyes wide open, should have at once made a restriction on the sale of these limits, so that every foot of pine on those limits should be manufactured in the country. Unfortunately for the good of the province, that was not done, and to the mortification of the people of Georgian Bay, they saw, year after year, vast quantities of saw-logs passing from the Canadian to the American side. In a few years after that, Sir John A. Macdonald, then being Premier, had his attention called to the matter, and by reason of its great importance, the Dominion Government imposed an export duty on logs which almost prevented the trade and shipment of them to the state of Michigan. Unfortunately, at that time a movement was set on foot by certain Canadian lumber manufacturers and by American limit-holders in Canada. The duty at that time was $2 on white pine lumber passing from Canada to the United States, and in consequence of a joint proposal made by the Canadian lumber manufacturers and the American limit-holders in Canada, the authorities at Washington and the Dominion Government entered into an arrangement by which the export duty was removed from logs, and at the same time the duty was reduced on white pine lumber from $2 to $1. Since I have had the honour of a seat in this House, I have at all times and on all occasions pressed upon the Government the necessity of taking action in this matter, and preventing the export of these logs from this country to the United States. When I say that I am within the mark in stating that there has been for the past eight or ten years, year in and year out, exported from the Georgian Bay to Michigan 400 million feet of white pine lumber, hon.

gentlemen may form some estimate of the immensity of that trade. Why, Sir, that means the keeping in steady employment of eighty large mills, each cutting five million feet of lumber in a year; that means the employment each summer of upwards of 3,000 men. I ask the Finance Minister to-night while he is listening to the importunities of his followers, and of business men in this country to retain and preserve duties upon certain lines of goods so that small factories may be enabled to keep in their employment ten or a dozen hands, does he not think it is of greater interest that to the province of Ontario there should be preserved the work of two or three thousand men? Now, what has been the result of this policy? The result has been that along the line of the Georgian Bay mills which were formerly in full operation are to-day closed down; and we have, as I said before, the mortification of seeing large rafts of logs continually passing from Canada to the United States, at our cost and to our bitter experience. More than that, I can tell the Finance Minister to-night that he gives under his tariff an unfair advantage to the American manufacturer, in that upon every foot of lumber that passes from Canada into the United States a duty of $2 a thousand is charged, while on lumber that passes from Michigan right across Lake Huron, because it is easy of access, and is poured into western Ontario—there is not a single dollar of duty charged. Now, let that be understood. If we must have a hostile duty of $2 a thousand levied by the American Government against us, then in the name of all common sense let us have the same tariff against their lumber coming into Ontario. But there is a much better plan ahead of us, a plan that is approved of not only by the inhabitants along the shores of those lakes, but even by the lumbermen themselves. I would refer the Finance Minister to the Toronto "Globe" of 21st April, 1897, when the following resolution was adopted by a representative meeting of some of the largest lumbermen in northern Canada; and when I read the names of some of the gentlemen who were present hon. gentlemen who are conversant with the lumber business will admit the fact that these men are in a position to speak by reason of the fact that they have tens of thousands of dollars invested in the lumber interests. At that meeting there were present: Messrs. H. H. Cook, John Bertram, Robert Thompson, Hamilton; W. Thompson, Longford; J. B. Smith, W. H. Pratt and P. D. Master. The following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

Resolved, (1) That any import duty imposed by the United States on Canadian rough lumber and lumber products should be met by a similar import duty on American lumber and lumber products entering our ports; and, also, in addition, by a corresponding export duty on saw-logs and pulp-wood, in order that the product of our forests cut by Americans shall not have any advantage in the same market over the similar product when cut by Canadians.

Now, I make this appeal to the Finance Minister, considering the hostile tariff that has been framed under the Dingley Bill against the white pine industry of this country, has the time not arrived when we should at least hold up our own hands in self-defence, and endeavour to keep that lumber industry in the country, as it can be kept if it is given that fair meed and share of justice that it should receive at the hands of the Government. We then would have the satisfaction of seeing employment afforded at the highest possible rate of wages to 3,000 men every year, on the north shores of the Georgian Bay.

Now, I wish to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments while I refer to what is known as the preferential phase of the present tariff. There must be one of two things to this phase of the tariff, it must mean either one thing or the other, either that hon. gentlemen are in earnest that it should go into force, or that they are only playing a part and endeavouring to humbug the public, and to weaken the effect of their abandonment of their former principles. If they are in earnest in their intention to carry out this tariff policy, then hon. gentlemen have done wrong and have acted against the best interests of the country. It must, of necessity, be plain to hon. gentlemen, as parliamentarians of years' standing, that there is no possibility under the decision given in the past for England to accept the preference we have offered under that clause. That goes without saying, in the face of all subsequent correspondence to the Australian conference. When hon. gentlemen made this proposition, they made it with their eyes open as to what may result. If to-day it has been ascertained from the Home Government that they propose to accept this offer, and the proposition is legal, then I believe it is the duty of this Government to inform the House of the fact, and that at once. If they have not that assurance, they have erred, and erred very materially because they have, by their action, manifested hostility to the United States. What was the necessity of throwing a firebrand at the people of that republic until the Government had ascertained whether or not the Act they were attempting to place on the Statute-book could become law. But if hon. gentlemen are in earnest about this, it is a matter fraught with the greatest possible importance, for this reason: That while the hon. Premier has stated that to-day a preference could only be given to Great Britain, it must be patent to every man reading the clause and an interpretation of the treaties, that Belgium, Germany and other continental countries, which were under the favoured-nation clause, must be held to participate in the benefits of a preferential clause in the tariff. If they are entitled to that preference, this Government should at once let it be known to the public what countries it is proposed to introduce under this arrangement, so that the mechanics and the capitalists may know the worst at the first possible moment. If the artisan of Canada is forced to be brought into competition with the artisan of the old world, in such an unequal contest, the Canadian interests must inevitably go to the wall. If that is the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, and every one could see the other night that the Minister of Trade and Commerce showed almost pleasure at the prospect that the United States would be in a position to avail itself of that clause, the Government owes it as a duty to this House, if there is any arrangement with the Imperial Government, to let it at once be known, and further they should at the earliest possible opportunity place a construction on that clause, so that the people may know what countries come under it.

As to the other resolution in respect to combines, I can only say that no such measure should ever pass in this Parliament or in any other Parliament. The terrors of the Inquisition were nothing compared with this, from a trade standpoint, for when we consider the bitter political fights we have in this country, the Government would be in a position to apply the greatest possible influence to every manufacturer who placed himself in opposition to them.

I do not believe the Government expect the tariff to go into force, and I hope it will not, by reason of the disadvantages that will accrue to Canada, for they will be great indeed if all these countries referred to come under the operation of that clause. I believe there are to-day behind the Liberal ranks men like Senator Cox, who are able to control the free trade element of Canada, and to-day the eyes of the people of the Dominion, whether capitalist or mechanic, are on Senator Cox who is seeking to keep down those who have pronounced free trade tendencies in this country. When the Tariff Bill reaches committee, I trust the Government will, as they have stated they will, be prepared to do, listen to every proposition submitted as to changes in the tariff. It behooves us to act in the interests of the country which are far above the interests of party, and while, from a party standpoint it might be advantageous to allow hon. gentlemen opposite to stumble into the hole, still I believe hon. members on this side of the House, having regard not to party interests but to the higher interests of the country, will extend to the Government their most sincere and hearty support in perfecting a tariff which will be to the advantage and for the benefit of the country as a whole.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan). I do not intend to occupy much of the time of the House, because the tariff has been fully entered into by my colleagues from the west: still, as representing a western constituency I cannot allow a vote to be taken, if it is proposed to take a vote, without having expressed my views on the question now under discussion.

The people of the west, and I speak for my own constituents more particularly, do not expect that the Government would make the radical changes that many think should have been carried out. We are quite aware that when a country adopts a protective policy, it is not easy to revert to the free-trade system; but we find that the present Government are guiding the ship of state in the right direction, and we are quite content to leave it in their hands, expecting that at the proper time it will get into the proper port. It is not, however, the tariff question that affects the people of the North-west so much as the question of freight rates. We have to give about one-half our produce—I refer more particularly to stock, because I know something about that trade—to take the other half to market. If we stockraisers in the Saskatchewan district sell steers for $30 per head, the jobbers are obliged to pay $32 to get them in the English market, and it is quite obvious that this comes out of the pockets of our farmers. We have also to give 15 per cent of our produce to bring back goods which we must necessarily consume in the country; so there is very little profit to our people. On the branch line running from Regina to Prince Albert, the passenger rate is 5 cents per mile and $1 per one hundred pounds for freight, the distance being 250 miles. It is thus apparent that the road should pay pretty well. I myself paid $518 freight on a car-load of apples from Seaforth, Ont., to the town of Prince Albert. I do not consider that this is at all a reasonable amount to charge, and I believe that if the Canadian Pacific Railway were to adopt a wise policy in this respect, they would lower the rates, and enable the farmers of Ontario to find a market for their fruits and other products in the North-west, while they would also enable the settlers there to get some of these luxuries which are now prohibited them. Suppose, Sir, we compare the value of a Pullman car with the value of a box car, we find that while a box car would probably cost $1,000, a Pullman car would cost $12,000. I do believe it to be a fact that the Canadian Pacific Railway does not run a Pullman car between Toronto and the town in which I live, or we will say Regina, on which they make $518 a trip. And yet they charge me $518 for the use of a box car to carry apples. If the Canadian Pacific Railway adopted a wiser policy and cut their freight rates, they would not have to haul so many empty cars to the west, but these cars would go back laden with the products of the farmers of Ontario for consumption by our people. There has been a great deal said about the duty on coal oil, and I must confess that coal oil is sold at very high rates to the people in our western country. We have to pay 31½ cents a gallon at wholesale prices, and before I came here, I was under the impression that the coal oil refiners were robbing us. However, since I came to Ottawa I have taken the trouble to go into the matter with certain gentlemen who knew all about the rates and everything connected with coal oil, but who are not interested in it, and I figured the thing out. I have discovered that it costs us 15 cents a gallon to lay coal oil down in Prince Albert from the wells at Petrolia. The oil itself costs about 12½ cents a gallon, and with inspection fees and other charges the cost is brought up to 31½ cents, so that after all I have come to the conclusion that the coal oil men are not so much to blame as are the railroad companies for the high freight rates charged. I hope that the Government will take into consideration the advisability of allowing the oil to be brought to the Territories in tank cars. We want permission to take the oil in tank cars from the wells of Petrolia right to the point of destination. At the present time, the oil is taken in tanks to the city of Winnipeg and it has to be inspected and barrelled there. It is then re-shipped to the town in which I live, or to any other town in the Territories, and we are obliged to pay a local freight rate upon it, which is as high as the rate from Petrolia to Winnipeg, and in some cases a great deal higher. This is unfair to the Territories, and as it is a matter which can be very easily remedied, the remedy should be applied at once. With reference to farm machinery, I know that the manufacturers have a great deal of freight to pay, and I presume that because of that they cannot sell the implements very much cheaper in the Territories than they do at the present time. I believe, however, that a great deal of the opposition to the machine manufacturers, was caused by the action of the firm of Massey-Harris & Company, who do not deal as they should deal with the farmers of the Territories. I heard an hon. gentleman state in this House, that this firm had lost a lot of money in the Territories. Well, if they have, I can say that it is not on account of the manner in which they do their business. They take good care to have the very best security, and they take no business risks whatever. They never let a piece of machinery out of their hands until they have a lien note upon it, which is registered, and very often they are not satisfied with a lien note, but take a chattel mortgage on his live stock as well, so that if the settler does not pay when the note comes due they very often sell the poor man out.

I wish to speak in a straight forward manner in reference to this tariff question, Mr. Speaker, and I must say that I am not satisfied with that part of the tariff which refers to agricultural machinery, because I think that the manufacturers had enough of protection before, and now that the duty on raw material has been cut down, I believe that the duty on the manufactured article should be cut down also. Under the regulations of the late Conservative Government, although the duty was supposed to be only 20 per cent on agricultural implements, yet we found that when machinery was imported the McCormick binder was valued at $100 for duty, while it was invoiced at $80, so that under the regulations of the late Government, although the people were supposed to pay only 20 per cent they were actually obliged to pay 25 per cent. If the present Government makes a fair and square valuation of the implements that are imported, I have not the least doubt that the people of the west will be perfectly satisfied. We are not unreasonable out there, and we do not ask for impossibilities. I am glad, Mr. Speaker, to find that the present Government is not forgetful of the western country. They have put binder twine and barbed-wire on the free list, and these are two articles which are largely used by our farmers. We have a prairie country, and there is a good deal of fencing to be done, and I am sure that the farmers will hail with delight the removal of the duty on barbed wire. The same remarks apply to binder twine. The Government have also lowered the duties on sugar, and many other articles which I could mention, such as nails, &c., which will be of great advantage to the farmer. I am also glad to find that the Government have increased the duties on liquors and tobacco. No right-thinking man would object to that. Both of these articles are luxuries, and are good subjects on which to raise a revenue. I regret that the Government did not put a tax on tea, because it can easily bear a tax and is a good revenue bearer. We produce no tea in this country, so that if a duty were placed on it every pound of tea would furnish a revenue to the treasury, and would enable us to reduce the taxation on other things which the farmer uses in the pursuit of his industry. If the Government put a small duty of 1 or 2 cents a pound on tea, the consumer would not have to pay any more for it, because the average profit on a pound of tea is 12½ cents, and the result would be that the retailer would simply have to reduce his profit. On the other hand, if the Government put a duty of say ½ cent a pound on sugar, the profit is so very low that the retailer would have to raise the price to the amount of the duty.

As regards the preferential tariff I take the view that it is going to be a great benefit to the people of our western country. If the vessels coming to this country can get more freight from the other side—and I believe this will be the effect of the preferential tariff—they will be able to reduce their freight rates, and the people of the west will reap the benefit thereof, because high freight rates, is one of the great hardships we labour under. Taking the tariff as a whole, I find that it is very satisfactory, and it has the further consolation for us, that it shows the Government are proceeding in the right direction. We take this new tariff as an instalment of better things to come, and I am satisfied that it is the intention of the Government to go further in the desired direction. When the people of the west read the speeches of the leader of the Opposition, and of his supporters who have addressed the House, they will be satisfied to leave the control of the affairs of Canada in the hands of the present Government. We in the west have practically only eighteen years of existence, and nearly all that time we have been governed by the Conservative party. We have had a trial of their legislation, and we have found to our cost that it was not directed towards enabling our farmers to prosper. It was only a year or two ago, when public opinion got so strong, that they were compelled at last to lop off the mouldering branches of the National Policy.

Before that time we were tied up with specific duties, some of which were very hard to bear. They all seemed to be made in the interest of the rich man, and none in the interest of the poor man.

The present Government have also taken a step in the right direction in the interests of the agriculturists of this country by having a practical farmer as Minister of Agriculture. That gentleman has grappled with the situation successfully, and we in the west have every confidence in him. He has assisted us by establishing creameries, which are a great boon to the people of the west; and if he established more of those creameries, there would be less grumbling on the part of the people there.

We are not unreasonable, but we hope that the Government will see their way in the near future to assist in building the Hudson Bay Railway, to which the people of Manitoba and the North-west look for the salvation of that country. We believe that nature created the great bay as a highway to the markets of the world, as an outlet for the produce of those great and fertile plains, stretching from Winnipeg to the foot of the Rocky Mountains. I have no doubt that the time is not far distant when the prejudice that exists in the east against that great railroad will be at an end, and it will be built. Then we in the North-west shall have our importations brought in at much lower rates than the people of Ontario, and no more will be heard in that country of high freight rates or of the tariff.

Mr. KENDRY. Mr. Speaker, the hon gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Davis, Saskatchewan), like a great many of those who come from the North-west Territories, spoke wholly in the interest of the particular locality from which he comes. In this country, where our interests are so diversified, we should legislate in the best interests of all parts of the country. In reference to the tariff, the industries of this country have been built up since 1878 largely by the National Policy. I defy hon. gentlemen opposite to say that they have not. The best evidence we have of that fact is that the gentlemen now on the Treasury benches have adopted that policy, or at least ninety per cent of it. Now, I propose to-night to speak in regard to the effect of the tariff upon the manufacturing industries of this country. I want to say to hon. gentlemen opposite, especially the Finance Minister, that while ninety per cent of their tariff is that of the National Policy, the remaining 10 per cent will close a large number of the mills and manufacturing establishments of this country. These gentlemen, especially those from the North-west, have been for years going from one end of this country to the other, condemning every part of the National Policy; and yet their policy of to-day is the same or nearly the same; and these gentlemen from the North-west now say that this policy will suit that country. When these gentlemen go back to their constituents again, and tell them that the policy which they used to grumble about now suits the North-west; I am certain that they will not be again returned to this House. Now, I want to deal with some of the figures in the tariff of this Government. They have adopted specific duties in about six-tenths of it, and in the other four-tenths they have taken the specific duties off. I make the assertion that the Government will not collect an honest duty by the ad valorem system. In the United States, under the Cleveland Administration, the tariff was largely ad valorem, and they were unable to collect the duties; and I call the attention of the Finance Minister to-night to the fact that his policy will have the effect of striking at one of the largest industries of this country, in which $15,000,000 is invested and over 15,000 hands are employed. It is claimed that the duties have been lowered on the cheaper kind of goods in the interest of the poor man; but I say that the goods that will largely come to this country under the new tariff will be shoddy goods from England, which we want to keep out. Next year you will find that this country will be flooded with these shoddy goods. What I think the Government should have done would have been to increase the duty on those lines of goods which the rich man wears, so as to tax the rich man as well as the poor man and to give the mills of this country some protection. As a result of lowering the duties on cheaper goods, the wool grown in this country will not be used. I make the assertion that in a few months the wool of this country will be three or four cents a pound lower than it is to-day, and that will not be in the interest of the farmers. There is no doubt that the Government will find that the specific duty is the proper duty. They have adopted it in some cases, for example on coal and sugar; but why not have a specific duty on everything? I suggest to the Government even now that if they impose only a small specific duty, that would be a check on the ad valorem duty, and they would be able to collect the revenue. Another matter I wish to call attention to is the effect of the tariff on the wage-earner. I wish to say that if our industries are to be continued running, this new tariff will mean, at the start, a reduction in the wages of the employees of from 15 to 20 per cent. You are very well aware that in the last six months, some fifteen or twenty mills have failed, and commerce has been in a bad condition from one end of the country to the other. And now the Government has struck a blow which will have the effect of closing down many industries. The smaller mills in all parts of the country will have to close, and if this preferential clause is carried into effect, it is only a question of a very short time when the large ones will follow suit.

As regards this double barrelled tariff which we never had before, and which is styled the preferential tariff, it will have the effect of closing down a large number of manufacturing industries owing to the competition it will create from England. We have had several speakers on both sides expressing themselves in favour of the preferential clause, but for my part, I say that duties should be collected equally from all goods, no matter from what country they may come, whether England, Belgium or Germany. We are bound to protect the wage-earners of this country but by this clause the Government have inflicted a very cruel blow on them. Take for instance the lock manufactories, which, under the old tariff, were protected by a duty of 32½ per cent, but which duty is now reduced to 30 per cent. It is true that the Government have lowered the duty on raw material, but that is a very small element in the matter, and that industry will have very hard work to exist if it be not wiped out.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Nothing of the kind.

Mr. KENDRY. I may say to the hon. gentleman that he does not know everything. In the town where I live, we have a large lock manufactory, and the gentlemen connected with it know something about their own business, and they will corroborate what I say.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The lock manufactory in our town is perfectly satisfied with the tariff.

Mr. KENDRY. I think the hon. gentleman would be satisfied with anything so long as it comes from that side of the House.

I now come to the carpet industry which has been encouraged under the National Policy, and which is another one that will be wiped out. The hon. gentleman will find that, from one end of the country to the other, unless the tariff is changed, a great number of these manufactories will be wiped out. Hon. gentlemen opposite are sending their emissaries to all parts of the world to induce immigrants to come to this country at the same time that he proposes allowing thousands of wage earners to come into this country to the United States. I hope that is a policy which will not be adhered to by hon. gentlemen opposite, but that they will become convinced by the deputations that are waiting on them from day to day and by the appeal all over the country that these grievances are very serious.

I wish now to refer, before closing, to a clause in the report of the Controller of Customs, which provides:—

That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the Reciprocal Tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

If that is going to be carried out, it is certainly something which would not be carried out except by this Parliament. It is something unprecedented to give such a power to the Controller of Customs. I remember some years ago a measure somewhat similar was introduced into the United States House of Representatives and they threw it out. It seems to me that the same course should be followed here. I hope the hon. gentleman will not press that part of the resolution. I do not wish to say anything further on the matter except to express the hope that the Government will take it up and see if it cannot do something to help our manufacturing industries.

Mr. ROCHE. I sympathize with those hon. gentlemen from the North-west in their attempts to blow hot and cold in the same breath. No person is in a better position to know the very profuse promises which were held out to the electorate of that western country and when hon. gentlemen compare these promises with the actual performances it is no wonder that we find little enthusiasm in the addresses delivered by them to this House. A goodly portion of the speeches of the hon. gentlemen consisted of a mildly condemnatory criticism of the tariff, but they are careful not to say too much to injure their party. They all, however, agree in saying that this tariff policy is merely an instalment of what is yet to come. Do these hon. gentlemen desire to make this Government a Government on the instalment plan? One would imagine they did. But, Sir, that is the very thing to which the Government and hon. gentlemen opposite objected in their predecessors. They objected to the repeated tinkering with the old tariff. What was the excuse given by the Government at the last session for not taking up the policy of tariff reform during last session? They said that during the recess they proposed collecting information and we did look to them, after all this inquiry, to produce a tariff that would stand for a considerable time to come, and when to-day they tell us that the present tariff is merely an instalment of something else, we can see that that is merely a device to cover their own disappointment. The speech of the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) was on the same line, condemning the Government very mildly for not doing justice to the great North-west.

The hon. gentleman gave some information why he spoke in this particular line. He declared that he would desire no better campaign literature to go back to his constituents with than certain remarks he was presenting to this House. This is the whole situation. As the House is aware, a protest has been lodged against the hon. gentleman, which will be brought to trial at the end of the present session, and he wishes to be able to say: See the independent stand I took in the interest of the farmers even against the interests of my own party. But the other portion of his speech was highly eulogistic of the Government. In effect he declared "With all thy faults, I love thee still." and desired the House plainly to understand that he would support the Government's policy at any rate. No person accused the hon. gentleman of desiring to oppose the Government by vote, no matter how much he might seem to do so by voice. The hon. gentleman, in the early part of his speech, read a poem by Rudyard Kipling touching the supposed concessions offered to the motherland. The poem was very fine so far as the sentiment was concerned, but its literary merits do not seem to be so highly regarded by the reviewers. The name will hardly be regarded as eulogistic by many Canadians, who are not enamoured of the name "Our Lady of the Snows" as applied to our country. It has rather a chilly suggestion about it, which would be more appropriate if made concerning the reception that the tariff will be given at the hands even of friends of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman read the poem nicely, and, no doubt, that made up for many of its other defects.

Now, the hon. gentleman made a remark that I think was entirely uncalled for. He expressed regret that Manitoba had not sent back a solid contingent in favour of the Liberal policy as a result of the general elections of 1896, and he gave as his reasons that Manitoba was practically taken by the throat and a full and free expression of popular opinion prevented by what he was pleased to term "wholesale ballot stuffing." It will be necessary for me to make some reply to that particular part of the hon. gentleman's speech. I feel like extending every indulgence to the hon. member for Lisgar in any statements he may present to this House on subjects of a political nature. The hon. gentleman's training as editor of the Winnipeg "Tribune" has not been conducive to placing facts in a fair, impartial and perfectly accurate manner before this House. As to stuffing ballot boxes in Manitoba, there were many charges, but how many convictions? Out of all the arrests—some eighteen or twenty, there was but one conviction, and that on the gentleman's own evidence. And that, if I mistake not, was not so much a case of ballot-stuffing. He initialled some ballots after the election, acting in concert with the stool-pigeon of the Liberal party, the man Freeborn. Freeborn was to take these to the Conservative committee, and try to levy blackmail, and, if successful, to divide the spoils with the deputy returning officer. But the Conservative committee refused to be blackmailed, and Freeborn handed over the ballots to the Liberals. And it was a strange thing that the bondsman of the man who was arrested was the Liberal candidate, Dr. Rutherford. There was only one conviction, and that is how it happened. But how would the hon. gentleman explain what has taken place in the same constituency within the last week or so. Another election took place in Macdonald, and the Conservatives did not put up a candidate. An old-time Liberal, Mr. Mackenzie, appeared as the Independent candidate, his opponent being Dr. Rutherford. The Conservative newspaper was in financial difficulties, its hands out on strike. The editor, without the knowledge of the proprietor, went to the committee room of the Independent candidate and offered, for a consideration, to come out in the paper in favour of the Independent candidate. The offer was indignantly refused. He then walked across the road to the Liberal committee room and made the same offer to come out in favour of Dr. Rutherford, and the offer was immediately accepted. That is the difference between the two parties. And that very night, the type already set up was brought in from the Liberal office and thus the Conservative paper appeared with editorials in favour of the Liberal candidate. That in itself would not have been so bad, but that was not all. The Independent candidate had his election address in the paper, and some parties, acting in the interest of the Liberal candidate, actually forged a paragraph trying to leave the impression that the Conservatives had combined with the Patrons to support the Independent candidate. Ballot stuffing was charged against the Conservatives, but not proved. But here was a case of forgery on the part of some one in the interests of the Liberal candidate. Immediately the Independent candidate took steps to have the editor arrested, and he was arrested as he was boarding the freight train to skip the country. And since then he has skipped the country. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) would not lay these facts before Parliament. With him it depends on whose ox is gored. He pointed to the Winnipeg election as evidence that the people of that city were enamoured of the Liberal policy. The people of Winnipeg, and I give them credit for it, look out very carefully for No. 1. They did not put up a candidate against the Liberal nominee.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Why ?

Mr. ROCHE. I will tell you why. An Independent labour candidate ran against the Liberal nominee who is a renegade Tory. The Conservative party decided that they would not seek to prevent the election of a supporter of the Government. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) has paid a visit to Manitoba and to Winnipeg since last session. He has had some surveys made by an engineer of the Red River and estimates made of the probable cost of certain works which the people of Winnipeg and of Manitoba generally are very desirous should be gone on with—the St. Andrew's Locks. The people of Winnipeg thought it would be right to give the Liberal party an opportunity to prove the value of its professions, and so did not oppose the Liberal nominee. But, at the end of five years, if they have not fulfilled the expectations of their friends, those people will have something to say.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he will state how many surveys of the Red River were made by the engineer of the late Government ?

Mr. ROCHE. That is the hon. gentleman's usual way of arguing: "You're another." That has nothing whatever to do with the merits of the present case. Now, Mr. Speaker, hon. members on this side of the House, who are in favour of the policy of protection to our agricultural, manufacturing and labouring population, the principle underlying the tariff introduced by the Finance Minister, should not prove so disappointing. But to those hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who vainly imagined that in tariff revision the principle of free trade would be adhered to the result must have come as a most painful surprise. But, above all, among those deluded electors who gave their support to the Liberal candidates and put their trust in them on the distinct understanding that with the return to power of the Liberal party the whole fabric of protection would be torn up and destroyed, root and branch, that, irrespective of any action that might be taken by any other country, on tariff matters the guiding principle of the Liberal party of Canada would be free trade. The fact that this Government adopts the much abused policy of their predecessors in office will create a feeling of resentment at the duplicity which has been practiced upon them. Confidence has been so shaken that in future any promises emanating from the same source will be taken cum grano salis, and with a very large grain at that. Nothing is more calculated to destroy confidence in our public men than to see the promises held out to the electors unfulfilled, principles abandoned and the very things that the present Government had so decried announced as the policy of the Government. When the Minister of Public Works, in addressing this House, touched upon the tariff issue, he said that we on this side expected that the Government, in dealing with tariff issues, would make fools of themselves, but that is where we got left. I presume the hon. gentleman meant by that that we on this side of the House naturally expected that as honourable men they would keep their pledges to the electors, but they were not such fools as to do so. They had the option of keeping their pledges and making fools of themselves, or of violating their pledges and making fools of the electors, and they chose the latter alternative. This may be good politics on the part of the hon. gentleman, but it does not bespeak a very high standard of public morality. However, the hon. gentlemen who have been inured to the cold shades of Opposition for eighteen long years, and who have been growing more reckless in making pledges upon each successive occasion, whose sole aim and object appeared to be to gain power by hook or by crook, and having gained it, to retain it at all hazards—to be sure, to such hon. gentlemen public morality does not count for much, except, like their free trade doctrines, it is all well enough in theory, but in practice they, as a party, have no use for it. Now, those hon. gentlemen must take the people of Canada for a very gullible class indeed. They must be imbued with a good deal of what my hon. friend from Durham (Mr. Craig) declared to be the Barnum idea, that the people like to be humbugged. But there comes a time, even to the most obtuse, when he catches on to those humbugging him, and then woe betide those who have been instrumental in befooling the victim. Now, the Liberal party have been in power but a short time, and still not so short a time but that they have given evidence of their intention to violate almost every pledge given to the electors upon which they secured power. A number of those pledges have been referred to by hon. gentlemen beside me, and it will not be necessary to enumerate them all, nor will it be necessary for me to enter into lengthy details touching any of them. Suffice it to say, that prominent amongst them was the promise to reduce the expenditure and the public debt. In neither case have they done so; they have increased both items. They promised if they were given opportunity that they would successfully negotiate a reciprocity treaty with the United States. They declared that the Conservatives in office heretofore had never been sincere in their attempts in this direction; they declared also that the Conservative public men did not stand in high favour with the American public men; that the Liberal party had always been more friendly disposed towards the Americans than the Conservative party, and if given an opportunity they would send a commission to Washington who would undoubtedly succeed in negotiating successfully a reciprocity treaty with that country. Indications do not point in that direction at the present time; on the contrary, the very best evidence we have that these hon. gentlemen know in their inmost hearts that there is not the remotest possibility of negotiating a reciprocity treaty with that country that would be fair to Canada, is the fact that they are, to use their own expression, discriminating against the United States. They thundered their eloquence against the Canadian Senate, and declared that if given an opportunity they would reform that institution. Well, Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that that is one pledge they seem in a fair way of fulfilling; they are reforming that body politic about as quickly as the law will permit, by placing as many Reformers in that institution as there are vacancies; but I do not think that is the kind of reformation that they promised the electors of Canada. While condemning their opponents for having, as they said, abused the Superannuation Act and superannuated a lot of officials unnecessarily, in the few short months they have been in office they have brought down already a long list of superannuated officers, and if they keep up their present pace, they will soon have the Civil Service depleted of all save the younger element. They railed against that portion of the Conservative policy which provided for a fast Atlantic service, and told the farmers of the province of Manitoba that their hard earned dollars were being wrung from them in order to carry a few passengers between here and the old country in a little less time than heretofore; they declared that to subsidize such a line of steamers would be directly prejudicial to the interests of the Canadian farmers. What do we see to-day? This portion of the Conservative policy has also been adopted by that party, and to-day a contract is signed for a fast Atlantic steamship service. They waged bitter warfare against what they were pleased to term the grinding monopoly of the Canadian Pacific Railway, its high freight rates, and declared their opposition to having the construction of a road through Crow's Nest Pass handed over to that monopoly. But we see to-day that members of the Government are hand in glove with that so-called monopoly, and are about to hand over, I believe, if rumours be correct, the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass

Mr. ROCHE.

Railway to that company. When they were in Opposition they ridiculed the idea that the duties imposed by the Conservative Government upon wheat, peas, barley and other products of the farm, were in any respect a benefit to the Canadian farmers. They stated that the old country markets ruled prices the world over, and that those duties might as well be abolished for all the good they were doing the Canadian farmer. But the best evidence that those hon. gentlemen were not sincere in railing about those duties, is the fact that they are retained in their new tariff. If, as they declared, the duties on agricultural products were of no benefit, why did they not abolish them entirely. To be sure they have reduced the protection afforded to the farmers heretofore to a certain extent. The duty upon wheat has been reduced from 15 to 12 cents a bushel, and I suppose that was done to compensate the millers for their reduced protection on flour from 75 to 60 cents a barrel. So what they took away with the one hand they appeared to give with the other, but all at the expense of the farmers. It is a well known fact that the price of wheat in the province of Manitoba, many times during these past two or three years, has been above an export basis; that many times the price in Manitoba has been greater than that across the boundary line, plus the duty. And still they have reduced the duty upon wheat from 15 to 12 cents per bushel. There were two items of especial interest in Manitoba that have been mentioned already in a number of speeches, that is the item of agricultural implements and coal oil. The Liberals told the Manitoba farmers that that was essentially an agricultural country, and why should they be taxed to keep up those bloated manufacturers of the east? They tried in this way to set one class of people against another, one province against another, cultivating the idea that the manufacturer was the natural enemy of the farmer. But notwithstanding all those professions, we find to-day that the manufacturer of agricultural implements is in the enjoyment of higher protection than he had under the old tariff, for the raw material that enters into the composition of his machines is allowed to come in at a reduced duty, the manufacturers get the benefit, but the farmer does not, and the protection of 20 per cent is kept on just as it was. One would imagine to hear the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) last night when he spoke on agricultural implements, that he held a brief in favour of the manufacturer of American implements. He was trying to impress this House and country how much superior American-made machines were to Canadian-made machines. I think the hon. gentleman took a very unpatriotic stand in that particular line, for there are a great number of men more practical than either he or I who hold a contrary opinion. During my campaign I met with as many farmers who declared that the Massey-Harris binder was equally as good as I did of farmers who favoured the McCormack binder.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I gave both sides.

Mr. ROCHE. The cotton lords also came in for a great deal of abuse at the hands of the Liberal party. The high protection they had enjoyed was pointed to as evidence of the injurious effects of the tariff; but the cotton lords to-day are in the enjoyment of a higher protection than they had under the old tariff, in many lines the protection has been raised, and their old cry falls to the ground in that respect as well. The people of the west were told how heavily they were taxed to maintain the employment of a few hundred men in the coal mines of Nova Scotia, and that was described as another iniquitous tax, embodying the vicious principle of class legislation, that would have to go with the advent of the Liberals to power. But has it gone? No, and not likely to go; but, on the contrary, in view of expressions made by the Finance Minister, both in this House and out of it, in the event of the Dingley Bill going into force with a coal tax of 75 cents per ton, there will not only be a tax on bituminous coal, but also on anthracite, which is now admitted free, and this would be necessarily a retaliatory tax which the people of Canada would have to pay through the nose for. And this is from a Government who were supposed to be opposed to retaliation in any form and who were going to legislate irrespective of any action taken by any other country. Why, Mr. Speaker, that love of change, so indigenious to the Liberal breast, which characterized their actions while in Opposition, still clings to them now that they have assumed the responsibilities of office. Their many-sided ante-election policy has undergone another change during the last few weeks; and is not this very fact of a great political party changing their policy at every election, no sooner having met with defeat with the one cry than they hatch out a new policy, trot it out and advocate it with all the gusto imaginable, to be met with the same result and have the same process repeated, and having at last been fortunate enough to delude the electors into returning them to power—is not this instability in itself sufficient to condemn any party in the eyes of intelligent people, and pronounce them unworthy to occupy positions of trust and incapable of managing successfully the affairs of a young and thriving nation like Canada.

The Finance Minister declared that no person imagined that the Liberals ever advocated the immediate adoption of free trade, and he travelled all the way to England for an authority to bolster up his arguments in favour of getting here by easy stages.

Now, that was rather hard on some of his colleagues who declared it was the intention of the Liberal party to use their own words—and it was the declaration of an hon. gentleman who occupies a specially high position—that they would not get there by easy stages, but by one fell swoop wipe away every vestige of protection.

The Finance Minister also expressed his admiration for the good old-fashioned method of doing business on the small scale. Well, the hon. gentleman is rather contradictory, for in another portion of his speech he said the world moves. And so it does, and Canada is moving with it, and with the modern and improved methods of doing business, the old style is not in it. You would imagine the hon. gentleman to be living in an ante-deluvian age. Canada cannot afford to be doing business on a back street, and must keep abreast with the progressive spirit of the times; so I see nothing in our present condition that should make us yearn for the non-progressive days of the past.

The speech of the hon. member for Alberta (Mr. Oliver) the other night contained, in my opinion, an undercurrent of disappointment and dissatisfaction. That hon. gentleman knew the many promises of reform that were made to the people in the western country, and with which the practices of the Government thus far do not tally; but while not at all enthusiastic in his praise of the Government, for party reasons, he did not desire to say anything calculated to injure them. He declared his intention of supporting their policy, because in none of the speeches delivered on this side of the House was there any better policy formulated. Does the hon. gentleman not remember the words of his leader while occupying the Opposition benches, that it was not the province of an Opposition to propound a policy for the country, that it was time enough to prescribe for the patient when he was called in, and now that he has been called in he prescribes for his patient in homeopathic doses on the instalment plan; and I presume if that is good logic when applied to the then Opposition, it is equally good when applied to the present Opposition. But the late Government, led by Sir Charles Tupper, had a policy and a good policy for the western country, and had they been permitted to carry that policy into effect it would have resulted in great benefit to that country. The hon. gentleman did not always think that the Liberals were friendly disposed to the west, as is evidenced by the following remarks delivered by him a few years ago:—

The reason that the people of the Territories do not kick more vigorously when election day arrives, is because they have no assurance that if the Opposition obtained power to-morrow, they would do any better in these respects than the Government is doing. The Liberals have never made a study of the North-west or its affairs, have never championed its cause or that of its settlers—more than to score a point for the party, when opportunity offered—and, indeed, have permitted themselves to rest under the libel that they are anything but friends of the North-west. Whatever may be the shortcomings of the Government party, they at least profess an interest in the Territories, which the Opposition does not even profess. Under the circumstances, the people of the Territories can hardly be expected to enthuse much over a prospective change of government, or to give a majority in favour of it.

So there are others who change their views pretty frequently besides the members of the Government. But there was one remark made by the hon. gentleman in which I heartily concur, namely, that there are other more important matters than even the tariff—the question of freight rates, a subject on which the Government may not have much influence, but it was one of the questions which the Liberals declared they would take up for the purpose of relieving the burdens pressing on the people of the North-west. I hold that freight rates can never be satisfactorily settled in that country until there is secured that nearer outlet for the products of the North-west to markets of the world via Hudson Bay. That country will never prosper to the extent nature intended it to, until we have a road to that Bay. The hon. gentleman said the late Government had no policy. The late Government of Sir Charles Tupper had an intelligent policy towards that country, and if ultimately it had been carried into effect it would have been productive of undoubted benefit, and if the present Government adopts that portion of the late Government's policy as well, and build a road to the Hudson Bay they will secure the everlasting gratitude of the people of the North-west. But I fear the expedition to be sent to test the navigation in Hudson Bay is not sent there to promote but rather to condemn the enterprise. Why should the Government have declined the offer of a vessel of 2,000 horse-power, fitted for ice navigation, and proposed to send there a whaling vessel with 70 horse-power that is not adapted for ice navigation; and considering that leading Liberals have cast doubts on the enterprise, and that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is superintending the sending of this expedition entertains doubts as to the route, I think the present expedition is not intended so much to test the navigability of the straits as to condemn the enterprise for all time to come. Of course, I may be mistaken in this view, but if so, present appearances are deceptive.

Mr. CASEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. WILSON. I should like to make a few remarks.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose that strictly the hon. gentleman is in order.

Mr. WILSON. I will not detain the House very long.

Mr. ROCHE.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Wilson) is, in strictness, in order, but when an hon. gentleman moves the adjournment of the debate so as to get a pre-audience on a future occasion, it is an exceedingly unusual thing for another hon. gentleman to intervene.

Mr. CASEY. I will withdraw the motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The motion has not been put, so that no consent is necessary to withdraw it. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Casey) give way?

Mr. CASEY. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I am not in the habit of speaking very often in the House, and as a matter of course I will not take up a very great deal of time. I wish to say a few words with reference to this new tariff that has been introduced by this new Government, and if there is 90 per cent of the old Conservative tariff left in it, I must say that the tariff is not as bad as we might have anticipated from this Liberal Government. However, before I enter into a discussion of the tariff I wish to say a few words about the history of this matter. Those of us who had the honour of a seat in the old Parliament, will remember then the unusual course pursued by the Liberal party at the last session. We know, how in every possible way, they obstructed the passing of the estimates, and that some of those hon. gentlemen spoke for five and six hours in order to obstruct. We know that the Finance Minister of that day made a proposition, that the Opposition should allow the estimates for two or three months to be passed, so that it would not necessitate the calling of the House immediately after the elections, but the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) then protested, that he would not allow a single cent to pass the House. I have no doubt that at that time, the leader of the Opposition and his followers had very little idea that they would succeed in the then coming elections. They expected that the Conservative Government would be returned to power, and the Conservative Government also expected the same thing, and so the Liberal opposition intended to embarrass the Government in every way. It was found after the general elections, that Mr. Laurier had a majority of members in the new House, and would be called upon to form a Government, and he found himself in a very awkward position. He had begun a new fiscal year without any estimates, and about the 8th of July he was called upon to form a Government, he knew that he could not possibly get his Ministers elected and meet the House on the 16th of July, when it was called for the despatch of business, and so he decided on two things. In the first place he further prorogued Parliament till the 19th of August, and then he caused Governor General's Warrants to be issued to provide the necessary funds to carry on public affairs. Those of us who were here in the first session of this Parliament remember the discussion on the issue of these Warrants, and I do not believe there was a single legal gentleman, who might be said to be well up in his profession, who tried to justify on constitutional grounds the conduct of the Government in this respect. They all said it was a matter of expediency, and that the Government being in such an awkward position, they were bound to raise the money in some way or other. I distinctly remember that the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) justified the Government on the ground of expediency, and he stated, that if it were shown that a single cent had been spent corruptly he would vote against the Government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said that the Government was in a tight place, and that they had to issue Governor General's Warrants, but he did not want it to be taken as a precedent for others to follow. I believe that the Government made a great mistake in adjourning the meeting of the House until the 19th of August, because after they had decided on issuing Governor General's Warrants, it would be better for them to prorogue Parliament until October or November, when they would have had time to mature their fiscal policy and lay it before the House. They would then have avoided this long delay and this uncertainty, which during many months have interfered greatly with the business of the Dominion. Then, Sir, the Government was embarrassed at the close of last session. They had promised a very great deal to the people; they had told the people that the protective tariff was a villainous system, and that it had robbed them; and in their emergency they hit upon the plan of appointing a commission to interview manufacturers throughout the country. They did this, although they had led the people to believe that they knew all the time what was the best for the country, and that they were ready at any moment with their fiscal policy. Well, Sir, this commission went first to Toronto, and they interviewed the pork packers. I remember very well that Mr. Fearman, who is a large pork packer, told the Finance Minister that that was the time of the year when they had to buy their supplies, and that if the tariff was to remain in a state of uncertainty, they would not be able to pay the farmers so much for their pork as they otherwise would. The Minister of Finance was not quite so generous to the pork packers as he was to the coal men, but perhaps there was not the same occasion for it, and so he threw out no hint to them as to what the tariff in this particular line would be. Mr. Fearman also told the Finance Minister, that he had tried the pork packing business for two years under a free trade policy, and that he found at the end of these two years, that he was a poorer man than he had ever been in his life before, and had to sell his factory and take the machinery out of it. Then, the tanners interviewed the commissioners, and the tanners told them, that they were all Liberals, that they had always been Liberals, that they were free traders, but that unless the Government did something to prevent the Americans selling leather in this country at less than cost, they would have to close up their tanneries. I am glad to see that neither in the leather nor the pork industries, have the Government reduced the duties. Then, the furniture manufacturers waited upon the commissioners, and I shall read to the House the opinion of a gentleman who said he had been a Liberal all his life time, and had voted for Mr. Mowat for twenty or twenty-five years. My hon. friend (Mr. Sutherland) knows a good deal about Woodstock, and he will probably know Mr. James Hay, to whom I refer. Mr. Hay said:

He could remember when elm was not used in the manufacture of furniture, but only as staves for barrels. Now it was utilized in every factory in Canada. The material was bought from the farmers, and largely increased the price of elm. "The results have, to my mind, justified the use of the National Policy," said the speaker. "I have been a Reformer all my life, and have voted for Sir Oliver Mowat for twenty or twenty-five years; still I think, and I would advise that the policy be not upset. There are a large number of unemployed in this country. It would be a mistake to increase that number. If there was one reason, when Mr. Mackenzie's Government went out of power, why the duties should be increased, there are twenty reasons to-day why more duties should be maintained at a reasonable figure. I think, also, the National Policy has been the means of drawing together the different parts of Canada."

That is the opinion of a gentleman who has been a Reformer all his life, and who I dare say at the inception of the National Policy was strongly opposed to it. However, after Mr. Hay had had an experience of 18 years of the National Policy his opinion was that it was a benefit to the country, that it afforded employment for labouring men and for mechanics, and that it drew the different parts of this country closer together, and tended largely to the development of our natural resources. Now, I think the evidence of this witness ought to weigh somewhat with the Government, and I am glad to see that it did, for so far as I know there has been no reduction in the duties on furniture. They listened to Mr. Hay, possibly because he was an old Reformer, and they had more faith in him than they would have in a wicked Tory. He gave his evidence:

Witness went on to point out that the introduction of the National Policy forced the Singer Sewing Machine Company to manufacture their goods in this country. If the duties were reduced, it would be in the company's interest to manufacture their machines in the United States and pay the duties. There had been no increase to the consumer, generally speaking, as a result of the protection to the manufacture of furniture.

Reverting again to the subject of furniture, witness said the productive capacity of the United States was far in excess of the demands of the country.

Now, hon. gentlemen talk about reciprocity with the United States; but I would like to know what we are going to send to them. On every hand they seem to be producing very much more than they want for their own use, and they are anxious for what we are anxious for, to get an outlet for their surplus. That is one of the reasons why I think this preferential clause should not apply to the United States. While I have great sympathy with the policy of preference to Great Britain, and would be willing to give every reasonable preference to the mother country, I certainly have no sympathy with the view that it should apply to the United States. For, so far as I remember, the United States has at no time in our history shown us any favours or any disposition to deal with us on fair terms. Another gentleman who gave his evidence at that meeting was a Mr. McMullen—I do not suppose it was the hon. member for North Wellington—a member of the firm of McMullen & Harris. This is his evidence:

Since July he had been making bedsteads, and was importing his raw material from the United States. If the tariff of 20 per cent were continued, he hoped to have forty or fifty men making bedsteads alone. They were the first in Canada to start making bedsteads of brass entirely.

There was a meeting of the commission in the city of Montreal, and at that meeting a gentleman by the name of Mr. Brown appeared. I have no doubt that the Finance Minister will remember the little incident that occurred on that occasion. Mr. Brown was evidently a very strong free trader, and had been reading the speeches and the literature of hon. gentlemen opposite. In the statement he said:

The first thing that should be placed on the free list is agricultural implements, which are protected by duties ranging from 20 to 35 per cent. Under present conditions, the most improved implements are almost as necessary to the farmer as the soil itself.

Implements might be placed on the free list without injuring anybody. The United States tariff has placed them on the free list from countries levying no import duty on similar articles from the United States.

This statement seemed to be news to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), and he turned to the gentleman sitting next to him and asked where Mr. Brown had got his information. Then, I believe, he plucked up his courage a little, and asked Mr. Brown himself where he had got the information, and that gentleman elicited roars of laughter by replying: "I got it from the campaign literature of the Liberal party, and I have it here." That gentleman was a free trader, a man who believed that the best interests of this country would be served by free trade pure and simple; and he had got this opinion from the speeches of his leaders, and supposed that those speeches were to be depended upon. Whether that is the case or not those hon. gentlemen who know them best will be able to judge. Then the workman appeared before this same commission. A Mr. James M. Ramsay, representing more than five thousand workmen employed in iron industries at Lachine, asked that, in the interests of the mechanics and workmen, no change should be made in the present tariff. Further on, the report says:

Sir Richard endeavoured to catch the witness in some explanations, but the witness replied: "If you had a little money invested in it, you would catch on sooner."

Now, I will refer to only one other witness. Mr. Dobie, manager of the business of E. W. Gillet, manufacturer of crystal yeast cakes and baking powder. He said:

The firm's headquarters was in Chicago. If there was a material reduction in the duties, they would manufacture in Chicago instead of in Toronto. They employed fifty hands in Toronto, one half men, one half women. Men were paid from $8 to $15 a week, and women $5. The firm paid out $100,000 a year, and their output from $140,000 to $150,000 a year. Duty on baking powder was 6 cents per pound. Same on yeast. This was equal to 100 per cent ad valorem. If the duty was reduced to 20 per cent, it would pay the firm to do its manufacturing in the United States and pay the duty, and simply sell in Canada. The price of the firm's goods manufactured in the States and here are the same. The price to the wholesale and retail grocers and the other consumers was the same as if there was no duty.

To Sir Richard.—We have the principal business in the United States, and there is no trust.

To Mr. Fielding.—They are all the same. Package sells for 10 cents.

This is one of the ways which these hon. gentlemen took, I believe, to get out of the difficulty in which they were placed. They had promised the people free trade pure and simple, and they hit upon the scheme to go round and inquire of the different industries to ascertain exactly what they wanted. I remember distinctly the ridicule that was heaped upon the late Government because they pursued a similar course, a course that was very much more appropriate to them than to hon. gentlemen opposite, because they were protectionists, and they wanted to know what was in the best interest of the country from the gentlemen who were manufacturing the goods and from the farmers who were tilling the soil. At that time hon. gentlemen opposite did not want any such information. What they wanted was free trade pure and simple. This brings me to the statement of the Finance Minister. He lamented very much the departure from our country of the small factories. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman meant. Surely he could not have meant to say that if the Reform party had been in power from 1878 to the present, we would have gone on manufacturing our carriages, buggies, sleighs, cutters and carts at the little wagon shops, and that the blacksmith would have gone on making his own horse-shoes and nails as in the past, and that we would have made no progress. And if he desires to have those days brought back to us by legislation, he would find very few supporters in this House. The fact is it became a serious question for us whether, in our own cities, we would manufacture in the large way our own carriages and our own boots and shoes and other articles we require or whether we should go on importing them from the United States. I think that the policy of the late Government tended very largely to develop the best interests of the country, although, in any event, no matter what kind of legislation we had, I believe we would still have made some progress, because I do not believe that it is possible to hinder the progress of a country like ours.

I now come to another statement made by the hon. Finance Minister which is a little peculiar. He said :

The question arises as to how far we shall be able to apply at once, or at an early day, these principles of tariff reform which we have in the past declared we wished to carry out. * * * No man who ever spoke in the name of the Liberal party of Canada, ever announced that we were going at one step to adopt the principles of free trade to that extent.

I do not understand why the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) made such a statement, for I give him credit for reading the speeches of his colleagues and knowing what they have said on the subject. He must surely be aware of the very strong statement which the hon. gentleman who sits beside him (Sir Richard Cartwright) made, and which I shall read for the benefit of the hon. gentleman and this House :

We will collect a revenue by duties placed upon articles which we cannot produce in Canada. * * It is the only possible method of taking every vestige of protection out of the tariff and still raising a revenue.

It seems to me that that looks very like free trade. I am very glad that the hon. gentleman has not carried out that policy, but has joined the protectionists, because I believe that our industries should be protected, and that we should not raise a revenue on the lines therein indicated. But he made another statement on the 25th of October, 1894 :

The time is ripe for very extensive and far-reaching reforms. I, for my part, would be sorry to see the issue dwindle down to a mere question of revenue tariff. We need, among other things, a radical readjustment, not only of our tariff, but of the whole system of taxation.

I do not think that these hon. gentlemen have carried that out very effectively. I do not know whether the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) took a very active part in the revision of the tariff or not, but if he did I would have expected a much more free trade tariff than the one he has, and to that extent, I am very glad that he was ignored. There was, in fact, a rumour at one time that possibly he might resign, and I am surprised that he has remained in a Government whose principles are evidently protective. It is true that up to six o'clock the hon. Finance Minister treated us to a purely free trade speech, and there may have been method in his madness. He may have spoken under the impression that the people would read his speech and not look into the tariff. A good many comments have been made on the tariff by newspapers friendly to the Government. The Toronto "Globe" last Saturday, said that the only justification for the duties being kept on soft coal and of the likelihood of a duty being charged on hard coal was that it might lead to reciprocity in the coal business, and then the "Globe" went on to say that it could not understand why the duties were raised on cottons. I think the hon. Finance Minister did not make that very clear, but it is difficult to explain the speech of the Finance Minister unless on the theory of the ex-Controller of Customs (Mr. Wallace) that the Government first put up the duty in order that they might afterwards give a preference to Great Britain and other countries. Then they did not eliminate all the duties on iron, because, according to the "Globe," the bounty will continue until 1902, and the "Globe" says :

The changes made will provide cheap raw material, and at the same time protect the best producing interest of the Dominion.

I thought that when the Liberals were returned we would lose all the protection, but that has not been the case I am glad to say. Let me quote a very strong reason given by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce why this tariff should be a free trade tariff. It was because the people were being robbed on every hand by the villainous system of protection. This will be found in "Hansard" of 1893, page 710 :

We are obliged every year, either on account of individual or general indebtedness, to pay a sum of $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 to our English creditors. Further than that, Canada is an enormously-taxed country. First of all, there is a tax of $30,000,000 which goes into the Federal Treasury ; next to that there is a tax, as I believe, about quite equal, which goes into the pockets of the protected manufacturers ; and, thirdly, there is a very heavy tax paid to the United States Government under the operation of the McKinley tariff.

Then at page 717 of "Hansard" of 1893, he said :

Now, Sir, what is the character of the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite? By means of it they take twice as much out of the pockets of the people as goes into the Treasury.

If that be true, this Government is criminal in allowing such a tariff to remain on our Statute-books during the last ten months, and not only that but in continuing it to the extent of 90 per cent, at least, for a considerable time to come.

This tariff has been attacked within a few days by the Montreal "Witness," but of course the opinions of that journal have not very great weight because you do not know where to find it. Sometimes it supports the Government and sometimes it criticises. But as an evidence that the Reform party agreed to give us, let me quote a few extracts from the speeches made by the hon. leader of the Government.

Mr. KAULBACH. Will it be in the shape of the Wilson Bill?

Mr. WILSON. No, there is no such Bill in this country as the Wilson Bill. This is a speech delivered by the leader of the present Government (Mr. Laurier) at Newmarket, in September, 1893:

I will not be satisfied until the last vestige of protection has been removed from the soil of Canada. This is the aim towards which we are progressing, the aim which we have in view, and we will not rest until we have achieved that object. When that will be, I do not profess to know, but, at all events, I say that the Reformers of Canada have reforms to carry out, but that our great reform is to put away from the soil of Canada the last vestige of protection.

Mr. GIBSON. Yes, but the platform fell down.

Mr. WILSON. I should think so. We have the strongest evidence that the platform fell down, and their principles with it, if they ever had any. I have another short extract, in reference to a speech made by the leader of the present Government in 1895 at Grand River, Que. He told the people that:

If he were Prime Minister, he would make it his duty to remove the duty on pork and flour.

And in carrying that out, he went so far as to take 15 cents a barrel off flour, and nothing whatever off pork. But the most extraordinary article that I have seen is the one that appeared in the Toronto "Globe" on the 26th April. A man reading it would naturally look two or three times to make sure he was not reading the "Mail and Empire." It is long and I will only read a portion of it.

Mr. GIBSON. Read it all.

Mr. WILSON. It is good literature, but the hour is late and the House is very impatient.

Mr. GIBSON. We are all satisfied.

Mr. WILSON.

Mr. WILSON. All right; we will try it. I have no doubt it will be very interesting to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). This is from an editorial of the Toronto "Globe" of the 26th inst. It is a very long article but it is well worth perusing, and I would advise the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) to read it all.

The FINANCE MINISTER. After the session.

Mr. WILSON. It would be too late then for the hon. gentleman to profit by it.

If we gave our market to the manufacturers of the United States and allowed American goods to come in as a flood, many of our factories must be swept away in the deluge, and widespread commercial disaster must result.

An hon. MEMBER. What is that from.

Mr. WILSON. It is from the "Globe" of the 26th instant. It is worth any gentleman's while to read the "Globe" now because there are some good articles in it. I almost think they must have changed the editor and taken a good Tory.

The real danger lies in the fact that Canada and the United States are contiguous countries, that we have to make long hauls and pay heavy freight charges in order to supply the home market, while, if we threw down the tariff barriers, the American manufacturer, enjoying the great national advantages of the short haul and the consequent low freight rate, could swamp us from one end of the Dominion to the other. For example, if there were no taxes on American goods, the manufacturer of New York State could control the market of Ontario as easily as he controls that of his own state, while the factor of distance and the burden of freight charges would make it impossible for us to meet American competition in the other provinces, where the American manufacturer could as easily, and as cheaply, throw his goods across the border into Canada. Therefore, in view of the physical configuration of this country, to reduce our tariff to a free trade basis in face of the high tariff of the United States and the low freight charges across the border into Canada, would be to doom even the most deserving of Canadian industries to decay and to send our young men in ever-increasing droves to the United States. We assert as strongly as ever the advantages of free trade with the neighbouring country. But we must consider self-preservation, and we must have national self-respect, and there does not appear to be any escape from the conclusion that, under all the circumstances, it is impossible for the moment to give any large measure of free trade to an adjoining country from whose markets we are effectively and determinedly excluded.

I had intended to read an extract from a speech by the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), but he is not in his place and I do not think I will bother with it at this time. There is one thing that strikes my riding, and which, I think, will strike a great many ridings in the province of Ontario, and that is free corn. What I am surprised at is that the Minister of Finance has not been as generous to the people of the province of Ontario as to the people of his own province. He said he was willing to reduce the duty on soft coal from 60 cents to 40 cents if the Americans were willing to leave the duty under their tariff at 40 cents. But, he says, if they do not, I will not only keep up the duty on soft coal but I will put a duty on hard coal as well. But, when he comes to the question of corn, he says to the Americans: You may enter it here free for everything except for making whisky; it will not make good whisky and we do not want it for that. This removal of the corn duty, in my opinion, will seriously affect the price of the coarse grains grown in Ontario. How can we afford to sell these grains even at present prices, to say nothing of a reduction. I know that oats in my riding are hard to sell at 17 cents a bushel. Before I came to attend this session, barley was quoted at 21 cents and they would not pay more. We are one of the best barley-growing sections in Ontario. The Bay of Quinté barley is noted as being the best in the American market. It used to be $1 a bushel and even more. But it dropped to 75 cents and so on down to the present price. It had to be used for feed, for no man can afford to sell it at present prices. Why should the Government allow corn to come in free to compete with the farmers who are getting such low prices for their coarse grains? I feel that it is unfair and unjust and I most earnestly protest against that part of the tariff, because I feel that it is opposed to the best interests of the Dominion. I think that will be almost the unanimous opinion of my people. As a matter of fact, the farmers in my riding are the strongest protectionists we have. I know that personally, because I have visited them from house to house a good many times. It is only once in a great while you can find among them a hard-shell Grit who is sufficiently "hard-shell" to take the position the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), who used to say: If other people have a mind to be fools and tax themselves, why should we follow them in that? The Government did not take that view and I am glad of it. They do not take the position that they are free traders like the English free traders. The Englishman does not tax the things he can make but the things he cannot make. The result is that Great Britain raises about one-quarter of her revenue from customs duties, while we raise fully two-thirds of our own in that way. But I am very glad to know that our Government does not take that position. I think it is much better that a dozen men, or even a whole political party, for that matter, should lose their reputation and be regarded as not overtruthful and as men who would not keep their promises, than that the whole country should suffer. Hon. gentlemen opposite used to say that protection must be abolished. I have shown that by the quotations I have given, and these could be multiplied by any number you like. They declared protection to be a villainous system and said that if they got into power they would eliminate every vestige of protection from the tariff. I am glad they did not do it; I am glad for my country's sake, because it is very much more to us that our country should be prosperous, that the best interests of the country should be considered, than that any particular party should be in power. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry for having trespassed so long on your patience, and I have to thank you and the House for your courteous attention. I again express the hope, in conclusion, that the Government will be able to reconsider this free corn question, and re-impose the duty of 7½ cents a bushel.

Mr. CASEY moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 30th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the British Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Hudson Bay and Yukon Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act incorporating the Ontario Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Dominion Portland Cement Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 80) respecting the Quebec Bridge Company.—(Mr. Lavergne.)

Bill (No. 81) respecting the Great Northern Railway Company.—(Mr. Lavergne.)

Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Mining Development and Advisory Corporation of British America, Limited.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 83) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Mycenian Marble Company, of Canada, Limited.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

Bill (No. 84) to incorporate the Continental Heat and Light Company.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Hull, St. Louis Dam and Victoria Springs Railway Company.—(Mr. Brodeur.)

Bill (No. 86) respecting La Banque du Peuple.—(Mr. Préfontaine.)

Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Columbia River Bridge Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 88) to incorporate Les Cisterciens Réformés.—(Mr. LaRivière.)

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 89) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1889.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. The object of the Bill is to effect a purpose that no other Bill which has been introduced in this House could effect, and the object sought to be effected is that embodied in the Bill introduced by me in a previous session. What it would accomplish would be this: It would enable the department in case a policeman who had served ten years was disabled, to give him a pension. At present under the Pension Act a policeman who is disabled, is entitled to a pension only after he has served fifteen years. I think that is unjust; if a man who has served ten years is disabled during service, he should be entitled to a pension. The old Pension Act provides that a man who has served twenty-five years, and who leaves the service, shall be entitled to a pension. That, I think, is a little too long a time. I propose that if a man has served twenty years, he shall be entitled to a pension, but with the same provision that exists in regard to his possible service of twenty-five years. There is nothing to prevent him going on and serving twenty-five or thirty years, but if he wishes to leave after serving twenty years, and is in good health and strength, there is no reason why he should not have the small pension which is calculated on the basis laid down in the old Act. That old calculation is preserved in this Bill.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have no desire at this moment to interpose between my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) and his Bill; but has he considered whether this legislation is in order?

Mr. DAVIN. A private member will probably be debarred, but the Government should take up this Bill. But I may say this to the Prime Minister: It is only by a very close and critical judgment that I can be held in any way to be enhancing the burdens on the public. The same remark will apply to a Bill which is already before the House, which does not make the same provision, but which errs in the same way. Of course, if the Government object to the first reading, I cannot help that. I am perfectly aware that when it comes to the second reading, if the Government says: we cannot take it up, I will have to forego the legislation because it is outside the powers of a private member.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS AT HAMILTON AND NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. CAMPBELL (for Mr. Gibson) asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to provide in the Supplementary Estimates for the payment for extra services rendered by Mr. Hugh Murray and Mr. John C. Bartle whilst acting collector of customs at the ports of Hamilton and Niagara Falls, Ontario, respectively?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). I am not able to answer "yes"; at least at present, to that question.

STATION-MASTER AT ST. CHARLES, INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked:

1. Has one Castonguay, station-master on the Intercolonial Railway at St. Charles, county of Bellechasse, been dismissed from the service?
2. If so, for what reason?
3. By whom has he been replaced?
4. Upon whose recommendation was he dismissed?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, the services of Mr. Castonguay, station-master on the Intercolonial Railway at St. Charles, were dispersed with. 2. He was dismissed for taking an active and offensive part in the late elections. 3. He has been replaced by Mr. O. Bouchard, of St. Valier. 4. He was dismissed as the result of charges preferred against him by Mr. Talbot, M.P.

ARBITRATOR—SOULANGES CANAL.

Mr. BERGERON asked:

1. Have Messrs. A. McKuown, Duckett, of Co-teau Station, in Soulanges county, and Dr. Lalonde, of Rigaud, in Vaudreuil county, been appointed arbitrators on Soulanges Canal?
2. By whom were they appointed?
3. On whose recommendation?
4. What is the amount of their salary or fees?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Messrs. A. McKuown, R. Duckett and Dr. Lalonde have been appointed valuers on behalf of the Government to value lands taken for the Soulanges Canal. 2 and 3. By Order in Council on the report and recommendation of the Minister of Railways and Canals. 4. Their fees are ten dollars per day for each day so employed, as has been the customary allowance, and reasonable actual travelling expenses.

W. B. MOORE, EMPLOYEE ON THE INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. For what reasons were the services of W. B. Moore, fuel inspector on the Intercolonial Railway, dispensed with?
2. When were they dispensed with?
3. Has a successor been appointed?
4. If so, when was he appointed and what is his name?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). The services of Mr. W. B. Moore as fuel inspector on the Intercolonial Railway were dispensed with as the office has been abolished. No one has therefore been appointed in his place.

MUNICIPALITY OF AMQUI.

Mr. Fiset asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to return to the municipality of the parish of Amqui the sum of one hundred dollars, which that municipality was compelled to pay for the construction of a railway crossing within the parish?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). My attention has only been recently called to this matter, and I have not been able to look into it. I shall take pleasure in doing so at the earliest possible moment.

MR. DOBSON, POSTMASTER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

What is the date of the resignation of William Dobson as postmaster at Head of Tatamagouche, Colchester, N.S.? Has any one been appointed in his place? If so, what is the name of his successor, and when was he appointed? If no successor has been appointed, who keeps the office, and what are the charges, allowances or expenses for rent and services up to date?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. He resigned on the 29th May, 1896. 2. The office has been offered to Hugh Macdonald and John Dobson, who successively declined it. 3. There has been no successor. 4. The office is understood to be in charge of John Dobson at the present date. The salary attached to it is $28 per annum, which includes all charges, allowances and expenses.

THE BAIE DES CHALEURS RAILWAY.

Mr. PREFONTAINE (for Mr. Lemieux) asked :

Whether it is the intention of the Government to give effectual aid towards the extension of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway to Gaspé Basin? If so, is it the intention of the Government to cause the necessary surveys to be made as soon as the weather permits?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). When any responsible person or company submit to the Government a proposition for the extension of the Baie des Chaleurs Railway to Gaspé Basin, the Government will be disposed favourably to consider the project, with the view of determining how far it shall receive material assistance.

J. SPROTT STEWART, POSTMASTER.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (for Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked :

1. Has J. Sprott Stewart been dismissed or removed from the office of postmaster at Upper Musquodoboit, in the county of Halifax?
2. If so, has he been dismissed or removed for any, and what cause?
3. If he has been dismissed or removed for cause, has any, and what complaint or charge been made against him, and by whom has such charge or complaint been made?
4. Has any, and what investigation been held respecting the matter of any such complaint or charge, and what opportunity has been afforded him of answering any such complaint or charge?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). 1. He has been dismissed. 2. For offensive political partisanship. 3. He was dismissed on representation of Mr. B. Russell, M.P. 4. There was no investigation.

RAILWAY SUBSIDY, NOVA SCOTIA.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER (for Mr. Borden, Halifax) asked :

Has the Government given any promise or other assurance of a subsidy in aid of the construction of a railway from Sunny Brae, in the county of Pictou, to any and what place in the county of Halifax or in the county of Guysboro', in Nova Scotia?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No action has been taken by Government on the application for a subsidy in aid of the construction of a railway from Sunny Brae, in the county of Pictou, to any place in the county of Halifax or in the county of Guysborough.

COPYRIGHT ACT, 1889.

Mr. OSLER (for Mr. Ross Robertson) asked :

Has the Government further considered the Copyright Act of 1889? If so, what action has been taken in reference to the same?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In view of the many objections advanced by the Colonial Office in permitting the Act of 1889 to go into operation, the Government have not, up to the present, further pressed the subject on the attention of the Colonial Office.

IMPORTS FROM BELGIUM.

Mr. QUINN (for Mr. Monk) asked :

1. Have representations been made to the Government by the Belgian Consulate in Canada with a view to obtaining the reduction of customs duties now granted to British goods, upon all Belgian importations to Canada under the terms of the Anglo-Belgian treaty of 1863?

2. What action does the Government intend taking in regard to the claims put forth by importers of Belgian goods in Montreal that they are entitled to a reduction of duty in virtue of the above treaty?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The answer to the first question is "yes." In answering the second question, perhaps it would be satisfactory to the hon. gentleman and to the House, if I answered it by reading a communication that has been sent to the Belgian Consul, in reply to a letter received from him :

Ottawa, April 29th, 1897.

Consul General of Belgium, Montreal, P.Q.

Sir,—I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 24th instant, addressed to the Honourable Controller of Customs, with reference to a reduction of one-eighth of the duties on Belgium goods imported into Canada.

In reply, I am directed to state that the resolutions introduced into the House of Commons respecting the Reciprocal Tariff, provide :

That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the Reciprocal Tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein, at the reduced rates of duty provided in the Reciprocal Tariff set forth in Schedule D.

(a) That any questions that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the Reciprocal Tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

(b) That the Controller of Customs may make such regulations as are necessary for carrying out the intention of the two preceding sections.

The Hon. Controller of Customs is not satisfied that the customs tariff of Belgium is such as to entitle the country to the benefits of the Reciprocal Tariff, but he will be pleased to receive any information that you may wish to furnish on that subject.

The Hon. Controller is advised that the treaty to which you refer, relates to a condition of affairs which does not arise under the tariff resolutions now before the House of Commons.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

That letter is signed by the Commissioner of Customs.

GOVERNMENT COMMISSIONERS AND POLITICS.

Mr. QUINN (for Mr. Monk) asked :

1. Has D. A. Lafortune, advocate, of Montreal, been commissioned by the Government to hold an inquiry into the administration of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary?

2. Has Wilfrid Mercier, advocate, of Montreal, been commissioned by the Government to inquire into charges laid against Mr. Daoust, superintendent of St. Ann Lock, in Jacques Cartier county?

Mr. QUINN.

3. How much per day do these commissioners receive for expenses or otherwise?

4. Is the Government aware that both these commissioners are taking an active part in the provincial campaign in Quebec, and does the Government approve of such a course?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). G. A. Lafortune, advocate, of Montreal, has been commissioned by the Government to hold an inquiry into the administration of the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary. Wilfrid Mercier, advocate, of Montreal, has been commissioned to hold one of the inquiries, I cannot say whether it is into the case of Mr. Daoust or not. I cannot state at this moment the rate of remuneration they receive. The Government is not aware that these commissioners are taking an active part in the provincial campaign in Quebec.

INFRACTION OF INLAND REVENUE LAWS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Dugas) rose to ask :

Why was the sentence of imprisonment carried out against J. Jobin, of Pont Rouge, for an infraction of the Inland Revenue laws, and not against George Vézina, of Quebec, convicted under the same laws?

Mr. SPEAKER. Before this question is put, I assume, as it makes two positive statements, that these statements are the result of some answers already given in the House. Otherwise the question would not be in order.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I am ready to answer the question. J. Jobin was sentenced to imprisonment in January, 1896, and sentence was carried out in April, 1896, under the late Government. George Vézina was sentenced to imprisonment in March, 1896, and the sentence was not carried out. I am unable to explain why the late Government did not insist in carrying out the sentence in both cases.

DR. NAPOLEON LAVOIE.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (for Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Was Dr. Napoléon Lavoie, of L'Islet, commander of the SS. "Aberdeen," ever in the employ of the Government of Canada before in any other capacity?

2. If so, in what capacity?

3. Was he ever in command of the SS. "Lady Head"?

4. If so, was he dismissed from said position after investigation, and for what reason?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes, as commander of schooner "La Canadienne" and steamer "Lady Head." 2. Fishery officer in charge of the gulf division and commander of above named vessels. 3. Yes. 4.

Yes, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in 1879, reported that Commander Lavoie being vested at the time with supreme control of the ship "Lady Head" and directly responsible to the Government for the efficiency of the service it was his duty to secure qualified assistants, as his discretion in the choice of officers was unlimited and that he had selected and retained officers shown to be incompetent and inefficient, and failed to report their inefficiency, and that while the Minister recognized that Commander Lavoie, for many years had satisfactorily fulfilled important duties, it was deemed necessary in the public interest to visit his neglect of duty in not reporting the inefficiency of his subordinates with exemplary severity.

IMPORTS OF VENEERS.

Mr. WILSON (for Mr. Hughes) asked :

1. Have "veneers made from woods native to Canada" been entered at Bowmanville, Ont., during recent months by the Dominion Organ and Piano Company at less than the regular rate of duty?
2. What was the rate of duty previous to April 23rd on such articles?
3. What is it now?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. It has not been brought to the attention of the Department of Customs that the Dominion Organ and Piano Company have entered veneers made from woods native to Canada at Bowmanville, at less than the regular rate of duty within recent months. 2. The rate of duty previous to 23rd April, 1897, on veneers of wood not over one-sixteenth of an inch thick, made from woods native to Canada, was 10 per cent ad valorem—vide Item 368. 3. In the new tariff the classification of veneers is changed. Item 367 of the old tariff read as follows :—

Veneers of wood, n.e.s., not over one-sixteenth of an inch in thickness, 5 per cent ad valorem.

Item 368 of the old tariff read as follows :—

Veneers of wood, not over one-sixteenth of an inch thick, made from woods native to Canada, 10 per cent ad valorem.

Item 321 of the new tariff is the only item referring to veneers of wood, and it reads as follows :—

Veneers of wood, not over three-thirty-seconds of an inch in thickness, 10 per cent ad valorem.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—EXTENSION TO MONTREAL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the Government to the following statement contained in the Speech from the Throne :—

I have much satisfaction in informing you that arrangements have been concluded which, if you approve, will enable the Intercolonial Railway system to reach Montreal.

I would like to ask the hon. leader of the Government, a long time having elapsed since we had this positive declaration from the Throne that these arrangements had been concluded, if he would be good enough to lay on the Table of the House the papers in relation to the matter.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). As my hon. friend is aware, the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair) has been laid up for some time, and is not perhaps able to give an answer now. I shall be able at the next sitting of the House to say whether or not the papers will be brought down.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I think I may say to the hon. gentleman that the documents, which are in course of preparation, and which will have to be submitted, as between the two contracting parties, are not yet quite completed. Some of the important details of the negotiations are not finally agreed upon. We are making all possible speed in bringing matters to a head, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that there will be no unnecessary delay in presenting the whole matter to Parliament. At the earliest possible moment the papers will be laid on the Table. They have been somewhat delayed by my indisposition of the last three or four days, but I think perhaps towards the latter end of next week I may be able to furnish the House with the desired information.

"OUR LADY OF THE SNOWS."

Mr. DAVIN. A number of Canadians have requested me to bring before the House a protest on their part against a description of Canada that has now acquired world-wide fame; and if it be necessary, I shall put myself in order by making a motion. It is now of record in "Hansard" that a great poet, one with the finest ear for English music of any poet of the century, has designated this great Canada of ours, so varied in her resources and so manifold in her gifts, as "Our Lady of the Snows." A protest has appeared against that, written by a young Canadian poet in the "Star," and I have been asked to place it in "Hansard" as an antidote to what some, perhaps oversensitive among our people, consider the unjust, though well meant, description which has emanated from the great English poet :

"OUR LADY OF THE SNOWS."

A poet sung of a nation
In words that were kindly meant,
And his song on ethereal pulses
Throughout the Empire went.
It breathed the Imperial spirit
At which the bosom glows,
But he slurred the land that he fain had praised
As "Our Lady of the Snows."

She has lands unknown to summer,
 But she keeps them for a park
 For such as find little Europe
 Too small for ambition's mark.
 She keeps them to pleasure Nansen,
 For a Franklin to repose,
 But they lie remote from the marts and home
 Of "Our Lady of the Snows."

True, she has somewhere, sometime
 Winters when keen winds bite,
 And in the frosty heavens
 Gleams the auroral light ;
 When in the drifted forest
 She counts the ringing blows
 Of the axe that reaps a harvest
 For "Our Lady of the Snows."

But while the sturdy Briton
 Still shivers in east winds,
 The winter flees, and the rivers
 No more the ice king binds,
 And blossom calls unto blossom
 And each its fair form shows
 In the land that is called by Kipling
 "Our Lady of the Snows."

She has woods of pine and maple,
 Where England might be lost ;
 She has ports that are ever open
 To ships that are tempest tossed ;
 She has fields of wheat unbounded,
 Where the whole horizon glows,
 And the hot sun laughs to hear her styled
 "Our Lady of the Snows."

She has vineyards hanging heavy
 With clustering purple and white,
 And the velvet peach in its swaying nest
 Fills the gardener with delight.
 She can pluck, if she will, at Yuletide
 In the balmy air, the rose,
 And her people smile when they hear her called
 "Our Lady of the Snows."

The wire that brought that message
 On lightning under the sea
 Had been too short to bear it
 To her furthest boundary.
 Not by a heedless phrasing
 Of catchword, verse or prose,
 Can the truth be told of the vast domain
 Of "Our Lady of the Snows."

This country has in the past suffered from the idea prevalent in England that Canada is a land of snow, where one has to go around the whole time clad in furs to avoid being frozen, instead of a country endowed with the finest climate in the world. Canada is peculiarly attractive for many reasons, but for me—and that is the experience of every healthy man—her greatest attraction is her climate. Much as I enjoy her summer, I can safely say that her winters are no less enjoyable. Of course, when a great genius, one of the most marvellous literary men that England has produced, one of the most variously gifted literary men in the Empire, sends out a poem describing Canada as a country whose chief characteristic is that she is snow-bound, and describes her as par excellence, the Lady of the Snows, the designation cannot fail to have great influence. Why, it would be more correct, if one could find an apt and concise phrase, to describe her as rich in vineyards, rich in mines, rich in cornfields, rich in harbours, rich in broad and deep-flowing rivers and inland seas. It would require something of the felicitous genius for expression of the hon. First Minister to do full justice to the climate of Canada, and when a member of this House gives this poem a place in "Hansard," and title "Our Lady of the Snows," as though it were a fitting and correct description, I feel it necessary—and I do it at the request of prominent Canadians—to enrich "Hansard" with Mr. Weir's reply. It is not necessary to do it. The words of Lord Salisbury, if he spoke of Canada, would be widely read, as would the words of any of the leading masters of prose in England, but they would not be as universally read as the words of Rudyard Kipling, who has become one of the most widely welcomed writers in modern prose or poetry. I do not wish to be understood as resenting Mr. Kipling's song, which after all has a true inspiration, but it is absolutely necessary that we should protest against Canada being described to England and the world as Our Lady of the Snows, when we know she is rather a lady that basks in the brightest of summers, and who, either in winter or summer, is dowered with all that can render a country attractive and make life pleasant. I move, Mr. Speaker, the adjournment of the House.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not know that Mr. Rudyard Kipling's description of Canada as Our Lady of the Snows is the most apt he could have selected, but we are all accustomed to poetical exaggeration, and even this House has occasionally had evidence of it. We know that poets are very much given to license, and if they exaggerate or take license no one objects very seriously. So far, at all events, no one has objected, but I think I should interpose an objection now, and that is to allowing the business of the House to be taken up by the poets. We have had too many motions of adjournment similar to the present one during this session. In fact we have had some men, other than poets, rising to move the adjournment of the House and then taking their seats and forgetting the purpose they had risen for. I earnestly hope that we shall have less poetry and more business.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Is it not a fact that this phrase, "Our Lady of the Snows," applied to Canada, which the hon. gentleman regards as libellous, originated with a very distinguished member of the Conservative party?

Mr. McNEILL. I desire just to say a word with reference to what has fallen from my hon. friend on the other side of the House (Mr. Laurier). He referred yesterday to me as not having moved the adjournment when I said I would conclude with a motion, and he did so in terms which were not such as my hon. friend generally employs with regard to one who differs from him. He spoke as though I had deliberately failed to do something which I had promised to do. I wish to explain that yesterday the reason I did not move the adjournment was that you had called me to order, and I was obliged to sit down. At the first opportunity when my hon. friend referred to the matter, I at once rose and expressed my desire to comply with the promise if I had had an opportunity of doing so. Now, with regard to what my hon. friend has said—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried, carried.

Mr. McNEILL. Mr. Speaker, if one is not allowed to make a few observations—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL. We have certain rights here, though we are in Opposition; and I do not think the business of the House will be in any degree advanced by unseemly interruptions—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL. At least, it will not so far as I am personally concerned, I can assure my hon. friends very distinctly of that. I was going to make a very brief observation in relation to this matter, but if my hon. friends desire I can make a number of observations, and make them at length. I do not wish to do so. I was about to say simply this—that whether the expression "Our Lady of the Snows" be the happiest expression or not, at all events, it would seem from the verses that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) read here to-day that Canada may well be described as the lady in whose breast patriotism glows. But I would say that I do think, for my own part, that we have been, perhaps, a little too sensitive with regard to these remarks as to the snows of Canada. I do not think that when Kipling referred to Canada as "Our Lady of the Snows" he indicated in any degree that the fact of our having snow here was a disadvantage to this country, because I know that the feeling of many in England is that our winters are most enjoyable winters, that the feeling is that this snow of ours is something the enjoyment of which they would like to participate in. I venture to think that we have been just a little too sensitive in reference to this matter.

Mr. QUINN. In answer to the inquiry made by the Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding). I think that I can safely state that the expression "Our Lady of the Snows" did not originate in Canada at all. It is quite true that it was immortalized in verse by a renowned Canadian statesman, Hon. Thomas D'Arcy McGee, whose fame, not only as a poet but as a statesman I am sure will last. We are proud to recognize him as a Conservative statesman and we hope that the present Government and the party it represents will give to the country somebody who will lay as high a claim to be held in the honoured and grateful memory of the people as the departed statesman—McGee.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am happy, indeed, to find that the poetical expression and the title given by the great poet to one of his last songs, has been the cause of a very interesting debate, and a very interesting half-hour given by the House of Commons to a discussion of the last work of Mr. Kipling. I also feel very glad, indeed, to know that this is one of the occasions which has brought back to the memory of the Parliament of Canada, the name of the Hon. D'Arcy McGee. We were proud of him when he was living amongst us; he did a work which nobody can possibly forget, and in view of the manner in which his career was brought to an end, it is to patriotic Canadians always a pleasure to hear the name of D'Arcy McGee spoken in this House. But I do not think that my hon. friend for Montreal (Mr. Quinn)—almost his successor in parliamentary life—has even yet reached the real source of the name given by Kipling to his last song. I will read, on that point, an extract from the Catholic "Register":

The poet Kipling's greeting to Canada, published in the London "Times" and cabled over on Wednesday, is an inspired production. But—do not mention it in Gath—the inspiration is decidedly Romish. The phrase "Our Lady of the Snows" is one familiar to every Catholic, as the name of one of the popular feasts of the Church in the Eternal City, and as recalling one of the most poetic and beautiful narratives of simple faith to be found in religious literature. There can be no doubt that Mr. Kipling went to Rome for the title and chord of his song; but we should not say he is a plagiarist, because we are delighted to know that a familiar Catholic phrase can inspire him to one of his best efforts.

Now, Sir, that is what I wanted to bring before the notice of the House. I see no reason at all why Canada should not be called the Lady of the Snows. She is the lady who is known throughout the Empire as being one of the progressive nations on this continent. I think that so far as our winters are concerned, we have, as my hon. friend has said, no reason to complain. I am quite satisfied to find that in this Jubilee year, Mr. Kipling, in singing a song in praise of Canada, has selected for the title of his song, Our Lady of the Snows.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

LOBSTER FISHING IN CAPE BRETON.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I desire to call the attention of the Minister of the Marine and Fisheries to a matter of some importance in the island of Cape Breton. No doubt he has seen a very numerous-signed petition which has been forwarded from that district in connection with the proposal to extend the season for fishing lobsters. I recollect in my time that this was a subject of considerable difficulty; and I have no doubt that the Minister will find in his way some of those difficulties which I had to encounter. But, taking into consideration the very peculiar hardships on that coast in connection with the drift ice, the department, in my time, was enabled, on several occasions, to make an exception in connection with the duration of the season. The season, I believe, ordinarily ends about the 15th of July, and the petitioners are anxious to have that extended to the 1st of August, so that they really ask fifteen days additional. But, in order that there shall not be too much drain on the lobster fishery in that district, I understand that they are willing to submit to a regulation by which they are not to begin so early as the fishermen in the other districts, that is to say, they will cut off from the earlier part of the season until the 1st of May, provided they get those fifteen days additional. Now, the hon. gentleman, of course, is in possession of information of considerable importance in this matter to which I have no access, that is to say, the reports of his officers. Since my time I can quite understand that the subject is placed more clearly before him by the great experience of the officers of the district, in so far as investigation has gone, touching the condition of the lobster fishery for that particular time. It is, of course, a point to consider whether, in those fifteen days, the berried lobsters are in such a condition that it would be destroying or affecting the permanency of the lobster industry. I therefore rise in order to impress upon him, by calling attention to the subject in this manner, the great importance of dealing with that subject as promptly as possible. No one knows better than the hon. gentleman himself, coming as he does from Prince Edward Island, how important it is that the parties interested in this matter should have an early intimation of the decision of the hon. gentleman. If the hon. gentleman can see his way to do it, I should be obliged if he would bring down such recent reports as he may have in his possession touching upon the condition of the fishery in that district, and any points touching the condition of the lobsters during the month of July, and particularly the last fifteen days of that month.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The question the hon. gentleman has raised is one of supreme importance, and I have not yet reached the conclusion that it would be in the public interest to extend the open season which the law now fixes at the 15th of July, although I do not mean to say that my mind is absolutely closed upon the subject. But the hon. gentleman is aware that last year I called a meeting of a number of the lobster packers for the purpose of ascertaining, if I could, what their view was upon the subject, and what the real facts were which could be gathered from practical men. There was a great deal of difference of opinion. We are now in this peculiar position, that this enormous industry which brings in so much wealth to Canada, is in danger of being destroyed. Our American cousins to the south have absolutely destroyed their lobster fishing industry along the coast of Maine by recklessly permitting lobsters to be caught at all seasons of the year. I would impress upon the hon. gentlemen from the maritime provinces the great importance, the supreme importance, in my humble opinion, of maintaining, even at the risk of temporary unpopularity, those provisions which are essential for the preservation of that great industry. Personally, I would like very much if I could see my way—and I am in almost daily consultation with my adviser upon that subject, Mr. Prince—I would like very much if I could see my way to grant the request of those gentlemen. But I have never yet been able to bring my mind to admit the justice of the claim they put forward, that there must be the same number of days allowed to the fishing industry in each locality. Nature will prevent the fishermen in some localities from beginning as early as nature permits them to begin in others; but it does not follow, to my mind at all, as a sequence that they should be permitted to continue beyond that limit. And there is this very grave objection which I state now frankly to the hon. gentleman and to the House—for I have no doubt the matter will be discussed by maritime men before the session is much older—that if I grant a concession to the fishermen along the eastern coast of Cape Breton, I will be forced to grant a similar concession to a great many lobster fishermen in other places. The department is inundated with petitions and demands from fishermen along the north shore of New Brunswick, the south shore of Prince Edward Island, as well as the east shore of Cape Breton, asking for this same concession. I know the difficulty of resisting it. I am overwhelmed with personal appeals and official applications from day to day, and week to week.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Circumstances are very different in different localities, are they not?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, circumstances are very different. In the examination that I made of that question last year, I found that before coming into office, I think I came in on the 13th of July, that my predecessor had extended the time to the 1st of August—I think it was. Of course, not being in possession of the official information on which

I could act, and being a new-comer there, I simply continued his decision, I enforced his decision, and gave them the continuation. If that had not been done, there were many fishermen along the north shore of Nova Scotia and the south shore of Prince Edward Island who would not have caught any fish at all, their season's work would have been absolutely fruitless. There is no doubt that they caught an immense quantity of fish during the fifteen days that the open season was extended, but I am afraid they caught this number of fish to improve their personal position very largely at the expense of the lobster industry. We are now reaching this crucial point in the discussion and the decision of this question, whether we will conserve the industry as a whole at the expense of individual interests who desire the extension, or whether the continuance and maintenance of the industry is to be the paramount object we have in view, although the continuance of that industry and the refusal to extend the time may personally injure a number of those who at present have their money invested in it. The hon. gentleman is aware that last year we had a scientific gentleman, Dr. McPhail, of Montreal, who, I think, was appointed by my predecessor, but whom, at any rate, I was pleased to be able to confirm in the appointment, and to give him all the assistance I could after I came in, and he has made a very scientific and exhaustive examination of this question. I have not got his report in a condition to present it to Parliament yet, but as soon as I am in a position to do so, I will be very glad to bring down all the reports that I can. I may conclude with repeating the remark that I made at first, that while I have not decided against granting the petition, still my mind leans in that direction, because I feel that if I grant the extension in that place I will have to grant it all round the coast, excepting along the south-east coast of Nova Scotia, where they do not ask it, because they could not use it profitably. The matter is a very important one, and I can assure the hon. gentleman it is engaging my very best attention.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to the scientific reports. I would be very much obliged if he could allow me to see any reports that he may have in regard to these past extensions: for instance, the character of the lobster taken in those last fifteen days, whether they were in a berried condition or not; and also as to whether the size of the lobster is running small or maintaining the average. Those were features that weighed with the department, and no doubt weigh with it now. Some of the best coast lobsters run very small-sized, indeed, showing depletion and exhaustion. In Cape Breton, the cases that used to come before me showed that the fish there, for obvious reasons, one being that they cannot fish with the same advantages in all the months open to other districts, were maintaining their size fairly, and if he has any information of that kind, it would be very useful to the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The evidence before the department on that point is most conflicting. We had the opinion of a great many gentlemen, but I have not found any preponderating weight of evidence in one direction or another. I have no objection whatever to furnish the information to the hon. gentleman. The subject is one of great importance, and I should be delighted if the hon. gentleman will give me the benefit of his great experience in the matter.

QUARANTINE MEASURES AT VICTORIA, B. C.

Mr. PRIOR. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government, and especially of the Minister of Agriculture, to a paragraph which appeared in this morning's Ottawa "Citizen," and which I will read:

Vancouver, B.C., April 30th.—William's Head Quarantine, off Victoria, is to-day a village with a population of over one thousand persons, including two doctors, the Marquis of Breadalbane, and many hundred Chinese, all living in an atmosphere laden with sulphur. The place became populated very suddenly yesterday, on the arrival of the steamer "Empress of China" from the Orient, flying a yellow flag at the masthead, indicating there was small-pox on board. Every one who came in contact with the steamer, as well as passengers and crew, numbering over three hundred, and eight hundred Chinese, were at once transferred to quarantine by the health officer, Dr. Watt, who has telegraphed to Victoria that the whole outfit will be kept prisoners for fourteen days. The accommodations, in spite of the recent improvements, are ridiculously short for the enormous crowd. Large consignments of provisions were sent over at once, but there is much grumbling and growling.

Every precaution known to science is being taken to prevent the spread of the disease. The steamer will not be allowed to move, unless the company secures a new crew two hundred strong to man her. This is impossible on short notice, consequently, as the steamer is heavily freighted and the passenger list is unusually large, the expense will be enormous, and the shipping interests of every city on the coast, as well as many inland, will be affected.

Later.—Owing to the crowded state of quarantine, the authorities have allowed a steamer to be chartered to accommodate the first-class passengers, chiefly the ladies.

I am sorry to take up the time of the House, but this is a matter which I think of some moment to the country. I may say there is a feeling of insecurity on the coast at the present time in reference to quarantine matters, owing in large measure, I think, to the fact that the last ship that came into Victoria flying the yellow flag, showing that small-pox was on board, was quarantined, and a very short time afterwards a few cases of small-pox were found in Victoria, Port Townsend, and also in Seattle, and naturally very many people believed, and I believe myself, that the small-pox came from that ship. I am not at all prepared to say that the present superintendent of quarantine, Dr. Watt, did not do his duty. I do not know; I sincerely hope he did so, and carried out the instructions and regulations of the department in a vigorous and strict manner. But I should like to know from the Minister of Agriculture whether strict orders have been given to that officer to carry out the quarantine regulations in their entirety. William's Head quarantine station is, as the Minister knows and many other hon. members know, the most important quarantine station in Canada to-day, not excepting Grosse Isle, in view of the rapidly increasing communication with China and Japan, and the large trade existing between those two countries and British Columbia. There are many large vessels running regularly, there are at the present time three important lines of steamers running from Victoria regularly, once a month; the Canadian Pacific Railway vessels go up to Vancouver, but the others go only to Victoria, and there is always small-pox latent in China and Japan. The quarantine buildings were constructed two or three years ago by the late Government; they are very fine buildings, the site is a magnificent one, and in fact there could not be better buildings or a finer site. But I am sorry to say there is not properly furnished accommodation for a large number of first-class passengers, such as are now quarantined at that station. The accommodation for steerage passengers is, I believe, pretty good, there being plenty of room; but for first-class passengers it is very bad indeed. I do not know whether there are sufficient beds and bedding and proper facilities to maintain a large number of first-class passengers there, and it is unpleasant to think that delicate ladies, many of whom have suffered from sea sickness from the long voyage, and men accustomed to all the luxuries of the day, should be suddenly quarantined in a station without any accommodation beyond bare boards. I only hope the Minister will see that as quickly as possible the quarantine station is placed in first-class condition. It may cost some money, but it is an expenditure that would not raise a debate in this House. I wish to say also that it was rumoured in town yesterday that owing to the influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the Minister of the Department of Agriculture had telegraphed that first-class passengers might be allowed to go free. I know that every one is very sorry indeed that the Canadian Pacific Railway, with its magnificent steamers, should suffer tremendous loss from those steamers being kept in quarantine; but beyond and above all this, we must first think of the public health, and I am sure the Minister will be ready to attend to it. I would ask the hon. Minister whether the superintendent at the quarantine station has strict instructions to carry out the rules, regardless of the expense that may be entailed on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other company?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Prior) informed me a little while ago, almost immediately on my return to the city after a few days' absence, that he would bring this matter up. The matter has been dealt with by the department in my absence, I think efficiently, so as to show that the department is well able to manage affairs of this kind, however important they may be or however suddenly they may arise. The statement which the hon. gentleman read from a morning paper is one which reflects great credit on the ingenuity of the publisher of that paper in putting forward a flaring and attractive heading and article; but at the same time the statements therein contained are hardly consistent with the facts of the case, as I think the hon. member must be very well aware.

Mr. PRIOR. No.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The facts as they appear from the telegrams, are as follows:—The "Empress of China" arrived with two cases of small-pox on board. There were 106 first-class passengers, 34 intermediate, and these, together with the steerage passengers and the officers and crew, made a total of 963. As a matter of fact the regulations require that when vessels arrive with contagious disease on board, they shall be detained. The regulations require that the officer in charge of the quarantine station at the port shall exercise his discretion, within the regulations and under certain rules, as to how much detention shall be made, and what passengers shall be subjected to that detention. It is well known that as regards small-pox the period of incubation is about 12 days. It happened in the present case that small-pox was found on the ship nine days before its arrival at Victoria. The passengers afflicted with the disease were immediately isolated, and the other passengers and crew, and indeed all on board were vaccinated seven days before the ship arrived in Victoria. The result was that, practically speaking, the other passengers were liable to supervision and careful watching until the ordinary period of incubation would be passed, which is, according to the dates I have received, to-day. The officer in charge did detain the vessel. He investigated the cases, he examined carefully to see whether all the passengers had been vaccinated, as was stated by the officers of the ship, and he found, as I understand, that they had been all so vaccinated. It is necessary for him in order to ensure the safety of the people of the city and of the country that contagious disease should not be allowed to spread; but it seems that the period of incubation having passed over, and the individuals affected having been entirely isolated, the rest of the people might safely be allowed to pass on with freedom. The doctor in charge of the quarantine at William's Head decided to keep the vessel there until the period of incubation of the disease should have been passed. He was given instructions from here to use his judgment, as to what danger there would be and to see that all precautions were taken. That judgment, I believe, he will exercise and act according to. I may say, that the gentleman who is in charge of the station is one who has for a long time occupied an official position in the province of British Columbia. It is true, that it is only a short time since he has been in the position which he now holds. Circumstances which occurred there required a change of officer in the quarantine service, and as a consequence this new officer was appointed not long since. Dr. Watt who now holds the position, was the provincial health officer for the province of British Columbia.

Mr. PRIOR. He was not the provincial health officer; he was the secretary of the Provincial Board of Health.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. "Secretary of the Provincial Board of Health," was the exact designation of his office. As a matter of fact, he was in charge of the public health of the province. He was appointed to the office which he now holds, and has gone to reside at William's Head, the quarantine station at Victoria. The officer who was in charge before did not reside at William's Head, but resided in the city of Victoria.

Mr. PRIOR. You are a little off there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) says I am wrong, but I think the hon. gentleman himself is mistaken. Dr. Macnaughton Jones, who was for a number of years the quarantine officer at William's Head, resided at William's Head, but Dr. Macnaughton Jones died a year ago, and the friends of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) appointed Dr. Duncan to that position, but Dr. Duncan never resided at William's Head.

Mr. PRIOR. I beg your pardon, Dr. Duncan did reside at William's Head. I should know a little about it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. My information is to the contrary.

Mr. PRIOR. Your information is wrong upon all points.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That remains to be seen. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) can prove that my information is wrong upon all points, I will be glad to give him an opportunity of doing so, and I will bring the documents to show that the information I am giving to the House is correct. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) has spoken about the importance of William's Head as a quarantine station. I fully realize that. I believe it is one of the most important quarantine stations in the Dominion. In consequence of the fact that we have constant communication between Victoria and China and Japan, where unfortunately there is more danger of acquiring contagious disease than there is from most of the countries with which we have communication. As a consequence of this, a few months ago, I sent Dr. Montizambert, chief quarantine officer of the Dominion, to carefully investigate this station and to see that every possible improvement both in the apparatus and in the buildings should be carried out, so as to put that station on a perfectly satisfactory basis. Dr. Montizambert made a report to me, which I have in my hand, asking for certain improvements, and I am informed that these improvements have already to a considerable extent been carried out. They were extensive in their nature and somewhat costly, but they are being carried out as rapidly as the officers of the Public Works Department in British Columbia can carry them out. A hydrochloric tank has already been put there. There has been erected a shed upon the wharf for the accommodation of passengers when they land, and where their baggage may be examined and, if necessary, disinfected. The steam chamber in the disinfecting house on the wharf has been lined so as to make it more effective in its work; trolley cars have been supplied, and a number of small matters in the way of lighting the wharf, and supplying necessary material for the apparatus, have been attended to. The shower and needle baths for the saloon passengers, and for the Chinese and Japanese passengers, are at present in process of construction. In addition to that, iron bedsteads of a particular pattern (which have been used for some years at Grosse Isle quarantine station with great advantage, being very easy to disinfect and keep clean), have been ordered to be sent out to the William's Head quarantine station, and some furniture for the station is also under order. The result is that in a short time the quarantine station at William's Head will be most effective and most complete in all its arrangements and all its apparatus.

It is true that one or two instances of detention have occurred there in consequence of the epidemic of small-pox which has been in existence in Japan. I am sure that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) who represents the city of Victoria, would be the last to wish that anything should be done which would endanger the health of the people of his city or of the province of British Columbia. It is true that representations have been made by the Canadian Pacific Railway, asking that as little detention as possible should be given to their steamers on arrival at that port, but neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor anybody else of authority in the country has asked that anything should be done which would at all endanger the health of the people, or give any opportunity for the introduction of disease into that country. I may tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Prior) that whatever he may think, or whatever rumours he may imagine have been started, there is no foundation whatever in the idea which he seems to insinuate has been expressed, and perhaps thinks is true, that through the influence of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, exceptional privileges have been given to anybody at the quarantine station at William's Head, or elsewhere. This explanation is perhaps complete enough to satisfy the hon. member (Mr. Prior) that everything calculated to make the quarantine station at William's Head complete, is being carried out as rapidly as possible. A great deal of the improvements have already been accomplished, and there will be nothing done to interfere unnecessarily with the traffic between China and Japan and the city of Victoria.

But at the same time, in the interest of the public health, it is absolutely necessary on certain occasions—and I think this occasion is one—that a proper period of incubation of the disease should be allowed to pass before even the saloon passengers should be allowed to land, and perhaps occasion danger to the community in which the hon. gentleman lives.

Mr. PRIOR. Might I be allowed to make an explanation. The hon. the Minister must have known that I made no charge whatever against Dr. Watt. I specially stated that I was not prepared to make any charge against Dr. Watt, and I do not see why the Minister made out that I had. The hon. the Minister stated that I knew this account was exaggerated. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I simply read it in the newspaper, and I knew nothing else about it, and that is the reason I asked for information. How could I know it was exaggerated? I thought it was a correct account of what had taken place, and that is the reason I asked for information upon it. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Fisher) also said that I insinuated that the Canadian Pacific Railway influence had been brought to bear. I simply said that I had heard the rumour. As this was of such tremendous importance to my constituents, I thought I was right in saying that I heard the rumour, and in asking what action had been taken by the Government.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The rumour is unfounded.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might be allowed—

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) must bear in mind that no general discussion is possible at this stage of the proceedings. This was a very urgent matter, and it has now been referred to in the House at considerable length by the hon. member who raised the point and the Minister who replied. No general debate can possibly be allowed upon it now. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Maxwell) has a mere question to ask, or a statement of a very brief character to make on this matter, perhaps the House would hear him, but it must not be enlarged into a discussion or debate.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAILS.

Mr. MARTIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Government—I am sorry the hon. the Postmaster General is not in his place—to the fact that we have had no mail from Prince Edward Island for about a week. I would like to ask if the Government is aware of this condition of things? It is not very often that we are a week behind in getting news from that part of the Dominion at this season of the year, especially as we have a new boat, the "Petrel." What has happened her? I would like to ask if the Government have any information as to the cause of the delay?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). In the absence of the Postmaster General, I may simply say that it is impossible for an answer to be given to the hon. gentleman, but I have no doubt that every precaution is being taken to overcome as rapidly as possible the difficulties he has pointed out.

BANK NOTE CONTRACT.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the acting Prime Minister if that note contract is brought down yet, or is in a position to be brought down? I am very anxious to have it.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I cannot say in the absence of the Prime Minister, when it will be brought down, but I have no doubt that it will be as soon as possible.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Fielding:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair, for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, the prolongation of the debate on the Budget may perhaps be excused, considering the number of incidental proceedings that go on each day before we arrive at it. On some days those proceedings consist of boring operations. On other days we strike a gusher. This has been one of the gusher days, and perhaps not so tedious on that account.

Coming to the actual question before us, I may say that this is not the time to discuss it in much detail. It is the general policy of the Government which is before us. To my mind the strongest justification of that policy is the manner in which it has been received by the Opposition. To use the language of the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) on another occasion, this policy appears to have fallen like a bombshell in their ranks. They have been at a loss how to criticise it. In fact, up to date there has been hardly anything worthy of the name of criticism from that side of the House.

The hon. member for York, N. B. (Mr. Foster), the financial leader of the Opposition, has taken a sneering tone. The hon. leader of the Opposition, who has to play second to him in a financial discussion, has taken the growling tone. The member for York has taken the yah-yah line of opposition; the leader of the Opposition has taken the bow-wow line. The two hon. gentlemen seem to have different conceptions of their own individuality and of the line they ought to take in this discussion. The member for York has been long misled by his own natural advantages. His undoubted resemblance to the ordinary stage presentation of Faust's creation of Mephistopheles in the drama of Faust has led him to believe for a long time back that he could play the part of a sneering spirit in that immortal drama. It seems to have been his opinion for years back that he is the very Mephistopheles in debate—that he could play the very Mephistopheles with the arguments of his opponents.

Mr. DAVIN. There is no such work as "Faust's Mephistopheles."

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend has tripped me up when I did not trip, for I specially mentioned the drama of "Faust," written by Goethe, in which this character occurs. This hon. gentleman, who plays the part of Mephistopheles with the arguments of his opponents, works up his sarcasm in his hands just as a farmer's wife might work up a pat of butter in the old days before we had the latest butter working machinery; he rolls it and pats it between his palms; and finally offers it to the House on the tips of his fingers, and expects that to end the whole question. That is the line of the Mephistopheles of debate.

The leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, seems to fancy himself in the character of the favorite old watch-dog, who growls whenever the interests of our poor suffering industries are in his opinion attacked. He is always on the watch to bay the Government, or the moon, or anything else that he thinks threatens the interests of those suffering industries. We have seen him on a former occasion ready to fight—yes, ready to die—for a particular principle which was before the House. It is hardly more than a year since on the floor of this House he declared himself ready to die for the sake of carrying the Remedial Bill then before us, the policy which since the opening of this session he has dropped his interest in, and surrendered it to the enemy. So the sincerity of his growl in defence of the suffering industries may be subject to a little doubt on this occasion.

These gentlemen see ghosts in the tariff, because, as they see opposite things in it, the things they see can not really be there. The member for York believes that this is a protectionist policy. He thinks he sees in it the ghost of the old clothes he used to wear when Minister of Finance—the ghostly rags and tatters of the National Policy clinging about the form of this tariff; and he objects to that. He does not like to be revisited by the ghost of the National Policy. The leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, thinks he sees in it free trade in sheep's clothing, so to speak. He thinks he sees in it the introduction of the thin edge of the wedge of free trade. About twenty years ago I had the pleasure of hearing that hon. gentleman denounce a policy introduced by a Liberal Government on this side of the House, because he said it introduced the thin edge of the wedge of protection. So that it seems he is always seeing the thin edges of wedges in any policy introduced by a Liberal Government; and his opposition does not depend on what the nature of the wedge is, so much as on the personality of those who introduce it. I am happy to agree with him in this particular instance to some extent. I believe this tariff is a step in the direction of freer trade, at all events, though it can scarcely be called a free trade tariff; and for that reason I am the more inclined to give it my support.

But all this discussion around and about the tariff, for we can hardly call it a discussion of the tariff, leads us to speak of the methods of tariff making employed by the two parties who have had control of the business of this country. The National Policy, as introduced by Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879, was admittedly the product of Yankee experts imported from Washington for the occasion. There was nobody in Canada who knew the ins and outs of protection sufficiently to frame a tariff for the Conservative party at that time. The tariff endured in substantially the same shape until 1887. In that year the tariff was the sole production of the autocrat himself who now leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper), a man, I cannot say of blood and iron, although that tariff was emphatically an iron tariff, but it may be correct to say, having due reference to the nature of the proceeding by which iron is smelted, that he was a man of blast and iron—an autocrat of iron furnaces. It was he who framed the tariff of 1887, and he framed it all apparently out of his own head, just as the cook on board a ship on which I once travelled made his puddings, because there was not the least sign of any other influence in it than his own.

The tariff of 1894 introduced by the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) when Finance Minister, was admittedly not framed by the Government at all, but by the Manufacturers Association of Canada. At any rate that was the assertion made at the annual meeting of the association in 1895. At that meeting they stated that they had sent a brief to the Finance Minister, and that he had accepted it and carried out what they had told him to do, and they published this statement in a circular which they sent to the members of this House. I read that circular in this House in the session of 1895, and it was afterwards read by other members, and the then Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) never ventured to contradict the statement of the Manufacturers Association that it was they who practically had made his so-called revised tariff.

Now, what about the tariff of 1897? The method of that tariff making has been already discussed, and I shall merely say in general terms, that it was the result of a prolonged search for information, in the first place. As I had the pleasure of being present on several occasions where the tariff commission was sitting, I am able to bear witness to the fact that the business men in the localities where the commission held sittings, were, without exception, satisfied with the manner in which that inquiry was conducted. They were convinced that they were dealing, not only with members of the Government, but with business men as well, fully capable of appreciating all the facts and arguments put before them in connection with the framing of a new tariff. The sittings of that commission were open to farmers and consumers of all kinds as well as manufacturers. There was full inquiry, followed by long conferences between the members of the commission and the members of the Cabinet; and judging from the fact that our Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) was so overwhelmed with work, in the last few days before the tariff came down, I do not suppose he and his colleagues were able to finish the work absolutely until within a day or so of the delivery of the Budget speech. These gentlemen had obtained full information and given it mature consideration before coming to a conclusion.

The tariff, on the face of it, bears traces of mutual concessions on the part of those who wished to retain high protection and those who wished to approach very closely to free trade or at least a tariff for revenue only. The making of mutual concessions was inevitable under the circumstances. We had been for eighteen years under a policy of protection, a policy of isolation, a policy which enervated and stunted the business life of this community. After having been submitted to eighteen years of that system, the business of this country was not in a position to stand that degree of freedom which it might have stood otherwise. Concession, therefore, was necessary. Protection for eighteen years, as I have said, had enervated and stunted the national life of Canada, and the stunting of the early growth of a nation, like the stunting of the early growth of a man or an animal, is something very hard to remedy in after years. If a colt, or a calf, or a child, or anything else is stunted while small, it is very hard to enable it to ever attain its natural growth. I say, therefore, that after eighteen years of protection, the national life of Canada became not only stunted and narrowed for the present but seriously injured as regards the possibilities of our attaining to the full growth of a nation.

I claim that in the period of protection which so injured us, no great natural industry, no new national industry, sprang into life, that the only industries which flourished were the natural ones which were not protected, and that its only effect on the existing manufactures of the country was to create monopolies in the hands of a few rich manufactures rather than to extend our manufacturing trade or build up anything new. But the worst of it was that it left us in a condition unfit for full freedom of action. The manufacturers are not the only people of Canada who were injured by it in their manhood. All the Canadian people had acquired the habit of waiting for Providence, or, in other words, the Government of the day, to do something for them. They had lost the habit of individual enterprise; they had lost the ability to struggle in free competition with the rest of the world. Protection has often been compared to a hot-bed system or the growth of tender plants under glass in a conservatory. That is a very appropriate comparison. We have also heard our industries described as infants, and we are to suppose these infants to have been in the nursery for eighteen years. What has been the effect on these infants and tender plants of fostering them in this way for eighteen years? Sir, they are not able to stand a draught of cool air, not to speak of the cold air which should blow upon them in order to render them really strong and vigorous. An infant puffed up with fat, it may be, but weak in vitality, is not fit to play in the same yard with other infants of the same age. The hot-house orchids or exotic pets, which have been the favourites of our hon. friends opposite for so many years, cannot stand the ordinary climate of Canada, about which we had so much discussion this afternoon. They have to be protected still longer, at the risk of losing them altogether, and, Sir, though I am a free trader on principle, and if we cannot get free trade, a revenue man on principle, I still have to admit the force of the contention that these poor little industries, which have been protected nearly to death by hon. gentlemen opposite, are not fit to go out in their nakedness and stand the Canadian climate without some shreds of protection being left on them.

Yet when I come to criticise the tariff on my own account, as I propose to do, though in a very friendly spirit, I shall have to contend that the Government of the day perhaps had a little too much consideration for these tender pets when they were framing their tariff. Looking at the maximum tariff, or general schedule, we find that a great many taxes are retained which are strictly protective and highly protective in their nature. I confess that I had hoped that the Government would have found it possible to make reductions in many directions in which they have not made them. If they have erred in this respect, however, I am satisfied that it has been from tenderness of heart towards the weanlings which have not yet been weaned, and from the fear that, if these were subjected to such treatment as the members of the Government individually would think wholesome and good for them, the poor children might possibly be lost in the experiment. So, although I think the Government might fairly have made a further reduction all round in that maximum tariff, I am inclined to give them credit for the best intentions and am by no means inclined to withdraw my confidence from them, even if we were to consider the maximum tariff by itself.

But the maximum schedule is not the whole of this tariff proposal, it is not, to my mind, the main portion of it. Even with the imperfect reductions which the Government have seen their way to make, it must be admitted that the new tariff gives us very considerable relief in many directions. The reduction of the duty on iron, will, undoubtedly, give most considerable relief to those who use iron, and that means, practically, the whole community. The reduction of the duty on coal oil, with regard to which a good deal has been said already, certainly gives a measure of relief—17½ per cent seems to be a very considerable measure of relief. Our friends of the coal oil industry tell us also that the regulations that have been removed effect a further reduction of 2 cents in the duty. So that, looking at it from a coal oil refiner's standpoint—and they ought to know the facts of the case—we have had, virtually, a reduction of one-half of the tax on coal oil. That, it must be admitted, is a very considerable and material relief to the users of this article.

Mr. DAVIN. How does my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) make that out? I would like to have him explain.

Mr. CASEY. My hon. friend must excuse me, because I do not undertake to make it out at all. I have told the House that there is a reduction of 1 cent on the duty, and the manufacturers of coal oil say that the relaxation of the regulations about importation in tanks will compel a reduction as great as would have been effected by further reduction of 2 cents on the duty. This makes a total of 3 cents, or one half the duty, if the contention of the coal oil refiners is correct.

Referring to the iron schedule, I cannot pass over the question of bounty without a word. I am very glad to see that the Government have adopted the bounty system rather than a high protective duty as a means of encouraging our iron industries. That these should be encouraged in some way, I think even the strongest free trader must admit. We have vast deposits of iron ore, but it is a peculiarity of iron mining that these deposits can be developed in a paying manner only on a very large scale, and iron can only be produced cheaply on a very large scale. It is evident, therefore, that the people who have the necessary capital to go into the exploiting of mines and smelting of ore cannot be induced to undertake the work on that scale without assistance, and it is necessary that the public should do something for them. If the development of natural resources is to be promoted at all, I think it is much safer and much fairer and better in every way to do it by a bounty than a high protective tax. I am therefore pleased to find that the Government have found the way to encourage the production without taxing all the consumers of iron to the extent that was done under the former tariff. It is not fair that the consumers of any particular article should bear the whole cost of encouraging its production. The development of our iron mines is for the good of the country at large, and the people at large should contribute for it, and not only those who use specially large quantities of iron.

But, coming to the reciprocal tariff, or differential schedule, or whatever it may be called, I confess that I find in this the gist of the fiscal policy of the Government. I think that the introduction of this policy is nothing less than a stroke of genius on the part of those who framed this tariff, or on the part of those who originally evolved the idea that these gentlemen have had the courage to put into practice. For the policy is not a new one in principle, though it is new in the method of application. The policy of providing that goods coming from Great Britain should be especially favoured was adopted as the Liberal policy as long as five years ago. It was voted for by every Liberal in the House, in support of a motion moved by my hon. friend who is now the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), and it has remained the policy of our party ever since. But this application of the principle to the tariff scheme is a thing for which the credit is due to those who have framed this particular tariff, and I think the method by which it has been applied justifies my statement that this tariff is a stroke of genius in this regard.

The first comparison that occurs to our minds for this preferential tariff is with the so-called preferential scheme with which our friends on the other side have seen fit to identify themselves. I say "identify themselves," for I take it for granted that when the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) moved a resolution the other day in the British Empire League to ask for preferential trade relations with the mother country, he definitely committed himself and his party to that as their platform. Now, let us compare the two platforms. The Liberal platform says to the mother country: You have been admitting our goods free for many years, you have been giving us favours in other respects—you have been protecting us with your army and navy, you have been standing between us and those who bully us or take advantage of us; now, it is our turn to do a little something for you, and we propose to do it by admitting your goods at a rate 25 per cent less than the goods of countries that have not shown us special favours. Here is a free offer of considerable privileges to the mother country. But, on the other hand, the British Empire League and the Conservative party seem to have limited themselves to the one idea that we must get something out of Great Britain. They have not been thinking of doing anything for England, but of asking England to do something for us. Their sole idea is that Great Britain should put a tax—I think it was figured down to 5 per cent on one occasion—on the breadstuffs bought from countries other than British colonies, and this at a time when we were doing nothing whatever for Britain, when we were, as a matter of fact, taxing the imports from Great Britain more highly than the imports from the United States. Now that the Government's preferential arrangement in favour of Great Britain is brought down to this House, where do we find the leader of the Opposition? We find him still sticking to his request for favours from Great Britain and refusing to endorse this scheme for giving favours to Great Britain.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Casey) does not mean to be unfair, but when he says that the proposal was that England should levy a tax of 5 per cent on commodities coming from foreign countries while we should do nothing in return, he is unintentionally unfair. For the proposal was that we should also levy a tax upon the goods of foreign countries and should devote the proceeds of that tax to purposes of Imperial defence and inter-communication. So we were agreeing to do something.

Mr. CASEY. I think that was part of the scheme, but as this tax was to be put on food products, which we do not import from any other country, I do not see where the fund was to come from or where the benefit to England would be.

Mr. McNEILL. It was not on food products alone, but on all imports.

Mr. CASEY. That is a more extended scheme than the scheme as I understood it, when I had last to do with the affairs of the league. At that time the scheme was for preferential treatment of food products by Great Britain. It seems they now ask Great Britain to give us the preference in other goods as well as food products. I do not see that we are likely to send manufactured goods to England. So the scheme resolves itself back into what I said—that England was to tax her food stuffs for the benefit of the colonies that produced these things. That is what I have understood the real gist of it to be, and I still understand it so, notwithstanding the explanation as to the phraseology of the scheme by my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill).

Now, I think the policy urged by the British Empire League and the Conservative party is rather a mean policy. On the other hand, I think the Liberal policy is a generous one, and I think so notwithstanding the alleged objection that the German and Belgian and other treaties may interfere with the unique position of Great Britain in relation to this tariff at the present time. We have heard to-day the answer given by the Department of Customs to the Belgian Consul, who asked that goods from his country might come in under this arrangement. It is quite clear that our Government does not admit that our tariff propositions compel us to admit German and Belgian goods under that preferential schedule.

If it did, I do not see how my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition could urge anything against it. The proceedings in connection with the French Treaty, which was ratified in 1895, although it was made some time before, must be fresh in our minds. We remember how that hon. gentleman, when High Commissioner in London, negotiated a treaty with France, a treaty which not only bound us to admit reciprocally certain articles from France at a low rate of duty, but to admit also any goods from France at the same reduced rate of duty which we might grant to any other country. The hon. gentleman negotiated that treaty himself. That treaty was a little too strong for the then Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), who was the hon. gentleman's superior for the time being, and he told the House so:

On the other hand, as the treaty is signed, Canada agrees to give France "most-favoured-nation" treatment, not only on the articles mentioned, but on any articles of her tariff in which she gives better terms to any other country. That was not the intention of the Government, as will be seen by a telegram which was sent to our commissioner in January, in which it was expressly stated that we agreed to the "most-favoured-nation" treatment, so far only as articles named in the treaty are concerned. Our commissioner, either through error or for reasons which he explains in his correspondence, signed the treaty with the clause in it as I have read, giving "most-favoured-nation" treatment to France in all articles of our tariff.

Now, that is the gentleman who objects to the present tariff because it might possibly give most-favoured-nation treatment to Belgium and to Germany. I should say that the speech from which I have quoted was delivered in the session of 1893, at a time when the Minister of Finance refused to ask the House to endorse the treaty which his subordinate, at that time, and his present chief, had seen fit to make with France. But at a later date the Minister of Finance saw fit to adopt that treaty, and asked the House to agree to it, and the House did agree to it. Under that treaty which is now in force with France, we are committed to a vast deal more than this present tariff commits us to, even if the present contention of the leader of the Opposition is correct, that we would be forced to admit Belgium and German goods. That is the bug-a-boo which is now held up, that this tariff will allow German and Belgian goods to come in at reduced rates. What are we committed to by the present treaty with France made by this hon. gentleman who raises that objection at the present time? On May 29th, 1895, Mr. Edgar asked :

What foreign powers have become entitled, under treaties with Great Britain, to like commercial privileges with Canada as those granted to France by the treaty of 6th February, 1893, known as the French Treaty? 2. Do each and all of such foreign powers become entitled to all the reductions proposed by Article 1 of said treaty?

Mr. IVES. 1. From the best information at the moment attainable, it appears probable that the following foreign powers will, under treaties with Great Britain, become entitled to like privileges in Canada as those granted to France by the treaty of February 6th, 1893, on its ratification, &c., viz.:—Argentine, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Bolivia, Chili, Columbia, Costa Rica, Germany (Zollverein), Muscat, Russia, Salvador, Sweden and Norway, and Uruguay. * * * It is also possible that the treaties with the following countries might be held to be binding on Canada in like manner:—Egypt, Montenegro, Mexico, Persia, South African Republic, Venezuela, and Zanzibar.

Now, here is a gentleman who negotiated a treaty with France under which we are compelled, without any reciprocal consideration from those powers, to give most-favoured-nation treatment to twenty other nations besides France. This gentleman objects to the present tariff proposal because it might possibly include Belgium and Germany alone. The inconsistency of his position is such as would be only possible on the part of the hon. gentleman himself, such as we have learned to expect from him, and therefore hardly worth special notice.

But I will say for those of us who lean towards a lower rate of tariff, that the possibility of other nations as well as England at some future time coming under this reciprocal schedule, is one of the things we like best, in this tariff proposal. This is an offer of reciprocity to the world. If Britain is at present, and likely to remain for some time, the only country who is to get the advantage of it, it is due to her own good sense in making the tariff arrangements she has made. But we hope to educate the world gradually to understand the value of Canadian trade and to induce other nations to come in under the same terms.

Now, Sir, this reciprocal scheme is objected to still further by the leader of the Opposition on the ground that it leaves too much power in the hands of the Controller of Customs. I cannot agree with him there. I do not see where else the power is to be left than in the hands of that particular Minister, charged with the administration of customs, subject, as he always must be, to the control of the whole Cabinet. I think that is one of the special advantages of the scheme, that, without any further legislation on our part, without negotiating a treaty, without going to any expense or cost, or giving any new or extraordinary advantages to a foreign country, we can simply admit from time to time other countries to this reciprocal arrangement whenever they have been wise enough to reduce their tariff towards us to a reasonable figure.

Then the clause which is meant to smash combines is objected to, because that leaves too much power in the hands of the Governor General in Council. Why, Sir, I consider that is what the country will consider about the best clause in the whole proposal. Such an able man as my hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace), the late Controller of Customs, tried his hand at smashing combines some years ago by legislation. It was not very successful. The people of the United States have tried to smash them by legislation, but it has not been successful. You can drive a coach and four through any Act of Parliament; but here the whole matter is left in the hands of the Governor in Council, that is, the Government of the day, who will be responsible to Parliament for any action that they may take, and responsible to the public at the same time, and who are bound to act in such a way as may defy criticism in dealing with a case of this kind. All that is required in order to destroy existing combines or to prevent new ones from coming up is, that the Government of the day should be satisfied, from evidence which they have obtained, that there is a combine and that it can be broken up by a reduction of the tariff or, if necessary, by placing the particular article in question on the free list. That is the only possible way of getting at the combines, and I hope it will be successful and that it may be freely used. So much for some of the objections that have been urged by hon. gentlemen opposite.

I wish to point out some further special advantages arising out of the tariff, from my point of view. The tariff—apart from the resolutions to which I have been referring particularly—gives us the benefit of a 25 per cent lower duty on nearly all the goods we wish to import. Let me take the two items of cottons and woollens merely as examples. There is grumbling because the duties on certain lines of cottons have been raised a little. But these kinds of cottons can be purchased from Great Britain, which is the great cotton factory, and so it is not fair to say that as a matter of fact, the cotton duties have been increased when there will be a reduction of 25 per cent within a year on all cottons imported from England. Instead of the duty having been increased, it has really been decreased by reason of this 25 per cent, which will come into force a year from July 1st.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon. leader of the Opposition endorses that statement?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I call attention to it.

Mr. CASEY. Then the leader of the Opposition emphasizes this statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. If the hon. gentleman is satisfied with the accuracy of that statement, he must have been mistaken the other night—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CASEY. I must be excused if I have confounded some other statement with his last speech, for the hon. gentleman has made so many contradictory utterances. The hon. gentleman said that this was the thin end of the wedge in the direction of free trade. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this is a step towards lower taxation; at the same time, I am satisfied that the reduction of 25 per cent on cottons imported from England is not a greater reduction than should be made, and is perhaps not as much reduction as should be granted.

It has been possible to make combines in cottons; it has not been found possible to make combines in woollen goods, which I chose for my other illustration. Woollen goods have, therefore, not been so close a monopoly as cottons; at the same time, the duties on the cheaper goods have been so enormous as to be practically prohibitive, and the producers of cheap woollen cloths have had the market almost entirely to themselves. Woollen manufacturers state that this 25 per cent reduction, which will come into force a year from now, will create considerable competition on the part of English manufacturers in regard to the cheaper classes of goods required by our people who are not over-rich, and will remove the scandal of duties reaching 50, 60, 70 or 100 per cent, which were hidden under the form of specific duties.

Then leaving those particular items, I desire to call attention for a moment or two to the great general advantage of the fiscal course that has been pursued by the Government. The encouragement of importations will, first, give some increase of revenue. It is quite clear that prohibitive taxes yield no revenue, and that allowing importations by making slight reductions in the tariff will furnish revenue. Second, it will change the course of trade, directing its course largely to trans-Atlantic countries rather than towards the people on this continent. Apart altogether from any feeling of loyalty, let us see what advantages it will give us. When we trade with the United States, our carriers get comparatively small profits. When our trade is across the ocean, we furnish trade to Canadian vessels both ways across the Atlantic. The high freights on exports to England during the past eighteen years have been largely caused by the fact that the ships have had freights only one way, and the result has been a high rate for our cattle, cheese and other products. Once you establish a stream of importations from England, you at the same time reduce the cost of exports from Canada.

As an advertisement for Canada, the publicity recently acquired is something for which it is worth while to pay a large amount, instead of getting it free, as we are doing, along with other benefits derived from the tariff. One instance of the value of this advertisement has been brought to our notice to-day in the reference to Rudyard Kipling's poem. Correspondents of the New York papers have declared that for the first time in many years Canada is attracting attention in England, and is being talked about. All the display we can make in the Jubilee procession, with our military and everything else, will not do one-twentieth as much to advertise the Dominion in Great Britain as a field for the investment of capital and for immigration, as the reduction in our tariff, made in England's favour. It will touch every business man in England and lead him to know that there is such a country as Canada, that it is a good place for investment and as a market for goods. It will induce immigration and capital to come here. One argument used in favour of the National Policy in the old days was that millions of English capital were waiting to be invested here so soon as it was definitely known that the fiscal policy of the country was protection to Canadian manufacturers. Like so many other promises made by hon. gentlemen opposite, in this House, it was not fulfilled and came to nothing. But I venture to predict now that not even our gold mines, which are already causing an influx of capital, will create such a favourable impression of Canada as a field for investment as will the preferential duty given to English goods, and this fact is turning the attention of all English people towards this colony. Wherever trade goes capital will go, where the flag goes capital will follow. When the people are talking about a certain country there emigrants will go. Any circumstance that makes Canada well talked about will turn the minds of investors as well as other people to this country, and the result will be money in our pockets. I just wish to say in general terms, that I believe this is the first sign of a new and better future for the country. We have come out of the chrysalis of protection; we have ceased to try and flock all by ourselves, like Dundreary's little bird. We are going to breathe a freer air; we are going to have freer trade; we are going to have freer enterprise; we are going to have freer aspirations; and, Sir, I believe that from this day forth, we are going to take up a fuller citizenship in the Empire, a fuller citizenship in the world, than has ever before been known in our history.

With these prospects in view, which I believe will spring to a large extent from the broader liberal policy that has been inaugurated by this Liberal Government, I have abundant hope and confidence in the future greatness of Canada.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 26) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Gibson.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 64) to incorporate the British Yukon Chartered Company.—(Mr. Fraser, Guysborough.)

Bill (No. 65) respecting the British Columbia Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

Bill (No. 66) relating to the Canadian Power Company.—(Mr. Gibson.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Pilots serving between Quebec and Montreal.—(Mr. Guay.)

Bill (No. 68) respecting the American Bank Note Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

Bill (No. 69) respecting the Quebec, Montmorency and Charlevoix Railway Company.—(Mr. Langelier.)

Bill (No. 71) respecting the St. Lawrence and Adirondack Railway Company.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Bill (No. 72) respecting the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company.—(Mr. Richardson.)

Bill (No. 73) to incorporate the Kaslo and Lardo-Duncan Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

Bill (No. 74) to incorporate the National Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Lount.)

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. RICHARDSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 70) respecting the Great North-west Central Railway Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman explain to the House what this Bill is?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I understand that it is for the purpose of extending the time of the company's charter. I might also say that while my name appears on the Order paper as the mover of the Bill, I did not consent to move the second reading. A local barrister asked me to present a petition for it in the absence of the gentleman he had selected. I did so, and he came to me and asked me to move the second reading of the Bill. I demurred, but said I was willing to do so in order that the Bill should get before the Railway Committee, where it would be fully explained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Where is the railway?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Some fifty miles of it, I think, have been built, from a point near Brandon to Hamiota. It has been in litigation for a number of years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know now what it is.

Mr. DAVIN. I have received communications from my own constituency and other parts of the North-west, and also from Manitoba, pressing me strongly to oppose this Bill. I myself know nothing about the merits of it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it had better go to the committee, where it will be threshed out.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I am sure I shall be pardoned for asking the indulgence of the House for a very few moments, not with any hope of throwing any new light on the subject under discussion, but to offer my protest against the resolution, or a portion of the resolutions, now before the House. I need hardly say that probably no question likely to arise during this Parliament, at all events during the present session, will be of more importance than this question, nothing has been looked for with greater interest, or with greater uncertainty, and no question has been more unsettled, perhaps, than the question of the tariff. Before the elections we said justly that our friends on the opposite side had no policy; and I think we are justified in saying that up to this moment, with all that has been done, they have not given the House or the country any striking evidence of having a policy, beyond one of such elasticity and of such a shifting character, that neither the House nor the country have any conception where these hon. gentlemen are going to lead us to in the end. Hon. gentlemen claim that they have redeemed their pledges. In fact, the hon. Finance Minister said that the resolutions before the House afford complete evidence that the Government have redeemed their pledges to the people, in essence and in fact. Now, I wish to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the position that was occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite before the election. They had no policy; they had only a set of small cries with which they went to the country. They claimed, in general terms only, that the policy of the Conservative party was bad; but they did not propose to remedy it in broad sense. Before I sit down I hope I shall be able to make it clear that they have not redeemed one solitary broad pledge, but have simply redeemed what they went to the country with—a few small cries. Now, what were those small cries? One was the question of binder twine; another was the question of coal oil; another was the question of rice, and another the question of barbed wire. Now, I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, whether, when we consider the tariff of hon. gentlemen opposite in its details, it can be looked upon as redeeming the pledges of hon. gentlemen opposite? Let me take first the question of coal oil. In that article these hon. gentlemen made a reduction somewhat disappointing to their own friends, but which cannot fail, on the other hand, to be far-reaching in its effects upon the country. They have made a reduction of 1 cent a gallon. Now, I would like to ask any hon. gentleman in this House—I care not how ardent a free trader he may be or how economical he may be in his own habits—if in this reduction there are any compensating advantages to the country which correspond at all to the blow that has been struck at that industry. Let us take the average consumption at the maximum estimated by hon. gentlemen opposite, namely 20 gallons to each family per year, and the reduction in the tax will simply amount to 20 cents on the consumption of one family. I should like to know whether it is worthy a great party to have struck so severe a blow at an important industry in order to give the small benefit to each family of 20 cents per year. Some hon. gentlemen may say that that is a very important thing in itself. I would admit that it would be if it were only one item out of hundreds of others in which reductions were made, but when you can only point to such a small measure of relief, I say that it is unworthy of the dignity of a great party to plume themselves on such a slight reduction, which strikes a blow on an important industry without giving the people any substantial relief.

Let me take the question of iron. I am pretty sure that public opinion would be very slow in coming to the conclusion that hon. gentlemen opposite have given any substantial relief to the people by way of a reduction in the specific duties on iron. I have it upon the authority of several gentlemen, in whom I have the most implicit reliance, that a ton of iron upon which a duty of from $4 to $10 was paid, when manufactured and when it goes to consumer, is, in fact, worth about $400. Now, just let me see if there is any relief given to the people by the reduction on the specific duties. If that statement be correct, and I have no doubt it is, it would seem that the duty imposed, putting it at the maximum of $10, would not amount to more than 2½ per cent. Is that giving the people any substantial relief?

It is impossible for any hon. gentleman who thinks out clearly this question to say that the lowering of the specific duties upon iron is anything but a sham. But that is not the worst of it. Those gentlemen have thought it wise to grant a bounty upon the iron manufactured in this country, which, to my mind, is a very proper thing; but when the Minister of Finance states that he is unwilling to grant a bounty upon the iron manufactured in Canada, except in so far as it is consumed in Canada itself, that seems to me the most extraordinary doctrine ever enunciated. The enlightened policy would be to give a bounty to encourage exports. What would cheapen iron in this country would be to manufacture for export twice as much as we can consume. We live in an age when men must trade on small margins, and if anything would have a tendency, as a stumbling-block, to render the encouragement utterly worthless, it would be to provide that the encouragement to be given to the iron industry in this country can only apply to the products which are consumed in this country. I am pretty sure the people will vigorously object to this policy, because after all it is only shifting the burden of taxation. If we lower the specific duties for the purpose of letting in on the one hand, and then give a bounty on the other hand, on the iron consumed in the country, we are taxing the people unnecessarily. We are taxing them in such a way that they are not going to have any compensating advantages. And after all does it make much difference, so far as dollars and cents are concerned, whether you tax the people by way of specific duties or whether you tax them by paying bounties out of the treasury of the Dominion.

Let me turn to the other side, which is the most deplorable, and that is that we have struck the iron industry a fatal blow. If there is any pledge which hon. gentlemen opposite have kept in a substantial manner, it is their pledge to knife the National Policy in every way possible. They may not have gone a great way, considering the great number of items, but they have gone far enough to affect the industries of this country, and we are told that this is only an instalment. What is the state of things in the country to-day? We have the most explicit declaration of hon. gentlemen opposite that this is only an instalment. One hon. gentleman after another rises on that side and says he is not quite satisfied but is promised that this is only the first blow and that the others are coming soon. I would like to ask what the impression must be in this country under such a state of things? Who is going to invest his money in the country? Where is the possibility of people manufacturing and giving labour to our people and thus affording a solution to that question the most dangerous of all questions, that is growing up not only in this but in other countries. One of the great difficulties has been the labour question, and in times of depression that is a most disturbing element. It seems to me that the plain solution of the labour question, the plain manner of dealing with what seems to be a false notion of hostility between labour and capital, is simply this. You find a day's work for every man in the country at some price, I care not how much, how large or small it is, and there you have a solution of the question which is without doubt a leading one and a real solution of a difficulty of that kind.

Another question is that of binder twine. I am pretty sure that in the province of Ontario, or in any other province, no one will think that the taking off a duty of 12½ per cent and making it free, will make the least difference to the farmers. Any person who takes the trouble to look at the returns of imports, will see that the small sum of $19,000 has been paid into the treasury of Canada in duties on imported twine. This importation is mainly in one province, and it is imported, not because binder twine is cheaper in the United States than here, but simply because the twine mills in the United States are nearer to some parts of our country than are the twine mills in Canada. It is simply a question of freights and not of duties. Hon. gentlemen opposite will not admit, although it is the fact, that this binder twine question is only one of the little shams with which they have tried to humbug the people. But I will give some evidence on the subject which hon. gentlemen on this side may not value very highly, but which hon. gentlemen opposite will no doubt receive as authoritative. I have here the statement of Mr. Noxon, who, I believe, is chief inquisitor for hon. gentlemen opposite, who, though in the pay of the province of Ontario, is the henchman of gentlemen opposite to coerce and harass the officials of the Dominion. He will furnish a conviction in any case in which it is desired. This will not detract from the weight of his evidence in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite. He was examined before the Public Accounts Committee of the Ontario legislature two or three years ago with regard to binder twine, after the establishment of the industry in the Central Prison at Toronto. This is what he said with regard to twine:

Q. Will other manufacturers, this year, sell at less than they did last year?—A. I think so.

Q. Will they undersell it?—A. I don't think so.

Q. Have you seen any prices quoted?—A. Yes.

Q. Where?—A. I have seen the prices of American manufacturers.

And, later on, he says:

Q. And you say you will be able to produce for half a cent less a pound this year than last?—A. Fully that.

Q. According to that, you will still be able to compete with the lowest quotation you have for this year, this at 7¼ before the duty is paid from the American side?—A. Certainly.

Q. And you will be still in a position to offer to the farmers of this country pure manilla twine equal to any on the market, so far as present quotations go, as cheap, or cheaper, than any other?—A. Yes.

An hon. MEMBER. Where is the twine made?

Mr. CLANCY. In the Central Prison, at Toronto. Now, Mr. Noxon was the inspector; was, in fact, the manager of that department, and in this statement he was defending the institution and defending his own conduct. He gave this as evidence that twine was being produced in the Central prison with prison labour—which is dearer than free labour—and we have Mr. Noxon's evidence to the effect that twine was as cheap or cheaper than elsewhere. I am not sure but that Mr. Noxon was right in that. No doubt a good quality of twine was produced there, and I think that at Kingston a good quality is produced. I regret that the Solicitor General (Mr. Fitzpatrick) is not present, for I would like to call his attention to these points. But what I wish mainly to point out is that taking off the duty on binder twine is really not a relief to the public and that the pretense that it is so is only a sham.

But these are the small things that hon. gentlemen opposite went to the country with in order to raise a party cry. They went through the country with a coal oil can in one hand and a pound of rice in the other, and they never rose above petty questions of the price of such articles. I venture to say that my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) made capital for his party in just about that way.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You are guessing now.

Mr. CLANCY. Though it is only guessing, it is not hard to guess what hon. gentlemen opposite will do under such circumstances. I regret that the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) is not in his place. But I can tell you that that was the cry he raised. He made a personal canvass in the houses, and on the platforms he talked of nothing else than the villainy of the Government in Ottawa that imposed an enormous tax on coal oil and robbed the people on their rice. Is rice cheaper to-day? They have dealt with the matter, and, as a matter of fact, there is far greater tax on it than before.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). No.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) must have a strange way of calculating duties. I thought that rice came in before at 3-10ths cent per pound, and that now it comes in at $\frac{3}{4}$ cent. If I am wrong in thinking that the present duty is higher than the old, perhaps the hon. gentleman will enlighten me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I shall be glad to enlighten the hon. gentleman. Uncleaned rice came in formerly at 3-10ths of a cent per pound, and it comes in now at $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per pound. But the manufacturer gets no more for the cleaned rice than he got before, for the duty on cleaned rice remains as before, $1\frac{3}{4}$ cents per pound. The increased duty on uncleaned rice comes out of the manufacturer.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure that the House is now enlightened. The hon. gentleman has told us what we knew before—that 3-10ths cent was paid formerly on the uncleaned rice, while the duty now is $\frac{3}{4}$ cent. But he seems able to convince himself—but I believe not an hon. gentleman on that side, and I am sure not an hon. gentleman on this side is convinced—that this increase does not come out of the pockets of the people. It is a perfect absurdity. But I do not wish to speak in harsh terms. It would be curious to know where the hon. gentleman would land in arguing about duties in such a manner as he does. But he has been distressed for fear that a rice mill would live in Canada. That is what has exercised the hon. gentleman and his friends more than anything else. But now he is in peace. He has discovered in his mind, and only in his mind, that this duty can be raised and still the people pay no greater tax.

These are the small cries raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. But the questions that the people expect to find raised at the assembling of Parliament are questions of greater magnitude. On these questions hon. gentlemen opposite gave no specific pledges, but only stated in broad terms that they were going to make reforms. One of these was the reduction in taxes. Has there been a reduction in taxes? The effect of this tariff is the very opposite. We were told, also, that there would be a reduction of expenditure and no further increase of public debt. These were the great questions before the country, and not these small points upon which hon. gentlemen opposite compliment themselves for having redeemed their pledges. On these greater questions, how have hon. gentlemen opposite redeemed their pledges?

As I stated a moment ago, taxation has been materially increased, but it has been increased in such a way that the burdens are heavier upon the people than they were before. The policy of the Conservative party was never to impose taxation without some compensating advantages, where it was possible to do so. What were the compensating advantages? Where duty was imposed as a protective duty in order that we might foster the interests of this country, it meant that if the people were taxed, they would have a day's labour for it; it meant that if the people were taxed, they traded with each other; it meant that if they were taxed, it was for the purpose of giving them the first right of a day's work, the first right of selling their own commodities, the first right of keeping their own country for themselves, so far as enjoying its fruits was concerned. Now, those were the compensating advantages for the taxation imposed under the National Policy. But now we have what is called a new National Policy. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) last night adopted the phrase of the new Liberal National Policy; I do not know whether his friends will be disposed to adopt it also. They have had their knife in the National Policy so long that I am afraid that if they adopt that name, it will not be received very well by the country. The National Policy, either upon the tongues or in the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite, is a thing that is very ill-fitting. Their National Policy has been one of tearing down, the National Policy of the Conservative party has been one of building up; and if the hon. gentleman and his friends can get the country to accept the proposition laid down by him last evening, then we are willing to accept that, and let it be the dividing line between the two parties in this country. Now, in the matter of additional taxation how much have these hon. gentlemen built up? I candidly admit that it is not very easy to build up, but we have the assurance that there would be no disturbing results from the reformation of the tariff. But I wish to say while upon that point that the whole revision of the tariff, so far as it has gone, has been not only a dangerous one, but it has been one purely of expediency, one answering in a faint way to the pledges that they are unable to redeem, but that they promised to redeem, and redeem, probably, at the cost of this country. Now, Sir, I wish to call attention for a few moments to what will be the effect of the policy of these hon. gentlemen as regards this two-sided shield that is held up to the people. One is that the people are told that notwithstanding that taxation of this country has been materially increased, there is a prospect at least of a substantial reduction in taxation from what is called schedule D. But let me point out that the hon. gentlemen showed great ingenuity, I admit a good deal of ingenuity, in the plan that they laid down for themselves, and one that they hoped to deceive the people with. The very first thing that the hon. gentlemen did was to impose an increased tax of at least one-fifth upon the class of goods that come into this country from Great Britain. The hon. gentlemen raised them from 30 to 35 per cent and from 20 to 25 per cent, and so on, and they prepared themselves for a standard in order that they might have a chance of knocking it down. Now, let me call attention to this fact. Suppose there was a large portion of the goods, and there will be a large portion of English goods coming into this country, the most that people could hope for under any circumstances, is that as they have increased the duty by one-fifth, they will be able to reduce it by one-fourth. The most that people could get out of it would be that they would have a difference of one-twentieth. Now, I am sure that hon. gentlemen, letting that stand alone by itself, cannot boast very much over it. But there is another question. Now, let me point out that the class of goods that come in with a reduction from England, particularly so far as the consuming classes in this country are concerned, is that class of goods that are not consumed by the masses of the people, but are consumed by a class of people who have wealth, who have money more plentifully, and who are better able to buy. Now, they have a decided advantage. I wish to call attention for a moment to a few items of that kind. I will take the item of silk and silk manufactures, condensing them. The fine clothes, carpets, curtains, embroideries and other fine goods, imported from England and coming in under that schedule, would be $6,699,000, while from the United States and other countries there would be only about half a million dollars' worth. Now, that means that the poorer people of this country are obliged to pay taxes for the wealthier class, that is the inevitable consequence of a policy of that kind; because the high-priced goods, the goods that are only consumed by the wealthier classes, come in with a reduction, while the goods imported from other countries and the United States are a class that are consumed entirely by those less able to pay duties. Now, I will consider the effect of this policy upon the farmers and the great consuming classes in this country, for whom hon. gentlemen have had such great solicitude in the past. Why, Sir, they were the champions of the farmers and the poorer classes; they were constantly computing the heavy duties that were imposed upon the consumers of cheap goods in this country, and they went to the country largely upon a cry of that kind. Now, I will mention a few articles in which the farmer is particularly concerned, taking the whole class of farming implements. There will be cultivators, seed drills, hay forks, harrows, harvesters, horse rakes, mowing machines, ploughs, plough plates and moulds, rakes, reapers, scythes, spades and shovels, and all other agricultural implements; nails and spikes, wrought hardware, locks of all kinds, pumps, sewing machines and all other kinds of machinery; woodenware, trees and shrubs, seeds, garden and field, and bituminous coal that is largely consumed now in Canada in consequence of the disappearance of other fuel. Why, Sir, all these articles are consumed by the farmers, they are the principal articles that the farmers buy, they are those that constitute the great burden upon the farmers of this country, and they are the class of goods that come in almost exclusively from the United States. The policy of the Conservative party is that they should be produced in this country, but if they have to come from a foreign country, if we were unable to shut them out in the past as effectually as we desired to do, then is not the difficulty multiplied as one could well imagine, when we find that the poorer classes must pay the higher rate of duty on that class of goods. Now, what is the amount of all those articles that come from England? Of all those articles, something like $304,000 worth came from England, while from the United States they amount to considerably over six millions. I am sure hon. gentlemen cannot close their eyes to the fact that if they were to apply the schedule, if they were to confine it alone to England, as they profess, and as they state now that they are going to do, I am not prepared to say that that is going to be the case, but if it were the case, and if it were applied alone to England, no greater injury could be inflicted upon the poorer classes, more particularly the farmers in this country, than to subject them to the burden of taxation that hon. gentlemen are proposing to place upon the people of this country. No policy seems to me is so just as the one that leaves it a voluntary matter to every taxpayer to be not only a taxpayer but at the same time a tax collector, paying taxes to the extent to which he is able and willing to consume goods.

But let me turn to another phase of the question with respect to the position hon. gentlemen have taken upon schedule B. So far as the resolution before the House goes, it will let in other countries as well as England. The resolution does not specify England, and the Government may bring in other countries or invite them to come in under that schedule. What would be the position supposing the United States, Germany and other countries competing with Canada were permitted to send in their goods under that schedule? Such concessions could only have the effect of destroying Canadian industries, and driving away the people employed in them. We are told that the tide of immigration would at once flow to Canada, that an impetus would be at once given to business. For what purpose would people come here, if there were no manufacturing industries and little employment obtainable? It is clear that capital and employment would diminish under a policy of this kind. It is almost impossible for the people here now to drag out an existence, and it would be strange indeed if people in England and other countries could not understand the question, and the consequences of such a policy being adopted in this country, or at all events evidence would be soon forthcoming in this country as to the impracticable nature of the tariff.

With respect to the question of preferential trade, which is involved by the resolutions now before the House, I may say that this is no new question in Canada. It is a question respecting which hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House have been anxious. It cannot be monopolized by hon. gentlemen opposite or considered as a question on which political parties have been divided. I believe that the sentiment in the Liberal party as well as the Conservative party has been favourable to preferential trade.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. I want the hon. gentleman's "hear, hear" when I now say that the Liberal party placed itself in a position in the past from which it was utterly impossible to approach the question in this light. They advocated other means of relieving the ills of the country. Their remedy was not preferential trade; they took a position which put preferential trade out of the question. They adopted a policy of unrestricted reciprocity. I have evidence of this from the mouth of an hon. gentleman, a colleague of the First Minister and occupying a high and distinguished position. I refer to a letter written by Sir Oliver Mowat to Hon. Alexander Mackenzie. It was after the defeat of 1891 at the general elections of the Liberal party, and grew out of the policy the party then pursued, that policy on which Mr. Blake was unwilling to follow his party and to which some reference is made in this letter, but which I will not trouble the House with to-night. This is what Sir Oliver Mowat had to say on this question:

Mr. CLANCY.

At the last general Dominion elections we lost some votes in Ontario, from a fear, created by Conservative management, that Liberal leaders were looking to political union; and many more Liberal votes would have been lost but for the confidence of Liberals generally that the charge was false.

So much as a matter of party tactics and the policy of the Liberal party. That hon. gentleman came from Toronto to Ottawa, and he brought his policy and his warning with him. Further he said:

As a mere matter of party tactics, therefore, and in addition to all other considerations, it is our policy to see that our party shows itself on all occasions to be as true to the British connections, and as little disposed to surrender this great Dominion to our neighbours, as the most British of Conservatives are.

I am not sure but that this letter was the birth of the preferential trade policy, or at all events gave rise to it, and followed the advent of the introduction of new blood in the Liberal party at Ottawa.

There was another fact that stood in the way, and which yet stands in the way of the Prime Minister of to-day, and which justifies the position of the Conservative party, and that is the speech made by the Prime Minister, in Boston. The Conservatives have been rather ridiculed and sometimes shouted at whenever they quote from Mr. Laurier's speech at Boston. It is always said that this is done to injure him; but this expression of opinion comes from the Minister of Justice. This is what Mr. Laurier said:

In the very nature of things, from the sole fact that Canada is growing, developing and progressing, the interests of Canada and the interests of England must be divergent, and whenever the interests of Canada are on one side and the interests of England are on the other side, the only consideration to me is what is best for Canada, leaving it to the people of England to consider, and do, what is best for England. This is not a question of sentiment, and, for my part, I am firmly convinced that the economic interests of Canada lie with this continent, and it is on the broad basis of continental freedom of trade that I place the question.

We have been told that this preferential trade policy has been most favourably received by the people of England, that they are grateful for the position taken by the Liberal party of Canada, that it is a duty on the part of the Canadian people to make some concessions, and the Government have given some evidence of the loyalty of our people. I make no apology for saying that I believe that the intelligent policy for the people of this country to pursue is not one of sentiment. Sentiment is very good in its place and we are as desirous of being moved as much by sentiment as any enlightened people should be moved. This is entirely a question of dollars and cents, and it is absolutely distinct from sentiment. The concessions offered by the Liberal party to the people of England have not been demanded by them. Great Britain does not ask her colonies to give her something for nothing. Very true, the English press and the English business men, and members of the Imperial Parliament, laud this proposition, and they laud it because they are anxious that not only Canada, but that any country on the face of the globe should give them trade advantages. The business men of England are too shrewd not to recognize that this proposal of the Liberal Government here, gives them valuable concessions. They are not applauding the Liberal party of Canada on the ground of patriotism, but they are applauding them on the grounds of their giving advantages to English trade in the Canadian market. That is not true patriotism, and it is not a true Canadian view either. It is a false proposition for hon. gentlemen opposite to say, that we should hold out the olive branch to the motherland. England demands no such thing from Canada, and if she did make such a demand I am prepared to say, for my part, that it would be hardly fair. It is not a progressive proposition for any one to make. What do hon. gentlemen opposite propose to do? They propose to open the markets of Canada to the manufacturers and workmen of England, and for that they get absolutely nothing in return, because England has nothing to give. England cannot afford under present circumstances, to give us any special privileges, and, Sir, neither can we afford to give England any special privileges. I say that the people of Canada would show that they were not an enlightened and progressive people, if they were prepared to shape their fiscal policy upon the ground of sentiment.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Hear, hear.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." Let me make myself perfectly clear, and I am sure I will have his approval again. I say, that when it is a question of the vital interests of the people of Canada, when it is a question of destroying the industries of this country, we should not allow sentiment to enter into the calculation. I should like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, if he thinks that sentiment should be considered in a matter of this kind? I am sure the hon. gentleman would not make any such assertion. Sir, this proposition of hon. gentlemen opposite, will have the effect in this country of favouring the wealthier classes and of taxing more heavily the poorer and the larger consuming classes. Hon. gentlemen opposite have done this for the mere sake of waving the banneret of preferential trade to England. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be applauded in England, but I tell them that they will not have the plaudits of the people of Canada.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Your leader advocated that.

Mr. CLANCY. Let me tell my hon. friend what my leader does advocate. He has advocated in the past, and I hope he will continue to advocate in the future, an intelligent and progressive policy. What was the position taken by the leader of the Conservative party in the past in regard to preferential trade with England? Under the Conservative policy, preferential trade did not mean that Canada was to make all the sacrifices, but it meant, that within the Empire, we should have some advantages that foreign countries would not have.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). The Conservative party were to be sturdy beggars, giving nothing in return for what they got from England.

Mr. CLANCY. There are none so blind as those who do not wish to see. I ask my hon. friend (Mr. Wood) to consider for a moment what advantages his party are giving under their preferential resolution, and then to consider, what they are getting in return. The policy of the Conservative party was, that Great Britain and her colonies should enter into such trade arrangements as would be mutually beneficial to all, and that could only be accomplished by concessions on all sides. The business men of Canada never thought of preferential trade on any other ground, and I am sure that the business men of Canada will not be carried away by the proposition made now, although no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite hope they will. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, why does he not make more concessions to England, if he thinks it right to make one. If this is a question of sentiment, then sentiment is very cheap, and gentlemen opposite can go on and do a great deal more for England. There is absolutely no limit to the extent to which you can go in the matter of sentiment. The Conservative party base their policy on a sounder ground. We say that concessions can only be made to the extent that we get an equivalent in some direct or indirect manner. I repeat that the people of Canada cannot afford to make any concessions to any country, without obtaining some compensating advantages.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to refer briefly to the proposition which confers such extraordinary powers on one individual, to give force and effect to this preferential resolution. I venture to say, Sir, that no Government in any enlightened country, under our modern notions of parliamentary government, ever came to a free Parliament, asking such extraordinary powers as the Liberal Government ask for I think that resolution. Members on both sides of the House will agree with me in that. The Parliament of Canada is for the first time in its history asked to surrender its power, and to place it in the hands of one man. If such a proposition were carried to its logical conclusion, it would mean that the conduct of affairs in this country, legislative and executive, might be delegated to Cabinet Ministers, and that there would be no necessity to call the representatives of the people together to sanction their acts. I hope that the people of Canada are too intelligent to consent to a thing of that sort. Judging from the acts of this Ministry up to the present time, I do not think that the people of this country have been inspired with sufficient confidence to warrant them placing this power under the control of the Government. Sir, the Government ask for a power which should not be placed in the hands of any Government, whether it be Liberal or Conservative. It is too important a question to be decided by other than the representatives of the people in Parliament, and too important to be left to the judgment of the present Cabinet, even in the light of all the wisdom they claim credit for. If the majority of the members of this House place such an extraordinary power under the will and wisdom of the Controller of Customs, I say that it means that our notions of parliamentary government in Canada have gone. It means that the members of this House have been willing to surrender a right which no Parliament should surrender—a surrender so dangerous and so far-reaching in its effects that I am sure the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches will hesitate before asking it from the members of this House, even on their own side. Why, Sir, with such a power in their hands, the Government could make commercial treaties with the United States, with Germany, with Belgium, or with any other country, without calling Parliament? The executive here in Ottawa are to be the judges. At their own sweet will they might bind this country, and do it untold injury. Even if they were prompted with the most honest motives, I say that the wisdom of no set of men is so great as to warrant them in assuming a power of that kind, a power which should not be placed in the hands of any executive in any country having responsible government.

There is another provision of this measure which is equally dangerous. Hon. gentlemen have discovered, since they got to the Treasury benches, a means of curing combines. When they were out of office, they never thought of such a thing. My hon. friend from West York (Mr. Wallace) did perhaps more than any other man in Canada in striking at what is an admitted evil. Nobody pretends to justify combines. There is a complete consensus of opinion in Canada that combines should not exist, and that every effective means should be adopted to prevent them and bring them to an end. Having said that, let us adopt not only a rational means, but an honest means, of dealing with them. My hon. friend from West York put on the Statute-book an Act dealing with them which may be tardy.

Mr. CLANCY.

but which is the only safe method in our enlightened age; and he has pointed out in this House, more than once, that the present Minister of Justice, whose duty it was to enforce the law in the province of Ontario as the Attorney General of that province, turned his back upon it. He was never friendly to Dominion laws while in the Government of Ontario. He has stated on more than one occasion that it was not especially his duty to enforce federal laws. Though he had the constitution of the courts and all the necessary machinery in his hands, he made no effort in that direction. I do not know whether that hon. gentleman has insured the present method of striking at combines. If it were proposed to place in the hands of a Conservative Government such a power, these hon. gentlemen would justly make their protests ring through Canada against such a proposition. Even Liberal papers, though saying that combines should be struck down wherever possible, have raised the warning that this would be a very unsafe power in the hands of a corrupt Government. Well, if anything is dangerous in the hands of a corrupt Government, it should not be placed in the hands of any Government. The belief that a Government will administer an Act properly and honestly is no security to the people. We want the security of the laws. We want a better security than the profession or the outward practices of any Government. In some circumstances you must trust men, but this is not a case where you should be obliged to trust men. This is a case of taking an extraordinary power by means of which hon. gentlemen can hold the hatchet over every honest manufacturer of this country. They could go to a manufacturer and say: "You have combined." The manufacturer might say: "No, there is nothing in that." They might reply: "Never mind, we are on to you, and if you do not support us or put up for us, we will come down on you."

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, they would not do that.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend says they would not do that, but I am sure that the people of Canada would not wish them to have the power to do it. I am afraid that some tolls would have to be paid, and that if they were not paid, a man's business would have to go to the winds. I say the people want better security than that, and I doubt whether even this Parliament will commit itself to so extraordinary a proposition as to place so dangerous a power in the hands of any Government in this country. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not defended that proposition so far. The hon. Minister of Finance might be excused for not referring to it, for he had a long speech to make; but I doubt whether hon. gentlemen opposite are prepared to give up their rights as members of Parliament, and to hand over that extraordinary power even to a Liberal Government, knowing well, as they do, that if the Conservative party came into office, they could not, if consistent, do other than charge them with having the power to coerce any manufacturer in this country and make him their slave.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have only to thank the House for the very patient hearing they have given me, and I hope that hon. gentlemen will see their way to withdraw or modify that proposition. The House is a unit in favour of striking down every combine in Canada; but the House, I hope, is not a unit in favour of adopting the means prescribed by hon. gentlemen opposite.

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Speaker, in rising to address the House on this very important occasion, let me say that there is one thing we can claim, and that is that this is the tariff of the Finance Minister and his colleagues, and not the tariff of the Manufacturers' Association of the province of Ontario. The ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has stated that during the past nine months a flaming sword has been held over the heads of the business men of Canada by the present Government. Does he know that a fiery sword was held over him when he was trying to revise his tariff in 1894, and that it was wielded with effect, for the next morning after that tariff was brought down to the House, a clerical error was found in the items of democrat wagons and starch, and before the tariff was passed, there were over a hundred more items discovered in which there were clerical errors. But not one single clerical error has been found in the present tariff during the time of this debate.

I have been very much amused by the various lines of argument advanced during this debate. The first thing we were told was that this tariff was illegal and unconstitutional, such a tariff as would not have been brought down by any Government in any civilized country. But that line seems to have been abandoned, and I have been wondering whether or not the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has got new light. The line now taken is that we are giving something to England for nothing. Can it be possible that the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has taken advice and has learned that the Government are perfectly correct in the position they have taken, that this preferential tariff does not affect the favoured-nation-clause in any respect, and that it can only take effect as regards the nations which enjoy the advantages of that clause, when they give Canada corresponding advantages?

I was rather amused at the slick way in which the hon. gentleman who last spoke tried to get around the reduction of duty on binder twine. He said the farmers were not going to be benefited by our taking off the duty of 12½ per cent. Well, if that duty were of no benefit to the manufacturers, why should it remain there? I say that we ought to get rid of every duty which gives any opportunity to anybody to take an unfair advantage of the community; and I further say that the manufacturers of binder twine have not been injured, because not only the raw material which went into the composition of that article, but the oil, coal and all the machinery for making it comes in free, so that in reality a benefit has been conferred upon the manufacturers. When hon. gentlemen opposite talk of binder twine, they ought to think of that page in the history of binder twine made in the Kingston Penitentiary, which was laid bare to the House last session, and which ought to make every Conservative blush with shame.

Then we were told that it was unworthy the dignity of a country like Canada to bring down a tariff of this description. And we were criticised for the small amount of duty taken off coal oil. Well, we know it took a considerable length of time to bring the tariff up to what it was under the late Government, and that it would be in the interests of the country that that tariff should be removed slowly and gently. As one who has been a farmer for the last forty-three years, I accept this instalment in good faith, as the beginning of the end, and I believe that the Government will do yet all it has promised. The Government never promised to take the duties off all at once; but they promised to give us free trade as hon. gentlemen opposite say it was given in England. How was it given in England? The agitation for the abolition of the corn laws began in 1824. The first line of duties, apart from the corn laws, was removed in 1845, when the duties on over 300 articles were reduced or abolished. In 1846 another list of duties was abolished, and so it went on until 1874, when the last duties were removed. Give the Government of Canada an equal length of time, and I have no doubt they will gradually pull down the tower of high duties built in this country, and in so doing will act both in the interests of the people and of the manufacturers. Why, in England the very same cries went out that are going out here to-day. There the alarm was raised that the people of Germany and France and other countries would manufacture the goods that would be consumed in England, but the events have falsified these predictions, and to-day England is one of the most prosperous countries on the face of the earth.

Now, let us take that question of rice that is so much talked about. 13,000,000 pounds of rice came into this country, and the duty paid on that rice, which was to be cleaned, amounted to $40,000, because there was 3-10ths of a cent of duty only, and that left nearly 1 cent per pound upon the rice to the manufacturer. But now that the duty is ¾ of a cent per pound, it only leaves half a cent per pound to the manufacturer. What is the effect of that? Instead of $40,000, there are $99,000 duties collected, and that extra $59,000 goes into the treasury of the Dominion and not into the hands of those who cleaned the rice. That is what we want, we want every industry kept in its proper position, and we want the treasury to get all the money to which it is entitled, and which should not go into the pockets of the manufacturers.

With respect to the statement that we have given something for nothing to Great Britain, I asked hon. gentlemen opposite what they would do. Is it not a fact that, when the Intercolonial Commission sat at Ottawa, a resolution was introduced before that commission asking Great Britain to put a duty on the imports of foreign breadstuffs in order to protect the colonies? Lord Jersey was there as a representative of the British Government. What did he say? He told the commission that only 17½ per cent of the trade of Great Britain came from the self-governing colonies, and if he took in the Crown colonies, the proportion did not exceed 25 per cent. Of breadstuffs, only $29,000,000 came from the colonies, while over $140,000,000 came from foreign countries, and Canada some ten years ago only supplied 3·2 per cent of the breadstuffs imported into the British Islands. I believe to-day that she supplies something like 5 per cent of the breadstuffs that Britain requires. Is it to be expected that Great Britain would impose a tax upon the food of the people of that country for the sake of a paltry 5 per cent of breadstuffs from Canada. Why, Lord Jersey told them plainly he could not be a party to any such arrangement.

Now, the preferential part of the tariff with Great Britain is nothing new. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) introduced a resolution into this House that the duty upon British goods should be reduced, and hon. gentlemen opposite voted it down. I believe that the only way we will ever get any advantage in the British market is the way the Government of to-day have taken, that of giving preferential trade to Great Britain. We can now ask Britain to give us some advantage, if possible in her market, but it required a considerable amount of audacity for a Canadian Government to go to the British Government and ask them to abolish those treaties containing the most-favoured-nation clause without having taken some steps to show that there was an absolute necessity for their abolition. The Government of Canada has to-day taken a position that is looked upon all over the British Islands favourably by all classes of the community. We have been told that that is not surprising because we are giving something for nothing, but that something which we are giving for nothing is something that will yet redound to the benefit of Canada to an enormous extent. I believe it is the entering of the thin edge of the wedge and which will bring about a condition of prosperity in Canada such as we have not seen for the last twenty-five years.

Then hon. gentlemen opposite speak about agricultural implements. Well, is it not a fact that these have been reduced to a considerable extent to the farmer. I have here a list that shows the benefits that the farmer is getting from the present tariff. My hon. friend who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Clancy) asked what the farmers would say in respect to those duties. We have been told by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) and by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) that there was no reduction in agricultural implements. On the contrary, there is a greater reduction under the present tariff than that there was under the tariff that was passed in 1894. The late Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) seems to have wakened up from his Rip-Van-Winkle sleep. In 1895 he told us that the farmer paid none of these duties. The farmer, according to the hon. gentleman, took his wheat to the mill and had it ground, and carried home his flour, without paying a tax. And he built his house of timber grown in his own country, and so paid no tax. And even this farmer's agricultural implements were to be made out of timber. The hon. gentleman did not know that the country was in a progressive condition until he was awakened out of his dream by the present Finance Minister when he described so graphically the progress made in this country in all sorts of manufacturing. And now the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) tells us that there is no relaxation of duties in favour of the farmer, that the only relaxation that was given under the tariff of 1894 when agricultural implements were reduced to 20 per cent. But that reduction was entirely nullified by the fact that the Government employed an agent (Mr. Hawthorne), the manager of one of the biggest hardware manufacturing industries in Canada to go to the United States and learn the prices at which they were selling goods. The result of that gentleman's mission was that the invoice prices of goods coming from the United States were increased for duty purposes from 15 to 30 per cent, thus neutralizing the reduction of the duty. Here is a list of implements on which the duty was 35 per cent and is now 25 per cent: Axes, scythes, hay knives, forks, rakes, land-rollers, straw cutters, root cutters, pulpers, fanning mills, potato diggers, hay tedders, hay loaders and horse forks, scufflers and hoes, post hole diggers, picks, corn planters, corn cutters and ditching machines. Then there are such machines as threshing engines, separators, horse-powers, and windmills, all farmers' machinery which have been reduced from 30 per cent to 25 per cent under the new tariff. Many of these implements are of as much importance to the farmer to-day, when he is farming upon an advanced system as we have got to do as are the implements the duty on which was reduced in 1894.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman say what the imports of these articles amount to ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). Under a 35 per cent tariff, they could not have been much.

Mr. CLANCY. They were all made in Canada.

Mr. McMILLAN. No ; I myself have got a tread-mill and a straw-cutter that I had to get from the United States and pay freight and duty on because I could not get them to suit me made here. Whether these are made in the country or not, the effect of this reduction is to reduce the price to the farmer and that is what we believe should have been done long ago.

Then I was amused when my hon. friend (Mr. Clancy) got up and asked us what would be the result if the United States and other countries should take advantage of this preferential tariff in the same manner as England did. I would answer him with the speech of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) who dwelt upon the effect of this reduction of duty upon our trade with the United States. He evidently had in his mind the idea that this new tariff brought us a step nearer to reciprocity with the United States. These hon. gentlemen think these things, but they try to conceal them from the people. I see my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) smile. He told us that the farmers get no benefit from this tariff. He spoke out of the fullness of his ignorance, trying to mislead the people whom he represents. No doubt he counts on the gullibility of those who sent him here as their representative. In this speech of the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), there is a large list of goods which he fears will be imported into Canada from the United States under this tariff. This will accomplish much what Sir John Macdonald told us the National Policy was to do. One of the great reasons for adopting the National Policy was to secure reciprocity with the United States. I believe the hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) told us that it would compel the Government of the United States, within few years to give us reciprocity. But it was like a good many other of the prophecies made by the hon. gentleman. We have been told of late that for a Government to take the reins of power upon false promises was one of the worst things that could happen to a country. If ever a Government assumed office under false promises, it was the Government that came in in 1878. One of the promises made by the present leader of the Opposition on behalf of that Government was that the country should be run upon a smaller expenditure than was deemed necessary by the Government of the late Alexander Mackenzie, that they had run the country upon a smaller expenditure before and were prepared to do it in the future. We were told also that for the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway not one cent was to be taken out of the public treasury permanently ; all the money was to be returned. By 1890 we were to have a million population in the North-west and 300,000,000 of bushels of wheat was to be exported out of that country. These were promises that were never fulfilled. Again we were promised that the surplus products of the farm were to be consumed here in Canada, even our butter and eggs and small fruit. This was to be accomplished by the great increase in the industries of the country. Has that increase taken place ? When the duty was put up on iron we were told that we should have iron furnaces at Weller's Bay, Toronto, Kingston and elsewhere and an increase of 20,000 in the number of our workmen, and if they went on and manufactured rails and steel billets and hardware and other things, that additional population would be increased three-fold, making 300,000 of a population dependent on our iron industries. And the fact is that we have one little iron furnace in Hamilton, and that is not due to the National Policy. We were told that the putting on of the iron duty would represent a burden of $500,000 imposed upon the people, but it was to be wiped out by taking the duty off coal. All these things proved delusive, and I am astonished to find hon. gentlemen decrying the present Government on the ground of unfulfilled promises. I feel and know that those who occupied seats upon the Treasury benches in the late Government recognized in their inmost souls that the Government that rules Canada to-day are fulfilling as rapidly as possible the promises they have made to the farmers, the manufacturers, and the people of this country. I have had communications from western portions of Ontario that all classes are accepting this as one of the brightest days in the history of Canada for the last twenty years. And let me repeat that this is the tariff of the Minister of Finance and not the tariff of the Manufacturers' Association. I am sure the late Finance Minister will be happy to hear the large amount of assistance that he got in framing the last tariff, and the way the flaming sword was held up over his head at the time that the tariff was before the House. Let me read from the annual report of the Manufacturers' Association, so that the fact cannot be gainsaid that the Manufacturers' Association influenced the Government of this country in framing the tariff of 1894 :

In accordance with the usage of this association, previous to your last meeting the tariff committee of the association, in the discharge of their duty, entered upon a close and careful examination of all matters brought before it by members of the association relating to the tariff.

The situation at that time was critical. An excitement, amounting to a furore, had been worked up by the enemies of protection, and some who had previously declared themselves staunch adherents of the National Policy, weakened. It was evident, however, that some changes in the tariff were imperative, and that, if they were not inaugurated by the friends of protection, the Government could not survive—

A plain indication that the Conservative Government is an organized hypocrisy, as it was once described in England by the late Mr. Disraeli, because they never intended to reduce the tariff, they only intended to deceive the country.

—that the enemies of protection would accede to power.

It was under these circumstances that the tariff committee entered upon their labours, having the counsel and assistance of many of the most experienced members of the association,—

It was not a meeting of Ministers in Council that rigged up the tariff of 1894.

—the result of which was the embodiment of their views in a communication to the Finance Minister (a copy of which is here before you), which elicited from him a kindly letter, in which he alluded to it as a well-prepared brief in which all the matters therein discussed had been done full justice. Perhaps it might be going too far to even surmise the effect these recommendations of your tariff committee to the Minister may have had in the final arrangement of the tariff; but it is but an act of justice to the committee to direct attention to the large number of changes that were made in the tariff along the lines suggested in the recommendations, and that in many instances the language used in both are substantially identical. This is particularly noticeable as regards the iron schedule, the duties upon textiles, the duties upon drugs, chemicals, alcoholic preparations, &c., as well as upon an extended list of miscellaneous articles, and large and most important additions to the list of non-dutiable articles. It is also to be noticed that, in many instances where the recommendations suggested that no changes be made in the duties upon articles therein enumerated, no changes were made.

What credit do the Government and Finance Minister deserve for bringing down a tariff like this to the House when the manufacturers of this country that entered into an association to influence the Government in framing their tariff? Let me say that I am happy to be able to state that many honest and intelligent manufacturers would not enter that association or have anything to do with it, but those who did enter it used such language as I have been reading to you with respect to the revision of the tariff, and those who did not agree with them were to be hung up by the neck, and that was to be the end of them. A statement of that kind was made at a meeting of the Manufacturers' Association:

One of the objects of this association is to influence public opinion to appreciate the necessity of the imposition of adequate duties upon imported products by which to protect Canadian labour.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Now, I think there is another statement somewhere with respect to this association by an ex-president. He says:

A popular superstition is, that the association is the vehicle by which an immense fund is collected to corrupt the electorate, than which nothing could be further from the truth. We have in the past, and it is to be hoped will in the future, devote any small surplus of our membership fees to spreading the truth by means of campaign literature and campaign speeches, following the manner, but not the matter, of the English Cobden Club.

What did the English Cobden Club do when they were agitating against the corn laws. They sent subscription lists throughout England and got £250,000 subscribed, so that if they were following the manner of the Cobden Club, the first thing they did was to bring influence to bear upon the Government as well through their literature as by the advice they gave the Finance Minister. Thank God, Mr. Speaker, we are out of the hands of the combinsters in Canada today. No wonder that their friends fight a hard battle for them when they see that in all likelihood a law will be put upon the Statute-book of Canada that will put an end to these combines. They said that law of a different description should be passed. Well, they had been in office since 1878, and after that Combine Committee sat, a Bill was brought into this House which was afterwards killed in the Senate. They have had ample time to bring in another law, but have they ever attempted to do so? No, and this explains why the funds of that association was brought to bear upon them so that they would legislate in their interest and not in the interest of the country.

Now, there is one question that I want to take up specially, and that is the question of corn. We have been told by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) and by the hon. gentleman who spoke last, what the effect would be of allowing free corn to come into this country. The hon. member for East Grey stated that in 1877 so large an amount of corn came into this country that the Government had to take hold and pass the National Policy in order to protect the farmers. Now, let me say that after the National Policy had been in existence in Canada for four years, there was a commission appointed that went to Chicago, that went to Toronto, that went to Montreal, and collected all the evidence they possibly could with respect to the influence that the National Policy had had upon the agricultural interests of Canada. Let me say that I was astonished when I first came to Ottawa and called for the Sessional Papers for the session in which that report was made, and the Sessional Papers of the next year, but I found that the statements with respect to coarse grains were eliminated, or had never been entered on the Sessional Papers, because they were not favourable to the Government of the day. I went and got a copy of the original report. The Trade and Navigation Returns show that in 1877, the very year that my hon. friend mentioned, there were 8,260,079 bushels of Indian corn brought into Canada and entered for consumption, of which Ontario took 6,719,000 bushels. Now what was the price of oats and the price of barley and coarse grains at that time, in Chicago and Toronto? Oats in Toronto, as shown by the report of the Commission in 1877, were 43 cents a bushel; in Chicago they were 31¼ cents, a difference in favour of Toronto of 11½ cents. When we come to 1881, how much corn came into Canada for consumption during that year? Just 2,043,000 bushels, as against 8,260,000 bushels four years previously. The price of oats in Toronto was 39¼ cents per bushel; the price in Chicago was 37 83-100, or within about 2 cents per bushel of the Toronto price. At this time 2,000,000 bushels of corn were brought into the country annually. Let me now give the prices when 8,000,000 bushels of corn were imported. They were as follows:—

—	Toronto Price.	Chicago Price.	Difference.
Rye, 1877 ...	70c.	$ 62¼c.	7¼c. in favour of Toronto.
“ 1881 ...	89	91.75	2¼c. in favour of Chicago.
Barley, 1877.	73¼	58½	15c. in favour of Toronto.
“ 1881.	91	1.09	18c. in favour of Chicago.

I have another statement showing how the National Policy works injuriously to the farmers as regards coarse grains. Take the years 1874-75-76-77 and 1878; the average price of oats was 33 cents, on October 20. The average price in 1878-79 and 1881 was the same, although a larger quantity of corn had been consumed during the first period and a smaller quantity during the latter period. The average price of barley during the first five years mentioned was 88 cents, and it was only 80 cents during the second period. The hon. members will notice that there was this reduction in the price of barley when a smaller quantity of corn was being consumed, the date of this report being November 20. The average price of oats in June during the years 1874-75-76-77 and 1878 was 45 cents; the average price at the same dates for 1879-1881 was 40 cents. These figures show conclusively that the price of oats has not been injured by the large importation of corn into Canada, and the same remark applies to barley.

I take a statement from the “Globe” of March 29th, 1897. The price of oats was quoted at 22 cents in Toronto and 22 cents in Buffalo, corn being then quoted at 27 cents in Buffalo. A farmer sells 50 bushels of oats at 22 cents and receives $11. He buys corn at 27 cents a bushel and for the $11 he obtains 40 bushels and 20 pounds of corn. The 50 bushels of oats at 34 pounds per bushel give 1,700 pounds of feed. Forty bushels and 20 pounds of corn at 56 pounds to the bushel give a total of 2,260 pounds of feed. If you deduct the 1,700 pounds from the 2,260 pounds, there is a balance of 560 pounds of feed. One bushel of oats being equivalent to 34 pounds of feed, there is a gain of 10 bushels of corn, which is equivalent to the value of $2.70. I have already stated that western corn has been selling at 18 cents and oats at from 15 cents to 18 cents in Windsor. Will any hon. member who knows anything about farming tell me why a farmer should not sell a portion of his oats and buy corn, because it is well known that better results are obtained from a variety of feed. So why should not the farmers have the privilege of selling their oats and buying corn in return on the best possible terms. The hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) stated the other day that corn sold in Toronto at 25½ cents, and oats were selling at 26 and 27 cents. Under such circumstances, would not a farmer be foolish if he did not sell a portion of his oats and purchase corn. I consider that one of the greatest benefits that can be conferred upon the farmer is to give him cheap feed, and I know of no other feed that can be obtained that will give better results for stock than corn. The day has come when every farmer in the country has to economize as much as possible and I think the farmer will benefit by selling part of his coarse grains and purchasing corn, because we must return to the land all we take out of it and even a little more if possible. In my opinion no greater benefit could have been conferred on the farmers of Ontario, Quebec, and the other provinces, than that of giving them free corn. The Government have taken the position that they were justified in favouring the farmers against the distillers. Formerly the distiller obtained free corn but not the farmer; the distiller obtained practically a rebate on his whisky, while the farmer had no advantage in regard to the beef he exported. It has been stated that the farmers will purchase corn and sell it to distillers. I am glad to say that the statement was not made by a farmer but by a member of some other class of the community, for I do not believe any farmer would take such a step. The farmers want a fair field and no favour, for we believe we are able to compete with the people of any nation. Britain has been referred to, and reference has been made to the distressed condition of the agricultural classes.

Mr. CLANCY. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds further will he tell this House whether he grows corn or buys it.

Mr. McMILLAN. I sell a portion of my oats and buy corn, and have done so for many years. I cannot ripen corn, but I raise a large quantity and use it in silos. I have done exactly what I have advised other farmers to do. I have heard a great deal about injury being done by free trade to England. I never heard such a slander as was uttered by a prominent member of the Conservative party with respect to England, I mean the hon. member for Pictou. Here is what the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said :

What is the whole policy of the motherland to-day? Driven from the civilized markets of the world ; steadily and every year finding their output to these markets decreasing, they spend millions on their navy and millions on their army to force their wares, and their goods, and their merchandise into the uncivilized markets of the world, which they are endeavouring to occupy, to settle and to control, driven there by the deadly effect upon them of the tremendous competition coming from the protected nations in the rest of the world.

Referring to the present Minister of Marine, he says :

The hon. gentleman himself laughs at the idea that Great Britain is the best market for most of our products.

Sir that is a slander perpetrated on England. There is not one scintilla of truth in the whole statement. England has not been driven from the civilized nations of the earth, but on the contrary her trade is daily increasing. In 1886 the total imports of Great Britain amounted to £350,000,000 sterling, and her total exports amounted to £269,000,000 sterling, or a total of £619,000,000 sterling. In 1895 England's imports rose to £418,000,000 sterling and her exports to £286,000,000 sterling, making a total trade of £703,000,000 sterling. This was notwithstanding the reduction in values and the severe commercial depression that has been felt in all civilized countries. I saw a statement in the "Citizen" this morning, that the trade of Great Britain has risen from £703,000,000 sterling to £738,000,000 sterling this year. That shows that England is still leading the van among the nations of the earth, and that she is still holding her own. She is holding her own even with Germany, and although she may not be increasing her trade in the same percentage, yet she is increasing it by larger amounts than Germany. These gentlemen opposite are the men who talk about loyalty to the British Empire, and who taunt gentlemen on this side with being disloyal. Was there ever a more disloyal sentiment uttered on the floor of Parliament, than that uttered by the hon. member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) with respect to the British Empire. I see the hon. gentleman is laughing, but he laughs at the wrong side of his mouth sometimes. Those gentlemen opposite have attempted to delude the people of this country. They told the farmers that they paid no taxes, but the farmers knew to the contrary. The late Finance Minister stated in North Ontario during an election campaign, that all the butter bought at 20 cents per pound had been sold and all the money returned to the Treasury without the loss of one cent to the country. But that same gentleman had to answer me across the floor of the House afterwards that they only received 14·38 cents. No wonder that his party considered him an able Finance Minister, because it must have taken some sort of financing and ledgerdmain to make 20 cents a pound and expenses, out of 14·38 cents. That is the way the late Government tried to delude the people of this country. Long may the farmers bless the day when the hon. members who now occupy the treasury benches were returned to power. When the history of Canada is written, the tariff Bill of our noble leader, Hon. Wilfrid Laurier and his Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding), and of Sir Richard Cartwright, and of Mr. Paterson, the Controller of Customs, and of all the gentlemen who assisted them will go down to posterity as the dawn of a brighter day in the history of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I may say, that the salt industry hardly receives justice in the tariff as it stands at the present time.

Mr. FOSTER. Ah, ah.

Mr. McMILLAN. You may say "Ah, ah." but you were the father of the present tariff on that industry, and you have got to father it, whatever it is. I may say that there has been more money lost in the salt industry in the county I represent, than was ever made. A large number of salt wells in that county were closed up on account of the depression of trade, and we all know that if a salt well is run for a few years, and if the plant is left unused for a short time, it rots more rapidly than if it were kept in operation. We have to complain of the large quantity of salt that comes into this country free of duty. Let me quote to you the number of pounds of salt that are imported free of duty :

From	Pounds.
Great Britain.....	163,579,132
Dutch West Indies.....	707,780
French West Indies.....	2,823,430
Italy	13,123,800
Spain	6,371,800
United States.....	5,349,120

Now, while that large amount is imported into Canada I think it is the duty of the Government to amend the tariff Bill. It may be of benefit to import from Great Britain as the salt is brought in ballast in the vessels, and it enables them to take back their freight a little cheaper than they otherwise would ; but there is no such benefit in the case of the foreign countries. This free salt bears very heavily upon the province of Ontario. All the salt produced in Canada is produced in that province, and in view of that fact we might expect to see that the province of Ontario would pay less upon salt than any other province of the Dominion. Such, however, is not the case. The total duty collected on salt imported into Canada is $4,580 and of that, the province of Ontario pays $2,848, and the rest of the Dominion only $1,737. While Ontario pays $2,848, Quebec only pays $184 ; Manitoba, $779 ; British Columbia, $554 ; Prince Edward Island, $131 ; Nova Scotia, $63 ; New Brunswick, $8. Therefore, the province of Ontario although, she has the largest salt deposits of any province in Canada, pays the largest amount of duty. That is not as it should be. There are several reasons for this. One is, that because of the enormous railway freights our manufacturers have to pay, they cannot send their salt from the western part of the province of Ontario to the eastern markets. I will give some instances of these enormous railway freights. In Canada it costs 10 cents per 100 pounds to carry salt 110 miles from Seaforth to Niagara, and in the United States, it costs only 2½ cents per pound to carry salt from Warsaw to Niagara, a distance of 60 miles. From Syracuse to Hamilton, 215 miles, the rate is 7½ cents per 100 pounds or $3.48 per 100 pounds, per hundred miles. Salt is a very weighty commodity, and so our salt manufacturers cannot send their salt to the eastern provinces to compete against the salt that comes in bulk in British vessels. From Seaforth to Hamilton, eighty-four miles, the rate is 9 cents per hundred pounds or 10.71 cents per hundred pounds per hundred miles, against 3.48 cents per hundred pounds per hundred miles in the United States. So that our salt manufacturers have no chance with the large amount of salt that comes into this country free, and with the heavy railway rates against them. I have letters in my possession to prove every word I have said with respect to this matter, which I think should be taken into consideration. If nothing else can be done, and if the gulf and sea fisheries are to have their salt free, let a duty be put upon that salt, and let a refund be given to the fishermen ; but do let the other provinces have the advantage of free salt, which they have not naturally, as against us in the province of Ontario.

Now, the farmers of Canada have a just grievance in respect to railway rates. I have a list of the carrying rates in operation to-day in the whole United States, east of the Mississippi River, as compared with those in operation in Canada. There are six classes of freight in the United States, and ten classes in Canada. The following table gives a comparison between the two countries in regard to first-class, middle-class and lowest class freight, the rates being per hundred pounds in each case :

Miles.	UNITED STATES.			CANADA.
	1st Class.	3rd Class.	5th Class.	1st Class.	5th Class.	9th Class.
	cts.	cts.	cts.	cts.	cts.	cts.
65.....	22	15	8	28	14	11
115.....	24	19	8½	38	19	14
160.....	28	20	10½	42	21	17
335.....	37	23½	13	66	33	26
475.....	45	30	18	78	39	29
565.....	76½	52	31½	86	43	32

These are circumstances which certainly tell very hardly against the Canadian farmer as compared with his brother farmer across the line ; and I have been strictly informed that these are the prevailing rates to-day.

Now, I would like to draw the attention of the House to one little transaction which I was a party to. A car-load of apples was shipped from Seaforth to Price Albert to Mr. Davis, the representative of Saskatchewan, and I had a son at Prince Albert who purchased three car-loads of cattle, and had them shipped to Montreal. Now, the freight on the cattle was $190 per car, while the freight on the carload of apples, although the haul was thirty or forty miles shorter, was $518. I have in my pocket the receipt for the money that was paid. Certainly a car-load of apples does not give a railway company so much trouble as a car-load of cattle. The cattle have to be taken out of the cars at different stations to be fed and watered, while a car-load of apples is simply carried to its destination without being disturbed ; and yet the freight on the apples was nearly three times as much as that on the cattle. Thousands of dollars would have been saved last year to the farmers of Ontario if the railway companies had been willing to carry apples to the North-west for a dollar a barrel, and the farmers of the North-west would have got apples at $2.50 or $3 a barrel ; but as it was, the apples had to be left rotting in the orchards of Ontario, and we could do nothing with them. Now, so much money has been spent by the people of Canada upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the Grand Trunk Railway is so indebted to the people of Canada, if it ever pays the debt, that we should have some consideration from these railroads ; but these railway companies are only soulless corporations, and do as little as they can for the farmer of this country. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, and I apologize for trespassing so long upon your time.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Speaker, at this late hour of the evening I do not intend to trespass upon the time of the House at any great length. In fact, I had intended to reserve any remarks I had to make for the specific debate on the differential or reciprocal resolution. As I shall be absent from the House during next week, I thought it only proper that I should place upon record my own views in respect particularly to that feature of the tariff which has been brought down. For eighteen years the Liberal party have been decrying the Conservative party and the National Policy. Certainly the Government's own friends have been considerably disappointed at their unexampled vaulting. They have not attacked the National Policy in principle, but they have meddled with it in detail sufficiently to disturb the industrial development of the country seriously, I fear.

As my remarks are to be directed particularly towards the reciprocal feature of the tariff, I will proceed immediately to discuss that feature. I presume that there is not a man occupying a seat in this House who is not anxious to recognize in some way or other the debt of gratitude we owe to the mother country. We owe the mother country considerable that is not recognized by the people of Canada generally. Just in what way that debt should be paid, I am not prepared this evening to suggest. For the immense advantages we derive from the oversight which Great Britain exercises in distant quarters of the globe over our commerce, and for the benefits conferred upon us by her consular agencies in every corner of the world, we have hitherto paid nothing. There is not in contemplation any provision that we shall in the near future pay anything, but I scarcely think this the proper way to recognize this debt of gratitude. Great Britain is extending to her colonies no favours; she is extending no favours to any country. She simply pursues a line of policy that, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, is adapted to the development of her industries and the extension of her trade. Still, as we owe her a debt of gratitude, which has never been recognized in any way, I, for one, am prepared to give my support to any special and reasonable recognition of that debt of gratitude and repay it in some way, and I think that there is throughout the country a feeling that England should have, in return for the favours granted us, as far as the colonial world is concerned, some differential treatment, some special favour in matters of trade. But while I recognize that as the correct principle to adopt and am strongly in its favour, yet I think that the principle incorporated in these resolutions is a bad one—bad, not because it shows any special favour to England but because it shows no special favour to England. Before I take my seat I think I can successfully show to this House, that not only does this Government's policy not differentiate in favour of England but it hands over to England's commercial enemies—aye, Sir, and her political enemies as well—favours equally as great as it extends to the mother country. If these resolutions are constitutional these favours must be extended to Belgium and Germany. Now, I express no opinion as to whether or not these particular resolutions discriminate against these countries which have the benefit of the most-favoured-nation clauses in their treaties with Great Britain. I am not going to rest my case upon that particular view. But what I claim is that this Parliament has no power to pass those resolutions on other grounds. If we pass these resolutions they must be disallowed, or rather if we implement them in a statute, that statute must be disallowed by Her Majesty. So far as the most-favoured-nation clause in treaties like Belgium and Germany's treaties with England is concerned, there have prevailed two diametrically opposite opinions. There is the American view and there is the European view, the one diametrically opposed to the other. The American view has been asserted by the United States time and time again, and it is this: that in a treaty between two sovereign powers, those mutual agreements contemplate, not obligations in the ordinary sense of the term, but simply that one high contracting party shall extend to the other the same degree of comity it extends to other nations. That view was adopted, in the first place, by a very clear-headed statesman, eminent in the councils of his country, John Quincy Adams. Since that time it has been reaffirmed by Clay, by Livingston, by Gallatin, by Frelinghuysen, by Evarts, by Bayard, and by different American foreign secretaries, from time to time, and it received an authoritative recognition from the highest court of the United States of America in the year 1886. In the judgment which was given in the case of Bertram vs. Robertson, will be found this authoritative statement of the American view, and according to that judgment, the most-highly-favoured-nation clauses in a treaty were agreements that a parity of comity should be extended by the one high contracting party to the other—that there should be no differential treatment so far as mere comity is concerned, but that they did not concern concessions made by one of the contracting parties for valuable consideration or a return for concessions made in order to obtain the same. In accordance with the American view, these most-highly-favoured-nation clauses in treaties do not prevent either party entering, for a valuable consideration, into a special treaty with another power for reciprocal concessions, and neither of the high contracting parties is entitled to claim the special favours extended by that special treaty to the other. But while that is the American view, they also hold that if either of the high contracting parties should extend to a third outside party gratuitous favours, that would be a violation of the treaty containing the most-highly-favoured-nation clause. I will read the judgment of the Supreme Court on the construction of the treaty with Denmark, by which Denmark was entitled to the most-highly-favoured nation treatment at the hands of the United States. In this treaty was a stipulation that if either contracting party granted a particular favour to any third nation in respect to commerce, that favour should immediately become common to the other party who should enjoy the same freely if freely made to the third party, or upon allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional. Subsequent to that treaty, the United States entered into a treaty with Hawaii by virtue of which reciprocal concessions with regard to trade were made between the two powers, allowing a certain schedule of articles to be admitted into the United States free of duty in return for a like concession on the part of the state of Hawaii. A merchant in New York claimed on an importation of molasses from St. Croix, one of the West Indies, a part of the dominions of the King of Denmark, a reduction of the duty, on the ground that he was entitled to it under the special agreement between the United States and Hawaii, which he claimed should apply also to importations from St. Croix. He paid the duties under protest and sued the treasury officer for the money received. The case was transferred from the ordinary court of New York to the Circuit Court of the United States, and finally came up before the Supreme Court of that country and the judgment was delivered by Mr. Justice Field. It is unnecessary for me to read the whole judgment and I shall read only some extracts. Speaking of this particular provision in the treaty, Justice Field said :

Mr. McMILLAN.

These stipulations, even if conceded to be self-executing by way of a proviso or exception to the general law imposing the duties, do not cover concessions like those made to the Hawaiian Islands for a valuable consideration. They were pledges of the two contracting parties, the United States and the King of Denmark, to each other, that, in the imposition of duties on goods imported into one of the countries which were the produce or manufacture of the other, there should be no discrimination against them in favour of goods of like character imported from any other country. They imposed an obligation upon both countries to avoid hostile legislation in that respect. But they were not intended to interfere with special arrangements with other countries founded upon concession of special privileges. The stipulations were mutual, for reciprocal advantages. "No higher, or other, duties" were to be imposed by either upon the goods specified; but, if any particular favour should be granted by either to other countries, in respect to commerce or navigation, the concession was to become common to the other party upon like consideration, that is, it was to be enjoyed freely, if the concession were freely made, or on allowing the same compensation if the concession were conditional.

According to that judgment, a nation enjoying the most-highly-favoured-nation treatment, was entitled to enjoy freely benefits which were granted freely by the other contracting power to an outside party, as a matter of comity. Mr. Justice Field said the clauses were to be considered together, and that the merchant was not entitled to a return of the duties for the simple reason that Denmark had not up to that stage offered to give to the United States, the benefit of the specific tariff that Hawaii had extended to the United States, and until she did that she was not in a position to claim the benefit of the treaty to that extent.

Now, the other night, during this debate, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) who is well versed in these matters, did not venture to express the opinion that the United States view supported his at all, in fact, if I may so say, he damned the United States view with faint praise. The United States view is also expressed in the second volume of Wharton's Digest of International Law, pages 37, and following. That view is there summed up in a few words which the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce read to the House as follows:—

A covenant to give privileges granted to the "most-favoured nations" only refers to gratuitous privileges, and does not cover privileges granted on the condition of a reciprocal advantage.

Let me call the attention of the House for one moment to the weakness of the argument of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has invoked the aid of the United States authorities to the destruction of the Government's contention. We extend this benefit of a reduced schedule of customs duties to England, not expressly by name, but it inures to the benefit of England. If it inures to the benefit of England, is that concession made to England as a matter of comity or gratuity, or is it extended to England in return for certain concessions made by England to Canada? We all know that England's tariff is a free trade tariff, and we do not get in exchange for our concession any consideration. It is a pure gratuity. Therefore, if the most-favoured-nation clause applies to this case at all, by the American view the concession to England violates the treaty, as we do not extend it in return for any concessions made by England to us. Now, there is the English, or, rather the European view. The European view of these treaties has been maintained persistently by England down to the present time. I shall not go into a historical resume of the times or occasions England has asserted it. That would be unnecessary. But I will state that she has claimed it down as late as 1895. In the report, extracts from which were read to the House by the ex-Minister of Finance the other day, it is claimed. A succinct statement of England's views is given in his report so far as the German and Belgian treaties are concerned. In that return, Grey said :

These treaties (1) Do not prevent differential treatment by the United Kingdom in favour of British colonies. (2) They do prevent differential treatment by British colonies in favour of the United Kingdom. (3) They do not prevent differential treatment by British colonies in favour of each other.

This view was conveyed to this Parliament in the year 1882 in response to an application by the Parliament of Canada to have closer trade relations with England discriminating against other colonies. The despatch to the Home Government contains the report of the committee of the Privy Council which was approved by the Governor in Council, October 26th, 1882. In it we find two clauses in which Canada protests against the English view of these treaties :

The Minister observes that although the Canadian Government are not at present prepared to propose any plan for the commercial convention with Jamaica or the West Indies generally, they feel it necessary to record their dissent from the principle hereby laid down, that as between portions of the said Empire no duties discriminating in favour of British as against foreign industry can be sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government.

He goes on further :

That, in accordance with this precedent, the Canadian Government claim that it is competent for any of the colonies possessing representative and responsible governments to enter into mutual agreement for their partial or absolute free trade with the mother country or with each other or with both, discriminating against other countries.

The same principle should also apply to the Crown colonies ; but, as their action must be through Her Majesty's Government, it is evident that their wishes cannot be carried into effect without the sanction of the Imperial Executive. Negotiations with such colonies does not seem to promise any beneficial results until this principle is conceded—that trade should be rendered as free as practicable between the various portions of the Empire, having regard solely to their own interests, and unfettered by any obligations to treat others with equal favour.

In reply to this despatch, England denied to Canada the right to legislate as Canada proposed to legislate, with respect to trade with Great Britain, discriminating against foreign countries. Afterwards, in the year 1891, England interposed in the case of a treaty that had been made between Spain and the United States, interposed at the very instance of Canada herself ; and this country is estopped from disputing the English view, as it is on record as our construction of the most-favoured-nation clause. England urged our claim and urged it successfully. Now, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) referred to this digest the other day, citing the text in support of the proposition that Germany had abandoned that contention. Germany has done no such thing. I will read the text :

Your despatch of the 8th ultimo has been received. You report that Mr. Carter, the special envoy from Hawaii to England and Germany, had succeeded in inducing the German Government to yield the point assumed by those governments, that the most-favoured-nation clause in their treaties with Hawaii entitled them to equal privileges in regard to imports with those obtained by the United States by the reciprocity treaty with the same country, and that no definite understanding had been reached with England, although it was probable that the proposition made by that government would be accepted.

Now, it is true that Germany waived it, but Germany waived it as a matter of arrangement with the United States. She did not waive it as a principle, she did not acknowledge for a moment that it was not borne out by international law, but she waived it simply as a business arrangement with the United States, and in order that goodwill should be maintained between those countries, and rather than have a long diplomatic contest with the United States. But we have another instance of the German and Belgian view of these clauses that is contained in a despatch from the Home Government to our Government. It will be found on page 12 of the Sessional Papers of 1883. The despatch is as follows :—

Downing Street, 27th Feb., 1882.

Sir,—With reference to my letter of the 7th January last, I am directed by the Earl of Kimberley to acquaint you that His Lordship is informed by the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels and her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin, in accordance with their instructions, placed themselves informally in communication with the Belgian and German governments as to the exemption of the Dominion of Canada from the stipulations of Article XV. of the Anglo-Belgian Treaty of 1862, and of Article 7 of the Commercial Treaty of 1865 with Germany.

That, I may say parenthetically, is the particular section that creates the difficulty in the present instance.

Her Majesty's Minister at Brussels has now reported that, in the opinion of the Belgian Government, the exemption desired by the Dominion of Canada would necessitate the denunciation of the Treaty of 1862, and the negotiation of a fresh treaty to replace it, and Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin has learnt that, in the opinion of the competent German authorities, it would not be either convenient or desirable to abrogate single articles of the Treaty of 1865, apart from a general revision of the whole instrument, for which, however, there did not appear to be any immediate necessity.

So far for the statement of the American and continental views of the most-favoured-nation clause. But I do not rest my argument that we have no power to pass this resolution on the ground that it discriminates against these countries ; I do not rest it there, although I do not concede that it does not discriminate, but I rest it on the ground that this resolution is a violation of the terms of the treaties by curtailing the rights which are guaranteed thereby to Belgium and Germany. The right which Belgium and Germany have under these treaties is an absolute and unconditioned right, and this Parliament proposes to take from those powers an absolute and unconditional right, and substitute therefor a conditional right. Now, in order to understand this fully, let us turn to the particular clauses of the German treaty. There are four or five clauses which bear upon this case. The first I shall read is as follows:—

II. The produce and manufacturers of the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty which may be imported into the Zollverein, and the produce and manufactures of the States of the Zollverein which may be imported into the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, whether intended for consumption, warehousing, re-exportation, or transit, shall therein be treated in the same manner as—

Now mark the particular words :

—and in particular shall be subject to no higher, or other, duties than the product and manufactures of any third country, the most-favoured in these respects.

There you will see that there is nothing said about treaties made with other powers. Goods coming from England into Canada should be admitted at no less customs duty than goods coming from Germany. It does not depend upon any special contract with any nation, but the stipulation in that treaty is this, which by the British view is binding, that goods coming into Canada irrespective of the country from which they come, shall not be admitted at less customs duty than similar goods coming from Germany. Now, there is another clause relating to the exportation which it is unnecessary for me to read, because it does not bear upon the case before us. I may say that there is a later clause which brings all the British colonies within the scope of this section.

V. Any favour, privilege, or reduction in the tariff or duties of importation or exportation, which either of the contracting parties may concede to any third power, should be extended immediately and unconditionally to the other.

Now mark those words. Remember that although it says "other powers," other high contracting powers, there is a later clause which applies all these cases to the British colonies. It is as follows:—

VII. The stipulation of the preceding Articles I. to VI. shall also be applied to the colonies and foreign possessions of Her Britannic Majesty. In those colonies and possessions the produce of the states of the Zollverein shall not be subject to any higher or other import duties than the produce of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, or of any other country of the like kind. Nor shall the exportations from those colonies or possessions to the Zollverein be subject to any higher or other duties than the exportation to the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland.

Article V. reads :

Any favour privilege, &c., &c., should be extended immediately and unconditionally to the other.

Now let us look at that for a moment. Under that section we find that if British goods come in here—I do not care what arrangement may have the effect of letting them in, the fact of their coming in is what we must look to, the fact of their being admitted—if British goods come into this country at a 25 per cent rate, we will say, then we have got immediately and unconditionally to extend that privilege to every state that comes within this most highly-favoured-nation clause. What does the Government propose to do? Do they propose to extend it unconditionally? No, Sir. English goods come in at 25 per cent. What about Germany? Can she get her goods in at 25 per cent absolutely and unconditionally? No. But you say to her: We will give England the privilege of bringing in her goods at 25 per cent, and we will give you the same privilege provided you do the same, or as the Government contend, provided we made as much out of the arrangement as you do. But there is no such condition in the treaty. Germany and Belgium are entitled to it entirely and unconditionally, yet the Government has attempted to read conditions into this treaty. But not only have they read conditions, but they have read conditions which no self-respecting state on earth can accept. Now what are they? What has been done whenever there has been discrimination heretofore made by one country in favour of another? I have looked through all the treaties that have been entered into since commercial treaties were made by Great Britain, and all that were ever made by the United States, and I fail to find any provision in principle like this. They have all proceeded on the principle of giving either absolute free trade in certain articles, or giving a schedule with certain duties annexed, on the terms of which the United States or Great Britain or other states centralized with another state would admit goods into their country, and specifically naming certain articles and certain duties in accordance with which the other contracting power would admit into their territory goods from either Great Britain or the United States or other first power. But that principle is not adopted here. Now, I say that this resolution annexes conditions to Germany's rights and other favoured-nations' rights that no self-respecting state can accept. What are those conditions? We do not give to Germany and Belgium the right to come in here provided their tariff is reduced to a certain maximum the same in all cases. Their treaty right is that unconditionally they shall have the privilege of putting their goods in here at the same rate that goods from any other place come in. But we say to them: You can bring your goods into Canada provided you disarrange your whole fiscal system and make the Controller of Customs of Canada dictator as to your tariff, and impose as a maximum rate whatever the Controller of Customs of Canada says. What self-respecting power for one moment would enter into an arrangement like that? Imagine for a moment astute men like those of Germany negotiating such a treaty with Great Britain, or an astute man like the Belgian Minister negotiating such a treaty, if for one moment it was contemplated that their goods should only be admitted into the colonies provided they gave up the control over their own tariff rates and allowed foreign controllers to fix the maximum rate of the tariff for exportation to Great Britain or to her colonies. I therefore say that if the reciprocity resolution is good and does not discriminate it must inure immediately under the terms of those treaties—not under the terms of the Belgian treaty, but under the German treaty—for the benefit of Germany and all other nations entitled to most-favoured treatment in commerce and trade. But I do not wish to be understood as conceding for one moment that this tariff does not discriminate against countries entitled to the benefit of the most-highly-favoured-nation clause. There is an element of discrimination in it. This resolution may mean many things. If it has one meaning, it discriminates indirectly, although it may not do so directly. The Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and the Controller of Customs have been asked in regard to the interpretation to be placed on this clause, but they have maintained a perfect reticence. The interpretation must be put ultimately by the law courts of the country, and the Crown officers of Great Britain who will advise Her Majesty in regard to it. The particular resolution reads as follows:—

15. That when the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which, on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the Reciprocal Tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce, or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the Reciprocal Tariff set forth in Schedule D.

(a.) That any question that may arise as to the countries entitled to the benefits of the Reciprocal Tariff, shall be decided by the Controller of Customs, subject to the authority of the Governor in Council.

(b.) That the Controller of Customs may make such regulations as are necessary for carrying out the intention of the two preceding sections.

I humbly submit that as a matter of treaty construction and international law, the meaning of that clause is this: that if you take the total imports into Canada of the products of any other country, and it is found in Canada that the duties levied on them is a certain per cent. and after reducing that percentage by 25 per cent, one-quarter of itself, it is equivalent to or above the percentage of duty levied by such country upon the products of Canada, then is that country entitled to the benefit of the reciprocal tariff. To take a specific case: Our tariff on those articles in respect to which we propose to reciprocate is eighteen and a fraction, and in Germany the tariff on those articles is 9·5. These are about the respective rates on the articles which are to be looked to in order to bring into force that reciprocal tariff. If we throw off from the Canadian tariff the 25 per cent provided for in the reciprocal tariff, our tariff will be reduced to a shade under 14 per cent. Germany's tariff is 9·5 per cent. I claim as a matter of construction of this diction, apart from the matter of treaties and most-favoured-nation clauses entirely, that Germany is within the clause. If you grant it to Germany, you grant it to a commercial enemy. But it must not only be given to that nation, but also to the Netherlands, which is practically a free trade country, to Belgium, which has an average tariff of 10 per cent on these, and also to Switzerland, and I do not know how many other countries. If this clause has not the meaning which I have attributed to it, it may have another meaning—if under all the circumstances the impetus to be given to trade and manufacture by the privilege of exporting the articles of the reciprocal tariff list that can be produced in Canada and the benefit to be derived therefrom is in the opinion of the Controller of Customs equal to the similar benefits to be derived by any other country from the privilege of exporting like goods to Canada then the reciprocal favour applies to that country. This which I infer is the construction the Government puts upon this resolution is an untenable one. Germany has treaty rights and is entitled to be heard, and the Government proposes by an ex parte judgment of the Controller of Customs to annihilate virtually Germany's rights under the treaties. One view or the other must be accepted; the latter is grossly absurd, and if the first is accepted then these different countries are entitled to reductions under the tariff and the claim of favouring England is false and hollow. Indirectly there is discrimination, if the latter view be taken. Why? Because this country is not saying to France, Belgium or Germany: We will let your goods in on precisely the same terms as those of other countries—but on terms which may be fundamentally different from the terms on which we allow another nation to come in. We must bring this matter down not to the question of benefit which a nation will derive, but on the basis of tariff alone. If English goods come to a certain percentage compared with German goods, then they are to be admitted; otherwise we are discriminating against different nations. The same set of conditions must entitle every nation to come in otherwise we are discriminating between countries. These conditions must be absolutely fixed and not contingent on advantage to be derived by Canada. The power given is an extraordinary one. There is no power more jealously guarded by the people of a country than the treaty-making power. Take for example the United States to the south of us. They have never placed in the hands of the President the treaty power, but it rests in the hands of men elected by the people directly and indirectly. In Great Britain the same principle applies. What is the case here? We are asked to place in the hands of the Controller of Customs and he alone, subject of course to the approval of the Governor General in Council, a power that may bring this Dominion, yes, in fact, the mother country and the Empire into serious conflict with other nations. Every one is aware how jealous nations are in regard to trade. In fact nine-tenths of the wars have arisen out of trade disputes or trade demands. Nevertheless it is proposed to give the Government powers which foolishly or stubbornly exercised may result in peace or war, powers which it is absurd to place in the hands of any man or any set of men. England cannot for one moment endorse such a proposal.

Turning to the matter of the tariff I will say this, that I in common with many hon. members on this side of the House rather feel like congratulating ourselves, that after eighteen years of attack and denunciation, these people who have been attacking and denouncing the Conservatives and their policy, tried to get as near as they could to it, and at the same time to give some pretext to the country for the claim that they have departed from it.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. So near and yet so far.

Mr. POWELL. So near and not so far. Under the Conservative administration and the beneficial results of the National Policy, this country, during eighteen years sprang forward by leaps and bounds, and made progress unparalleled in the commercial history of any country in the world, if we except England's development for the decade following the adoption of free trade.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Particularly in the population of New Brunswick.

Mr. POWELL. That matter has been threshed out time and again. The method of taking the last census failed to reveal increases to the population where the most reliable statistics showed large increases. Both the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries know the truth of what I am going to state as an illustration. Take the census of 1881, and the census of 1891, and compare them in respect to the parish in which I live, the parish of Sackville. Any man who knows, will tell you that this parish has made greater progress during that decade, than probably any other portion of New Brunswick. It has increased in wealth and increased in population. In the lower portion of that rich and populous parish, there are to-day two houses and more, for every house there when the National Policy was introduced in 1879. Notwithstanding this the census of 1891 shows only a very trifling increase over the census of 1881. There is something wrong on the face of the census returns, and what is wrong has been explained over and over again to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He knows it, but he has the figures of the census before him and persists in his unfair course. He is at liberty to make whatever he can out of this cheap device.

Now, if this trade policy of the Conservative party was a bad thing, if it was decimating the population of our country, why was it not immediately wiped out of existence when the Liberals came into power? If protection is a poison, why was not the antidote at once applied? The Liberal Government is holding to the Conservative policy to-day, because they know that it was the greatest stimulant that was ever applied to the trade of this or any other country. During the last campaign the Minister of Marine (Mr. Davies) had two or three stock arguments. One of these was, that it was greatly in the interests of the country and the maritime provinces especially, that they should have free coal oil. From one end of Prince Edward Island to the other, he tried to lead the farmers to believe, that under a Liberal Government all duty would be wiped out and coal oil would be so much cheaper than daylight, that the people would put up the shutters on their windows and burn it even in daytime. But, what has the Liberal Government done with regard to the duty on coal oil? They have reduced the duty by a paltry cent a gallon. The Minister of Marine also told the people that he was going to do away with the iniquitous duty on flour; a duty which the Prime Minister declared to be imposed—he even said “corruptly” imposed—in the interests of the farmers of Ontario, in order to buy their votes; and which he further declared was a tax that should be immediately wiped off the Statute-book, and should not be incorporated in the tariff of any civilized nation except under the extreme financial exigencies of war. But the Liberal Government is in power, and still the duty on flour substantially remains. Is this near to it and yet so far? I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, to take up the time of the House further at this late hour. When the debate on this particular clause comes up, I shall not have the pleasure of being here, as I said at the opening of my remarks, and I wished to place on record my views as to the constitutional features of this resolution. I believe this resolution bad in the light of international law, bad in the light of commercial principle, and that it is a cheap subterfuge to deceive—as this Government have been deceiving since their accession to power—the electorate of this country.

Mr. MACDONNELL (Selkirk). Mr. Speaker, I desire to address myself for a few moments to a paragraph in the speech delivered last night by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Roche). Speaking of the editor of the Winnipeg "Tribune," the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) said :

The hon. gentleman's training as editor of the Winnipeg "Tribune" has not been conducive to placing facts in a fair and proper light here. As to stuffing ballot boxes in Manitoba, there were many charges, but how many convictions? Out of all the arrests—some 18 or 20—there was but one conviction, and that on the gentleman's own evidence. And that, if I mistake not, was not so much a case of ballot stuffing. He initialled some ballots after the election, acting in concert with the stool-pigeon of the Liberal party, the man Freeborn. He was to take these to the Conservative committee and try to levy blackmail, and, if successful, to divide the spoils with the deputy returning officer, Freeborn. But the Conservative committee refused to be blackmailed, and Freeborn handed over the ballots to the Liberals. And it was a strange thing that the bondsman of the man who was arrested was the Liberal candidate, Dr. Rutherford. There was only one conviction, and that is how it happened. But how would the hon. gentleman explain what has taken place in the same constituency within the last week or so ?

This latter statement refers to recent transactions about which I know nothing. After accusing the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) in this way, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Roche) in the succeeding sentences becomes himself a brilliant example of that very fault which he attributes to my hon. friend the member for Lisgar. As to the statement that Freeborn was a stool pigeon of the Liberal party, the evidence in the election trials proved that Freeborn was sent by the Conservative organization of Ontario to the province of Manitoba, to work in conjunction with the Conservative organization there, for the purpose of stuffing the ballot boxes in that province, and for the purpose of instructing the deputy returning officers, appointees of the Conservative Government, as to the best method of stuffing these ballot boxes. It is a little bit peculiar—but I suppose we are not to be surprised—that, whenever the sins of the Conservative party find them out they at once seek to make it appear that the Liberal party is responsible for them. However, in this case we have the proof, that the Conservative organizers were guilty, for we have a telegram from Robert Birmingham to Nat Boyd at Neepawa. The date of this telegram is the 20th of May; it was sent from Toronto, Ont., by Robert Birmingham to Nat Boyd, and it refers to this same man Freeborn. It reads as follows:—

He was a first-class man in North Bruce.

(Sgd.) ROBERT BIRMINGHAM.

That telegram came out in evidence at the election trial, and I think that it disposes of the charge that Freeborn was a stool pigeon of the Liberal party. The facts in this connection were that, after the election, the Conservatives failed to make good their agreement with Freeborn, failed to pay him for the dirty work he had done for them, and Freeborn having been betrayed by the Conservative party, felt that he was justified in placing the information in his possession in the hands of the Liberal party. This was done by placing in the hands of certain officials ballots taken from the polls at Carberry—ballots which should have been placed in the ballot boxes, but for which others were substituted, and these ballots he gave to the Attorney General of Manitoba with the statements of the facts. Now, I propose to quote at length, in order to place it on record, a statement of the facts as contained in the speech of the Attorney General of Manitoba. This speech was delivered in the Manitoba legislature on Monday evening, the 29th of March, of this year :

Hon. Mr. Cameron said he had told the House some time ago of his intention to make a statement in connection with the election prosecutions. Possibly, an apology was due the House for it being delayed so long, but a variety of circumstances had prevented until now. In speaking on the question generally, there was very little to say, because he thought the whole House, irrespective of party considerations, would agree with any remarks that might be made with regard to keeping the ballot system free from any suspicions of party manipulation. He believed it was hardly necessary to make the statement that the members of this House and the public generally looked upon any tampering with the ballot box, any method of thus taking away votes, as akin to treason. A blow struck at the ballot box was a blow struck at the liberty of the nation. Under our system of government, the will of the people was expressed at the ballot box, and if that was tampered with, it would be impossible to know what the will of the people was. When these prosecutions were first undertaken, some objection was made because of the violation of the secrecy of the ballot, but the discussion that had taken place since had removed that objection. It was true that one of the objects to be secured in the vote by ballot was the secrecy of the vote, for the purpose of preventing intimidation, but that was not the only object, and if there was some evidence of a crime in connection with the ballot box by which the views of the electors were being misrepresented, it would be a remarkable thing even on general principles if individual electors could not be called and asked in the witness box how they voted. That this was quite in keeping with the principle of the ballot was shown by the fact that in England each ballot is numbered, so that, should an inquiry arise, each ballot can be traced to the man who polled it. Such was also, he believed, the case in Ontario. However, the matter had lately not been heard of, as the chief justice at Portage la Prairie decided to admit this evidence after consultation with his brother judges, and it was, therefore, admitted.

Shortly after the election in June, information came to the Attorney General which led him to believe that there had been a deliberate conspiracy entered into with the object of stealing the constituency of Macdonald in that election, that the method by which that was to be done was to employ as deputy returning officers men who would manipulate the ballots so that the ballot cast for one candidate would be destroyed, and a ballot already prepared and marked for the other candidate substituted therefor, and placed in the box. The theory of the Crown was that there was a conspiracy, and it was believed to be so widespread as to cover the whole constituency and to extend to other constituencies as well. He did not need to remind the House of the size or configuration of the constituency of Macdonald, stretching about 50 or 70 miles from east to west, and about 85 or 90 miles from north to south. It is traversed by three lines of Railway—the C.P.R. main line, the Glenboro' branch, and the M. & N. W. Railway. On each of these lines are incorporated towns and villages, besides a number of villages not incorporated. Information received from various sources then showed a conspiracy embracing these towns and villages, and so widespread in its operations as to lead to the formation of the theory of which he had already spoken. So much had appeared in the newspapers regarding this part of the question that it was unnecessary for him to say anything further. He would say, in passing, that so far as the new ballot was concerned, the Durocher ballot, experience had proved that it was a failure, especially in preventing tampering and substitution when the counterfoil was removed. In regard to its shape, size and matter of the counterfoil, the new ballot was very much easier to conceal in the hand and manipulate than many other ballots, say for instance, that in use in the provincial elections. Nor need he say anything of the gravity of the offence, which is admitted by men of all parties. The office of deputy returning officer is a very important one. He is the custodian of the ballot box, and the judge of election. He should do his duty faithfully, without respect to party leanings or affiliations. In fact, his oath deals clearly with the nature of his duties and how he is to perform them. Hon. Mr. Cameron then read the two oaths which the deputy returning officer must take before the opening and after the closing of the poll. He pointed out that this showed the serious manner in which the law regarded the office of deputy returning officer.

In pursuance of the information originally received, a persistent attempt was made to obtain further evidence. The Dominion Government was notified of the case and of the information of the Attorney General as to a conspiracy. The Dominion Government was naturally interested in this matter, because it was a federal election, the returning officer was an appointee of that Government direct, and the deputies were appointed indirectly, through him. Moreover, the Dominion Elections Act contemplates the intervention of the Dominion Government in cases which come under that Act. It was quite in accordance with that Act, that communication was opened up with the Dominion Government, and, as he had more than once informed the House, the Department of Justice at Ottawa had fully sanctioned these prosecutions. To speak of the prosecutions in detail might take some time. However, he would endeavour to be as concise as possible.

THE G. B. ANDERSON CASE.

He would deal first with the case of Anderson, which was dealt with at the last assizes, when the jury twice disagreed, and which was postponed on the application of the Crown officers. He would not say more on this, because he had spoken on it before, and because the case was held over for the next assizes, on the statement of Judge Killam, that the case was of a very serious character, that there was important evidence, and that the Crown was within its rights in asking that the case stand over till next spring.

EVIDENCE IN THE HENRY WALLER CASE.

Leaving aside this case, he would go on to take up one brought at Carberry, on the main line of the C.P.R., against Henry Waller. In this case, the accused was committed by the magistrate, but the grand jury returned "No Bill." And here he might speak of a difficulty which presented itself in all these cases. In a case where it is alleged that forty voted for a candidate and only thirty ballots are found in the box, these forty men must be called and put in the box to tell how they voted in order to make a case. But in the lapse of months these voters move away to Ontario, England, Australia, and other places, some die, some become ill, some never having disclosed how they voted are not on hand to give evidence. The first thirty may be easy enough to get, but the evidence of the last ten is always extremely difficult to obtain. In the Waller case, he would read to the House a portion of the evidence which was given at the preliminary investigation when he was sent up for trial. He alluded to the testimony of Freeborn. Freeborn was a witness there, and testified that "the accused had got this scheme in a letter from Robert Birmingham, of Toronto. That he saw Mr. Boyd, the candidate, about midnight, the evening before he saw Waller, the accused. Boyd said not to go out, that a party would be in to see me in the morning. Boyd mentioned no name, but Waller came to my bedroom on Saturday morning, and proposed the ballot scheme."

They then went through the various phases of instruction. In addition, however, to the evidence of Freeborn, there was the evidence of one Scammell. Scammell had been arrested with the others. He had acted as deputy returning officer at Rathwell, on the Southwestern Branch, and gave evidence at the preliminary trial of Waller and also before the grand jury. Scammell said: "Mr. Waller asked me to go up to a room in the hotel with him. The first thing he asked was 'Can you play cards?' I said yes. He said, 'You'll do.' Next he said, 'I want to show you something.' So he took a small piece of paper, folded it up and showed me how to exchange one ballot for another."

Scammell confessed his guilt, and admitted that he himself had substituted six ballots in the ballot box at Rathwell. Mr. Speaker, this is some of the evidence on which Waller was committed, and that evidence was known to the Crown before the prosecution against him was commenced. It was substantially the evidence put in before the grand jury, and yet the grand jury reported "No bill" against Henry Waller.

There was also a deputy returning officer named Brooks, Poll 41, arrested at Carberry, and the following facts were disclosed at the investigation before the magistrate :—

“ At the close of the poll, 36 ballots were shown to be marked for Rutherford, while 41 voters swore before the magistrate that they had voted for Rutherford.”

There was no direct evidence against Brooks, but the circumstances were so suspicious that the magistrate committed him for trial.

JAMES WALLER.

James Waller, a brother of Henry Waller, was also arrested at Carberry on a similar charge. The charge was, however, abandoned by the Crown before any evidence was taken. It appeared that James Waller had made statements to various persons that he could have made the majority for Boyd at his poll as big as he liked. Although it was believed he knew all about the transactions, the evidence was not obtainable, and the charge was abandoned in this case. Possibly, the man was boasting when he made the statements he did, though he may have known all about it.

FINKELSTEIN'S CASE.

One Finkelstein was another deputy returning officer who was arrested at Carberry. In his poll 38 ballots appeared for Rutherford. There was but one rejected ballot, and that was marked for all three candidates, but it was shown that this was put in by a man named Webb. Forty-two voters appeared and swore that they marked their ballots for Rutherford, and there were several witnesses who refused to answer the necessary questions while in the box, and gave evident impression of having been tampered with at the preliminary investigation.

ANDERSON'S TRIAL.

Another Carberry case was that against Thomas Anderson, who was committed for trial and against whom the grand jury found a true bill at the assizes. The case came to trial before the petit jury, and they disagreed. The Attorney General proceeded to quote the following from the charge of the chief justice to the jury in this case :—

“ The return made shows that there were 49 ballots cast for Boyd, 29 for Braithwaite, and 15 for Rutherford. The case which the Crown seeks to make before you is, that it brings here 24 persons who say that they voted for Rutherford, and that these 24 persons did, in fact, vote for Rutherford, but that only 15 ballots were found in the box at the close of the poll marked for him, and the Crown asks you to draw the conclusion that certain of these ballots for Rutherford were withheld and ballots substituted, to the number of nine.”

There was some question as to whether the accused was the deputy returning officer before whom some of the witnesses voted, but there is no doubt Anderson was the man appointed to act at Arizona poll. There were 93 ballots in the box, 93 names on the list, and every ballot initialled by the prisoner ; so the chief justice left it to the jury to say whether the accused was the man or not. The jury disagreed.

CHARGE AGAINST CLARKE.

Another case at Carberry was one against William Clarke. This man was committed by the magistrate, and a true bill found against him by the grand jury, and he was tried at the Portage la Prairie assizes, with the result of a disagreement. The speaker read the following extracts from the charge of the chief justice to the jury in this case :—

When the box was opened at the close of the poll there were found in it 121 ballots of which eighty three were marked for Boyd, ten for Braithwaite, nineteen for Rutherford, and nine were spoiled. Spoiled ballots they were called, but they were really rejected ballots. Four of them were properly good ballots, being marked for the candidate in the square at the end of the name instead of in the disc placed there for that purpose; two of the ballots were marked for both Boyd and Rutherford ; two for Boyd with the counterfoils not torn off ; and one ballot was not initialled by the deputy returning officer. The others were initialled, which, with the eighty-three, ten and nineteen make the 121 found in the box, but in the poll-book only 119 names of persons were entered as having voted. Where, then, did those other two ballots come from ? There is something curious there, at all events. Two ballots too many, and one of these initialled by the accused, so it must have come from him. We are told that while Clarke was out no votes came in, so that the whole of the votes and the only votes in the ballot box were put in while the accused was there. There were in the ballot box, as I say, nineteen ballots for Rutherford, then there was one which was marked for Rutherford which was rejected. That would make twenty, and there were two marked for both Boyd and Rutherford, and that would make twenty-two ballots apparently marked for Rutherford by some person or other. There were 31 who swore that they voted for Rutherford, and that would leave nine, at any rate, unaccounted for. Then we come to the evidence of a conversation with Freeborn by the accused. Freeborn says Clarke came up to him while he was going along the street and said to him : “ How did you get along with the ballots up where you were ? ” And he said, ‘ All right,’ and that then Clarke made the reply, ‘ We gave them a pretty good dose,’ or ‘ We gave them a pretty good shot of it down here.’ Freeborn cannot remember which of these expressions he used, but he says that is the conversation as far as he remembers it.”

The jury disagreed, but the Crown considered the circumstances such as to ask for a remand until the next assizes, which was granted, the accused being released on bail.

MALCOLM ORR.

On the south-western branch there were three arrests at Glenborough, and the Attorney General dealt first with the case of Malcolm Orr, who was committed for trial by the magistrates. Orr's return at the close of the poll was : Boyd, 121 ; Rutherford, 70 ; Braithwaite, 2 ; and spoiled ballots, 5. Of these spoiled ballots, one was marked for all three candidates, and initialled ; one for Boyd and Rutherford, and initialled ; one marked for Rutherford and initialled and with counterfoil on ; one not marked, but initialled, and with with four lines across and initialled. The evidence showed that 78 voted for Rutherford. Of these, one (Ashby) voted for both candidates spoiling his ballot ; Grantham spoiled ballot No. 3, and got another, so that his ballot need not be deducted ; ballot No. 1 has to be deducted, leaving 76 Rutherford ballots to be accounted for as against seventy in the box. In addition, four witnesses believed to have voted for Rutherford refused to answer. W. H. Robertson is in England, R. Steele in Ontario, Thomas Kenyon in England, William Bell could not be found, Wm. Atkinson is in Montreal, W. Thornborough at McGregor, Wm. Robinson in Brussels (Ont.), S. Ezard not known, R. J. Davison in Detroit, and L. F. Kingsley in Winnipeg. These fourteen men were all supposed to be Rutherford voters, and could not be got to the trial. Evidence was also given to show that the accused was under the influence of liquor during poll day.

Robert Roberts and Abram Denison were also arrested, but the cases were abandoned for want of sufficient evidence, though it was known that they interfered with the ballot box and carried it away to the hotel with them.

PARKER AND MAWHINNEY.

In the case of W. J. Parker, of Treherne Poll, there were found in the ballot box at the close of the poll, 52 ballots for Boyd, 46 for Rutherford, 16 for Braithwaite and two rejected ballots. The two rejected ballots were apparently intended for Rutherford, so that it may be said 48 men voted for Rutherford. In this case 49 voters swore before the magistrate that they voted for Rutherford. In this trial, also, there were a number of absent voters unobtainable. Parker received from Anderson, who was deputy returning officer at Arizon, a few days before the election, the sum of $100, but Anderson swears that he intended it for Alexander, the postmaster at Treherne, and that Parker agreed to give it to Alexander for election purposes.

There was also on the south-western line the case against William Mawhinney. A man named Maxwell had for a long time usually acted as deputy returning officer at Holland in Dominion elections, and so far as known to the speaker, had always been a satisfactory official. Maxwell, however, had, unfortunately for himself, a mutilated right hand, most if not all the fingers were off the right hand. Curiously enough, therefore, this Maxwell was not appointed deputy returning officer last June, but Mawhinney was sent all the way from Portage la Prairie to take the poll at Holland. Mawhinney was committed for trial and a true bill was found against him by the grand jury. Notwithstanding the evidence, however, the petit jury acquitted him. The following are some extracts from the charge to the petit jury by His Lordship the chief justice.

"The charge which the Crown makes against him is, that he unlawfully and wilfully destroyed certain ballots which were complete ballots, by having been in the hands of the electors of that district, marked by them and returned to the deputy returning officer to be placed by him in the ballot box. Now, as to the blank ballots, there seems to be some uncertainty as to the exact number sent out to that poll. Mr. Richardson, the returning officer, does not seem to have properly counted them before sending them out, but he has, however, entered in his book the number as being 245. From the return of the ballots used and unused, there would seem to have been 246, and we find an entry in the poll-book used as if there had been 263. This seems to me to go to this length, at any rate, to show great carelessness in the way this part of the work was done, no doubt about that. There is also a want of signature to one of the returns which should have been made in the poll-book, and the accused says it was an oversight that it was not put there. Now, at the polling place there were 160 persons who voted. According to the ballots produced here from the clerk of the Crown in Chancery, there were 84 for Boyd, 34 for Braithwaite, 38 for Rutherford, and 4 rejected. The charge of the Crown is, that a much larger number of people voted for Rutherford than 38, and that, therefore, their ballots must have been destroyed and made away with by the accused. We have called here 46 witnesses who swear that they voted for Rutherford, and you have also heard read the depositions taken before the magistrates of one other, who is too ill to come to this trial, but whose evidence I have admitted, who swore before the magistrate that he had voted for Rutherford. We have, then, 47 who swear that they voted for Rutherford, and, as only 38 ballots were found for him in the box when opened, no doubt, according to that statement, there are 9 ballots for Rutherford unaccounted for. But of these 47 a number of the witnesses seem'd to be uncertain whether they marked their ballots in the first, second or third compartment, and counsel for the defence has built a strong argument on this fact. But, in considering that, you must take into account that that is a thing that works both ways, because, if persons intending to vote for Rutherford made a mistake and voted for another person, there may be people who intended to vote for one or other of the other two candidates, but who by mistake marked their ballots for Rutherford. Then, we have the evidence of this man Freeborn, whose character needs to be defended, as I said before. He is a man who has been engaged in a great deal of crooked work. He admits that he was engaged in crooked work before and about that time in the month of June. He, after that, turned round and disclosed the crooked work that he had been engaged in to another party, and he says he did it from a motive which may be a very improper one—a motive of revenge, certainly not a proper one—because he did not get certain moneys which he claimed he should have received for the work which he had been engaged in, and not having obtained these, he says that he determined to unseat Mr. Boyd, and gave the information which he possessed to other parties for the purpose of an election petition to unseat Mr. Boyd; but he says that, when he did so, he had no idea of criminal prosecutions resulting therefrom. At any rate, he is here, and has given the evidence which you have heard, in which he says that he met Mawhinney. He did not know him before that, and Mawhinney came up and spoke to him, and they then had a conversation over election matters, and he seems to have given the accused the impression that he had been a returning officer himself, and he says the accused said to him, 'I don't think the Grits will get on to me unless Sharpe gives me away.' or something like that, and he says that the accused also told him the number of ballots that he had withdrawn and substituted others for, but he cannot remember how many the accused told him had been disposed of in that way."

Mawhinney himself declared that he had never met Freeborn, and His Lordship advised the jury to be careful about accepting the evidence of the accused person in his own behalf.

M'DOLE'S PETITION.

Another case on the same line of railway was that against James McDole, who was committed by the magistrate for trial. McDole was committed on the evidence very largely of Freeborn, and also on a document which was put in signed by McDole himself. This document is in the form of a petition to Boyd, asking him to resign the seat for Macdonald, and thus save many of his supporters from being proceeded against.

RENWICK AND HAMILTON.

There was also a series of prosecutions undertaken along the line of the Manitoba and North-western Railway. At Poll No. 8, Fred. M. Brown acted as deputy returning officer, and was arrested. In this case, it was proved that Freeborn went to Richardson, the returning officer, who directed him to Brown; that he saw Brown and got 30 blank ballots from him, ten of which he gave to Sanders, of Gladstone. Brown was arrested for manipulating ballots at his own poll, but, owing to the absence of a great number of witnesses in Ontario, the case was not gone on with.

William Renwick, the deputy returning officer at Poll No. 45, near Arden, was arrested and committed by the magistrate for trial. The count at this poll was: Boyd, 56; Braithwaite, 51; Rutherford, 27, and 1 rejected ballot. The deputy returning officer himself voted on a certificate signed by J. H. Howden, of Neepawa, who produced as his authority for that act a letter from Richardson, the returning officer. This was a clear and flagrant violation of the Election Act. It was with great difficulty that Reeve McGregor could get the deputy returning officer to take his oath of office. Thirty-two voters swore they voted for Rutherford, but McNair, Rutherford's agent, and a number of others who voted for Rutherford, were away in Ontario and could not be present.

W. J. Hamilton, of Neepawa, was deputy returning officer for Poll 47. It is alleged that this individual had made the remark at the close of the day that, "Gentlemen had voted during the day for the Conservative ticket, who had never done so before." At this poll, the ballots counted were as follows:—Boyd, 46; Braithwaite, 36; Rutherford, 31; ballots objected to, 2. The evidence showed that William Goodman, the poll clerk, was only here on a visit, his home being in Ontario. He was appointed by the deputy returning officer, but performed none of the duties of a poll clerk, except to write the first name in the book. All the other names were written by Hamilton; in fact, all his other duties were performed by the deputy returning officer. A ballot was given him in a hasty manner by the deputy returning officer, and he had almost proceeded to the polling both when Rutherford's scrutineer challenged his vote, as he was not on the list. The deputy returning officer stated that Goodman's name was on the poll at Glenboro'. It was proven that the name of William Goodman did not appear on the Glenboro' poll or any other poll in the electoral district of Macdonald. The certificates on which R. A. Bruce and the deputy returning officer voted at this poll, were signed by J. H. Howden for the returning officer.

THE McFADDEN CASE.

Moses McFadden was deputy returning officer at poll No. 48, and conducted his poll in a most arbitrary manner. When Rutherford's scrutineer objected to the vote of Alexander McKenzie, he was threatened with arrest. There was something very suspicious about the vote of this Alexander McKenzie. Alexander McKenzie does appear in the poll list at poll 52, but he was at that time acting as hired man for the deputy returning officer, and as he was by no means a man of sufficient substance to have been the owner of the property set down opposite the name of Alexander McKenzie in poll 52, his vote was objected to. Nevertheless he was set down in the poll-book as being in poll 48. One John Robertson voted at this poll, but his name is not on the list, nor is there a certificate to him as agent. As the difference between the count and the proved vote was only one, the case was abandoned by the Crown. A number of other witnesses were not obtainable on account of absence, and it was deemed advisable, under the circumstances not to press for a committal.

SANDERS'S CASE.

Another case on this railway line was the one against George W. Sanders, the deputy returning officer at Tupper. Sanders was tried before the magistrate at Gladstone, committed, and sent for trial at the Portage la Prairie assizes, and the jury there found him guilty. The following extracts are taken from the charge to the jury by His Lordship the Chief Justice, in this case:

"What number of blank ballots were sent out? It is said to be 161. It is remarked that that is rather an odd number—161—as they were done up in pads of 50's and 100's. It is said they counted on the morning that the ballot box was opened to see that there was nothing in it except what should be there, and that they were taken out and counted by different people, and that they may have made a mistake." Continuing, the chief justice refers to Freeborn, one of the witnesses, as follows:—"Now, you saw Freeborn and heard him give his evidence, and I must say there is nothing about his character to be commended. The only thing about it is that he frankly owned up to having been engaged in crooked work. He tells you that he was a Conservative, that he acted for the Conservative party, and that he was engaged in crooked work in connection with elections. Then, after the election was over, not having been paid certain expenses that he thought he was entitled to, he thought he would get the better of the candidate for whom he was working, and have him unseated, and he went and disclosed to the opposite party what he professed to have been engaged in for the purpose of having an election protest, and he tells you that he has been engaged working up evidence in connection with that matter, but that he did not expect criminal prosecutions in connection with it, but that the unseating of Mr. Boyd would be the result. Now, it is very often necessary to use such persons in connection with such matters. Frequently criminals who have been engaged in such matters, and who 'split' on their associates, come forward, and the Crown has to use them for the purpose of bringing other criminals to justice, as the saying is: When knaves fall out, honest men get their own.' He, Freeborn, was subjected to a strict cross-examination, and he told a consistent story, but whether that is true or not is for you to say. He tells you that he gave 10 blank ballots to the accused and he returned nine. Now, all these ballots are produced here and are all initialled by the accused as you will see. * * *

Now, the Crown's theory is that a certain number of persons voted at that election and in place of some of the ballots which those people gave to the deputy returning officer he substituted others, really the ballots in place of the nine which he afterwards gave Freeborn, and which are now produced here. There were 20 witnesses called and they all swore they voted for Rutherford. In the box there were only 16 ballots marked for Rutherford, one rejected marked for Rutherford and Braithwaite, so that there are, according to the theory of the Crown, four ballots at all events which were given for Rutherford for which other ballots were put in the box. The accused differs with Freeborn as to the times Freeborn saw him and showed him how to do it, and also as to the place and says it was on the street, not in the hotel, and says that he told him he didn't care to do it. It was curious the reason that he gave why he refused to do it—because he was not used to sleight-of-hand. It was not because he had any horror of it, or anything of that kind, but that he was not used to sleight-of-hand work and that his hands were too small. Now, we have the evidence of this witness, who shows you how the ballot, after it was given to the accused was folded up, making it very much shorter than its full length, and these nine ballots produced here seem to have all been folded in that way. Now the Crown suggests that is the way he succeeded with a small hand in doing it; folded the ballot up in that way, and it would not then project further than the hand and be noticeable. The accused when in the box made no denial of having folded the ballot for this man Stewart who was the witness before him."

In this case Sanders was found guilty, and after being found guilty such, it had been said, was the horror of Mr. Boyd and his friends of the offence with which Sanders was charged that he, Boyd, at once washed his hands of Sanders and refused to provide bail. But it must be remembered that two bondsmen were required and that one of the two gentlemen on the bond was Mr. McKelvie, president of the Conservative association at Gladstone.

HERRIMAN CASE.

There is still another case, that known as the Herriman case, and a great deal has been said about the terrible injustice which has been inflicted upon this man. Let the circumstances be recalled, and he would prove to the House and the electors of the province that, on the facts as they were known to the Crown before action was commenced, that the prosecution was justifiable. Herriman did not live, and was not an elector in the constituency of Macdonald. He is a gentleman whose record is to be found in the police court and the Superior Court, and in the reported case of the Queen vs. Herriman, Manitoba Law Reports, vol. 8, page 630. Herriman was arrested in 1892 on a charge of gambling and vagrancy, and was sentenced by the magistrate to three months in the common jail. The prisoner appealed and the appeal came before Mr. Justice Killam, and he upheld the conviction made by Police Magistrate Peebles. The learned judge said: "Why, then, should effect be given to the opinion of a witness whose means of forming it and the reliability of whose judgment are unknown? Such a course would be to substitute the judgment of the witness for that of the court. I know of no principle of the law of evidence which would justify this. There was, however, evidence which would justify the magistrate in finding the following facts:—The prisoner practised gaming extensively; he had no other ostensible profession or calling (if gaming can be termed such), by which to support himself. The prisoner was a member of what is called in the evidence of one witness 'a combination' for purposes of gaming; although the nature and purposes of this combination are not shown, at least, it can be inferred, they shared together in some way the profits resulting from their gaming. This combination, within eighteen months, won as large an amount as $3,000 from one party; much of the gaming was carried on in a room leased to the prisoner and another party; in the room was kept a table of a character peculiarly suited for the purposes of gaming, and particularly for a game called 'faro'; in some cases the prisoner or the combination took a 'rake off' or a percentage of the stakes; in a few isolated instances, the prisoner made use of marked cards or fraudulent dice; the prisoner lives in a house apart from the room mentioned and very inexpensively."

That was the individual, Mr. Speaker, who was selected by Wm. Richardson, the returning officer for Macdonald, to act as deputy returning officer at a poll in that electoral district. Now, taking it for granted that the theory of the Crown that there was a conspiracy, is correct, then, there was no place where a skilful operator like Herriman was much required as at the poll at Beaver Creek. The figures at the close of the poll stood this way: Rutherford, 49; Boyd, 27; Braithwaite, 49, and rejected, 4. These figures, on their face, show it to be just the very place where a man who used marked cards and fraudulent dice, should be sent. He, therefore, went to Beaver Creek, which is about 9 miles north of the McGregor station. The original arrangement was that Dr. Eaton, of Carberry, was to act as deputy returning officer, but two or three days before election day, Eaton's appointment was cancelled, and Richardson came to the city of Winnipeg and swore Herriman in there. On June 22, he arrived on the train at McGregor. He was recognized there immediately by an old resident, who knew something of the antecedents of Mr. Herriman, and the people there became very much alarmed that he had come there to practise some nefarious work in McGregor. At once a special constable was sworn in, and Herriman was very closely watched. To the surprise of every one, the next morning, Herriman took a buggy and drove northward, and he appeared at the poll at Beaver Creek to the great astonishment of everybody, and produced his credentials to act as deputy returning officer, and so angry were the electors and the representatives of Rutherford and Braithwaite, that they very plainly informed Mr. Herriman that if they caught him engaged in any crooked work, they would make it extremely lively for him. Under the circumstances, there is no doubt whatever the Crown would have failed in its duty, if, with these facts before it, it had not instituted the prosecution. Although a prima facie case had been made which would justify a committal, it was felt that the evidence was hardly strong enough to secure a conviction at the assizes, and the Crown, therefore, withdrew the proceedings.

There has been a great deal of criticism indulged in over the evidence of Freeborn, and, without speaking at length upon that point, he would once more refer to the statement of the chief justice, that it is in some criminal cases absolutely impossible to secure conviction without the evidence of just such men as he. The Crown feel that they have done their duty in this matter, and the circumstances proven at the various trials show their justification.

It has been stated by one hon. member, that Herriman left the court room with his character cleared. There was no such thing. It was no finding of the magistrate that dismissed Herriman, but it was on the statement of the Crown alone that he was let go, and for the reasons stated. The Crown was in duty bound to probe every case of suspicion to the bottom, and to spare no expense in bringing guilty parties to justice, but events have shown that charges like these are very difficult to prove, and, on account of the extreme difficulty of procuring such clear evidence as would secure a conviction, Herriman was let go, and the proceedings deliberately abandoned by the Crown counsel. Having gone over all the cases where there were arrests, he would just touch upon one again, the Scammell case.

Scammell was the deputy returning officer at Rathwell, and he confessed, and the proceedings against him were abandoned. He (the Attorney-General) had been subjected to a very great deal of criticism in connection with these cases, and it had taken the shape of an organized attack upon himself and his department in connection with a motion by an hon. member, because the department had not commenced proceedings for perjury against a certain individual. He took the stand then, and now, that his department only took hold of such a case after the accused had been committed by the magistrate. The hon. member claimed that in the well-known Chamberlain case, the department had taken the initiative. Such was not the fact. Chamberlain was arrested on June 22, 1893, at the instigation of W. R. Talbot, a private individual, but not on a charge of perjury; he was arrested for personation, and brought before the magistrate on that charge. The case was conducted by Mr. Monkman on behalf of Mr. Talbot, and, after having been remanded from time to time, some evidence was taken in the case. Suddenly, Chamberlain broke his bail and, while the case was still pending, took refuge across the boundary. Two or three months afterwards he reappeared, and was seen in the city of Toronto. It was due to the administration of justice in this province that he should be brought back and punished. A warrant for perjury was accordingly sworn out, executed at Toronto, and Chamberlain was brought back for trial. He was indicted for perjury, and after surmounting several technical objections, he was found guilty and sentenced to three years in the penitentiary, although he was released by the then powers at Ottawa, after serving about a year and a half. That case in no way affected the rule of the department, and no case of perjury has ever been taken up until it has first been brought before the magistrate by some individual.

Some time ago, he was replying to the hon. member for Woodlands, and took occasion to remark, in the Marquette election case, that the counsel for the respondent, Mr. Tupper, admitted to the counsel for the petitioner, that corrupt actions sufficient to void the election had been committed. He had lately received the following letter from Mr. Tupper:—

“Winnipeg, March 23, 1897.

“The Hon. J. D. Cameron, “Attorney-General, Winnipeg.

“Dear Sir,—In the Winnipeg daily “Tribune” report of your speech on Mr. Roblin’s resolution of censure respecting the failure of your department to prosecute Wm. G. King, the petitioner in the Marquette election case, the following appears:—

“Hon. Mr. Cameron—The counsel for the respondent admitted to the counsel for the petitioner, that corrupt actions sufficient to void the election had been committed.

“Mr. Roblin strongly protested against this, and said Hon. Mr. Cameron should not make statements which were not true. He had never heard of any such admission. Hon. Mr. Cameron said he was telling what was absolutely the case in every particular, and Mr. Roblin might rest assured of it.”

“As you are aware, I am Dr. Roche’s counsel, and I am at a loss to understand how you ventured to make the above statement, as it is absolutely untrue that I ever admitted to the counsel for the petitioner that any corrupt act had been committed in connection with the Marquette election by any one, and I may add that in November last, four months after the petition was served, Dr. Roche informed me that, not only was he not personally guilty of any corrupt act, but that, after the most careful inquiry, he was unable to find a single case in which an agent of his had violated the Election Act by the committal of any corrupt act. Under these circumstances, I hope that I shall not appeal to you in vain to state on the floor of the legislature that you find, upon inquiry, that you were not justified in making the above statement respecting myself.

“Yours truly,

“J. STEWART TUPPER.

“P.S.—I am sending a copy of this letter to the ‘Free Press’ and the ‘Nor’-Wester’ for publication.”

While he (Mr. Cameron) was not very familiar with the rules of etiquette as they relate to open letters, yet it seemed to him (the Attorney-General) that when a member of the same profession as himself sends a letter to two newspapers in addition to one directed to himself, that he was called upon to answer it, though he must confess that letter had the appearance of a political manifesto about it.

Continuing, he said he had known for some time the terms of agreement between the two counsel in the Marquette election case. Mr. Ashdown had been defeated by some 60 or 70 votes, and upon asking Mr. Ashdown for further information upon this subject he sent the following letter:—

“Winnipeg, March 26, 1897.

“Hon. J. D. Cameron, city:

“Dear Sir,—In answer to your inquiry regarding the Marquette election protest, I would say that originally I declined to go into a protest until I had facts laid before me that rendered it certain to my mind that I had been done out of my seat by very unfair means. I was not prepared to fight the question if it was only one of technicality, but when I was satisfied that we had good ground on the merits of the question to go ahead, then I instructed that to be done. The mass of evidence which we finally gathered was very considerable, and when the verbal understanding between Messrs. Tupper and Howell was come to regarding the vacating of the seat, I was a consenting party to same; but was not willing that the matter should be left to the memory of those two gentlemen, and therefore at my suggestion a letter dated the 14th December, of which the inclosed is a copy, was written by Mr. Howell after suggestions and changes by myself. Subsequently under date of the 16th Mr. Tupper replied, as per copy inclosed. I thought at the time that Mr. Tupper, having gone over some, at least, of the evidence which we were prepared to offer, was thoroughly satisfied that on the merits of the case his client had no show whatever, and consequently he agreed to the terms set.

“Yours respectfully,

“J. H. ASHDOWN.”

The following is the letter of Mr. Howell, and D. Tupper’s acceptance of the terms of same:—

“December 14, 1896.

“Stewart Tupper, Esq., Q.C., city.

“Re Marquette.

“My Dear Tupper,—Mr. Ashdown has just been with me and has asked me if we have made binding arrangements respecting the settlement in this matter. I think, therefore, it is better that we should have everything in writing, so that there may be no mistake.

"As I understand our arrangement, it is as follows:—

"If the appeal to the full court now standing for judgment herein is decided in your favour, of course that disposes of the whole matter and the petition drops, unless I desire to take it to the Supreme Court. If, on the other hand, the appeal is not allowed, then when the trial comes up on the 16th of January, you or your client will admit such bribery by agents as will void the election. No order is to be made as to costs.

"Please write me confirming these terms, and oblige.

"H. M. HOWELL."

On the 16th of the same month, the following was sent to Mr. Howell:—

"H. M. Howell, Esq., Q.C., Winnipeg:

"Re Marquette.

"My Dear Howell,—I have your letter of the 14th instant, and beg to confirm the terms of our arrangement as therein stated subject, of course, to the trial being postponed until judgment is given on our appeal to the full court.

"Yours truly,

"J. STEWART TUPPER."

Under the circumstances, and with this proof in hand, the Attorney General repeated that what he said on the former occasion was absolutely true. He could not understand Mr. Tupper's denial, in the face of his written agreement, unless that gentleman was trying to draw a fine distinction between admitting bribery by agents and agreeing to admit such bribery when the trial occurred. A distinction evidently without a difference.

Before concluding he would like to say a few words on the difficulties that were encountered in these election cases, and this without reflecting on one party any more than the other. The Chamberlain case was a case in point, and those above mentioned show the extreme difficulty in obtaining convictions in these election prosecutions. It had been said by a great English statesman that an average man's political and partisan feelings are to-day a stronger force than his religious convictions. Be this true or not, we must admit that they are potent and that they invade the jury room, and, what is worse, the witness box. We cannot be blind to this fact, and the speaker was quite aware of it when these prosecutions were started, yet the facts which have since then been made public have amply justified the proceedings which the Crown has taken. He was sure the actions of the department of Justice at Ottawa, and of the Attorney General's Department here under Hon. Mr. Sifton and himself have the approval of the vast majority of the people, including the best elements of the Conservative party, and he hoped it would be the means of securing purity of election throughout the whole province.

In dealing with these election cases, he had confined himself thus far to the district of Macdonald, with the exception of the case of Anderson, whose offence was supposed to be committed in Winnipeg and was tried there. There were evidences of gross wrongs committed in other constituencies. Take, for instance, the electoral division of Lisgar, at poll 45, Barnsley, at which W. O. Taylor was the deputy returning officer. Under the Dominion Election Act two agents and no more are allowed for each candidate and for these alone can certificates be issued if they vote at any other poll than that at which their name appears on the list, but at that poll three certificates were granted to agents. In poll 58, at Swan Lake, where Arthur G. Hawkins was the deputy returning officer, four certificates were granted to agents, although objection was taken to such action.

In Provencher, the officials under the Dominion Election Act simply ran riot, and, as a sample of their doings, he would recite that in Poll 1, where E. J. C. Buron was deputy returning officer, the returning officer granted seven certificates to agents of Mr. LaRivière to vote, and all voted, though objected to. In Poll 4, where Miles McDermott acted, the returning officer had granted no less than twenty-three certificates to agents of Mr. LaRivière to vote at this poll. These were objected to, but the votes were all taken.

In conclusion, he could assure the Speaker and the House that nearly all, if not all, the facts mentioned this evening to the House were known to the Crown, either through Hon. Mr. Sifton or himself, and, in view of that knowledge, there was no other possible course open to the department here, or the Department of Justice at Ottawa, than to institute these prosecutions, and, if possible, bring the guilty parties to justice; and he believed that the people of this province, and in fact the whole of the Dominion, including, as mentioned before, the best elements of the great Conservative party, approved of the duty which had been performed with so much trouble and patience.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have concluded, and I think this statement of facts presented here to-night will prevent a repetition of any such statement as we heard last night from the representative of Marquette (Mr. Roche).

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). I move the first resolution pro forma, and without any intention of keeping the House longer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. With that understanding, I now move that the committee do rise, report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the Prime Minister to adopt the usual course under those circumstances, of allowing the same latitude of discussion of the resolutions in committee, as there would be on the general question. A number of hon. gentlemen who were anxious to speak have deferred their remarks in order to let the House go into committee to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). That has always been understood.

Motion agreed to.

Committee rose and reported progress.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 3rd May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Firman McClure, Esq., for the Electoral District of Colchester.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 23) to incorporate the Methodist Trust Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company.—(Mr. Quinn.)

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 76) to incorporate the British Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 77) to incorporate the Hudson's Bay and Yukon Railways and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Oliver.)

Bill (No. 78) to amend the Act incorporating the Ontario Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

Bill (No. 79) to incorporate the Dominion Portland Cement Company.—(Mr. Britton.)

Bill (No. 85) to incorporate the Hull, St. Louis Dam and Victoria Springs Railway Company.—(Mr. Landerkin, for Mr. Edwards.)

Bill (No. 87) to incorporate the Columbia River Bridge Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

QUEBEC BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. Fiset (for Mr. Langelier) moved second reading of Bill (No. 80) respecting the Quebec Bridge Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like the hon. gentleman to explain this Bill.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Langelier) who has the Bill in charge is not here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not want to prevent the Bill getting a second reading, but we should know what it is about.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I presume that the object of moving the second reading is to give the Bill a stage. I do not myself know what the Bill is.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Is this to build a bridge across the St. Lawrence at Quebec?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have not read the Bill, and I do not know what it is.

Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Bill is not printed, and the order had better stand.

MINING DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION.

Mr. MAXWELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Mining Development and Advisory Corporation of British America (Limited).

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to have the hon. member (Mr. Maxwell) explain this Bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I intended to have presented this Bill, but in my absence it was put on the Order paper by my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell). I have not the Bill with me to-day, but I will be able to explain it later.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose the hon. gentleman will be able, later, to tell us in general terms the object of this Bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Quite so.

Mr. SPEAKER. The order stands.

MYCENIAN MARBLE COMPANY.

Mr. ROSAMOND moved second reading of Bill (No. 83) to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Mycenian Marble Company of Canada (Limited).

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. ROSAMOND. This is a Bill to empower the Commissioner of Patents to grant a patent to the above-named company; the time in which they could apply for the patent and pay the fees having elapsed through some neglect of the clerk.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

CONTINENTAL HEAT AND LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. ROSAMOND moved second reading of Bill (No. 84) to incorporate the Continental Heat and Light Company.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like the hon. member to explain that Bill.

Mr. ROSAMOND. This is the usual Bill for a private company, granting the ordinary powers to enable the company to establish works for the lighting of cities and towns, and also for heating.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

LES CISTERCIENS REFORMES.

Mr. LaRIVIERE moved second reading of Bill (No. 88) to incorporate "Les Cisterciens Réformés."

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. LaRIVIERE. This is to incorporate the Trappist Fathers, who have an establishment in Manitoba, and who intend to have other establishments in Manitoba and the Territories. Their object is to have model farms, and to teach agriculture and other pursuits in that line, and they only ask for powers to have a legal existence as a corporation.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SASKATOON AND BATTLEFORD AND UNION LAKE MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked :

Has the contract for carrying the mails between Saskatoon and Battleford and Union Lake been let? If so, what are the names of the contractors, and what is the contract price in each case?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The contract for this service has not yet been let.

DOMINION EXHIBITION IN TORONTO.

Mr. WALLACE (for Mr. Clarke) asked :

Is it the intention of the Government to grant any financial aid to the Dominion Exhibition to be held in the city of Toronto during the months of August and September of the present year?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have reason to believe that the promoters of the Dominion exhibition have been informed by the Minister of Agriculture that the Government does not see its way to give any financial aid to the Dominion exhibition this year.

JOSEPH MERCIER, OF STE. FAMILLE.

Mr. GILLIES (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

1. Is one Joseph Mercier, of Ste. Famille, Island of Orleans, employed in any capacity by the Government?
2. If so, in what capacity?
3. What is his salary?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is impossible yet to give the answer. We shall have to look over all the departments. I would request that the question be allowed to stand till the next sitting.

JOHN IRVINE.

Mr. GILLIES (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

1. Has one John Irvine been appointed keeper of the Red Island Lightship?
2. If so, is his appointment a permanent one?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). John Irvine has been placed in temporary charge of the lightship referred to.

MR. BAZINET, OF JOLIETTE.

Mr. GILLIES (for Sir Adolphe Caron) asked :

Are the Government aware that Mr. Bazinet, assistant collector of customs at Joliette, P.Q., has made in a Liberal convention the nomination of the Liberal candidate chosen to contest the election for that district in the Quebec Legislative Assembly? Are they also aware that the same Dominion official is making political speeches in every parish of the district in favour of the Liberal candidate?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government have not been informed that Mr. Bazinet is taking any part in the elections now going on.

THE RATE OF DUTY ON COAL.

Mr. McDOUGALL asked :

1. What was the rate of duty on Scotch and English coal imported into Canada under the old tariff?
2. What is the rate under the new tariff for the first year?
3. What will the rate be after the first year under the new tariff?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The rate of duty, as my hon. friend knows, was 60 cents a ton, and he knows the rate under the present tariff; but he knows also that the Finance Minister made the announcement a few days ago, when he delivered the Budget speech, that the whole question was under consideration, and that a further announcement would probably be made on the subject.

SASKATCHEWAN MAILS.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked :

What amount does the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company receive for carrying the mails to Saskatchewan, N.W.T.? How often are they supposed to deliver the mails at Prince Albert, Saskatchewan? What time of day is the mail supposed to be delivered in Prince Albert? Has the mail been delivered on time in the months of February and March, 1897?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Canadian Pacific Railway is paid $2,053.38 for the conveyance of the mails over the Regina and Prince Albert Railway, and the service is semi-weekly. The trains are due to reach Prince Albert at 9.35 p.m., Tuesdays and Saturdays. The Department have no knowledge as to the degree of regularity of the service during February and March.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.—BINDER TWINE.

Mr. McDOUGALL (for Mr. McLennan, Glengarry) asked :

1. What was the cost of establishing the manufacture of binder twine in Kingston Penitentiary, including machinery, labour and all other expenses connected therewith?

2. How many were employed in the manufacture of binder twine each year since its commencement, their position, and the total cost to the country?

3. What was the quantity manufactured in the year 1896? The cost of manufacture per pound in that year, and the price at which it was sold per pound in the province of Ontario in 1896?

4. Have any sales been made this year? If so, to whom sold? What quantity, and at what price per pound? What are the terms and conditions of the sales and payment?

5. When sold in large quantities, at a reduced price, has the Government made conditions and stipulations with the purchases that the consumer will be protected in getting twine at the same price as formerly sold by the Government?

6. Do the Government intend to further manufacture binder twine? If not, why? What has been done, or what is to be done with the plant used for the manufacture of binder twine?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say: 1. $40,280. 2. In 1894, four officers, aggregate salaries $3,620, and about 40 convicts; in 1895, four officers, aggregate salaries $3,620, and about 40 convicts; in 1896, three officers, aggregate salaries $2,800, and about 40 convicts. 3. The preparation of this statement would require considerable time and the question should therefore be put in the form of a motion for a return. 4. Yes. To the Hobbs Hardware Company. The sale includes the actual output up to August 1st—approximate quantity sold, 500 tons. As the goods have not yet been placed upon the market the price cannot be made public at present. The terms and conditions of sale are cash on delivery. 5. No conditions have been exacted. The keen competition of the past few years and the lowering of the duty in 1894 have made this unnecessary. 6. The matter is under consideration.

POSTAL REGULATIONS.—UNITED STATES AND CANADA.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Britton) asked:

It is stated that under the postal laws and regulations of the United States, the sender of a letter may have said letter returned to him at any time, before its actual delivery to the person to whom such letter is posted, provided the sender fully identifies himself to the postmaster at the office at which the letter was mailed, and deposits with the postmaster to defray any expenses made in recalling the letter. Is there any such law or regulation in Canada? If not, has the matter been considered by the Postmaster General, or in his department?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The only way I can answer this question is to give to the House the regulations of the United States and those of Great Britain. The regulations of the United States are as follows with regard to withdrawal of mail matter:

Mr. McDUGALL.

UNITED STATES.

381. Before Despatch.—After mailable matter has been deposited in the post office, it cannot be withdrawn except by the writer thereof, or the sender, or, in case of a minor child, the parent or guardian duly authorized to control the correspondence of the writer. The utmost care must be taken to ascertain that the person desiring to withdraw the matter is the person entitled to do so. If necessary, the postmaster should require the applicant to exhibit a written address in the same hand as that upon the letter, and such description of the letter or article mailed, or other evidence, as will identify the same and satisfy the postmaster that the applicant is entitled to withdraw it.

The postmaster acts at his peril in permitting such withdrawal, and would be liable, however honest his intentions, were he to deliver it to an imposter or one not entitled to it. He should in no case delay the mail or retard the business of his office in order to search for a letter desired to be withdrawn.

Withdrawn by Sender After Despatch.—After a letter has passed from the mailing post office, the delivery of the same may be prevented, and its return to the writer secured, by an application by the writer to the postmaster at the office of mailing, stating reasons therefor, identifying the letter, and supporting such application with sufficient proof in writing. Upon such application and evidence, and upon a deposit being made by the writer of a sum sufficient to cover all expenses incurred, the postmaster shall telegraph a request for the return of such letter to his office, if it has been forwarded, to the postmaster at the office of address, carefully describing the same, so as to identify it and prevent the return of any other matter. On receipt of such request, the postmaster at the office of address, carefully describing the same, so as to identify it and prevent the return of, will deliver it to the writer upon payment of all expenses and of letter rate of postage on the matter returned, on the envelope of which postage-due stamps of the proper value must be placed and cancelled, and upon the prepayment also of a registered parcel, addressed to the First Assistant Postmaster General, Division of Correspondence, Post Office Department, in which the postmaster shall inclose and transmit the application of the writer and all proofs submitted by him, together with the writer's receipt for it, and the envelope of the returned letter.

CANADA.

Property in Post Letters and Other Mailable Matter.

(Sec. 43, 49th Vict., Chap. 35.)

From the time any letter, packet, chattel, money or thing is deposited in the post office for the purpose of being sent by post, it shall cease to be the property of the sender, and shall be the property of the person to whom it is addressed, or the legal representatives of such person; and the Postmaster General shall not be liable to any person for the loss of any letter, packet or other thing sent by post.

GENERAL POST OFFICE REGULATION IN UNITED KINGDOM.

Postmasters are not allowed to return any letter, parcel or other postal packet to the writer or sender, or to any one else, or to delay forwarding it to its destination according to the address, even though a request to such effect be written thereon.

SUBSIDY TO REGINA, LONG LAKE AND SASKATCHEWAN RAILWAY.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) asked :

1. What amount of cash subsidy did the Regina, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway Company receive from the Dominion Government?

2. What amount of lands did they receive per mile?

3. Are the lands located, and if so, where?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The company do not receive any direct cash subsidy from the Government. All they get is a bonus of $80,000 a year for twenty years contingent on the transportation of men and supplies. The land subsidies are 6,400 acres per mile.

QUEBEC BRIDGE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is the Government aware that, speaking at a public meeting in the city of Quebec, on the 27th of April instant, Mr. S. N. Parent, Mayor of Quebec made the following statement, according to the newspaper "Le Soleil" :—"He (Mr. Parent) held in his hand a letter from Ottawa, giving him the assurance that the building of the bridge (meaning the bridge across the St. Lawrence at or near Quebec) would soon begin" ?

2. Has the Government, or any of the members thereof, given Mr. Parent any such assurance?

3. Since the Premier announced the policy of the Government in reference to the bridge across the St. Lawrence, at or near Quebec, on the 9th of September, 1896, in reply to the inquiry by the member for Montmagny, has the Government in any way altered its policy in relation to the said enterprise, and if so, in what way?

4. Have any assurances, other than those already stated, been given in relation to the said bridge to anybody, and if so, what were the assurances?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The Government are not aware that Mr. Parent made the statement referred to and reported in the newspaper "Le Soleil." There is no change of policy with regard to the bridge, and the Government have taken no steps since the answer given to this House by myself on the 9th of September, 1896.

Mr. GILLIES. The hon. gentleman has not answered the second paragraph of the question.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am not aware that Mr. Parent has any such letter.

GEORGE VEZINA.

Mr. BERGERON (for Mr. Dugas) asked :

1. Is it not a fact that the present Controller of Inland Revenue gave orders to have George Vézina, of Quebec, imprisoned under conviction of having infringed the Inland Revenue laws?

2. If he did not, why did he not give the necessary instructions to carry out the sentence of the court?

3. If he did give instructions, why were they not carried out?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). When the present Government came into office they found the case had been disposed of by their predecessors in office and they did not deem it at all advisable to disturb the disposition of that case.

LAND OFFICE AT ESTEVAN.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether the land office at Estevan has been removed to Alameda?

2. Whether any change has been made in the boundary of the agency?

3. Were the services of Mr. A. E. Hetherington dispensed with?

4. If so, why? Was there any complaint against his efficiency?

5. Has his position been given to Mr. D. A. McEwan?

6. What training or experience has D. A. McEwan had?

7. If the position has been given to McEwan, why was it not given to an official already in the service?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In reply to the hon. gentleman I beg to say: 1. The land office at Estevan has been closed. A new office for the district has been established at Alameda. 2. No. 3. Yes. 4. When the office at Estevan was discontinued the Minister decided not to re-employ Mr. Hetherington, for reasons which he considered to be satisfactory and conducive to the public interest. Mr. Hetherington had only been employed by the Department for a few years. 5. Yes. 6. Mr. McEwan's training and experience were of a character to satisfy the Minister that Mr. McEwan had the ability to perform the duties of the office satisfactorily. 7. Because the Minister thought Mr. McEwan the best qualified man for the position.

MR. PIERRE BÉGIN'S DISMISSAL.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Has Pierre Bégin, of Lévis, been dismissed from the position of section man on the Intercolonial Railway?

2. If so, for what reason and at whose request?

3. Was an investigation held in his case? If so, what is the nature of the report, and by whom was it made?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Pierre Bégin has been dismissed from the position referred to. He was dismissed for active and offensive partisanship in the last general election. No investigation was held, the department having acted on the representation of Dr. Guay, M.P., made on personal knowledge.

MR. EUGENE BLANCHET'S DISMISSAL.

Mr. GILLIES (for Mr. Casgrain) asked :

Is the Honourable Minister of Railways and Canals aware that Eugène Blanchet, of Fraser-ville, is actually employed as section foreman between Rivière du Loup and Cacouna, and that he was paid as such in the course of April?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Yes, I am now informed that Eugène Blanchet of Fraser-ville is employed as section foreman between Rivière du Loup and Cacouna, and I believe he was paid in April for work performed as section foreman during the month of March.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest, that, as usual, we run through those notices of motion on which there is no discussion.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Very well.

MR. WILLIAM McCARTHY, FENELON FALLS.

On motion for :

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals, or any officer or officers thereof, and Wm. McArthur, of Fenelon Falls, in regard to the dispensing with his services.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I may inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) that the passage of this resolution would be entirely useless. There is no correspondence in the department relating to this officer, and the hon. gentleman will see, therefore, that there will be no advantage in pressing the motion.

Mr. HUGHES. All I have to say is that the hon. Minister must have given a very peculiar answer to my question some time ago, because he distinctly—

Mr. SPEAKER. We cannot discuss the matter at present. The motion must stand.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE LATE GOVERNMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for :

Copy of Schedule B, showing recommendations of the Treasury Board as submitted by report of Council to His Excellency the Governor General on the 6th and 7th July, 1896, and intended to be approved by him, laid upon the Table of the House last session, with a statement of the action taken by the Government on each of these appointments as made by the said Order in Council approved by His Excellency, or, where no action has been taken, the reason for such a course.

He said : I regret to say that any necessity should have arisen for making this motion, which I certainly do not think should have been required. The House will remember that this matter was the subject of a discussion between the First Minister and myself ; and I am quite sure that the House will be surprised to learn by a paper laid upon the Table of the House by the First Minister, stating the appointments which had been approved by His Excellency the Governor General and thus making public to the House and to the country the fact that His Excellency the Governor General had sanctioned this Order in Council—the House, I say, will be surprised to learn that these appointments have been treated, I think, in a very extraordinary manner, the most extraordinary manner which any appointments ever emanating from the Government of Canada, have been treated before. The House will remember that on the occasion of that discussion in reference to the change of Government, I showed to the House that on the occasion of the defeat of Mr. Mackenzie and his Government, of which the present First Minister was a member, Lord Dufferin, in the discharge of his duties as Governor General, sanctioned every appointment suggested or proposed by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie of which, as I say, the present First Minister was a member without any exception or qualification whatever. The hon. gentleman knows these appointments, 116 in all, if I remember aright, in addition to 17 promotions, were made by a Government that had just sustained a defeat at the hands of the people by one of the most overwhelming majorities that ever overturned an Administration in Canada, or perhaps relatively in almost any other country. The majority by which Mr. Mackenzie's Government was defeated will be found, I think on reference to the Journals, to have been between 80 and 90 in a House of 215 members. A reference to the character of the appointments, the details of which were laid on the Table of the House last session, will show that they were of the most important nature, that they included a large number of the most important appointments that could be made in Canada, ranging from Judges, of the Supreme Court down to County Court Judges, also a large number of officials holding very high and important positions, one of the hon. gentleman's friends being appointed as Deputy Minister, although he had been quite a short time in the public service. Every recommendation by the Government of which Mr. Mackenzie was Premier, although that Government was defeated by an overwhelming majority, was sanctioned by an able Governor General, in fact one of the most able and experienced Governors General that Canada ever had, without any exception whatever. I will not refer to other recommendations made, although they included large additions to salaries which had not previously been sanctioned by Parliament ; but every appointment and every recommendation was approved, I hold in strict conformity with Imperial precedents and precedents established on former occasions when the Government of Sir John A. Macdonald resigned in 1873—all those appointments and recommendations made by the leader of the Government and his colleagues were sanctioned by Lord Dufferin who was then Governor General. Acting under the well-known rule that in the absence of any previous rule, it is the duty of the Governor General to follow English precedents, all those appointments were properly sanctioned by Lord Dufferin as Governor General. When the Government of which I had the honour to be the head was defeated by a majority insignificant in comparison with that which had defeated the Government of which Mr. Mackenzie was the First Minister, made, as I hold properly, 92 recommendations, a much smaller number than were made by Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, 26 were refused, as I hold entirely in violation of the principles of parliamentary government and all English precedents, and as I hold in the strongest possible violation of the principles established by Lord Dufferin on two similar occasions, namely, the resignation of the Administration of Sir John Macdonald, in 1873, and the defeat of the Mackenzie Government in 1878.

The hon. gentleman knows that the reports of the Treasury Board recommending a large number of these appointments were submitted to the Governor General; that he, in the exercise of his discretion or indiscretion, took the extraordinary course of undertaking to judge as to what appointments should be sanctioned and what should not. His Excellency signed those Treasury reports with a qualification. That signature was the most valid and complete authority the Governor General could give to all those appointments that did not come within the category of the exceptions he took as to the recommendations. The decision as to those appointments which came within the category to which the Governor General took exception was submitted to the judgment of the hon. the Prime Minister and his colleagues. They exercised that judgment, and subsequently brought down and laid on the Table of the House a report of those appointments, which, under the signature of the Governor General, had been made valid and complete according to his own declaration. My hon. friend was asked, what was the position of those appointments? His answer was, those appointments will stand. It was not possible for my hon. friend to give any other answer, because it was perfectly obvious that having, as a leader of the Administration, brought down those appointments and declared they had received the imprimatur and sanction of the Governor General, it was quite obvious that those parties held those positions by the most indefeasible tenure possible. I quite admit that it was perfectly competent for the hon. gentleman to exercise his judgment, and to review any appointments that were made. The fact that the appointments were made within parliamentary rule does not take them out of the category of appointments which can be reviewed by the Government, if they are able to show any reasons why such appointments should be changed or recalled. But no greater publicity could be given to those appointments than the fact that they were embodied in the statement laid on the Table of the House as appointments proposed by the previous Government and sanctioned by the Governor General, and the addition of the emphatic declaration by the First Minister that those appointments will stand. The House will be a little surprised to learn, hon. members ought to be surprised to learn if they are not, that down to this day an extraordinary, I do not hesitate to say an unprecedented course has been pursued in regard to a large number of those appointments. I do not say in regard to every one that those parties have been left without any communication whatever from the Government down to the present day. I cannot imagine that greater disrespect could be shown to the Crown or to the Governor General of Canada than to lay on the Table of Parliament a statement of appointments with the declaration made by the First Minister, and that those parties should be left without receiving any communication whatever from the Government respecting their position. I am not prepared to say that this has occurred in every case, but I know that in several cases it has occurred.

At the outset, I may say that the whole of the recommendations made by the Government of which I had the honour to be a member, had reference to insignificant positions, with the exception of the names of four gentlemen who were nominated for seats in the Senate. Instead of there being appointments of judges to the Supreme Court, or the county courts, or of persons to positions with large salaries attached, they were all appointments made in the ordinary course to fill vacancies in the public service, and with comparatively small salaries, as any person who takes the trouble to run his eye over the list will see. I do not intend to go into this matter fully, but I shall give one instance. A gentleman came to me a short time ago and said: The House and the country were notified that I had been appointed collector of customs at a salary of $800, but I have not received a word of communication from the Government up to the present time; I assumed that I was appointed, and I am not in a position to take up any other employment, because I daily expect that the published decision of the Governor General in Council will be given effect. I have been left in a condition of expectancy and doubt ever since, and I do not yet know whether I am to receive the office or not. I ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) if he thinks that a proper mode in which to treat an appointment made under those circumstances? Does he think it justice to the individual? The hon. gentleman has the advantage of being a lawyer, and I am not in a position to speak as to the question of law, but every one knows that under ordinary circumstances this gentleman who was appointed to the office would have the right to a fiat to compel the Government to pay him the salary that had been proclaimed to the country as attached to the appointment which had been signed by His Excellency. I hold that this Government were bound to do one of two things. They were bound to install every one of these appointees in their offices and communicate the fact to them; or, if from any reason that subsequently occurred they felt that they were justified in cancelling the appointment, they should have cancelled it by Order in Council, and notified the person that he was not to receive the office. My hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), will, I think, admit that the humblest individual in the country is entitled to at least that at the hands of the Government.

Another case occurs to my mind. I was informed of a vacancy which had taken place in the Library, because of a resignation, and in virtue of the right which belonged to me I nominated a gentleman for that position. He was appointed by His Excellency the Governor General, and his name appeared in the list of those whom the Premier said, had been absolutely appointed, and as to whom there was no qualification whatever. That young gentleman, down to this hour, has never received the slightest intimation from the Government, as to whether he is to be called upon to discharge these duties or not. It is a question of only $400 a year, but it was a matter of great importance to that young man. If the Government were inclined to cancel these appointments, the least they could do in justice to themselves and in justice to the parties concerned, was to have given these persons notification. My attention has been called to many similar cases, and so far as I am able to learn, many of those appointees have been superseded by the appointment of other persons. I should fail in my duty to the House if I did not give the Prime Minister an opportunity of stating on what grounds his Government pursued this entirely unprecedented course.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) so far forgot himself, in the discussion to which I refer, as to allude to me as an office grabber. On what grounds was I an office grabber? If it was office grabbing for the head of a Government to make ninety-two recommendations, I ask him how he characterizes himself and the late lamented Hon. Mr. Mackenzie, the leader of his Government, when, after they had met with an overwhelming defeat at the hands of the people, they grabbed no less than 116 appointments, and 17 promotions. I am quite sure that had my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) reflected he would not have used that term in reference to me. If it were worth the time of the House I could vindicate myself most emphatically, from the first hour of my entering into public life down to the present moment, from the charge of being an office grabber. I believe, if there is a public man in this country, who can vindicate himself against such a charge as that, it is myself.

Mr. CASEY. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Some hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." and I am quite sure that if he be acquainted with the past history of this country and with my own history, he does not intend that as anything else than an emphatic endorsement of what I am saying.

Mr. CASEY. Hardly.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not desirous to take up the time of the House at length, but as I had not an opportunity of replying to my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) on a former occasion, I want to call his attention to a very grave error into which he fell. The hon. gentleman then said in reference to the Senate:

I charge here against him (meaning myself) and against his party, that, in so far as the Senate of Canada is concerned, they have all along, for the past eighteen years, disregarded the constitution of Canada in the nature of the appointments which they made to that branch of the legislature. It was one of the well-understood principles at confederation—and the hon. gentleman referred a moment ago to the debates of the Quebec Convention—it was one of the well-understood principles then, that if the Senate was not elective, and if it was to be appointed by the Crown, then both political parties should be equally represented on the floor of the Senate.

I have no doubt that my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) made that statement in good faith, but he was entirely mistaken. No such principle was ever established, and the very authority he quotes to prove it, disproves his statement, as I shall show. What occurred was this. The House is well aware, that when the question of the constitution of the Senate came to be considered, for many years an elective legislative council had existed in Old Canada—the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario united—and that in the other provinces, the legislative councils consisted of persons appointed by the Crown. Well, Sir, as I need not remind any member of this House, confederation was accomplished by a combination of the Liberal party and the Conservative party. It was a coalition Government, and there was at Quebec, the Hon. George Brown, the Hon. Mr. Howland and the Hon. Wm. McDougall representing the Liberal party, and Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier and Sir E. P. Taché representing the Conservative party. The delegation from Nova Scotia consisted of three supporters of the Government of which I was the head, together with the leader of the Opposition in the legislative council and the leader of the Opposition in the House of Assembly, who had been named by me as delegates to represent Nova Scotia. The same took place in the province of New Brunswick. The delegation was composed of members of the Liberal and Conservative parties, and Sir Oliver Mowat was almost the only person who raised the question of an elective Senate. It was by common consent of the delegates, supported in the strongest manner by the late Hon. George Brown, that the policy of having a Senate nominated for life by the Crown was adopted. Connected with that policy was the understanding that in the first appointments to the Senate due regard should be had to a fair division between the Liberal and Conservative parties. That was done. The gentlemen nominated for the position of senators were selected from the old legislative councils to a very large extent, if not to the entire extent, in Canada, and they were nominated so as to represent fairly the two parties. The same thing was done in the province of Nova Scotia. Before a single appointment was offered to any Conservative, one-half of the senatorships to which the province of Nova Scotia was entitled were offered to leading gentlemen in the old legislative council of that province who were Liberals; and no appointment was made until they had the opportunity of accepting or declining it. So the hon. gentleman is quite right, so far as the first appointments to the Senate were concerned; but he is entirely wrong in supposing that there was ever contemplated any limitation to the power of the Crown in regard to appointments to the Senate after the question of these original members had been disposed of. I am not able to say with absolute certainty, but I think my hon. friend will agree with me that, to a very large extent within the last eighteen years, there were no members of the old legislative council who had not been brought into the Senate or who were left unprovided for. I think I am safe in saying that. I say emphatically that there was no understanding, which the hon. gentleman charges as a breach of faith on the part of the government of which I had the honour of being a member. I will read what Sir John Macdonald said in the statement the hon. gentleman quoted. He said:

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

He (Sir John) wrote a name, choosing from his own party, and they selected their man, and the consequence was twelve Reformers and twelve Conservatives were elected to sit in that Chamber, and no one knew better than his hon. friend that it was a fair understanding that the claims of members of the legislative council of Old Canada to seats in the Senate should be considered as vacancies might take place, and that had been faithfully carried out.

That, instead of supporting the statement of the hon. gentleman, that we had violated the principle which had been established in regard to the Senate, entirely disproves it, because it shows that that principle was confined to the existing members of the old legislative council of Canada, and was faithfully carried out. That statement was made by Sir John Macdonald in 1872. The hon. gentleman knows that a year afterwards the power to appoint to the Senate passed from the hands of Sir John Macdonald to the hands of Mr. Mackenzie, and I have yet to learn that Mr. Mackenzie was in any way limited in regard to filling any vacancies in the Senate by anything except the general principle that they were to be appointed by the Crown, and for life.

Now, I do not intend to take up more time on this point. But I see by the newspapers that the Hon. Mr. Power has been discussing questions in relation to myself, and he has placed before the public the following statement:—

There was an election in Nova Scotia in 1859, and the Conservative government, which had been in power, were defeated in that election, as happened in the election which took place in 1896. The government did not accept their defeat, but called upon the Representative of Her Majesty, Lord Mulgrave, to forthwith dissolve the House which had just been elected. They found that they were in a minority of four, and they claimed that there had been certain irregularities in the elections of some members and asked that the House should be dissolved. The Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia very naturally and properly declined to do that. He said that that was not his business—that the trial of those elections was a matter for the House and its committees. This happened in the beginning of the year 1860—this refusal to dissolve. The House met in 1860, and the government were defeated, and as the governor would not give them a dissolution, they had to resign. They resigned, I think, about January, or February, 1860, and they sent a very strong memorial to the Duke of Newcastle in connection with the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct. The action of the Lieutenant-Governor met with the cordial endorsement of the Duke of Newcastle; and after all this had taken place, on the 29th October, 1860, months after the whole thing had been disposed of by the Duke of Newcastle, the gentleman who now leads the Opposition in the House of Commons addressed a long letter to that nobleman, from which I propose to quote to the House two or three extracts. Speaking of the refusal of Lord Mulgrave to dissolve, this gentleman said to the Duke of Newcastle:

"A decision has been made which cannot fail to induce, in these colonies, the impression that what has been supposed to be self-government, is but a delusion and a snare."

A little further on he said:

"The people of this province have been content, my lord, to pay a salary of fifteen thousand dollars a year to a governor sent from England, besides a large additional sum to keep up his establishment; while the State of Maine, with twice our population, has the privilege of electing that officer from among her people, and pay him but fifteen hundred dollars.

"Can such a condition of things be expected to give satisfaction, with the evidence forced upon us that we have no rights worthy of a moment's consideration, when weighed against the interest or convenience of a gentleman who has been useful to the Imperial Cabinet before coming here?"

"Destitute of representation in the Parliament of Britain, with our most eminent men systematically excluded from the highest position in their own country, and for which their colonial experience and training eminently fit them, it is impossible that the free spirit of the inhabitants of British North America can fall soon to be aroused to the necessity of asserting their undoubted right to have their country governed in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people. * * * *

"In conclusion, Your Grace will allow me to add, that should it prove true that the Colonial Office has determined to sustain the Lieutenant-Governor in the unconstitutional course pursued by him, it will become necessary to lay the subject before the Imperial Parliament, and this country will then learn whether the time has arrived, when important constitutional changes have become indispensable for the acquisition of British institutions, as enjoyed in the parent state.

"I have the honour to be,

"Your Grace's most obedient servant,

"CHARLES TUPPER, M.P.P."

That was pretty strong language, all because the government had not chosen to dissolve a newly-elected assembly.

A gentleman in the audience interrupted Mr. Power by saying, "All pointing to federation as a remedy."

Hon. Mr. POWER. There was not a word said about federation, and nothing thought about federation. It rather pointed to independence, or annexation, so that we could elect our own governors, and pay them only $1,500. That is rather ancient history; still, the leopard does not change his spots; and a few months ago, in the summer of 1896, this same gentleman was the leader of a government which appealed to the country and which was defeated upon that appeal; and the language which he used in another place towards the Representative of Her Majesty, was nearly as strong as the language contained in that document of 1860.

An hon. gentleman interrupted that statement by saying, "Not a whit too strong."

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman quoting from the debates of the Senate? I gather from the nature of the last interruption he quoted that he is doing so.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said an hon. gentleman in the audience interrupted.

Mr. SPEAKER. There can be no dispute as to whether the hon. gentleman was quoting from the debates of the Senate or not. If so, I shall have to check the hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then I can only bow with the greatest deference to your ruling, Sir, and shall not quote from the Senate Debates in any other place. But

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

I wish to draw the attention of the House to what the facts were. It is quite true that, upon the conclusion of the elections in 1859 in Nova Scotia, the government of which I had the honour to be a member, felt that a very grave question arose, and it arose in this way. A Bill had been passed, previous to the dissolution of the House, declaring that any person holding office under the Crown was disqualified from sitting or voting in the legislative assembly—a law similar to that which exists here. It transpired that five gentlemen at least who were elected in opposition to the government were notoriously holding offices under the Crown, to the knowledge of the Lieutenant-Governor and of every other intelligent person in Nova Scotia. The Lieutenant-Governor, under those circumstances, wrote to the Colonial Office, stating the facts, and asked the Colonial Office what he should do, if a majority composed of those gentlemen, notoriously disqualified as they were by the Act of the legislature from sitting or voting, created a majority and took charge of the government. That despatch of the Lieutenant-Governor was referred to the law officers of the Crown in England, and when I mention that Sir Richard Bethel was at that time the Attorney General, afterwards the distinguished Lord Chancellor, the House will understand that the opinion sent out had the very greatest weight and authority. That opinion of the law officers of the Crown, taken by the Colonial Office at the request of the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia, was sent out, as I consider, for his guidance, and it declared that if the attempt to govern were made by a majority notoriously disqualified from sitting or voting in the House, it would become the duty of the Lieutenant-Governor to appeal to the people. Those were the circumstances under which I maintained that it was necessary, for the vindication of the law and the constitution of the country, that there should be a dissolution. I do not think that it will require any elaborate argument to show that I had good ground and that the government of which I was a member had good grounds for drawing the attention of the Colonial Office to the position that was then taken. But I may say that the declaration of Mr. Power, that confederation had never been heard of or thought of until then, is entirely unfounded. Before that letter was written by me, I had been invited to open the Mechanics' Institute in St. John, and on that occasion I chose for my subject the political condition of British North America, and I propounded precisely such a scheme of government as exists in Canada to-day, as the solution of all our difficulties, as the means of opening up these positions of Lieutenant-Governors to men belonging to our own country, who were eminently qualified to fill them. Was I right or wrong? The last thirty years have vindicated my policy and shown that we are as able to furnish men fitted to discharge, in all the provinces, that high position—men from both parties—as worthily as any who could be obtained from the old country. Not only is that the case, but the reduction of salaries to which I pointed has been accomplished in the same way. I did challenge the act of the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia as a gross violation of the constitution of the country—and I was supported by the law officers of the Crown in England as to what was the proper course for him to pursue—and we called upon him before resigning and asked him to carry out what we regarded as the instructions from the Crown, and give the people of Nova Scotia the opportunity of electing a Parliament of which the majority would not be composed of persons notoriously disqualified from sitting or voting or otherwise taking charge of the public business. I probably used quite as strong language and stronger than I have been permitted by you, Sir, to use in another direction. Well, the Governor declined. He was advised to withstand that appeal, and he refused to give that dissolution which we asked. Then I carried the case before the country, and I may tell Mr. Power, if he does not know it, that I had the support of nine-tenths if not nineteen-twentieths of his co-religionists in Nova Scotia, who sustained me in my declaration that the constitution of the country had been violated by the Lieutenant-Governor. When we got to that ultimate tribunal, where the voice of the people could declare itself, the Government which had sustained the Lieutenant-Governor in that unconstitutional course was swept out of existence. The Hon. Joseph Howe, who was the leader of the government, was defeated in the county of Lunenburg. The members of his government, right and left, all over the province were driven out of office, and we came back to power with one of the largest majorities ever obtained in the olden times in that province. I think I had a majority of twenty-five at my back in that House. I give these particulars as showing what really took place. I may say that the Lieutenant-Governor accepted his defeat and took an early opportunity of retiring from his office and going back to England. But before he did that, he had the mortification of being obliged to call back to office the men whose advice he had refused, and also to restore to their positions, before he left the country, every official whom he had dismissed on the advice of his former Ministers. I do not intend to carry the parallel further, but I think, as the hon. gentleman has gone out of his way to give his version of this story, it is just as well we should clear up these historical records. I did not intend to say more on the question than I have said, and as this came up necessarily in connection with the action I have taken in this House on this very question, I felt it was my privilege to draw attention to it, and I am very much obliged to you, Mr. Speaker, for not having, at an earlier moment, interfered with my statement of the facts.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sure I shall not surprise my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) if I tell him that I have no intention at all of discussing, on this occasion, issues arising out of events which took place forty years ago, almost, in the province of Nova Scotia. I do not know whether those issues are alive yet in the province of Nova Scotia or not. But if we are to judge of the feeling of Nova Scotia by the last verdict given by the people at the general election, they are not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend cannot say that as to the views expressed, whatever he may say as to myself, seeing that the province was carried on my policy.

The PRIME MINISTER. I do not at all intend to question the statement of my hon. friend, or to consider whether it was upon his policy or not that it was carried. I suppose that the questions to which I have referred were settled about forty years ago. I do not know whether these questions are still alive in the province of Nova Scotia, but if they are alive at the present time, then the people of Nova Scotia must have reversed the views they held. I do not care to go into the many controversial questions upon which my hon. friend entered upon this occasion, with the single exception of that concerning the Senate of Canada. That is still a vital question, and it may be as well to know where we stand in regard to it. The hon. gentleman challenged the statement I made that it had been a settled policy of both parties at confederation, when the Senate was made a nominative and not an elective body, a policy agreed upon by Hon. George Brown and Sir John Macdonald, representing both great parties of Canada, that both parties should be represented on the floor of the Senate according to the proportion in which they were represented in the country. My hon. friend admits that this was the case, that this rule was admitted so far as the first appointments to the Senate were concerned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The PRIME MINISTER. Well, Sir, if this was understood to be the rule when the first appointments were made, will he pretend to the House that it was a rule to be applied only once and after that disregarded? What would have been the opinion of the people of Canada if they had been told that this rule was a good rule for the appointment of the first Senate, but that it would not be afterwards followed? Any man of common sense would say that if it was a good rule for the first appointments it was a good rule for all times. If it was proper to have both parties represented according to their respective forces in the country when the Senate was first established, would it not be equally just, equally fair, equally reasonable, that this same rule should apply to the Senate in later years. Can my hon. friend give any reason why this rule, being acted upon once, should not always been acted upon? Can he give any reason why this rule having been once observed should be disregarded afterwards? Why, Sir, the Senate is of such a character that rule should be maintained at all times. Let me call again the attention of my hon. friend to the statement we find in the memoirs of Sir John Macdonald by Mr. Joseph Pope, which bears directly upon the contention that I lay down. I quote from the second volume of this work, page 235 :

We have already seen Sir John Macdonald's opinion of the constitution of the Canadian Senate, which is largely the work of his own hands. It is true, that at an early period of his career he favoured an elective Upper House, but eight years' experience of this system was sufficient to change his views, and to convert him into a firm upholder of the nominative principle. Every year since confederation strengthened the conviction of his matured judgment and showed him more and more clearly the advantage of the nominative over the elective system. To his mind, the chief among the objections to a Senate chosen by the popular vote was the ever-present danger of its members claiming the right to deal with Money Bills, and the consequent possibility of disputes with the House of Commons. The proposal that the provincial legislatures, whose members are elected for purely local purposes, should choose the senators to legislate on matters of general concern, was also objectionable, being opposed to the spirit of the constitution, which confined the local assembly to a strictly limited sphere of action. He held that the system unanimously agreed to at the Quebec Conference had worked well, and should be undisturbed.

Thus we see that Sir John Macdonald's mature judgment, after many years of experience of confederation, led him to the conclusion that the system which had been adopted at confederation, that of senators being nominated by the Crown, but so chosen as to represent both parties upon the floor of that body in proportion to their power in the country, should remain undisturbed. This is a strong argument in favour of the view which I represent. I leave to the judgment of any man in this House or out of it to say whether any other rule could be wisely followed. There is a reason why the two parties should be represented in the Senate, but what reason could be given why the Senate should be filled with representatives of only one party? So long as we have party government it is surely well that both parties should be represented not only in this House but in both Houses of the legislature. No reason could be given why there should be a departure from the view which was laid down at confederation except party exigencies, except that it was found necessary to make the Senate, for a long time, a refuge for defeated politicians. Therefore, I all the more adhere—fortified as I am with the opinion of Sir John Macdonald—to the opinion that the true construction of the nominative principle is that both parties which divide public opinion in this country should be represented in that House in a manner somewhat approximating their relative strength in the country.

With regard to the motion made by my hon. friend, I have no objection to offer to it. I think it is a fair motion, and the papers will be brought down accordingly. I think I understood pretty well the first of the hon. gentleman's argument in so far as this motion applied. He stated that after the defeat of his Government he had made a certain number of appointments—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Recommendations.

The PRIME MINISTER. Recommendations—certain of which were approved by His Excellency and others disapproved. It is no use going again into the discussion of the question—no good purpose could be served. But I would recall the statement made by His Excellency at the time giving the reason for disregarding certain recommendations made by his advisers after their defeat. His reason was that he was bound to accept their advice on matters of routine, but all other matters that departed from routine business, he thought had better be left to the incoming Administration. I had occasion afterwards to state that we accepted the statement of His Excellency which we thought laid down a fair and equitable rule. So far as concerns the recommendations made by the hon. gentleman which were approved by His Excellency, I stated on the floor of the House that it would be the duty of the Administration to respect all these appointments unless there was some cause to the contrary. We have gone upon this rule. We have respected, or intended to respect all the recommendations approved by His Excellency, except in a few cases, where we thought there was cause for removal or for different advice being given to His Excellency. The hon. gentleman says that in some cases parties have not been notified of their appointments, and, in others, did not receive their commissions. That may be in a few cases. There may be a few cases, I know there were, where the parties did not receive their commissions, though they came within that rule; but the reason was that behind every one of those cases, as the papers will show when they are brought down, there were good reasons why the appointments should not be made. They required some inquiry, and no decision was come to at the time. We would not, and we could not, in fact, in consistency with the rules which we laid down for our guidance, dismiss anybody appointed under such circumstances, any more than we would have dismissed anybody else who had been in office except for cause shown. In many of those cases, so far as I remember, we thought it was preferable to hold an inquiry, departmental or otherwise, and we came to no determination in such cases. These reasons may have delayed the notification to some of those gentlemen who were appointed; but that was the only reason, and when the papers are brought down my hon. friend will find that these cases are very few indeed.

Mr. FOSTER. The one point in which my hon. friend really touched the motion that was introduced by the leader of the Opposition, was in the last two or three minutes of his remarks. There was no contention between my hon. friend and the leader of the Government as to all that class of names with regard to which His Excellency had withheld his recommendation, or his signature. The point of contest between my hon. friend and the leader of the Government was as to those whose recommendations were signed by the Governor General, and who were, consequently, de facto appointed to office. Now, what is the excuse of the hon. gentleman with reference to those? Some, he says, may be held over till the present time, he does not know how many, that will be shown when the papers come down. That is very true, and as to how many have had no information, or as to how many whose appointments have been annulled, we shall not know until the papers are brought down. But the hon. gentleman, to parry the force of the statement made by the leader of the Opposition that up to the present time there were appointed, and he knew of them who had not received any notification, good, bad or indifferent, brings in this excuse, that the Government found it impracticable to dismiss them any more than they would dismiss officers who had already entered upon their duties, because they were really officers, and had been so appointed by Order in Council; but it was thought better to make an inquiry into them, and that led to delay. Well, now, that is rather hard upon the Government. It is now nine or ten months since the Government took office. These gentlemen have been waiting, their appointments having been signed by the Governor General, and these appointments have been made public through statements made here on the floor of the House; and yet these gentlemen have been left for nine or ten months without even the courtesy of a communication by the Government. An investigation surely should not take so much time as that; surely an investigation having been undertaken by my hon. friend and having been carried out very summarily and the results having been apparent in very few weeks, not to say a few months, I do not think it was a sufficient excuse for my hon. friend to state that inquiry was necessary when nine months had elapsed, and these gentlemen have received no word in any way with reference to their appointment. However, with reference to that, my hon. friend has covered the ground, and when the papers are brought down we shall know the exact state of the case. But my hon. friend the leader of the Government is singularly unfortunate in the other position he took with reference to the argument of my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. He endeavoured gravely to argue before this House that the principle involved in the late election in Nova Scotia was the same as that which was affirmed by Sir Charles Tupper when he was in opposition in Nova Scotia, in 1859. In the latter case the preceding legislature had passed a law stating that persons holding offices under the Crown were disqualified for sitting as members of Parliament. An election was held, and when the election was over it came to pass that the Government of the preceding period was in a minority, that amongst the majority there were at least five or six who were elected as members, but who were disqualified by the very Act which had been passed by that legislature precedent to the election, and that, therefore, they could not sit if the law was to have the force of law at all, that the Lieutenant-Governor in Council at the time asked the Colonial Office for instruction, and the Colonial Office asked the law officers of the Crown for an opinion. The opinion of the law officers for the Crown was that those men ought not to be considered as members of Parliament, and that a Government ought not to be carried on with a majority, the prevailing part of whom were persons who had been elected in direct opposition to the statute law which disqualified them from being members of that legislature. What was the principle involved? The principle involved was the independence of Parliament, and my hon. friend tried to argue that in the province of Nova Scotia the principle of the independence of Parliament respecting a law of the legislature, had no life left there because, in the election which was held a month ago, Mr. Murray was victorious and the Liberal-Conservatives in that legislature were defeated. That was the argument, if there was any argument. It needs but to be stated to the House to show how far afield my hon. friend went in order to support a bad position. Well, Sir, my hon. friend is even more unfortunate in the second position. He asks if there is any reason at all why an arrangement carried out on the appointment of the first Senate of Canada should not be carried out all the way through. The arrangement at that time was that the first Senate should be made up of representatives of both parties, in equal or nearly equal numbers, and the hon. gentleman maintains that, therefore, this should follow as the rule under confederation, and so long as this country exists under a constitutional government. Now, Sir, who were the appointing parties in that case? What was that first Government in Canada? Was it a party Government, or was it a coalition Government? It was made up of members of both of the parties precedent to confederation, both of whom had friends, both of whom joined together to make the first Government and to carry on the affairs of the country for the first time. These two sitting down together, prominent Liberals and prominent Conservatives, stipulated amongst themselves that in the formation of the first Senate, the two political parties precedent to that time should be equally represented, and the appointing powers who were representatives of both parties sat down together and made the nominations upon the basis they had agreed upon. It is here stated in the extract, a part of which was read by the leader of the Opposition, that the Hon. George Brown, although a party to that, and having gone into the Government, went out before the appointments had been actually made, but Sir John A. Macdonald carried out the appointments on the line which they had agreed upon before, and thus kept faith with the Liberal section of the party. Others of the Liberal party, of course, remained in that first Government and were there when the appointments were made. Now, Sir, if there is any basis I think which follows from the constitutional rule, which follows in Great Britain as well as here, it is that if there is an appointing power, and that appointing power is the Government of the day, the appointing power, that is the Government of the day, has perfect freedom as to whom its appointees shall be, and unless there is something in the constitution of the country itself to make it necessary that a certain portion of both political parties, or of certain creeds, or of certain classes, should be represented in the Senate, then there is nothing binding. The circumstances are as different as they could be. The first was a coalition Government, made up of the two parties, both of whom had friends in the Government, and there was this circumstance in addition. It was this, that there were a certain number of legislative councillors, friends of both parties, and every one knows that upon making the first change from the old Government to the new in every case, as much as possible, old rights or old privileges, whatever you may please to call them, are tenderly dealt with. What was more natural than when two great parties came together to establish confederation and sat down in order to make the first nominations to the Senate, that they should say to each other: Let us have both parties represented, and let us take them from the existing legislative councils, whose offices we have abolished by the Act of Confederation, and let us translate them in their proportions to the new Senate. There is a circumstance that is not present when nominations are made now and which was present then: and that makes all the difference. That arrangement was loyally carried out by Sir John A. Macdonald, and the Liberal-Conservative party, and it was that understanding alone which was carried out. The hon. gentleman has gone very far afield in order to make an argument, because what was actually done under that state of things was that the old legislative councillors were provided for by the two parties, who were acting in perfect agreement, and they were looking after prominent men to translate from the legislative councils to the Senate—a set of circumstances which then prevailed. but the circumstances now prevailing when the Government are called upon to make appointments are quite different, and we cannot argue from the first to the second, and can only argue on the constitution itself. Now as to the practice in Great Britain. Does the principle exist there that when a Conservative Government comes into power and makes appointments to the House of Lords, those appointments are made equally from both parties? My hon. friend knows it is not so. He knows it is exactly the opposite, and that the disparity in the representation of parties in the House of Lords is greater than it is in the Canadian Senate to-day. So I think my hon. friend is not very strong as regards the ground taken by him, and he is still less strong in the argument he has used in order to make his ground appeared more tenable.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I desire to say a word on the point referred to by my hon. friend opposite. The hon. gentleman has stated in the course of his remarks that the late election of Mr. Murray in Nova Scotia could have nothing to do with the point in dispute between Senator Power and the leader of the Opposition, inasmuch as the points which were determined by the people of Nova Scotia were altogether foreign to the points of difference then existing between the hon. gentleman and Lieutenant-Governor Mulgrave. I think if the hon. gentleman will refer to the remarks of Senator Power and if he will read the history of the time, he will find that the decision of the people of Nova Scotia given the other day had as much reference to the points in dispute as had the decision regarding the points in controversy with respect to the action of Lieutenant-Governor Mulgrave when the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) appealed to the people of Nova Scotia. I am not old enough to have taken any part in those elections, but I have read the history of that time, and if my memory serves me when the legislature became divided, an appeal was taken to the people—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was three years afterwards.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Perhaps it was three years—

I thought it was four years—upon a distinct issue between the House and Hon. Mr. Howe arising out of the education question.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will accept the hon. gentleman's statement of his recollection as to what took place.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question was not raised at all.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is only a short time ago since I refreshed my memory on these points, and I think I am correct in saying that the issue before the people then had no more to do with the constitutional point the hon. gentleman has stated than the issue when Mr. Murray was returned. I do not intend to go into the general question, which was threshed out last year; but the leader of the Opposition will find in regard to the appointments, that nearly all the list has been disposed of, except perhaps one or two more cases on which action has not been taken.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend has spoken of a subject on which he does not profess to have any special knowledge—that of the conduct of the Lieutenant-Governor, and I am sorry he mentioned his name, as I did not do so, and he is not living; but the issue was so live an issue that I presented petitions signed by a majority of the electors of the province of Nova Scotia demanding, and it was kept a live issue down to the time of the elections.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That was not the issue on which the hon. gentleman went to the people.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was one of them.

Motion agreed to.

SOUTHPORT, BELFAST AND MURRAY HARBOUR PROPOSED RAILWAY.

Mr. MARTIN moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other papers in possession of the Government relating to the proposed branch railway from Southport to Belfast and Murray Harbour, and other proposed railway branches in the province of Prince Edward Island.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a few remarks on the subject-matter of this motion. Early last session, I put a similar motion on the Order paper, but the debate on that motion was adjourned, and it was not again reached before prorogation. Last session I also asked from the Minister of Railways and Canals the following statement:—

A statement showing the amount of money contributed by the Government towards the building and subsidizing of railways in Canada since the first of July, 1873; the number of acres of land given as subsidies to railways in Canada since that time, with the estimated cost and price of such land; and also a statement showing the proportion of such expenditure made in each of the provinces separately, including the Northwest Territories; deducting therefrom, for each province, any sums that may have been charged back against the province on account of such railway expenditure in their debt account with the Dominion.

I regret that the Minister of Railways and Canals has not yet brought down that return, because if we had it now it would be of great service to us in discussing this question which so intimately concerns the province of Prince Edward Island. Some hon. members may be aware that this matter has been discussed in this House for some years. Prince Edward Island has a grievance in that respect since confederation, and especially since 1883, when a departure was made from the compact with reference to subsidies to railways, which was arrived at when we came into the union. Since 1883, railways have been built by the Dominion Government, and others assisted by giving subsidies though not extending beyond our province, and that I presume was in order to relieve the provinces of the burden of paying for railways within their borders. The provinces were unequal to the task, and the Dominion Government came to their rescue and extended the system of granting subsidies to railways in the different provinces of the Dominion. That system has never been applied to Prince Edward Island, notwithstanding the fact that the province is badly in need of railway expenditure. The branch lines with reference to which I have given notice of motion, was contemplated before we entered confederation and in fact, in the 211 miles of railway which were under contract or in operation at the time of the union, it was proposed that these branches should be built, and especially this branch to the south. I doubt if the Railway Bill would have been passed in the provincial legislature unless it had been agreed to, that these branch lines should be constructed. I would remind the House that in 1896 the late Government brought down a project which included the building of this railway from Southport to Belfast and Murray Harbour. The carrying out of that project would render long-delayed justice to Prince Edward Island, and I trust that the present Government will carry it into effect. I may say, that in 1896 the proposal was endorsed by the then Opposition who now control the affairs of this country. The basis on which this claim was made was agreed to in 1888, when a demand was made by Prince Edward Island for the fulfilment of the compact of confederation. A delegation was sent up here, and a sub-committee of the Dominion Privy Council made a report, from which I will give you the following extract:—

1st. That, from the insular position of this province, we, Prince Edward Island, did not receive the same benefit from the construction of the Pacific and Intercolonial railways that the other provinces had received. 2nd. That the said railways cost a great deal more than was anticipated when they were commenced, and, as the terms on which this Island entered the union were, in a great measure, based upon their contemplated cost at commencement, therefore, this Island had a right to some consideration on that account. And, thirdly, that the subsidies granted to the other provinces in carrying out the late railway policy of the Government, had not been made applicable in any way to this Island, whereas the other provinces had in this manner been largely benefited.

This statement corroborates the contention which I hold, and which the province holds to-day; and unless this claim, which was admitted by the sub-committee of the Privy Council, is satisfied, and the province of Prince Edward Island is put in the position demanded by the terms of union, there will be a great deal of dissatisfaction in that province. The people of Prince Edward Island will never be satisfied with the existing state of things, in which, while they are called upon to pay their share of the interest on the money expended on railways in every part of the Dominion, are debarred, or have hitherto, at least, been debarred, from partaking of any of the advantages accruing from that expenditure.

Last year, in addressing this House, I went pretty fully into this matter, and showed that since the 1st of July, 1873, there had been spent or contributed by the Dominion Government as railway subsidies in different parts of the Dominion the large sum of $153,981,234. On this sum Prince Edward Island pays her share of interest, though, being the smallest province of the Dominion, she is entitled to, not simple fair play, but even on account of its small numerical strength even more than that at the hands of this great Dominion. Giving the Dominion credit for $500,000, which was placed to the credit of the province, or $20,000 a year, there would be still due to the province on this basis the sum of $2,702,835. This statement or statements on the same lines has been made repeatedly in this House and in the other Chamber, and it has never been successfully contradicted. I think it has been made by the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies), by the hon. member for King's (Mr. Macdonald), and in the Senate by the hon. Senator Ferguson and the hon. Senator Prowse. There has been no reply to those statements. The question remains as it was before, and justice is not done to Prince Edward Island.

I intend on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, with your permission, to refer to some statistics which will go further to prove the claims of Prince Edward Island in this matter. I find, by looking at the public records of this country that at confederation, in July, 1867, the number of miles of railway in operation in the Dominion was only 2,278, while on the 30th June, 1895, there were 16,091 miles in operation, an increase of 13,813 miles in 28 years. Now, I find that in the province of Ontario there is one mile of railway for every 344 of the population; in Quebec there is one mile for every 442 of the population; in New Brunswick there is one mile for every 264 of the population; in Nova Scotia there is one mile for every 501 of the population; in Manitoba there is one mile for every 103 of the population; in British Columbia there one mile for every 122 of the population; and in the North-west Territories there is one mile for every 32 of the population; whereas Prince Edward Island has only one mile for every 517 of the population. This shows that Prince Edward Island has the least railway mileage to the population of all the provinces of the Dominion. That was not the case when we entered confederation. At that time the Dominion had only a mile of railway for every 700 people, while Prince Edward Island had built at its own cost a mile of railway for every 480 people. To-day the position is reversed. Prince Edward Island then held the first position in regard to railway expenditure, while to-day she holds the least favourable position. To-day, after 25 or 30 years in the confederation, she has only a mile for every 517 people, while the Dominion of Canada, instead of having a mile for every 700 people, has a mile for every 300. Is it fair, I ask you, that the small province of Prince Edward Island should be called upon to contribute to the increased mileage all over the Dominion, while she has not received the adequate share which properly belongs to her? I may point out further that in order to obtain this railway mileage, the Dominion has contributed up to the 30th of June, 1895, the sum of $153,996,778. And that is not all. Besides that the Dominion has contributed at least 50,464,186 acres of land. Thus, that large portion of the domain of Canada, a share in the profits of which would naturally belong to Prince Edward Island, has been absorbed in railway construction besides the amount of money I have mentioned. It will be readily understood that of this large increase in railway construction, from 2,278 miles at confederation, to 16,091 on 30th June, 1895, each province, as well as the Dominion, has contributed its share; and I wish to point out, from the statistics I have in hand, the amount of money which has been contributed by each province. I find, on reference to the Dominion blue-books, that up to June 30th, 1895, Ontario has, deducting the loans, contributed altogether, including her municipalities, $17,470,181. I am taking each province, including the municipalities, because in some provinces the municipalities have contributed as well as the provincial government, and in order to make this statement as fair as possible, I have included in it the amount spent by the municipalities, as well as by the local governments, and I deduct the loans made, because I presume the loans are good and the interest and capital will be finally paid. The table I am about to read gives the amount contributed by each province, including the municipalities :

Ontario	$17,470,181
Quebec	14,615,233
New Brunswick.....	4,989,800
Nova Scotia.....	2,306,601
Manitoba	1,336,278
North-west Territories.....
British Columbia.....	75,000
Prince Edward Island.....	3,150,000

It follows, therefore, that the different provinces have contributed, through their provincial governments and municipalities, the following sums per mile for railways, wholly within each of them :—

Province.	Miles of Railway.	Con-tributed Per Mile.
Ontario	6,403	$ 2,725
Quebec	3,139	4,656
New Brunswick.....	1,404	3,555
Nova Scotia.....	891	2,590
Manitoba	1,472	900
British Columbia.....	890	93
North-west Territories.....	1,772
Prince Edward Island.....	211	15,400

Thus, Prince Edward Island has paid at the rate of $15,400 for every mile of railway she has, and the next largest amount paid is that paid by the province of Quebec, $4,656 per mile. Ontario has only paid $2,725 per mile, and New Brunswick, $3,555 per mile.

Railway building has, therefore, been a very expensive business for Prince Edward Island especially. That province has only 211 miles of railway, which have cost it $15,400 per mile, while the other provinces have a larger number of miles per capita and these have not cost them anything like that amount. Ontario contributed out of its provincial resources, per mile, only one-fifth as much as Prince Edward Island, Quebec only one-third as much, New Brunswick only one-fourth as much, and Nova Scotia about one-fifth or one-sixth as much. That statement shows, on the face of it, that little Prince Edward Island has been more than abreast of the whole Dominion in the way of railway enterprise. While the other provinces have not contributed over $4,000 each, and some only $2,000 and others $3,000 per mile for the railways built within their limits, the little island of Prince Edward has loaded herself down with a debt of $15,400 for every mile of railway we have to-day, with the exception of some eleven miles, which were built by the Dominion Government in order to make some show of carrying out the terms of the union as regards communication with the mainland. It will not be difficult to understand that where the provinces paid the least, the Dominion Government has paid the most, and vice versa. In Prince Edward Island, for instance, where the provincial government has paid largely, the Dominion Government has only paid a little, while in British Columbia and the North-west Territories and in fact all the rest of the provinces except Prince Edward Island, where little has been spent by these provinces themselves, large sums have been paid by the Dominion Government. And these eleven miles of railway to which I have alluded have no commercial value at all, but are there merely under the terms of the union, for the purpose of making some pretense of supplying winter and summer communication with the mainland.

On this matter I wish to make a further statement, and that is, that while the facts are as I have stated with regard to railway expenditure in the province of Prince Edward Island, any one taking up the blue-books of this Dominion and reading them would be led to believe that that province has never spent a cent for railway construction. Let me first refer to the Year-Book of the fiscal year of 1895, page 645, and in doing so I wish to state, in justice to the compiler of the statistical Year-Book, that he is not responsible for the statements therein, as he has compiled them from other blue-books of the Government—from the Railways and Canals Reports and other Government reports. What do we find in this book? We find, on page 645, the expenses paid by the Dominion Government and by the provinces for railways in this Dominion, as follows, up to June 30th, 1895 :

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest to my hon. friend that perhaps it would be well to move the adjournment. It is quite evident he will not get through before six o'clock, and by moving the adjournment he could go on and finish his very interesting argument when the House meets again.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. DAVIN. It is understood, of course, that my hon. friend will go on with his speech when the debate re-opens.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is the understanding.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence with the Government of Prince Edward Island, not already brought down, respecting the claims of said government on the Federal Government.—(Mr. MacDonald, King's.)

Copies of all letters, papers, correspondence, petitions, &c., relating to the dismissal of J. Albert Verge, fishery officer for the River Restigouche and its tributaries and the waters of the Baie des Chaleurs, and the appointment of Charles Brown in his place.—(Mr. McInerney, for Mr. McAlister.)

Copies of all letters, papers and correspondence relating to the closing in March last of the post office at Oak Bay Mills, Quebec.—(Mr. McInerney, for Mr. McAlister.)

Copies of all correspondence in connection with the appointment and installation of George G. King to the postmastership of Marsh Hill, Ont., had with any member of the Government, or any officer of the Post Office Department.—(Mr. Foster.)

Return of copies of all letters, telegrams, petitions, reports and other communications with respect to the appointment and dismissal of David H. Price, postmaster of Aylmer West, and the appointment of his successor, Frederick Ashbaugh.—(Mr. Bennett, for Mr. Ingram.)

Copies of all papers, letters, documents, petitions, &c., relating to the dismissal of A. J. McNeill, as postmaster at Stanley Bridge, in Prince Edward Island.—(Mr. Martin.)

Copy of the Order in Council appointing Mr. A. D. Danis as collector of tolls at the Beauharnois Canal.

Also, for nomination of Mr. Danis as collector of customs at Valleyfield.

Also, for nomination of excise officer at Valleyfield.

For papers, correspondence, letters, &c., in relation to the dismissal of Mr. Danis as collector of tolls.—(Mr. Bergeron.)

Return showing the names of all persons dismissed from the service of the Inland Revenue Department since the first day of July, 1896; also the names of all persons appointed to the service of said department since the first day of July, 1896.—(Mr. Wallace, for Mr. Wood, Brockville.)

Copy of returns for Weller Bay while an outpost, i.e., about eleven years:—

1. The value of dutiable goods and duty collected.
2. Value of free goods.
3. Total number of vessels entered and cleared.
4. Total salary paid.—(Mr. Hughes, for Mr. Corby.)

Copies of all correspondence, petitions and reports relative to the dismissal of T. P. Shields, postmaster of Upper Maugerville, and the appointment of Emery Sewel in his place, and in reference to any changes proposed in the location of said post office since 1891.—(Mr. Foster.)

Copies of all papers and correspondence relating to tenders for the mail contract between Shubenacadie to Dean, in the province of Nova Scotia, including a statement of the tenders received and the reason for awarding the contract to one Guild.—(Mr. McDougall, for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Copies of all papers relating to the release of Daniel Brien Sullivan, committed to gaol at Toronto on the 18th November, 1896, including the reports of the Police Magistrate of the 21st and 27th November, 1896.—(Mr. McDougall, for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Return of all correspondence, evidence, reports and papers respecting the dismissal of the car inspector and car oiler at Stellarton, Nova Scotia, under instructions of the mechanical superintendent, Intercolonial Railway, at Moncton, 5th February, 1897.—(Mr. McDougall, for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper.)

Copies of all letters, telegrams and papers that have passed between the Government and any person or persons in connection with the dismissal of Dr. George Duncan, late quarantine superintendent at William's Head Station, B.C.—(Mr. Earle, for Mr. Prior.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Indian Affairs at Ottawa and the officers of the Indian Department at Regina and at Winnipeg, respecting the furnishing supplies to the St. Paul Industrial School; also, the correspondence between the Department at Ottawa and the Hudson Bay Company at Winnipeg.—(Mr. LaRivière, for Mr. Davin.)

1. Copies of all correspondence and other documents relating to the creation of post office inspectorships at Stratford, Barrie and Kingston and the appointment of inspectors and other officials connected with such inspectorships.

2. The number of employees connected with each such office and the salaries paid, and all other expenses of each office.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Copies of all correspondence with the Government of Prince Edward Island relative to the Government's co-operation with the said government in the construction of a bridge across the Hillsborough River, at or near Charlottetown, in said province.—(Mr. Macdonald, King's.)

Copies of all correspondence and other documents relating to the appointment of the Rev. Mr. Fairlie to the position of superintendent of the Industrial School, Winnipeg, and all recommendations for such appointment, and all departmental orders or other papers having relation thereto.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Return showing: 1. Each contract for carrying the mails cancelled since 7th July, 1896, showing the locality covered by each contract and the county and province in which situated.

2. The name of each contractor.

3. The price of each contract at the time of cancellation.

4. If new contracts entered into, the contract price of each new contract.

5. The reason for the cancellation of each contract.—(Mr. Cameron.)

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 4th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House, that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of Richard Willis Jameson, Esq., for the Electoral District of Winnipeg.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Richard Willis Jameson, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Winnipeg, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. LANDERKIN moved :

That that part of the 49th Rule which affects the time for presenting Private Bills, be suspended, in reference to the following petitions, namely : the Georgian Bay Ship Canal and Power Aqueduct Company ; the Restigouche and Victoria Railway Company ; the Montreal Bridge Company ; the Great Eastern Railway Company ; the Sun Life Insurance Company ; the Columbia Western Railway Company, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their Seventh Report.

Mr. SPROULE. Before this motion is adopted, I wish to say, that it appears to me that we ought either change the 49th rule, or else have less frequent attempts in this House to suspend it. If the rule is of any value whatever, it ought to be adhered to as closely as possible, and it should only be departed from under very exceptional circumstances. Every year this motion is made over and over again, and it appears to me that the rule is more honoured in the breach than in the observance. The rule should be changed, or else when an effort is made to have it suspended, very strong reasons should be given for such a motion.

Motion agreed to.

HALIFAX LOAN COMPANY.

Mr. FRASER moved :

That that part of the 49th Rule which limits the time for receiving Private Bills, be suspended, in reference to the petition of the Halifax Loan Company, Limited, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Standing Orders, as contained in their Seventh Report.

He said : I take for granted that the committee has looked into this matter. While the rule is a good one, it must in certain cases be suspended, and the committee are the best judges when that should be done.

Mr. SPROULE. That does not make it any more justifiable to violate the rule.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. SOMERVILLE moved :

That the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present session, be now concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 90) respecting the Montreal Bridge Company.—(Mr. Boisvert.)

Bill (No. 91) respecting the Sun Life Assurance Company of Canada.—(Mr. Rosamond.)

Bill (No. 92) respecting the Great Eastern Railway Company.—(Mr. Boisvert.)

Bill (No. 93) to incorporate the Columbia and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Bostock.)

SUPPLY

House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Charges of Management..... $150,650

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. leader of the Opposition will see that there is a considerable reduction in the total amount. There are very small increases in commission on public debt, in brokerage and in miscellaneous printing ; but in most of the other items, including the charge for printing Dominion notes, there are considerable reductions.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I see there is an increase in the charge for printing, inspection, advertising, &c., from $12,500 to $15,000. Will the hon. gentleman explain ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Last year they found that the item which had been reduced to its old figure was not quite large enough, and not wishing to be caught in that predicament again, we ask for $15,000. The hon. gentleman understands that, unless absolutely required, this sum will not be expended.

The Governor General's Office..... $11,150

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is precisely as heretofore, with the exception of a very small statutory increase of $25 in the one case and $12.50 in another.

Mr. SPROULE. I thought the Government had stopped all the statutory increases this year.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. These were statutory increases that had been granted before. They are just balanced periods. They had been granted, in the one case, terminating on the 1st October, and in the other case, terminating on the 1st of January next.

The Department of Justice, including $4,000 for the Deputy of the Minister of Justice and $600 allowance for the salary of the private secretary of the Solicitor General, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act. $24,850

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase in the first item of $450.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman will turn over the page, he will see the thing given in detail. Heretofore the Deputy Minister of Justice was in the habit of receiving $4,000, but it was paid in two places, a part in his proper place as Deputy Minister of Justice, and $400 as solicitor of the Indian Affairs. Sir Oliver Mowat thought it more expedient to consolidate the two sums in one. There is a small statutory increase, however, for a second-class clerk.

Mr. HAGGART. Does the Deputy Minister of Justice act as solicitor for Indian Affairs?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. Is there a provision for a solicitor to the Indian Department?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. There is a provision for a law clerk.

Mr. HAGGART. Then you are giving a deputy head $400 for acting as solicitor for Indian Affairs and providing for a law clerk as well.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We will take that up when we come to it, if the hon. gentleman will allow this to pass.

Mr. DAVIN. Has there always been a law clerk in connection with the Department of Indian Affairs?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). No, there has been a solicitor but no law clerk. The intention is to do away with the Deputy Minister of Justice acting as solicitor and appoint a permanent law clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me hardly possible that we should allow this to pass and take up the discussion of the item for the law clerk.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I do not object to the discussion, but thought it would come more conveniently on the other item.

Mr. FOSTER. But in the meantime you will have passed this. I take it that the Department of Indian Affairs, under its promises of economy, is not going to increase the expenses by the addition of a law clerk and then throw upon the Justice Department the $400 which was formerly paid by the Indian Department for a solicitor, and paid to the Deputy Minister of Justice. Either one or the other surely ought to be left out. If you are going to appoint a law clerk for the Indian Department, then you have no need to appoint a solicitor for the department. Heretofore the solicitor has done the business and done it well. With the clerks in the Indian Department, able and experienced clerks, to advise the Deputy Minister of Justice, everything heretofore has been done that is necessary as far as legal advice is concerned. Surely my hon. friend is not going to tell us that in the re-arrangements made in the Indian Department, serviceable clerks have been done away with so that they now require $2,000 or $3,000 worth more of legal advice.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) will look a little further down he will see that there is a reduction of $5,102 effected in the Department of Indian Affairs, so that the country will not be the loser even with an increase of $400 to the Department of Justice. As to the reasons that made my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Sifton) require a law clerk in the Indian Department, I think it would be better that they should be given by himself. The Minister of Justice held that he could not reduce the salary of the Deputy Minister of Justice, that that officer was well worth $4,000 a year. He was not an officer of our appointment, as the hon. gentleman well knows, and Sir Oliver Mowat considered that he was not overpaid at $4,000 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. But it would be infinitely better if you want to pay your Deputy Minister of Justice $4,000 a year, to say so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That is precisely what is done. If the hon. gentleman will look at the item he will see:

Deputy Head (heretofore $3,600 salary of the Deputy of the Minister of Justice and $400 salary of the law clerk of Indian Affairs).....	$4,000
Precisely what the hon. gentleman asks has been done.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite so. I did not notice the parantheses.

Mr. BENNETT. Has an appointment been made to the position of solicitor of the Indian Department at $2,000 a year?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). No.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask whether any of the clerkships in the Department of Justice, estimated for here, are vacant?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am advised that all these clerkships are filled.

Department of Justice, Penitentiary Branch $3,150

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is a similar case of the increase of $50 being granted for the year, half of it falling after the 1st of July, which is therefore estimated for.

Mr. FOSTER. And these are the same clerks?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The same clerks, I believe.

Department of Militia and Defence..... $41,050

Mr. HUGHES. According to the estimate, there is a saving here. I would like to ask wherein the Minister proposes to make the saving?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I had not expected that this would come up. I have just sent for the Deputy Minister, and if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hughes) wants, as he is justified in wanting, detailed information, that officer will be here in a few moments. In the meantime we might proceed to another item, passing over the next item, of Secretary of State's Department.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery $29,100

Mr. FOSTER. There is a slight increase here. We would like an explanation of the changes that have been made.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I believe that there are hardly any changes except a few increases in salaries of halves and quarters of the fifty-dollar increase, which have been allowed, some of them for broken periods. Otherwise, there is no change.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any vacancies in the positions estimated for here?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I understand these are all filled.

Department of the Interior, including $2,000 to provide for the promotion of T. G. Rothwell and $1,900 for the promotion of K. J. Henry to chief clerkships, $1,500 for the promotion of P. G. Keyes to a first-class clerkship, and $850 for the salary of James Dunnet, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.....$104,814

Mr. SPROULE. There is an increase of $370 here. Will the hon. gentleman give us some explanation of what has caused it?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The increases consist of certain statutory increases and of the increases indicated in the item—in the salary of Mr. Rothwell from $1,750 to $2,000, Mr. Dunnet from $650 to $850, and Mr. Henry from $1,800 to $1,900.

Mr. FOSTER. We could have seen that by comparing the figures. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) will have to give a more extended explanation than simply to subtract the old figures from the new. The House would like to know the reasons for the addition in each case. But, first, with reference to the deputy head, I would like to ask who is the present deputy head of the department, whether a change has been made, and if so, what the reasons for that change are?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The present deputy head of the Department of Interior is Mr. Jas. A. Smart. As the hon. gentleman is no doubt aware, Mr. A. M. Burgess was formerly Deputy Minister of Interior. A change has been made in the following way: Mr. Burgess has been transferred to the office of Commissioner of Dominion Lands, an office that was formerly held by Mr. H. H. Smith, of Winnipeg. But Mr. Smith has been superannuated, and it is the intention to abolish the office of Commissioner at Winnipeg, and Mr. Burgess will transact the duties of Commissioner at the head office in Ottawa. In answer to the hon. gentleman's request for the reasons of the change, briefly these reasons are: That under the former management of the Department of Interior, the affairs of the department were not conducted in a satisfactory manner. They were not conducted in a satisfactory manner, because it was apparent that there was no desire, or no strong desire, no effectual desire, on the part of the Minister of Interior, or of the deputy, or of both, to act in a reasonable way with the settlers of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, with whom, particularly, that department has to deal; and it was deemed impossible by me as the responsible head of the department to secure a satisfactory administration of the department without at the same time making a change in the deputy head. I think it desirable that the deputy head of that department should be a man who is familiar with the affairs of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and not only familiar with the affairs of the country, but familiar with the circumstances of the people, one who would understand, not only the technical office details of the business that came before him, but understand the circumstances with which he was dealing so that he would know the effect of any decision, or would know what was likely to occur as a result of it. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman expects me to go into an extended discussion of the result of the late Government's policy in regard to North-western affairs, probably this would not be the best place to enter into a lengthy discussion of that matter; but I have no objections, if the hon. gentleman so desires, at a convenient time to give him my ideas in regard to the manner in which the Department of Interior as affecting the condition of the people of the North-west Territories, has been conducted. I fancy the explanation I have given, however, will be sufficient for the present.

Mr. FOSTER. What salary does Mr. Burgess get in his new place?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. $3,200. The ex-commissioner's salary was $4,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The chief clerk and secretary is the same who has been there before—any change in that office?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No change.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Surveyor General is the same?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The same.

Mr. FOSTER. And the Commissioner of Patents?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The same.

Mr. FOSTER. What accounts for the difference in the salary between the old and the new? The proportion of the $50 increase?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. The Accountant is the same?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, who is this Mr. Rothwell, who is being made Law Clerk, and in whose behalf the Civil Service Act is violated by the hon. gentlemen—who always found most particular fault with having a law upon the statute-book and then coming down when the Estimates were put on and continually violating it?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The epithet is unfortunate—not violating.

Mr. FOSTER. If these principles were so sound when they were not in office, why are they violated now that they are in office?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I may say in reply to the hon. gentleman, that Mr. Rothwell was a second-class clerk in the department at a minimum salary of $1,100. Mr. Rothwell is a member of the legal profession, and on that account he was in charge of the legal matters in connection with the department since 1884. He has from time to time since that date been taking more and more control of matters appertaining to questions of title in the department where the services of a lawyer were required, and his services in that respect have become extremely valuable. The hon. gentleman is no doubt aware that in the Department of Interior a large number of questions of a legal nature arise, and sometimes they are of a very intricate character. They do not require the highest degree of legal knowledge, but they require a fair amount of legal knowledge, and a somewhat intimate and thorough knowledge of the statutes relating to the various matters and the details of the business that comes before him. It would be entirely unsatisfactory to be obliged to refer those matters to the Department of Justice, in fact it would probably mean that there would be much greater delay in issuing patents in disputed cases than there has been in the past, and I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that that is quite unnecessary. It is my desire rather to facilitate the issuing of patents instead of delaying them; and that is the necessity for a law clerk. Mr. Rothwell has been in effect law clerk for some time, and the fact that he is called a law clerk makes no substantial difference in his work. The one point really for discussion, is as to whether the increase which is suggested is a justifiable increase, the increase is from $1,750 to $2,000. Now, I may say that while I have had the honour of transacting the business of this department, I have found that Mr. Rothwell was an extremely valuable officer. The hon. gentleman knows that I came into the department without knowing anything of the officers, and I had to judge of them upon their merits, and from the way in which they transacted their business, and in view of the extremely efficient manner in which this gentleman discharged his duties, and of the value of his services to the department, I thought it would be a proper thing, and very much in the interests of the efficient discharge of the business of the department, that the value of his services should be recognized, and that he should receive an additional salary. I may say that in view of the knowledge of law which he has, and his ability as a professional man, I do not think $2,000 is at all excessive, in fact I think it rather a low salary for a gentleman of his ability and experience in those matters. It would be an extremely inadvisable thing for the Government to run any risk whatever of losing his services, because it would be some years before anybody else could acquire the same thorough knowledge of the business.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the hon. gentleman give explanations now with reference to K. J. Henry?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. Henry was appointed a temporary clerk upon the 30th of June, 1871, and he will complete his 26th year of service upon the 30th of June next. He has been employed almost continually as registrar of the correspondence and clerk in charge of the files of the department. His salary has been from time to time increased, until it has become $1,800, and the proposition which is before the committee now is that his salary be increased to $1,900. The increase amounts only to $100, just double the amount which, in the ordinary course of procedure under the Civil Service Act, would be the annual increment. I have thought it advisable to ask that Mr. Henry's salary should be increased by $100, in view of the fact that he holds an extremely important position in the department. I think it is advisable when officials are differentiated in regard to their duties, one man holding an exceedingly responsible position and another man holding a less responsible position, who perhaps has been longer in the service and yet is not considered capable of holding the higher position, that the man holding the responsible position should be more highly paid than the other. I do not consider that this distinction has been sufficiently drawn in the Department of Interior—I do not know how it is in regard to the other departments—I think there has been too much disposition to give consideration to the length of service rather than to ability and satisfactory work. I consider Mr. Henry is a very efficient officer, and therefore I ask the House to increase his salary by $100.

Mr. FOSTER. Were both those men on the permanent temporary list?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. FOSTER. They were on the permanent list?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes. From information I have, Mr. Henry has been on the permanent list for twenty-six years.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the reason that no salaries appeared opposite their names in the estimates for 1896-97?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They were estimated for as so many first or second-class clerks; and as regards the special vote asked for, of course no corresponding vote was asked last year.

Mr. FOSTER. As regards the four technical officers, are they the same as before, and are their salaries the same?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. They are the same officers—there has been no change.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of item No. 10?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The salary asked for Mr. Keyes is $1,500, his previous salary having been $1,400. He is the chief clerk of the branch of the department which looks after the disposing of ordnance lands and the collection of revenue derived from those lands. He was appointed on July 17, 1878, at a salary of $700, and has therefore been nineteen years in the service. He is now chief clerk of the branch, and my reason for asking the House to increase his salary by $100 is almost similar to the reason given in the case of Mr. Henry. Mr. Keyes being in charge of an important branch, I thought it well to recommend this slight increase in recognition of his efficiency. Of course, I take it that the House understands that when I ask the salary of an officer to be increased, it is done because I have made an examination of his work, and have found the officer efficient.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I wish to point out to the hon. gentleman that he is taking most extraordinary power, as head of the department, in violating the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I know very well that this is not the first time men have been advanced, notwithstanding the provisions of that Act; but the hon. gentleman has gone a long way beyond anything done by his predecessors in that direction. Not only has he recommended that a new status be given to Mr. Rothwell, but he has recommended an increase of salary in the present case, and all this is in the teeth of the Civil Service Act. I submit that this is a very dangerous position for the head of the department to take, because it leaves in his own hands a wider discretion than I think was ever contemplated by that Act. So while I do not object to what the hon. gentleman says, when he declares that the efficiency and work of the officials determined him to take this extraordinary course. I wish to point out to him and his colleagues that they are accumulating a good deal of trouble for themselves, because the exercise of this discrimination between the merits of members of the service will prove a matter of considerable worry to them hereafter. I fully agree with the hon. gentleman that there should be some officials in the Department of Interior possessing, if not a complete knowledge of law in the sense of being a lawyer, at least possessing that status, because the issuing of letters-patent requires the application of a legal mind, if not a legal knowledge. The same may be said in regard to other departments, but that is a rule not observed by the present Government in regard to some of the other departments.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to point out that here we have, as an initial step, the cost of the department increased by $1,900.

Mr. DAVIN. I observe it has been increased on the whole by $400; but in regard to items up to No. 10, the increase has been $1,900. I do not rise to object very strongly to this increase, but I wish to point out that this is the beginning of a policy of economy.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the superannuation allowance of Mr. H. H. Smith?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. $1,590 a year.

Mr. HUGHES. Were the ordinary ten years added to his time?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. HUGHES. Was any addition given to his time of service?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. An Order in Council was passed by the late Government—I cannot give the exact date of it, as I did not know the hon. gentleman would bring the matter up—but it was some time after the salary of Mr. Smith was reduced from $5,000 to $4,000.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Between the 5th and the 10th of January.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. An Order in Council was passed by the late Government during the month of January, in which it was provided, that when Mr. Smith should retire, the term of five years should be added to his superannuation allowance. The present advisers of His Excellency did not see fit to add anything to his term, although they did not see fit to rescind what seemed to them to be, after a manner, an obligation entered into by the late Government. It should be said, however, that the late Government had no power to bind their successors, nor to bind themselves, as to what they should do when Mr. Smith should be placed on the retired list. Although the Order in Council was said to have been passed when some of the former advisers of His Excellency were temporarily not performing their duties, still it was an Order in Council, and we therefore recognized it and permitted Mr. Smith to have the benefit of the additional five years.

Mr. HAGGART. Who has been appointed to the extra first-class clerkship which the Minister asks for?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not created an extra first-class clerkship.

Mr. HAGGART. You have. You have taken Mr. Rothwell and Mr. Henry; you had eleven before and that makes twelve.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There has been no appointment.

Mr. HAGGART. Then there is a vacancy.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. If Mr. Rothwell is appointed law clerk at a fixed salary, the effect will be to create a vacancy, but I have no intention of appointing any one to that vacancy, because I do not think it necessary to do so.

Mr. HAGGART. Then why do you ask for the vote?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will examine into the contention of the hon. gentleman later, and if he is correct I will ask to have the vote reduced.

Mr. HAGGART. Let the item stand.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Very good.

Mr. HUGHES.

Mr. HAGGART. Is this gentleman who is appointed law clerk, and who the Minister says is a member of a legal society, a barrister or solicitor?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I am informed that he is a solicitor for the province of Ontario.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. You ought to know, you appointed him.

Mr. HAGGART. Not as a law clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. The Minister has not exhausted the list of explanations on these rather serious breaches of the Civil Service Act. There is a man by the name of Dunnet there. The Minister may have an explanation on that; he has "done it" too often.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Oh, oh.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will give a brief sketch of Mr. Dunnet's history, as I think it will appeal to the sympathies of the hon. gentleman. Mr. Dunnet entered the service in 1878; in 1893 he passed the civil service examination, and he has therefore been in the service as a temporary and permanent clerk for nineteen years. During that time he succeeded in getting his salary raised to $650. Mr. Dunnet came to me thinking that he had been—not exactly unfairly dealt with—but thinking that his merits as a servant did not receive that attention that they ought to receive, and after careful consideration of his case I thought he was entitled to a reasonable increase in his salary. After a gentleman has been a faithful servant for nineteen years, I do not think it can be said that the salary of $850 is excessive.

Mr. SPROULE. When was H. H. Smith superannuated?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. His superannuation took effect on the 1st of April.

Mr. SPROULE. I notice that in two of these cases, you have not only given the clerks a statutory increase of $50 each, but you have actually doubled that statutory allowance. Has the department adopted the new principle, that while withholding the ordinary statutory increases from civil servants generally, they will reserve to themselves the right to increase in any particular case and to any extent they like?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They recommend it to the House.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have come to the conclusion, which I think can be very well maintained to the satisfaction of the House, that the Minister in charge of a department is in a much better position to decide, whether a man is entitled to an increase of salary or to a larger salary than the automatic action of the Civil Service Act. I give my opinion for what it is worth; that it is not conducive to the efficiency of the service, that every man who is in the service shall know that he is going to get $50 a year increase whether he is efficient or not. It is not conducive to efficiency that there should be no special recognition of merit, or ability, or diligence. As the hon. gentleman well knows, practically, for some years past, the $50 a year increase has been almost automatic. In fact, it is rather a fine point of law as to whether the Civil Service Act contemplates that there should be any discretion about it or not. The civil servants themselves think there is none, but the conclusion of the Government is, that they would not give the increase unless it is specially considered that the civil servant earned it. We considered it to be more in the interest of the efficient work of the departments, that the Ministers should exercise discretion in regard to increasing salaries, rather than that it should be entirely automatic, and that officers should get increases whether they were efficient or not.

Mr. SPROULE. It is at least pleasing to know that the hon. gentleman does not agree with his friends when they were in power before, because, if my memory is correct, they were the parties who adopted the principle of the statutory increase, and it has been acted upon ever since. But it is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have selected for promotion the two clerks he has selected, because, if my memory is not at fault, these two clerks were the subject of considerable controversy in this House a few years ago, and his friends behind him moved a vote of want of confidence in the Government because these same two clerks were not dismissed on account of certain irregularities which came out in 1891.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Which two clerks?

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Henry and Mr. Rothwell. There was a very long and very heated discussion over the matter in this House, and some very hard strictures were passed upon the Government because they did not dismiss these two men on account of the irregularities which were carried on in the department with their knowledge and consent; and now these same two men are selected for promotion. It is at least a justification of the late Government for what they did not do.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Would the hon. gentleman be more specific in regard to what these men were guilty of?

Mr. SPROULE. I could by bringing in the report of the Public Accounts Committee.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not think the hon. gentleman is putting that matter fairly. The gentlemen who sat in the Opposition did not all agree that Mr. Henry should be dismissed. On the contrary, if he will turn back to the debates, he will find that Mr. Henry's conduct was defended by some gentlemen of the Opposition. I defended it myself.

Mr. SPROULE. I did not say all of the hon. gentleman's friends did so, but I take it the majority did.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. I have some remembrance of the investigations which took place in reference to the Department of the Interior in 1891, and the conduct of Mr. Henry and Mr. Rothwell was such as to meet with the approbation instead of the disapproval of the committee. Mr. Rothwell came before the committee and gave his evidence in a straightforward, manly manner, and so did Mr. Henry. I do not think any reflection was cast on either in the committee or in this House. These two men were exempt from the criticisms of the committee, for the simple reason that they acted in a straightforward, honourable manner in giving their evidence, and no charge was brought against them that was sustained in any way whatever. I think they deserve credit for their conduct, and I am satisfied that in the discussion which took place in this House, neither Mr. Henry nor Mr. Rothwell met with the censure of any gentleman in the Opposition at that time.

Mr. SPROULE. Then the hon. gentleman must have a very bad memory. If he takes the trouble to look up "Hansard" he will see that he is entirely astray. I do not say that these gentlemen are worthy of condemnation, because we defended their conduct at that time. What I say is that the very fact that they are selected for promotion and an advance of salary is a justification of the late Government in defending them.

Mr. McCARTHY. I think it is unfortunate, if my hon. friend entertains that opinion about these gentlemen, that he should have mentioned their names in the terms he has; for every one who heard him would supposed that he disapproved of the promotion of these gentlemen because of what happened in 1891. I do not remember very much about Mr. Rothwell, but I do remember that when Mr. Henry's name was under discussion here, it was shown that he had been very unfairly treated. What he had done was perhaps technically open to condemnation, but he had done it in obedience to his superior officer; and when his superior officer asked him to commit a like offence, he objected, and in consequence he has incurred the enmity of that officer from that time to this. So I am glad that the hon. gentleman has stated that he does not mean by the observation he has made to cast any reflection upon either of these gentlemen.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not, but I say that they are most unfortunate cases to be selected for promotion.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not see the force of that statement, if these gentlemen were not deserving of censure. The mere fact that some persons called their names before the committee is no reason why they should not be promoted if they afford cases which justify the Minister in recommending their advance of salary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not intend to say a word with reference to these gentlemen whose names are now before the committee; but I want to draw the attention of the committee to what I think is a very serious and important matter. It was the policy of different Governments, under the Civil Service Act, to add $50 a year to the salaries of such clerks as performed their duties in such a way as to secure the recommendation of the head of the department for that increase, which was done on the report of the Deputy Minister, a gentleman who is not a political partisan, but a permanent official acting under all Governments. Not only have we that policy, introduced I am told—I do not remember myself—by hon. gentlemen opposite when in power before—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No. I think it was in existence from 1867.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am right, at all events, in saying that it was the practice of the Liberal party when in power. It was a sound and salutary practice, provided it was properly carried out; and every assurance that it would be fairly and impartially carried out was implied in the fact that the statutory increase could not be obtained unless the deputy head certified that the official was entitled to it. Now, what has been done? It is declared that this practice has been swept away, and that the Minister of the Interior has adopted a policy of cutting off that statutory increase which under the law and practice of Parliament was awarded uniformly to all officials who performed their services in such a way as to obtain the recommendation of the deputy head, and has provided not only that the statutory increase shall be given to certain individuals, but that it may be doubled. Now, what is the position of all the rest of the civil service? The fact that you put the names of these two gentlemen in your estimates as entitled to double the statutory increase, and leave out the overwhelming body of the civil service, who under the law and practice were entitled to the increase of $50, is a censure fastened upon the character and standing of every officer in the service who is not treated in the same manner. In my judgment, it is opening the door to the grossest party favouritism. It is more than that: it is opening the door to the demoralization of the civil service by insulting all those gentlemen whose names do not appear. If the names of certain individuals are to be put before this House as entitled to consideration, then it follows that every man whose name is not put before the House in the same way is branded, as far as this Government can brand him, as inefficient, or as not so faithfully discharging his duties as to be entitled to that which all Governments have granted hitherto. I regard this as a most grave act, and open to the imputation of an attempt to introduce favouritism into the civil service, and to treat one official on a basis entirely different from that on which other members of the service are treated.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I think the hon. gentleman has misunderstood entirely the probable results and the reasons for the action of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope so.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It is quite true that for a number of years an increase of $50 per man, until the parties had reached the maximum of their class, has been granted, without question or dispute.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But granted upon the evidence of the Deputy Minister.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am quite aware of that. An abuse had sprung up, an abuse which existed in the hon. gentleman's time, which existed in my time, and after my time, and which there was danger of continuing to exist with great injury to the public service. For a long number of years it has come to pass that every soul in the civil service, good, bad or indifferent, every man who was not absolutely a subject for dismissal, got this increase of $50, as a matter of statutory right. I submit that that was not the intention of the House, or the true intention of the statute, and not in the interest of the civil service. It is in the interest of the civil service that the men who have deserved this favour by their good conduct, should get it; but I think this matter should be regarded particularly with reference to the fact that our civil government expenditure has gone up by leaps and bounds from $700,000 or $800,000 in 1878 to about $1,400,000 in the present year, and that apart from the very large augmentation in the amount of superannuation charges, I think we are paying more for the civil service of Canada than our income warrants. We might, and possibly ought to have taken a different line; we might, and possibly ought to have dispensed with the services of a very large number of these people; we might, and possibly ought, to have dismissed 300 or 400 civil servants, but we did not do that, and we determined that, in the present state of the finances of the country, the sum of $1,400,000 which, I think, was the vote asked for by the late Government, was all the country could stand for the civil service.

As a man of business, does not the hon. gentleman know that very nearly a million and a half of dollars is an enormous sum to pay for the civil service of a country like ours. It is more in proportion than is paid in the United States, taking their expenditure and revenue and population. It is more than is paid in England in proportion to their population, revenue and expenditure. I think it is our duty to keep that down, and the only way I can possibly hope to do so is by refusing to consider these statutory increases as a matter of course. If we are wrong in our law, it is for the hon. gentleman and others on that side to point out where we are wrong. Although it may be perfectly true that certain nominal checks were provided to be exercised by the deputy heads of departments, the hon. gentleman knows, as well as I, of what little use that check was. How often have I not risen and asked whether out of 200 or 300 employees in any department, it was possible that every mortal one of them should have deserved the statutory increase. And the hon. gentleman knows well that he told the House in reply that we had such an excellent service, we could not find a single man in it who did not deserve the statutory increase. He knows that the right of depriving them of the increase was not exercised and that the thing had become a regular abuse. There is not a banking or other institution which would have permitted this to go on as we have. The civil service at present, in proportion to the character and class of work done, is very largely paid, and overpaid in its lower branches. I never have contended that the higher officials were overpaid, and although it is rather foreign, perhaps, to the present discussion, I may say that it will be worth while, when we have time enough and the House has time enough to decide whether we ought not to revert to the English fashion which divides the civil service into two classes—the one confined to purely clerical work and the other having a very much larger scope and better salaries in proportion. I must tell the hon. gentleman that we cannot go on with these statutory increases over such a large service. It is on that ground, and not on the ground of desiring to insult the public service, that we have decided that, at present at least, we must bring these increases to a close.

Mr. COCHRANE. Where does the retrenchment come in in this department, when the expenditure is $430 more than before?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the old rule had been applied, it would have been $4,000 or $5,000 more that would have been asked for. There are about eighty-eight officials, and most of them would have been entitled to their $50 increase under the old rule. Generally speaking, all these big departments had a large increase of several thousand dollars a year, accounted for by the statutory increases. There is an increase of $400 which my hon. colleague endeavoured to explain. I think we should take the two departments together, and in the two will be found a considerable saving.

Mr. COCHRANE. I understand that. The hon. Minister wants to leave the impression that the present Government are economizing, but they are asking the House for $430 more than they should, and they are putting into the hands of the heads of the departments, the dealing out of justice, as they see fit, and not according to law. I am prepared to support every attempt at economy, but I do not want hon. gentlemen opposite to tell me and this committee that they are going in for retrenchment when they are increasing the expenditure.

Mr. McNEILL. I think there is a great deal of force in what has been said by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the necessity for great economy in the civil service, but there are certain principles which ought to govern us and which we should not violate, even to secure economy. It does seem to me that if a number of gentlemen have been induced to enter the service on a certain understanding, and if over many years a certain practice has been followed in the service, whether strictly in conformity with the law or not—and every one who enters the civil service is not supposed to be really and practically very conversant as to whether the deputy heads of departments are construing the law as it ought to be or not—it is hardly fair to treat them now on a totally different footing. These gentlemen have been induced to enter the civil service on the understanding that they were entitled to certain statutory increases; and, while it may be right to say that those who enter the civil service hereafter shall not be entitled to that increase, I do think that we should maintain these principles of honour and justice, irrespective altogether of considerations of economy, which are required from honourable men and from an honourable Government. I think it is not a fair thing, I think it is a very unfair thing, to endeavour to secure economy by sacrificing these men in this way. It is all very well to say that you are going to make a saving in a certain department; it is all very well for the Minister of Interior (Mr. Sifton) to come down here and tell us, as he did a few moments ago: I do not approve of the Civil Service Act; I think it is a mistake not to give me the power to increase the salary of officials in my department; and, because I do not approve of the Act, I am going to do what I wish irrespective of that law ; and then to turn around and say : I have economized in my department. How ? By violating a well understood agreement with the men who had entered his department : by violating a distinct understanding. Whether it is an absolute legal contract or not, I am not prepared to say ; but it has been a well recognized understanding for years and years. But the hon. gentleman comes here and tells us that he does not approve of the Civil Service Act and thinks it unwise that he should not be allowed to select certain gentlemen whom he fancies, from among the officers of his department, to whom this increase shall be given, and to deprive others whom he does not approve of, of this statutory increase, which, when they were induced to enter the civil service they believed they were entitled to. I think that this is not just, I think it is such a course as no Government ought to be prepared to defend. I heard what my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) said with regard to the determination the Government had come to as between two alternatives. One alternative was to dismiss a number of men, and the other was to strike off the statutory increase, an increase to which the civil servant was entitled if he had not done anything improper. Surely my hon. friend does not mean to say that it was contemplated by the Government or that they ever allowed it to cross their minds, that they should turn out bodily without compensation a whole host of gentlemen who had entered the service with the understanding that as long as they conducted themselves properly in their positions and showed themselves to be efficient civil servants they would be retained there.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No such understanding has ever existed.

Mr. McNEILL. I think the understanding has always been that, except in special circumstances, the civil servant, when he was put upon the permanent list was really a permanent civil servant. Of course, we may go into technicalities and split hairs upon this matter, but what is the broad understanding with these men ? The broad and distinct understanding is—and every member of the civil service has always held it to be so—that when they are put on the permanent list, they are there permanently ; and if they are removed for special cause, if a man be superannuated for some special reason, the Act contemplates that (as I understand it), and provides that that shall not be done without giving to the civil servant a compensation therefor. I think that nothing more unfortunate for the best interests of this country could be imagined that it should be supposed that the permanent members of the civil servants are not permanent. I think that permanence in the civil service is one of the most essential principles that we can insist upon in the interest of the country—in the interest of any country. I am satisfied that you can do nothing more damaging to the best interest of any country than to instill into the minds of the civil servants of the country that they are not secure in their positions so long as they discharge their duties properly and well. And I think my hon. friend must admit that that is so. I think he will admit that every writer on the subject whose views are worthy of consideration has laid down that proposition and urged it as strongly as possible. That a good permanent civil service has been at times the salvation of a country, when the Government of the day has not been discharging its duty, is a fact that every one knows. I think that nothing could be more fatal to the best interest of Canada than that the principle should be laid down that our civil servants shall not be able to regard their positions as secure to them if they discharge their duties faithfully and well.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I should regret that hon. gentlemen opposite should come to any hasty conclusions on matters of this kind. I fear that my hon. friend (Mr. McNeill) in the kindness of his heart has driven himself to adopt conclusions which his better judgment will not sustain. He is stating a proposition here evidently for the purpose of having it promulgated through the country that there has been an attack upon the permanence of the civil service.

Mr. McNEILL. I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to misrepresent me. I was simply referring to what the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) had said, and it was in regard to his observation alone that I spoke as I did. I think he said—and he will correct me if I do not represent him accurately—that two alternatives were open to the Government : one being to strike out statutory increase as it is called, and the other to dismiss a number of civil servants, in order to effect economy. And when I went on and referred to these gentlemen as being permanent civil servants, my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) corrected me and said he did not understand that there was any such understanding. I hope my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) will not say that I was discussing a question in order that what I said might go to the country. I called attention to it in order that it might be brought to the mind of the Government, and I am glad that it has been so forcibly brought to their minds as my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) shows it to have been.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot further follow the point, the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) having stated that he had no such idea as I thought he had. I wanted to point out that the facts of the last year have proved the permanence of the civil service in Canada more than anything else that has taken place before. I need only remind the hon. gentleman of the facts. Here is a party coming into power after having been out of power for eighteen years. That party has now been in power almost twelve months and, in the majority of the departments of the civil service there has not been a single change made. The hon. gentleman says he did not mean to discuss that point, so that I shall not follow it further. I wish to show my hon. friend, however, that he is taking a position upon a false basis. The civil servant, after he takes a place in the service, has a reasonable right to assume that he will remain there on what is called the permanent list. But if the exigencies of the public service require that he should be dismissed—if, for instance, his place is no longer required—he goes without any breach of contract. And the law, in its wisdom, makes special provisions for cases of that kind. It provides that if the civil servant has been less than ten years in the service he shall be paid a gratuity of a certain number of months' pay according to length of his service; and, if he has been in the service more than ten years that he should be paid what is called a superannuation allowance. So the terms upon which he enters the service and the terms upon which he may be dismissed if the exigency of the public service require it, are perfectly well known to him on one side and to the Government on the other.

Now, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, said truly that the party that came into power had to make its choice, either to make a large cut down in the number of civil servants who were engaged at Ottawa, and give them a gratuity which the law provides should be given to servants when they are dismissed in that case, or we had to provide that the statutory increase, so-called, should not be continued. I admit that there is a good deal to be said for both: I admit that it was a long time before we could make up our minds; but I say that after reviewing the whole situation we come to the conclusion that it was in the general interests of the public, and chiefly in the interests of the civil servants, and of the better class of civil servants, that we should resort to the scheme which we intended to propose to the House. Now, the hon. leader of the Opposition, I think, spoke without mature reflection. The hon. gentleman will see that it is not so much an understanding based upon the law that the civil servant should have $50 a year added to his salary, as it is an abuse which has grown up from year to year. I believe myself that the law originally contemplated such a state of facts as the hon. gentleman the leader of the Opposition depicted, that the deputy heads of each department should carefully analyse the work done by each civil servant, and having analysed it, should report the result of his judgment to the head of the department, and the head of the department, if he chose so to advise the Government, would then advise that the $50 increase should be given.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the law.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will excuse me, that has not been the practice, that has never been the practice.

Mr. COCHRANE. Why didn't you put it in practice?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Then we would have been breaking what the hon. gentleman says is the understanding which exists between the civil servants and the Government, that they should get $50 every year. I want to show that what we are doing is practically the same thing; we determined that the old system of granting $50 increases as a matter of course, should cease. It has been granted, year after year, it did not matter whether the man deserved it or not, it did not matter whether he was what is called a four-o'clock-civil-servant, who keeps his eye on the clock from five minutes to four, and is ready to run out as soon as the clock strikes four—or whether it applies to that still larger class, I am proud to say, of civil servants who are ready to work up till six o'clock, and ready to work up till ten o'clock, if need be. The former got his $50 increase just the same. Therefore, the man who worked hard and with an honest intention to serve the public, had no recognition at the hands of the Government at all; and the man who left his office at four o'clock sharp, aye, and sometimes was in the corridors so as to be out in the air when the clock struck four, just got his $50 increase the same as the man who worked up till six o'clock, and went back in many cases and worked up till ten or eleven at night. We thought that kind of thing was not fair between man and man, it was not fair in justice, and the injustice which had grown up year after year had been crystallized around the statutes. So, when we came in we had to decide upon one of two things, that all these increases which have been given as a matter of course for years back were wrong, in which case I suppose we would have had to withdraw them, or we had to declare that increases in the salaries of civil servants should only be granted on the express recommendation of the head of the department who is responsible for it, and that recommendation would have to be approved year after year in the House. Did ever any hon. gentleman hear any defence made for the statutory increase, so-called, in this House? Not at all; it was taken as a matter of course. What is the meaning of this increase? Probably the Government says: There are the usual statutory increases. Nobody questions it, nobody questions whether the man deserves it or not, whether by his diligence and attention to his duties, he was entitled to it; it went as a matter of course. We said that kind of thing is unjust to the civil servants themselves, unjust to the hard-working section of the civil service; and I have the greatest possible pleasure in saying, after nearly a year's experience, that there is a very large proportion of the civil servants who work honestly, and work for long hours, and deserve at the hands of the Government special recognition from time to time. Now, we determined that this perfunctory system of adding $50 a year to every man, whether he was good or bad, should stop; and we determined that if there was a special case deserving recommendation, the head of the department should come into Parliament each year, give his name, and be prepared to give the reasons for the increase. I have no hesitation in telling the hon. gentleman that in my own department I have recommended two or three increases—they will come up directly; but I have recommended them after very careful examination into the merits of the different gentlemen. It is no reflection on those whom I have not recommended, for this reason, that the men whom I have recommended—and I assume it is the same in other departments—are men who, for one reason or another, were doing a very large amount of special work and were not receiving anything like adequate pay for it.

Mr. COCHRANE. Had they not been doing it without?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, they had. I won't anticipate the discussion which may come up when my department is under review; but I will show the hon. gentleman that there are men who, by this automatic system, were kept down to a scale of salary altogether disproportionate to the work they discharged for the public. I say that kind of thing ought not to exist. The Minister ought to be responsible to the House for the proposed increases he makes, personally and directly responsible. He ought to be able to explain to the House the why and the wherefore; and although it is open to the criticism which the hon. gentleman opposite makes, that sometimes partiality may creep in. I say that, taking it altogether, it will be found that if fair-play predominates in the mind of the heads of the department when he makes a proposition of that kind, I will venture to say that in nine cases out of ten, such increase will be found to be well deserved.

Mr. COCHRANE. You did not see the matter in that light when you were in Opposition.

Mr. DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman fails to follow my argument. I was pointing out to hon. gentlemen that when I was in Opposition there was no basis of criticism. We were told the man was entitled to his increase, whether he worked well or badly. There was nothing to criticise, the law gave it to him, it was the statutory increase, therefore we could not say a word, and no word was said. Now, we do not think that that was fair. Not only was it not fair to the taxpayer on the one hand, but it was not fair to the better class of the civil service on the other. I say that if you do not recognize merit in the civil service as you ought to recognize it, you won't get the same return that other businesses do where merit is recognized and appreciated; and we have got to put our civil service as much as possible upon a business basis. Let men who do the work, and do it well, and do the best work, be paid best, and let their services be recognized; and if there are other men who, from inferior education, or other causes are not as capable, not as qualified to do the work as others, of course they won't get the same recognition at the hands of the Minister, whoever he may be. I think it will be seen by the hon. gentleman that, taken as a whole, although it is open, as I frankly admit, to some criticism—you cannot conceive of any system which is not open to criticism, and in which some evils may not creep in—but take it as a whole, it seems to us the fairest and the best way of recognizing merit, and giving a deserving officer some recognition for the service he renders the public.

Mr. COCHRANE. I am somewhat at a loss to understand the hon. gentleman's retrenchment when I look at another item. The Minister of Trade and Commerce informed the committee that $1,400,000 was too much to expend on the civil service, and we should call a halt. But in looking on page 20, I find another item in connection with the Department of the Interior where the retrenchment goes on in the same way. We have retrenchment by asking the House for $897 which, added to the $1,430, makes $2,327 all through.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If the hon. gentleman will turn to page 12, at the foot of the civil service estimates, he will see how much increase there is for the past year in what we ask. There was a total increase during the year in the whole civil service of $1,635, and the decrease is $35,016; in other words, the decrease this year according to those estimates, is over $33,000. Now, what is the use of carping about $800, or $400, in one particular branch, when the decrease as a whole is what I have stated to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. McNEILL. I should be sorry if my hon. friend misunderstood me in any way. I would like to remove two misconceptions from his mind. In the first place, I had no reference, when I spoke, to political dismissals at all. Certainly so far as my hon. friend himself is concerned, I could not make any complaint as to that. On the contrary, I have to thank my hon. friend for the very straightforward course he has taken in reference to a matter which I brought to his notice some time ago in connection to a matter of that sort. The other misapprehension I wish to remove from the mind of my hon. friend is this. I should be sorry if he thought that the speech he has just made was an answer to the observations I offered. I did not say one word as to whether the granting of $50 a year increase was a good or bad system. I did not say whether it was a good or bad system to select some men for special reward. I was speaking of the understanding which existed when those men entered the service, and I ventured to think that hon. gentlemen opposite had violated that understanding.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman had better settle that matter with the leader of the Opposition, because that hon. gentleman said it was the duty of the deputy to make, in each case, a careful report.

Mr. McNEILL. The understanding was that the practice would be continued as it existed previously. It is only in special cases, as the hon. gentleman has admitted, that it is refused; and he said in the course of his remarks that when the question was asked in the House why the $50 was given, the answer made was that it was the usual statutory increase.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The hon. gentleman was wrong in his contention. I do not admit that a civil servant has a right to a statutory increase of $50 annually. I grant that this was done by our predecessors and by the late Government, but I do not admit the increase as a matter of right or as anything more than a matter of grace. I contend it was not because of any right belonging to the civil servant in any respect that such an increase was granted. I hold it had become a very gross abuse, and was leading to gross abuses all the time. No deputy head could have stated, if he were examined on oath, that he had complied with the direct terms of the Act and had made a careful report. It has always been notorious that if this statutory increase were given to perhaps one thousand men, not one was found who would not deserve the $50 increase. Does any one suppose that out of a thousand civil servants a very considerable number did not render inferior service? We know better; we know that many should have been dismissed, and that a large number did not render honest eight hours' work daily to the country, and should not have had $50 increase yearly. I will show the practical result of this. In 1892, with eighty-eight officers, precisely the same number as at the present time, the annual charge to the department was $92,000. Then it sprang up to $95,000—statutory increases all the time. The next year it was $98,000—statutory increases and one or two men added. Then it advanced to $101,000, then it was $102,000, and so it reached the present figure. Is there going to be no end to this state of things? The civil service estimates amounted to $1,413,000, then $1,457,000 was reached, then the sum advanced to $1,475,000, and so on all the time under the operation of this rule. I say it is high time that this should be stopped. We have stopped it. Instead of asking for $1,475,000, we ask for $1,414,000. If hon. gentlemen opposite desire to promote economy, they will not criticise unduly that reduction. Civil servants have rights which will not be violated by us. We are not disposed to interfere with civil servants except for three causes: If a civil servant is found inefficient and incapable, we are entitled to discharge him, and we will not hesitate to do so; if he is guilty of malfeasance in office, we are entitled to discharge him, and we will not hesitate to do so; if he is guilty of active partisanship while he holds office in the civil service, we will most assuredly dismiss him. For these three causes we will dismiss civil servants. But as a Government, we must reserve to ourselves, as every man of business will do, the right if we find too many men in the service, more men employed than are required for the work of the department, to dismiss them. We break no covenant with them, we violate no arrangement entered into with them, but we simply carry out provisions made by law, which provisions hon. gentlemen opposite know well to be that if a civil servant has served less than ten years he is entitled to a certain gratuity, if he has served more than ten years and has paid the superannuation allowance, he is entitled to a certain superannuation in proportion to his salary. But I do not think the hon. gentleman is wise in talking about covenants entered into so far as civil servants are concerned. If the hon. gentleman is going to maintain that it is a great compliment on the part of a civil servant to enter the public service, I may inform him that I do not understand such to be the opinion of the people generally. Comparing the pay of the ordinary civil servants with that of the clerks of any bank—and with a bank I think a fair comparison may be made—it appears to me that the members of our civil service are exceedingly well paid. I have never held that the higher grades were paid as highly as they deserved. I draw a broad distinction between ordinary clerical work such as is done by a majority of the civil servants, and high grade work done by deputy heads or officers in grades close to them. Many of those men have very important services to discharge; they occupy positions for which the best talent in Canada is none too good, and I have, time and again, when I have observed our civil list growing up to large sums for administration from a comparatively moderate sum, pointed out the desirability of making a reform. That was my individual opinion. Here we are trying to do the best we can under very difficult circumstances. It is our duty not to allow the expenditure of Canada to exceed a certain figure. We are endeavouring to do so as best we can. I do not pretend to say, and no one can pretend to say that objections cannot be offered; but I do most respectfully submit to the committee that it will not do to admit that a civil servant is entitled to have his salary increased $50 a year for his life. I do not grudge a civil servant or any man a fair day's pay for a fair day's work, but we must measure the pay by the remuneration for similar kinds of labour elsewhere. I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite, if they come to consider what is paid to civil servants, will consider they are underpaid, and most assuredly they cannot say that the vote of $1,500,000 for the civil service, irrespective of the very large sums voted for the payment of the outside service, is a small percentage for a country like Canada to spend.

Mr. SPROULE. It is not with any disposition to object to the hon. Minister carrying out a policy of economy in the various departments that I take exception to his remarks, but because we have always understood that the statutory increase was a matter of legal right. Why was it called a statutory increase? It was because it was fixed by statute, and because the statute controlled one man as well as another.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The Minister of Justice advises that that was not a correct construction.

Mr. SPROULE. That may be, but it has always heretofore been taken that it was a statutory increase, and could not be altered. The Act says:

The minimum salary paid to a chief clerk shall be one thousand eight hundred dollars, with an annual increase of fifty dollars up to a maximum of two thousand four hundred dollars.

Again the Act says:

The minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be one thousand four hundred dollars per annum, with an annual increase of fifty dollars up to a maximum of one thousand eight hundred dollars.

And section 26 of the Act is as follows:—

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

That section of the Act was the authority under which the deputy head of a department acted, but we have no intimation from the Government that the deputy head so acted in the present case. The Act further says:

The increase of salary of any officer, clerk or employee authorized under this Act for the then current year may be suspended by the head of the department for neglect of duty or misconduct.

That appears the only provision for the suspension of the $50 a year increase; but yet, the Government have suspended it of their own motion without even an Order in Council. We ought to know the authority under which they so acted, and we ought to know if they can violate a statute with impunity, or whether the statute has been wrongly interpreted heretofore. It always did seem to me that there was no possibility of stopping this statutory increase unless we amended the law. I claim that the Government should have first repealed this section of the Act, and then they would have gone about it in a proper way.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In regard to the point raised by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart), I find that there were ten first-class clerks last year, and as we have estimated for ten this year, there is no discrepancy. My hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Cochrane) is very much exercised by reason of the fact, that there is an increase of $370 this year for civil government, Department of Interior; but if he looks at the Estimates of last year which were prepared by a Government in whom he (Mr. Cochrane) had great confidence, he will find that there was an increase of $5,590.

Mr. COCHRANE. Your friends said that was wrong.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) can show that he protested very violently against that increase made by his friends last year. I was not then a member of the Government, but I understand that the Estimates prepared by the late Government were adopted by the present advisers of His Excellency.

Mr. DAVIN. I find in the Estimates of last year that there were eleven first-class clerks instead of ten.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have counted them again, and I find there are only ten. If my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) will look at page 87 of the Estimates he will find under the item "Dominion lands chargeable to income" that we ask for a vote of $90,938.25, which is a decrease on the Estimates of last year of $27,283.75. I should explain to the committee, that although not technically, this is practically a decrease of $27,283 in the civil government estimates for the Interior Department. It is a decrease for this reason. The largest portion of the expense of this department is in connection with Dominion Lands, and the economy which will be effected amounting to over $25,000 during the next fiscal year, will be brought about by the abolition of unnecessary offices in the outside service. It will be at once apparent that when these offices are abolished in the outside service, it will necessarily place upon the officers estimated for under the head of civil government, a considerable increase of work. Before it is discovered how that change will work out, it would have been imprudent for me to decrease the number of clerks in the inside service, and consequently there has only been a decrease of one third-class clerk. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Cochrane) was evidently under a misapprehension as to the question of economy. When he comes to figure up the salaries paid by the Department of Interior, after these Estimates are passed, he will find that notwithstanding some small increases, there is on the whole a decrease of over $25,000.

Mr. FOSTER. The question that has been discussed—and I must say very fairly discussed on both sides of the House—is one which is of sufficient importance to engage more of the attention of the House. Its importance has been added to by the explicit declaration of two Ministers of the Crown which completely changes the basis upon which additions are to be made to the salaries of civil servants in this country. We cannot allow a complete change to be made in this way without comment, and without calling the attention of the House and the attention of the country, to what is involved. I listened particularly to the law as it was read by my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule), and I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries who is a lawyer: Whether he thinks that they can, under that rendering of the law, drop the statutory increase other than for cause; such cause being inattention to duty or some other reason which in the opinion of the department casts a stigma upon the clerk. If ever the words of a statute were explicit, these are. There is the general declaration that there shall be a minimum and a maximum salary, that the minimum shall commence at so much, and that there shall be a statutory increase of $50 a year. There is a very proper power placed in the hands of the Minister to prevent that increase being given, which the law says shall be given, if there is any cause which approves itself to the Minister, such cause being something which rendered the clerk either, from inability, or inattention, or carelessness, or bad habits not deserving of that increase. But outside of that I ask my hon. friend if he thinks that under the reading of the law they have the right to prevent the increase.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not of much use for my hon. friend and me to discuss this matter, because I tell him that the matter was formally submitted to the Minister of Justice, and he gave a long reasoned opinion that it was not compulsory but entirely permissive.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it would be very interesting if the hon. gentleman would bring that down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman should bring it down without a motion.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, I think we have got upon something else than legal ground. Civil servants have rights as well as any other good citizens of this country—as well as Ministers of the Crown. A Minister who enjoys his office and emoluments ought not to treat an official with anything but the fairest consideration. I think that is a principle which we will all agree to. No man goes into the civil service of this country without looking into it beforehand. There are in the civil service a great many young men of excellent education and excellent parts. When looking for a career for themselves, these young men looked to the civil service. They read the statute law, and besides that they had the custom of twenty-five or thirty years to guide them. I have no doubt that a member of Parliament on either side, when explaining the matter to an applicant for a position in the service, would say: The law is this: you go in at the minimum, and there is a maximum to which you attain, and you attain to that by increases of so much per year, such increases being given so long as you perform your duties well and get the commendation of the head of your department. The young man enters the service on this basis. He is not a lawyer, and is not looking for technicalities; but there is the plain meaning of the law, and the practice of twenty-five or thirty years. You may say there is no abstract right which the civil servant can claim. But he has taken his step outwards in his career on that basis, and that ought to be taken into consideration by any Government in discussing whether there should be changes or not. The law contemplated that in fixing a minimum and a maximum; it contemplated that there should be an increase in some manner. Was that left to hap-hazard, or to the will of the Minister? No; Parliament thought it best not to leave it to hap-hazard, and it prescribed in the law under what conditions and circumstances these increases should be made. We are all agreed upon that. But, my hon. friend says, it costs a great deal, this civil service. I admit that; I have always admitted it. I have no hesitation in saying that I think our civil service has cost us more than it ought to have cost any time in the last fifteen years. I am not saying that, if possible, the cost should not be reduced. But when our hon. friends opposite say that there was open to them only one of two alternative courses, either to keep on the statutory increases without looking at the merits of each case at all, which they say has been the prevailing practice, or to sweep them away entirely, or to put them under the will of the Minister, I say they have not rightly stated the question. There was another course open to them, that was, to adhere to the spirit of the law as passed by Parliament, and to apply the safeguards which would make it imperative upon every Deputy Minister to place before his Minister the record of his department for the preceding year, on which the Minister, acting on his responsibility, would decide. I have no hesitation in saying that there has been laxity in this respect—that Deputy Ministers thought they should not look into the record at all, but should just recommend the increases as a matter of course. All Deputy Ministers did not do that; some were careful not to do it. I know that there were cases in my own department in which the statutory increases were kept back simply on account of lapses and lax conduct on the part of certain officers. There is where hon. gentlemen could apply the safeguards in carrying on departmental service. That was another alternative; but my hon. friends did not take that, or give the statutory increases as a matter of right, but they took the alternative of sweeping away all statutory increases, and substituting what? The law or will of Parliament? No, but the absolute and arbitrary will of the Minister of the department. Our civil service are not simply the dregs of the community; they are not simply third-class men. They are men of education, men of spirit, men of honourable instincts; they have feelings just as much as we members of Parliament have. In the course you are taking you are introducing the feeling amongst them that if they are to get anything more than they are getting to-day, they have to get it through political favour—nothing else. My hon. friend may shake his head as much as he likes; but he knows in his heart as well as I know, that the moment the Minister of the Interior promulgated this doctrine and he followed it, that moment they opened the door to his party followers to use their influence with Ministers to obtain promotions for certain individuals. My hon. friend may have the stiffest of backbones; but political influence is political influence, and he and every other Minister will yield to it. But beyond that there is the demoralizing effect upon the civil service, in the feeling entertained by every civil servant to-day, that if he is to get the $50 increase for himself and his family, he has no other way of getting it than by currying favour with the politicians or otherwise securing the good-will of his Minister. My hon. friend is unfair in a heated partisan discussion; but we are not having a heated partisan discussion. My hon. friend is a fair man now and he knows that there are men of great worth and great ability in his department who have been a long time there, and who are not in receipt of high salaries. Those men see that four men are selected by another Minister for advance in their salaries—one $250, another $200, and two others $100 each; and he says to himself: Why am I left out? From the 1st of July to the 1st of July I have done my duty in my office, and my conscience is clear; yet my $50 is refused to me. The man whom I have in my mind is as good as any man who has received these high increases. Take Mr. Rothwell, who has received an increase of $250. Did he do his work before? The Minister says he did it, and did it well. Will he do anything more than his work now, and do it well? No. But where is he to-day? Made a chief clerk at the will of his Minister and $250 added to his salary, while others have remained as first-class clerks without any addition to their salary, who are in every respect just as painstaking, steady and worthy members of the service—without saying anything against Mr. Rothwell at all—as Mr. Rothwell is. But from this moment out, there is no feeling of independence in the civil service. There is no feeling that they are to be treated on their merits. Every civil servant knows what partisanship is in this country. Every civil servant has heard it enunciated from the front benches here that an offensive partisan should be dismissed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. An active partisan.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, that an active partisan should be put out, and the spirit is encouraged everywhere throughout this country that those in power for the time being, put there by their friends, must give consideration to their friends. We might as well acknowledge that, we know it is so, and I tell you, Sir, it will be practically impossible for anything but political influence to have weight in making up the sum of the reasons that will influence a Minister's decision. For the Minister himself it is a bad place to be put in. In future, those who have influence with him will approach him and say: We want such a man increased, he is a real good fellow, and his father and family have always voted for us, and the Minister will be at a loss for a reply. Formerly he could have said: There is the law, this man has done his work, and he will get $50 per year increase until he reaches his maximum. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce says there is no way of rewarding a man. There is. The reward comes when a man has reached his maximum, and a Minister exercises his power of recommending him for a higher grade. That is where the power of the Minister, under the old law, came in. I say that this principle, enunciated to-day, is a bad one for the civil service, and also for the Ministers. It will be taken throughout the country as a warning for civil servants to get political influence to work, or for politicians to bring influence to have their friends in the service given higher salaries.

But my hon. friend, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, said: Oh, this thing was getting too bulky, and it ought to be brought down. Is there no other way of bringing it down? I take my hon. friends opposite as witnesses. What have they been saying for the last fifteen years? They have been saying that there are too many civil servants in the departments, that they are tumbling over one another. I can tell you how hon. gentlemen could decrease the sum total paid without resorting to the means they have taken. They could do so by not filling the vacancies when they occur. A large proportion of vacancies occur every year, and if these hon. gentlemen were true to their convictions of a few years ago, and when an officer, for any reason, went out of office, let the office lapse, they could effect a saving greater than any they will make by the means they have taken. But my hon. friend did not give the past Government the credit he should. We took the very best means of reducing the cost of the civil service. Where was the chief difficulty? It was where my hon. friend said it was, that second-class and first-class and chief clerks were not too highly paid, and that there was a great deal of work done by first-class clerks which was really writer's work, the wages for which went up to a thousand dollars. Two years ago we introduced a Bill, which is to-day the law, by which no more third-class clerks were to be appointed. In their stead we appointed writers, who begin at a minimum of $300 and go to a maximum of $600, and did writer's work. In the natural course, the expenditure, under that system, would be very materially reduced, and the work just as well done, while the higher grades would be kept up to their present proportions.

I tell you what you are doing. The young men who have come into the service, and are the best class of men for the service, and who to-day have some hope that their conscientious labours will not go unrewarded—many of those men, with their growing families, who have been living economically on the basis that each year they can afford just a little more expenditure, because they will get the $50 increase, buoyed up by the hope of this increase, this year find it suddenly cut off; and I know, of my own experience, of men whose obligations, pared down to the utmost limit of economy, under their expectations, have to-day to look to a deficit of $50 and borrow the money to meet obligations incurred under the expectation of getting that increase. We cannot afford to demoralize our civil service. I put it to the Ministers generally, not from a partisan point of view, whether they are starting out in the right course by taking away the statutory increase from the deserving, and leaving it to the Minister alone to recommend that it be given to whomever he chooses. After all, Ministers are only mortal, and many of them are dependent on certain persons in their own department for forming their ideas, and thus they often get their impressions of the people under them from parties who are interested in making certain impressions on the Minister's mind. I ask them to think it over, whether or not it is not better to proceed on that principle of sweeping away the regular and permanent increase and making it simply dependent on the will of the Minister himself.

My hon. friend, the Minister of Interior (Mr. Sifton), has escaped criticism of his department, because the criticism was drawn away to the civil service generally, but he must not think that his department is not open to criticism, as he has explained its management. This Minister is only three or four months in office, yet he goes to work and assumes to know what are the qualifications of the fifty, sixty or eighty men who are in his department. I say that that is absolutely impossible. I entered my department with a good deal of young vigour and tried to get acquainted with the persons in it and measure their services, and I did not feel I was competent to do so when I had been there three or six months or even longer, and I think others will bear me out in that view. But this Minister had been there only four months, when he made up his mind as to who were deserving of $200 or $250 increase and who should not get any increase. It would have been better if the Minister had taken at least a year to make himself thoroughly acquainted with his department before attempting to gauge and measure the employees of his department, and from eighty or more single out four for preferment and increase and leave the others as they were. My hon. friend removed Mr. Burgess—because, no doubt, it was a removal, a degradation. Mr. Burgess was appointed by the hon. gentleman's own friends and was thoroughly acquainted with the working of the department. Though not a political friend of my own, he is a friend of mine in a general way. I have come in contact with him, and I know that as Deputy Minister of that department he proved himself always a man who thoroughly understood his work.

But my hon. friend shoves him aside after he has been there three months, or rather two months—and I believe he wanted to do it before he had been there three weeks. If rumour is correct, he did so. He fought a hard battle, and rather had a reverse, the story goes; but he insisted as an insistent Minister can, and carried his point, as an insistent Minister will. But he said that Mr. Burgess did not show a willingness to promote the best interests of the North-west. I am sorry he said that of a Deputy Minister who is older than he is and who has been in the department under Ministers of both regimes for a long period of years, and has had the respected confidence of every Minister under whom he has served. Yet Mr. Burgess is set aside because forsooth he did not show a proper spirit of assistance to the North-west. I think that this criticism might have been omitted, because I do not think it was deserved by Mr. Burgess. But if Mr. Burgess, an able man, a man of many years' experience in the department, a man who knew the North-west—whatever my hon. friend may say—if he was not a man to be relied upon and to get information from with regard to the department, there was another man who was just the man for Galway. And who was that? A man who had never been inside the department; a man who cannot by any possibility have the history, the records, the atmosphere of the department. He must learn the affairs of the department—a totally untried man. I say nothing against him; he may be an excellent man for all I know. But it seems to me and to the country that to put aside an officer like Mr. Burgess and take in a complete stranger to the department, even though he be from the North-west, looks like forcing the position. Though the gentleman may not have the records of the department at his fingers' ends, he had the records of my hon. friend's (Mr. Sifton's) politics at his fingers' ends. It looks like a political appointment. The country is watching him, and it will be seen in the future whether the present Deputy Minister proves a justification for his appointment. I am not going to judge him now; that would be unfair; he has been in his position too short a time. But if he does not show himself the man for the place, then the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sifton) has laid himself open to the strongest criticism and rebuke that this House and the country can give. With reference to Mr. Smith, the hon. gentleman says the Order in Council was passed by which Mr. Smith, when he came to be superannuated, should have five years added to his time. My hon. friend stated that, I think, but it cannot be too clearly understood that Mr. Smith at that time suffered a decrease of $1,000 in his salary.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It was some months before.

Mr. FOSTER. It was practically the same time. Mr. Smith assented to that decrease, and the recommendation was made by his Minister, but it was not acted upon in any authoritative way, that when he came to be superannuated, he should have five years added to his term of service.

Mr. FOSTER.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is wrong. I said the Order in Council passed, but it was not acted upon.

Mr. FOSTER. There are Orders in Council and Orders in Council, as the hon. gentleman knows.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not know. Does the hon. gentleman repudiate responsibility for an Order in Council?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is a little too fast. Who talked of repudiation? Did I say a word about it? My hon. friend knows I did not. It will be time enough to pick me up when I fall down. I did not say that there was to be repudiation, but I say there are Orders in Council and Orders in Council. This was an Order in Council, if it passed, on the recommendation of the Minister, that a reduction of $1,000 in salary be made in Mr. Smith's salary, and, as a consideration, when superannuation was given, if it should come, five years should be added to his time. That goes so far as a recommendation is concerned, but it has no executive force; what gives it that is the Order in Council for superannuation. But I want just to put this before the House: When a man voluntarily leaves off $1,000 of his salary, an old servant and a good servant, as Mr. Smith has always been, surely it is not asking too much, when the law gets the authority of Council and when it has been exercised in cases of superior officers who have shown merit, to add five years to his term of service. And I am glad that the hon. gentleman allowed this to Mr. Smith. Not many officers, as the hon. gentleman knows, would submit to a decrease of $1,000 in their salaries.

I do not know that I need extend the criticism to which I have referred. But I wish to again emphasize that my hon. friend by bringing these four cases down in which he has actually acted against the civil service law and has made large increases, has entirely negated the position that has been taken by hon. gentlemen on the other side. I ask my hon. friend—my honest and honourable friend—from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) if he will not now assist me. He and I have been opponents, but still we have agreed on many things. But I ask him if, with his record in this House of having consistently, year in and year out, opposed any increase that was extraordinary and not strictly in accordance with the Civil Service Act, he is going to support four increases, one of $250, one of $200, and two of $100 each in the Interior Department at the beginning of this new regime. I confidently rely upon my hon. friend supporting my contention in this respect.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was not present while the Minister of the Interior was giving the explanations. I am sorry that I missed that part of the discussion. I will have to rely upon the reading of it in the "Hansard." I have only to say that I have generally opposed increases, and, unless there is a good, sound, justifiable reason for giving increases, increases should not be consented to for a moment. That is the policy I pursued when I was upon the side where hon. gentlemen opposite now sit; and I hope that every Minister when he rises in the House to defend any increases in his department or any other expenditures, will make a sound, logical defence. For my own part, I should hesitate to endorse what I condemned when proposed by my opponents, even when it is proposed from this side. I have confidence in the Ministers of the several departments that they will be ready to justify what they have done and give every explanation that may be necessary. Had I been present to hear the explanations of the Minister of the Interior, I should be ready to give my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) an answer to his question. But not having heard those explanations I am not in a position to say what course I would take upon this matter.

Mr. FOSTER. There is only one course for us. We must allow this item to stand until my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) has had an opportunity to read up this debate. It would be altogether unfair to put him in a false position. He ought to have the benefit of the reading of "Hansard" on this matter. Moreover, we are promised the report of the Minister of Justice on this subject, and if my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) will allow the item to stand there will be no discussion on the items but only on the Minister of Justice's decision.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have sat in this House for a good many yeears, but I never had such a compliment paid me before by the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) as allowing an item to stand for the purpose of giving me an opportunity to read the explanation with regard to it. I am glad to see him taking that course, but I think it would have been much better if he had done it before, while he was in office.

Mr. FOSTER. I must always be ready to pay that compliment to the acting leader of gentlemen opposite. It is now six o'clock and perhaps the hon. Minister could bring this down and have it here after dinner.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will try to get it by the time the House re-assembles.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Department of the Interior..... $104,814

Mr. HAGGART. I would ask the Minister of Interior if the office of Superintendent of Mines is still in existence in his department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The Superintendent of Mines is an outside officer residing at Calgary. There has been no change in respect to his salary or position.

Mr. HAGGART. I see in last year's Estimates he was voted for as belonging to the department here.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The hon. gentleman is in error. Last year there was an officer who was called a Chief Clerk of Timber and Mines, he was voted a salary of $1,400. The Superintendent of Mines is Mr. Pierce, who resides at Calgary and gets $3,000 a year, and he is paid out of the outside vote. This officer to whom the hon. gentleman refers, and whose salary is now asked for, is a first-class clerk, and is among the ten first-class clerks whose salaries we are now voting.

Mr. HAGGART. Before six o'clock I was reminding the hon. gentleman that there were ten first-class clerks down here, and a Mr. Henry and a Mr. Rothwell, who make twelve, and that there were only eleven provided for last year. I suppose amongst these twelve he includes the chief clerk of mines, and the extra clerk he is providing for is Mr. Keyes, who is moved from a second-class to a first-class clerkship.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman was, of course, entirely mistaken in the information that he gave before dinner, that there were only ten full clerks voted for last year. If it is true that there were only ten clerks voted for last year, the discrepancy would be greater this year. But he says now the eleven which are mentioned in the Estimates must include the chief clerk of mines.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I was not mistaken in what I said before. The facts were as I stated. I did apparently misunderstand what the hon. gentleman was asking about.

Mr. HAGGART. Then the discrepancy which I have pointed out was filled up. There was no vacancy, but Mr. Keyes was promoted from a second-class to a first-class clerkship?

Mr. WALLACE. Before this resolution passes I think we are entitled to a little further explanation from the Minister as to the reasons why he has asked this committee to set aside the law of the land in the Civil Service Act. The Civil Service Act says that the minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400, with an annual increase of $50 up to $1,800, which is the maximum salary of a first-class clerk. These two gentlemen, who I am quite willing to concede are qualified gentlemen, are transferred from the first-class to the class of chief clerkships, which will enable their salaries to be increased over the amount of $1,800, although no first-class clerk can receive a higher salary by this Act than $1,800. Now, you propose in one instance, I think, to make the salary of one of these gentlemen $1,900 a year, and the other $2,000, and you place them in a further list which the law says they cannot be placed in until they pass a certain examination. I would like to ask the Minister if they have become duly qualified to become promoted to chief clerkships? If not, I presume they cannot be appointed. Of course this Parliament can make any law, and can set aside any law. In these cases that we have under review now, you increase the salary of one man who was appointed in 1893, at the minimum salary that the law provided for, because the law provides that they should be appointed at a salary of $400. This gentleman was appointed at a salary of $500, or $550, I am not sure which, because he is getting now $650. He got an increase in 1894 to $550; in 1895, to $600; and in 1896, to $650; and now you are proposing to give him a still further rise of $200 in one year. I do not know anything of the merits of this gentleman, but only the fact that has been stated here to-day by the Minister himself, that he passed the civil service examination in 1893, and the Government of that day placed him upon the permanent staff. He was a temporary clerk, it appears, but they placed him upon the permanent staff and gave him $100 more salary than those who go into the civil service are entitled to. The reason the Minister gave to-day was, in my opinion, no reason at all, and I think he should give us a sufficient reason when he asks this House to suspend the operation of the law and give this gentleman an increase of $200 when the statutory allowance is only $50. Now I remember very well when the hon. gentlemen, now on that side of the House, insisted that every clause in this Civil Service Act should be carried out; they went further than that, and made a declaration that this law was not sufficiently strict enough, that it was too favourable to the civil service, that it gave them too many advantages, that it was giving them too rapid promotion, and all the rest. Now these same gentlemen propose to this House, that this Act shall be suspended, that the law giving an annual increase to these clerks of $50 should be suspended, and that an increase of $200 shall be given; an increase that, according to the usual custom, would take four years to reach, is to be reached at once in the case of this man. Now what are the circumstances that justify that increase of salary from $650 to $850? It may be said that $200 is not very much, that he is a very deserving man. But just look at the effect it will have upon other members of the civil service, more particularly at a time when you are saying to others: You used to get your annual increase of $50, but this year there is no annual increase in the whole of the inside service. I am told that there is no annual increase in any of the departments. Of that I am not going to make any complaint, because at this time when every branch of business, when every industry, and every enterprise, is economizing, cutting down their expenses, when the cost of living is lower, perhaps, than it has been in the recollection of any of us in this country—this is a time when the Government may fairly consider whether they should give this annual increase if the power is vested in them to refuse giving it. But in face of that, in face of the members of the civil service standing still all round, you take up one man, two men, three or four men, in one department, and without any reason that has been given to this House that will justify it at all, you have increased the salary of these four members of the civil service in the Department of Interior by $200 and $100 per annum, respectively. I repeat that the Minister is bound to give the committee a reason for his action—the reasons the hon. gentleman gave this afternoon are no reasons whatever. What did he say? He stated that one gentleman was a very worthy man. Is he the only worthy man in the Department of the Interior; is he the only man who has done his duty in that department? Again, is he, in conjunction with three other gentlemen, only deserving consideration? If such be the facts, the Minister is unfortunate as regards the staff with which to do the work of the department. There are no less than eighty-seven or eighty-eight clerks in the department. According to the hon. gentleman's statement, there are only four men worthy of promotion; the balance are not worthy of the ordinary increases, but the hon. gentleman has increased the salaries of four men by twice or thrice and even five times the ordinary increase. The effect will be to create great dissatisfaction not only in the Department of the Interior, but in all the departments, because the officers in the various departments will ask the Minister and any one who may be supposed to give the information, what are the reasons that four gentlemen are selected in one department for increases and the other eighty-four are refused the ordinary increase this year. The Minister of Interior is bound to give the committee full explanation of his action, which he has not yet given. The hon. gentleman has given no reason which might not apply to sixty or seventy clerks in his department. Before he asks Parliament to increase this vote, when economy should be practised, when salaries shall be reduced to the lowest possible point, when advantage should be taken of all possible means of retrenchment and every opportunity seized to reduce the staff, the hon. gentleman should offer further explanations, especially as this is the largest amount ever asked in the history of the Department of the Interior. The hon. gentleman is asking this committee to vote $104,814. What has been the expenditure of the department during the last few years? In 1893 it was $98,000; in 1894, $101,000; in 1895, $102,000; in 1896, $98,000 and last year the estimate showed $104,440. That was the highest point reached up to this year. So hon. gentlemen opposite during the two years they have been in power, have asked Parliament for the largest amount ever needed for this department. I am satisfied that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who preached economy when on this side of the House, and will no doubt seek to practice it when on the other side of the House, will sustain me in the opinion that the expenditure is altogether too large, and cannot be justified. The whole expenditure of the department should be reduced, and we can fairly call upon the Government to do this. At all events, the Minister is in duty bound to endeavour to justify this proposed increased expenditure.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is one point to which I wish to call the attention of the committee, and it is this: We have not yet reached the items which show that a very considerable reduction has been made in the outside service.

Mr. WALLACE. Why has not a reduction been made in the inside service too?

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman should give the Government credit for the very large reduction in the outside service due to the abolition of the Land Board at Winnipeg, and from his knowledge of departmental matters, he should also admit that the business of the office here will be considerably increased. The work done by the Land Board must be done somewhere, and it has been transferred to Ottawa. The hon. Minister has been endeavouring to recast the entire service of the department, and I compliment him on abolishing the Winnipeg Land Board, for I did not think it performed any service whatever. By the abolition of that board, the country will save about $30,000 annually, except some increases of salaries due to the work to be performed in the department here. In order to meet such increased work, the hon. Minister, instead of employing new hands, has added somewhat to the salaries of two or three officials upon whom the burden of the work will fall. He considers the staff ample, not only to perform the work required of it in past years, but also to perform the duties of the Land Board at Winnipeg as well. If in recasting the department the hon. Minister can show that, taking the estimates throughout, there will be a saving of $27,000 on the vote, that will be a full answer to the questions put by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace). I have never been favourable to increases in salaries. There should be good and well defined grounds for granting increases in salaries of men already fairly well paid, and I was disposed at first to take exception to these increases; but owing to the explanations given this evening, I am of the opinion that the Minister made a fairly creditable start towards reductions in the department, and I think it should be satisfactory under the circumstances.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the Minister been able to obtain either of the Orders in Council I asked for?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I understood the hon. gentleman asked for Sir Oliver Mowat's opinion?

Mr. FOSTER. And also the Order in Council.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have been able to get the opinion, and I have sent it to a clerk to copy.

Mr. HAGGART. I see there is a decrease in the staff. Is the hon. gentleman getting rid of any officers in the department, and if so, what are their names? I observe there is a double allowance for private secretaries. There is a vote for private secretary to the Minister of the Interior and private secretary to the Department of Indian Affairs, whereas there was only one vote for this work last year.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There has been no officer in the inside service of the Interior Department removed, that I am aware of; if so, it entirely escapes my recollection at the present time. It is true, I am asking for the usual vote of $600 for a private secretary, but when we get to the item of civil government for Indian Affairs I will explain to the hon. gentleman why that is necessary.

Mr. WALLACE. Who is the private secretary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. A. P. Collier; he receives a salary of $1,200.

Mr. HUGHES. In addition to the allowance for private secretary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No; he gets $1,200 altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. Was he in the service before?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. No.

Mr. BRITTON. It is perhaps a little premature to discuss the legal aspect of the question, before the opinion of the Minister of Justice is laid on the Table; still, I wish to call the attention of the House to the Civil Service Act as it is, and as I read it. It will be seen by any one who carefully reads the Act, that this increase is not a matter of course. It seems to me that the interpretation is, as if the section was read something in this way.

The minimum salary of a first-class clerk shall be $1,400, with an annual "possible" increase, &c.

It is a fair interpretation of the section to read it as if the word "possible" were there, because it must be controlled by section 26 of the Act, and which reads :

No officer, clerk or employee shall receive any increase of salary except by Order in Council passed on the report of the deputy head, concurred in by the head of the department, stating that such officer, clerk or employee is deserving of such increase.

It follows, therefore, that if there is no such report by the deputy head, approved of by the head of the department, there can be no increase. That report is a condition precedent to the increase being granted. I can easily understand that in a case such as the present, when a new Minister desires to reorganize his department, he might find it well to stop this annual increase. As has been stated by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace)—and nobody can deny it—if ever there was a time in the history of the country when economy should be practised, and when if any changes are to take place, salaries should be decreased rather than increased, that time is the present. That rule applies to all professions and all departments just now. If the Minister has to reorganize his department, he must first discover what men are competent and efficient to do the work. If the head of a department who has to take the responsibility for his administration is not to be permitted to make a selection of that kind, it would be very extraordinary indeed. In any mercantile establishment he would have that discretion allowed him, and much more should he be allowed to have it while administering such an important department as the Interior. It seems to me that the House ought, without cavil, to accept the action of the Minister in reference to the increase of salaries, to particular men whom the Minister sees are the best fitted to discharge their duties. I quite agree with what was said this afternoon; that if the whole of the officers of the department were not left without the passing of this Order in Council, which is a condition precedent to the increase, then there might be an invidious distinction which certainly would be objectionable in reference to a class of persons such as compose the civil service of Canada. No one could have greater respect for the members of the civil service as a whole than I have, judging from the intercourse I have had with them during the short time I have been a member of this House. The Government in this case have made no distinction. They state, apparently under the advice of the Minister of Justice, that they have the power, without making any invidious distinction, to say that this increase, this additional increase, provided for by the statute, shall not be given this year, and so without doing the officials any harm—except, of course, the harm of disappointed expectation—they do not give the increase. However, disappointment is quite in order these days for others than the civil servants, and they can hardly find fault, if the Government, in their desire to practice economy, should not ask this House to vote the increases. It is rather fortunate that the statute is so worded as to permit of a reduction all around, or rather to prevent an increase all around, at a time when the country can ill afford it. I hazard the opinion, after carefully reading the Act, that the Government have made a fair interpretation of it. I submit that now is a good time for the Government to avail itself of the provision of the statute, and to practice economy in the right direction.

Mr. HAGGART. No one on this side of the House disputes as to what the law is on the subject. It is not denied that the Government have an option in the matter. Even after the report recommending the increase is made by the deputy head, it has to be approved by the head of the department, and then it requires the sanction of an Order in Council. What we do object to is that the Ministry come here and ask for an increase in excess of the amount specially mentioned in the statute. The Minister and the deputy head of the department are perfectly justified in refusing any increases, as these were not intended to be made annually and perpetually. The increment is only to be granted when the party is deserving, when the deputy recommends it to the head of the department, and when the head of the department recommends it to Council; the Council may refuse to grant the increment. I remember the debate which took place in the House upon the parties who were suspended. Mr. Pereira was one, Mr. Henry was another. In that debate, hon. gentlemen opposite took the ground that these men were not punished sufficiently by a month and a half's deprivation of salary, and that they ought to be dismissed from the service; yet we now find them supporting a Minister who by his action justifies the course of the Government at that time.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister whether there are any vacancies at the present time?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. There are no vacancies.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I understood that the opinion of the Minister of Justice was to be laid on the Table before this item was declared carried.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I stated that the opinion of the Minister of Justice had been procured, and that I had sent it to a clerk to be copied. I will lay it on the Table of the House in a few minutes. That opinion refers to statutory increases in all the departments, and it can be discussed at one stage of the Estimates, as well as at another.

Office of the Comptroller of the N.W.

Mounted Police..... $10,350

Mr. HUGHES. It is reported that the Mounted Police are to be reduced in number. I would like to know from the Minister of the Interior if that is true.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, it is true.

Mr. HUGHES. To what extent?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. So far as I am able to say at the present, the reduction will amount to about 250 in officers and men. The present force is 750, officers and men, speaking in round numbers, and the intention is to reduce it to about 500.

Mr. HUGHES. Has there been a detachment of police newly enrolled and sent north to the Yukon country recently?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, there has been.

Mr. DAVIN. This question of the reduction of the Mounted Police force will come up at another time. I intend to speak on it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I appreciate the hon. gentleman's intention.

Department of Indian Affairs $45,090

Mr. FOSTER. We would like to have the full explanations of this.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Would the hon. gentleman say what particular portion he wishes to have explained?

Mr. FOSTER. All of it.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. That would involve simply the reading of the details, which I presume the hon. gentleman does not wish to have done. I will state the chief changes in the department. In the first place, it is proposed to unite the office of Deputy Superintendent General with the office of Deputy Minister of the Interior, which makes a reduction of $3,200. It is proposed to do away with the office of Solicitor, which secures a reduction so far as this department is concerned, but an increase of $400 in the Department of Justice. It is proposed to raise the salary of the gentleman who has been at the head of the Land and Timber branch, to $2,000, and to make him secretary and chief clerk. It is proposed to appoint a law clerk; he is not appointed yet.

Mr. FOSTER. What is Mr. McLean's present salary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. $1,800.

Mr. FOSTER. When was he appointed?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. In 1873 or 1874, I am not able to say positively which. The law clerk to be appointed will receive a salary of $2,000. The accountant and chief clerk receives $1,950. There is a reduction in the number of first-class clerks. The first-class clerks were estimated last year at $15,125; this year at $9,700. Second class clerks, we estimated last year at $10,687.50, and this year at $9,600. Third class clerks last year at $17,337.50, and this year at $18,350. The changes in the clerkships arise from the fact that two have died, and it is not intended to fill their places, and it is proposed to superannuate two of the clerks at the end of this year.

Mr. FOSTER. Who are they?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. Wm. McGirr. I was in error in saying there were two; there is only one. I can give in detail an explanation of the decrease. There is a saving in the Department of Indian Affairs, by combining the office of Superintendent General of Indian Affairs and that of Deputy Minister of Interior, amounting to $3,200, and there is the abolition of the solicitorship, $400. Then there is the abolition of two first-class clerkships and a reduction in the salary of one first-class clerk. The reduction took place because the official unfortunately was so much addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors that I found it necessary to dismiss him, but subsequently, upon his very strong promise to reform, I took him back at a reduced salary, upon probation for six months. There is the abolition of a second-class clerkship, and the salaries of messengers transferred from this department to that of civil government contingencies, $600, and statutory increases not granted, $102.50.

Mr. FOSTER. Why was Mr. McGirr superannuated?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Because I came to the conclusion that his services were not necessary in the department, that is to say, his services could not be satisfactorily made use of to the advantage of the department. I might add that Mr. McGirr was brought down from the outside service some time ago, I think in 1892 or 1893, and the work which he had been doing in the office here did not seem to me work which called for the employment of a clerk. I considered him unnecessary and recommended his superannuation.

Mr. HUGHES. Who is now doing the work he did?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. It is done in the secretary's branch. His duties consisted chiefly in checking the reports that came from the agents. They are checked in the usual way.

Mr. HUGHES. What are the duties of Mr. McLean, the new secretary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. As secretary of the department he is practically responsible, under the deputy head, for the conduct of all the correspondence of the department. In addition to that, he is particularly the head of what is called the secretary's branch, which comprises the correspondence and registrar's branch—the branch where the largest amount of business has to be done.

Mr. HUGHES. Is Mr. Smart acting Deputy Minister of Indian Affairs?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Mr. Smart is acting in the place of Mr. Hayter Reed, who is absent on leave. He receives no additional salary. Mr. Hayter Reed is still Deputy Superintendent General but is not transacting any business in connection with the department.

Mr. FOSTER. What becomes of him when he returns to the department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. He will be superannuated.

Mr. FOSTER. So that the Minister proposes to get rid of all the old standbys who do know something about the department, and put new men in their places. How long was Mr. McGirr in the employment of the department?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I do not know.

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not think the remark of the ex-Minister of Finance came with very good grace with regard to getting rid of old men who were in the department and knew all about it. He will remember that Mr. Vankoughnet, the man who knew most about it, was superannuated without his consent, by hon. gentlemen opposite, and Mr. Hayter Reed was put in there, not because he was considered a better man or more efficient, but because a place had to be found for him, and in order to find that place, Mr. Vankoughnet, an efficient and faithful servant, was superannuated against his will. Mr. Hayter Reed, on the contrary, has been a very short time in the department into which he was brought and of which he was made deputy head.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is very forward in coming to the rescue of the Minister, who has so ably violated the principle that my hon. friend always stood up for when on this side, and who has, in his first appearance before this House, brought down no less than eight violations of the Civil Service Act in his Estimates. This new-found convert, the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), has the proverbial zeal of new converts. There is no parallel at all between the treatment of Mr. Hayter Reed and the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet. Mr. Vankoughnet was a long time in the service, and an old man.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 57 years old.

Mr. FOSTER. I think he was a good deal older than that. My hon. friend, as usual, is speaking without the book. I happen to know about Mr. Vankoughnet's superannuation, and there is no parallel at all between the cases. The hon. member for Wellington says that Mr. Reed had to have a position made for him. He certainly was not a person floating around somewhere for whom an office had to be found. He was in the employ of the department in the Indian branch, and I make bold to say, and I do not think I will be contradicted, that there is not a man in Canada to-day who understands more about Indian affairs in Canada and who has more of the confidence of the Indians than Mr. Hayter Reed. He was made what he was simply because of the long experience he had had of this branch, one of the most intricate and responsible that the Government has to deal with. So, there is not a fair comparison. My hon. friend has not answered the question as to treatment of Mr. Reed by referring to the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet. The same remark applies partly, to Mr. McGirr. He may not have been so long in the service—or perhaps he may have been quite as long.

Mr. HUGHES. Since 1877.

Mr. FOSTER. So he was longer in the service. Mr. McGirr has special knowledge of the North-west and aptitude in the treatment of the Indians, and he was brought here because of these qualifications. Mr. Hayter Reed and Mr. McGirr are two young men, and both men of ability. I do not think there has been any fault found with their work while they have been in connection with the department. They are both able and experienced men, and they have a knowledge of the North-west and of the Indians, which has been especially availed of to do useful work. There is something in being acquainted with the whole of the antecedents, with the whole course and record of matters connected with the departmental administration. These gentlemen have been turned out. Mr. Burgess has been turned down and degraded. These are all men who might have expected far different treatment. They have been long identified with the department, and there is no fault found with their work. But just as soon as the new Minister comes in, a change takes place. These officers are not political supporters, they were not wanted for one reason or another, and, within three months of the advent of the new Minister, before he had even got his bearings in the department, out they went. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Sifton) think that these two departments, with the multiplicity of work there is in them will not be overburdened with only one Deputy Minister ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Not under the organization we have.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, will my hon. friend tell us why he added $200 to Mr. McLean's salary ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I will answer my hon. friend's question with pleasure. I have asked the committee of the House to add $200 to Mr. McLean's salary, because I think his capacity and his experience and ability in the department warranted it, and because I think that when a man shows capacity and ability in a most important department, as Mr. McLean does, the service will not suffer, but will rather profit by a recognition of it. The hon. gentleman will understand, of course, that the discussion of personal matters in which the reputation and character of men are involved is a delicate matter. He will understand also, of course, that in speaking as the responsible head of the department, I express myself upon subjects of this kind with a great deal of diffidence. I prefer to err upon the side of prudence in avoiding saying anything that would injure anybody's reputation. I may say, however, in this connection, that the somewhat perfunctory way in which the hon. ex-Minister of Finance has given the explanation why Mr. Reed and Mr. McGirr were brought down from Regina to take places in the Indian Department shows pretty conclusively that he is repeating the explanation that was prepared for public use at the time the change was made, an explanation which, I can tell the hon. gentleman, is only a subject of merriment in the North-west where these gentlemen are known. For reasons which never were made perfectly clear to the public, the late Minister of Interior saw fit to make certain changes. I do not propose to discuss the capacity of Mr. Vankoughnet as compared with the capacity of Mr. Reed. Suffice it to say that the opinion has hardly ever been contradicted—I do not think the hon. gentleman contradicted it himself this evening—that Mr. Vankoughnet was quite as competent to discharge the duties of deputy superintendent as was Mr. Reed ; and it was not hinted at the time the change was made, so far as I can remember, that there was any lack of capacity on the part of Mr. Vankoughnet. But the explanation which was generally conceived at the time, and which I apprehend was the true explanation, was that it was desired to give these gentlemen positions here, and this means was taken of making room. There is a marked difference between the proposition I make and the proposition the hon. gentleman and his friends endorsed as regards this office. They removed a man who was promoted by themselves. If he was not fit for the place, he should not have been promoted. He had received their official recognition as one well qualified to discharge these duties. But I have done nothing of that kind. I have not removed a man who had received my endorsement or the endorsement of my colleagues. There is this radical difference between the hon. gentleman's position and mine. I can quite understand that the hon. gentleman should say there is no parallel ; there is no parallel in one sense of the word. There is a parallel in the sense the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) indicated when he said that if there was anything open to criticism in this matter, the transaction carried out by the hon. gentlemen opposite when in office was much more open to criticism upon the same ground. Now, I do not know that there is anything further I can say in regard to the observations of the hon. gentleman except this:—That the Department of Indian Affairs is a complicated department, and that its efficiency is largely a question of organization. I wish the committee to understand, Mr. Chairman, that I fully realize the responsibility it involved in recommending changes of this kind. And, if the Department of Indian Affairs is not more efficiently conducted hereafter than it has been in the past, I shall be quite prepared to have the House condemn me, and through me the Government, for the changes made. But I would ask the House to remember that it has been somewhat notorious that the Department of the Interior and the Department of Indian Affairs have not been conducted in all cases in the past with the degree of efficiency that the people of Canada have a right to expect in view of the large amount of money that has been annually expended. All I ask is to be judged by the results of the changes I have made and not by the doleful prognostication made by my hon. friend while the Estimates are going through the House.

Mr. BENNETT. I think the hon. Minister of the Interior is unfair to Mr. Hayter Reed in remarks he has made.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I did not say anything very uncomplimentary of Mr. Reed.

Mr. BENNETT. If he is to be superannuated on the ground of unfitness, let it be so stated and understood. If, on the contrary, he is to be displaced by reason of his political affinities, let that be known, because the inference then can be drawn and from what has been said is that and that alone. I have a word to say in defence of Mr. Reed. I met him in the department during the last Parliament, and I have had a good deal to do in the Department of Indian Affairs. His conduct, as compared with that of his predecessor, was altogether in his favour. There was a time when reflections might have been cast upon the late Government relative to the manner in which Mr. Vankoughnet performed his duty, and I think I remember correctly that when he was superannuated, no vote of censure was called for on the action of the Government on dispossessing him of the office he held. If anything needed to be said in justification of the superannuation of Mr. Vankoughnet under the administration of the department by Mr. Daly it could be found in a very strong letter which appeared in the Toronto "Globe" over the signature of Mr. H. H. Cook, entirely supporting the stand the Government had taken by Mr. Daly in recommending this superannuation.

I regret that the Minister of Interior differs from the hon. the Premier, because a little time ago the Premier made the announcement that of all matters to be kept in view, one certainly should be the advancement of art and literature in Canada. Now, I regret to see that Mr. Scott, who has acted as superior officer to Mr. McLean in that department, has not been advanced instead of Mr. McLean. In the absence of Mr. Reed, Mr. Scott usually discharged the duties of this office, and I venture to think, discharged them with the greatest possible satisfaction to all hon. gentlemen, and to the public generally, who may have come into contact with him.

Mr. DAVIN. I rather think my hon. friend the Minister of Interior made a too sweeping proposition in reference to the question under discussion. The question under discussion was the superannuation of Mr. Hayter Reed and Mr. McGirr, and in that connection the Minister said that it is notorious that the management of the department had not been what it was desirable it should be. Well, the meaning of that could only be that Mr. Hayter Reed and Mr. McGirr, but especially Mr. Hayter Reed, who occupied a controlling position in that department in the North-west Territories, had been inefficient. Now, I must say this in justice to Mr. Reed, that I have had a good many transactions with that department in connection with business in the North-west Territories, and so far as I was able to judge of Mr. Reed's actions as Indian Commissioner, he was a most efficient officer, and so far as I was able to judge of his conduct as Deputy Minister here, he was a most efficient officer. Not only that, but his subordinates who were in a position to criticise him, although some of them personally may have disliked him, I never heard from one of them an opinion regarding his management of the department that did not reflect credit upon him. The reputation Mr. Reed had in the Territories was one that we in this House should always be ready to acknowledge. The reputation he had as Commissioner—and I think his actions here as Deputy Minister bore that out—but certainly as Commissioner the reputation that he had was one of keeping down the expense of his department as low as possible, and of having a thorough knowledge also of his department in all its details. As my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) has pointed out, he had won the confidence of the Indians to an extent that no other man in that department had ever done. That is a great advantage in itself. I must say that the proposition made by the hon. Minister, made as it was in connection with the superannuation of Mr. Reed, seems to me to reflect unjustly on that officer, and in a way that facts would not bear out. And so with Mr. McGirr. Of course, I am not in a position to controvert what the Minister says respecting the duties that Mr. McGirr had to discharge, but I must say that the reputation that Mr. McGirr had in the North-west Territories was that of a man who has a thorough knowledge of Indian Affairs and was a most useful officer. I could quote the opinion of gentlemen in the North-west Territories who are connected with the department now, and who have the confidence of hon. gentlemen opposite, who share that opinion, or used to share that opinion that I have expressed in regard to Mr. McGirr. Now, there is this remark, I think, to be made. I think that none of us will deny that the Minister is perfectly entitled to say that he will have to be judged by the result of the experiment that he is making. Of course, that is the position of every Minister entering in the duties of a new department. But I express this hope, that we shall not find by-and-by that this place that is now made vacant, this position of deputy superintendent, will be filled up again. If this removal is a bona fide one, and if the two departments can be carried on by one man, why, if time endorses that view, we shall of course rejoice at the fact. But what I say now is that I fear that after some little time has passed away, the Minister will discover that in a department like that of Indian Affairs, so full of details as it is, and having so many complicated questions coming before it, he will have to appoint a deputy, and then we shall have a deputy Superintendent of Indian Affairs brought in from the outside, just as we have a Deputy Minister of Interior. That is what I fear is going to take place. I rose because I could not hear the remarks that have been made without saying that there cannot be the least doubt that a more conscientious or a more efficient officer is not in that department to-day than Mr. Reed or Mr. McGirr.

Mr. FOSTER. Can the Minister tell the House who he proposes to appoint as law clerk?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I have not arrived at any conclusion as to the appointment. I may say, by way of explanation of the item, that I find that the work of the Indian Department suffers by reason of the fact that we do not have the exclusive service of a solicitor. There is a very considerable amount of work that involves legal knowledge in connection with the construction of the Indian Act, the Indian Advancement Act, the legal advice to agents and the conduct of disputes, and preparation of questions with regard to disputes, that arise in reference to the various treaties; and it is, I find, almost impossible to have these matters satisfactorily disposed of unless I have some person who will perform the duties of a law clerk, and will be able to deal with these matters, and give them his constant attention. I in no way reflect upon the conduct of the work of Mr. Newcombe, the Deputy Minister of Justice, but the difficulty arises in the preparation of questions, and in watching legal matters which are referred when they are very important, to the Department of Justice, and when they are not very important, are decided by clerks of the department. I think the work would be much more effectively done if we had a law clerk, and I therefore ask for provision to be made for one. There is a considerable number of matters which specially require attention in that direction, which I expect to take up after the present session of Parliament is over, and there is no immediate necessity why a clerk should be appointed until some time after the 1st of July.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope my hon. friend does not propose, in carrying on his department where so many intricate questions arise, to make a law clerk the arbiter of legal questions.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes, unless it is an important matter. There are many minor matters which could be conducted by an ordinary lawyer. Of course specially important matters will be referred to myself, and I will refer them to the Minister of Justice, as is the practice in other departments. There are, however, more minor legal matters in connection with this department than in connection with any department except perhaps the Department of the Interior. Of course this officer will not handle important cases, but he will act rather as a solicitor, the important matters being referred to the Minister of Justice in the regular course.

Mr. FOSTER. Then this officer will be an intelligent clerk who will deal with certain matters, and important questions will be referred to the Department of Justice. The hon. Minister has made another break. He is asking an appropriation to pay for two private secretaries.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose the hon. gentleman has read the political history of this country for the last five, six or ten years?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. The "Debates?" I confess I have not read them all.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the hon. gentleman is at a disadvantage, and he does not know what kind of stone wall he is running against. Of course he has never come down and asked allowances for two private secretaries. He is not aware probably that by all the strong men in the Opposition this crime of having two private secretaries for one Minister was very strongly reprehended. It never ceased to be a ground of contention when the Estimates were up, and a ground of condemnation of the Minister for his extravagance and of the department for its extreme extravagance. I am sorry the Hon. David Mills, who now has a seat in another and higher sphere, is not present. I am sure the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) if not so verbose was just as eloquent in condemning a Minister for having two private secretaries; but the hon. member for Bothwell at that time particularly attacked the Department of Indian Affairs for its tremendous extravagance, and one of his main points was that there was a second private secretary. So strong was the cannonade, so furious and fast were the bombs and shells that in his good nature the Minister of the Interior gave way, and wagged along for two or three years with one private secretary, and seemed to do very well. Now, we have a new Minister, and the first thing he does is to make this terrible demand on the conscientious convictions of his supporters by asking them for a second private secretary. Would it not be the best thing, in the interest of the hon. gentleman's own friends, to drop the item?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Will the hon. gentleman say he objects to it?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. On what grounds?

Mr. FOSTER. Simply because I think you ought to do with one. And if not, for shame's sake, when a party has year after year inveighed strongly against the appointment of two private secretaries, the hon. gentleman ought not to ask for two. He even should not have a double one—he should have only one.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. I fancy the hon. gentleman in his desire to exercise the talent which he possesses as a debater is losing sight of the fact that the purpose of asking for Estimates for the Department of Indian Affairs is to get the business of the department done in the most efficient way possible. I suppose the hon. gentleman will admit that, for it is a simple proposition. It is purely a question of how the service shall be organized, as to whether by changing the service in a certain direction the work can be more efficiently performed. I may tell the hon. gentleman that one of the first things I encountered in connection with the department was a deluge of letters—not applying for offices—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Although there were quite a number—in which my attention was called to the fact that people had written letters, one, two, three, four and even five years ago and had not received any replies. This it appeared had been going on for many years. I take it to be the right of people who have business to transact with the department to receive answers to their letters, and I am inclined to think that any one who has had any business with the Department of Indian Affairs during the last five months will say they have received answers in the ordinary business course and have obtained the information asked for. If I do not have a secretary at liberty to collect the information asked for by these letters sent from all over Canada, it will be an absolute physical impossibility that the correspondents can get answers to their letters. It is one of the duties of a Minister to see that correspondents get answers to their letters, and I am endeavouring to do it, and for this purpose I have employed this gentleman to do this part of the work, and I do not think he is excessively paid. In view of the extra work and of the fact that he is liable to be called upon at any hour of the day or evening when Parliament is sitting, he should be allowed the additional remuneration asked in this vote. I may say that so far as regards the appeals made by the hon. member who sits behind me, I can appreciate the disappointment the hon. gentleman must feel at the lack of response.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the new secretary?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. A. J. McKellar.

Mr. FOSTER. Is he now in the service?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. He is a clerk belonging to what class?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR. He is a second-class clerk, at $1,400 a year.

Mr. FOSTER. Here is a second-class clerk at $1,400 made a private secretary. I must now call upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has most persistently declared that it was a parliamentary outrage to take a first-class or a second-class clerk for private secretary. Why did not the Minister select a young man on a comparatively small salary and add $600 to it, so as not to make a drain on the service and on the finances of the country. Instead of doing so, the hon. gentleman must have a high class clerk, one at $1,400, as private secretary. But how grateful will the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) feel that during the last five or six minutes the Minister of the Interior has had the satisfaction of telling him in so many words that while that hon. gentleman opposed the appointment of two private secretaries in previous years, he must refrain from doing so now, and in fact he complimented the Minister on his administration of the department.

Mr. McMULLEN. The late Minister of Finance seems to take considerable delight to-night in having a "drive" at me. On the question of private secretaries, I found fault with the appointment of a first or second-class clerk in his department as secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. He was a second-class clerk at $1,000 a year.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman increased his salary, and gave him the allowance of $600 as private secretary.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman is quite wrong.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then the hon. gentleman proceeded to criticise very fiercely the estimate for two private secretaries. I can remember, not so many years ago, when the Minister of Finance had two private secretaries. He had one in his department, and in order to do the very large volume of work that devolved upon him, he found it necessary to keep another at his house.

Mr. BENNETT. But you condemned it.

Mr. McMULLEN. I did. I challenged the prudence of keeping two private secretaries, but the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster) gave such a very plausible explanation that the House sanctioned the vote. I cannot but feel amused by the criticisms of my esteemed friend the ex-Minister of Finance, because it brings to my recollection so many little things that he was guilty of himself when he was in power. It is wonderful what a change a position makes in a man.

Mr. FOSTER. We want now to hear from the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). Has he also experienced a change of heart. I am thinking he will be a little more prudent than the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and will say as little as possible about it; but for fear that the Minister of Interior may have wrong information imparted to him by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) I want to say, that although I had two private secretaries, $600 was the total amount that was paid, and I did not have two clerks drawing pay from the department either; only one, so that there is quite a difference between the two cases. But then we are all human and fallible and liable to failings.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You should have been in Opposition long ago; it has improved you vastly.

Mr. FOSTER. I was speaking particularly for the benefit of my hon. friend (Mr. Landerkin) who has just interrupted me.

Offices of the Auditor General..... $27,100

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). One messenger has been dispensed with and there are two partial statutory increases. These are the only alterations.

Mr. FOSTER. Very well.

Department of Finance..... $50,460

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This sum is almost identically the same as it was before.

Mr. FOSTER. I notice that.

Department of Inland Revenue..... $38,540

Mr. FOSTER. The Controller of Inland Revenue is not here, and the vote had better stand. There seems to be an additional clerk which requires explanation. There is another matter which I want to bring to the attention of the Controller (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière) and I would like him to be here. I notice that a distinguished relative of Li Hung Chang is about to be fumigated, and I want to appeal to the sympathy of the Controller of Inland Revenue to prevent such an outrage.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. We will let the vote stand; but I think my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) will find that it is the Minister of Agriculture who has charge of the quarantine.

Post Office..... $194,962 50

Mr. FOSTER. We want some explanation of this.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is a decrease. There is one first-class clerk less.

Mr. HUGHES. What became of him?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He died. Mr. Fortier is his name and he is still dead.

Mr. HUGHES. He might come back like Mrs. McManus's husband.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. Unfortunately he is dead, and it is not necessary to fill the vacancy. There are two second-class clerks less and that involves a reduction of $2,200, I think. These vacancies were in existence when the last Estimates were voted and have not happened since I entered the department.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there any vacancies in the second-class clerkships now?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. There are two that are dropped are all the vacancies in existence. There are three third-class clerks less, arising from three resignations.

Mr. FOSTER. Forced?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No. Mr. Scribner was studying medicine and resigned. Miss Barber resigned to get married, and I have forgotten the reasons for Mr. Balderson's resignation, but they were all voluntary. One messenger died; and lastly, there is an error of 50 cents in the amount. That disposes of all the changes, resulting in a reduction of $3,550.

Mr. FOSTER. There seems to be one new chief clerk.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Yes. That is a new office. It is what we propose to call the Controller of Railway Mail Service. The railway mail service heretofore has been under the divided control of the various district inspectors, and this appointment involves the transfer of the railway mail service from the local inspectors to a central officer at Ottawa. Temporarily, I am trying in that position, Mr. B. W. Armstrong.

Mr. FOSTER. Who was what?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He was a first-class clerk in the Toronto post office and a man of very considerable experience. He is, I think, one of the best men in the service for the position. I did not select him on my own responsibility, but I entirely approved of his appointment. I acted on the advice of the chief inspector in the choice. Mr. Armstrong is there for the time being, and I have no doubt will be a success. He has had considerable experience in the service. He was practically in charge of the Toronto general post office, but has spent the best part of thirty years in the service, though comparatively a young man.

Mr. FOSTER. Just what are the duties you propose such a man to do?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. He will, among the other things, have charge of the railway mail service. The mail service on the trains is every day becoming more important from the gradual process of transferring the mail service from stages to railways. Before I took office there were 404 railway mail clerks. The Controller will have the direction of these, arranging their time-tables, seeing that they are in charge of their trains in every part of the Dominion, and generally perfecting the organization. The province of Ontario, for instance, is divided into six inspectors' districts. Formerly the railway mail clerks were supposed to be attached to these districts. They were more or less local officers, their immediate superior being the inspector of the district to which they were attached. My view of the railway mail service is that it is one continuous service, and that the local inspectors should not interfere with it. The new system will result in a very considerable saving in the number of mail clerks in due time.

Mr. FOSTER. How ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the men will work with greater efficiency and with more economy to the service. Not being under local management, their time will be utilized to the full without regard to districts. I could, if it were worth while, illustrate in detail some of the inconveniences arising from the old system. Suffice to say that in the United States the system obtains the whole mail service over that vast area being under one controlling mind, one central officer, with his officials scattered here and there, and all responding to his authority direct or through his local agents. Under the old system, the inspectors, having the railway mail clerks in their charge, have become rather local and stationary officers than what they were originally designed to be, as the term implies, inspectors, so that we have little staffs scattered throughout the country, doing local office work, instead of being engaged in what I think was the original design—inspecting local post offices and seeing that the stage work and the local mail service was being properly discharged. The new arrangement will, I think, result not only in a considerable reduction in the cost of the railway mail service, but in greater efficiency in what is commonly known as the land service. The inspectors will then be freer to attend to the work of their districts, and fewer men will be required for the working of those districts. I am satisfied that there will be generally increased efficiency with a reduction in cost.

Mr. BENNETT. In each of the six postal divisions in the province of Ontario, there were a certain number of railway mail clerks who were under the inspector of the division, and the inspector of each division had what was known as a chief railway mail clerk, to whom was assigned the duty of looking after the clerks on the trains. I understood the Minister to state that Mr. Armstrong, from the Toronto post office, who I believe is a most capable officer, has been appointed to the position of controller of the railway mail service. I wish to ask the Minister if it is the intention to have under Mr. Armstrong a chief railway mail clerk in each division, as heretofore. If these chief clerks are to be dispensed with, it must of necessity be the duty of Mr. Armstrong, in the event of a letter being lost or tampered with on a train, to go from one part of the province or of the Dominion to another to look after the matter.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It will not be necessary to have as many chief railway mail clerks in the Ontario division as there have been. The system went into force on the 1st of April. I am feeling my way into it, but up to the present time it has worked satisfactorily, and I think, when a year goes by, if I am then here, it will be my pleasure to report satisfactory results such as I have indicated.

Mr. BENNETT. Will the hon. Minister be good enough to state what changes have been made with regard to the chief clerks ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot give all the details. No new persons have been taken into the service, the men being transferred from the railway mail service or from the inspectors' offices. There has been one chief clerk appointed for Halifax, one for St. John, one for Montreal, one for Quebec, one for Ottawa, one for Toronto, one for London, one for Winnipeg, and one for Victoria and the mainland in British Columbia. The last-named officer is temporarily looking after the service on the mainland, and is also, in consequence of the rapid increase of population, doing some work that properly belongs to the inspector's office.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the hon. Minister say what has been done with the railway mail clerks at Kingston, Stratford and Barrie ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I cannot tell what has become of them at present. I presume they will be discharging the ordinary duties of mail clerks. My desire is to make promotions in the mail service the reward of merit, and I instructed the chief inspector and controller in each case to select the most efficient men in the district as local superintendents. I cannot give the names of them all now. These appointments that have been made as local superintendents, as connecting links between the controller and the railway mail staff, are, for the time being, temporary, to see whether they are equal to the task. If, after reasonable trial, they are found equal, their appointments will be made permanent. I have given a free hand to those officers to recommend—and have, in each case, acted on their recommendation—the men they consider the fittest, without regard to any other consideration. The system is being put into effect. If it happens that there are any in the service who occupy the position the hon. member for Victoria inquired about and who have not been drafted into higher positions, I will endeavour to find proper positions for them in the service.

Mr. HUGHES. Do the six old divisions for ordinary inspection purposes stand as they formerly did in Ontario ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Up to the present I have arrived at no final conclusion, but I believe this system will result in a very considerable economy in those inspectors and will warrant a reduction in the number.

Mr. HUGHES. Are the railway mail clerks, under the new system, transferred from, say an Ottawa or Quebec division, up to an Ontario division?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Whilst I would feel bound to have regard to the convenience of those in the service, and perhaps would be bound to respect provincial lines, I think there is much inconvenience in the mail service through having to regard the division of provinces, such as Ontario, where the province is divided up into different railway mail service districts. I would desire the railway mail clerks to understand that there is but one service from ocean to ocean, and that they are not to consider themselves unfairly treated if their runs are changed in the public interest.

Mr. HUGHES. In making any such change, is the hon. gentleman careful to look after seniority. For instance, a clerk in Barrie or Toronto division should not lose his seniority because a mail clerk is brought in from another division to fill a vacancy. For instance, if a vacancy occurred in the first-class, it would not be fair that a second-class officer should lose his seniority by some one being brought from another position to fill the first-class vacancy.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I should not like to make a statement that would be binding upon me in any way. I do not know that mail clerks who are attached to a division have any special rights with regard to that division. They should rather be regarded, I think, as members of one common service. There are certain prizes under this arrangement for the service, which, I believe, will stimulate the members of the staff to efficiency. The railway mail service is regarded as one of the most severe in connection with the Post Office Department. It is a service very trying to the physical endurance of the staff, and after a man has served a number of years in it, it is reasonable that he should look forward to being able to retire into a less severe branch. For that reason, I think that whoever may be in this department should feel perfectly free to reward merit and promote men regardless of the accident of their having been appointed to another division.

Mr. HUGHES. Here is a division, say the Toronto division, with a certain number of second-class clerks, and among these a vacancy occurs. There is a third-class clerk ready and available, and who merits promotion, but a second-class clerk is brought from Ottawa to fill the vacancy in the Toronto division. Would the third-class clerk in Toronto then lose his seniority and chance of promotion, which a third-class clerk in Ottawa might gain?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It would be my duty to try and respect the rights of the clerks in these divisions, but my own inclination would be, if there were no restriction of the kind alluded to, to treat all the railway mail clerks as members of the common service, and in matters of promotion I would take the advice of those capable of giving it and make them without regard to districts.

Mr. McINERNEY. Has the hon. Postmaster General had any protest from the mail clerks of New Brunswick concerning a change in the run made there lately?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have had no protest, although some representations have been made to me. I do not think there is any real foundation for any grievance. The change the hon. gentleman refers to arises in respect of the run between Lévis and Moncton. It happened that at one time that was a dividing line, Campbellton being the dividing point, I think about 290 miles from Lévis to Campbellton, and a little less from Campbellton to Moncton. I think I am correct in saying that there were twelve railway mail clerks engaged in that service. By making it one through run, doing away with those divisions, and making the run direct from Lévis to Moncton, we are able to conduct that service with four less men, when they are properly educated to it. When they are properly accustomed to it, it would be more profitable to the clerks and better for the service. Every time there is a change in connection with the railway there is a loss of energy, a waste of time, a waste of labour. By the arrangement that we are experimenting with and that I believe will be successful in a month, we shall have four mail clerks starting from Quebec and four from Moncton, four New Brunswickers, and four Quebecers. I think that my hon. friend (Mr. McInerney), perhaps, is under the erroneous impression that inasmuch as in the organization there happened to be a little preponderance from Quebec that is a permanency. If that is his fear, I will assure my hon. friend that there is no foundation for it. We are only putting it in shape.

Mr. McINERNEY. I only wish to bring this matter to the Postmaster General's attention, because when I was down in New Brunswick at Easter I met several of the railway mail clerks and it was evident that they felt very sore indeed—I will not mention names—on account of the change then in operation. There were men who had been on the list for a long time, men appointed in 1873, in 1874, and they thought that the privileges they had enjoyed for so many years in the long run—which I understand is of advantage to a mail clerk because he is paid something for mileage—would be taken away from them by the system the Postmaster General was trying to bring into vogue. They made certain representations to me and said they intended to call the Postmaster General's attention to the facts. I understood that the whole run from Lévis to Moncton was being made by men sent from the province of Quebec. Naturally there would be a grievance in the minds of New Brunswick mail clerks if they found that the run they had over the best part of the Government road was being interfered with by men from any part of Quebec. I wish to protest on behalf of the New Brunswick mail clerks against any change that will interfere with the privileges that have been enjoyed for a long term of years by these men, some of whom were appointed by the Mackenzie Government, and who have no particular shade of politics, and who, from the number of years they have spent in the service, are entitled to consideration. I also wish to protest against any change which may be contemplated that would interfere with the privileges they have enjoyed during all these years. From what they told me I understood that they had a grievance. I only wish to ask the hon. Postmaster General if that grievance has been put in writing and presented to him, or if any protest has been made. For I have collected some information, and, at another time, I may see fit to bring it before the House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. No protest from any mail clerks have reached me. Whether it has been sent to any officer of the department or not, I do not know. If there has been any inequality in the representation, such as I indicated a moment ago, that will come to an end on the 15th of this month. We had to settle down in a certain way. We had to take clerks off other runs to teach those who are being put on the practical duties of the office, the sortation on the cars, &c. The Controller stated that it would take about six weeks, and that after the 15th of May he would have the representation I had mentioned—four from Lévis and four from Moncton, to run through each way. I think my hon. friend will agree with me that that is a fair arrangement. If not, I shall be glad to hear any representations on the subject.

Mr. McINERNEY. Did the four men from Lévis previously run through from Moncton? Were they on the road before?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The run was different—it was from Lévis to Campbellton, and then there was a run from Moncton to Campbellton.

Mr. GILLIES. I would ask the hon. Postmaster General if he contemplates or intends making any addition to the inspectoral division of Nova Scotia. The hon. gentleman knows that that is a very important division. It is territorially large and it is practically divided already into two divisions, Nova Scotia proper and the island of Cape Breton. I understand that for some time past it has been contemplated by the department to have the inspectoral division divided into two. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he intends making such change?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have no objection to discuss that point now, but perhaps my hon. friend (Mr. Gillies) would prefer to wait until the matter of inspectors comes up. Such a discussion would hardly be in order under this item of civil government. The discussion we have had has arisen over the establishment of the new office, that of Controller of Railway Mail Service. If my hon. friend acquiesces in that suggestion and will renew the inquiry when we come to the item which deals with the inspectorates, I will discuss the matter.

Mr. GILLIES. I am aware that the discussion is, perhaps, just a little irregular on this item, but I brought up the question because there is a possibility that I may not be present when the item the hon. gentleman has referred to is going through. If the hon. Minister (Mr. Mulock) would prefer to discuss the matter on the Main Estimates, I will get some gentleman to ask some questions for me if I am not here.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. If the hon. gentleman wishes it, I will answer him now.

Mr. GILLIES. I would be pleased to have an answer from the Postmaster General.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not been able to find any argument in favour of an increase in the inspectorates of Nova Scotia. My opinion is that there are too many inspectors at the present time in Canada and that there has been too much extravagance. I believe that the new system, when it is in full swing will make any increase in the number of inspectors quite unnecessary.

Mr. GILLIES. Then the intention is not to increase?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I see no reason for making a recommendation for an increase or to propose any appropriation for that purpose to the House.

Mr. McINERNEY. I would like to ask the hon. Postmaster General if there is any vote here for an increase in the number of first-class mail clerks in the province of New Brunswick, and I wish to say that I think that there was last year a proposition for the addition of one or two, that is, promoting them from second to first-class rank. Mr. Henry Wathen was one. I would like to know if it is the intention of the Postmaster General to propose a vote to enable him to put Mr. Wathen on the first-class list?

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Bain). We are drifting away from the item.

Mr. McINERNEY. But I would like to ask now if the Postmaster General does not object to answer me.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The Chairman is quite correct that we are drifting away from the item, but I will answer my hon. friend if I may be allowed. I do not think there is any item in the Main Estimates for the purpose my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. McINERNEY. Would I be in order in asking the Postmaster General if he intends to bring down an item to that effect. Mr. Wathen was appointed by the party to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) belongs, and has been in the service ever since his first appointment. He has passed his examination and every person who knows him will know that he is well qualified for a first-class clerkship. I have brought this case before the Postmaster General, believing that he will do him justice. I would ask him now if he intends to bring down the vote at any time this year to put him in a position to give Mr. Wathen what I think he is entitled to, a first-class clerkship.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will say to my hon. friend, that I am anxious to have an opportunity of going through the whole staff of the service. Speaking roughly, there are some 1,800 on the staff, and as soon as this session is over, I intend to make a study, to inform myself as to the merits of every member of the staff. As a matter of fact it has been simply impossible, to me at least, to do that work properly, since I have been in office, and for that reason and no other I have not felt able to make suggestions and recommendations to my colleagues, or now to the House, dealing with promotions of any kind. Therefore it has not been from a determination not to do it, but because I want to have an opportunity during recess of carefully studying the claims of each member of the staff so as, if possible, to do justice all round. It is for that purpose alone that I am unable, during this session, to deal with the question of promotions at all.

Mr. HUGHES. I think the proposition of the hon. Minister to make a seniority list, has a good deal of merit in it. Now, in making his seniority list, it would be well to consider localities from which appointments come. At the present time he will understand of course that appointments are made, for instance, in the New Brunswick division, from New Brunswick, in the Quebec division, from Quebec, and so on from the other provinces. Now, if a vacancy occurs in the seniority list, is the appointment to come from the district from which the vacancy occurs? I suggest to the hon. Minister that there might be difficulty in that respect in the new seniority arrangement. A locality might possibly lose its chance of having its members appointed on this staff.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. As I mentioned before, whilst I regard the mail service of Canada as one unbroken service, at the same time I think public opinion would not warrant me in disregarding provincial lines. It seems to me that that is about as far as efficiency will warrant one going, in having regard to territorial divisions of any kind.

Department of Customs..... $38,600

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). There is a decrease of $1,387.50 since last year.

Mr. FOSTER. Why are there three additional first-class clerks?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. In the first place, it is proposed to dispense with the services of a chief clerk whose salary is $1,800, and there are three gentlemen who will be promoted from the second-class to the first-class, and one Mr. Moran, from the third-class to the second-class. His present salary is $1,350, very near the maximum of the second.

Mr. FOSTER. That is another break.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No, it is expected that he will have extra duties to perform in the re-arrangement of the staff, owing to the discontinuance of the services of a chief clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. And you are giving him an extra $50 besides?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Yes, but I am saving $1,800 on other grounds.

Mr. HUGHES. Who is the chief clerk whose services are being dispensed with?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Webster; I am trying to re-organize the department and work it at somewhat less cost.

Mr. FOSTER. I think I will have to ask my hon. friend to let this stand over till to-morrow. The ex-Controller of Customs has something to ask him specially.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. I have no objection, if the hon. gentleman will feel that I am not neglecting my duties. I am asked out on public business a good deal during the day.

Department of Marine and Fisheries..... $55,780

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). In this matter the hon. gentleman will see there is $200 of a decrease. There are one or two votes on which explanations will no doubt be asked. In the first place, I ask for an increase of $100 for Mr. Stewart, Commander of the Surveying Service.

Mr. FOSTER. He is not in the regular service, is he?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, he is what is called a technical officer. The hon. gentleman will remember that Commander Boulton formerly filled the position which Mr. Stewart now fills, and received a salary of $4,000. Mr. Stewart is a graduate of the College at Kingston, and was trained under Commander Boulton, and receives a salary of $1,700, which I propose to increase to $1,800. I think all sides of the House will agree that that increase is desirable in the interests of the public service. He well deserves it, he is doing his duty remarkably well, and to the satisfaction of everybody.

Mr. HAGGART. Why do you put in "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act?"

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not understand myself why that is put in. So far as Mr. Stewart is concerned, the Civil Service Act does not apply to him at all, and there was no occasion for that, but it was slipped in because it was an increase. The next gentleman in whose salary there is an increase is Mr. Stanton. Mr. Stanton occupies a position in the Civil Service, in the Marine and Fisheries, corresponding to that in other departments known as a chief clerkship. He is in charge of the fisheries correspondence, and he was reported to me by the deputy and all those who understand his business well, as a gentleman who ought to receive an increase. I examined the matter pretty thoroughly, and satisfied myself that Mr. Stanton's case was one that deserved an increase. He is getting $100, two statutory increases.

Mr. HUGHES. There were six officers last year, and there are six officers this year, and yet there is a considerable reduction in the salaries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I will come to that in a moment; I was confining myself to the increases. Now, with respect to Mr. Gilbert. He is revenue clerk in the Marine and Fisheries Department, and has charge of the revenue, without any assistance, and no less than $160,000 a year passes through his hands. He is recommended by his superiors as a good officer, and as one deserving an increase. After examining into the matter very closely, I came to the conclusion that $650 a year was altogether too low a salary for the work performed.

Mr. FOSTER. When did he come into the service?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He entered the service five or six years ago at least. He has to do a great deal of work day and night. There are no politics in any of these increases. Every officer in the department except one, I believe, is in sympathy with hon. gentlemen opposite. Mr. Gilbert, however, I believe has no politics. After consulting with the deputy and the chief accountant of the department, I came to the conclusion that his salary should be increased from $650 to $800 a year, which is a very moderate sum. These are the only increases I ask the committee to vote.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). I notice the words are appended "notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act." Why is that necessary?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Because Mr. Gilbert is a third-class clerk, and the increase is $150.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). It seems to me that while hon. gentlemen opposite found much fault with these words being used when they were in Opposition, they are now used to an extent far beyond any application ever anticipated. It is a dangerous precedent, and is adopting a dangerous principle.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I thoroughly agree that hon. gentlemen opposite have a right to receive full information as to the reasons why I propose this increase. Mr. Gilbert is practically assistant accountant; he has charge of an expenditure of $160,000; he works day and night and has no regular hours. There is no question of politics in this advance. He is a young gentleman who has an enormous amount of work to do, and does it well. The officers in the department recommend this advance, as his present salary is altogether inadequate for the service he discharges. I looked into the matter myself and satisfied myself that the representations were correct; so I took upon myself the responsibility of advising that this increase be made. I repeat that there are no political influences at work in this matter; I do not think Mr. Gilbert has friends in this country, but he is a thoroughly good officer and efficiently performs his duties. It is an act of common justice to grant this increase. I recommend it cheerfully, after having made a close examination into the facts.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will make other explanations, as I suppose increases grow out of decreases.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a decrease, which I propose to the House, and it is a very unpleasant duty to perform, but under the circumstances I feel bound to propose it. My hon. friend (Mr. Costigan), when he was Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in August, 1895, appointed Mr. O'Hanly as technical officer at a salary of $1,100 a year. Last year I asked for a similar amount, stating to the House at the time that I did not propose any change in the salaries of officers in the department because I did not feel qualified to pass judgment on the amounts paid to the different officers. When it became my duty to examine the matter very closely, I formed the opinion, from information obtained from the head of the branch and from examining Mr. O'Hanly's work, as far as I was capable of doing so, that Mr. O'Hanly was paid altogether disproportionately to the value of the work he performed. I do not think that in strict and severe justice I have sufficiently reduced the amount, but there were considerations which prompted me to act on the side of mercy, and allow the salary to be $800. I therefore propose a reduction of $300. I do it on the ground that this amount represents the worth of Mr. O'Hanly's services. I do not want to say more, and I ask the House to accept that as my statement, and as also as being the statement of the head of the branch to which he belongs. I think in July, 1896, the Minister confirmed Mr. O'Hanly in his appointment and salary of $1,100. I would be willing to do so if I thought his work justified it. I am compelled to say, however, that it does not, and I frankly state that I cannot recommend Parliament to pay a larger sum than the amount named.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I think I should say something as to this appointment, as it was made on my recommendation. A vacancy occurred in the department. Several applications were sent in, amongst the applicants being Mr. O'Hanly. We made inquiries as to his qualifications in relation to the technical branch of the service. We found that he was as well qualified as any man in the technical service of the country; that he had been a practical engineer, had been employed in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway for many years, and had been employed temporarily in the Department of Interior, and was there at the time I proposed to transfer him and give him this permanent position. His appointment was under consideration for a couple of weeks before the transfer took place, because the chief officers of the branch of the Interior Department where Mr. O'Hanly was then working, were urging very strongly that, on account of his industry, his application to work, and the intelligence with which he discharged his duties, they ought not to lose the services of so valuable an officer as he was, and that he should be made permanent there. It was because that could not be carried out, that they reluctantly consented to the transfer to my department, on the very highest recommendation that any officer could leave one branch of the service to go to another with. Mr. O'Hanly was appointed at $1,100 on the understanding that it would be made $1,200, and I think the salary of $1,200 was voted for him. Whatever deficiencies may have been charged against Mr. O'Hanly—I cannot say as to what reports have been made—I know that he is an engineer, that he has given practical test of his ability in that profession, and I know that his superior officers in the branch that he left, and while I was there in the branch that he came to; never gave two opinions as to his industry and to his attention to the duties imposed upon him. He was then considered a most satisfactory officer in every way. I never learned until just now, that there was the slightest question about his ability in the discharge of his duties. The hon. Minister (Mr. Davies) has stated that politics had nothing to do with these changes. Well, politics had nothing to do with the appointment of Mr. O'Hanly, because if politics had anything to do with it, he would not have had the appointment. The politics of Mr. O'Hanly's father are pretty well known in this country, and if there is a prominent Liberal in his section, it is Mr. O'Hanly, senior. Therefore, the appointment was not made out of consideration of his politics, and I thought that perhaps Mr. O'Hanly might have received as generous treatment from the gentlemen now at the head of the department as he received from me.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I am sorry my hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) should intimate any want of generosity on my part. I am aware that Mr. O'Hanly's father is a Liberal, and he himself is supposed to be a Liberal, and I was disposed to give him fair even-handed justice. His industry I do not call in question. He is a technical officer, however, and I am bound to accept the reports of his superiors in office. After examining his work and the time he takes to do his work, I have been able to form an honest and fair conclusion, and in fact, I think I have gone possibly a little further than I should have gone in recommending that a larger salary than $800 should be paid to him. I may say that I have been pressed from a great many quarters on this point, and there were many considerations which might prompt me to err on the side of what my hon. friend (Mr. Costigan) is pleased to term, generosity; but I cannot see that in the discharge of my duty as a public servant, I would be entitled to allow mere feelings of generosity to weigh with me. There must be justice done. While I regret it—nobody regrets it more than I do—at the same time, I cannot recede from the conclusion I have reached after a good deal of consideration, pressed as I have been from all sides, and knowing him to be a Liberal and all that.

Mr. McINERNEY. Is this the only reduction in the department?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes; that is the only reduction in the department.

Department of Public Works $48,600

Mr. FOSTER. Please explain.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). I am asking $3,940 less than last year, and the reason is that I have dispensed with the services of Mr. Lightfoot, a first-class clerk, drawing a salary of $1,800. I have also dispensed with the services of the following third-class clerks: Mr. Durocher, Mr. Marion, Mr. Belliveau and Mr. Champagne.

Mr. FOSTER. How is the Chief Architect $200 less?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Fuller, the Chief Architect, has been superannuated, and I only give $3,000 to Mr. Ewart, who is acting chief architect.

Mr. FOSTER. Is Mr. Ewart a first-class clerk?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has been acting for years as assistant chief architect. I have promoted him, and he is now acting chief architect.

Mr. FOSTER. Who is the assistant.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have none. I do not want any either, for the time being.

Mr. HAGGART. Have you appointed Mr. Ewart chief architect?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not appoint him chief architect. He is simply acting as such.

Mr. HAGGART. Is it your intention to recommend his appointment?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not made up my mind what I will do.

Mr. McINERNEY. Is there any special reason for dismissing Mr. Belliveau?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. There is no special reason, but in looking through my department I found that I could dispense with the services of a certain number of employees, and I am very sorry that Mr. Belliveau was one of those. I would like very much to keep them, but I feel that I can go on without those whom I have dismissed, and I have made up my mind to practice economy as much as I can.

Mr. McINERNEY. I regret very much that the hon. gentleman found it necessary to dismiss Mr. Belliveau. I understand that there were only two French Acadians in the service at Ottawa, and one of these was Mr. Belliveau who has been dismissed. The French Acadians in the province of New Brunswick number over 60,000 souls. They are a people who ought to be looked on as having some rights in this country, and to have them represented by one man in the service here is not, I think, giving them a fair measure of justice. If the Minister of Public Works found it necessary to curtail the number of officers in his department, I think he might have done so without striking at one of the two men of a nationality, who I think, are entitled to some consideration in this country. Therefore, on that ground, if it were possible to do so, I would ask the hon. gentleman to reconsider the case of Mr. Belliveau and try to put him back in the service.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I do not see what the question of race has to do with such a question. I did not inquire whether Mr. Belliveau was a French Acadian or a French Canadian. I simply inquired whether this man was needed. I found I did not need him, and the question is whether because a man is of French origin or of English origin, we are bound to employ him when we do not want him. There is the whole question for me. I am very sorry indeed to have to dispense with the services of Mr. Belliveau; but I may add, as the hon. gentleman raises this question, that if Mr. Belliveau had been an abler man than he is, perhaps I would have kept him. I am quite prepared to show the letter which Mr. Belliveau has written to me, and in which there are as many mistakes as lines.

Mr. McINERNEY. I thought you had no special reason?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I had no special reason when he was dismissed; but he has written this letter to me since. It seems to me that in such a case I should not be accused of being an enemy of the French Acadian race. Still, if I can see my way to employ Mr. Belliveau in another place, I will do so gladly.

Mr. McINERNEY. Did the hon. gentleman take in his department a new third-class clerk in place of some he had dismissed?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not appoint one man.

Mr. McINERNEY. Did not Mr. DesBrisay go into the Public Works Department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has been transferred from the department of the Privy Council to my department in place of Mr. Thériault.

Mr. HUGHES. Is Mr. John B. Charleson employed in the Public Works Department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Yes. He is not employed in the class I am now asking money for.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to know in what class he is employed, because we have something to say about him when the vote comes up?

Mr. HAGGART. Will the hon. gentleman tell me whether any one but a first-class clerk can be appointed chief architect—whether he considers that it is open to him to make a selection from outside the service?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not give any attention to that question, but my intention is to keep Mr. Ewart. I have no desire to change him at all. So far I have found him to be a very faithful officer.

Mr. HAGGART. Surely the hon. gentleman will be able to answer this question, whether under the law the appointment of chief architect should be made from the first-class clerks.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I have not considered that question.

Mr. REID. I would like to ask the Minister if Mr. Belliveau was on the permanent list?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He was.

Mr. REID. Was he paying into the superannuation fund?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. No: he had not been ten years in the service. He had only been in two years, if I remember rightly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Will the hon. gentleman say why he dismissed Mr. Thériault, Mr. Durocher, and Mr. Champagne in preference to others in the department?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. Mr. Champagne was a messenger. I found two messengers, Mr. DesRivières and Mr. Lepage, who were paid $500 a year, employed as copyists instead of as messengers. I brought them down to the work for which they are paid. Mr. Champagne was then no longer necessary and I dispensed with his services. As to Belliveau, Thériault and Durocher, I found that I could do without their services. As a matter of fact, I dispensed with the services of some others, not from any political reasons, but because I did not need them.

Mr. HAGGART. But the hon. gentleman asks us to appoint another, Mr. DesBrisay, whom he takes from another department.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He has been appointed in the place of another man, Mr. Verreault, whom I was obliged to dismiss because he was not a useful employee. Mr. DesBrisay is a very able man, and so far he has proved very useful.

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman got rid of two whom he had not a word to say against and whom he does not pretend to say were not perfectly efficient. Why not have retained them instead of bringing Mr. DesBrisay over from the Privy Council?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not retain them because they were certainly not of the class Mr. DesBrisay is. He is an exceptionally able man.

Mr. FOSTER. Has my hon. friend no compunctions of conscience in depriving the Privy Council and his leader of the services of so able a man?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). If my hon. friend wants to part with him and I have a vacancy, I would be very glad to have him in my department. Politically he is a very bad man, but otherwise he is a very good officer.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. He is not so bad as my hon. friend thinks.

Mr. CASGRAIN. When will we be able to discuss Mr. Charleson's appointment?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. As soon as my estimates come, I will be glad to give my hon. friend the opportunity he wants.

Resolutions to be reported.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 5th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 94) to commemorate the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria by making her birthday a perpetual holiday (from the Senate).—Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière.)

Bill (No. 96) to amend the law respecting Controverted Elections.—(Mr. Bell, Pictou.)

CRIMINAL LIBEL.

Mr. DAVIN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 95) to amend the law of Libel.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Explain.

Mr. DAVIN. The object of this Bill is to prevent a person accused of libel and pleading justification from—after he has set out the facts in the plea of justification, and that plea has been set aside or quashed—coming on again with a new set of facts, and if that is set aside or quashed, coming on again with another. I did not think such a thing was possible under our law, but it seems to be possible; and as evidence has come before me that it is possible, I wish to amend section 634 of the Criminal Code. I also think the Criminal Code should be so amended that if, in the plea of justification, the libeller makes a criminal charge against the libelled, and fails to prove it, he should at once be liable to be put on his trial for that. If this change is not made, then, as a learned judge has said, a man may libel you worse in the pleadings of a court than he can in a publication, and go scot free. In Quebec, as appears from the case of the "Mail" and Laflamme, in a civil suit, the person bringing an action for libel cannot only recover for the damage done by the libel, but also for the libel in the pleadings. I am not sure that that can be done outside of Quebec, but what I propose has nothing to do with civil matters. It is to prevent possibly great hardship and put the law in a position in which I think every lawyer will agree it should be placed. In fact, I have not spoken to any lawyer on the subject who does not feel astonished that what I want to prevent could possibly occur, but the impossible has taken place.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUEEN'S OWN RIFLES.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON asked :

1. Has the report of the commission of officers appointed to investigate the affairs of the "Queen's Own Rifles," Toronto, been received by the Government?

2. If so, does the report recommend the reinstatement of Col. Hamilton?

3. Has any action been taken by the Government on the report?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). On the first two questions the General Officer Commanding reports as follows:—1. Yes. 2. The court had no power to make any such recommendation. All they were empowered to do was to inquire into, and report fully all the facts of the case. This they did. 3. No.

IONA STATION RESTAURANT.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Does the Government propose building a restaurant at Iona station, on the Intercolonial Railway? If so, when?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). No, the Government has not decided upon building a restaurant at Iona station, on the Intercolonial Railway, but the matter is under consideration.

Mr. DAVIN.

WHARF AT IONA.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Has the Government decided to build a new wharf at Iona, Victoria county, Nova Scotia, this season, or repair the old one?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The matter is under consideration.

WHARF AT NORTH RIVER.

Mr. BETHUNE asked :

Was there a petition received from North River, St. Anns, Victoria county, Nova Scotia, praying that a public wharf be built at said North River? If so, will the prayer of the petition be granted?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). A petition has been received from North River, St. Anns, Victoria county, N.S., praying that a public wharf be built at that place. That petition is under the consideration of the Government.

GOLD DREDGING IN STEWART RIVER, YUKON.

Mr. McINNES asked :

1. In what newspapers and within what dates in each of such newspapers, did the Government advertise for tenders for a lease for the exclusive right to dredge for gold in a part of the bed of Stewart River, a tributary of the Yukon?

2. What are the conditions of the proposed lease referred to in the said advertisement?

3. Have any tenders been received? If so, from whom and for what amounts?

4. What is the nationality of the tenderers?

5. Is it the intention of the Government to accept any of the tenders? If so, which?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say: 1. The following newspapers were authorized to insert an advertisement inviting tenders for a lease for the exclusive right to dredge for gold in a part of the bed of Stewart River:—The "Times," Victoria, B.C., the Vancouver "Daily World," Vancouver, B.C., the "Tribune," Calgary, N.W.T., the "Tribune," Winnipeg, Man., the "Free Press," Ottawa, the "Journal," Ottawa, the "Globe" Toronto, the Toronto "Star," the "Telegram," Toronto, the "Herald," Montreal, "La Patrie," Montreal, the "Witness," Montreal, the "Freeholder," Cornwall, the "Canadian Freeman," Kingston, the Advertising Printing Company, London, Ont. All the above named newspapers, with the exception of the last three mentioned, were authorized to insert the advertisement three times a week during the month of April. The last three mentioned papers were authorized to insert it three times. 2. The conditions of the proposed lease are annexed hereto. 3. Three tenders have been received, but have not yet been opened. Until the tenders are opened, no reply can be given to questions 4 and 5.

Conditions under which a lease may be issued for the exclusive right to dredge for gold in a part of the bed of Stewart River, a tributary of the Yukon River, North-west Territories.

1. It will be necessary for the successful tenderer to furnish evidence within three months from the date upon which his tender is accepted, establishing to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior his financial ability to carry on the proposed undertaking.

2. The returns of the survey of the one hundred consecutive miles of the river selected shall be filed in the Department of the Interior within two years from the date of the acceptance of the tender.

3. The term of the lease shall be twenty years, and the royalty 25 cents per ounce of gold on the gross production, shall be payable monthly during the season when the dredges are working.

4. A return under affidavit shall be made once in each year from the date of the lease, showing the progress made by the lessees in their undertaking.

5. If it is found that the lessees are not progressing with their work to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior, he may cancel the lease.

6. The lease shall be subject to the rights of all persons who have received, or may receive, entries for location under the mining regulations; provided that no one shall obstruct the river so as to stop the dredge from working or from passing up or down the river, or build wing-dams above or below any dredge within a distance of 1,000 feet; but the persons who have obtained entries in the manner described, shall not be prevented from depositing tailings in the river.

7. The privilege to be granted shall not be allowed to interfere in any way with the general right of the public to use the Stewart River for navigation and other purposes; the free navigation of the river shall not be impeded by the deposit of "tailings" in such manner as to form bars or banks in the channel thereof; the current or stream shall not be obstructed in any material degree by the accumulation of such deposits; and upon being satisfied that these conditions, or any of them, are not being complied with by the lessees, the Minister of the Interior may cancel the lease.

8. The lease to be issued shall reserve all roads, ways, bridges, drains and all other public works and improvements now existing, or which may hereafter be made in, upon or under any part of the river, and the power to enter and construct the same. It shall also provide that the lessees shall not damage or obstruct any public ways, drains, bridges, works and improvements now, or hereafter to be made, upon, in, over, through or under the river, and that they will substantially bridge or cover and protect all the cuts, flumes, ditches, and sluices, and all pits and dangerous places, at all points where they may be crossed by a public highway or frequented path or trail, to the satisfaction of the Minister of the Interior.

9. The lessees will also be granted the privilege of locating in sections of five miles or less in length and ten chains in breadth, ground in the bed of the river within the hundred miles selected that is not submerged at high water, but which is low and formed by the changing of the bed; but, before any dredging is done on any of these locations, entry therefor shall be obtained from the agent of Dominion Lands or other officer acting under authority of the Minister of the Interior in that behalf in the district in which the claim is situated; and entry shall not be given for any portion of a location for which entry has been granted as a placer claim under the mining regulations, or for any portion which will interfere with the operations of any person holding an entry for a placer claim; and it shall be optional with the Minister of the Interior whether one or more locations may be entered for by the lessees at the same time. The royalty to be paid on the gross production from claims of this class shall be 25 cents per ounce of gold.

10. An area of land, not exceeding 160 acres, will be granted to the lessees free of charge for the construction thereon of works necessary for the prosecution of their operations, the grant to consist of such parcels, and to be situated at such points, as may be determined upon by the agent of Dominion Lands for the district or the officer acting under authority of the Minister of the Interior in that behalf; and such grant may be made upon application at any time after the agent or other officer has certified to the Minister of the Interior that not less than three dredges belonging to the lessees, properly equipped for mining operations, have arrived at Stewart River.

11. A permit will be issued to the lessees to cut whatever timber is required for the operation and maintenance of their works, upon payment of the dues prescribed by the timber regulations.

CASCUMPEC BUOY SERVICE.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Have tenders been called for the Cascumpec buoy service in Prince Edward Island?

2. If so, did the notice calling for tenders contain the usual condition that the lowest or any tender need not be accepted?

3. If these words were omitted, what was the reason?

4. Has the contract been let, and at what figure?

5. Has the contract been awarded to the lowest tenderer? If not, why not? What is the name of the contractor?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). 1. Yes, tenders were invited up to the 21st April last. 2. The notice did not contain this condition; it was in the customary form. 3. Notices inviting tenders for buoy contracts have not in any instances contained this condition. 4. The tenders have not yet been determined upon by me. I only saw them an hour ago. Complaints have been made that sufficient time was not given to enable tenders to be made after the notices were posted up, which will be considered before a conclusion is reached.

CUSTOMS SUB-COLLECTOR, ORWELL, P.E.I.

Mr. MARTIN asked :

1. Who is acting as sub-collector or sub-inspector of customs at Orwell, in Prince Edward Island?

2. Is a permanent official to be appointed?

3. When did the services of the late sub-inspector or sub-collector terminate?

4. Was his salary paid up to the date of the termination of his services?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. No person. 2. No. 3. 1st December, 1896, when the outpost was abolished by Order in Council. 4. Yes.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM MCKENZIE, DREDGE "CANADA."

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER asked :

1. Have the services of Captain William McKenzie, master of the Government dredge "Canada," been dispensed with?

2. If so, at what date and for what reason?

3. Was an investigation had prior to his dismissal?

4. If so, when did it take place?

5. If Captain McKenzie was dismissed after the late local elections on 20th April, why was action taken then and not prior to that date?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). 1. Yes. 2, 3 and 4. The engagements of dredge men are only for one season, and Captain McKenzie was not re-engaged for the present season. 5. The action in this case has not been taken before date mentioned, because the dredge on which Captain McKenzie was engaged last season was not then in commission.

VALLEYFIELD MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

Is the Honourable the Postmaster General aware that the mail carrier between the Canada Atlantic Railway station at Valleyfield and the Valleyfield post office detains the afternoon mail over an hour and a half? Will the Postmaster General give instructions to the effect that the service be done in a more regular way?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The department is not aware of there being any such delay as that referred to, but inquiries have been set on foot, and, if such a delay exists, steps will be taken to prevent it in future.

BEAUHARNOIS CANAL.—DISMISSALS.

Mr. BERGERON asked :

1. Is it true that Joseph Cardinal, Napoléon Mathieu, Alphonse Julien, Amable Rufionge, lockmasters, and Homer Monette, lockman, all on the Beauharnois Canal, have been dismissed from their employment?

2. If so, why?

3. On whose recommendation have they been dismissed?

4. Was an investigation held?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). It is true that the persons referred to have been dismissed from the Beauharnois Canal. They were dismissed because they took an extreme and offensive part during the elections in June last. Dismissal took place on the representation of the Hon. J. Israel Tarte. No investigation was considered necessary, the Minister speaking from personal knowledge.

Mr. MARTIN.

HARRISON LAKE REGION.—GOLD DISCOVERIES.

Mr. MORRISON asked :

Is the Government aware of any gold discoveries in the Harrison Lake region, British Columbia?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The Government has no information in regard to gold discoveries in the Harrison region, except such information as is contained in the last annual report of the Minister of Mines in the province of British Columbia. That report, of course, is public property, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Morrison) can consult it for himself, if he so desires. If there be any gold discoveries there, they will be, according to the best of our knowledge, upon provincial lands, and will fall under the administration of the provincial government.

HARRISON RIVER RAPIDS.

Mr. MORRISON asked :

Is it the Intention of the Government this year to make an appropriation for the improvement of the Harrison River Rapids?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). It is not the intention of the Government to make an appropriation this year for the improvement of the Harrison River rapids, but it is the intention to have an examination of the said rapids made. In the meantime the Snag boat "Samson" has been detailed to remove snags in that river, thereby improving the navigation of that river, as much as possible.

THE BREMNER FURS SEIZURE.

Mr. DAVIS moved for :

Copies of all letters, reports and other papers in possession of the Government in any way relating to the claim of one Bremner, of Bresaylor, N.W.T., for compensation for furs alleged to have been taken possession of by General Middleton, during the trouble in the North-west Territories.

He said : In making this motion in connection with the claim of Mr. Bremner, of Battleford, I am quite aware that I am bringing up a question that was discussed some years ago in this House ; and although this question was discussed and a great deal of evidence was taken before a committee, up to the present time Mr. Bremner has never been paid for the furs taken from him. Now, previous to the rebellion of 1895, Mr. Bremner was a fur trader near Battleford, in the district of Saskatchewan. He had traders acting as agents for him further west, and he was a wealthy man. In the spring of the year previous to the breaking out of the rebellion, these agents had brought in their furs to be stored. The rebellion then broke out, and Mr. Bremner sent his furs for safe-keeping to Battleford, where they were put in charge of the North-west Mounted Police. I believe that General Middleton was in command of the Government troops in that country at the time, and that he and another gentleman in the Indian Department, Mr. Hayter Reed, took possession of those furs—I think evidence was brought before this House to that effect. However, I happen to have a letter here that I received the other day from Mr. Warden, who is in the Indian Department. But before I read this letter I must say that it was very strange that Mr. Warden at that time, although he was a Liberal and not in sympathy with the party in power, received a Government position. I do not know why he received this Government position, because it was the first case in which a Liberal in the North-west Territories was appointed to a position by the Conservative Government. The position, however, was only a small one, worth $600 a year. We also know that a gentleman named Mr. Clink, another Liberal, was appointed as Indian agent at a salary of $1,200 a year. Well, it was obvious to us that these gentlemen must have been possessed of certain information which they did not wish to give at the time of the investigation, and for that reason we assume they must have been given these positions. Now, however, things have changed, and Mr. Warden has written me a letter in connection with the Bremner seizure, which I will read to the House :

Battleford, 26th April, 1897.

T. O. Davis, Esq., M.P., Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 13th instant, re Bremner furs, I beg to make the following statement :—

In the summer of 1885, just after the rebellion, Mr. Hayter Reed and the late Mr. Bedson came to my room, at the Q. M. store, Battleford, about four o'clock in the morning, saying they wanted to get some of the furs lying in the store, as the General had confiscated them. They wanted a parcel put up for the General, and one each for themselves. I told them that as soon as the storeman, Constable Dorion, came in, he would attend to their wants. Dorion came in about 5 a.m., and I told him to give these gentlemen what furs they required, and that he could pack them in some of the empty saddle-boxes. Dorion, Reed and Benson then went to the storehouse and packed the furs. Some time in the forenoon, a team came from the steamboat landing, and took the three cases away to the steamboat.

Now, Sir, I think that goes to show that Mr. Hayter Reed and Mr. Bedson, two Government employees, took those furs. I do not know what you call it here, but the people in the North-west Territories would call that stealing. I claim that it is the duty of this Government to see that this man is remunerated. Those furs were taken by an agent of the Government, and I think the Government is legally and morally bound to pay that claim. I read a great deal of the discussion that took place on this subject some time ago, I think six or seven years ago ; I read the speech that was made by the Hon. Mr. Blake, in which he went all over the facts, but I claim that his speech was not to the point. If Mr. Bremner had been a rebel, it might have been all right ; but he was not a rebel. Bremner was a loyal citizen, and as such he should have had the protection of General Middleton for his life and his property. But in place of that we find General Middleton, and others with him, took this man's property. Now, I claim that as he was a loyal citizen, he had a right to the protection of the Government troops ; his property should have been protected, but it was not protected, and was taken from him. Therefore, I think the Government are justly bound to pay this man's claim. There are precedents for this. The Government has paid some millions of dollars of claims of people in the North-west Territories, whose goods were taken ; we do not know who took them, and still the Government has recognized those claims as legal. We know that at Batoche they paid the claim of Navier Batoche, amounting to $20,000 ; they paid a certain gentleman by the name of Solomon Venne $15,000 ; and they paid a gentleman by the name of Baptiste Boyer. We find that all those gentlemen were belonging to the faithful, while other men who did not belong to the faithful have not to this day got one cent for the property taken from them. Now, I claim that if it is right and just for the Government to pay a million dollars for those claims in the North-west Territories, then it is right and just that this man, not being a rebel but a loyal citizen, should be paid the same as any other citizen.

Mr. LISTER. Some years ago the claim of Mr. Bremner was brought to my attention and I deemed it my duty as a member of this House to call the attention of the then Government and Parliament to the claims of this man, who, in my opinion, has been most unjustly dealt with. Prior to the rebellion of 1886, Mr. Bremner had been for years a successful fur trader in the North-west Territories. At the time of the breaking out of the rebellion he was a man in very comfortable circumstances as a result of his own labour and industry for years before. When the rebellion broke out Mr. Bremner had in his possession the whole catch of furs from the previous winter, amounting, according to my information, to some $7,000 or $8,000, furs of a very valuable character indeed, as the House will understand when I say they amounted to that sum of money.

The rebellion broke out. Bremner was at one of the points, with his stock of furs, preparing to send them to market, and without any notice whatever officers in command of the Canadian forces seized his furs and arrested him as a rebel. He was taken to Regina and imprisoned for months. When the rebels were tried there, the Crown did not find sufficient testimony to justify even placing this man on his trial, and he was released without a trial. When he returned home, he found his furs had disappeared; somebody had taken away all he had in the world, the catch of furs of the previous winter. Information which I obtained induced me to make a charge, and it was referred to a special committee of this House, at the instance of the Government. It is not necessary that I should not go into all the testimony that was taken, suffice it to say that the evidence proved conclusively that this man had been wrongfully deprived of his furs, and it was proved with equal clearness that General Middleton and others, officers the officials of this country, had taken those furs away. It was proved that a portion of those furs was brought down to Ontario, that a part of them was brought, I believe, to the city of Ottawa. The evidence was sufficiently strong to make it convenient for General Middleton to resign his position; but that did not pay the unfortunate man who lost the earnings of a lifetime. Bremner was released. His property, as my hon. friend has stated to-day was, in plain Saxon, stolen—stolen by the officials and officers of this Government.

An hon. MEMBER. Of this Government?

Mr. LISTER. Of the old Government. Governments, however, never die. Honest men may come in and dishonest men may go out, but the Queen's Government continues all the same. Sir, General Middleton resigned, he left the country; but poor Bremner, the half-breed of the North-west, never could get hon. gentlemen opposite to extend to him one atom of simple justice. The man since then has been afflicted, paralyzed; he is ruined, he is a pauper to-day, and what my hon. friend asks is that a measure of common justice should be meted out to this man. Hundreds of claimants in that country were paid under the report of the commission issued by the Government to investigate claims for damages alleged to have been sustained during that rebellion; but for some reasons, which I never could fathom, Bremner's claim was ignored by the Government. At last they said that in law Bremner is not entitled to recover anything because his property was taken by the military forces of Canada. That is good law, I believe; but in a case of this kind I doubt the wisdom of any Government setting up such a defence. This man was not a rebel. He was never brought to trial, he left the court-room in Regina a free man as regards any charge of rebellion against the country; and if it can be shown that officials or officers deprived him of his property, surely it is the duty of the Government to make him some compensation. The letter which my hon. friend has just read I have never seen before; but the statements made in it seem to prove that Canadian officials took those furs without lawful authority and they were divided between military men and Canadian officials. It was impossible at that late date to get all the evidence that might have been obtained, if we had been in a position to bring the people here and get their evidence before the committee. The evidence set out in this letter was not before the committee, but the evidence submitted was sufficiently strong and convincing to satisfy every man who listened to it, every member of the committee, and, I believe, every member of the Government, that the property of this poor half-breed had been wrongfully taken, and that he had been deprived of his furs; and if the Government is satisfied from the evidence taken by the committee that such is the fact, then, by every rule of justice, honour and honesty, the Government is bound to make compensation to that man.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL FROM NEWBURGH TO KINGSTON.

Mr. WILSON moved for:

Copies of correspondence and papers cancelling the contract with Mr. Finkle for carrying the mail from Newburgh to Kingston by the way of Camden East, Wilton, Odessa, &c. Also copies of tenders for carrying the mail from Newburgh to Kingston by the way of Camden East, Wilton, Odessa, &c.; together with all correspondence, reports and papers in connection with this contract.

Mr. Speaker, I understand that Mr. Finkle had his contract renewed for four years by the old Government, without any tenders having been asked for the work. The new Postmaster General, as has been his custom, cancelled the contract and called for tenders, and tenders were received by his department. I understand that one Edward Martin was the lowest tenderer, and that the contract was awarded to him, and he was notified by the post office inspector at Kingston, Mr. Merrick, on 23rd February, that his contract had been accepted and that he should commence work on April 1st. Martin did what any man would do, he made all preparations necessary to fulfil his contract. On the 19th March he was told by the same post office inspector, not to make any preparation, because it was under consideration by the department that they were likely to change the route. Matters continued in that way until the latter part of March, when he was notified not to commence to fulfil his contract on the 1st of April. I think this is very unfair to Mr. Martin. He was the lowest tenderer, and he had been notified that his tender had been accepted, and he made preparations to carry out the contract. I do not think that the present Postmaster General or any other hon. gentleman in this House would ignore a contract of that kind, and allow a man to suffer loss in consequence. I understand that the tenders of two other persons beside Mr. Martin, were lower than that of Mr. Finkle for this service, and if there was any change contemplated in the route, or with reference to the contract, the Government might have asked for new tenders, or more proper still, Mr. Martin should have had a fair show to do the work as he had made the arrangements to do so. I hope that when the papers come down they will show that things are not so bad as I anticipate they are. In any event, the Postmaster General should see that Mr. Martin, who is in ordinary circumstances, should not suffer loss by reason of the action of the department. He should not be put to the inconvenience and expense of selling traps which he had for other purposes, buying a team of horses, and making arrangements to carry out his contract with the Government. I trust that the Postmaster General will at least indemnify him for that.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection whatever to the order of the House being carried for the production of the papers in question. I cannot speak with any knowledge of the facts, as I know nothing whatever in regard to the matter, but I am perfectly certain that my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) will be satisfied when the papers are produced, that everything was conducted strictly in the public interest. It sometimes does happen that after tenders have been invited, the community awakened to the fact that perhaps a more convenient service would be better, and in such cases these representations have to be considered. It may be that this is one of the cases in point. If, however, the notice given to the successful tenderer was such as to have justified him in going to the expense to carry out his contract, and if the public interest afterwards called for the change of service, it would be very reasonable indeed that this official should receive some compensation for the expense he might be put to.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will investigate the matter thoroughly, and I am sure I will do what my hon. friend (Mr. Wilson) would under similar circumstances do himself.

Mr. WILSON. Hear, hear.

Motion agreed to.

BEAMSVILLE POST OFFICE—MR. FAIRBROTHER.

Mr. McCLEARY moved for :

Copies of all letters and correspondence between the Government, or any members thereof, referring in any way to the dismissal of Mr. W. D. Fairbrother as postmaster at Beamsville, with a copy of the charges and by whom such were made.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on the motion to adjourn the House a few days ago I endeavoured to say something in connection with this matter, but you very properly called my attention to the fact, that I had this resolution on the Order paper, and so I was obliged to postpone my remarks until this hour. It will be hardly necessary for me to go over the ground I did a few days ago, in connection with this Beamsville postmaster who has been dismissed from his position. Suffice it to say, that I read to the House the charges that were made against Mr. Fairbrother, and which were given by the Postmaster General as the reasons why that gentleman has been dismissed from the office. I quite agree with the statement, that if any of those charges were true, Mr. Fairbrother was not entitled to continue in his position as postmaster at Beamsville. My greatest objection to the whole procedure is, that the hon. Postmaster General refused to give Mr. Fairbrother an investigation into the truth or falsity of these charges. The House will remember, Sir, these charges were of such a character that they would deprive Mr. Fairbrother of his honour, and his status as an honourable business man in the community. He was, therefore, entitled to receive at the hands of the Postmaster General, far more generous consideration than he did. The first intimation that Mr. Fairbrother had in reference to this matter, was a letter that he received from the post office inspector in the following words:—

I beg to inform you that I have this day received from Ottawa intimation of your dismissal from the postmastership at Beamsville. You will be notified later on as to the date on which the transfer will take place.

Yours truly,
(Sgd.) R. N. BARKER.

Mr. Fairbrother immediately wrote to Mr. Barker asking him for an explanation, and Mr. Barker in reply, said :

I am in receipt of your letter of the 21st instant, but I am unable to give you the information that you ask for. Your successor in office is Mr. Alexander Allan.

Not having received the information from the post office inspector, Mr. Fairbrother immediately wrote to the Postmaster General and asked him for an explanation as to why he had been dismissed. The answer that he got from the department is as follows:—

I am directed to acknowledge your letter of the 23rd instant, protesting against your dismissal from the postmastership at Beamsville.

Your obedient servant,
THE SECRETARY.

That is the reply that Mr. Fairbrother got from the department when he pleaded for an investigation or at least for a statement of the reasons why he was dismissed. Now, the hon. the Premier declared before this Parliament last session, that an entirely different line of procedure would be taken in reference to the dismissal of officials. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) declared, that no official would be dismissed without an investigation, unless of course, the Minister in charge of the department directly knew that the officer was guilty of offensive partisanship. Let me read his own words :

No Minister would pretend to dismiss any official unless he had an opportunity to defend himself ; but when the case is within the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, under such circumstances there is no cause for inquiry. When the Minister is not cognizant of the facts himself, whenever a case is brought to him by extraneous evidence, these statements must be substantiated, and every man must be given an opportunity to defend himself.

I ask the Prime Minister, the Premier of this country, the leader of this House, what attitude he is taking to-day in this connection ? Is he prepared to defend the conduct of the Postmaster General in dismissing a man whom he the Prime Minister pledged himself before this Parliament to protect ? He gave his word as a man of honour, as the leader of the Government, as the Premier of this country, that no official would be dismissed without having an opportunity to defend himself, but, Sir, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has not shown himself equal to the occasion. He has permitted somebody, whoever it may be, to belittle him in the eyes of the community and to belittle him in the eyes of this House as well, when he allows himself to be dragged down from his high position as leader of this Government to listen to what petty charges may be brought in by individual members of the party, and when he descends to gratify the spleen or the vicious desire of the heelers of the party to get positions for their friends. This dismissal of Mr. Fairbrother is more than an ordinary one, because he was an exceptionally good man. He was the postmaster of the village in which the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) resides. He has not only the good-will of the citizens generally, but, without any allegiance to party whatever, he has the sympathy and cordial support of both Reformers and Conservatives alike in that municipality. I want to read, for the information of the House, an editorial that was published in the Beamsville " Express " of April 7th :

In the Toronto " Globe " of yesterday we noticed an item regarding this subject, originating in a reply to a question proposed by Mr. McCleary, and answered by the Minister of the Interior. In the answer given by the Minister, Mr. Fairbrother, the recent incumbent of the office, is accused of being guilty of many offences, some of them very serious ones, any of which, if proven, might be sufficient to procure his dismissal. But the question is, have the offences, or any of them, been proven ? Have the accuser and accused been brought face to face, so that an opportunity was afforded for disproving the charges made ?

If this has not been done—and we believe it has not—there has been a serious failure of justice. We have no personal object to answer in the matter, but we do love British fair-play, and so far as we are able to ascertain the views of a large portion of the community, irrespective of political leanings, they judge that Mr. Fairbrother has not had a fair opportunity of vindicating himself. His character has been seriously maligned by some one, and all he asks is that a thorough investigation takes place. To this we think he has a right.

Will any one question the right of Mr. Fairbrother to have an investigation in this matter ? The publisher of this paper is not a political friend of Mr. Fairbrother. The Liberals in that neighbourhood were strongly opposed to his dismissal. Let me read to you a letter written by a Liberal, whom my hon. friend from Lincoln will recognize as a warm supporter of his own—a letter which was published in the Beamsville " Express " of April 14th :

To the Editor of the " Express " :

Dear Sir.—The charges made in the Commons against Mr. W. D. Fairbrother, the Beamsville postmaster, as published in the daily " Globe " of Tuesday, are to us residents here simply astounding. The catalogue of offences, any one of which, if proven, would be enough to remove him, stretch out over one-third of a column of the paper. Burglary and arson are pretty much all that is not down in the list. The exceedingly off-hand style of throwing out in the House and through the press over the country charges affecting the character and conduct of one occupying a public and responsible position is not edifying. I suppose the privileges of Parliament may protect those who can claim its protection, but there surely must be somewhere a weighty responsibility attaching to those who have originated and given currency to these damaging allegations.

As regards the merits, nine out of ten of the persons doing business at the Beamsville post office, and knowing in what manner the office is conducted, will readily testify, if opportunity be given, that the office has never been administered so satisfactorily and upon such straight business lines, as it has since Mr. Fairbrother came into the office. He is really an exceptionally good postmaster—young, active, courteous, very regular and attentive to duty. I do not know how any one can speak too highly of him as a public servant in an office requiring uncommon patience and kindness of disposition, with great quickness, accuracy and activity of mind and habit. Not myself giving very much time to politics, I yet have a warm interest in clean, good government, and am a Reformer. I am in a reasonable degree certain that Mr. Fairbrother has not discriminated as is alleged, in favour of Tory against Reform literature as to post office delivery or circulation, that he was not a Tory canvasser outside, nor a Tory scrutineer inside, any polling place last June, and that he has not been an active partisan anywhere at any time. Negatives cannot be proved, but certainly, if any of the charges of political partisanship are true, they are susceptible of proof—in an open, face to face investigation. As he was too young to be put upon the last Dominion lists, his sins must be within somebody's recollection besides the person furnishing the information to the Government.

There is in our village a standing Reform committee, or political organization to look after Reform interests. We have a president, a secretary, and a lot of good Reform members. I have not of late attended the meetings. I do not understand that there has ever been any complaint made against the postmaster in the party caucus on account of any unfairness or for any other reason, or that any proceedings whatever have been taken to effect his dismissal. I think the rumoured dismissal first, and the undreamed of list of charges since, came upon my brethren of the local Reform committee, as it certainly did upon me—a thunderbolt out of a blue sky.

In singular consistency, while summarily dismissing a young, capable and popular official, the Government appear to have appointed as his successor a most estimable gentleman certainly, but one who has reached the ripe age of eighty. With the honour and the wisdom that come with many years, there has come also to my old friend, Alexander Allan, some of the counterbalancing weaknesses and infirmities that attend old age. He is partially blind; he has had for some years a disabling nervous affection of the hand or fingers, so that he writes with great difficulty and very slowly and tremulously. It would not be very much aside from the truth to say that he cannot write at all.

Now, keeping in mind that the village post office is not being run for the sake of the postmaster, but for the convenience of the public; that it is maintained for the public by the money of the public, and that the administration that we have to deal with has lately come from the people; that it is a Reform Government, and so in a measure pledged to govern according to the wishes of the people—having this in mind, there is reason to believe that this case will not be closed without due and full inquiry, and, if need be, a reversal of the decision that has been announced as having been reached upon ex parte statements.

The continuation of the letter does not pertain to the matter in question. This letter was written by Mr. Van Norman, of Beamsville, who is and has always been an active Liberal. He states that this Government is pledged to Liberal principles and to deal out even-handed justice to the people of this country; and he hopes this case will not be closed without justice being done to Mr. Fairbrother. Mr. Fairbrother has been thrown out of his former employment, and the elderly gentleman to whom Mr. Van Norman refers, Mr. Allan, has superseded him in the position.

Mr. TAYLOR. How old is he?

Mr. McCLEARY. Eighty years of age; that is what Mr. Van Norman says.

Mr. HUGHES. The new postmaster is eighty?

Mr. McCLEARY. Yes, eighty years of age.

An hon. MEMBER. That is the old postmaster.

Mr. McCLEARY. I do not think Mr. Allan intends to be postmaster very long. He may hold the position nominally, but he has two assistants now, if I am rightly informed, and he is more of a figure-head than anything else, just to tide over the little skirmish for the position. Coming back to those charges, which were given by the hon. Postmaster General as the reason why Mr. Fairbrother was dismissed, I wish to give to this House, and through it, to the people, the reply of Mr. Fairbrother to those charges. Mr. Fairbrother says:

In answer to the charges made against me as postmaster of Beamsville, I submit the following, which I declare to be true:—

Charge 1.—I sold both Reform and Conservative papers. I did not try to force the sale of Conservative papers more than I did Reform, or Reform more than I did Conservative. I sold more "Globes" than any other paper I handled. From April 1, 1895, to April 1, 1896, my account with the "Globe" Printing Company was $110.69; from April 1, 1896, to April 1, 1897, it was $113.48. From April, 1895, to April, 1896, my account with the "Mail-Empire" Printing Company was $74.32 and from April, 1896, to April, 1897, it was $58.01. I did not give away any papers to try and influence any one in voting; in fact, I do not remember giving any away. I never held back any Reform literature or literature of any kind.

Charge 2.—I never attended any political caucuses in the interests of either party, and was never on any committees or in any committee rooms. I went to a public meeting in the city of St. Catharines to hear Sir Charles Tupper speak. I did not take any part in the procession or meeting while there. I simply went to hear the speaking, and I came away before it was over. I also attended the meetings that Mr. Gibson and Mr. Rykert held in this village. It was late when I got to both of them. I took no part in either of them.

Charge 3.—I always tried to accommodate every one, and to make the office as convenient as possible. I opened my office never later than 7 a.m., and often at 6.30 a.m., and kept it open from then until 8 p.m., and very often till 9 or 10 p.m. I have always tried to be as prompt as possible in serving the public and to give them a good, efficient service, and always tried to live up to the rules prescribed.

Charge 4.—The assistant had been in the habit of putting all the mail for people of the same name into the one box, and had also been giving people boxes when they did not rent them. I spoke to these people about the matter, and the consequence was that a good number of them rented separate boxes, thereby making it more convenient for the public and for the postmaster as well. Those that did not care to rent a box asked me to put their mail in the general delivery. I have that arranged in alphabetical order. There are just as many general delivery boxes now as there ever was.

Charge 5.—I have never made a practice of reading postcards. Sometimes, when cards are illegibly addressed or have been dropped in without any addresses on at all, I have had to turn them over so as to find out who dropped them in, so as to find out where to distribute them, but I have never read any cards just for curiosity sake, and have never been spoken to by, or been cautioned by, my assistant for so doing.

Charge 6.—I emphatically declare that I was not scrutineer at the last election, nor was I even asked to be. I did not assist in bringing any voters up to vote. I was not in a rig at all that day. I did not take any active part in the election. I did not ask any one to vote for either candidate or even ask any one how he was going to vote. I was up in front of the election booth for a short time in the afternoon, when there was not much doing in the office, watching the people come up to vote, but I did not try to influence any one in voting, or speak to any one about how he was going to vote. I do not think I was out of the office, except for my meals, for more than an hour all that day.

W. D. FAIRBROTHER.

This is the declaration of Mr. Fairbrother. He has not only given his word but he went before a justice of the peace and made the following affidavit:—

I, William D. Fairbrother, of the village of Beamsville, in the county of Lincoln, do solemnly declare that the statement made by me in reference to the management of the Beamsville Post Office, and hereunto attached, to be true in every particular, and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

Declared before me, at Beamsville, this twelfth day of April, A.D. 1897.

DAVID DAVIS, J.P.

Now, Mr. Fairbrother has given his affidavit that those charges, which were sent broadcast over the country by the hon. Postmaster General against him, with the purpose of destroying his character and standing in the business community, are untrue in every particular, and all he asked from the Postmaster General was the opportunity of establishing that they were untrue. That opportunity, however, was not granted to him, and, therefore, I have conceived it to be my duty, as the representative of the people in that neighbourhood—because I may say there is a sort of little reciprocity between my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) and myself in this regard; my hon. friend looks after some of my constituents, and while Mr. Fairbrother is a constituent of his, I am only just extending to him a sort of reciprocity in that regard—therefore, I have conceived it to be my duty to bring this matter before the House. I have stated this question fairly and truthfully. The hon. Postmaster General, I hope, will reconsider the matter. I think that, in honour to himself, in justice to Mr. Fairbrother, for the good name of the Government, this matter should not be allowed to rest and Mr. Fairbrother sent adrift without the benefit of an inquiry. I ask the hon. First Minister, who pledged himself before Parliament, last summer, to give every public servant accused a chance to defend himself, to adhere to that pledge now. If he desires to receive the plaudits and approval of the right-thinking people of this country, he should stand by his declarations in Parliament. Mr. Fairbrother was ruthlessly and heartlessly dismissed without any reasonable ground whatever for his dismissal.

Mr. GIBSON. Before this motion is carried, I think it is due to myself to say a few words regarding it, but first of all, I desire to return my thanks to my hon. friend, who has just taken his seat, for the courtesy he has extended to me by not bringing up this matter in my absence. A great deal has been said through the public press about the age of this gentleman who has been appointed postmaster at Beamsville. Well, I wish to call the attention of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition to the fact that this man is just exactly his own age, and I am bound to admit—and I think every hon. gentleman in this House will bear me out—that the hon. gentleman does not consider himself old, and I am sure the gentleman who has been appointed postmaster at Beamsville is just as active and vigorous as my hon. friend who leads the Opposition, and who, I hope, will be able to lead the Opposition for many years to come.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot allow that to pass because, according to my hon. friend behind me, this young and new postmaster is eighty years of age.

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman, if I am correctly informed, is between 75 and 76 years of age. However, like the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition, he is a man of experience, having had some experience as postmaster some years ago. Unfortunately for him, through no fault of his own, he lost all his money. However, to come back to the appointment at Beamsville, the hon. member for Welland did not enlighten the House as to how that appointment came about. I think, perhaps, the less that is said about that the better. But I want to say, in a word, that this young man was not summarily dismissed. The young man of course, after the election in June, heard all kinds of rumours that he was to be dismissed. One Saturday evening he came down to my house and asked me candidly if it was my intention to recommend his dismissal from the service. I said: Certainly not so long as you behave yourself. I think I am well enough known in the neighbourhood from which I come to be certain of unanimous endorsement when I say that I never have undertaken the dismissal of a man even from my own employ for voting against me or for holding opinions on political questions different from my own. I certainly would not have treated this young man differently in that respect from one of my own workmen. I can say here that I have never asked a man in my employ to vote for me. When this young man came to me, I gave him my assurance that so long as he behaved himself, I would not recommend his removal from office. Now, how did he get the office? His father-in-law got the office for him. Prior to that the father-in-law had held it for eighteen years and had farmed it out to Mr. Zimmerman. When the young man married Mr. Bennett's daughter, Mr. Bennett came and informed Mr. Zimmerman that he would have to make way for Mr. Fairbrother, but that, so far as Mr. Zimmerman was concerned, the emoluments he had received would be the same as before. How did this young man act with his assistant postmaster? Did he act as his father-in-law had done? This boy, not yet of age, came into office, and his assistant taught him to telegraph, taught him the business of the office; and then, he, feeling that he had my assurance that nothing would happen to him, began to abuse his assistant. Tory-like, he wanted everything for himself. He cut his assistant's salary down to $20 or $25 a month. I understand that the receipts from the office, the post office, the telegraph and sale of newspapers was something like $900 or $1,000. This money was formerly divided equally between Mr. Bennett and Mr. Zimmerman, and this was Mr. Zimmerman's position until Mr. Fairbrother felt himself strong enough to say to this man who had shown him such kindness: I cannot discharge you, but I will cut your salary down and make your position as uncomfortable as possible. Mr. Zimmerman then came to me with the complaint that has since been recorded in "Hansard," and stated further that this young man, Fairbrother, left the windows open in the winter time, but protected himself with a glass screen so that the wind and frost should not affect him. On more than one occasion, Mr. Zimmerman came to my house and made complaints to me. I said: Well, Mr. Zimmerman, my time is not always at my own disposal, and I cannot listen to your complaints. I put them in writing, like a man, and I will send them to the Postmaster General, and let the Postmaster General deal with them as he sees fit. Now, the hon. member for Welland says that there is no truth in those charges. How does he know?

Mr. McCLEARY. The sworn statement of the gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. The sworn statement of a gentleman who, in my presence, on election day, stood checking off the people who went in to vote, the man who, with his father-in-law took turns in checking off the voters in my presence. Is not my word in this House as good as the statement of a boy sent down to an hon. member? I leave that to the judgment of the House. Not satisfied with checking off those who were going in to vote, he jumped into a rig and brought up voters in my presence. And he dared to tell the hon. member that he never neglected his duty on election day. Mr. Zimmerman's statement is as true as the other, for he not only neglected his duty on election day, but on some others. I need give no better proof than to say that he admitted that he went down to hear Sir Charles Tupper in the afternoon in the city of St. Catharines—to hear that hon. gentleman plead for my opponent. But it is only fair that I should say that the hon. gentleman hardly mentioned my opponent's name but told the people: If you cannot vote for Mr. Rykert, vote for the National Policy. Now, my hon. friend from Welland is very much shocked. He talked about the Turkish atrocities. Well, I will give him a sample of the Turkish atrocities that were committed by some of his leaders some years ago. Let me read a letter that was read in this House last session:

Department of Railways and Canals.

Dear Sir,—Referring to your letters of 17th November and 9th and 17th February, relating to the dismissal of your son from the service of the Intercolonial Railway, I have to state that the reason for his dismissal was that he took an active part in opposition to the Government at the last election. This, as you will readily understand, no Government officer will be permitted to do, and your son's action was so conspicuous that it could not be passed over.

Yours faithfully,

CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, along the same line, we have another case, somewhat similar; and, if the House will pardon me for a moment, I will give this illustration. A gentleman writing to one of the hon. members of this House that he had been removed from office without cause, states as follows:—

In 1884 I was sent to Port Arthur from Winnipeg, in the customs service, to assist Collector Nicholson, who was the only officer at that port at the time. I was there until the close of 1887, when I was dismissed to make room for a secretary of the Conservative Association of Port Arthur and one of their most active workers. In all my time in the customs service I took no part in politics whatever, but somehow they found me out, and I had to go.

Now, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who answered this gentleman's complaint, stated:

Department has a high appreciation of your services as an officer, but the Government could not overlook the claims of the Port Arthur Conservatives.

No fault to find with the officer, but they had to make room for "Port Arthur Conservatives." We had another case which was read to this House last session:

The position had been taken from me by Mr. Macdonnell, the late Conservative member, and the reason given by him, which the post office inspector informed me, was that I had gone Grit in the preceding election.

Mr. LISTER. Who signed that?

Mr. GIBSON. I cannot tell you now. I deny the statement that has been read to this House by my hon. friend from Welland, and I state on my honour and on my responsibility as a member of this House that every word I stated in regard to Mr. Fairbrother is true. And I am not only prepared to make that statement to this House, but I am prepared to make an affidavit in a court of justice. Now, my hon. friend spoke about the hunger of the Grit party.

Mr. TAYLOR. Hear, hear.

Mr. GIBSON. You are hungry now. In 1878 no Liberal who was not fastened down under the Civil Service Act was allowed to remain in office for a month, they were turned out in all directions. Men were removed, not on account of their inability to do the work, but because they were Liberals. I knew a case in point, because I employed the same man afterwards myself, and know whereof I speak. The Government found that the men whom they had in their employ knew nothing about the drainage and masonry work around these Parliament Buildings, and after this man was discharged they brought him back again, and said that they had made a mistake. They appointed him as assistant to another man, and after the work was done, my friend had to leave Ottawa and come back to work for me in Beamsville. My hon. friend opposite can find lots of cases in his own riding without coming into mine. I will give him another name of one of his own pet friends in the village of Niagara Falls, young Simpson, a mail clerk, who not only poses as a Conservative, but he was president of the Liberal-Conservative Association. At the last election he, a Government employee, had the indecency to allow his name to be put upon posters in a town of my hon. friend's riding, calling meetings and grand rallies of the Conservative party. The hon. gentleman referred to a letter that was written by a friend of the Liberal party. Now, I want to ask here, How was this petition that he speaks of circulated in the village of Beamsville? He does not know the whole case, I see. A petition was circulated in the village of Beamsville among the Liberals under a misapprehension. They were told that it was in order to call a meeting of the executive of the Liberal Association of the village of Beamsville to consider Mr. Fairbrother's case. The Tories, of course, did not require to be coached, it was the Liberals whom they wanted to sign it, and they signed it under a misapprehension that the whole of this matter was to be re-opened, not by Parliament, but by the executive of the village where I live. Now, speaking about the respectability of the young man who was in charge, I have nothing to say against him. I do not want to say anything against him, but I say that he abused the position that was given to him, and he abused the confidence that I reposed in him. After I gave him my assurance, he went to work and abused the man who had not only taught him, but the man who had been more than kind to him during all those years, and kind to his father-in-law for eighteen years. I know that the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition will remember the gentleman whose letter I am about to read to the House, not only as a personal friend of his own, but as a very strong and warm admirer and political supporter of his. This is the letter :

Mr. GIBSON.

Toronto, March 25, 1897.

Mr. Alexander Allan, Beamsville, Ont.

Dear Sir,—It gave me great pleasure to have your letter this morning, stating that you had been appointed postmaster of Beamsville: I congratulate you on securing the appointment, and also I may say that your friends in power have only done what was right and fair by you, for the consistent support you and your friends have given to them for a great number of years.

I shall attend to any application made from the Guarantee Company immediately. Wishing you many years of pleasant occupation as postmaster of Beamsville, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. R. BROCK.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is, so far as I am concerned, the whole case of the postmaster of Beamsville.

Mr. CRAIG. I have no particular reason to interfere in this debate, except to say that I think it is a most unfortunate thing that, instead of politics being elevated, as we all hoped they might be when the party opposite came into power, it seems to me they have been rather degraded by a great many dismissals for political reasons all over the country. Now, what is the great complaint made by the member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) in this matter? It is that this postmaster who admittedly discharged his duties well, who was perfectly qualified to discharge them, who declares that he took no active part in politics—that this man was dismissed without an investigation. I think that is the great cause of complaint, and no complaint, I understand, has been made against him. But this dismissal is aggravated when we recall the words used by the Premier in this House last session, that no Minister would dismiss any civil servant, or any servant of the Government, without a complaint being made, and the matter being investigated, and without that man having an opportunity of replying. Now, we all admit that this is British justice. I see that the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) shakes his head.

Mr. McMULLEN. Because my hon. friend does not state the case correctly.

Mr. CRAIG. Will you state it correctly, then?

Mr. McMULLEN. After you are through, I will.

Mr. CRAIG. I find the Premier's words, uttered on the 1st of September, 1896, at page 506 of the "Hansard"—perhaps the hon. member for North Wellington will read this over before he speaks, so as to be quite correct. I will read it to the House now :

The PRIME MINISTER. No Minister would pretend to dismiss any officer, unless he had an opportunity to defend himself.

I think that bears out what I said. Now I will go on and read a little further :

But when the case is within the personal knowledge—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CRAIG. Well, I am interested to see that the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) calls himself a Minister. I am going to read a little further :

But when the case is within the personal knowledge of the Minister himself,—

Now, I do not think that the hon. member for Lincoln can put himself under that head. Perhaps he looks forward to the time when he will, but I think he is anticipating, he is rather too soon. The Premier does not say, within the knowledge of any member at all. But he says distinctly :

When the case is within the personal knowledge of the Minister himself, under such circumstances there is no case for inquiry.

Now, what can be plainer than that? If the hon. member for North Wellington can get around that, he can get around anything. When the Premier used that expression, I admired him for taking that position, and I regret very much that he has allowed pressure from members of this House—I have no doubt pressure was brought by the hon. member for Lincoln in this matter, I have no doubt that he is responsible for this dismissal—I am very sorry that the Premier has allowed himself to be influenced by the member for Lincoln, so as to forget what he pledged himself to in this House. Now, I hold that this was a pledge, not only to the House, not only to the country, but to the civil servants all over the country, and gave them the assurance that they would not be dismissed at the whim of any member of this House. I say whim, because I think it is a most unfortunate thing for civil servants, who are servants of both parties all over this country, to feel that they hold their positions at the whim of any member of any party. I think that is a most unfortunate state of things, and has a demoralizing effect upon the civil service. Now, I was a little surprised, although I was not very much surprised, at the remarks made by the hon. member for Lincoln, when he read a letter written by the present leader of the Opposition. The hon. gentleman remarked: It is all right, we are acting perfectly right, we are doing just what we ought to do in this case, because you did the same thing. That is a great argument, is it not? I am sure the hon. gentleman and many members of his party have gone up and down this country talking about the wicked Tories and what they have done, and that they should be driven from power, and thus they held us up to scorn and obloquy for doing these very things which the hon. gentleman now turns around and says the present Government are perfectly right in doing, because we Conservatives did the same when we were in power.

I am surprised that the hon. gentleman should use such an argument. If it was wrong when we did it, the fact that we did it does not make it right to-day.

An hon. MEMBER. Was it wrong?

Mr. CRAIG. I say it was wrong. I say that if anything like that was done, it was a wrongful act.

Mr. LANDERKIN. But you formally sustained it.

Mr. CRAIG. When I spoke on the question of dismissing translators of the "Debates," the Premier asked me what I would do, and at the same time he said you would cut their heads off. I replied that I would do no such a thing. I do not pretend to be any better than other Conservatives; but I want to speak on this point, and at the same time show that I have a right to speak on it, because I have been consistent in my course throughout. When I had the power to appoint a postmaster at Bethany, I appointed an Equal Righter who had worked against me, and I did so because he was a poor man and I thought he would be a good man for the position; and for so doing I was blamed by many Conservatives.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What was his salary?

Mr. CRAIG. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will either rise and say what he wishes to say, or will keep quiet. My action on this question gives me the right to speak on it, for my action has been consistent. I have another case in mind; I do not want to show any egotism, but I wish to express my disapproval of carrying party to the extreme, as is seen in this country. I know that the Postmaster General and other members of the Government are often placed in an unfortunate position by members like the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), who wants certain things done from party motives and no other motives. They want to place certain men in positions and punish others, and they bring pressure to bear on the Postmaster General or some other Minister, as in this case, because they want to punish a man. I do not think members should have the power to punish men in this way. The Government should resist the pressure and stand between the civil service and members of the party, no matter which party is in power. I have another case, I say, to show my consistency. At one time the dredge was lying at Port Hope, and I was asked to nominate a caretaker. I appointed a poor man who had voted against me, because I wanted to give the man something to carry him over the winter. Some Conservatives disapproved of my action, but I acted irrespective of party.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Because he was an honest man.

Mr. CRAIG. I am sure the hon. gentleman would not have done so. He would have appointed a clear Grit, and I am glad he is interrupting because it gives me the opportunity of saying this. I regret that this man Fairbrother was dismissed without an investigation being held. That is the gravamen of the charge made in this case. If an investigation had been held, this man would have had an opportunity of being heard, for he denies the charges in toto. Of course, I am bound to accept the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln. This man, however, believes he has been unjustly treated in having been denied an investigation, and moderate men throughout the country will say that if this man was guilty of these charges, an investigation should have been held and he should have had the opportunity of proving his innocence, or the member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) would have been able to show that he was guilty.

Mr. LISTER. During the last session of Parliament, and during this session, many hours have been taken up by complaints from the other side of the House of dismissals of public officers by the present Government. I can only say for myself, speaking with some knowledge of the facts, that the Government has acted in this matter with the greatest possible moderation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LISTER. I have no hesitation in making that statement. What are the facts? For eighteen years hon. gentlemen opposite were in power. At election after election, the office-holders were led to believe that they would be retained in office for ever. They were encouraged to act as committee men—they were the men who carried out the election campaigns throughout the country, and they were the active supporters of the Government. They were offensive to the Opposition in many instances—of course, there were exceptions; but in the majority of instances the office-holders were the most offensive partisans the Liberal party had to meet. They believed that hon. gentlemen opposite would retain office, and that they might continue to take the offensive part which they had assumed in the past. Those gentlemen must have known—if they did not know, they were obtuse, indeed—that if a change of Government took place, they would be removed; and the complaint we on this side of the House have to make is that the Government has not done its full duty in this regard. When hon. gentlemen went into office in 1878 the first work they entered upon was the dismissal of the public servants of the country. From the lowest officer to the highest, no man felt himself safe. Even the railway employees in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the present leader of the Opposition did not scruple to dismiss, not because they were inefficient or did not perform their duty, but because they were Liberal supporters; and if we give hon. gentlemen opposite a dose of the same medicine they gave us in 1878, they must not complain.

Mr. CRAIG

Do they want to goad this Government to make further dismissals, for there are many men who should be dismissed? In my own county there are a number of officials who, if political partisanship is to be good cause for dismissal, should be dismissed; and I may say that I have not asked for the dismissal of a single man in the county of Lambton. Although I feel they have acted improperly, and that I would feel justified in insisting on their dismissal, I feel, furthermore, that the stand taken by the Government and the Liberal party since their accession to power in teaching the office-holders that they must maintain a position of neutrality, will, in the future have a salutary effect, and office-holders will discharge their duties and leave politics alone. I only state what is known. Hon. gentlemen opposite know perfectly well that throughout the length and breadth of the country, office-holders have been their most active political supporters.

We are not introducing a new rule in Canada; we are not disregarding what has been the rule in England for years and years, because for the last seventy-five years the rule in the mother country ever has been; that the price of office is neutrality. It is the rule there, that if an office-holder takes an offensive part in politics, he does it at the risk of losing his office in case the party he supports is not successful at the polls. Sir, that is a salutary rule, and that is the rule that ought to have been enforced in Canada during the last eighteen years. Office-holders should have been given to understand in Canada, that the political party which they supported did not expect them to engage actively in its campaign, but instead of that, the late Government encouraged the civil servants to actively support them in elections. Such being the case, what complaint can now be made? The office-holder when he takes office knows that he takes it upon the implied understanding that he is to be neutral in politics. If he disregards that rule, he takes his official life in his hands, and if he loses it he has only himself to blame. Sir, take through the length and breadth of this country, and I say, that since the present Ministry have come into power their moderation is a matter of surprise. The Government have been urged to dismiss employees for the sufficient reason that they were active political partisans, but when you look at the number of dismissals actually made, you find that they are insignificantly small. Hon. gentlemen opposite want this country to believe, that we want to dismiss the whole civil service of Canada. We want nothing of the kind. We want to impress upon the civil servants of this country, that when they take the pay of all the people of Canada, they must give their undivided attention to the people of Canada as a whole, regardless of politics. Civil servants although they may have been partisans before, must cease to be active politicians when in office. I admit, that as a general thing a Government will appoint its own followers to office, but the moment a party follower is appointed, he must cease to become an active supporter of any party. He must make up his mind that while he has the right to exercise the franchise as any other citizen, he must cease to be an active politician. I repeat, Sir, that in the interests of the service itself, and in the interests of the country, public officials must be taught the lesson that they are to serve Canada, and not any political party. I believe that the public servants of the country now understand this, and that in future elections there will not be found that active interference by them in political campaigns, which has been so prejudicial to the interests of the country, and so injurious to themselves.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would be probably difficult to occupy the time of the House with a graver or more important question that is at present under consideration. Last session and this session, reference has been made to this question at considerable length. I believe that gentlemen on both side of the House will agree with me, that it is time there should be some clearly defined and well recognized line of conduct laid down and adhered to by the Government. Half a dozen different principles have been propounded from the Government benches in regard to this question of the position of civil servants, which to a great extent concerns the interest of this country. Last session, the Minister of Public Works read a letter written by me in reference to a dismissal in the county of Digby, and he stated that the Government would follow the principles laid down in that letter. Sir, that letter of mine gave the reason for the dismissal referred to, and declared that the official had been guilty of grossly offensive partisanship. The Minister of Finance then held, that civil servants were free men to exercise the franchise, but that they must do it within certain bounds, and they must not be guilty of offensive partisanship. He laid down the rule, that if an official took a grossly offensive attitude in reference either to a candidate supporting the Government of the day, or a candidate of the Opposition, he must not complain if he is removed from office. I at once said then, that both sides of the House would agree to that proposition as to the line of conduct to be pursued by the Government and that while civil servants were not forbidden to express their opinions in a fair and gentlemanly way, yet they should not be guilty of offensive partisanship. Before the House rose, last session, it will be remembered, that the hon. the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair) after a long laborious effort, and after several weeks had passed, exhumed a letter written by myself which he read from his place in the House, and which found its way into the pages of "Hansard." That letter has been re-read to the House by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), who, like the Minister of Finance, considers, that the highest authority to justify any act charged against the Government, is to show that they have for it such an illustrious precedent as that set by myself. Well, Sir, I accept that, and I will abide by any action that I have taken as a public man in regard to this question of dismissals from office. I will exonerate the supporters of the Government, whenever and wherever, they are able to quote my actions as a precedent in support of what they have done. I may tell the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), that the man who was discharged by me when Minister of Railways and Canals, was not only guilty of offensive partisanship, and not only guilty of taking a conspicuous part in elections, but he actually used physical force at a public meeting, in support of his party and in opposition to us.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Did he have an investigation?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was the fullest inquiry. He was guilty of this conduct at a crowded public meeting in the city of Moncton, hundreds of people were cognizant of it, it was a matter of public notoriety, and after a full investigation—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A full investigation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, a long period elapsed between this conduct and the date of dismissal. There is hardly a gentleman in the House who will say that if an official goes to the length of using physical force at a public meeting, you would not be perfectly justified in dismissing him.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did he hurt many of your fellows?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not say that, because as my hon. friend knows, we are generally able to take care of ourselves, whether in a question of intellectual or of physical force. But, Sir, this is a grave matter, a matter which this House cannot treat with too great consideration, for this reason, that if the system that "to the victors belong the spoils" is to be introduced, and the wholesome practice of admitting the individual right of public officials to maintain their opinions in a temperate, fair and gentlemanly manner, is to be departed from, the country should know it; and every official under the present Government, and the Government also, should understand that what is now established as the law in relation to their opponents, will necessarily have to be carried into effect in regard to themselves and other officials supporting them when a change of Government takes place.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It will be a long time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It may be a long time, but if these dismissals are rolled up in the manner in which they have been during the short tenure of power of hon. gentlemen opposite, there will be a fearful account to be rendered when that day comes be it far or near, and it is just as well that it should be understood that these gentlemen on the Treasury benches are not laying down the law for their opponents; they are laying down the law for their friends. I want to ask the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, and who has argued this matter in a temperate and straightforward manner, stating that in his view the moment a man is appointed to office he is to understand that his political life has terminated and he is to do nothing but attend to his duty—I want to ask him if he holds, as I assume he does, from that statement, that the gentlemen appointed and holding office under this Government, are precluded from supporting the Government—from going to an election and giving their votes, or giving a free and independent, but fair and manly expression of the views they hold on public questions. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. McCleary) made an overwhelming case in regard to the matter now before the House—an unanswerable case, and consequently an unanswered case. I listened to the specious plea of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) in favour of what had been done; but he was unable to meet the ground taken by my hon. friend behind me, when my hon. friend showed that what had been done by the Government had been done in contravention of the declaration of the leader of this Government made on the floor of Parliament. My hon. friend behind me shows that that declaration has been dishonoured, and a course diametrically opposed to it has been adopted in driving from an important office this man, against whom there is no charge of his not having honestly and faithfully performed his duties. What does the hon. member for Lincoln say? Do I require better evidence of the impropriety of driving this man from office without any investigation than that hon. gentleman's statement? No, Sir. What does he say? He says that when this gentleman came to him and said, "Do you intend to dismiss me, or do you intend to sustain me in office?" he, knowing the character of the man, the position he had attained in life, and the mode in which he discharged his duties, gave him his word that he would not be disturbed, provided he acted in a proper manner. What does he say to-day? He says he disapproves of some business arrangement between that man and his assistant. What had he to do with that? What had this House to do with that? A gentleman entrusted with official duties has a right to make his own arrangements with persons who assist him. That is no ground whatever for the violation of the declaration of the First Minister, that no man should be deprived of his office, if any charge were brought against him, except after investigation, save in a case in which the transaction was within the knowledge of the Minister himself. We all admit that if a Minister is able to say that he is aware of his own personal knowledge of offensive partisanship or any other improper conduct on the part of an official, he would be justified in acting upon his own personal knowledge. But that is not the case in this instance. There the matter stands, that the hon. member for Lincoln had given this gentleman a high character and had given his word that he should remain in the position undisturbed; and yet, when a gentleman came to him with complaints, what did he say? "I have given my word to this gentleman that he should be retained in his office, and I cannot listen to your complaints, but I will send them to the Postmaster General, and get him to turn out of office the man I was pledged to protect."

Mr. GIBSON. I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman should not put words in my mouth. What I said was that I had no time to listen to the complaint of the gentleman, and that if he would put his statement in writing, I would forward it to the Postmaster General for him to deal with. Not to discharge him; I did not say anything of the kind. I hope the hon. gentleman will accept my word.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement without hesitation, but he makes the case stronger against himself, because, having refused to entertain the complaint himself, he sent it forward to be dealt with by other parties, after having given his pledge that this man would not be dismissed. But I was astonished to hear the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) say that this Government had proceeded with great caution and great moderation. I believe I shall put a motion on the paper asking this Government to lay on the Table of the House a statement showing the number of persons who have been discharged from the various departments of the public service since they came into power; and I do not hesitate to say that I believe it will immensely outnumber all the dismissals which took place under previous Governments during the past eighteen years. What did an hon. gentleman say in reference to the mode in which I had administered the Department of Railways and Canals? Let me repeat that when I was appointed Minister of Public Works and of Railways and Canals in 1878, because the two departments were then consolidated, I found that the account of the Intercolonial Railway was between half a million dollars and three-quarters of a million dollars on the wrong side of the ledger of the previous year. I found also that the hon. gentleman who had been charged with the administration of the Railway Department had put on record his declaration that it would cost the Government about $750,000 a year to operate the Intercolonial more than could be obtained from its operation. There is not an hon. member in this House who will not say that it was not my duty to grapple at once with such a state of affairs. No hon. gentleman will fail to approve of the course I adopted of at once entering into a most thorough investigation of the management of the Intercolonial, in order to see what reduction could be made in the burden which its management had hitherto entailed on the country. I called upon the ablest men in the department to report to me what could be done to effect a saving and more equally balance revenue and expenditure. When I got their reports, I went into the whole question in the most thorough and careful manner myself. I say more, I say that when these gentlemen showed to me that I could make a great saving by a great reduction in the number of employees on the railway, I called upon them—and I can prove my statement before a committee of this House, because these men are now living and can testify to the truth of what I say—to return to me a list, without favour or affection or partisan bias, of those that could be dispensed with. Practically a large number had been appointed, in fact almost all had been appointed by my predecessor, Mr. Mackenzie. I called upon the chief men in the department to not only give me a statement of how great a saving could be effected, but to give me the means of working the road with the fewest hands possible by selecting the ablest and best men in the public service, regardless of political considerations altogether, and the result was that while I did make a great reduction, I was attacked right and left by the Conservative party and by various Conservative members, and even Conservatives out of the House, for having dismissed Conservatives and retained a large body of strong political opponents on the railway. That is a matter susceptible of proof in the clearest possible manner; and when I tell the House that the result of my management was to save to the country over half a million dollars per annum, they will understand not only that I was able to perform a great service for this country, but that in discharge of that duty I had regard mainly to the qualifications of the men who were retained whether Liberals or Conservatives, and many of those occupying the highest and best paid positions in the service were selected from men who had been and were known to be my strong political opponents. So much for that, but I say more. I say that during the whole period of Liberal-Conservative administration, the course was adopted of maintaining the integrity and character and position of the civil service, and whether in the inside service engaged at the Capital, or the outside civil service all over the country, regard was had solely to efficiency and permanency of office. Unless there was some strong and sufficient ground brought against an official to warrant his dismissal from the service, none were disturbed. Again and again, as hon. gentlemen behind me know, appeals that were made to provide for partisans anxious to serve the Government were met by the statement that unless good ground could be given, it was impossible to make room for partisans or political friends. I say that during the long period the Liberal-Conservative party were in power, we adopted the course of maintaining the integrity and high character and independence of the service by refusing to listen to every request for the dismissal of a civil servant, except on the ground of his incapacity or of offensive partisanship. We stand on that ground to-day. I say, show that any official is incapable of performing his duties, or that he is guilty of offensive partisanship, show that he has offered open insult to gentlemen supporting the Government, and we have not a word to say in his defence. That is the position we take, but hon. gentlemen opposite have swept hundreds out of office without cause, without investigation, without any reason except that their places were wanted for hungry partisans who are hounding this Government on to its destruction. Under these circumstances, not only is deep injury done to the men who were thus deprived of positions in which they were honestly and honourably and faithfully discharging their duty to their country, but apart altogether from the injustice done to them, there is a deeper and greater wrong done to the best interests of Canada in establishing this doctrine which has been abandoned by the United States of America as fraught with utter ruin to the public service. This old doctrine, that to the victors belong the spoils, which was found to sap and undermine the public service of the nation until they were compelled to abandon it, is taken up and being put into execution from day to day by the members of this Government, and that in violation of the declaration made, not only by the First Minister himself, but by other Ministers in this House. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) said that the gentleman whose case is before the House took notes at the polling booth.

Mr. GIBSON. I said that he was scrutineer at the polling booths and checked off the men who went into vote.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not see anything offensive in that.

Mr. GIBSON. Of course not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am sure there was nothing offensive in it; we have the authority of the hon. gentleman for it. He said himself to this man: You shall not be disturbed by me; yet he was dismissed at once and without any charge. If it be decided that a man shall be deprived of everything except the right to vote, let it be so announced. But do not let us have one declaration of principle from one Minister and another from another Minister, and then have all these declarations treated as idle wind and scores of dismissals made of honest, industrious, efficient public servants without cause assigned, without explanation of any kind. Why, Sir, I know several cases of dismissals in which the parties have asked the Government: Is there any charge against me? Have I done anything wrong? Have you any ground of complaint? And the answer was: No, there is no charge whatever against you. And when these parties have asked: As I am not allowed to serve the country and am not in employment, will you give me a recommendation, will you allow the officials under whom I have served to say whether I have performed my duty in an honourable and straightforward manner? And this has been refused. So, Sir, it would appear that the policy of this Government is not only to drive men out of office, to deprive men who are honestly and faithfully serving the country of the positions they hold, but to starve them, if possible, by preventing them from getting employment elsewhere. There has been an amount of cruelty, an amount of injustice, an amount of unfairness in dealing with the public officials of this country during the short regime of the present Government, that, when it is summed up before this House—as I hope it will be, for I shall move a resolution that a list of the employees discharged, either without cause assigned, shall be laid upon the Table—will startle this House and this country. Assuming the sincerity of the statements—and I am not questioning it—made by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister), I think nobody will be more astonished than he when this long list of officers who have been ruthlessly driven from office without cause or reason, except simply that some person else wished to occupy their place, is submitted to this House. But this policy of dismissals on one side from office is a policy that cannot be maintained. It is utterly impossible that it can be maintained by one party and not by another. The first duty that will be forced upon whoever may succeed these hon. gentlemen is to remove from office—and I say it here in the face of the House and of the country—every man who has taken the position of a man improperly driven out of the public service. And I can only say, so far as the officials are concerned, the principle propounded and laid down by gentlemen opposite will have to be applied to the officials of this country in the same way that they have applied it. The course they pursue will be forced upon their successors, and a condition will be brought about that every man who wants to see the civil service of this country preserve the high and independent character that it has heretofore had, will deplore from the bottom of his heart. No person regrets it more deeply than I do. I feel there is no injury that this Government is inflicting upon this country greater or more serious than their endeavour to strike down all independence of character in the civil service and to terrorize the members of that service by giving them the impression that they must carry out the views of this Government or be driven out of office.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). I would not have attempted to say a word but for the statement of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) who has just sat down, that the present Government have dismissed, within the short space of time that they have occupied the Treasury benches, more officers than were dismissed by the Conservative party in the eighteen years during which they were in power. I take exception to that statement. When the Conservatives came into power in 1878, they swept out of the service every officer they could possibly dismiss. I am only going to detain the House for a single moment to state one fact. The hon. leader of the Opposition, when he was in the Government in 1872, introduced a law in reference to weights and measures inspection. They were driven from power before they had time to put this law in operation. When the Government of the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie came into power that Government had the opportunity of putting the law in operation and making the appointments in the weights and measures inspection service. When the Conservatives came back to power in 1878, the hon. gentleman who now leads the Opposition forgot all the good points of the measure he had introduced and thought it was not a good measure for the country, and he repealed it holus bolus. He could not see his way to dismiss the men individually, but he repealed the law and thus drove every man who had been in the Weights and Measures Inspection Department out of office at one sweep. The hon. gentleman himself was then the person to introduce a new Weights and Measures Act, and under that they appointed their own men in almost every instance all over the country, making up the weights and measures service much as it is to-day. But they did not stop even with this wholesale sweep. There was a gentleman occupying a high commercial position in Hamilton who had been appointed collector of customs at Niagara Falls. He occupied that position for a very short time. Nobody could find fault with him: a man competent in every way to discharge the duties of collector of customs. He was summarily dismissed from office; no complaint against him, but simply that he was a Reformer and always had been, and that was enough to bring down upon him the vengeance of the Government. The hon. leader of the Opposition would have us believe that he is the guardian of the civil service of this country. These hon. gentlemen guard the interest of the civil servants so long as those civil servants do their bidding, but when they fail in that, they must make way for others. Several other dismissals took place at that time. It was many years ago, and I have forgotten the details; but had I thought that this matter would come up I would have refreshed my memory and could have given the hon. gentleman some samples of his own work that he seems to have forgotten. I hope he will carry out the promise he has almost made to this House that men in office, no matter what their political opinions, if they are competent and faithful will be secure in their positions when he comes back into power.

An hon. MEMBER. He does not expect to come back.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). We know that. I hope he will live long enough to come back into power, but I do not think he will. I only desire to recall to the hon. gentleman's memory these things of which he himself was guilty, to show him that he is hardly in a position to find fault with the Government. This Government has only dismissed men who have taken an active part in politics, and I hope that they will dismiss every man who takes that position in the future.

Mr. LOGAN. The hon. leader of the Opposition has spoken of the action of the Government as injustice and cruelty. With reference to this case in Moncton, of which I happen to have some personal knowledge, I beg to say one or two words. This young man was only seventeen years of age when the election took place in 1882, some time, I think, in the summer—and on the 17th of November this young man's father wrote to the then Minister of Railways asking him why his son had been dismissed. Where was the investigation? By whom was the charge investigated? Where was the tribunal? He waited long days, and long weeks, and did not even receive the courtesy of a reply to his letter of the 17th of November. On the 9th of February, in the depth of winter, he wrote again to the hon. gentleman, imploring him to tell him why that his son, seventeen years of age, had been dismissed from the railway. Then we find that the month of February passed, the month of March passed, and April had gone until its 7th day before the then Minister of Railways deigned even to reply to the request of this poor boy's father made on the 17th day of November of the previous year. This is a specimen of the cruelty and injustice of the hon. member when he was Minister of Railways, and he complains to-day—of what? He complains to-day because this Government appointed a commission to investigate this case; he complains also because of other dismissals made in this country. Now, Sir, having the honour to represent the county which that

hon. gentleman so long represented, I can tell him that in that county—and he knows it as well as I—there are five or six hundred employees of this Government, and out of this whole number there have not been only two or three dismissals, notwithstanding the fact that some of them are most violent political partisans, and a good many of them are relatives of the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman says that many of them were relatives of mine; I would ask him to name them?

Mr. LOGAN. I have not here a directory of the county of Cumberland; but at some future time when I have more time at my disposal, and when this House has more time at its disposal, I may take occasion to remind the hon. gentleman of a few of his relatives who occupy Government positions in the county of Cumberland. I can think of three or four of his relatives at the present time. The collector of customs at Tidnish, for instance, is an esteemed nephew. The late inspector of bridges on the Intercolonial Railway is a relative, and there are others in the county of Cumberland whom I can bring to the attention of this House when time permits. Now, Sir, let me say it is my opinion that the Government has dealt too leniently with partisan officials. In the county of Cumberland, out of five or six hundred employees, there have been only two or three dismissals. And yet the hon. gentleman talks about injustice and cruelty. The hon. gentleman himself did not even give an answer to this boy's father, who wrote on the 17th of November, until the 7th day of the ensuing April; and then what did he do? Did he say there was to be an investigation? Did he even claim that there had been the farce of an investigation? No, Sir, he only says:

The reason for his dismissal was that he took a very active part in opposition to the Government at the last election. This, as you will readily understand, no Government officer can be permitted to do, and your son's action was so conspicuous that it could not be passed over.

Mr. Speaker, I regret very much that the hour of six o'clock has arrived, because I would like to call the hon. gentleman's attention to many other dismissals that took place in the county, under the late Government.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals, or any officer or officers thereof, and Wm. McArthur, of Fenslon Falls, in regard to the dispensing with his services.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Copies of all correspondence between the Department of Railways and Canals, or any officer or officers thereof, regarding the dispensing with the services of Wm. Hungerford, late engineer of the dredge "Otonabee"; of Mr. Kennedy, late foreman of the Rosedale Works, and of George Laidlaw, late timber inspector on the Balsam Lake section of the Trent Canal.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Copies of all letters, petitions and orders between the Government and any person or persons referring in any way to the installing of David Halliday, who was appointed by the late Government to the position of collector of customs at the port of Morrisburg; or letters, petitions and orders referring in any way to appointing any other person or persons to that position.—(Mr. Broder.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

MINING DEVELOPMENT AND ADVISORY CORPORATION.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (for Mr. Maxwell) moved second reading of Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Mining Development and Advisory Corporation of British America (Limited).

Mr. FOSTER. I think we ought to know what the nature of the Bill is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The hon. member who has charge of the Bill is not here. Of course if the hon. leader presses the matter, it will have to stand.

Mr. FOSTER. I think it had better stand, then, unless some one else is able to give explanations.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there is no one else here who can do so.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 28) respecting the Ontario Pacific Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.—(Mr. Landerkin, for Mr. Snetsinger.)

Bill (No. 12) further to amend the law respecting Building Societies and Loan and Savings Companies carrying on business in the province of Ontario.—(Mr. Landerkin, for Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT—BICYCLES AS BAGGAGE.

Mr. CASEY moved second reading of Bill (No. 16) to amend the Railway Act. He said: In moving the second reading of this Bill I am not inflicting a discussion on the House from any whim of my own. As I was asked to undertake the introduction of this Bill by a most influential body, the Canadian Wheelmen's Association, I looked into and considered the matter before acceding to their request, and being confident that what they asked was only consonant with justice and fair-play, I intend to do my best to induce the House to pass this measure. I am very much obliged to those gentlemen for paying me the compliment of asking me to take charge of their Bill, and I only fear some want of address on my part may lessen its chance of success; however, I will do my best. The Bill itself is an exceedingly simple one. It consists of one clause with a subsection. It provides that section 250 of the existing Railway Act should be repealed, and the following substituted:—

Checks shall be affixed by an agent or servant to any parcel of baggage having a handle, loop or fixture of any kind thereupon, or to any part of which a check can be affixed, delivered to such agent or servant for transport, and a duplicate of such check shall be given to the passenger delivering such parcel.

That section only varies the original wording of the section by adding the words "or to any part of which a check can be affixed." Then comes a new part, subsection 2, as follows:—

2. Bicycles are hereby declared to be baggage within the meaning of this section, and a passenger shall not be required to protect in any way any bicycle delivered by him for transport. Provided that the company shall not be required to transport, under the provisions of this section, more than one bicycle for any passenger.

It is quite clear, then, what the meaning of the Bill is, that it is simply a declaratory Act that bicycles are to be considered as baggage, and as such shall have all the rights and be subject to all the conditions which are accorded to and imposed upon any other class of baggage.

In requesting the House to pass this Bill, I feel I am speaking for one of the most important sections of the community; I feel I am speaking not only for those who are using bicycles now but those who will be using them next year and the year after. I am speaking for the youth and progress of this country—not exclusively for the youth either, because there are some grave and serious members of this House even, not to speak of any higher grade in the world, who are using the wheel. I believe some members of the Cabinet have lately began to practice; I might instance the Postmaster General, who I am told, and in fact I have the evidence of my own eyes for asserting, is becoming an expert on the wheel.

Mr. FOSTER. He is becoming a "fly on the wheel."

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has called attention to a personal matter, to which I did not intend to refer. I have heard that joke made in regard to a certain hon. gentleman as he appeared on a wheel, but I did not mean to refer to it. I see the hon. gentleman takes my joke, and I do not intend to push it further. As a general rule, though, I may say it is safer for a gentleman wishing to ride a bicycle not habitually to wear a long-tail coat.

I speak for the youth and progress of the country in asking the House to pass this Bill. Over one hundred thousand young men and women, I believe, use the bicycle to-day in Canada; we have the best grounds for believing they do so. The sale of wheels is increasing very rapidly. As the price goes down, the sale will grow with increasing rapidity. The bicycle no longer can be said to be the luxury of the few or of the rich or even of those comfortably well-to-do; it has become an article of habitual use by all classes of the community. We all know how largely it is used in cities, not only by the rich and their children, but by the workingmen, and by the working-women; by railway employees, by factory people, and by all classes. I am able to state from my personal knowledge, that in the country districts the case is quite similar. In the part of Ontario in which I live—and I think it is not peculiar in that respect—nearly every farmer's son now aspires to have a bicycle, almost as eagerly as he aspires to have a horse and buggy to take his best girl out for a drive. He has the horse and buggy still, but he wants to have the bicycle also.

An hon. MEMBER. And the girl.

Mr. CASEY. Yes, and the girl wants to have her bicycle too to accompany him, so that the farmers' sons and daughters are equally interested in this. Then, if all classes of society in cities, and towns, and in the country are interested in this measure, I am not ashamed to insist upon the House giving it the utmost attention.

One of the arguments used against this Bill is a sort of pooh-pooh argument: Oh, this is just a thing gotten up by a few rattle-pated young fellows who have bicycles, and who want to run out a few miles from the town, and come back on the train! I have disposed of that argument by pointing out the influential character of the persons who use the wheel. They are influential in many ways. There is, I suppose, hardly a member in this House who has not been assisted in his successful campaign by the bicyclists amongst his supporters. They have drummed up meetings, they have carried special messages to committees, they have brought in reports of the state of the polls, and they have gone in procession on the triumphal evening when the hon. gentleman in question was elected. In all ways, the wheelmen have taken an important part in the last general election held in this Dominion.

It is worth the while of hon. gentlemen to consider, whether the wheelmen may not take an important part in the next campaign. I do not wish to be accused of bribery and corruption, by calling attention to a matter of this kind, but I do think it is worth the attention of every member of this House, from the members of the Government down to the junior members on the back benches—if there be such a thing as a back bench in this House where we are all free and equal—I say that from the youngest to the oldest member here, it is worth his while to remember that these young men who use bicycles are important fellows at election times. This is by no means a party measure; these young gentlemen are by no means all of the same party feeling, but there is no doubt that they will feel much more kindly towards those who assist them to obtain what they believe are their rights, than towards those who try to debar them from obtaining these rights.

This matter has been before individual members for some time past. There has been a good deal of discussion in the lobbies, and I want to pay attention to a few of the arguments I have heard against the Bill, and to those objections to it which have been formulated in print. In the first place, I am told, that it is a matter of class legislation, and that it would be an innovation. I claim that the boot is on the other foot. Until about a year ago, every railway in Canada carried bicycles on the same terms as they carried other baggage. Therefore, it is the railways who have introduced class legislation, or rather class discrimination against a certain large section of the people. They it is who have made the innovation by declaring that something is not baggage which had been formerly considered baggage, and they have made this class discrimination against those who use wheels, as compared with the rest of the public. Not only did all railways class bicycles as baggage until within a year, but up to the present day, the Government railways continue so to class them. On the Intercolonial Railway and Prince Edward Island Railway and all others in the maritime provinces, bicycles are still carried as baggage, and for that reason some of our maritime province friends hardly realize the grievance which the people of Ontario and Quebec labour under. They have been accustomed to see bicycles carried on railways as they should be carried, viz.: As the personal necessities of the passengers. In the United States, nearly one-half of the railway companies have always carried, and still carry bicycles as articles of baggage. In eleven states of the union they are compelled by law to do so; but apart from that compulsion, such large railway systems as the Pennsylvania railroad system with its ramifications extending through many states, and the Boston and Albany, which is somewhat similarly situated, and many other railways carry bicycles as baggage. The Boston and Albany road has gone so far as to provide a complete outfit in the baggage cars to make it convenient to carry bicycles, and they make no extra charge to the passenger. The eleven states which by legislation class bicycles as baggage are as follows:—New York, New Jersey, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Arkansas, Arizona, Ohio, Colorado, California, North Dakota, and Michigan. In France, by order of the government, bicycles are carried as baggage. These illustrations are sufficient to prove that in many large and civilized communities, what we ask from this House is considered to be justice to those who use the wheel.

Let me give another instance. It is said by some that the bicycle is too serious a rival of the railways to be treated in the manner we ask. The bicycle is certainly much more of a rival of the street railway than it is of the steam railway; but what is the case in the city of Toronto? The Street Railway Company there, which undoubtedly suffers by bicycle competition, which claims that it loses five or six per cent on its total capital by the competition from bicycles, now fits up its cars with attachments for hanging up bicycles, and carries the machine free when the owner pays his five-cent fare. This enlightened company, a company jealous of guarding its rights, has seen it to its advantage to carry the bicyclist home, and his wheel along with him, when he is tired, or when his tire is punctured, or when for any other reason he does not find it convenient to use the wheel. I have thus disposed of the argument that this is class legislation, and that it is unfair to railways to ask them to comply with this request.

The Bill is merely a definition of what should be considered baggage. Now, some dispute our right to define what is to be called baggage, but we may as well go to first principles. It is an undoubted fact that this House has the right of dictating anything it likes to a railway company, so that we need not question our power in this matter. What is open to question is: Whether we are doing what is fair in this particular respect. We already dictate to railways what they shall charge for passenger traffic, and we have fixed the maximum rate at 3 cents a mile. The freight rates of all our railways except the Canadian Pacific, I think, are subject to approval by Order in Council; the alignment of every railway is subject to dictation either by this House or by the Governor in Council. If we have the right to regulate the railways in these respects, the right to call them before the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and decide there all sorts of disputes, between one railway and another, or between the railways and the public, surely we have the right to declare what is baggage and what is not.

I contend that the definition which we wish to put on the statute-book now will not interfere with the convenience or the profit of the railways in any noticeable degree. Even if it did so interfere, I contend that the rights of the public should be considered before the convenience of the railway companies. Why, Sir, the public are the largest shareholders in Canada in many of our leading railways. So far as Canadian capital is in these railways at all, the greater part of it has come from the public chest of Canada. What has gone into them from other sources has been invested in bonds and mortgages by people outside of Canada after their construction has been provided for. The public interest, then, is the interest of the largest shareholders in cash paid down, and we have therefore the right to say that the convenience of the public shall be consulted as well as the convenience of the railways. But I say that the rights of the railways do not clash with the convenience of the public in the present instance, because we do not want to make any unfair or brutal use of the powers we possess.

In framing this Bill, we have tried to follow the language of definitions already laid down by the highest judicial authority in Great Britain. I refer to Lord Chief Justice Cockburn, whose decision as to what is baggage under British law is accepted, I believe, by the railway companies as well as by ourselves. The courts of England, of Canada and of the United States have all pretty unanimously held, with him, that "whatever a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience, according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to his immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey, must be considered as personal baggage." Following this indisputable principle, the courts have held that guns and ammunition are the baggage of the hunter, that fishing tackle is the baggage of the angler, that tools are the baggage of the mechanic, that the easel and sketching materials are the baggage of the artist, and the bicycle is the baggage of the wheelman. We take our stand on the ground that the bicycle is as much the baggage of the wheelman as any of these things I have mentioned are the baggage of these respective classes.

I may be allowed to enlarge very briefly on that point. The bicycle is a purely personal belonging. It is a thing which can only be operated either by the owner or by some individual who rides upon it. It is not in the same category as a horse and cart, a plough or a harrow, which may be used by animal power, by steam power, or in any other way, apart from its individual conjunction with a human being. It is as much personal to the man as a pair of boots, a pair of skates, a pair of stilts, or any other means of getting about.

We are met on all hands by what I may call the horse-and-buggy argument. It was brought up in the House when I introduced this Bill, and it is brought up seriously in print by some persons. We are told that if you allow the bicycle to be carried free, you might as well allow a horse and buggy to be carried free, because both are vehicles. The comparison is so absurd that I hardly know how to go about disproving it. I said, when introducing the Bill, that if its opponents could show a horse and buggy as small, or as well-behaved in a baggage car, as a bicycle, there might be some fairness in the comparison. To say that because you allow a bicycle to be carried free, the next step is to allow a horse and buggy to be carried free, is about the same thing as saying that because you allow a cat or a canary to be carried on a train, you will have to allow an elephant or a camel to be so carried. Whoever got up this comparison between a bicycle and a horse and buggy is about as muddled as was the porter of whom I read in "Punch" over a tortoise—or turtle, as we would call it—which was to be carried on the train. He turned to a fellow employee and said: "Now, Bill, look here; what do you make of this? Cats is dogs, and canaries is dogs, and parrots is dogs; but what in thunder is a tortoise?" The classification which makes cats canaries and parrots pass as dogs is no more absurd than the classification which would put the horse and carriage and the bicycle under the same head.

In going into this question a little more particularly, I am obliged to follow the line of argument published and put before the House by the Grand Trunk Railway people. They have adopted as their own a memorandum made by the general baggage agents of railways in the state of Illinois in opposition to a Bill called the Sharrock Bill, then before the legislature of that state. I may say in general terms that the statements in this memorandum are many of them incorrect. The Bill which this memorandum was intended to oppose was materially different from the Bill now before this House, and the reasoning based on the incorrect statements in the memorandum is of such a nature that I cannot characterize it without going through it at some length. First, I have said that the two Bills are different. The Bill in opposition to which this memorandum was issued proposes, according to the statements of these baggage agents:

That the transportation of bicycles and similar vehicles be compulsory on the part of railways, and that such articles be carried free in baggage cars.

The Bill before this House does not provide that "similar vehicles" should be carried as well as bicycles. I do not know what that might include. It might perhaps include a horse and buggy. This Bill does not provide that bicycles shall be carried free. It merely provides that they shall be put on the same footing as any other baggage; and if the railways have the right to charge on baggage generally, they will also have the right to charge on bicycles. So that the Bills are quite different. Then this baggage smashers' manifesto says that it should be understood that the railway companies are willing to carry bicycles when they are packed in trunks the same as ordinary baggage, and further on they say that they do not carry guns, easels, mechanics' tools or other articles, which have been declared to be baggage, unless they are packed in trunks. This last statement, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely false. The railway companies do carry these things without their being packed in trunks, and the baggage smashers of Illinois are simply telling a lie, unless the practice in Illinois is very different from what it is here.

In another paragraph they quote again Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's decision as to what is baggage under the existing law. The Lord Chief Justice says:

On the other hand, the term "ordinary baggage" being confined to that which is personal to the passenger and carried for his use or convenience, it follows that what is carried for the purpose of business, such as merchandise or the like, would not pass as baggage.

Now, here are these railway people asking us to accept Lord Chief Justice Cockburn's dictum as to what is baggage. He decides that merchandise carried for the purposes of business is not baggage, and yet these very railway people carry for commercial travellers, who travel at a reduced rate, to the extent of 300 pounds weight of merchandise, carried for business purposes, and they not only do not object to it, but do all in their power to get this class of travel. If they diverge so far from the lines laid down by Lord Chief Justice Cockburn with regard to the carrying of merchandise as baggage, how can they ask us to accept a twisting of his decision in some other part of it, in order to exclude bicycles?

They proceed to say that the most liberal construction possible would not authorize the transportation as baggage of beds and bedding, brooms, pots, pans and other kitchen utensils, in the case of a man moving his domicile from one place to another. Well, that is just what the Canadian Pacific Railway is very glad to do in the case of settlers moving to the North-west.

Later on this memo. goes into some most remarkable calculations as to the convenience of stowing away bicycles. It says in one place that a bicycle occupies as much room as three trunks, and in another place that two bicycles occupy as much room on a truck to be wheeled across the platform as twenty-five trunks, and so on. The absurd and wilful untruth of those statements must be evidence to any one who has seen a bicycle and a trunk. They pretend that ordinary baggage is always delivered to them in compact parcels of 8 cubic feet. Did anybody ever see a commercial traveller's baggage done up in the compact form of a cube containing 2 feet each way? I do not think so, nor will you find any ordinary baggage so packed. As a matter of fact, the present law does not make any distinction as to the shape in which baggage is done up, and the railways in Canada make no such distinction. As long as there is a handle to it, they have to check it and are very glad to get it. I know of a Saratoga trunk belonging to a couple in the province of Ontario into which they can both get and shut the lid on top of them, and they measure combined considerably more than 8 cubic feet. That trunk is carried everywhere without charge for excess baggage.

It would be impossible to take up all the arguments of this memo. at present. Yet I must take up two or three of them :

We are aware, they say, that various devices have been invented for the hanging or securing of bicycles in the baggage cars, and quite alluring pictures have been made showing how the bicycle can be carried under such circumstances. It will be observed, however, that, in these pictures, little or no baggage is shown, and while these devices may be very excellent to secure bicycles when transported in an otherwise empty car, their use is practically impossible upon any road the passenger traffic of which assumes any degree of magnitude. On the trunk lines of the country, east and west, and north and south, baggage cars are usually so well filled that the handling of all bicycles within them is frequently difficult, and sometimes impossible.

Taking that to be true, I would ask the baggage smashers' association of Illinois, and those in Canada who adopt their arguments, what they are going to do, under the circumstances, if somebody offers a bicycle and ready to pay the fee demanded? Will there be any more room if the bicycle is paid for than if it is offered as an article of baggage? There certainly will not. If it is hard to find room for the bicycles as baggage in their cars, it will be equally difficult to find room for them when paid for. That whole argument is put entirely out of court by the fact that the companies make no objection to receive any amount of bicycles provided they are paid for. We may accept it as a fact proved that the railways can stow bicycles in their baggage cars if they want to.

Then they go on to raise a bugbear. They say that the passing of this law will affect a certain class of passengers. They say that : " A statutory provision, such as is asked for by some bicyclists, specially defining bicycles as baggage and requiring their carriage on the same train with the passenger, works an unjust discrimination against other passengers and their baggage. Such a statutory provision would give them a preferential character, and wherever it became necessary, as is sometimes the case, to leave some baggage to be carried on a later train, with the existence of such a provision, the bicycles would have to be carried and the other baggage would have to be left."

The only answer to these statements is that they are absolutely untrue. This statutory provision which we ask you to put on the Statute-book does not give preference to bicycles over other baggage, but only provides that other baggage shall not be given any preference over bicycles. If the companies have too much baggage, composed partly of bicycles, and partly of trunks, they would have to leave some of the baggage behind. It would be for them to decide whether they would leave the bicycles or the trunks or some of each behind, and there is nothing in this Bill to force them to give any preference to the wheels. Then they proceed to give a statement of the fares charged on the roads in the United States and in England. They give a list of the rates on American roads for various distances. I would ask what American roads carry at this rate? I am informed, on good authority, that the roads in the United States charge more than is stated in this memorandum. On the other hand the tariff of rates charged on British railways is given at rates which are quite too high. I need not read the figures, but I can give the tariff of rates charged on British roads, if occasion calls for it, showing that the figures given for British roads are about twice as high as those actually charged.

In other words, this falsified memorandum underestimates the charge of American roads and overestimates the charges of English roads and draws a misleading comparison. Besides, these underestimated figures for United States roads are below the rates charged in Canada. For instance, in the States, according to this memorandum, they carry bicycles one hundred miles for 25 cents. At the rate demanded in Canada you could not get a bicycle carried for one hundred miles for 25 cents. I have not the time to figure it out exactly, but it is a good deal more than that. So, this memorandum, prepared to combat a Bill not before this House, is incorrect in its facts, weak in its argument, and misleading in its conclusion.

I must refer to one other point. They say they are glad to accept—and we know that Canadian railways are glad to accept—bicycles put up in what are called bicycle trunks and carry them as baggage. Did you ever see a bicycle trunk, Mr. Speaker? It is about as convenient a thing to put into a baggage car as a two-humped camel would be. It has no particular shape, and can not very well stand up or be allowed to lie down. It is about as bulky and inconvenient a thing as you can imagine. But the railway companies practically say: If you take one of these bicycle trunks empty on your shoulders when you go out from Ottawa for a spin to Britannia or Aylmer, and will pack your bicycle in it, we will carry it back for nothing. But if not we will charge you 25 cents—for the charge for the shortest distance is that amount.

Now, I want to make a point or two of my own. First I lay down the proposition, which cannot be controverted, that the use of the bicycle procures passengers for the railways who would not be procured if people were not in the habit of riding a wheel. The use of trains by bicyclists is almost entirely confined to cases where the wheelman has run out into the country, and, for some reason, has found it more convenient to come home by train. Thus the use of the bicycle is advantageous to the railways in getting them a fare that they would not otherwise have got, and they should not fine a man who gives them that fare by charging a tremendous rate for his bicycle. It costs at commuted rates five cents to go by train from Ottawa to Britannia. For this rate they are bound to carry your baggage also. But if the owner of a commutation ticket makes the trip by train and takes his bicycle, they charge 25 cents for his bicycle, and 5 cents for himself—five times as much for the wheel as for the man. If a man has not a commutation ticket, he will have to pay 15 cents for himself and 25 cents for his wheel. I contend that free carriage of bicycles would induce wheelmen to take longer spins in the country, and come back by train, paying their fare and thereby affording a great deal of traffic for the railway companies which they do not now get. Instead of riding ten miles out and ten miles back, making a twenty mile spin, the wheelmen would go out 20 miles and come back by train, paying a very handsome fare to the railway company.

But I find that I have talked a great deal longer than I intended to and I shall close. I merely want to mention the fact of the number of petitions presented in favor of this Bill already—and they are still coming in. I find that petitions have been presented up to this afternoon from different cities from Canada as follows: Toronto, seven petitions containing 7,070 names; Montreal, 2 petitions containing 1,105 names; Hamilton, 1 petition, 870 names; Kingston, 1 petition, 350 names; Chatham, 1 petition, 389 names; Brantford, 1 petition, 257 names; Fredericton, 1 petition, 46 names. One other city has been omitted by some oversight of the compiler. There was a petition from St. Thomas, which is also a city. Petitions have been received from many towns and villages. In all petitions have been put in bearing the signatures of 14,618 people asking that this Bill may pass. These came from 45 different electoral divisions, of which also I have a list before me. There is a petition of about a thousand names from the city of Ottawa which is in the hands of one of the hon. members for the city who is now away from home and has not been able to present it. I have two or three more petitions which arrived this afternoon and could not be presented. We have petitions already received, in addition to those presented, to make the number of signatures of those praying for the passage of this Bill, over sixteen thousand, and these from all parts of the Dominion, from Nova Scotia to the extreme West. These represent a vastly larger number who have not had the opportunity of signing any petition, and altogether represent an amount of influence which this House cannot disregard.

Now, I have a word to say to the Government. I hope they will see it possible to take up this Bill and use their undoubtedly great influence in this House to secure its adoption. If they cannot quite see their way to do that, I hope they will give it the benefit of their moral support. If they feel perfectly indifferent about the matter, I hope they will, at least, not oppose it. In other words, if they do not help us, I hope they will not "help the b'ar," but will let the Bill have fair play, and I am satisfied from the expressions of opinion I have heard from hon. members of the House that it will triumphantly pass all stages and become the law of the country.

Mr. PENNY. In seconding the Bill proposed by the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), I desire to say that I do so because I represent a constituency in which there are many wheelmen. Under ordinary circumstances, I do not believe in asking legislation for matters of this kind, but, as I understand that this Bill asks for nothing but what the railway can give to the wheelmen of the country without materially interfering with their accommodations for baggage, I think it is perfectly reasonable. I do not intend to go into a long argument, because I think the proposer of the Bill has placed the case of the cyclists of Canada very ably, and has explained the case clearly. It would only be worrying the House to go over the ground again. But I would like to say that in asking for this legislation we are doing a great good to the whole community. We are not here to legislate only for corporations; we are here to legislate for all classes of the people; we are here to legislate, if possible, so as to turn out our young men and young girls who are growing up as good citizens. It is a well known fact that athletic sports tend to make good citizens of our young people, and therefore I consider that any legislation which will encourage our young people to go in more for athletic sports than they have hitherto done, will be a great benefit to the whole Dominion. It is a well known fact that bicyclists are per force compelled to be moral citizens; therefore, I think it is the duty of this House, as far as possible, to aid them in their humble pastime of bicycling. Now, another consideration which I wish to bring before the notice of the House is that the greater portion of those who enjoy the pastime of bicycling, belong to the middle classes, they are persons who find that 25 cents added to the cost of their day's pleasure, will be a considerable inconvenience to them; therefore, I think that if we can in any way cheapen their pleasure, it is the duty of this House to do so. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have supplemented with these few remarks the arguments of the hon. gentleman who proposed this measure, and I will say no more than to ask the Government to give it their favourable consideration.

Mr. ROSS ROBERTSON. I will not occupy much time of the House in expressing my opinion in regard to the Bill now before the House. In connection with this proposal in regard to bicyclists, I think that the general convenience of the people who use bicycles should be considered by the railways. It looks very much as if the railways, in objecting to carry a bicycle as the baggage of the wheelman, are actuated more by a desire to add to their receipts than by any hardship they experience in handling these machines. Railway managers take advantage of the doubtful interpretation of a word which they define to suit themselves. The word baggage must necessarily change in meaning as inventions increase which add to the comfort and convenience of travellers. The personal effects of to-day are not what they were thirty years ago, nor will they in the future be identical with what are accepted as personal effects to-day. It is therefore unfair to define the word baggage by any hard and fast interpretation which railroad managers may give it for all time to come. In the past the word baggage has been elastic enough to cover a multitude of things, from a shot gun to a Saratoga trunk; and it is only now when railway managers find the bicycles a source of revenue, that they conclude that the word has been stretched to its limit, without even selvaqe enough to include bicycles. Consistency is not a jewel that sparkles in the shirt bosom of railway managers. They claim it is a hardship to carry a thirty-pound bike unless it is paid for, but it is no hardship to carry a 150-pound Saratoga trunk free. Railways, I think, should not be permitted to take advantage of every change in the usages of the people to add to their receipts. The bicycle is in universal use, it is an article of personal convenience, it has come to stay, and to my mind it ought to be considered as baggage in the popular sense of the term. It has been recognized as such in the United States, and by railways that have much less privileges under their charters than railways in Canada. The railways in the United States, and in Europe, have solved this alleged difficulty, of the carriage of bicycles, without much loss of space, by suspending them from the ceiling of the baggage car. To me it seems that it is the duty of railways as common carriers to meet the requirements of the public consistently with the rights of the public. The railway companies in this country are only too ready, yea, too keen to insist upon the strict letter of their privileges, and surely it ought to be the function of this Parliament to see that they do not deviate from the strict line of their duty.

Mr. PENNY.

Mr. LISTER. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the Bill now before the House; my sympathies are entirely in favour of the measure which has been introduced by my hon. friend from Elgin (Mr. Casey). The Bill is a short one in itself, and it was difficult for me to understand how my hon. friend could make such a lengthy speech upon the two provisions in this Bill. The Bill, Mr. Speaker, whether it passes this House or not, will go down to posterity as Casey's Bicycle Bill. Men in the United States have attained—shall I say notoriety? No, prominence, by the introduction of just such Bills as this. There is no reason to my mind why a wheelman should not have the right to have his bicycle carried, the same as a passenger has to have his baggage carried. There is just this difficulty about the Bill under consideration, and one almost doubts whether it has received that care and attention which a Bill of such importance should receive at the hand of the promoter. My hon. friend, under the sections of the Bill, provides that railway companies shall carry a bicycle upon the same terms as railway companies are obliged to carry the baggage of a passenger. Of course my hon. friend knows that railway companies are not obliged at all to carry the baggage of a passenger free of charge. What is the result? We pass a law saying to the railway companies: You must carry the bicycle upon the same terms as you carry the baggage of the passenger. Ten thousand, twenty thousand, thirty thousand wheelmen will say: We want our wheels carried free. But to pass this Bill as it stands at present, would put it in the hands of the railway company to say: We are not bound by any law to carry any baggage free; therefore, we will charge the baggage of every passenger who travels upon the railway. The result would be that the wheelmen would be compelled to pay a charge upon their bicycles, and the passengers on the railway train would be compelled to pay for the baggage which is now carried free. I do not pretend to say that this is an insurmountable objection to the Bill. I am inclined to think that the difficulty can be surmounted, but one would think that it would have been much better on the part of my hon. friend to make it compulsory on the part of the railway company, not only to carry the bicycle, but to carry other baggage free to the extent of 150 pounds which they carry now. This Bill, however, does not do that, and the result of passing this Bill might be to force the railway companies into charging what they do not charge for now. Sir, this Bill has been promoted, and this Bill is being supported, by many thousands of the younger men in this country. They undoubtedly have rights, and it is undoubtedly in the power of this Parliament to compel the railway companies to carry the bicycles of travellers who have no other baggage, in all probability, than the bicycle upon which they ride. We have heard my hon. friend from Elgin lengthily and eloquently advocate the passing of this Bill. There is no argument, I venture to say, that he has not advanced why this Bill should become law; every argument that ingenuity could devise has been advanced by my hon. friend. He has recourse even to anecdotes apropos to the question under consideration. Now, this measure, like everything else in this world, has two sides. There is no doubt that the railway companies have some objection to this Bill, otherwise they would accept the principle without an Act of Parliament to compel them to do so. My judgment is that the wheelmen have the stronger side; my judgment at present is that it would be profitable to the railway companies, and it would not be an inconvenience to the public generally, if this or some other Act similar to it should become law, and therefore I feel as if I should heartily support the measure now before the House. But I think that this Bill, being one relating to railways, should be referred to the Railway Committee, where it could be fully and exhaustively argued pro and con. If that committee is satisfied that this is a proper measure to become law, it will so act, as it always does in the public interest, and will recommend that this Bill become law; on the other hand, if it is not satisfied, it will recommend that this Bill do not become law. Under any circumstances, I think this Bill should be referred to the Railway Committee, where it could be more thoroughly and fully discussed by those in favour of it as well as by those opposed to it. After that has taken place, this House will be in a better position to determine whether it should become law or not. I do not think this Bill as drawn should become law, because I do not think we should leave it to the railway companies to decide in regard to carrying baggage which is now carried free. It now rests with the companies to say that any person who travels with any baggage shall pay to the uttermost farthing. If the railways occupy that position, then it will be competent for them to say that they will or will not carry one wheel for every passenger free. I believe the House will agree with me that this Bill should be referred to the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. It is somewhat difficult to understand the object which the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has in view when he endeavoured to throw light on the Bill, because the argument he has advanced is entirely premature. It is not now a question whether the Bill should be referred to the Railway Committee or to a special committee, but the House at the present time is considering the principle of the Bill. The hon. gentleman started out by stating that the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) would probably immortalize his name if he carried this Bill through the House, and that it would be known as "the Casey Bill." If so, I think we might with equal propriety, say that the hon. member for Lambton will immortalize his name by the efforts he is making to kill the Bill, in what he would no doubt call a respectable way, by referring it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. LISTER. That is not a very great compliment to the Railway Committee.

Mr. SPROULE. The whole point of the hon. gentleman's argument was that the Bill should not pass—if a fair interpretation is placed on what the hon. gentleman said. The hon. gentleman expressed sympathy with the Bill, and thought the mover had the weight of argument in his favour, and yet the hon. member for Lambton was quite willing to assist in killing the Bill by sending it to the Railway Committee.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman has no right to make such a broad statement. I asked that it be referred to the Railway Committee for the purpose of hearing all sides, those in favour as well as those opposed to the Bill. Surely that was fair. The hon. gentleman, I do not think, intends to be unfair in his criticism.

Mr. SPROULE. If so, the hon. gentleman should advise the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. LISTER. Certainly.

Mr. SPROULE. Why did the hon. gentleman suggest a reference to the committee? It is plain to any hon. member who has had any experience that the hon. gentleman's aim was to get the Bill before the Railway Committee, because it is easier to kill a Bill there than it is here, and there is not the same record taken of what is said on one side or the other. I take exception to those who hold that a fair interpretation of the law does not include a bicycle as personal baggage. The railway companies admit it is personal baggage because they say that if you put it in a box we will carry it. If it is personal baggage in the one form, it must be so in the other. It is only for convenience of carriage that the railway companies require a bicycle to be carried in one form rather than in another. So long as they admit—and they do admit the principle, because if a bicycle is boxed they are perfectly willing to carry it—that a bicycle is personal baggage, then it becomes a question as to whether the companies should, because it is not convenient in one shape, refuse to carry it at all. The courts of England, of Canada and of the United States hold that "whatever a passenger takes with him for his personal use or convenience according to the habits or wants of the particular class to which he belongs, either with reference to his immediate necessities or to the ultimate purpose of his journey, must be considered as personal baggage." If this definition be correct, it is "for his use and convenience," and "according to his class." A bicycle must be regarded as personal baggage according to that interpretation. Although there might be a dispute as to that, railway companies practically admit it by agreeing to carry a bicycle if it is boxed up. It is not, therefore, imposing any hardship on the railway companies to compel them to carry a bicycle free, even though it is not boxed, any more than if it is boxed, the only difference being that in the latter case it may be stored away a little more conveniently. That, however, is only a more liberal interpretation of the law than the railway companies themselves are disposed to put upon it. I was amazed at the argument, made by implication rather than by direct statement, that this House should not pass the Bill on the ground that railway companies are not now obliged to carry personal baggage free, and, therefore, if you compel them to regard this as personal baggage, they will refuse to carry any kind of baggage free. We had that species of argument used before; we heard it with respect to second-class return passenger tickets. This is, however, only an apparent danger, and in reality there is no danger whatever in that direction.

Mr. LISTER. Let the Act declare in express terms that the bicycle shall be carried free.

Mr. SPROULE. It may be necessary to go that far. The Toronto street railway carries bicycles free. That is a city having 200,000 people, and it must be a greater concession on the part of that electric railway than it would be on the part of any ordinary railway company. The cars are small and the room is therefore very limited, and yet bicycles are carried as free personal baggage. Surely if an electric street railway company, with limited accommodation in the cars, can carry bicycles free, a similar concession can be granted by the ordinary railway service. Already seven states in the Union have passed laws to carry bicycles free as personal baggage. What has been done there is regarded as right, and the railway companies have carried out the law, after having tested its legality in some instances. One or two of the largest railway companies on the continent have accepted this view and are prepared to carry bicycles as passengers' baggage. The railway companies in those states having accepted the situation, and the electric railway of Toronto having agreed to carry bicycles free, the time seems to have arrived when Parliament should impose a similar duty on the part of our railway companies, provided they will not otherwise do it. Taking all these things into consideration, we would do no injustice to the railway companies by asking them to give a more liberal interpretation of the law. Although perhaps in some cases, this would be inconvenient to the railway companies and would require more space in their cars, there is no doubt in my mind that they would ultimately make money by it. The time is rapidly coming when the force of public opinion will be so strong that neither the Parliament of Canada, nor the railway companies will be able to refuse to carry bicycles as personal baggage.

Mr. CRAIG. I feel that this in an important measure, and one which requires very careful consideration. I was requested by a number of wheelmen in the town in which I reside to support this Bill, and I answered them, that I would give it my best consideration, and if after hearing both sides of the question I could see my way to support it, I would do so. That is the position I take now. I have a natural repugnance to vote for a measure which compels public institutions to do more than they have hitherto been obliged to do, unless it is distinctly shown that what they are asked to do is in the public interest, and will not impose upon them any unfair obligations. I believe that to be a pretty safe position to take on these questions. I was struck by one remark made by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey), when he said, that this Parliament has the right to dictate anything to railway corporations. It is true in one sense. We have the right, that is we have the power to do it, and I feel that having that power, it imposes upon us the obligation of being very careful as to how we use it. We have the power, but we should never use that power in an unfair way. As was pointed out by the mover (Mr. Casey), we are asked to define baggage. The hon. gentleman told us, that baggage had been defined by a high authority, and he gave us the definition. It occurred to me to ask: why we should be asked to give any specific definition, and to go further than that general definition which has been laid down. If we specify bicycles as baggage, do we say that tricycles are baggage? I see, that as an amendment to the first clause, the sentence is added:

That checks shall be affixed to any part of baggage having a handle, or to any part to which a check can be affixed.

The question occurs to me now, whether a wheelbarrow would come under this definition of baggage. That may seem an absurd sort of question, but it is a fact that many men who go to work have wheelbarrows, and the question arises, whether that would come under this definition. I do not suppose it would, nor do I suppose that tricycles would come under the definition; so that a man travelling with a tricycle could not have it checked, while another man could have his bicycle checked. I mention this merely to show that it is rather a dangerous thing for this Parliament, to constitute itself a dictionary to define a word like "baggage" which has a general signification.

Now, why do the railways object to this Bill, and, have they any reasonable ground for objection? I have not read these circulars which have been distributed, but it occurs to me, that one objection is that bicycles are awkward to handle. We know that trunks are jumbled in and out of the baggage car, and we know also that bicycles could not be handled in that way. Trunks are piled indiscriminately in the car, whereas a bicycle would have to be hung up or placed in a rack, and consequently occupy a great deal more space. There is also the risk of breakage. I presume that if the railway companies were compelled to carry bicycles as baggage, they would be held responsible for their safe keeping, and this would be a serious consideration as the bicycle is a very delicate machine, and might be very easily broken. All this shows that the question is not so easy to settle as it would appear at first sight. The hon. member for Montreal (Mr. Penny) mentioned, that bicycles often run out a short distance from the city, and that they want to come back by train. That seems to me to be one very strong objection to the Bill. Suppose thirty, or even fifty bicyclists, go to some station ten miles from Toronto, and buy their tickets which cost them about thirty cents, and when the train comes along they want to return; these young men who go out for amusement could compel the companies to carry their bicycle, although the railway company might not have expected that they would be called upon to provide such accommodation on a train which merely pulled up at the depot. This would undoubtedly cause delay and inconvenience.

It is quite natural that bicyclists should want this privilege, and I sympathize with them in their desire that this Bill should pass. They no doubt think they have a perfect right to it, and I am strongly in favour of it, if it can be accomplished without doing anything unfair to the railway corporations. I heartily approve of giving the Bill a second reading and referring it to the Railway Committee, which is the proper place for such a Bill to go. In the committee, the whole question will be argued by those in favour of granting the privilege, and by those opposed to it, and the members of the committee who like myself are anxious to do what is fair to both parties, will have an opportunity of hearing both sides and deciding on the evidence. The hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) mentioned, that the Toronto Street Railway carries bicycles free. I do not know whether that is so or not; but I believe I saw a paragraph in one of the newspapers to-day or yesterday, which stated, that the Toronto Street Railway had absolutely forbidden its employees to take bicycles on at all. I mention that to show that there are a great many points which ought to be discussed in considering this measure, and the only place where that discussion can properly take place is before the Railway Committee.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to resent the imputation made by the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule), that the proposal to send this Bill to the Railway Committee is for the purpose of killing it. My experience of that committee is, that it gives careful and full consideration to every Bill that comes before it, and I am quite sure that this Bill will receive fair and reasonable consideration from that committee. I am in favour of its being sent there. The hon. member (Mr. Craig) has raised some very important points, and it is quite proper that the representatives of the railway companies should be heard with regard to their objections to this Bill, and that also those who are interested in its becoming law should have an opportunity of stating their case. When both sides are heard, the Railway Committee will fairly and impartially deal with the whole question, and report to the House pro or con upon it. There is another point to which allusion has already been made. We certainly have not reached such a condition of railway development in this country that we can afford to legislate imprudently with regard to railway corporations. We know that for years they have not been earning the money they anticipated when the original investments were made in them, and I think we should be exceedingly careful about forcing upon them by legislation anything that would damage their credit or interfere with investments in railways in the future. I hope that the railway people, when they come to hear the arguments presented by the advocates of this Bill, will be able to give very sound and good reasons why it should not become law. If they cannot do that, I have no doubt the committee will adopt the Bill and report it to the House. I think it was possibly in an unguarded moment that my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) spoke of the Railway Committee choking or killing the Bill if it went there. I have never known a Bill that went before the Railway Committee that did not receive careful consideration on its merits; and I have never known any Bill to be rejected by that committee which gave evidence of being a Bill that should be passed. Therefore, I hope that if this Bill passes its second reading, it will go to the Railway Committee, where I am sure all parties will have a full opportunity of presenting their arguments for or against it. Another point worthy of consideration is that raised by my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Lister). I have heard railway managers say that if this Bill passed, and you added to the amount of work they would have to do for nothing, they would be forced to charge for other baggage, in order to earn money in some other way. My hon. friend from East Grey asks why the railways should require bicycles to be boxed up in order to go as baggage. If my hon. friend were going on a journey, and he carried loosely in his hands a number of coats and other things needed for the journey, would he not think it unreasonable to ask the railways to check them in that condition? I think they would insist on their being boxed up in some way, so that they could be handled carefully. The railways may say the same with reference to bicycles. We know that a bicycle is a tender structure, easily damaged, which must be carefully handled; and in being transferred from train to train and coming into collision with trunks, the bicycles might suffer serious damage; and if a baggage car got into a collision, I am afraid they would fare worse than the trunks. The question is whether the railway companies should be responsible, under these circumstances, for bicycles in the same way as they are for ordinary baggage. In England I understand bicycles are not carried free, but for a moderate charge; I do not know whether that is general or not. In the United States some railways carry them free, while others do not. In Canada I should have hoped that the railway companies had decided to carry bicycles as baggage. I think it would have been in their interest if they had done so. But we should avoid legislation of this kind, if we can do it by getting the railway companies and the bicyclists to come together and adopt some reasonable way of getting over the difficulty. I would rather see that done than see this Bill forced through the House in bitter opposition to the railways.

Mr. CASEY. There is no bitter opposition.

Mr. McMULLEN. If the Bill is sent to the committee, and both parties state their case there, the committee will be able to come to an intelligent conclusion on the subject.

Mr. LOUNT. The objections made to the passage of this Bill do not seem to me to be serious, as every member who has spoken so far has endorsed the principle that railways should be compelled to carry bicycles free. I think they express the sentiments of the country generally; and if one is to be guided at all by petitions to this House coming from all parts of the country, it can be very easily seen that there is a unanimous feeling in favour of the passage of the Bill. I have not yet heard any strong reason why it should not become law. It is quite true, as the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has observed, that there is no law at present that can compel a railway company to carry baggage free. That is, there is no written law; but there is a very well understood law of practice, which existed for many years past, in fact, almost from the very inception of railway enterprises, that they shall not only carry the passenger for his ticket, but also necessarily his baggage to a limited extent free, and properly so. Had it been necessary to pass legislation for the purpose of compelling railway companies to carry baggage free, no doubt long before this there would have been such an Act upon the Statute-book; but as the railway companies have recognized their duty in that respect, there has been no necessity for any such legislation. Therefore, I may safely say that there is an unwritten law practically compelling railway companies to carry baggage free. Then the question arises, whether or not bicycles should be regarded as of that character. One has to have regard to the class of persons who are asking for this legislation. The bicycle traveller carries nothing with him but his wheel, and he would be entitled, when travelling by railway, by the unwritten law I have mentioned, to carry 200 pounds of baggage. The railway company would make no objection whatever to carrying this amount. It is, therefore, not at all unreasonable that being unable to carry anything but his bicycle he should ask that the railway companies be compelled to deal with him as fairly and liberally as they do with ordinary travellers. What objection can there be to this? It cannot matter much whether the baggage be in the shape of a bicycle or a box so long as it does not amount, either in size or weight, to more than the other baggage a traveller would have the right to carry. It surely cannot be urged that a bicycle is more troublesome to carry than the ordinary Saratoga. Probably the best evidence we can obtain as to the reasonableness of this measure is the fact that in eleven states of the union bicycles are now being carried by railways free; and as the railway companies in these states have been able to make arrangements to carry bicycles with the greatest convenience, the objection urged from that point of view does not appear very serious. You will notice, Sir, also that in the United States this law is not confined to any one section but prevails all over from New York to California. Of the intervening states, eleven have legislated in this direction. We are told that we should not press this because the railway companies may possibly put a charge upon baggage. I apprehend no difficulty on that score. My hon. friend from West Lambton has drawn attention to this Bill and pointed out that it is framed in such a way as not to be a benefit to the bicycle owners, if it passes. Well, eliminate a few words, and you make it operative without any difficulty. Strike out in the second section the words "Within the meaning of this section" and let it read "Bicycles are hereby declared to be baggage, and a passenger shall not be required to protect in any way any bicycle delivered by him for transport," and add these words "and shall be carried free of charge." In this way you make the bicycle baggage, and compel the railway companies to carry it free of charge, and I can see no reason why this Bill should go to the Railway Committee. The first section might be struck out altogether. I would simply take the second section and make it provide that bicycles shall be baggage and shall be carried by railway companies free of charge. That is what the wheelmen are asking for and that can be passed at once if the House approves of it, without any reference to the Railway Committee. But the objection is raised that this ought to be referred to the Railway Committee in order that both sides may be heard. Why, Mr. Speaker, we have heard both sides. The amount of literature which has been sent to every member of this House by railway companies on this matter sets forth every possible objection they can make, and we cannot possibly require any more evidence. The members of this House are quite capable of coming to a conclusion upon the simple question whether bicycles should be baggage or not, without further information from or reference to the Railway Committee. I therefore would urge that this Bill should not be referred to the Railway Committee but be dealt with by the Committee of the Whole House and amended in the way I have pointed out.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise merely to suggest that in such an important measure we ought to hear from the Minister of Railways and Canals. It is clear that if this Bill is to be seriously dealt with and passed into law, that cannot be done without the consent of the Government, and if the Government wish that it should become law, it is perfectly clear that nothing is easier than to pass it. We ought to hear from the Minister of Railways and Canals on this important matter.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I have no objection at all to state the view which has presented itself to my mind and which is entertained by the Government with respect to one question, at all events, which has been spoken of in the present discussion. I gather that the sense of the House on both sides is in favour of allowing this Bill to pass through its second reading. I have no objection to offer to that course. On the contrary, without expressing any personal view as to whether the Bill should ultimately pass into law or not, I am decidedly in favour of the course which seems to be approved by the general sense of the House, of having the second reading taken. I am, however, on the other hand, decidedly of opinion that it is a proper Bill to be referred to the Committee on Railways and Canals. I think that there are features of it and questions involved in it which can be much better dealt with and more satisfactorily disposed of there than in the Committee of the Whole House. That is the view the Government entertain. We feel that as this proposes an amendment to the general Railway Act, it should receive the fullest possible consideration. There are interests which are entitled to be heard and considered. Even those who may most strongly favour the ultimate passage of the Bill will agree that it should be threshed out fully, and that cannot be so efficiently done as by the Railway Committee. If this Bill receives the second reading, I will move that it be referred to that committee, and I will do so without the slightest disposition to prevent it being dealt with by that committee as speedily as circumstances will permit. So far as I am concerned, I am personally prepared to afford every facility for the early consideration of this Bill by that committee, and I regret that the hon. member for East Grey thought it right to assume that a proposal of that kind implied, in any way, a disposition on the part of the mover of the proposal to strangle the measure at its birth. Such an idea is most unfair to the Railway Committee. As far as my observation has extended, that committee has, at all events, evinced a disposition to give every measure before it the fullest and fairest consideration. If the Bill passes its second reading, I shall move that it be referred to that committee, and shall do so, feeling that I am not thereby evincing the slightest hostility to this measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair) moved :

That the Bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.

Mr. CASEY. As the promoter of the Bill I wish to say that I am sorry my hon. friend has thought it necessary to refer this Bill to the Railway Committee. It is a Bill of only one clause, containing no intricacies and hardly any points disputed or requiring evidence. I think personally that a Committee of the Whole House could have dealt as well or better with this Bill as the Railway Committee. I hardly like the practice of referring public Bills to a private Bills committee. I do not think it is regular, and I do not think it is in the interest of public legislation. That committee was intended for private Bills, and they take up its time. However, on the excellent assurance we have received from the Minister that he will facilitate the consideration of this Bill in the Railway Committee, and that he has no hostility to the Bill, and will do nothing to kill it off in that committee, I am satisfied that the Bill will receive fair play before the Railway Committee, will be called in good time, and will have a fair chance of being passed if the majority of members think it a right thing to pass it. Under all these circumstances, I have no objection to the motion of the hon. the Minister of Railways. I have only mentioned my general objections for the purpose of putting them on record for any cases that may arise in the future.

Motion agreed to.

EXPORT BONUS ON BUTTER.

The House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Reid in favour of the payment to farmers of a bonus on a specified quantity of finest fresh creamery butter to be exported to Great Britain.

Mr. DAVIN. It seems to me that the motion is one which ought to commend itself to the House. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) when my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) made that motion, contended that the principle of bonusing butter was a bad principle. But we have the tariff before us now, and in that tariff we have the principle of a bonus. We have the iron bonus. If it is a good thing to help the manufacturer of iron by means of a bonus, why should it be a bad thing to help the manufacturer of butter in the same way? The hon. the Minister of Agriculture argued against the bonusing of butter because he said butter had been bonused in Victoria, and butter-making had made great progress there. On the face of it, it seemed to me to be a non-sequitur that the hon. gentleman should refer to the fact that butter had been bonused in Victoria, that it had made great progress there, and that therefore a bonus was not a good thing. It seems to me that the experience of Victoria, where the manufacturer of butter has risen from one million to thirteen millions is an instance in favour of the policy suggested by my hon. friend. Then the hon. Minister of Agriculture pointed to the fact that in Quebec there has been a bonus on butter and he said that, instead of the bonus going into the pocket of the farmer, it had gone into the pocket of the middleman. What did that show? It showed that the legislation was defective, and all we have to do in embodying in an Act the suggestion of my hon. friend, is to avoid the mistake which was made in Quebec. I find, on turning to the Statistical Year-Book of 1895, that the butter imported into Great Britain was 158,238 tons, or 316,476,000 pounds. Of that quantity we exported to Great Britain only 4,970,047 or about one seventy-eighth part of the butter that is imported into Great Britain. The position of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture on this matter seems a strange one. The hon. gentleman takes a great interest in his department. I am glad to say that; I am more forward to say it in his absence than I would be if he were here. I think he takes as great an interest in his department as any Minister could; and those of us on this side who have had any transactions with him have received the impression of an interest in his department, and an efficiency to which we are glad to testify. The hon. gentleman lays it down, in the course of his speech, that Canada is quite capable of producing the very finest kind of butter. In every part of Canada, but especially in that part from which a few of us come, there cannot be the least doubt, we can produce butter the best that can be produced in the world. Well, why should not this House do for the farmer of Canada what it would do for the iron-maker in Canada, and why should we not seek to get part of this immense market that imports every year nearly 160,000 tons of butter? I humbly think that if we adopt the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Reid) the result will be that we shall stimulate the export of butter to such an extent that we shall make progress somewhat like that made in Victoria, and, instead of sending four million pounds of butter we shall send twenty-four million pounds in a few years. With the cold storage policy that hon. gentlemen have adopted from their predecessors and which the hon. Minister is carrying out with such energy—in fact one of the reasons why I admire him is that one of the subjects that I was pressing on my own friends for two or three years, he took up with exemplary energy which gave me the greatest possible satisfaction—there is no reason why this country should not compete with Denmark in the exportation of butter to the English market. I think that the proposal that something should be done to help our farmers, and to stimulate the manufacture and exportation of this great staple of industry finds favour with those newspapers that have directed their attention to this subject. At one time we were very low in the manufacture of cheese. But, in consequence of the fostering influence of the Government of Canada this has become a staple of export to be reckoned in the very largest figures. Although we can produce good butter just as well as we can produce good cheese, we are still sending to that vast English market, only a sixtieth part of the amount that she imports. Therefore, I would urge on the Government, notwithstanding what has fallen from my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, to consider this motion favourably, and certainly if it comes to a division, I shall give my vote in its favour.

Mr. McMILLAN. Before this resolution passes I would like to say a word or two. There is no doubt that it is in the interests of Canada at the present time to foster legitimately, as far as possible, the dairy industry generally, and the butter industry particularly. But let me say that the Government has already a very large sum of money in the Estimates for the benefit of creameries all over the country. Every creamery in the country has the privilege of putting up cold storage, and if they put it up according to instructions, they get $100 for each creamery. The Government have also appropriated a large sum of money for the outlying districts, so that the farmers who are not able to hold their butter until it is marketed, will get the benefit of this large amount of money, which will be used to pay for their milk as it goes into the creamery, and they will refund it when the butter is sold. But apart from that, there are $140,000 in the Estimates this season for the benefit of the creameries. As a farmer I say that that is a large sum of money to be given for our benefit. Let me also add that according to the evidence of the Minister of Agriculture, the system of bonusing creameries in the province of Quebec has not been successful. We have the evidence of people there, at one of their meetings, that except in one instance there had not been a pound of butter manufactured in that province as a result of the bonus. It appears that the persons who manufactured butter from cream and milk sent from Ontario, got a good portion of the bonus, and by this means had built up a little business at the expense of the Quebec legislature. Then there was a committee appointed to draft a resolution strongly advising the discontinuance of the system of granting bonuses to creameries, and also advising the application of whatever money had been voted for the purpose, to increasing and improving the refrigeration accommodation, both by sea and land. Here is the resolution that was passed by that committee that was appointed :

That this association, having heard that the province of Quebec proposes the discontinuing the bonus to creameries, heartily concurs in the same, and recommends that any further grants be given towards the increasing of refrigeration accommodation.

I believe it is the duty of the Government to do everything that they possibly can to get our goods carried to the British market in the very best possible condition. They have done that, and as a farmer, while I have an interest as shareholder in a creamery to-day, I believe that we are getting all that the farmers in reality ought to get in that direction ; and if this comes to a vote, I shall certainly vote as a farmer against giving any bonuses in that direction. We also have evidence from the Australian colonies, where butter has been bonused for a certain length of time, that the butter industry was not benefited by the bonus, showing that their experience has been similar to ours in this country. I hold that the Government is doing all that they ought to do by giving us cold storage, and even assisting to build creameries in outlying districts where it is a necessity that the dairy interest should be encouraged in its inception. I do not know, from the evidence that we have before us, that it would benefit the butter industry to give a bonus for butter ; therefore as a farmer I hold that it is not the duty of this Government to give a bonus.

Mr. BRODER. I dissent from the view of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. McMillan. He has quoted from a speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture on the 7th of April, giving the verdict of the trade in Montreal in reference to the butter bonus in the province of Quebec. Now, Sir, it is quite reasonable to suppose that the men engaged in the produce trade in Montreal would not, in their own interest, favour a bonus. Their object is to wait for the accumulation of stock in the country, to buy it at reduced prices, and hold it in anticipation of a rise in the market ; and they would naturally be opposed to the continuous shipment of our butter from the factories week by week. Now, the object of the bonus should be to induce farmers and producers of this article to ship it continuously week after week, while it is fresh, rather than hold it until it becomes stale and unmarketable. It is therefore, quite reasonable to expect that the trade would not want the butter to be shipped from the factory through the city of Montreal without passing through their hands. I am somewhat surprised to hear the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan), who is a farmer himself, take the view that he has taken. Now, the Minister of Agriculture held that the bonus did not increase the product of butter in the province of Quebec. Well, his statement is at variance with the statements of the Department of Agriculture in that province. I hold in my hand a statement issued by the Department of Agriculture of Quebec as to the increase of the number of factories in that province during certain years, a part of those years being covered by the two years that the bonus was granted. For the sake of comparison I will take the liberty of giving the House the figures of the number of creameries and cheese factories. In the year 1890, in the province of Quebec, there were 617 cheese factories ; that number had increased to 1,467 in 1894. In 1890 the number of butter factories was 111, and in 1894 there were 307 ; and last year there were, in round numbers, 400. Now, Sir, that proves without doubt that the bonusing system in the province of Quebec, although giving only a small amount, 1 cent per pound, largely increased the butter product in that province. Now, notwithstanding the fact that the cheese industry stands on such good footing, and holds its own against all competitors in the English market, I question whether it would not be wise for the people of Canada, and particularly for the farming interest, to keep these two industries more evenly balanced than they are. When we look at the condition of things in the United States with reference to dairying we find—I am now quoting from memory from a report of the Secretary of Agriculture for the United States—that in 1894, which is the last report I have been able to secure, they had 16 million milch cows in the United States, and they had 36 million of other cattle, steers and those that were non-milkers. Now, if they saw fit, they could easily have 30 million milch cows in three or four years, by ceasing to keep steers and fat cattle, and by turning their attention instead to keeping dairy-cows. Therefore, we ought to be on the alert, for I noticed in the "Gazette" of Montreal, of the 7th of April, a statement there that the Department of Agriculture in the United States are already proposing to send commissioners over to England to inquire into the condition of the market there, and to endeavour to secure the English market for American butter. For this purpose they are going to move on the very line adopted by the old Government in Canada, and continued by the present Government. What I wish to call the attention of the House to is this fact, that if there is anything the Canadian people can do to place their butter on the English market, we should do it. The only system by which this can be done is by placing the butter on the market every week while it is fresh; but you cannot induce the farmer to do this while butter commands only low prices, for he considers the question of prices as much as does the speculator. He wants to hold his product for higher prices, just as does the speculator, and he will not ship it unless he is specially induced to do so while it is fresh. We cannot secure the English market for our butter unless the product we send over is fresh. I am surprised at the position taken by the Minister of Agriculture, because he seems to lose sight of the fact that the logical conclusion of the cold storage system is to keep the product fresh and in good condition, and thus enable it to find its proper place in the market. In regard to Australia and Victoria being benefited by the bonus system, we must remember that these colonies have given a larger bonus than that brought to the attention of the House. They have given 4 cents per pound. Hon. members can well understand how such a bonus has built up the trade. Instead of lopping it off at once, it would have been very much better to have taken off one cent of the bonus, say each year. I have here a statement showing the increase of the product of butter in the colony of Victoria during the six years in which the bonus was granted, as follows:—

	Pounds.	Value.
1888	1,202,649	£ 54,369
1889	1,019,230	37,447
1890	1,626,605	60,327
1891	4,652,344	236,336
1892	7,093,344	355,700
1893	13,975,633	573,107

If hon. gentlemen will look at the money received for this number of pounds of butter and take the trouble to notice the prices, they will find that the prices received by this colony in the English market were very good prices; and when they are compared with the prices of Canadian butter, it will be found that the Australian colonies realized a larger difference than that between bonus and no bonus, and that they realized more than 4 cents per pound above the ordinary price. This shows that not only did the people of Victoria get back the 4 cents per pound owing to their butter being fresh and in good condition, but that notwithstanding the Government had paid 4 cents per pound bonus, they received 4 cents additional, or 8 cents in all. This is a matter that should be dealt with on business principles. The farmers cannot understand why $2,000,000 can be expended on militia and $10,000 only in promoting the butter interest. There is no use fighting when there is no bread in the House. We should expend $1,000,000 of the $2,000,000 voted for militia on the farmers. They are loyal in their affection for the country. It is about time to take up and seriously consider the interests of our farmers. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk about what they are doing for the farmers. Their proposals are calculated to benefit the well-to-do farmer who has money, but the poor farmer who is struggling with an unimproved farm and who has a few cows, will be assisted very little by the propositions of hon. gentlemen opposite.

The main reason why Canadian butter does not occupy a better place in the English market is that it is shipped when it is too stale. The Commissioner of Agriculture of the province of Quebec took the trouble to send commissioners to England. He asked certain questions in regard to the trade, and to those questions he received replies from men largely interested in the butter trade in the old country, and five out of seven of those firms answered Question 4—Why does not our butter realize a better price?—with the statement that it reached the market too stale. In some instances, it is too salt; but in almost every case the reason it does not realize a better price is because it is too stale. We know that France ships fresh butter to that market, and although that butter is very inferior to our Canadian butter, it realizes a better price, because it is fresh and very slightly salt. The people of England can inhale all the salt they require from their atmosphere, and do not need to take it in their butter; but our farmers think they must put it in large quantities in their butter for keeping purposes. If they take out of that butter all foreign matter, it will practically keep itself. The difficulty arises from not being able to keep out foreign matter, and thus butter becomes strong and rancid; but if the butter were carefully made and subsequently kept under the cold storage system, there is no reason why it should not reach the English market in a fresh condition and be able to meet all competitors. I venture to say that the Canadian people as a whole are prepared to support the proposition contained in the motion of my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Reid).

I wish to answer the statement made that under a bonus system not one dollar goes into the pocket of the farmer. That appears to be the conclusion reached by the Minister of Agriculture, who said there was no benefit resulting from such a system and that it did not increase the price of butter received by farmers. If the money did not reach the farmers, of course it could not do any good to them. If, however, the butter trade in Montreal received the money, then why were they opposed to the bonus system? I have had some experience in the trade, and I am aware that speculators are satisfied to make half a cent a pound profit. If the men in the trade could get one cent per pound Government bonus, they would be well paid on their transactions. They would be the last men in the world to advocate a discontinuance of the bonus if the money went into their pockets. I venture to say that all the trade are not opposed to the bonus system. Now, Sir, I have here a statement made by a very prominent dealer in Montreal, and he spoke rather favourably of the bonus in the province of Quebec. In the report of the Minister of Agriculture of the province of Quebec for 1895, he gives a statement made by Mr. A. A. Ayer, one of the largest produce dealers not only in Montreal but in Canada. I am quite aware that Mr. Ayer afterwards advocated the discontinuance of the bonus, but he did so for the simple reason that he declared the bonus had already done its work. He said:

The bounty has had the effect of stimulating the exportation of butter. This trade promises to turn out much more satisfactorily than in the past. We are surprised at the number of demands we receive. Our stock of butter at the present moment is very low, and we expect high prices for the month of October and for next winter. Our exports, up to last Saturday, amounted to 38,500 boxes or tubs, against 20,786 at the same date last year, and we think that about 6,000 tubs will be shipped this week, which will still further increase the difference over last year.

In that statement, he is referring to the exports of his own firm only, and not to the trade generally. That is the position that Mr. Ayer took in 1895 in reference to the effect of bonusing in the province of Quebec. I wish to say in connection with the question, that if there was a failure in the province of Quebec, and if the money did not reach the people for whom it was voted, and if the effect was not that which was desired, nevertheless it ought to be within the competence of hon. gentlemen opposite to so devise a scheme, that the money will reach the proper parties, and that the effect will be what it is intended to be. The certificates under which this butter was shipped from the province of Quebec were such, that if the scheme had been carried out properly, it would have resulted in the commendable object they had in view. I venture to say, that this Government should give a higher bonus than one cent a pound. I would advocate 3 cents a pound bonus and I would advocate that after a few years, one cent a year should be taken off; thus bringing the trade back to its normal condition, without a bonus. In that way, the effect would not be disastrous on our trade. The Government must induce our people to ship the butter over to the English market, when it is fresh, or we will never secure that market. The trade in England is handled entirely different from what it is in Canada. If you get a customer for Canadian butter he wants to get his supply constantly, and in good condition. He does not want to go to the market one week and get Canadian butter, and the next week being unable to get Canadian butter to be compelled to take Danish or Australian butter. When a dealer gets customers for a good article of butter, he wants to continue giving them that article. The difficulty has been, that when a dealer goes into the large markets, such as Liverpool and London, he may get a fair article of Canadian butter one week, he puts that on his counter and gets a class of customers who like it; but when he goes back to the markets of London or Liverpool next week, he cannot get Canadian butter up to the former standard, and so he has to take something else. He cannot get a constant supply of good Canadian butter, and consequently his customers will demand something better. If our Canadian butter were put on the English market in good shape it would find customers, and if it were furnished of uniform quality and continuously, these customers would continue to use it, and so create a demand. I hope, Sir, that if we have any other member in this House who will represent the farming interest with the earnestness of the hon. gentleman from Huron (Mr. McMillan), he will take a different line of argument, and one more in harmony with the interests of the farming community.

Mr. ROGERS. I wish to say one word in connection with this matter. I did not expect that it would have been brought up to-night, and so I am not prepared to deal with the question at length. I, for one, would be very sorry to say a word in any way which would throw the least damper on any policy calculated to encourage the farming industries of this country. This has been a live question for me for many years back, and I have always felt that in the past we have not received that consideration from the Government which we should have received. One of my strong complaints against the late Government was, that they did not attend to the interests of the farming community as the importance of that community demanded. I claim that the Government of Canada has been doing for the farmers during the last three or four years, only what they should have done for us years ago. We all know the high stand which our Canadian cheese has taken in the English market, and we know also, that it has worked its way up slowly and gradually to that high place, with but very little encouragement from the Government. We have had very little assistance in any way, in the shape of schools or instructors throughout the country, both of which have been the growth of later years. Many years ago the cheese market was entirely in the hands of the Americans. Their Government advanced the interests of the American farmers, while our Government was in the background in that respect. The Canadian farmers, much to their credit, took this matter into their own hands, and brought up Canadian cheese to its present standard in the English market. We have felt for a number of years, that Canadian butter has not taken the place it should take in the old country markets. It was not shipped in a proper state, and it was kept too long and became stale. Another reason which told against it was, that it was all dairy butter, made indiscriminately of all grades and shapes, and even if it had been shipped directly, under these circumstances it could not have competed with the butter from other dairying countries. Of late years, however, butteries and creameries have been established not only in the summer but in the winter as well, and this has given a great impetus to our trade in that article. If I thought for a moment that Government bonusing of butter would be of lasting benefit to the farmers of Canada, I would be sorry to say anything against it; but I do feel that the stand which the Government has now taken will for the present at all events fill the Bill. We farmers on the whole, have always contended in the past, that the bonusing of exports in any branch of trade was against our interests. We have advocated that strongly, and we propose to continue advocating it, and not to ask for any bonuses. Give us a fair show in a legitimate way, and I believe we can hold our own with any country in the world. It is quite evident to me, that the small bonus which has been mentioned here, of one cent a pound, would not in any way increase the export of our butter. Our main object is to get lower freight rates and better accommodation in the shape of cold storage. I am very glad to see the stand which the present Government have taken this year, by appropriating such a large amount of money to encourage cold storage. If the farmers were so encouraged that they could secure a uniform market which they could rely upon, a market that would not be glutted and the prices brought down to a starvation basis, then they would have a better chance of selling their butter in the English market, and of increasing its reputation there. I would not advocate that the Government should commence any other system, until they had given their present system of supplying cold storage, a fair opportunity of proving whether it will be successful or not. If our butter trade in the English market does not increase in consequence of this policy, then we shall have to look out for something else. At the present time, we do not believe in the principle of bonuses, and we do not ask for it this year. I believe that when the present policy of the Government in regard to this matter has had a fair trial it will be so successful that we will not have to ask for a bonus, and so it will give us stronger ground on which to take our stand against the bonusing of any other industry.

Mr. REID. I must say that I am surprised at the course taken by the hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan), and the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers) in regard to this resolution. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) has been in this House for a number of years, and has been regularly speaking in the interest of the farmers, claiming that they were in a very bad state, and that the Government should do something to assist them. He mentions that there is now a vote of $140,000 in the Estimates in the interest of the farmers. I take it for granted that he means item No. 83:

To promote dairying interests by advances for milk and cream, and for making butter and cheese, to be recouped out of the proceeds of sales of such butter and cheese to be placed to the credit of the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

As I understand this item, any money to be advanced to the farmers has to be recouped out of the proceeds of sales. In that case the farmers are not getting any benefit whatever except the use of the money. Would not any business man go into any business in this country if the Government would put up the money in the same way? The resolution I propose would give a direct benefit to the farmers. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), if I remember rightly, took a strong stand during the last campaign against giving bounties. I do not know whether or not he will be in favour of the bounties on iron; but I take it for granted that he will be. If that is the case, we shall find him favouring the bounty on iron and opposing the bounty I asked to be given to the farmers. Now, in figuring up the amount that I would like placed in the Estimates for the farmers this year, say $10,000, I find that it would amount to about one-fifth of a cent a head of the population of the Dominion to-day. I believe people who are living in the cities and towns and villages, and who are dependent on the farmers, would gladly pay their share towards this bonus. I was strongly pressed by both Liberal and Conservative farmers in my constituency to urge this matter on the Government. It is not a party matter at all; it is a matter I believe in the interest of the farmers, and in the interest of the public as a whole. I believe that the large amount of money that would be brought into this country by the increased quantity of butter that would be sold in the English market would be of great benefit to this country; and I am especially surprised to find the two gentlemen who I thought would be the most willing to support this resolution, taking the stand they do this evening. In view of that, I ask that the fact be placed on record.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher), I would suggest that my hon. friend have this matter again adjourned. The arguments which have been brought forward, for my part, I do not feel competent to answer; but when the Minister of Agriculture is in his seat again, he will no doubt be prepared to give his views on the subject. I would therefore move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. WALLACE. Will the hon. the leader of the Government give the House to understand that he will see that the matter is brought before the House again? Otherwise I think it should be disposed of to-night.

The PRIME MINISTER. I will undertake to have it brought up again.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The PRIME MINISTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 6th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

THE TUG "LILY."

Mr. McMULLEN asked:

(a.) What was the date on which the tug "Lily" was first engaged by the Dominion Government?

(b.) The name or names of the owner or owners?

(c.) The estimated value of the tug?

(d.) The number of days employed each year from her first engagement and the gross number of days?

(e.) The hire paid per day and the gross amount of hire paid to date?

(f.) Was hire paid on Sundays as well as other days?

(g.) Where do the owners reside, and where has the tug been used?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). The following are the answers to the hon. gentleman's questions:—(a.) On 1st June, 1884. (b.) W. B. & S. Anglin—from 1st June, 1884, to 31st August, 1891. S. Anglin & Co.—from 1st September, 1891, to date. (c.) From $1,000 to $1,500. (d and e.)

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Firman McClure, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Colchester, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding).

HUDSON'S BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to interrogate the Government with reference to the Hudson's Bay expedition, which is a matter of very deep concern to the people of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and the time for the departure of which is close at hand. We hear rumours in the lobbies, and I have seen statements in the newspapers, that the vessel which the Government propose to send out to investigate the navigability of the straits is not at all suited for the purpose. In fact, it is stated that this vessel is entirely too small and too light and entirely unfitted for ice navigation. I may also say that I had a conversation with Mr. Hugh Sutherland, the president of the Winnipeg and Hudson's Bay Railway, and he leads me to understand that he has looked very carefully into the arrangements made, and, in his opinion, the boat is not at all a satisfactory one for the purpose. I have also learned from certain conversations I have had that the impression exists that the men who are to be sent out in charge of the expedition have not the necessary experience to conduct an expedition of that kind. I should like to have a statement from the hon. Minister of Marine regarding this expedition. I should like him to tell us exactly the kind of boat that has been chartered, and, if possible, submit to us some evidence as to the character and fitness of that boat for the purpose. The hon. gentleman might also inform the House as to the ability of the man who has been selected to take charge of the expedition. This is a matter in which this House and the country are very deeply interested, especially Manitoba and the North-west Territories. For the last ten or fifteen years—

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman must not go into a discussion of the question.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have but two or three words to say in conclusion, but I shall resume my seat, Sir, if you think I have gone far enough.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman has gone far enough.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The subject to which the hon. gentleman has brought the attention of the House is a very important one. Some questions were asked in the Senate to-day concerning it, and I had some information prepared this morning in order to answer the questions in the Senate and that information I shall be very happy to give to the hon. gentleman now. When the House last year voted some $35,000 for this expedition, I felt it was desirable to have the very best boat that could be obtained for the purpose. After thinking the matter over and consulting with my colleagues, I came to the conclusion that it was absolutely essential that the gentleman placed in command of the expedition should be one who would have the confidence of the Canadian public. I am happy to say that I think I have been able to select a gentleman who will command that universal confidence. Commander Wakeham has been for many years in command of "La Canadienne" in the Gulf fisheries. His record in the Marine Department stands very high. I think my hon. friend opposite (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), who was in charge of the department before me, will endorse what I say, that there are very few men better qualified to command an expedition of that kind, both from his experience and education, and it was with the greatest satisfaction that I found myself enabled to procure his services to command this expedition.

The next point that occupied our attention was the class of vessel to be sent over. There were many conflicting opinions, and I did not attempt to rely upon my own judgment in the matter at all. I had many consultations with Commander Wakeham and the other nautical advisers of my department, Captain McElhinney and others, and we determined that the best boat for the purpose would be one of the ships employed in the sea fisheries for the Newfoundland sealers. I sent a special agent to Newfoundland to examine the ships, and one that was recommended the highest was the steamer "Hope," which had been engaged by Commander Peary, the United States Arctic navigator, for two years previously. She was a vessel of 452 tons gross and 307 net, with a horse-power of seventy, and a speed of eight knots, but she was already engaged, and her owners would not charter her for the expedition. There was a sister ship called the "Diana," which we were fortunate enough to secure. Some misconception exists about this vessel. She was built twenty-two years ago, and there were rumours to the effect that she was not suitable, but the important fact was ignored that the "Diana" is a Dundee sealer screw-boat, was rebuilt entirely in 1892. She has a tonnage of 473 gross and 275 net, almost the same as the "Hope," with a horse-power of seventy and a speed of nine knots. Mr. Whitely, the officer of the fishery department in Newfoundland, after examining all the ships there, recommended this one as the most suitable, and I am happy to be able to say that we were able to charter her and she will probably leave Halifax the 20th of this month. The gentleman to whom my hon. friend refers, Mr. Hugh Sutherland, entered into correspondence with the department, and intimated that a vessel of the build, size and tonnage of the "Diana" would not be suitable for this expedition. He desired that we should engage a very large steamer of 2,000 or 3,000 tons, made of steel, as being more suitable; but on referring the matter to the nautical advisers in the department, they one and all advised against such a vessel being taken. They thought a steel vessel not suited, that she would be too unwieldy, and being of steel would not be at all suitable for the arduous work she will be engaged in as a vessel specially built to resist the action of the ice. I had placed in my hands as far back as last December, a letter from Admiral Markham, who has had a good deal of experience in the navigation of ice waters, and who intended at one time, or hoped to be able, to accompany this expedition. When I heard of his desire, I at once forwarded an invitation to him on behalf of the Canadian Government to accompany the expedition and give us the benefit of his valuable services. I regret to say that Admiral Markham finds himself unable to accept the invitation, and he has recommended in his place Captain Burke of the Royal Navy. The moment I had an intimation from him that Captain Burke would be a suitable man, I at once asked him to take Admiral Markham's place on the expedition. As this is a subject of great importance, I will read, if the House will permit me, the letter which Admiral Markham wrote, on the 14th December last, on the subject of this expedition and the proper kind of vessels to employ. The letter was written to Col. Harris, and was forwarded to me by Col. Harris' attorney. He said :

I find that here are two Dundee whalers that would be available for Hudson Strait next summer, viz.: the "Terra Nova," of about 600 tons, and the "Esquimaux," of about 450 tons. Both would be admirably adapted for the purpose we should require, namely, to report on the state of the ice in the strait during the summer months. As they will be employed in the Newfoundland sealing in March, either of them could be delivered over at St. John, Nfld., on the 1st of May. The price of the "Terra Nova" would be $500 per month for five months certain, and $350 per month after that period. To be insured for $11,000. The "Esquimaux" would be $400 per month for five months, and $300 afterwards. To be insured for $6,000.

This, of course, simply means ship and machinery, and does not include crew, coal, stores or provisions. If chartered, they would like their present captains to accompany the ship, not necessarily in any official capacity, although they might be usefully employed as ice-masters, for they are both experienced ice navigators. If the Canadian Government have voted $35,000 for the survey of Hudson Strait, I do not see why they should not charter one or other of these ships. They possess a speed of about 8 knots, and are especially constructed for ice navigation. Please command me, if I can do anything further in the matter; of course, their owners would like to know as soon as possible, for if not chartered, they will be employed whaling in the summer.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he mention what the horse-power was ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No; it was a speed of eight knots. I at once instituted inquiries, and found what the horse-power was, and I found the horse-power of the "Esquimaux" recommended by him, was seventy. I instructed Mr. Whitely, a fishery officer in our employ, to examine each of these ships. I have already said that I was unable to obtain the "Hope." He reported in favour of the "Diana," and he says that the speed, size, and strength of the "Diana" are just about the size, speed, and strength recommended by Admiral Markham. The "Diana" is the faster by one knot than the one he suggested. I was in hopes that we would be able to obtain the services of Captain Bartlett, a very experienced ice navigator, and I tendered him an offer. I may say that I did not chaffer with him about the pay, but unfortunately, after considering the matter for some time, he had in view another appointment of a more permanent character which he accepted, and which prevented him from accepting the position of sailing master. We then looked about in all directions to obtain a first-class man, and we settled upon Captain Whitely, who has been for several years in the employment of Messrs. Job Brothers, and who lately has been in command of some sealing vessels in British Columbia. Finding he was qualified for that position, I telegraphed him and he accepted the appointment, and is now in command of the "Diana." So that the House will see that we have chartered a ship about the size, about the speed, and about the horse-power recommended by Admiral Markham. Now, with respect to the "Port Pirie" steamer which was recommended by Mr. Hugh Sutherland, I referred the matter of her selection to Commander Wakeham, and he reported to me that she would not be at all suitable. He said that the owners did not seem to have a great deal of faith in her ability to carry out the work, themselves, and they proposed that we should insure the ship to her full value and take all risks. Commander Wakeham did not feel disposed to accept that risk, and he reported that :

Handiness is of as much consequence in ice as power. Many ice-masters would say, more. Bartlett speaks of the "Hope" being a good vessel, because she is handy, can turn and manœuvre quickly.

Admiral Markham says, in his paper "On the Hudson Bay Navigation," a ship with quick manœuvring powers will have an enormous advantage over one whose turning powers are indifferent, while threading her way through lanes of water in a loose pack.

"Diana" is such a ship with quick manœuvring power. There is no intimation that the "Port Pirie" was originally built for ice work. Her owners are the Anglo-Australasian Steam Navigation Company; this does not sound like ice. She must be unhandy, owing to her great length. Her coal consumption must be altogether too large to permit of her remaining north through a long season. It would never do to load her deeply with coal and put her in ice. She would not work under sail, and can have no provision for lifting her screw clear of ice, or replacing a broken blade.

The "Port Pirie" is the ship suggested by Mr. Sutherland.

As regards sending ordinary steel or iron vessels into ice, I would call the Minister's attention to the case of the "Miranda." Four or five seasons ago, some American scientists chartered this steamer in New York for a season's trip to Northern Labrador. They were warned that she was not safe, but decided that for a summer trip it would be all right. They had only got a short way north of Belle Isle when they struck what seemed to be a small piece of ice; the vessel was stove in and sunk in a short time. The passengers and crew were saved and brought back in a fishing schooner. The "Miranda" had been running between New York and St. John's, Nfld., for some years, and was considered a strong boat. The case of the "Miranda" is a fair specimen of what we might expect when in light ice with an ordinary iron or steel ship.

Acting upon these recommendations, I determined not to charter a steel ship, but to charter the best sailing seal ship in the Newfoundland seal service. We were fortunate enough to secure the "Diana," a vessel reported well of in every respect. I regret very much that there seems to be a doubt existing in the minds of the uninformed, as to the capacity and strength of this ship. Now that she is rebuilt, she is confounded with the old "Diana" before she was rebuilt, but this is an entirely different vessel. She is now strengthened and rebuilt in every way, and fit to cope with the difficulties which she must necessarily encounter in the Hudson's Bay.

Mr. FOSTER. Has Captain Burke accepted the invitation ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have not heard that he has accepted the tender that has been made to him through his agent here. We have, therefore, Commander Wakeham in charge of the expedition, the officer who will be directly responsible to the department, and who will make the report. We have Captain Whitely as sailing master, and we have succeeded in getting a man from Nova Scotia, Captain McCormick, I think, who has been some twenty-five years visiting Hudson's Bay, and who speaks Eskimo, and can act as translator. We have a crew of Newfoundland sailors engaged, men selected by Whitely as sailing master, and we have some specialists who go forward to take meteorological, geological and other observations during the summer months that she will be in the Bay.

Mr. FOSTER. You said you had not heard from Captain Burke, but were corresponding through his agent here. Is Captain Burke a man of business ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I say that Captain Burke was the gentleman nominated by Admiral Markham, and Captain Burke is one of the promoters of the Hudson Bay and Pacific Railway Company. The attorney for the Company in Ottawa, presented his name to me, and after consultation I decided to accept him, and notified the attorney in Ottawa to that effect. He has cabled the offer to Captain Burke, and I am in hopes that Captain Burke will accompany the expedition. Therefore, we think the "Diana" is in every way well equipped and prepared for the expedition. Commander Wakeham is now making the necessary preparations to equip the vessel in every proper way. No pains have been spared to make everything complete, in order that the experiment may be a thoroughly reliable one. Instructions have been given to the commander that he is to proceed to the entrance of Hudson Straits at the earliest possible moment when experience has shown that any vessel could possibly enter there ; that he is to remain cruising in and out of the straits for so long as there is any difficulty in the way whatever. When he has finished and settled the spring navigation of the straits, he will then proceed to Hudson's Bay proper, and test the fishing capacity of those waters. The steamer will carry with her a detachment of men from the Geological Survey. One detachment will be landed on the north shore of the straits and another detachment on the south side to make geological explorations, and they will be brought back by the steamer in the autumn. It has been reported to me that some American whalers have for a series of years visited Cumberland Sound, north of Hudson's Bay Straits, and have acted as if they owned the country ; and my instructions to Commander Wakeham were to proceed up the Sound, to take as formal possession of the country as possible, to plant the flag there as notice that the country is ours, and take all necessary precautions to inform natives and foreigners that the laws must be observed, and particularly the customs laws of Canada. After consultation with Dr. Dawson of the Geological Survey, I adopted that course in regard to a matter, which he considers of very great importance. That gentleman seemed to think that if encroachments were allowed to be made and to continue, they might result in diplomatic questions arising within a few years, and we determined to anticipate any possible difficulty by asserting our sovereign rights in the most marked and distinct manner possible. If I have not answered the question put by my hon. friend, I shall endeavour to do so, and I am prepared to give any further information to hon. members of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not answer the question that I intended to ask, if I did not ask it, namely, who will be the representative of the Manitoba Government ; will the North-west Territories be represented ; also, if they have applied for representation, and the reasons why the application was refused, if it was refused ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I may say, in answer to my hon. friend, that the Government considered the question of having on board the vessel a representative specially and particularly from Manitoba and the North-west Territories, and they determined that it was right and proper that such a concession should be made. After communicating with the authorities there, we determined to appoint a gentleman. Mr. Fisher was nominated as a gentleman who would be suitable for that position ; his nomination was accepted by me, and I notified the Manitoba Government that he could go. He has had notice sent him, of course if he accepts—and I have reason to believe he will—he will go as the representative specially of Manitoba and the North-west Territories.

Mr. HUGHES. Is he a member of the Manitoba legislature?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I do not know. I am aware that he comes from that part of the world; his name is James Fisher.

Mr. DAVIN. I am very glad the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has brought this matter up; and as it is desirable that a full understanding should be arrived at in regard to this expedition, and as the hon. member for Lisgar did not take the step that would enable hon. members who are interested in it to ask questions, make suggestions and discuss it, I will take the course which will enable that to be done.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman will move the adjournment of the House:

Mr. DAVIN. Yes. From the last words which fell from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the reply he gave to my question as to whether the North-west Territories were to be represented on this expedition, it appeared that our desire is not to be realized.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I must have misunderstood the hon. gentleman. We are sending on the expedition a gentleman who is specially to represent the North-west and Manitoba.

Mr. DAVIN. The question I asked was: Whether the North-west Territories would have a representative.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not understand that the hon. gentleman wanted to have a representative distinct and apart from Manitoba; in other words, that he wished to have two representatives sent on this expedition.

Mr. DAVIN. We do not regard ourselves as identical with Manitoba. We knew there was to be a representative from Manitoba, and the question I asked was, whether the North-west Territories would be represented, and the hon. gentleman told me it would. We do not consider when a man is taken from Manitoba that the North-west is represented. That statement seems to amuse the Prime Minister and to give a sense of humor to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries; nevertheless if the hon. Premier when he made a visit to the North-west had made his stay a little longer, he would have become more westernized, and he would now understand that we do not regard ourselves as subsidiary to Manitoba or identical with that province.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I could not see the boundary line.

Mr. DAVIN. There is a good deal the hon. gentleman could not see when he was there. His sunny ways not only dazzled the people but his sense of fact was hypnotized. I do not think the information given to the House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries can be considered satisfactory, especially by the North-west. It is not interested in the questions which alone can be settled by this expedition, according to the explanation given by the hon. Minister—whether a sealer can make its way through Hudson's Bay and Straits and live there, and what fishing facilities may prevail, and how long Hudson's Bay may be navigable for such a vessel. These are the three questions which the Minister thinks will be settled by this expedition. But in not one of these questions is the North-west directly interested. What the North-west is interested in is this, whether a vessel that can carry North-west products to the English market can live in those seas and can be navigated, and for how long a time each year. It is not the navigability of Hudson's Bay by a sealer that is to be solved, but it is the navigability of Hudson's Bay by a commercial vessel; and not by a vessel of 275 tons net, which would be unable to do any business for the North-west or Manitoba, but by a vessel of 3,000 net and possessing many hundreds of horse-power. Therefore, the answer given by the Minister will certainly not be satisfactory to the North-west. Suppose Commander Wakeham, who I may say I have heard is not a man who has ice knowledge and who I am told has had no experience to fit him for the command of this expedition, although I am told he is a good commander in the work in which he is engaged—should come back from the command of the "refurbished" "Diana" and report that he was able to live for a certain number of months in those seas, and that he found them navigable, is there not the same uncertainty as to whether a commercial vessel would find them navigable? If the offer made by Milburn & Company had been accepted—an offer that placed at the disposal of the Minister a ship of adequate capacity, and at a risk that was not large—better results might have been anticipated. A difficulty appears to have arisen in regard to insurance of the vessel. The Government could have insured the vessel for a certain number of dollars. If she had been lost, Lloyd's would have paid her value. This was, therefore, a mere trifling matter. And yet, that is held by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to be a bugbear that cannot be got over. I should like if the Minister had explained—and there will be nothing to prevent him speaking again—to what question, and by whom was the question put, to which Admiral Markham sent that letter in reply. If the real problem had been placed before Admiral Markham, the chances are that he might have sent a very different letter from that. What we want to know is, not how a little sealer can get along in the Hudson's Bay, but how a vessel that would carry cattle, and grain, and the produce of the North-west Territories would get on. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) left me in doubt, as to whether he had had any communication direct with Captain Burke. He seems to have communicated with both Admiral Markham and Captain Burke indirectly.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) is mistaken. I communicated with both of them through their agent, who communicated with me. They first opened communication with me through their agent, and I directed my answers to the agent whom each of them had respectively chosen.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to see what was the character of the communication that was made to Admiral Markham, and what question was placed before him, because it might turn out that the letter sent to him would actually suggest such an answer as he has given, and limit him in his answer. If the real problem was placed before him by saying: We want to test this outlet for the great North-west Territories and Manitoba; we want to see whether that grand bay is capable of being used, as most Canadians believe it can be used, for sending our grain and cattle at a short transit across the Atlantic, and we want to know it as soon as possible. If Admiral Markham received a communication of that kind, I am inclined to think that he would not have suggested a petty little vessel of 275 tons. That vessel can come back, and the commander can make his report, and say: I have been successful, and I found the fishing good; but, Sir, there would be still the uncertainty as to whether or not this could be made a great commercial highway. Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the House.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I know my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) would not like to have a false impression created in the country. When he refers to this as a little vessel of 275 tons, that is not the proper way to express it. The "Diana" is a vessel of 475 tons, but when you deduct, as they do deduct, to arrive at the net tonnage—

Mr. DAVIN. I said 275 tons net.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Two hundred and seventy-five tons net is the tonnage of the vessel, when all deductions are made for space utilized on board. The vessel is actually 475 tons, and she is not a small vessel, but a large one.

Mr. DAVIN.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I live on the Detroit River and we have a ferry crossing that river every five or ten minutes during the winter months. We have tried all kinds of iron boats, steel boats and wooden boats, and we have found that the best for the service is a vessel much similar to the "Diana." A 475-ton vessel is quite a large vessel. The gentlemen in charge of the expedition will undoubtedly take instruments with them to ascertain the depth of the water, and they can find out on a small vessel whether it is deep enough for navigation by larger vessels. For more than one hundred years the Hudson's Bay Company has been navigating those waters, and as they have preserved the records of the different trips, there is no doubt of the navigability of Hudson's Bay. The question to be solved by this expedition is in reference to the currents, and also in reference to ascertaining how long each year they can navigate through the Hudson Straits. There is no doubt in the world that Hudson's Bay is open a very large portion of the year, but the difficulty is as to the straits. I can tell the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin), speaking from my experience of forty years in a district where ice is very heavy, that a wooden boat, or a boat similar to the one engaged by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, is the very boat required for that kind of work.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) Although this is a question that more particularly refers to the North-west Territories and Manitoba, still it is one of general interest to the Dominion as a whole. That being the case, I wish to make a few remarks, and I shall say, at the outset that, in my opinion, the practicability of the navigation of Hudson's Bay is sure to be established in the near future. The hon. Minister (Mr. Davies) tells us, that on information he has received, he has recommended a wooden boat for the expedition, and it must be remembered that this wooden boat is twenty-seven years old.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I stated that the "Diana" was thoroughly rebuilt in 1892.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) I do not wish to put the hon. gentleman in any wrong position, and I intended to refer to that. Now, as regards the rebuilding, everything depends upon what that ship is. If she is a colonial vessel, built of the ordinary woods of the country, it makes no odds how much she has been rebuilt, she is still an old ship. If she is a good English-built vessel, built of live oak, then, even though she is twenty-five years old, and has been renewed, she may be a good ship. Although a wooden vessel has been recommended to the Minister, his own experience of the good ship "Stanley" ought to tell him the immense advantage possessed by a steel ship for such work. While the "Stanley" may not have the very excessive currents to contend with that prevail in Hudson's Bay, yet she meets very strong currents and very heavy ice. Judging from the success that attended the "Stanley" in prosecuting the winter service between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, I myself am of the opinion that not only can Hudson Straits be successfully navigated by proper ships, but also the River St. Lawrence, where the ice does not freeze across, can be navigated during the winter. For one hundred years the Hudson's Bay Company have navigated these waters with wooden vessels. It has been stated that the "Diana" is only nine knots, and in my opinion that is not sufficient to enable her to get out of the way of the ice floes in places where there are such strong currents as prevail in Hudson's Bay, and where the ice flows so rapidly. In my opinion, a vessel of much greater power and much greater speed is requisite for a fair trial of proving the practicability of navigating the Hudson Straits during a long season. I have no doubt at all that the gentleman whom the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has put in charge of that expedition, Commander Wakeham, is, in all probability, the right man in the right place. As has been referred to by my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), he may not have large experience as an ice navigator, but he is a man of great intelligence, and a man who will discharge his duty properly and in a capable manner. I am of opinion that the vessel is rather small to give the matter a fair trial. A small vessel of that kind would naturally have a small draft of water, and in that case the screw—as she is no doubt a screw vessel—would be brought so near the surface that the ice would injure it much more than a vessel of greater capacity and greater draft. The "Stanley," which plies between Prince Edward Island and the mainland, is capable of taking in water ballast, and being lowered so much that the screw is below the point where it would likely be injured by ice. A ship of that kind would be desirable, both on that account and because her movements would be so rapid that there would be very much less danger of her being injured in passing through a narrow place where the ice might catch her or jam her. I trust, however, that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will meet with every success in this expedition, because I think it is of very great importance to this country as a whole, and of exceedingly great importance to the people of the North-west.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the motion is put, I would like to say a word or two with reference to this matter. It is an important question in more ways than one, but there are two points in which it is especially important. In the first place, we have no money to spend for a purpose that will be idle; we have no money to throw away; and this expedition, as it is now being planned, will cost at least $35,000. It would not be good economy if, for the sake of spending no more than $35,000, an inferior ship were to be secured for what the whole country is looking for—a real test of the navigability of these straits; not by whaling vessels, short vessels, or slow vessels, but by vessels such as must to-day be employed in order to do a commercial business. The question of the navigability of these straits to be tested to-day is not whether whaling vessels can get in, not whether a vessel of peculiar build can get in during certain months or certain days of the year, but whether it is possible to carry on successfully through these straits a commercial business for the great North-west, and of course to carry it on with vessels sufficiently large to make freighters, and sailing with sufficient frequency during the open season to render the venture a commercial success. The expedition sent up there in 1885 and 1886 was, I think, for a somewhat different purpose. It was preliminary. What it was intended to do, and what I think it did do, was to make observations, chiefly to find out at what period of the year the ice opened and the quantity of ice to be encountered during the whole season; and consequently observers were kept there for two seasons, and they were to take a constant note and keep a faithful record of everything in connection with these matters. That period is past, and if my hon. friend is going to send up a vessel simply to do that work over again, even if he should do it somewhat more thoroughly, which I hardly think he can do in one season, the expenditure will be money wasted. If the railway is to be built to Hudson's Bay, it can only be built on the ground that it will form a connecting link between the sources of supply and the old country by a line of regular steam navigation; and what the country wants to know to-day is whether it is possible to navigate the straits by commercial vessels for a sufficient length of time each season to render the project a success. The only question with me is whether my hon. friend's vessel is going to elucidate that question in any way at all. I am afraid it is not. He is sending up a vessel which he says has the merit of being a short one and being able to make quick turns; but you are not going to carry hundreds of thousands of bushels of wheat across the Atlantic in vessels which are short, and which can make sharp turns. The hon. gentleman is getting a vessel which has nine knots of speed and seventy horse-power; but a vessel of that kind would never be adopted as a commercial venture to carry freight through those straits. I am not a navigator, but I can see just where, in the navigation of those straits, perilous at the best, a strong reserve power, along with quickness, would be the salvation of a vessel in a place where currents and the jamming of the ice are the two incidents chiefly to be met with. These requirements are not going to be attained by my hon. friend's ship. The old "Diana," though she has been overhauled, cannot be called a new vessel; and the very facts which my hon. friend has stated show that she is not a vessel which can be classed as a commercial vessel. What I think ought to be done is this. Whether the expedition goes this year or waits for another year is a matter of very little importance compared with the importance of making a thorough test of the navigability of the straits; and if my hon. friend has not been able to find a vessel which comes up to the mark for that test, he had better not spend his $35,000 this year, but wait for another year; and Manitoba and the North-west and the rest of the country will thank him for waiting if by waiting he can secure a strong and capable commercial vessel to make the test properly. I want the hon. gentleman to give that point the consideration it deserves; for he will be judged in the country in proportion as he meets the requirements of a commercial test. My hon. friend is not sure that he is going to have an experienced ice navigator with this vessel. I do not raise any question with regard to Commander Wakeham. He has had a great deal of experience with ice in the gulf and is in every way a competent and reliable man; no better could be obtained. At the same time, I think it is important that we should have with the vessel some man like Admiral Markham, or one of equal or nearly equal ability and experience, in order that there may be the greater confidence in the results of the test. My hon. friend has not stated whether Captain Burke will go or not. But is there not another point which my hon. friend ought to guard? I understand, from what the hon. gentleman said here, Lieutenant Burke is interested in a company which proposes to do business in that section of the country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He is one of the promoters of what is called the Pacific Railway Company to run from Churchill to the Pacific coast. Admiral Markham is the chief promoter and Captain Burke the second.

Mr. FOSTER. I think my hon. friend would probably admit that if he takes Captain Burke, who represents that company, he should also take a representative of the older company, and the one which, in this House and the local legislature of Manitoba, has for eight or ten years been considered as the Hudson's Bay Railway Company. It might be a cause for well-founded discontent if you took the representative of one of these companies and no representative of the other. One man's place on board a ship does not amount to very much when fitting out an expedition. I throw that out as a hint which it might be well for the hon. gentleman to act on. Is my hon. friend sure that he is making this a commercial test, for if not, he will not accomplish anything?

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have just a few observations to make, and I would not make them were it not for the remark of the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) that I failed to put myself in order so as to enable me to make them. I am not quite as adept in debate as the hon. gentleman, and therefore forgot for the moment that I could have put myself in order by moving the adjournment of the House. I was about to say, when called to order, that one of the reasons why the west particularly would like to see this question settled, and settled for all time, is the fact that for the last fifteen years the Hudson's Bay Railway has been used as a stalking horse in every election. It has been almost impossible for the people of the west to hold an election without having the question of the construction of the Hudson's Bay Railway Company introduced. Now, the position I have taken and that taken by a great many others in the west, is that if the Hudson's Bay Railway is a feasible enterprise, it would be an excellent thing for the North-west. So far as I am concerned, I have never been able to satisfy myself that it is a feasible enterprise from a commercial standpoint. But I have always taken this position. I have always said, let the Government satisfy itself upon that point, let it have a thorough investigation made into the navigability of these straits, and I would hold up both hands for the expenditure of any reasonable amount of money to attain that end. It was in that view that I introduced the subject here. All the members of the west are anxious, I am sure, that this test should be, as the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) has said, a thorough and satisfactory test, one that will satisfy the people of the west and the people of all Canada as to the navigability of those straits. I am not sufficient of an expert to say whether the ship to be sent out there should be a steel steamer or a sealer or a whaler, but I have heard various representations on the question, and I am inclined to the opinion that it would be a dangerous experiment to send a large steel steamer into those straits to encounter the ice. I have also come to the conclusion that a vessel of the character of the one chartered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would probably be the proper vessel for that work. It seems to me that the character of the vessel is not the most important matter. Suppose large ice floes are encountered, surely it is not the intention to back up and make full charge at them in order to smash them. It seems to me what is infinitely of more importance is to have in charge of that expedition a man of experience in ice navigation, who would be able to size up the situation and could form an opinion whether the floes found in those straits would be an impassable obstruction or whether a vessel could navigate through them. Entertaining that view, I do not see that it would be so very important to have a vessel of large tonnage or that it would be necessary to have a steel vessel. I may say, in conclusion, that there is another consideration, although not so important, which may have some weight. There is a gentleman in the North-west who all who have met him will agree is a man of very considerable ability, and who has devoted the last ten or twelve years of his life to this project, and it would certainly be a good thing to have this matter finally settled and thus enable that gentleman to realize his project or drop the question of the Hudson's Bay navigability entirely, and devote his time and abilities to some calling that would bring tangible results.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). As the arrangements, I understand, have already been completed by the Government and a steamer chartered, any criticism we may now make is not likely to have any material effect and seems to me rather late in the day. If we are to believe what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Richardson), and who, I am glad to say, expresses himself as in a position to speak for the North-west and Manitoba, this question, which, for the last fifteen years, has engaged so much the attention of this House of Parliament and Government, is about apparently to receive some measure of settlement. Regarding the question from the standpoint of the desirability of a final settlement, it seems to me unfortunate that a steamer has not been selected which would be more likely to furnish us such complete information as would settle the question, than the one which had been chosen. From what little knowledge one acquires from shipping in our maritime home, we must come to the conclusion that while the steamer selected will, to a large degree, ensure the safety of the members of the expedition, it will not be so efficient in furnishing us with evidence to settle this question, which has been under the consideration of the Government for the last fifteen years, as a steamer combining much greater power and speed. Such a steamer would enable the parties sent out to investigate to see a very great deal more of Hudson's Bay in the course of the short season over which the navigation there extends than can be possible with the very slow steamer the Government has selected. In these days of rapid transit at sea, a steamer with a speed of eight or nine miles an hour is one which cannot possibly accomplish a great deal of work in that short season. It would take her a long time to deliver the two exploring parties at the north and south ends of the bay. The time taken to deliver them and then to return and bring them home in the early autumn would leave very little spare time for any other work. As has already been pointed out, the navigability of the Hudson's Bay is not in question at all, because that was settled years ago. It is well known that the vessels of the Hudson's Bay Company make regular trips to the bay, so that the question of navigating the straits and the bay is already settled. What I imagine is of more importance is to ascertain whether or not they can be navigated by such a class of steamers as are used nowadays to convey large cargoes. Every one will agree that the great object is to ascertain whether the great wheat crops of the North-west can be sent by that route to Europe, and I do not see how that can be ascertained by sending out there a slow steamer, a sealer, whose ordinary business it is to poke about in a slow and leisurely manner among the ice floes until it has discovered where the seals are to be found and then to work into that floe and lay there. What is required is such a steamer as the Government already own, because this question of navigating water filled with ice, in which there are strong currents, has already been settled by the Government in the navigation carried on between Prince Edward Island and the northern ports of Nova Scotia. This is done with the steamer "Stanley," which has proved herself capable of navigating these waters in the most inclement season—throughout the winter and not in the summer only as would be the case in Hudson's Bay—and maintaining a high rate of speed, say from 18 to 20 miles an hour. In a steamer like the "Stanley," you would have a vessel well fitted to meet the conditions and able to push aside obstacles if they were encountered. Furthermore, you would have a steamer which would enable the trained men who represent the Geological Survey and other scientific departments to study the currents and temperature, &c., and thus collect the data which it is most important and most necessary to the people of Canada to ascertain. Accepting the Minister's statement as being authoritative and not subject to question, I am sorry, for my part, that I cannot but fear that the result of this expedition, which will cost thousands of dollars to the people of Canada, will be almost nil, and, in the end, will leave us in the position which the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) has deplored, with a question, which, for fifteen years has occupied the attention of the country still unsettled, and, practically, no progress made toward its settlement. I am sorry the Government has not acted differently. However, it is not well for us to predict what will happen. I hope for the best results. Still, from my knowledge of ice navigation and of the circumstances of the case, I do not anticipate very favourable results of the expenditure about to be incurred by the Government.

Mr. KAULBACH. I am very anxious indeed, that the proposed expedition to Hudson's Bay may be a success, and I am sorry that I could not have had an interview, or an opportunity earlier to suggest one or two things to our respected friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries bearing on this subject. I quite agree with some of my friends who referred to the speed of the vessel, which vessel, I understand him to say, he has engaged. A boat of eight or nine knots appears to me entirely insufficient for the work contemplated. Had I known what was proposed, I could have recommended to the hon. gentleman a boat of a speed sufficient to meet the requirements and of a tonnage of some 400 or 500. The speed would be about from 12 to 15 knots. The boat I refer to is built of pitch pine and comparatively new. I know that the currents in these waters are very strong, from the fact that the fleet of vessels belonging to the port in the county I represent have to frequent the waters of the Labrador shore, and proceed north very often, as far as the mouth of Davis's and Hudson's Straits. A boat for this service would naturally be required of extra power to navigate these waters and push through the immense floes of ice. The object of this expedition, as I understand it, is to ascertain whether the waters of Hudson's Bay are navigable for a sufficiently long time in the year for the purpose of the export of grain from the North-west. I fear, from what I have read and learned, that the season in that country is too short for mercantile enterprises, that the bay cannot be entered earlier than the middle of July, and that any vessel found there eight weeks after that would have to arrange to get out at once or be bound there for the remainder of the winter. As to Hudson's Bay itself, I understand that it is open the whole year round. Of course vessels would have to remove from the shore or the mouths of rivers, otherwise they would be sealed for the winter. I would suggest, if the proposed contract is not closed, that it be delayed until the hon. Minister can secure a boat for the purpose of a power sufficient to navigate these waters with success, and that the whole of the bay, from one end to the other, on the north shore as well as the south shore, be visited by the expedition and a report made as to the capabilities of that country. I would suggest that, in addition to the main object, that of ascertaining the possibility for the export of grain from the North-west, this other object should be kept in view and the expedition made thereby in every way a grand success.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I would like to say a word or two, not that I am an expert in ice navigation or know much about Hudson's Bay; but, from what has fallen from the lips of several of the members of the House, it would seem that the ship chosen to go on this expedition is not quite suitable for the purpose, and when it comes back another will probably have to be sent. The navigability of Hudson's Bay is a problem which will probably be solved very soon. If the solution of that problem results in the traffic from the North-west going to Europe from some port on Hudson's Bay, and if that is for the general advantage of Canada, of course, we have nothing to say. But I must say that we should regret to see our ports sacrificed, as they would be to a certain extent, in this matter. I would like to call the attention of the Government, and especially of the members of the Government who more particularly represent the district of Quebec, to a few facts. Hudson's Bay is very far away from Quebec. We have been trying for a great many years to ascertain if the River St. Lawrence is not navigable, if not all the winter, at least for a great part of the winter. As hon. gentlemen know, navigation in the St. Lawrence from Quebec now ceases about the end of November and is not resumed until the last days of April or the first days of May. However, for some years past, experiments have been made with relation to this matter, and the Board of Trade of Quebec has called the attention of the Government to the fact that it would be in the interest of the country that an expedition of some kind should be sent into the St. Lawrence to ascertain if it is navigable during the winter months. This last year we have seen the experiment carried out to a certain extent. Mr. Menier's ship, the "Savoy," which is rather a large ship, has been navigating to and fro between the Island of Anticosti and Quebec, after the 1st of December, and also prior to the 15th of April, and she is demonstrating that, during that time, at all events, the winter navigation of the St. Lawrence River, to a great extent, would be practicable. Some years ago, also, a boat crossed the St. Lawrence River from Murray Bay to River du Loup, and to St. Denis, opposite, for the greater part, if not for the whole part, of the winter. As I said before, the Board of Trade of Quebec called the attention of the Government to this important subject some years ago. Now, it seems to me if this large sum is to be voted, or has been voted, to test the navigability of the Hudson's Bay, that the gentlemen who represent the district of Quebec in the Cabinet should bring their great influence to bear on their colleagues to have such an expedition sent out into the St. Lawrence River to find out whether that river is navigable at least for a longer space of time during the winter months than it is now supposed to be. The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Dobeil) I know has at heart the best interests of Quebec, and he has done a great deal to give us the fast line of steamships between Quebec and Liverpool, and I believe he is converted to the idea of a fast line now. He has also done a great deal, I believe, towards building a bridge between Quebec and the south shore, and if he will bring this very important question before his colleagues, and bring his great influence to bear upon them to try and get an expedition sent out in a short time to test the navigability of the St. Lawrence River during the winter months, and if he did succeed in giving us a longer navigation, I have no doubt he would feel himself that he was giving Quebec a great boon.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to ask one or two questions of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries before he closes the debate. Listening to the discussion as carefully as I have been able to do, it seems to me that if the vessel my hon. friend has selected, is not of sufficient power to enable her to contend effectually with the currents of the straits, that is a fatal objection to the choice he has made; also, if she is too slow a vessel to cover the distance which she ought to cover during the time she is out, that is also a fatal objection. But, having listened to the discussion, I cannot see, for my own part, that a good case has been made against the vessel from any other point of view. I cannot see why, if there be intelligent officers on board of that vessel, those officers should not be able to decide whether an ordinary mercantile vessel would be able to perform the work. It seems to me it does not matter whether the vessel is a long vessel or a short one, whether she is a whaler or a sailer, or what she may be, as long as she is commanded by intelligent men who understand their business, and who are able to make an intelligent report. It seems to me that if these men are capable men, and are fit to discharge their duties, whether the vessel be long or short, the officers in command of her ought to be able to give a thoroughly trustworthy opinion as to whether this is a navigation which ordinary mercantile vessels would be able to undertake. But I should like very much, for my own information, at all events, if my hon. friend would deal with these other two questions which have been brought up, that is, as to whether she will be powerful enough to contend with the currents effectually in such a way as she ought to do, and also, as to whether she will be fast enough to cover the amount of space that she ought to cover, in order that a proper report may be made.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. While I regret the tone of the observations of some hon. gentlemen, I may say, Mr. Speaker, that some remarks have fallen from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that are deserving of consideration. I do not think that I made myself as plain as I would liked to have done when I first gave my statement. There seems to be an impression abroad that the "Diana," which has been chartered, is a small vessel. I repeat again what I said before, that she is a vessel of 475 tons, rebuilt in Dundee in 1892, and one of the strongest vessels in the fleet that sails from Newfoundland. She was recommended by Commander Wakeham as the best vessel that could be obtained; and she was recommended by Mr. Whitely, fishery officer in Newfoundland, as the best vessel that could be obtained in Newfoundland. She is of the horse-power that was specially recommended by Admiral Markham. She was recommended by Captain Bartlett, the most experienced navigator that sails from Newfoundland, as the best vessel that could be obtained. She possesses, in point of fact, all the qualifications which these experienced men seem to think a vessel should have. It struck me, as the hon. member from Prince Edward Island thought it should strike me, that possibly the "Stanley," a vessel specially constructed by the Government some years ago to cross the Northumberland Straits, might be chosen. I submitted the question to Captain Wakeham, whether it was possible to utilize the "Stanley" for the purpose of this test, and he denounced it as an impossibility, he would not trust his life in her. I was not satisfied with that report, and I sent down a special letter to Captain Finlayson, of the "Stanley," who has been twenty years on board that vessel navigating the straits, and to Mr. McMillan, the chief engineer of that ship, who has also been twenty years in the service, and I asked them if they thought it was possible to utilize the "Stanley" for this purpose. They told me it was a mad scheme, that neither of them would risk his life in her, and nobody who understood the perils of ice navigation would think of trusting the "Stanley" in that work. What was I to do next? I had the offer of the "Port Pirie," a vessel of 3,000 tons, a steel vessel. I was told by those experienced men that she also was unsuitable, and the owners of that vessel would not charter her for the voyage unless we insured her for the amount of $140,000 in case she was lost. What was the gain of putting her on? This vessel was recommended, she is of the same horse-power, and the same size that Admiral Markham says are suitable for the purpose, and she is of the class of vessels which all experienced arctic navigators choose when they go upon expeditions of that kind. Did ever anybody in the world hear of a steamship of 3,000 tons being sent up on Arctic navigation? Can anybody imagine for a moment that a man who values his life, an experienced man, would trust it on board a ship of that kind in the spring and fall months when she is specially to be engaged in fighting ice? It would be all very well to send such a vessel there in the midsummer months, but what we must have is a vessel that can go there and fight with the ice in early spring, to see how early a vessel can go in there, and late in the fall, to see how late a vessel can go in and out at that season of the year also. My hon. friend knows that when he says that she has to go there for the purpose, not of testing whether a vessel of that size would be suitable for navigation, but whether there is navigation at all in those months. That is the point, and we have got the class of vessels which are always used in Arctic navigation and have got the most experienced men. I hesitate not to say that I conceive myself to have been exceedingly fortunate in getting Commander Wakeham's services to take charge of this expedition. He is a gentleman of very great experience, and a man of very level head; and I appeal to my hon. friends who have presided over the Department of Marine and Fisheries for years back, if they can recall to mind a single officer in the service of that department who would be as suitable for the purpose for which he has been chosen as Commander Wakeham. The sailing master, Captain Whitely, has been for three or four years in charge of the Job Brothers' sealers in the Hudson Bay navigation. He therefore has great experience in that line, he possesses all the necessary qualifications, and he has been in charge of a Behring Sea sealer besides. With these two gentlemen in charge, one experienced in navigating vessels through the ice, and the other a man of very large and varied experience in navigating ships, and thoroughly well educated, and, in my opinion, capable of making a most careful, prudent, and reliable report, I think we are exceedingly fortunate in those who command the vessel. I could get no experienced men to advise me to select or to risk a steel vessel for a purpose of that kind, at a probable cost to the Government of $140,000; and when I was backed with the opinion of Commander Wakeham that the "Diana" was in size and in speed and in horse-power, just the vessel for the purpose, I thought I was doing something that would meet with general approval. I believe that everything has been done that prudence and care could do to insure success, if success is possible at all. I do not think there is any other point that I need comment upon.

Mr. HUGHES. What about representatives of the company?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Some gentlemen have expressed a desire that another person should be nominated to specially represent one of the rival companies. I may say with respect to the matter, that I shall be very happy to consult my colleagues on the point. I did not consider it necessary that two special representatives should be sent of the companies which proposed to construct railways. I was informed by the solicitors of this company that they wished to send a representative as they intended to go on immediately with the work at Port Churchill.

Mr. DAVIN. Who were the solicitors?

Mr. DAVIES.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. An Ottawa firm. I have their letter, which I shall be very happy to show to my hon. friend. I thought when we selected a gentleman who has the same interest as the representative of the other railway company would have, and we sent him on the expedition, he would obtain all the facts. But I shall be very glad to consider the suggestion made.

Mr. KAULBACH. I desire to ask the amount of the charter paid per month and the insurance on the ship?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We do not insure the ship.

Mr. KAULBACH. How much is to be paid per month for the charter?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I cannot for the moment recollect the amount; it is very reasonable, however. I will give the hon. gentleman the information.

Mr. KAULBACH. I have a very high opinion of Commander Wakeham. I have known him for a number of years, and I think he is just the man for that expedition.

Mr. CASEY. Not having heard the whole of the debate, I do not intend to go into any details in connection with the subject. I may say, however, that the question of the navigability of Hudson's Bay is one of the utmost importance I believe to the future prosperity of Canada, and I will add that I am satisfied from conversations with the Minister in charge that he is fully impressed with the importance of making the fullest investigation possible. No doubt he will see that a full powered vessel, properly manned, will make the exploration. But the point to which I wish particularly to refer at the present moment is that which was touched upon by the hon. Minister in his last remarks, in regard to the representatives of different railway companies going with the expedition. The gentleman who was announced as going with the expedition to represent the Hudson's Bay and Pacific Railway Company is not known to me. I will not speak as to his qualifications: he is a director of that company and is one of the original promoters. The original promoters of the Hudson's Bay Company are asking for a representative as well as their rivals. I think the request is a fair one. I do not see any reason why a representative of the one company should not be sent and not of the other. At the same time, I understand the promoters of the Hudson's Bay Railway Company are willing to drop their request to have a representative, if a representative of the North-west Territories be sent in whose opinion they would have confidence. I hope the Minister will be able to arrange with the Government of the Territories and the Hudson's Bay Company in regard to this matter, so that no one will be able to complain that rights and interests were not looked after, because the cost of sending a couple of men would be very trifling compared with the satisfaction of knowing that every one's interest has been attended to.

Mr. DAVIN. I was very sorry the Minister resumed his seat without giving the House the assurance that the North-west Territories would be represented on the expedition, because, as I emphatically said, we do not consider the North-west is merged in Manitoba. We never admitted it, and if there should be any greater desire now than at any past time to merge the North-west in Manitoba, that would lead, I hope, to its protesting with still greater strength against that proposition. We are apart from Manitoba, and we wish at all times to be dealt with as we are, a separate entity. I wish to say one word with respect to what fell from the hon. member for Lisgar. He talked of this question having been used as a stalking horse in elections for fifteen years. What kept this question for fifteen years before the elections, and what prevented the successive Conservative Governments from building the Hudson's Bay Railway? The opposition offered by hon. gentlemen who then sat on this side of the House, and no member offered greater opposition to it than the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries. The hon. member for Lisgar cannot console himself with the thought that this exploratory survey—because it is nothing more—will settle the question. If it would settle it, we on this side of the House would be satisfied; but the complaint made by the hon. member for York and by myself is that it will not settle the question. This will be simply an exploratory survey. The hon. member for Bruce did not seem to think that we have made out a case against the vessel that is to be used. Let me read what Admiral Markham said in regard to a vessel of about the same horse-power. He wrote:

We, in the "Alert," were frequently detained for many consecutive hours at a time for want of power to propel the ship through loose streams of ice which an ordinary steamer would have had no difficulty in penetrating.

In that report Admiral Markham lays particular stress on those two important factors, power and speed required to take advantage of lanes of open water which always prevail in loose ice. What I fear is this, that if Commander Wakeham comes back, as come back he will, I am satisfied, and reports that he ascertained that the Bay is navigable, still we shall not be any nearer than we are now to the construction of the railway to Hudson's Bay. While speaking of the building of a railway, I would emphasise the suggestion made on this side of the House by an hon. friend behind me—perhaps the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will give me his attention—

Mr. CAMPBELL. Go on.

Mr. DAVIN. I shall take my own course, with all due deference to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell). I ask my hon. friend the Minister, that in view of the suggestions from this side of the House, and also from the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) who supports him, he should deal fairly with the two companies and let the old company as well as the new be represented on this expedition. This new company I understand is an interloper in this question. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the House and the country will be glad, that my hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) raised the question, and that we have thus far been able to ventilate it. All I regret is, that when, according to what the Minister stated, we are about to pay $7,000 a month—

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not say $7,000 a month. I said I could not recollect the amount, but it is very much below that.

Mr. DAVIN. $7,000 is what the hon. gentleman said, and I do not know what he would call below that; whether it would be $100 or $200 a month.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The hon. gentleman will excuse me; I said $7,000, but I at once corrected myself, and said that I could not recollect the sum.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It is not that or anything like it.

Mr. DAVIN. We are going to pay several thousand dollars a month to do what has been already done by the "Alert." The "Alert" proved the navigability of the bay for the purpose of fishing and coasting, but what it did not establish was that it was navigable from a commercial standpoint, and that is the standpoint that interests us in the North-west Territories.

Mr. HUGHES. A word or two more will not do any harm in connection with this debate, although probably it may not do any good. Already a number of railroads in Ontario have charters to the James Bay, and I would suggest to the Minister that he should add a representative of the province of Ontario to the expedition.

Mr. PRIOR. And British Columbia.

Mr. HUGHES. British Columbia has the Pacific Ocean for a sea front, and there is no necessity that that province should be represented. The rights of the provinces that do touch on Hudson's Bay might be considered, and either a representative from each of these provinces, or a joint representative should be sent to the expedition. I would ask the Minister, is it the intention to have the press represented on the expedition?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. If all those whose claims are being pressed were represented on this expedition, we would have a larger number than are going to England on the Jubilee contingent.

Motion to adjourn, negatived.

JOSEPH MERCIER, OF STE. FAMILLE.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked :

1. Is one Joseph Mercier, of Ste. Famille, Island of Orleans, employed in any capacity by the Government?
2. If so, in what capacity?
3. What is his salary?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). We have no record of such a man being employed under this department. It is quite possible that he may be employed as one of the crew of a lightship, but of that there would be no record here as the captain employs his own crew.

DISMISSAL OF MR. McCALLUM.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the Orders of the Day are called. I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) whether he has any knowledge of the dismissal of Mr. McCallum, foreman and lock superintendent on the River Du Lièvre works, and by whom has Mr. McCallum been succeeded? If the hon. gentleman has not the information now, I beg to give him notice that I will bring the question up to-morrow.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Very well.

THE BANK NOTE CONTRACT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved :

That the papers laid on the Table of the House on the 3rd instant, relating to the printing of Government notes, stamps, &c., be printed forthwith, and that Rule 94 be suspended in relation thereto.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). There is no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be glad if the Minister of Finance would add to that, a copy of the late contract which was current up to the 23rd of April.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is the last contract.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. HUGHES.

BEAMSVILLE POSTMASTER—MR. FAIRBROTHER.

The House proceeded to further consideration of the proposed motion of Mr. McCleary for an Order of the House for :

Copies of all letters and correspondence between the Government or any members thereof referring in any way to the dismissal of Mr. W. D. Fairbrother as postmaster at Beamsville, with a copy of the charges and by whom such were made.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. Speaker, at 6 o'clock last evening I was discussing this matter when the House took recess. I believe that the case made by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) in reference to Mr. Fairbrother, is an exceedingly poor one. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) who represents the county in which Beamsville is situated, has given his personal word of honour as a member of Parliament that this man Fairbrother has been an active political partisan. Now, I am perhaps a little conservative in reference to this question of partisan officials. Before a member of Parliament asks that the bread and butter should be taken out of the mouths of his neighbour's children, he should be very careful that he is not doing a serious injustice, and he should see that there is sufficient cause. I think when a member of Parliament goes to the Government which he supports, and to which he is bound to be loyal, and asks for dismissals, he should be very careful that the circumstances of the case warrant him in doing so. When he gives his word of honour as a member of Parliament, that such and such an official has taken an active part in politics, and should be removed, he should approach the matter with very great seriousness and remember all the consequences attached thereto. For my part I do not propose to ask for the dismissal of any official, unless I am thoroughly convinced that I can defend my course, not only before this House but before the great bar of public opinion in my own county. If I err, and if I commit an injustice, then I have to answer to my own constituents when the proper time arrives. As far as I am concerned, I believe we should approach this matter with every seriousness. But, Sir, when a member of Parliament does take this stand and does state to the Government that he knows of his own personal knowledge that an official of the Government has taken an active part in the election, then the Government to whom he is loyal should be loyal enough to him to say : We take your word upon this matter, and we dismiss this man upon your recommendation. Sir, this has been the practice during the past eighteen years under the Conservative Administration.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. LOGAN. This, Sir, to my own actual knowledge, has been the course pursued by the Conservative Government for eighteen years.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No ; yes.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not wish to justify myself by anything which the late Government has done.

I look on this matter as a matter of principle. If a Minister of the Crown has an active political partisan in his service, that man, when the proper time arrives, and when he thinks he can do it with the best success, will stab that Minister in the back. Therefore, the Minister, for his own sake, and for the sake of the department over which he rules, should see that he has men in his department who are true to him as well as true to the country at large ; and when a member of Parliament approaches a Minister of the Crown and gives his personal word that an official has taken an active part in politics, to his own knowledge, then that official should be removed. I think I heard a mild dissent from the other side of the House to the statement I made that this was the practice under the late Government. It may not have been the practice in some counties ; but I am sure that it was in the county of Cumberland, in season and out of season.

I have already brought before this House the case of certain gentlemen who occupied positions under the late Government. I remember calling attention to the case of a certain doctor who lived at Northport, and who was the physician to the sailors who came there. He was the only doctor in the vicinity ; but just before the last election his services were dispensed with, simply because he was a Liberal, and the position was given to Dr. Clay, who lived twelve miles from Northport. So that when a sailor became ill and was carried ashore, however sick he might be, he was driven past the door of the doctor who was a Liberal and carried twelve miles to Dr. Clay, who happened to be a Conservative. This is an example. I referred also to the case of Mr. Thomas Allen, of Cape Tormentine, who was dismissed after fifty-four years of service, and without superannuation. In the town of Joggins, in my county, we had a postmaster, an excellent man, named Burke, who one fine morning was informed that his services would not be required any longer. He was summarily dismissed without the slightest sign of investigation. A gentleman named Morris, a postmaster at Advocate, in my county, was also summarily dismissed, and a strong Conservative put in his place. In my constituency dozens of section men on the Intercolonial Railway came to me and gave me their word that after various elections, particularly that of 1887, when the present leader of the Opposition was elected the member for that county, they received summary notice that their services would be no longer required. One man named Tower, a very excellent man stated to me that he had received notice on the 13th of the month that on the 14th his services would be no longer required. I have many other cases of the same kind. One man, a station agent on the Intercolonial Railway named Livingstone, was squeezed out of the service by having his salary cut down to $13 a month. And when it was not thought expedient that men should be dismissed summarily, they were quietly superannuated. I would like to know where the investigation was held in reference to Mr. Brydges, the chief engineer of Government railways in 1878. Every one in the maritime provinces, whether Liberal or Conservative, if he is honest, will say that the Liberal-Conservative party, when it came into power in 1878, cut a clean swath in the maritime provinces, and wherever a man was a Liberal, he was summarily dismissed, and a first-rate Conservative was put in his place.

Last evening the hon. leader of the Opposition questioned a statement I made with reference to certain relatives of his being appointed to office. I have not time to go through the whole list ; but I will call his attention to a few cases near my own home. I may say that some of the most important positions in the neighbourhood where I happen to reside are those of collector of customs at Amherst, chief auditor of the Intercolonial Railway, the railway's solicitor, station agent at the city of Moncton, collector of customs at Tidnish, chief inspector of buildings on the Intercolonial Railway, collector of customs at Truro, agent of the savings bank at Parrsboro', port physician at Parrsboro', and agency of the savings bank at Amherst ; and let me tell you who have occupied these positions. The position of collector of customs at Amherst was held for a great many years by a very estimable gentleman named Dr. Nathan Tupper, who, I regret to say, has passed from this earthly sphere ; he was a brother of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The chief auditor of the Intercolonial Railway is Mr. Clarence A. Lowe, a nephew of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The former railway solicitor, who also a year or two ago passed away, was Mr. W. M. Fullerton, a brother-in-law of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The station agent at Moncton, one of the most important stations on the Intercolonial Railway, was Mr. Alonzo Hillson, another nephew of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The collector of customs at Tidnish, seventeen miles from my town, is at the present time Mr. Thomas Lowe, another nephew of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The chief inspector of buildings on the Intercolonial Railway, has been Mr. Charles Tupper Hillson, another nephew and a namesake of the hon. leader of the Opposition. The collector of customs at Truro, a very important place, is Mr. George P. Nelson, who happily has married a niece of the hon. gentleman. The keeper of the savings bank at Parrsboro' is Dr. A. Stewart Townshend, a relative of the hon. gentleman's family. The port physician at Parrsboro' is the same Dr. Townshend; and the keeper of the savings bank at Amherst is Mr. Charles H. Bent, who happily also married a niece of the hon. leader of the Opposition. And Mr. Speaker, there are others; their names are legion. I have referred to Mr. Charles Hillson Tupper as being the inspector of buildings on the Intercolonial Railway; but this was not the only position he held. He was the mail carrier at Amherst between the post office and the station. When the Intercolonial Railway was opened this position was given to his father, the brother-in-law of the present leader of the Opposition, without tender, and it was held by him until his death, when it was given to the very estimable sister of the hon. leader of the Opposition, Mrs. Hillson, and she kept until her death, when it was given to Mr. Charles Tupper Hillson, the chief inspector of buildings, without tender, and against protests of his own friends. Year after year, for probably fifteen years, this same contract was given to this gentleman without tender, and when the late Government was turned out of power in June last, I asked the hon. Postmaster General to cancel this contract, and he did so. And what was the result? Last year the same Mr. Hillson was paid nearly $600 for carrying this mail, and farmed it out for $200. I asked the hon. Postmaster General to put it up to tender, and he did so, with the result that it was let to an excellent firm for $193. Mr. Hillson had received nearly $600 for the last ten or fifteen years and had farmed it out every year, never paying more than $200, and never touched a mail bag in his life.

An hon. MEMBER. That is so.

Mr. LOGAN. The hon. gentleman has taken care of some of his friends in the maritime provinces. This case is one in which the Postmaster General has done perfectly right, and I am sure that when the hon. gentleman's supporters make statements such as those which my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) made yesterday, they make them, knowing the seriousness of the situation and knowing that the partisan officers whom the Government were asked to remove, were men who would not be true to their leader, but would be traitors in their department.

Mr. McNEILL. I have listened with some degree of surprise to the remarks which have been made by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat. I had fancied that we were discussing the dismissal of a postmaster, but instead we have been treated to a dissertation about the friends and relatives of the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) having been appointed to positions under the Government.

Mr. LOGAN. I was asked to give these names last evening just before six o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER. By whom?

Mr. LOGAN. By your leader.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has just proved the statement he made yesterday to be entirely erroneous; and if it were worth while, I would show that the additional statement he has made to-day, is absolutely as erroneous as the first.

Mr. LOGAN. I would be very glad to hear the hon. gentleman. The statements I have made are not erroneous, and if the hon. gentleman wants more names, I can supply them to him in any quantity.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The names the hon. gentleman has given are not those of relatives of the leader of the Opposition, and if the hon. gentleman knows his county at all, he ought to know that.

Mr. McNEILL. If the hon. gentleman was merely replying to a request that had been made by the hon. leader of the Opposition, of course I would be very sorry to make any reflection on what he said; but I was not aware of that. However, I think he travelled a little outside the record when he talked about the mail contract, because I do not think he was requested to enter upon a question of that sort, at all events I wish just to say that I think nothing could be more unfortunate than that we should lay down a rule in this House that any member of the civil service who is accused of active partisanship by a member of this House should be dismissed because of that accusation from his position. We have, in the first place, had that position repudiated by the hon. First Minister himself. We have had the pledge given by him to Parliament, in the most solemn manner, that no civil servant would be so dismissed, and I am very much surprised to hear an hon. member from that side of the House, who is a supporter of the leader of his party, taking exception practically to the pledge given by his leader, and suggesting that another rule should be laid down. I do not think that anything more grave to the interests of this country could well be imagined than that a solemn pledge of that kind, given by a gentleman occupying the position of Prime Minister, should be held lightly by any member of this House. I presume that before this debate closes, we shall hear from the Prime Minister himself on this subject. For my own part, it seems to me that if pledges of this kind are to be given lightly to Parliament, if such pledges are not to be held as something sacred which cannot be broken or in any way violated, public life in this country is becoming very much degraded indeed. I think that the public opinion of this country will hold the Government bound by the pledge given to Parliament by its leader. I shall be very much disappointed if public opinion does not go so far. So far as this matter is concerned, what we have heard has thrown a good deal of light upon actions of this kind and given us an opportunity of judging as to how complaints made by members of the House and acted upon promptly, without investigation, may result. Certain charges were laid against this gentleman. These charges were read to the House by the hon. member who brought this matter to our notice. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) got up and defended his course in this matter. Did he say that this unfortunate man who has been dismissed was so dismissed because he was guilty of the charges preferred against him. Not at all. What he said was that he had done something which had not been mentioned in these charges at all, that he had treated his assistants unkindly and improperly. That was the gravamen of the charge made by the hon. member for Lincoln, and because of that statement, without any charge, in reference to it being preferred against him, and without any opportunity to reply, this gentleman was dismissed. This is, to my mind, one of the most serious matters with which this House can be confronted. I am quite satisfied that if we were to have the Yankee spoils system introduced in Canada, we shall have in Canada just the same results as that system has given in the United States. What has been the result in the United States. Will the House allow me to read one sentence from the work of Mr. Lecky on "Liberty and Democracy," which has been published quite recently and which has attained wide popularity. Speaking of this system, Mr. Lecky said—

An hon. MEMBER. Who is Lecky?

Mr. McNEILL. I am sorry the hon. gentleman does not know. Mr. Lecky says:

The modern system of making all posts under the government, however unconnected with politics, rewards for party service, was organized in 1829 by Andrew Jackson. This President may be said to have completed the work of making the American Republic the pure democracy which Jefferson had begun.

His statue stands in front of the White House at Washington as one of the greatest men of America, and he assuredly deserves to be remembered as the founder of the most stupendous of political corruption in modern history. Then he goes on to refer to the spoils system and says:

This was the beginning of a system which has spread like a leprosy over all political life and for which there is, I believe, no adequate parallel in history.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the system which is now introduced in Canada. I have heard the hon. member (Mr. Logan) who last addressed the House, say that in the county which he represents improper dismissals of public officials have taken place. I cannot judge of that, as I know nothing of the cases to which the hon. gentleman referred. No doubt he thinks that the dismissals were improper. Perhaps if an explanation were given it might turn out that these dismissals were not so improper as they appear. If any man were dismissed in any county simply because he differed from the Government of the day, I think that was a most improper action, whoever was responsible for it. But I know that in many counties, at all events in Ontario, that system was not adopted by the Conservative party. I know that it was not adopted in my own county; I know that since I had the honour of representing the constituency I do represent, not one single man has been dismissed who was appointed by hon. gentlemen opposite for any cause whatever during that time, and I believe that not one single man has been dismissed there since Mr. Mackenzie's time in 1878. I have made inquiry and have heard of none, and it has been stated publicly in the newspapers that none have been dismissed. Readers were asked to send in the names of any who have been dismissed, and not one has been able to point to a solitary case. I do not believe that in the county of Bruce any such dismissals have taken place. I know this—that Sir John Macdonald set his face like flint against a system of this kind. I know that positively. And if there has been an individual case here and there throughout the country where this has been done, it only shows that there has been a very improper exercise of power, which should be denounced. And certainly, hon. gentlemen who have come into office and who desire, I hope, to conduct the affairs of this country in an honourable manner should not say that they will in this wholesale manner—

Mr. SOMERVILLE. They do not say so.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman has just said that any member of the civil service who had been an active partisan should be dismissed.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. It is all very well for hon. gentlemen opposite to make a rule of that kind, if they choose, and to act upon that rule with the greatest stringency, if they think right. But it is not right to make a rule of that kind now for the first time and make it retroactive. I think it is very unjust, and, for my part, I protest with all the force I can command against a system which will degrade the civil service of this country and will reduce this Canada of ours to just such a condition in this regard as obtained in the United States for years past, but which, I am glad to say, they are now endeavouring to set to rights. At the very time that the people to the south of the line are doing their best to get themselves out of the slough into which this spoils system had led them, we are threatened here in Canada with the plunging of this country into just such a condition of things as that which they are escaping. I will appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite; I will appeal to the best instincts they have—and there are men on that side of the House who are imbued with as high ideals and as pure instincts, and as honourable motives as any man on this side—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. McNEILL. I think there are some. I suppose that those who jeer me are not among the number. I would appeal to the best men on the other side, at all events, to strengthen the hands of the members of the Government who are opposed to the spoils system. I believe there are such men who are utterly opposed to introducing the spoils system into Canada. I do not wish to take up more of the time of the House, but I could not avoid saying a word—

Mr. LANDERKIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question? He stated that in Bruce there had been no dismissals during the last eighteen years. Would the hon. gentleman state if there have been any since the change of Government?

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, there have.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if he has moved for the papers showing the reasons for these dismissals?

Mr. McNEILL. I have not moved for papers, but I have asked questions. I expect to move for papers before the session is over. The hon. gentleman may possess his soul in peace for he may rely upon it that it is my intention to bring the matter to the attention of the House before prorogation.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I thought I would remind you in case you should forget.

Mr. McNEILL. No fear of my forgetting. I am in correspondence in relation to the matter now. When I was interrupted by the hon. gentleman, I was just about to conclude what I had to say, but now that the hon. First Minister (Mr. Laurier) is in his place, I would like again to call his attention to the remarks I made when I first got upon my feet to address the House on this subject. I would like to call the hon. Premier's attention to the pledge he gave to this House last session to the effect that no member of the civil service should be dismissed without having had a trial, without having had an opportunity to reply to the charges made against him. I hope the hon. gentleman will give us some explanation in reference to this matter before this debate closes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think we have heard about enough of this Beamsville post office. From all I have been able to gather from the statement that has been made by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), I think that the Postmaster General (Mr. Mullock) was perfectly justified in taking the course he did with regard to this dismissal and the appointment of another. In the first place, it was clearly proven by the statement of an hon. member of this House who, I am sure, has the respect and esteem of almost all members from both sides, that the man who was dismissed had taken an open, active partisan part in the elections. I do not think there is any person who will challenge the accuracy of that statement. That fact was reported to the Postmaster General. The hon. member for Lincoln did not demand the dismissal of this officer, but left the matter entirely in the hands of the Postmaster General. The Postmaster General, in the discharge of his duty, and following up the course intimated at the last session of Parliament, that where any man openly offered opposition to any candidate and took an active partisan part in an election, which this man did, no man will deny that—

Mr. McCLEARY. We do deny it.

Mr. McMULLEN. You cannot deny it. He checked off the voters at the polls.

Mr. McCLEARY. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) said so. I would like to know if that is not taking an active partisan part in an election. Now, it was distinctly stated at the last session of this Parliament that where any man took such action in an election, he risked his official life. The hon. leader of the Government was quoted as having stated that when it came under the eye of any Minister that a man had taken an active part, an investigation was unnecessary; and the leader of the Government also stated that in a case where a Minister from his own personal knowledge had dismissed a person in his own riding, or where a Minister had seen personally any one taking an active part—in that case he was justified in dismissing that man. Is not any member of this House, in his own place, within his own sphere, in his own riding, as much to be relied upon as any Minister of the Crown? Then I hold that under these circumstances the leader of the Government never intended to say, and his words do not convey the meaning, that the knowledge should be simply and solely confined to the Minister. The fact is that where any man has taken an open and active part in an election under the eye of any member of Parliament, or any Minister, that simple fact, certified to by the member, is a sufficient ground upon which to dismiss that man. That was the principle laid down last session, and acting upon that principle, the Postmaster General did what I believe he had a perfect right to do, and I believe he would have been recreant to his duty if he had not made the removal in this case, and appointed the man who had acted in that capacity before. Now, I must say this, in view of all my business relations and political transactions with the Postmaster General since he came to discharge the duties of that office, I am prepared to say that he is one of the most painstaking and careful members of the present Cabinet, so far as I have seen, I think he is honestly anxious to discharge his duty faithfully, and I think he is trying to serve his country in its best interests. I am quite sure it was with that view, with an earnest desire to that end, that he dismissed the postmaster at Beamsville and put in his place the man who now occupies it. I think if the Opposition have no better case upon which to found a charge against the Government of acting from political motives and in the interest of their supporters, they have made a very great mistake and have cut a poor figure before the public. My hon. friend has drawn attention to the American system. Why, Sir, the American system has never been transported to this country. I am sorry to say that the political action that comes nearest to adopting the American system, was the action of the Conservative Government in 1878. When hon. gentlemen opposite came into power did they take off the heads of officials one by one? No, Sir, but they positively decapitated officially a whole lot of men, but they did it quietly and cautiously by repealing a statute, and in a short time the law was re-enacted and a number of supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite were appointed. We know that the statutes of this country confirm that fact. But the present Government have not taken that course, they have not encouraged that course in any shape or form. It is only when men have openly been offensive partisans, and taken an active and hostile position in elections against a member, that they have been dismissed from their offices, and justly so. I believe that the lesson that has been given to the civil servants by these dismissals was much needed, and will be of great benefit in future elections. It will teach the civil servants to be prudent, and keep within the sphere of their official duty, and to avoid being led into political hostility against one side or the other. They will learn that while they are officials of this country, they should observe neutrality, and not risk their official heads in their anxiety to help other political friends. I hope that the lesson that has been given them will bear fruit in the future, and that the civil servants will keep within proper and prudent lines, and not expose themselves to the inevitable result that will follow their taking an active and hostile course when elections are held.

Mr. TAYLOR. I do not think the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) wishes to misrepresent the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), but if I understood him aright, he has done so. He has laid down the doctrine that a Minister has the right, if, within his own knowledge, a civil servant has taken an offensive part in politics, to dismiss that man; and he says that the Government have the right to make dismissals on the recommendation of a member.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman misunderstood what I said. I said that where a member of this House is perfectly cognizant of an official in his riding taking an open, active, and hostile course in opposition to him, on his so stating to the department under the knowledge he has, that is sufficient to warrant the head of that department in dismissing that man.

Mr. TAYLOR. That is as I understood the hon. gentleman; and the hon. member for Lincoln took the same view when he recommended the Government to dismiss Mr. Fairbrother for taking an open and active part in the election. Now, we had a statement made yesterday by the hon. member for Lincoln, that after the elections were all over he told Mr. Fairbrother: I will not advise the Government to dismiss you. Attend to your own affairs as you have done in the past, and you will not be interfered with. Now, which statement are we to believe? The hon. member for Lincoln who gave his word to Mr. Fairbrother—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Before the election.

Mr. TAYLOR. No, since the election. After the election was over, after these rumours were abroad that he was to be dismissed, Mr. Fairbrother went to the hon. member for Lincoln and asked him if it was true that he was going to recommend his dismissal, and he said: No, I will not recommend your dismissal. Attend to your business in the future as you have done in the past, and your position is all right. Therefore the member for Lincoln can not have recommended to the Government that Mr. Fairbrother should be dismissed; otherwise the statement must fall to the ground that he did not make the recommendation. Now, he must take either one horn or the other of the dilemma. He promised Mr. Fairbrother that he would not do it, and the member for North Wellington says the Government has dismissed him on the recommendation of the member for Lincoln. Now, what we want is the papers, so that we may see if the member for Lincoln did recommend this dismissal, and broke his word that he gave to Mr. Fairbrother that he would not recommend it. The only statement he made here yesterday was, not that Mr. Fairbrother took an offensive part in the elections, but that he had not treated his assistant fairly—that was the only reason that he gave to this House—that he forwarded the papers to the Postmaster General, and let the Postmaster General act on his own decision, not on his recommendation. But we have his statement that he made, and his promise that he gave to Mr. Fairbrother that he would not recommend his dismissal, therefore the Postmaster General must have acted on the recommendation of some other person than the hon. member for Lincoln, judging by his own statement made in his place in Parliament yesterday.

After Recess.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection whatever to an order of the House being passed for the production of the papers asked for, and if the discussion had been restricted until the papers were produced, it would have been confined within narrow limits. The discussion has wandered far beyond the mere issue involved in the removal of the officer in question, and it has taken a wider range as to the principle which should determine dealing with officers generally. On this occasion, as on many others, there appears to be, either by design or accident, an attempt to invoke an incorrect principle, or rather to apply to the acts of the Administration a principle that is not applicable. It is suggested that whenever a public officer is dismissed by the present Administration it is an application of the principle "to the victors belong the spoils." I entirely repudiate the idea that there is any foundation for asserting that such a principle has been applied in this case, or in any other case that has come to my knowledge in connection with dismissals by the present Administration. There is a wide distinction between dismissal for cause and dismissal without cause. Where there is dismissal without cause, then it may be argued that the principle referred to has been applied; but where the dismissal is for cause, then the only question is, was there sufficient cause or was there not. In all the cases that the present Administration have dealt with the dismissals have been made for good and sufficient cause. The doctrine "to the victors belong the spoils" implies that the men are dismissed from office without cause and without reason, simply because their party has gone down in the political battle and with the party the office-holders. That is not the condition of affairs in connection with any dismissal

Mr. TAYLOR.

I am aware of, that has taken place by order of the present Administration. I listened last night to the leader of the Opposition, I will not say with surprise, because I am accustomed to the exaggerations of that hon. gentleman. If I had not had a great many years' experience listening to him I might perhaps have attached some weight to his exaggerated language; but remembering his indulgence in hyperbole and his strong expressions, and that in his habit of drawing upon his imagination to supply the place for facts, he is challenging the supremacy of Baron Munchausen in the realm of fiction. I have learnt to attach little or no importance to remarks made by the hon. gentleman. The less foundation there is for argument the more vehement he becomes and the more largely he indulges in invective. Thus yesterday he almost exhausted his extensive vocabulary of invective to find sufficient attributes with which to characterize the wrong-doings of this Administration. The hon. gentleman has long since abandoned the use of attributes that are not superlative in degree. Can any one imagine an hon. gentleman, filling the responsible position of leader of the Opposition, addressing this House with a "Hansard" reporter taking down his words, and making the statement he did in regard to his own practice and in regard to a particular act, and being cognizant of what he was talking about. Dealing with the case of Ryan, I think it was, the hon. gentleman stated that he had given that man a full investigation, that the charge against him had the fullest investigation. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his place. He who became so virtuously indignant at the dismissal of officers by this Administration, because, as he said, there had been no investigation and it was an entire departure from anything he had ever been a party to, that even in the case of John Ryan his conduct had been subjected to the fullest investigation—is on record as having stated on a previous occasion in this House that there had been no investigation. Not only so, but the "Hansard" itself contains the evidence that there was no investigation. I challenge the hon. gentleman or any one to produce any evidence whatever in support of the correctness of the hon. gentleman's statement that there had been an investigation of the case of John Ryan. I have before me a copy of the letter read in the House last session in the presence of the hon. gentleman, its reading being interrupted by interjections from the hon. gentleman, and this letter is signed Charles Tupper and was written to the father of John Ryan, who had been dismissed.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the hon. gentleman certain that the leader of the Opposition said there was an "investigation"?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I do not think the hon. gentleman wishes to be unfair. If he will look at "Hansard" he will not find the word "investigation."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I heard the words "subject to the fullest investigation."

Mr. McDUGALL. No; "fullest inquiry and consideration."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I am giving my version of what he said, and I think I am giving a correct version.

Mr. GILLIES. I am sure the hon. gentleman will pardon me for interrupting him, but there is a difference as to a statement of fact. The hon. Minister purports to quote the words of the leader of the Opposition, as to his having stated that there was a full inquiry. The words are as follows:—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. "Did he have an investigation?"

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was the fullest inquiry. He was guilty of this conduct at a crowded public meeting in the city of Moncton, hundreds of people were cognizant of it, it was a matter of public notoriety, and after a full investigation—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. A full investigation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, a long period elapsed between this conduct and the date of dismissal. There is hardly a gentleman in the House who will say that if an official goes to the length of using physical force at a public meeting, you would not be perfectly justified in dismissing him.

The statement was not "full investigation," but "full inquiry."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I leave my hon. friend where he has put himself. I had not looked at "Hansard."

Mr. GILLIES. The Postmaster General misapprehends the point. The hon. Minister interjected the word "investigation," after the leader of the Opposition had said "fullest inquiry." The leader of the Opposition followed this up by saying there was the "fullest inquiry."

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I find the word "investigation"—I need not repeat the statement. The leader of the Opposition stated that there had been the "fullest inquiry"—I do not care what term hon. members choose to say was used, because both the words "inquiry" and "investigation" were used. What is the fullest inquiry? Is it an inquiry made by a Minister alone, without giving any opportunity for the officer to be heard? The hon. gentleman (Mr. Gillies) is a lawyer, and does he say that an investigation or inquiry is of the fullest kind if it is so held? The leader of the Opposition was drawing on his imagination, and he was entirely in error when he said there had been an investigation. However, since he has apologized for the language, I am willing to allow the hon. gentleman to withdraw it, because he frequently says what he does not mean. This is but one proof of the correctness of what I have said of him. The leader of the Opposition in this letter laid down the principle upon which dismissals should take place. He wrote it on the 7th April, 1883, and addressed it to the father of the dismissed official. He says:

In reply to your letters of the 17th November and the 9th February, on the subject of the dismissal of your son from the service of the Intercolonial Railway, I have to state, that the reason for his dismissal was, that he openly took a very active part in opposition to the Government at the last election. This, as you will readily understand, no Government officer can be permitted to do, and your son's action was so conspicuous that it cannot be passed over.

It is there stated that this particular officer was dismissed for taking an open part against the Government, and I presume that the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) at that time took a course which he deemed proper in the public interest. How comes it that that rule is a good one for him to follow, and that he repudiates it when some other Government chooses to apply it. Talk about the fullest inquiry; why, the dismissal took place months and months before the leader of the Opposition made known the reasons for it. On the 17th November a letter was written to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) asking for the reason of the dismissal. He did not reply then that there had been an inquiry, and he did not say until eighteen years afterwards that there had been an inquiry. How can the hon. gentleman say, eighteen years afterwards that there was an inquiry, full or otherwise, in connection with the transaction. The second letter was sent to him on the 9th February, and the hon. gentleman did not offer any excuse or explanation then. It was not until the 7th April, six months afterwards, that he ventured to explain why this officer had been removed from the service, and then he did not pretend to say that it was necessary to have an investigation, nor does he dare to say so now.

My hon. friends opposite seem desirous of discussing post office matters at considerable length, and I have no fault to find with them for that because they are quite within their right, and the subject-matter of discussion is worthy of public attention. I do say, Sir, that there is no branch of the service which more calls for neutrality on the part of officials than does the postal service. I have had occasion to look into complaints against the conduct of some postmasters during the recent election, and previously. Many hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken to me in apologetic language on behalf of many officials, friends of theirs, and whenever I could do so I have not disturbed these officials. I have not disturbed a single officer on the permanent force, for cause or otherwise, with the exception of two cases, one of whom was reported as being guilty of corrupt practices by the trial judges. Even in that case, there are circumstances that appeal to my pity, and these circumstances I am considering with a view to see if it is possible to give that officer any relief. There is one officer in the department at Ottawa at this moment, and there are others in the outside service, who I know have committed offences, and against whom complaints have been made to me from undoubted sources, for having committed political offences quite as great as those complained of by the leader of the Opposition, and for which he dismissed Mr. James Ryan.

Well, Sir, I have not, in a single case, except, as already mentioned, dismissed one such officer, and whenever I have to recommend the dismissal of an officer I do it with regret, and would wish that I had not to perform so painful a duty. At the same time I am here to discharge my duty, and I propose to discharge that duty, and neither intimidation, nor criticisms, nor abuse, nor attack, nor any other influence will cause me to swerve from discharging my duty. I propose to show why, in this particular branch of the service, the officials, and postmasters especially, should observe a proper and dignified neutrality. Let me give an illustration or two in regard to matters which have been brought to my knowledge. In one case, in a small community in a rural district, the postmaster, with a salary of $200 or $300 a year, was one of a political committee and became deeply interested in party work. There were meetings in his post office, probably after hours, and as the election proceeded this man became so deeply interested in the contest, that he yielded to temptation and failed to discharge his duties as postmaster. He neglected to deliver letters, he prevented notices of meetings reaching their destination in proper time, and hindered campaign literature passing through the mails in the regular way. In another case, the postmaster so far forgot himself as to retain a letter for ten days, and then to alter the post date on it in his own handwriting, and so brought himself within the reach of the criminal law. In another case, the postmaster withheld a letter which was directed to a well-known political agent, although the latter called for it several times. In that way, and in many other ways, the rights of Her Majesty's subjects, regardless of politics, to have equal use of the mails, were interfered with. That state of affairs will increase in intensity so long as postmasters are permitted to become involved in party strife, and thus be tempted for the time being to place their political zeal before their official duty. Believing as I do, that the postal service exists for all the people of Canada regardless of party politics, I shall require the strictest neutrality from all the public officials engaged in that service.

Complaint is made that the appointment of Mr. Allan was not proper because of his being so advanced in years. Well, I have precedent for that. In 1892 a postmaster was appointed for the important city of Sherbrooke, in the province of Quebec, and the late Government appointed to that office a gentleman who, in the civil list, is described as of uncertain age, born about 1820, showing that he was seventy-two years of age when appointed.

Mr. CLANCY. Did you approve of the appointment?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not passed any opinion upon the appointment; but there is this to be said about it, that it is much less defensible in the public interest, so far as age is concerned, because that particular officer would be entitled to superannuation, whereas if the Beamsville postmaster were to become unfit to discharge his duties, his office not being a staff office, his name would be simply taken off the list, and he would cease to be a charge upon the public revenue.

The leader of the Opposition proceeded in other ways to refer to the Administration, and I would refer to him a little. No public servant ever did more to demoralize the civil service of Canada than that hon. gentleman. He was appointed to a high position under the Government, a position demanding the strictest neutrality. He was our High Commissioner in London; and yet, while retaining his office and receiving a large salary, he came out here in 1891, came down from his high position, took the stump, and became a political partisan of the worst kind. He well knew that he was doing an improper act, and the example he then set, unrebuked by his leaders, was imitated by other civil servants; and so, the whole army of civil servants of this country—not all, but the great majority of them—came to believe that they were there to serve their party on the platform and promote their election. That vicious example set by the leader of the Opposition has borne fruit; and now he would seek to escape from the responsibility of the demoralization of the civil service produced by that example, under cover of violent denunciation, because the result of his example brings disaster to those who unfortunately followed his lead.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The Government advanced $2,000 to pay his expenses in the meantime.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That may be; I know nothing of that. But I would say, in conclusion, that when a member of this House in the position of my hon. friend from Lincoln gives me a statement in writing, upon his responsibility as a member of this House—

Mr. GILLIES. But he did not give it to you, he says.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman is misinformed. When the hon. member for Lincoln gave me his assurance, whether in writing or verbally it would make no difference, that a postmaster in the village of Beamsville had to his own knowledge committed the offences in question, further inquiry would in my opinion be unnecessary. It would prolong action, and would result in considerable expense, but would accomplish no other purpose. No Government will question the absolute accuracy of the statement of my hon. friend. When a member in the position of my hon. friend from Lincoln makes a statement of the kind, there is the best guarantee that his statement is absolutely within the facts. He is bound to make good that statement before his electors and before the country. As a public man, he cannot afford to make a statement to me of something within his own knowledge if that statement is not literally true; and, with evidence of that kind, a Minister would be derelict in his duty if he did not accept it as a full statement of the facts. At all events, in the future as in the past, I accept the words of my colleagues on matters within their own knowledge, and I consider that those statements are incapable of disproof, and that further inquiry under the circumstances would be an idle sham. For these reasons, I am satisfied that the man who was dismissed cannot truthfully contradict the statement upon which he was dismissed. When my hon. friend from Lincoln said he saw him with his own eyes do these things—

Mr. HAGGART. What things? I have not heard them yet.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have not got the exact answer before me.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. He will find them in the "Hansard" of yesterday.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I suppose they are the same things that are on record in the department—if I remember rightly, that he was an active worker in the campaign, that he canvassed, that he was engaged as an outside scrutineer on election day, and so on. He was agent for my hon. friend's opponent. These were the offences for which he was dismissed, and I ask if there is one man on that side of the House who will contradict or question the accuracy of the statement of my hon. friend from Lincoln. If not, no one will say that further inquiry was necessary. I did not quite catch the remarks of the hon. gentleman who made this motion. I understood that he had some affidavits, but I did not hear any affidavit of the ex-postmaster controverting the statements that were made on the floor of Parliament in answer to the inquiry of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) as to why Mr. Fairbrother had been dismissed. I do not understand that up to this moment he has dared to contradict the statements, and they stand confessed by his silence to be true. Then, what nonsense it is—it is a tempest in a tea-pot—to make a noise about an inquiry that would be productive of nothing. The whole issue is whether the statements made by the hon. member for Lincoln are or are not correct; and until the accused person can by evidence make out a case that the charges are untrue, then, I say, he is out of court. And I will further give this challenge: If the dismissed postmaster can satisfy me that the statements made against him and for which he was dismissed were untrue, I will have great pleasure in doing my duty and reinstating him in office. Until that is done, he will remain outside.

Mr. BENNETT. The question under discussion is whether or not the postmaster of the village of Beamsville was given what the hon. First Minister said last year would be given to every person against whom a charge was preferred—the right to meet his accusers face to face and disprove or have proved against him the charges made. That point has been raised, but a very large field has been gone over from one province to another, and perhaps no person is to be more congratulated than the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) on the quantity of extraneous matter which he introduced into the debate this afternoon. I remember well, when quite a lad, I first heard Sir Charles Tupper address some thousands of people in the town of Barrie, on the occasion of a very large demonstration, and how I was struck with the greatness and ability of the man. In the last Parliament I had the pleasure of knowing the then member for Cumberland, the Hon. Mr. Dickey, then Minister of Justice; and comparing the present member with these two men, who formerly represented that constituency, it would seem that the people of Cumberland have at last found a representative beside whom Sir Charles Tupper and the Hon. Mr. Dickey pale into utter insignificance. The hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has made speeches all over the country and in this House on questions of vital moment to the country, but what were these compared with the utterances of the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Logan) this afternoon? That hon. gentleman must for years back have been pursuing the task of hunting the pedigree of the Tupper family and that, too, at the imminent danger to his life or at least to his health. I can imagine him standing in the draughts of blacksmiths' shops, listening to the people, who were in their prime, years ago, retailing to his absorbing ears who were the ancestors of the Tuppers. I can fancy his hanging around corner grocery stores listening to town gossip—

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). The hon. gentleman's fancy is stronger than his argument.

Mr. BENNETT. I can fancy the hon. gentleman at all times pursuing what should be the bent of a future statesman, endeavouring to find out something of great import to the country as a whole, and to-night he has moved down from the back benches to one of the Minister's seats, no doubt imagining that in one bound he has achieved promotion and become a Cabinet Minister. The hon. gentleman's remarks remind me of the fact that a man named Hamilton once made a brilliant speech in the House of Commons and after that subsided into unbroken silence, and his name was handed down to posterity as "Single-speech Hamilton." I trust that the hon. gentleman will never be handed down to posterity as having achieved a high reputation on the speech he made this afternoon. Be that as it will, the hon. gentleman is no doubt satisfied with his effort of this afternoon, he has no doubt placed on his own abilities the highest value, and I do not think any one will take occasion to quarrel with him in that respect.

I think this question should have been dealt with on its merits alone. I concede the perfect right of a Minister to accept the word of one of his supporters, I can understand the Minister accepting the word of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) as to the truth of the charges made against this postmaster, but I say that if those charges were true, that was the stronger reason why an investigation should have been held, and if they were not true, then an injustice has been done this man. If they were true, the accused should have had the opportunity of meeting his accusers face to face. Why, the hon. member for Lincoln stands forth as the embodiment of a great institution in this country, which preaches brotherly love and throws over every man the mantle of charity, and I think the hon. gentleman should have extended to this accused postmaster a little of that compassion which he and many others have always preached, on every possible occasion. And if the ardour of youth had impelled this young man to be rather restive in the political field, the hon. gentleman should rather have condoned the first offence, particularly when, as has been stated in the debate, he himself told this young man that nothing had been done by him of which the hon. gentleman had reason to complain.

Mr. GIBSON. I do not wish the hon. gentleman to misrepresent me or put words into my mouth which I did not say. What I said was that the young man, having heard certain rumours which were very rife and prevalent in the village in the month of June, came to my house and asked me if it was my intention to recommend his discharge, and I frankly told him no, so long as he behaved himself; and it was because he misbehaved himself that I added my testimony to the evidence given by Mr. Zimmerman.

Mr. BENNETT. That is exactly what I understood the hon. gentleman to say the other day. All these matters of which complaint were made occurred in and about the election, and not at all subsequent to it. Surely he could not accuse the postmaster of having been extra jubilant after the election. I suppose that his emotions were rather suppressed then, and that it was the hon. gentleman who was in a jubilant mood. So that when the hon. gentleman promised the postmaster that no complaint would be made of what he had done, he afterwards, on his own statement, broke faith with this young man. That must certainly follow the statement he has made.

I am pleased to hear the hon. Postmaster General make the statement that the department is to be conducted on the basis of non-partisanship; and if he proposes to carry out that promise, I can refer him to my own riding, where he will find some most glaring cases to deal with. He will find there two postmasters who were very active on the stump against me in the last campaign, and if that will not suffice, I can bring to his notice two cases of postmasters openly tampering with letters, and if that will not suffice, I can show the hon. gentleman postmasters who have been the most active partisans in the last five years. What I stated in the House last year when this question of the dismissal of public servants was up, I repeat to-day, and that is that during the time I had control of patronage, in the last five years, I always thought life was too short to heckle and harrass and worry men who were opposed to me politically. And if politics consist in venting your spleen and indignation on men against whom you have feeling, as the hon. member for Lincoln evidently has done, on his own admission, then all I can say is that politics must be reduced to the level of the men in power, because they are evidently above the level of the men who to-day have control of the patronage. I trust the Postmaster General will deal alike with Conservatives and Liberals. If he is prepared to give the same treatment all around I shall have much pleasure in submitting the names of two postmasters in East Simcoe who certainly distinguished themselves very much in the past campaign on behalf of the Liberal candidate in that riding. There is no doubt that in this case the postmaster at Beamsville was not fairly and honourably treated by the hon. member for Lincoln, because after that hon. gentleman had pledged his word that the man would not be interfered with, he went behind his back and broke that pledge. It is opposed to all spirit of fair-play, it is opposed to British justice, to have acted in this way, and not have permitted the postmaster to confront those who accused him and make them prove the truth or falsity of their charges.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I am astonished to hear our neighbours on the other side make such wry faces over the discharge of one postmaster at Beamsville. I live in a city opposite the city of Detroit, into which three trunk railways run, and which requires a good many custom-house officers. In that neighbourhood we have twenty custom-house officers. Out of the twenty, seventeen were Conservatives and three Liberals. Our friends opposite who are making such a fuss about the discharge of this postmaster of nineteen years of age at Beamsville, came to our city and discharged the only three Liberals in the county of Essex who were custom-house officers. Now, I can give the names. One of them was Mr. Samuel Chevalier, a man not more than 60 years old, in good health, and a competent officer. Another was Mr. John Watson, a man who had been twenty or twenty-five years in the service, an able, honest, industrious and prudent officer. And next was Mr. John Brown, who was at least fifteen or twenty years younger than the leader of the Opposition. Now, these men were discharged—for what? For being Liberals.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the hon. gentleman permit me? I am informed that these men to whom he refers were superannuated, and not discharged.

Mr. MCGREGOR. It was just the same. These men were doing their duty and doing it well. I would ask the hon. gentleman who has asked the question, why the late Government did not discharge some of the older Conservative members of the service who were alongside of these men and who were not nearly as efficient?

Some hon. MEMBERS. And much older.

Mr. COCHRANE. You don't know anything about it.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Yes, I do, my dear Christian friend. Was there a trial or an inquiry into the cases of these men?

Mr. HUGHES. This is ancient history; tell us about Miss Kelly.

Mr. MCGREGOR. My friend wants to know about Miss Kelly. I will tell him. In the town of Windsor we have a large post office with a full staff of clerks. In fact, they were falling over each other the number was so great. There was a political contest in the constituency of West Huron, and it was a pretty wicked fight between the Hon. J. C. Patterson and Mr. M. C. Cameron. As soon as the contest was over Miss Kelly was sent over from Huron to Windsor as an addition to the employees in the post office. Now, we never required Miss Kelly in Windsor for any purpose. We did not only have to dismiss Miss Kelly from the post office; we have dismissed three or four others, and nobody has been appointed in their places. When the Conservatives dismissed Mr. Chevalier, Mr. Watson and Mr. Brown, they appointed older men than any of them in their places. They appointed William Stokes and P. C. Ponting, both Tory heelers who had been Tory heelers for years. During the last contest we had a young Conservative in the county of Kent who went from place to place against my friend Mr. Campbell, a young man named Killackey. Having served his time on the stump within four or five days after the election, he took a place in the custom-house under the old Administration at a salary of $1,000 a year. And he did more than that—though he went in on the 26th of June he drew full pay for the month of June. Four or five days was quite sufficient for him on which to draw a month's pay. Gentlemen opposite talk about discharging men without trial. Why, Sir, they could not have acted more shamefully than they did in the county of Essex. There is another case. Last year, the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) said that I could not prove what I had said in reference to Mr. Hackett, who had charge of the lighthouse at Amherstburg. He said that I would not dare to move for the papers. But I moved for the papers. Mr. Hackett was appointed in 1876. During 1891 the Conservative Government discharged him, and the reason given on the return was "on the recommendation of the Liberal-Conservative Association of Amherstburg." The Order in Council was passed on the 1st of June, 1891. What are they hollering about a little postmastership in Beamsville for? Let them come to Essex and we will show where they have dismissed man after man because those men were Liberals and for no other reason. Did they put in the customs department more able men, more honest men or younger men? Had they done so, the case would have been different. I hope the time has come when we can close this little bickering because we have a good many cases we can give if necessary. We thought it well enough to let this thing go on for a short time, but where there has been one dismissal by this side, we can prove many dozens on the other. As against this Government we can say that they have not dismissed enough, considering the acts of which many officers have been guilty. They have been in office so long, these customs officers, and officers in the Inland Revenue and Post Office Departments, that they thought they were there for life and could do as they saw fit, so long as they did some damage to a Liberal.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure if any evidence were needed as to the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite are conducting the affairs of the country with regard to the officials, hon. members and the country can no longer be in the dark after having heard an hon. gentleman read a lesson to his own friends, meting out the strongest condemnation to the Ministers in this House behind him whom he sits. The hon. gentleman said that officials had been dismissed in the county of Essex, and when he was asked whether they were not superannuated he was forced to admit that they were.

Mr. MCGREGOR. I stated so.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman admitted it when he was asked; but he took care not to tell the House that they had been superannuated as his friends are superannuating many officers.

Mr. MCGREGOR. They put Tories in their places.

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend (Mr. McGregor) is very much distressed because they did not put Liberals in their places. Let me ask my hon. friend if he is putting Conservatives in places that are being made vacant now? The hon. gentleman has one rule for Conservatives and another for Liberals. I want to say to my hon. friend that his statement with regard to an official in the customs at Windsor is entirely an unfair one. The hon. gentleman cannot be possessed of the facts or he would not, on responsibility of a member of this House, go so far as to state what he did with regard to the drawing of his salary for a month by an official who had been in office only a few days. I wish to say to my hon. friend in order that he may not repeat it again—because I do not think he would repeat it if he knew the facts—that official drew his salary on the recommendation of the chief officer saying that he must go upon the pay-sheet during that month, and it would be corrected in the next month. Now, if my hon. friend had made the slightest inquiry he would not have given utterance to a statement so damaging and so unfair.

Mr. MCGREGOR. May I ask the hon. gentleman, was it returned the next month? Does he know it was returned?

Mr. CLANCY. I ask my hon. friend who is behind the curtain, who has the confidence of his friends, who has the run of the offices, if he is able to say now that it has not been returned?

Mr. MCGREGOR. It has been returned, but not until after I brought the matter up in this House.

Mr. CLANCY. Now, my hon. friend knows perfectly well that this officer did not disgorge when he was caught. He knows he was giving utterance to a statement that was most damaging, and I have no hesitation in saying that it was entirely unworthy of the hon. gentleman. The fact is that this officer drew the salary upon the recommendation of his chief officer, with the understanding that it was to be returned on the other work. Now, the officers he speaks of as having been dismissed, were superannuated, just as his own friends are doing every day now. I think that puts an end to what the hon. gentleman thought to be an offence against his friends. I do not know if he was prompted through the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson), who is sitting beside him, in the course he has taken. I am sorry the Postmaster General is not in his place, because I wish to call his attention for a moment to the position of the member for Lincoln. I wish to call attention to the statement that was made in the House yesterday, and was repeated a few moments ago by the hon. gentleman himself, that after the election this young man came to him and said to him: There are all sorts of rumours that I am to be dismissed; what are you going to do? Well, Sir, from those good impulses that sometimes impel us upon the moment, with our notions of fair-play, the hon. gentleman committed himself irrevocably to this statement: Well, so long as you behave yourself, I will have nothing to do with your dismissal, nor will I recommend it.

Mr. GIBSON. In the statement I made yesterday, I gave the reasons why he did not behave himself. Now, I wish to ask the hon. gentleman this question: Does he, as a member of this House, believe the statement I made of the way this young man behaved himself? Does the hon. gentleman believe that the postmaster of Beamsville conducted himself properly towards his assistant by throwing open the doors and abusing him, and then reducing his salary to $20 a month?

Mr. CLANCY. My hon. friend asks me if I believe that the official now in question had done any wrong to warrant his dismissal. I shall take the hon. gentleman's word, and the House should take his word, that the hon. gentleman gave his pledge to this man. I believe the hon. gentleman's pledge is worth something. I am not yet willing to believe that the hon. gentleman would pledge his word that the official would not be interfered with, and then go back upon it. What did it mean? It meant that he was cognizant, that he saw this young man marking off votes, and that he saw him hauling in voters, and after all that was over, when the offences were all committed, he said: I will not recommend your dismissal at all. Now, upon what ground did he recommend his dismissal? Was it for partisanship? Was it on the ground upon which hon. gentlemen are seeking to dismiss other officials in this country? Had it anything to do with his public duties? Was it on account of anything pertaining in the slightest to his office that the hon. gentleman changed his mind, withdrew his pledge, went back upon the whole thing, and came down here and made a statement, as he said, to the Postmaster General? Why, it was upon the little thing that they did not divide the salaries properly. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if that is any part of his business? Is he going to inquire into the business of every official to see whether they are getting a just proportion of the salary, whether they are to keep the doors open, whether somebody has been sitting in the draft? Mr. Speaker, this reason is unworthy of an hon. member of this House. It is unworthy of any hon. gentleman to bring such a reason forth and offer it as an excuse for the dismissal of an official. Now, I wish to call the attention of the Postmaster General to this fact. I think the word of a member of this House should have some weight, and it is all well enough for an hon. member to come to this House and say: Certain officials have been aggressive in my election, they have taken a too active part. No doubt these gentlemen speak with some heat, they feel very keenly as we all feel after elections. Then we have more. There is the pressure of those behind who are constantly asking positions from the Government. I care not whether it be a Liberal or a Conservative Government, there is always a constant pressure for positions. Now, what should follow that? Why, the fact is that cases arise every day of the most frivolous and worthless kind, just such as that the hon. member for Lincoln has shown the House. I say conclusively that to proceed upon the ground alone of a statement of a member—I care not how truthful he may be, I care not how often he gives his word of honour and takes it back again—I say it is a most dangerous thing to make dismissals upon statements such as those made in this House by hon. members. I quite admit that it is not a proper thing for officials to make themselves offensive in elections, and it would be infinitely better if a new rule could be laid down by which they would all abstain from that. But I wish to point out that when an official does take an active part, if he is worthy of dismissal, his case is worthy of an investigation. I would like to ask my hon. friend who is a good lawyer, who would urge a case with great vigour and with great ability, if he were defending a client, would he allow his client to lose a dollar even in a division court without calling in witnesses? Should any person be condemned upon mere hearsay? Such a procedure with regard to an official is unjust, because it involves his living, it involves his reputation, and his livelihood for coming years. I think it is an unfair thing. Whatever might be the policy of the Government as to dismissing officials for taking part in elections we have seen nothing yet which would justify any such dismissal in the mind of any person who has any notion of justice, any notion of right, any notion of a procedure that would put it beyond the possibility of a doubt that the accused had committed an offence. I say there is no case too small if hon. gentlemen proceeded upon that line. Where are you going to draw the line between offensive officials and those who are not? Now, I make no apology for their taking part in elections. There has probably been too much of it in the past. I believe it would have been very much better had that not been done. But let me point out to the hon. gentleman that they laid down a rule before they came in office themselves, and I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the condition of affairs in Ontario. The hon. gentleman knows that the officials of the Ontario Government are most offensive partisans. They are in a position to coerce people. Their position is different from that of the Dominion officials, for not only do they use their influence as individuals but they use their official influence, which is infinitely greater. If the hon. gentleman wanted to be fair and treat officials just as he would like his own friends to be treated in case of a change of Government, he would not endeavour to lay the foundation of a state of things under which all officials in Ontario could to-morrow be turned out on the ground that they had been active partisans in the past. Without discussing the propriety of dismissing public officials and laying down a rule contrary to that which hon. gentlemen opposite had advocated in Opposition, there is no reason why an official should be dismissed without trial. Of the hundreds of cases that have occurred we find very few in which the officials have had a trial. We have had the statement of the Postmaster General that if this young man who has been dismissed can show that he was not guilty of the offence with which he was charged and on which he was dismissed, the Minister would be willing to reinstate him. A stronger case could not be made than that embodied in the admission of the hon. gentleman himself, for he now admits that possibly after all that official was dismissed without cause. This only shows the difficulty of the present system.

Mr. WOOD (Hamilton). Did your party ever make an investigation before dismissing an officer?

Mr. CLANCY. I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite in finding one case in eighteen years, one letter in eighteen years' administration of public affairs on which they hang their case of an official having been dismissed by a Conservative Government. What was that case? As was stated by the leader of the Opposition, that official was notoriously offensive, and even used physical force in the presence of hundreds of people. Those statements do not seem to be contradicted. I remember the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stating last session that he knew of a case of an official who was at a public meeting at which he was present and used offensive language—I do not know if he used physical force—and the Minister dismissed him. I think the hon. gentleman was quite right in his action. But now hon. gentlemen opposite are able to find a single case, hinging on a single letter and they put that against hundreds of cases of dismissals that have occurred during the last nine or ten months, and they ask the country to take that as an answer. I have only to state this, that hon. gentlemen are more hopeful than is usual under circumstances of that kind. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) gave a very wholesome warning in the course of his speech. He said: Do not goad us on to dismissing officials; you had better keep quiet; I have not asked for any dismissals in my county, but if you are very noisy you may have to go; we have laid down a new rule, and in England they are pursuing a similar course. The hon. gentleman, however, on more than one occasion has had local officials side by side with him on the public platform and going through the riding with him, fighting the battles of the Liberal party. It is astonishing how hon. gentlemen have so quickly reconciled themselves to changed conditions. Hon. gentlemen opposite are now in office and they are making use of the patronage. It is unfair and illogical for hon. gentlemen now to say that they are not following the doctrine "that to the victors belong the spoils." Hon. gentlemen may make that declaration, but the fact is they are doing so every day. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to assent to that proposition, but the Ministers are constantly dismissing officials. Let me tell them more. There are cases where officials have asked to be allowed to appear by counsel, where investigations are held, and the instructions of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are not to permit counsel to appear. Is it unfair not to permit a man, who is unable to speak English, or speak it very imperfectly, to employ some one to conduct his case for him? Yet the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries has given instructions not to permit this to be done. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has been after the heads of the officials in his county. He came down and told the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that certain officials had been fighting against him, that their heads must come off, and they have come off. The hon. gentleman has had one or two cases of that kind. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is actuated by the statement made by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who said he was astonished at his own moderation, and has not had more heads removed. I know of cases of dismissals in which the officials asked for an investigation but were unable to get it. I point to the dismissal of Mr. Pelletier as Inspector of Fisheries.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Has he been dismissed?

Mr. CLANCY. He has received notice of dismissal; whether he has been retained or reinstated I do not know. I saw the letter of dismissal, but whether he is still acting I am not aware. I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to that particular case. The gentleman holding the investigation sent a letter to the person charged with the offence stating that he would hold an investigation in Chatham on a certain day; but the person charged, being a farmer living two miles from the post office and not going there for his mail every day, did not receive the notice until the day after the investigation was held. The other party being nearer at hand—I will not say having any warning—appeared, and the investigation proceeded.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Who was the commissioner?

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Sheppard.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The inspector for Ontario.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Pelletier protested against this course, and asked for a re-hearing. I do not know what the report or recommendation of Mr. Sheppard was; but a commissioner can make a strong report when he hears the evidence of only one side. I am informed that Mr. Pelletier applied to Mr. Sheppard, and possibly to the department, for the case to be reopened in order that he might be able to put in his reply; but the request was not granted. I hope the hon. Minister will not lay down that rule as one to be applied to other officials. This official should have had an opportunity given him of disproving the charges. I have no more to say beyond this on that point: We have an affidavit solemnly sworn to by Mr. Fairbrother, denying in the most positive and categorical way every charge made against him. We have it on the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) that he did not think the conduct of the postmaster merited dismissal. The hon. member thought, that although Mr. Fairbrother took part in the election, his action was not sufficiently offensive to dismiss the young man and he gave him his assurance to that effect. But the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) now tells us, that he discovered afterwards that this young man had not been dealing quite fairly with some of the officials in the office—a matter with which neither he nor the Government had anything to do—and so he took back his word, and went to the Postmaster General and had this young man dismissed without the slightest investigation. The Government may disclaim as much as they like, and they may deny as much as they like, but conduct of that kind proves beyond question that they have inaugurated the spoils system in this country. The friends of the Government have been pressing them for the last nine months, but I do hope that Ministers will have stamina enough now, to say, that no officials will be dismissed unless it has been made perfectly clear that they have been active partisans, and until they have had a chance of answering every charge made against them. In not one case out of ten where officials have been dismissed, have they been allowed even a sham trial. The Government have dismissed officials on the statement of a member of Parliament, who possibly does not know the facts, but who comes to a Minister and says: I want so and so dismissed, as I believe he has taken an active part in the election. Probably that action of the member is instigated by men who are candidates for the position, and who will get it when it is made vacant. We all know that human nature is weak, and no one more than the members of the Cabinet who are lawyers have the best means of knowing, the danger of accepting any such evidence as that. The country will judge the Government by their acts, and unless they retrace their steps the consequence of their conduct will come home to them in no uncertain way.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. McCleary) and the gentlemen on the other side of the House who have backed him up in this debate, have not added much to their reputation, nor have they done any service to those of their friends whom they are seeking to benefit. It is making a mountain out of a mole hill, and it is altogether unworthy taking up so much of the time of Parliament with this little two-penny-half-penny affair. To the personal knowledge of an hon. member of the House, this discharged postmaster acted as scrutineer on the day of election, checking off the voters as they came in to vote, and brought voters to the polls in cabs to vote for the Conservative candidate. A man who would do that should have been dismissed at once, and the Postmaster General did perfectly right in accepting the statement of the hon. member for Lincoln, and giving that official the grand bounce. If he wants to be a politician he will have to cease to be a postmaster. It is amusing to hear some members of the Opposition lecture the Government, and dictate to them the standard of morality which they should adopt. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has referred to the Ontario officials, and said that every one of them is an active partisan. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) is indeed ungrateful to the Ontario officials in the county which he represented in the local legislature for many years, and part of which I represent in this House now. Why, Sir, nearly every one of these officials of the Ontario Government were strong supporters of his. The sheriff of the county, the jailor—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Two bailiffs in the county of Kent, were his strongest supporters, and at every election where he was a candidate these men did their best to elect him to the local House.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well, that the jailor and the bailiff to whom he refers, were appointed, not by the Liberal party but by the Conservative party.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What difference does that make, they were Ontario officials.

Mr. CLANCY. Wait a moment till I explain.

Mr. LANDERKIN. We think Mr. Campbell can explain it better than you can.

Mr. CLANCY. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Campbell) has no right to say that they were active in my support. They dare not open their mouths. But let me ask the hon. gentleman, what about Mr. Mills and what about Mr. Rankin who are Ontario officials, and who were presidents and secretaries of the Reform Association?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is true that these officials were appointed by the Conservatives, but all the same they are officials of the Ontario Government.

Mr. CLANCY. And they dare not say a word.

Mr. CAMPBELL. They have always been consistent Conservatives, and they have always supported the hon. gentleman, and it is ungrateful on his part to throw slurs on those men who helped him so well. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) must remember that Mr. Rankin holds a position to which there is no salary attached. He is one of the license commissioners, and when the license commissioners were appointed in the county of Kent, the president of the Conservative Association was also appointed.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, but because there was no salary attached to it he would not hold the office.

Mr. FRASER. That is it; after the money.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Tories do not care for any offices unless there is a good round salary attached to it, and that was the reason why Mr. D. R. VanAllan, the president of the Conservative Association of the county of Kent refused the office he was appointed to. It is most unfair for the hon.

gentleman (Mr. Clancy) to contend, that gentlemen holding a purely honorary position should be debarred from taking part in elections. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Clancy) has referred to Killackey, but I do not think that he knows the facts or else he would not have made the statement he made to-night. There never was in Canada a more disgraceful course pursued by any public officer than that pursued by Mr. Killackey. On the 12th of May the Order in Council was passed appointing him preventive officer in the town of Windsor. He was advised by his own friends to retire from politics and attend to the duties of his office. They told him that possibly the Government might be defeated and that if he continued in the campaign it might be unpleasant for him. His reply was that he did not care, that the Government would not be defeated, but that even if they were he would hold his position.

Mr. BENNETT. Did not the hon. gentleman admire him for that?

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Order in Council appointing him to that position was passed on the 12th of May, and he continued actively from day to day stumping the county, and appearing every night at political meetings and taking part in the Conservative interest.

Mr. CLANCY. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but he knows it is true. He knows that Mr. Killackey continued until a few days of the election to take an active part in the contest. There never was a man in that county or any other who abused the Liberal party and the hon. leader of the Liberal party as did that gentleman. He denounced the leader of the Liberal party and the present Premier of this Dominion as a traitor to his race and creed, and pointed to him as a man who should not receive the confidence of the electors. Night after night he appeared on the platform, until two or three days before the election.

Mr. CLANCY. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that he is making a statement that is utterly apart from the truth.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman should withdraw that expression.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Speaker, I bow to your decision with pleasure. I accept it in the truest parliamentary sense. I desire to say to the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat that I know personally that Mr. Killackey never went on the stump after he received the notice of his appointment.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is begging the question altogether. The Order in Council appointing Mr. Killackey was passed on the

Mr. CAMPBELL.

12th of May; the election took place on the 23rd of June. Mr. Killackey knew immediately after the Order in Council was passed that he was appointed. The Chatham "Planet," the Tory organ in the county of Kent, announced it in its editorial column; the Windsor "Record," the Chatham "Banner," and every other paper in the two counties announced it. He was congratulated on the appointment by his friends, and he was advised by his best friends to cease taking any part in the contest.

Mr. HUGHES. The papers have also announced that Mr. McGregor, the representative of North Essex, has been appointed collector of customs at Windsor.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Is it the "Warder"?

Mr. FRASER. Then it would not be believed.

Mr. HUGHES. No, the "Globe."

Mr. CAMPBELL. This gentleman, as I have stated, continued addressing public meetings in the county of Kent up to within three or four days of the election. I know it because I met him on the platform myself, and there is no use for the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) shaking his head, because I met him and had to defend myself against his attacks. But what more did this gentleman do? As my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. McGregor) has stated, the next day after the election he went down to Windsor and took possession of his office on the 26th of June. He served four days as preventive officer at Windsor. One of the first duties he had to perform was to make out the pay-sheet, and what do you think he did? Mr. W. P. Killackey put down his name for a whole month's salary and received it. He turned it off on the poor old collector, who was sick in bed, saying that the collector had advised him to do it, and that he could refund it next month; but the next month he again put down his name for his full salary; and when August came around, he again put down his name and drew the salary for the full month of August; and when September came around, he put down his name again and drew his full salary for the month of September; but on the 11th of September, when the matter came up in the House of Commons, and when the papers in Windsor and in other places called attention to what they called Killackey's "gall," he found that it was getting too hot for him, and then, on the last day of September, the poor fellow thought he had better refund the money that he had stolen in the month of June last. He knew, when he drew a month's salary in June, that he had only put in four days.

Mr. CLANCY. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not intend to do that official an injustice. If the hon. gentleman will look at the report of the Minister of Customs, he will see that he made a note in his statement—

Mr. MCGREGOR. No, he did not.

Mr. CLANCY—that he had no idea of taking a salary to which he knew he was not entitled.

Mr. CAMPBELL. What an innocent fellow this man was. He put in four days in the month of June, and the poor, innocent man did not know that he was stealing a month's salary, less four days, when he drew it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Shame.

Mr. CAMPBELL. He says that, on the advice of the poor, old collector of customs, who was sick in bed, and not able to attend to the duties of his office, he drew his salary that month, saying that it could be returned the next month; but he did not return it until public notoriety called his attention to it, and it got too hot for him; and he returned it on the last day of September. This is the man whom the hon. member for Bothwell is defending; this is the man who is still in the office at Windsor, whom this Government has not yet turned out. I say he ought to have been dismissed in five minutes after the Government came into power; and when these gentlemen get up and make a hue and cry about a two-penny half-penny little post office at Beamsville, as they have, they are simply bringing home to the Government the fact that they are getting no thanks for their forbearance and leniency. The hon. member for Bothwell also refers to the case of Mr. Pelletier, inspector of fisheries in the county of Kent. I am glad he has brought that matter to the attention of the House, because if ever the late Government deserved the severe censure of the House, it was for the way they dismissed the predecessor of Mr. Pelletier, Mr. Timothy McQueen, who had been inspector of fisheries there for sixteen or eighteen years. There was no charge brought against him.

Mr. CLANCY. Yes, there was, and it was investigated too.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is true that there was an investigation, but Mr. McQueen was not invited to attend; it was held without the chief witness being present. Mr. Pelletier's friends held an investigation, but Mr. McQueen was given no opportunity of being present and defending himself. I say that there never was a more disgraceful affair than the dismissal of Mr. McQueen in the county of Kent, solely because he would not support the Conservative candidate in that county. Now, what has Mr. Pelletier done? It was notorious, everybody knew it, that during the last contest he canvassed actively and openly for Mr. William Ball, the Conservative candidate. The hon. gentleman says he had no notice. All I know is that the inspector of fisheries in the province of Ontario, Mr. W. B. Sheppard, of Toronto, who, everybody knows, is a strong Conservative.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why, you are not acquainted with the gentleman. Charges were made against Mr. Pelletier. The inspector sent him notice of these charges and of the investigation, a week before he held the investigation in the town of Chatham. The same day that the notices were mailed to him they were mailed to other parties there, but Mr. Pelletier never came before the investigation at all. He knew that he could not defend his conduct, he knew that he had been guilty of the grossest partisanship, and that he could not answer the charges, and so he kept away purposely. Evidence was produced, and I do not know what the report was because I have not had the pleasure of seeing it, but Mr. Pelletier is still there performing the duties of his position. But I do say this, that if ever there was a man whose head ought to come off it is that of Mr. Pelletier in the county of Kent, and if there should be a vacancy, the old inspector, who for many long years filled the position to the satisfaction of everybody, against whom no charges were levelled at all, ought to be reinstated in the position from which he was unjustly and without investigation dismissed a few years ago. I do not know that I have anything more to say at present. I think the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy) has been exceedingly unfortunate in the cases he has brought before the House. In the case of Killackey, that gentleman is still holding his position. Mr. Pelletier is still performing the duties of his position, and if the Government do not cut off the heads of those two officials, they will not be doing their duty to the people. I have a good deal of sympathy for the officials because a great many of them, who took part in the elections, were ordered to do so by the late Government. Why, a Government mail clerk in the county of Kent, who received leave of absence, spent about two or three weeks canvassing against me, and of that the hon. member for Bothwell no doubt is aware. That man has not been dismissed because I believe he was innocent of any evil intent. He was actually ordered to do what he did. These gentlemen were so long in power that they began to think they owned this country and would stay in office for ever, and they instructed their officials that if they did not turn out on election day and do all they could for the party, they would be dismissed. Those who took an active part in the elections, those who were strong party men, received their promotion or had their salary advanced, and in many cases these poor men were ordered to do, and actually did work which they had no heart to do. I think the Government have been exceedingly fair in their dealings with these officials, and if there is any censure to bring it, must be because the Government have not been more prompt in dismissing more officials. I can assure my hon. friends opposite that if they continue this course of pitching into the Government and refusing them credit for their leniency, they will do more to goad the Government on and make things worse for their own friends. The hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for Bothwell threatened to-night that they would pay us back, when they got into power, in our own coin. Well, they have been doing that for the last eighteen years. During that time, there was hardly a single Liberal in the whole Dominion appointed to a position, and the few Liberals who were in office when they came into power, they took steps to get rid of as soon as they could. By repealing the Weights and Measures Act, they destroyed every official in the province of Ontario, and that solely for the purpose of installing their own friends in office. There has been too much said about this question, and I would advise our friends to drop their talk about dismissing officials from this moment out.

Mr. DYMENT. To my politically untutored mind, some of the questions that have been brought before this House by the Opposition are most senseless and childish, and this is one of them. It is a perfect farce. We are sent here to look after the affairs of the country to the best of our ability, and we have now wasted two days of the time of this House, and for what? Because the Opposition are trying to defend an official, who plainly and openly worked for them in the elections against the hon. member for Lincoln. I venture to say that if the tables had been turned, if this official had worked for a Liberal, and the Conservative Government were returned to power, his head would have dropped into the basket inside of two weeks. If hon. gentlemen opposite think that by such means as this they can win their way back to power at the next elections, they will be sadly mistaken—more sadly mistaken even than they were in Quebec on the 23rd of June last. The people are sick and tired of this. I do not rise to exonerate the Government at all because they have done nothing that requires exoneration. If it were not presumption on my part, I would criticise them for not having dismissed more than they have. They have not dismissed one-tenth of those they should. My district is actually overrun with partisan officials, men who got out and worked against me in the last election, and but few of whom have been dismissed. Let me mention a few of them who have so worked and still retain their office. The Indian doctor at Gore Bay in the Manitoulin Islands is the president of the Conservative association there, and distributed literature and canvassed against me in the last election. Another Indian doctor who, by the way, drew over $1,600 a year from the country, was one of the biggest Conservative politicians in the whole of Algoma. In fact if it had not been for him, my friend, Mr. McDonald, would not have got the nomination at Sudbury when he did. It was this Indian doctor who turned the tables for Mr. McDonald. This is a notorious fact, yet this man had been allowed to remain on until now, I am sorry to say, he has passed over to the majority. I refused to ask for his dismissal, as I refused in many other cases, and I must say that of those whose dismissals I did ask for the Ministers refused absolutely to consider the cases at all, unless the fullest proof was given to them of some wrong-doing. The postmaster at Gore Bay at a political meeting just the next night after I had spoken, got on the platform and addressed the meeting, and yet he still retains his position. There is Mr. McGovern, the immigration agent at Port Arthur. It is notorious that he had full charge of the voters' lists for the Conservatives at the last revision. He enjoys, in the capacity of immigration agent, a pass over the Canadian Pacific Railway and was sent up and down the line arranging the voters' lists and he is still in his office. Mr. Robinson the postmaster at Manitowaning attended meetings against me and, even at my own meeting at Manitowaning interrupted me. Mr. Davis, the postmaster at Norman, I am told on what I believe to be the very best authority—indeed I think I have an affidavit to that effect—canvassed against me. I am informed that he went to one of the men working on the road at Rat Portage, a common labourer, and told him that if he did not vote for Mr. McDonald in the last election he would have him dismissed from that paltry job. He was a councillor in Rat Portage. There is Mr. N. W. Ross, and my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) well knows that he is one of the strongest partisan officials. There has not been an election since he went there that he has not been the biggest toad in the puddle. He is still in office. There is another, whose name, were I to mention it, would not need explanation as to what he had done, for hon. members know something of his record. The House may remember a couple of letters that I read last session. In one of them the writer said that he had been dismissed from the public service without investigation and without any complaints made against him. In fact the department felt that there was no charge against him, that he had done his work faithfully and well. But he had to go. The House may also remember, Mr. Speaker, that some hon. members doubted the correctness of the statements in that letter. Now, I have something here I purpose reading to the House, not that I think it will convince the members of the Opposition, for they do not want to be convinced; but this is a formal affidavit. After the usual heading it goes on:

Mr. CAMPBELL.

1st. That, for more than ten years previous to A.D. 1894, I held the office of forest bailiff under the Indian Department at Ottawa for part of Manitoulin Island.

2nd. That, during my tenure of office, I heard of no complaints as to my efficiency or my neglect of any duty appertaining to the said office of forest bailiff.

3rd. That, in the summer of 1894, after the provincial election, the office was summarily taken from me, without any notice of any complaint or of any neglect of duty on my part.

Yet no one, we are told, was dismissed by the late Government without full inquiry being made.

4th. That I have cause to believe, and do believe, that the said office was taken from me because I voted for the Liberal candidate at the said provincial election.

5th. That in my room and stead three forest bailiffs have been appointed, all Conservatives, all of whom still hold the office.

There is an affidavit, solemnly taken by one H. May.

Mr. HAGGART. I listened with a good deal of attention to the remarks of the Postmaster General laying down the rule adopted by the present Government in reference to officials who interfere in politics. I was not present when the debate commenced this afternoon, but I have taken the opportunity of reading the speech of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). The postmaster at Beamsville seems to have committed a great offence in the eyes of hon. members opposite and in the eyes of the Postmaster General. I did not hear from the Postmaster General what were the charges against this postmaster. He referred me to the communication he had received from the hon. member from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson). The only way by which I could find out the charge was by reading the report of the hon. gentleman's speech. Now, what was the offence that this postmaster committed? The utmost of his offence, according to the hon. gentleman, was that he was an outside scrutineer at the polls. No, he afterwards committed a crime greater than that. He went to St. Catharines and listened to the speech of Sir Charles Tupper. Now, I can tell the Postmaster General that the postmasters have always been regarded as being in an entirely different category from the officers of any other department. They have always been treated so both by Conservatives and by Reform Governments. Never before in the history of the department has a postmaster been dismissed for taking part in politics. When I was Postmaster General I had hundreds of complaints such as that which the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) sent to the Postmaster General. I refused to act in any case, because it is a well known rule in the Post Office Department, where there are over ten thousand postmasters receiving salaries from $7 to $1,000 in villages, that they had a right to be political partisans if they liked, to attend political meetings and take an active and even partisan part in the elections. It was a well established rule in the department that no postmaster should be deprived of his situation on such grounds.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Is that a written rule?

Mr. HAGGART. It is a well known rule. The hon. gentleman cannot point to a case where even his Liberal predecessors have acted as he has done.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I can find cases in which—

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman cannot find a case when I was Postmaster General, nor can he find a case under my Conservative predecessors or successors in that office in which action was taken on the principles he has laid down. And the reason is plain. Is a man to be deprived of political privileges, because, for the benefit of the community he lives in, he accepts the paltry situation of postmaster for which he receives, perhaps, $15 or $20 a year? Are postmasters throughout the Dominion to be told: Unless you support the Government in power you will be removed from office? This is a terrible doctrine of the hon. gentleman.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) say that I laid down the doctrine that postmasters were to support the Administration? I laid down no such rule. The rule I desire to lay down is that the postmaster shall observe neutrality between the political parties.

Mr. HAGGART. The law the hon. gentleman lays down is that no postmaster shall take an active part in a campaign and the evidence he receives on which to remove a postmaster from his position is the statement of one of his supporters in this House. That is a position that no Government has ever taken in this country before. In my own riding dozens of postmasters are among my most active political opponents. There are cases of postmasters in the villages in receipt of $800 or $900, and the committees of my opponents have met in their offices. Yet I never thought of removing them. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right when he states that if the postmaster is so much a political partisan that he refuses to deliver letters, delays the spread of political documents and so on, he ought to be dismissed. If a postmaster is so much a partisan that he infringes upon the criminal law, he ought not only to be dismissed but punished criminally. I would not care who he is. When I was Postmaster General I would have dismissed such a man at once. To lay down the rule that a postmaster in a country town or anywhere, because he takes an active part in politics, upon the mere dictation, perhaps, of my opponent in the riding, he must be removed from his position. This is the most monstrous doctrine that was ever advocated by a Postmaster General in this House.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. How is it then, that in 1879, about fifteen days after the Conservatives came into power, the postmaster of Montmagny was dismissed without any notice, just because he was a Liberal and worked for the Liberal candidate?

Mr. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman says that, and perhaps it is correct. Would the hon. gentleman state whether it was in my incumbency of the office?

Mr. CHOQUETTE. It was under Tory rule.

Mr. HAGGART. I venture to say that the principle I have laid down has guided all my predecessors and successors in office, not only in Conservative but in Liberal Governments, and under it no such dismissal was ever made on any such grounds. It never occurred when I was in office. I have had dozens of complaints that meetings of opponents of the Conservative Government were being held in post offices in different parts of the country; I have had dozens of complaints of postmasters taking most active action during political campaigns; but I never heard when I was in office that a dismissal was made on that ground. It was a well-known rule of the department that outside of cities and towns, where the statute declares they were ineligible for voting, in country places, on account of the difficulty of getting postmasters, they were to indulge their political opinions to the extent of partisanship, if you like. But this is the first time that I ever heard the doctrine laid down by a Postmaster General that because a postmaster takes an active part in a political campaign, he renders himself liable to dismissal.

Mr. FROST. It strikes me very forcibly that our friends in Opposition are making a great deal of noise over a very small matter. It reminds me very much of a story that I heard once of a man who was a dealer in frogs in the city of New York—and I call the attention of the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) to this story. This dealer came up to a certain country town to purchase frogs, and there he met a man who was in the habit of fishing for them, and who told the frog dealer that he could get him all he wanted. Well, says the frog dealer, that is all right, I will buy all my stock from you, and go no further. A short time afterwards the man came along with a small pailful of frogs. Why, says the dealer, I supposed you were going to give me all I required, but this is a very small amount. Well, says the other, I will tell you. If you had heard the noise that I heard in the pond, you would have thought that there were several car-loads there. Now we have heard a great deal of noise, we have heard a great deal of croaking, a great deal of mock indignation and of mock heroics, about the dismissal in a little village. We have heard the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals telling us in thundering tones how virtuous he was during the whole time of his incumbency of the office of Postmaster General. Well, we have heard this kind of stage thunder before. He says that the present Postmaster General has laid down the most monstrous doctrine that the postmasters in country villages and in country districts should be neutral as between neighbours holding different political views. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals calls that a monstrous doctrine. Now I contend, Mr. Speaker, that if a postmaster is not to be neutral in any part of this country, no matter whether in a city, town, village, or township, then I say you may bid good bye to all confidence in that postmaster on the part of the surrounding community. The people of the opposite political complexion from that postmaster will inevitably lose confidence in him, and there will be a more or less constant agitation for his removal. For my part, I am opposed, and have always been opposed to dismissals of any kind. I am satisfied that our Conservative friends and the country generally, if you could get right down to the bottom of their hearts, must be amazed at the leniency and the benevolent disposition of this Government towards Conservative officials. There has never been a Government in Canada that has treated officials so leniently, and so kindly, and so tenderly as the present Government. We know that the Conservatives have been in power twenty-five years out of the thirty years since confederation, and they have filled every office with their own friends. Wherever a few Liberals were in during the administration of the late Mr. Mackenzie, the Conservatives have mostly superannuated them and dropped them out, until to-day when this Government came into power, we find from one end of the Dominion to the other a continuous line of Conservative officials. Now it is only natural that these officials should have worked consistently and persistently on behalf of the Government candidates, and as one speaker has already said, many of them were at work because they were goaded to it by their superior officers, by the candidates in the local districts, and by the Government themselves. So far as that goes, they certainly have our pity. But there is no doubt that throughout the length and breadth of the land the Conservative office-holders did work persistently and insistentlly, in season and out of season for the Conservative candidates. And to-day what is the result? In my own constituency where there is scarcely a Liberal office-holder, not one single man has been discharged. I know that on the Rideau Canal, where there were over twenty-two officials suspended last fall when the Minister himself gave me a list, and I could put any official in that I liked—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FROST. Certainly I could, I had that privilege; but what did I do? I told the Minister to put back every man, not one single man in the whole riding was dismissed. In my own constituency some of the postmasters were deputy returning officers in the election against me, but those postmasters are in their places and are not dismissed. Charges have been made against them time and again, but I have not troubled the Postmaster General with those charges, I have not troubled a Minister of this Government with these scores of charges that I have had from my constituency against different individuals.

Mr. CLANCY. That is a rebuke to your friends.

Mr. FROST. That is a far better record than can be furnished by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy). For my part, I think there has been altogether too much made out of this question of the dismissal of officials. One would imagine, to hear the constant thunder of our friends in Opposition, that the spoils system was practically introduced into this country. Now, there is no truth in that, there cannot be any truth in it, because my own constituency is an example. I know our friends on this side have been as careful as it was possible to be in all their constituencies in regard to the scores and hundreds of officials who worked openly and most flagrantly against them. I hope the time of the House will be taken up with subjects of more importance to the country than the mere fact of a few officials having been dismissed. Only yesterday we heard, when the Minister of the Interior propounded a system by which he would effect a saving of $27,000 or $30,000 in the Department of the Interior, hon. gentlemen opposite object to it simply because he proposed to make certain changes in the officials. If a new Government coming into power is not at liberty to make changes which they believe to be in the interest of the country, in what way is the business of the country to be carried on? Do we follow such a course in regard to our own private business? If I place a foreman in charge of my establishment, and he makes certain changes in my interest, do I find fault with him? Certainly not. The people have placed hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches at the head of affairs, and if in the course of their investigations in the departments they find dead timber, men who should be set aside, and men who are receiving too high salaries, surely reductions should be made in the interest of the people and to meet their wishes. I say the people will be satisfied with such action, and hon. gentlemen opposite are making the mistake of their lives in opposing these changes made in the interest of economy and in the public service of the Dominion. We should therefore consider that the Government are doing their best, and it must be remembered that they are all the time refusing demands made on them, because members are only human, and in some constituencies no doubt they are justified in calling for dismissals of public officials. So far as regards this postmaster, I hope it will not be held that such an officer should not be independent because he receives only a small salary. He should be neutral in order to ensure the confidence of every member of the community, and if he is not able to take that position, he should not take a postmastership. Wherever there is a civil servant, no matter whether in the inside or outside service, who has been doing his duty faithfully, he has not been interfered with, and no Liberal has any intention of complaining against such a man. In my own riding there are a good many officials who fought against me as persistently as they could; almost every Tory official in North Leeds and Grenville worked against me day and night, but up to this moment I have never complained of any one of them, and do not intend to do so, as I intend to leave them alone. This is a very small matter to be brought up by the Opposition, considering the very lenient and tender treatment which the officials throughout the Dominion are receiving from this Government.

Mr. McCLEARY. When I placed on the Order paper the resolution now under consideration I had no conception it would create a debate of such a wide range as that which occurred yesterday and this afternoon in regard to it. If the hon. member for Lincoln, who seems to be sponsor for the Postmaster General, had confined himself solely and entirely to the attitude he has taken in securing the dismissal of Mr. Fairbrother as postmaster of Beamsville, the discussion would have been confined to the subject covered by the resolution. But the hon. gentleman saw fit to ignore practically those grave charges which were submitted to the Postmaster General in the case of Mr. Fairbrother, and resurrected an old letter which did service last session, and which had done service two or three times previously, written by the leader of the Opposition in respect to the dismissal of a civil servant some time ago. When I inroduced the subject I made use of some pretty strong language in criticising the attitude of the Government in this matter. I said it was a flagrant outrage on the civil rights of a Canadian citizen. If I had any doubt as to the righteousness of Mr. Fairbrother's case when I made those observations, the doubt has been entirely swept away by the lame defence attempted to be put up by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) and the Postmaster General for dismissing this young man from his position. What is the attitude of the Postmaster General? Had he yesterday stood up in his place and made the statement he did to-night, namely, that if the truthfulness of those charges could be denied successfully, he would give Mr. Fairbrother an investigation, we could have settled the matter at once. He stated that if those charges were untrue he would re-open the case and grant an investigation or reinstate the officer. I am not asking for his reinstatement, if he is not worthy of it—all I ask is British fair-play. The hon. Minister said that Mr. Fairbrother had given a general denial, but not a specific denial to the charges. Mr. Fairbrother denied specifically every charge, and made an affidavit to the effect. Here is another affidavit he has made :

I, William Fairbrother, of the village of Beamsville, in the county of Lincoln, do solemnly declare, that the charges as given by the Minister of the Interior, for the Postmaster General, against me, as postmaster of Beamsville, in answer to questions made by Mr. McCleary, M. P. for Welland, and hereunto attached, are false in every particular.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

Declared before me, this 12th day of April, A.D. 1897, at Beamsville.

(Sgd.) DAVID DAVIS, J.P.

There is Mr. Fairbrother's affidavit, to which he has attached the charges as taken from "Hansard," where they are specifically stated, and he declares they are untrue. Will the Postmaster General grant an investigation? I do not ask his reinstatement if guilty, and if he is guilty of one-tenth of what he is charged with, he is not worthy to hold the position. The Postmaster General found fault with the leader of the Opposition because he had not answered a letter from an official whom he dismissed some years ago, and he said that months elapsed before it was answered. What was the position of the Postmaster General in regard to Mr. Fairbrother? When the post office inspector told Mr. Fairbrother that his position would be vacant, he wrote to the Postmaster General asking for the reasons and praying for an investigation. The answer was brief; it merely acknowledged the receipt of his letter, and so Mr. Fairbrother never knew why he was dismissed until the question was answered by a Minister in this House. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) has strengthened my argument, and strengthened Mr. Fairbrother's position in demanding an inquiry. Fair-minded man as he (Mr. Gibson) is, I hope, even though it be against some of his political pushers that are urging him on to this; I hope he will yet insist that even-handed justice shall be meted out to Mr. Fairbrother. I believe that the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) did not intend to dismiss that gentleman. He told us, that this young man had come to his house after elections, telling him that there were rumors that he was going to be dismissed, and in the hon. member's own words this is what he said to Mr. Fairbrother :

One Saturday evening he came down to my house and asked me candidly if it was my intention to recommend his dismissal from the service. I said: Certainly not, so long as you behave yourself. I think I am well enough known in the neighbourhood from which I come to be certain of unanimous endorsement when I say that I have never undertaken the dismissal of a man even from my own employ for voting against me or for holding opinion on political questions different from my own. I certainly would not have treated this young man differently in that respect from one of my own workmen. I can say here that I have never asked a man in my employ to vote for me. When this young man came to me, I gave him my assurance that so long as he behaved himself, I would not recommend his removal from office.

From what I know of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Gibson) I believe that he sincerely meant to carry that promise out. The hon. gentleman does not say, that Mr. Fairbrother was a scrutineer on election day, but he says he saw him checking off the names. And if this postmaster did act as a political partisan, why should the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) give him the assurance, subsequent to the election, mind you, Mr. Speaker, that he should not be interfered with so long as he behaved himself. The hon. gentleman now says, that the young man did not behave and he gives as an instance of his improper conduct, that he did not divide up the salary with his assistant in the same proportion as did his predecessor. Well, the hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Bennett who preceded Mr. Fairbrother, had Mr. Zimmerman as his assistant, and as Mr. Bennett had another and more remunerative business to attend to, he could afford to give a large proportion of his salary to Mr. Zimmerman who really had full charge of the office. Mr. Fairbrother married the daughter of the ex-postmaster, and he had to support his family, and could not afford to give the bulk of his small salary to an assistant. Surely, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) cannot press that as a charge against the postmaster. But the hon. gentleman further says, that Mr. Fairbrother left the windows or the doors or something else open and caused some fresh air to get into the establishment. Well, the Postmaster General did not enumerate that offence amongst the charges which he stated to the House. All this was thought of afterwards, and Mr. Zimmerman, the post office assistant, has gone to the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) with all this information. If the Postmaster General will dismiss a postmaster for leaving the windows open to ventilate the office, and deprive him of his livelihood and likewise take away his character and his honour, then things have come to a pretty pass in the public affairs of this country. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) stated, that I said nothing at all about how Mr. Fairbrother had got the position, and he insinuated that there was something that I dare not tell. I certainly do not know of anything that should not be told. I know that Mr. Fairbrother was an intelligent, active, industrious, honest and capable young man, and that is certified to in the letter of Mr. Van Norman of Beamsville, who is a political friend of the hon. member for Lincoln. I know that Mr. Fairbrother was recommended for the position by Reformers and Conservatives alike, and I hold in my hand a copy of the petition that was sent to the then Postmaster General asking for his appointment. The hon. member (Mr. Gibson) will know some of the names, and let him tell the House whether they are Conservatives or Liberals. The first is William Tollman, I know him, and I know him to be a good Liberal. The next is Mr. A. F. Campbell, who was a merchant in Beamsville at that time, another good Liberal. The next signature, James Allan & Company, merchants; the next is James Allan, and this Mr. Allan is, I think, the son of the postmaster who has been appointed. Were not all these good Liberals? I know they were, and I appeal to the hon. member (Mr. Gibson) to deny it if he can. The next is James Fowler, boot and shoe man, also a Liberal. The next is Milton Zimmerman. I do not think that is the assistant in the post office, but at all events he is a Liberal. The next is W. A. Comfort, M.D. Now, Dr. Comfort is a well known Liberal, and so I might go through the rest of the names.

Mr. GIBSON. Go on through them all!

Mr. McCLEARY. That is unnecessary. I want to show the character of the petition that induced the Postmaster General of that time to appoint Mr. Fairbrother, and I would not have referred to it had it not been that the member for Lincoln seemed to insinuate that there was something in the appointment that could not be told. I would ask the hon. member for Lincoln to contrast the conduct of the Conservative party in the neighbourhood where he and I live with the conduct that has been pursued since this Government came into power. Take the county which he has the honour to represent in this Parliament.

There are in his own county twenty-two or twenty-five post offices, in which fifteen of the postmasters are Liberals, and strong Liberals, and seven are Conservatives—two Liberals to one Conservative. Not one of them was ever interfered with in any way; but, on the contrary I know of the appointment of Liberal postmasters in the county by the Conservative Government. These appointments were not made on party recommendations, but because we believed the parties were suited for the positions, on account of the conveniences they had for taking the offices.

I said a while ago that I did not believe the hon. member for Lincoln had any idea of carrying out this dismissal, or interfering much with the officials in that neighbourhood; but I will give you the reason why I think he changed his mind. It will be in the recollection of this House that when the hon. Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair), I think for the first time, made some observations in this House, coming to it as a stranger from the maritime provinces, he declared that he was going to take the ipse dixit of any member of Parliament or any defeated candidate who was his friend, as to the dismissal of officials. That declaration created an uproar throughout the country. Every municipality, nearly every polling subdivision, throughout my neighbourhood at any rate, began to organize what were known as "bouncing" committees, and the officials were looked after. However, the Toronto "Globe" took a different position, and in an article in which it found fault with that attitude, it referred to the matter in this way:

Now, it is true that the Liberals promised tariff reform, promised the destruction of abuses that have grown up in connection with the tariff, and promised to endeavour to put an end to the fraud and corruption that grew up under the late Government, but they certainly neither promised nor suggested that tariff reform or any other reform included in the Liberal platform was to be accomplished by a wholesale dismissal of officials.

The leading Liberal organ in the county of Lincoln, the St. Catharines "Journal," took this up, and declared that that was not the principle that ought to govern the Liberal party. This is an extract from its editorial:

We have never advocated wholesale dismissals, but we do say, and say it deliberately, that a wholesome application of the "spoils system," where it is deserved, would, at the present time, be a positive benefit to the country, and notwithstanding the tone of the "Globe" on this subject, we know we voice the sentiments of the great bulk of the electors all over Canada when we assert that they are anxiously looking for such an application of the brush, and we mistake the temper of the Liberal party if they do not demand from their representatives the fulfilment of their promises, and prompt attention to the present desires of their Liberal friends. The high moral tone affected by the "Globe" will not satisfy the party, and to be continually prating about the guilty men who ought to go, but do not, is rather poor politics and poorer consolation. The "high moral plane" got a fair trial from '73 to '78, and Liberals have been eighteen years trying to explain why the pure Mackenzie Government was not appreciated by the people. The same mistake is about to be made, and we must protest, while there is yet time, against the present namby-pamby policy of the Administration. We have long cherished the idea that the Government should discharge first, and let the partisan explain his conduct afterwards. This would save trouble and expense. We fail to see where the present deputy heads of departments and other officials could be any more loyal to their chiefs than our Liberal friends, if they were given an opportunity, and the impression remains that if the Ministers neglect to judiciously "clean" up their bureaux, the "hard workers of the party" will see to it that they get plenty of time to attend to their own affairs in the near future. This is plain talk, but opportune.

I do not know whether the hon. member for Lincoln ever read that editorial or not.

Mr. GIBSON. I never read it.

Mr. McCLEARY. I thought possibly he did. Somebody must have read it and told him about it; and I think it is because of such an attitude taken by the hungry heelers around the city of St. Catharines, by the crowd who will rush the hon. member to his political destruction if he listens to them, that he has taken this course. Otherwise, I am satisfied that he would have adhered to the noble, manly and honourable position he took when he told Mr. Fairbrother that he would stand by him and see that he was not dismissed from his position. The hon. member further said yesterday that there was some misunderstanding in reference to the petition that was got up in Mr. Fairbrother's behalf; and he said in effect that Liberal names were got on it by misrepresentation—that the Liberals were told that it was only for the purpose of calling the local executive together to re-open this matter. Now, I never heard of anything of that kind.

Mr. GIBSON. You do not live in Beamsville, do you?

Mr. McCLEARY. No, but I will tell you of another petition, which I have in my hand. This is a petition from the ratepayers who get their mail at the Beamsville post office. This is not gotten up for an investigation by the local Liberal committee, but it represents:

That the said William Fairbrother has always fairly discharged his duty as postmaster and to the satisfaction of the general public.

That the said William Fairbrother has never taken any part in any election contest, either by voting or otherwise. He has always strictly adhered to the duties of his office.

Your petitioners would respectfully request that an inquiry be made into the manner in which the said William Fairbrother has discharged the duties of his office, and if the same results satisfactorily, that you will be pleased to return him to his position in the post office.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. McCLEARY.

There is a petition that was gotten up in the village of Beamsville and the surrounding neighbourhood. Is that signed by all Tories? No, Sir. I need not read the names, the first two are those of two clergymen whom the hon. member for Lincoln knows well and which are both Liberals, the Rev. Mr. Cotton and the Rev. Mr. Marshall. The next name is that of Mr. Van Norman. There are nearly 400 names on this petition, and nearly half of them are the names of pronounced Liberals. The hon. gentleman from Algoma spoke of this as a childish matter, but I say it is not only Mr. Fairbrother's position which is at stake, but something which the people of that district hold dear, its character and good reputation and the principle of justice and fair dealing to all. The hon. member for Kent said I had not mended my reputation by bringing up this matter. I did not come here, Sir, to get a reputation from him or any other hon. gentleman. I am not here to vindicate my reputation, but I am here to vindicate the rights, the liberties and privileges of Canadians, which I know have been abused by this Government, and therefore have a perfect right to bring this matter to the attention of this House. I certainly think that a sufficiently strong case has been made out to warrant the Postmaster General in giving Mr. Fairbrother an opportunity to defend himself and obtain justice. He certainly ought to have such an opportunity, especially when we consider the declaration of the hon. the First Minister last session, that no official would be removed without an investigation. No man on that side has dared to qualify that pledge except the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who told us that the First Minister meant something else, but we have to take what comes from the hon. member for North Wellington with a great deal of allowance. Is there anything this Government would propose or do which that hon. gentleman is not prepared to swallow? Why, he has swallowed the retaining of the duty on coal oil and the increase of duty on cottons—

Mr. GIBSON. You swallowed a lot in your time, too.

Mr. McCLEARY. We had good things to take, and we never had to swallow doses like that. Some hon. members have told us that this Government have been too lenient, that they have not carried sufficiently into effect the wishes of their party, and have not driven from office a sufficient number, and the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has stated that the Government have kept on the Rideau Canal every official. I am sorry we have not got the hon. member up our way to protect the officials on the Welland Canal. I could take up an hour almost going over the dismissals in my own town—the dismissals of men who are now without any prospects of making a living for themselves and families, and dismissals, not by the dozen or score, but, as my hon. friend knows, by the hundreds, of men who were employed on the Welland Canal.

Mr. GIBSON. How many men are employed on the Welland Canal?

Mr. McCLEARY. About 200 or 250. Right around the town where I live there have been dismissals of many employees on the canal. Men who were on that canal for the past seventeen years, men who have given their best years to the service of the Government, have been dismissed. They went on in their young years, and now they are turned adrift not able to do anything else. The result is that in my town you will find bills of sale placarded everywhere, because these men are compelled to sell their effects, and families have already moved to the city of Buffalo. Talk about the National Policy driving the people from the country, the hon. gentleman is driving away men who have been true loyal subjects of this country, who never took part in election matters, and yet who have been dismissed from office without other means of gaining employment. If such action on the part of the Government is to be characterized as lenient, I do not know by what term we would describe the conduct of the Turks towards the Armenians. I think I would have to apologize to the Turk. A case has been made out sufficiently strong for the Postmaster General to interfere, and I hope he will have an investigation made. The hon. member for Lincoln says he acted as scrutineer, and I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but Mr. Fairbrother declares he did not.

Mr. GIBSON. I was present when this young man was scrutineer; I was present when he was taking the people to the polls, and if any one wants more information, I am willing that the hon. gentleman should get the opportunity of having an investigation.

Mr. McCLEARY. I am bound to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. The hon. gentleman must have understood that, when he saw Mr. Fairbrother there he was only there by chance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McCLEARY. Why then, did the hon. gentleman say to Mr. Fairbrother that he would protect him in his office, if he was an active partisan drawing voters to the polls and working as outside scrutineer and otherwise working against the hon. gentleman? Why did he say after the whole thing was over, that he would not disturb him in his office? Simply because the hon. gentleman knew that Mr. Fairbrother only happened to be there. I know who was the scrutineer—it was Joe Ryck-man at that polling subdivision and Mr. Fairbrother was not.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the hon. gentleman answer me this question—does he say of his own knowledge that Mr. Fairbrother was not there as a scrutineer?

Mr. McCLEARY. That he was not scrutineer?

Mr. GIBSON. That he was not there as scrutineer.

Mr. McCLEARY. Well, what I want to say is that the hon. gentleman from Lincoln says he was and I am bound to accept his statement. But the hon. gentleman did not say so yesterday, he said he was there marking the lists. But that is neither here nor there. When the hon. gentleman reconsiders this matter with the Postmaster General and allows the case to be opened up for consideration, he will have behind him the respectable, right-thinking men of his own party in the county which he has the honour to represent. They desire that Mr. Fairbrother should have British fair-play.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) asks me if I will give an investigation, I stated before that I accepted the statement of my hon. friend from Lincoln as proof of the charges upon which this officer was dismissed. The answer given as to the reasons for dismissal was given on the 5th of April, and appeared in unrevised "Hansard" at page 496:

That he took an active political part in the last general election, that during the whole of the election day he acted as outside scrutineer and took an active part in bringing voters to the polls instead of attending to the duties of his office; that satisfactory evidence was furnished as to the postmaster having taken such political part, which rendered any further investigation unnecessary.

For these political reasons this officer was dismissed. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) will file with the department an affidavit of Mr. Fairbrother denying these charges I will give him an investigation and give him a chance to prove his innocence publicly before the people.

Mr. HUGHES. Will you restore him to office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will deal out justice. I might say that the affidavit the hon. gentleman (Mr. McCleary) read to the House is a general affidavit referring in vague terms to all the charges that were made. The hon. gentleman's question was what charges had been made and for what reasons was he dismissed. Accordingly it was necessary for me in answering these questions in full not only to give the reasons for which he was dismissed, but the other charges which I deemed it not necessary to deal with. His affidavit has reference to them all. I call this to the attention of the hon. gentleman that he may in turn call it to Mr. Fairbrother's attention lest he may think that that declaration does not go as far as it really does. Before he places on file an affidavit he had better study its language and see that it does not go further than he contemplates. Those are vague, and I think more sweeping than he would substantiate. Therefore, I caution him.

Mr. McCLEARY. Let me ask a question, so that the Postmaster General and I may understand each other. If Mr. Fairbrother denies on affidavit the charges that the Postmaster has referred to—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The political charges; these are the only ones I took action upon.

Mr. McCLEARY. If Mr. Fairbrother declares in his affidavit that they are untrue will the hon. gentleman give him an investigation?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I will.

Mr. McCLEARY. All right.

Mr. BELL (Picton). I heard the discussion which took place at very considerable length spoken of as a two-penny-half-penny affair. To a very large extent it has taken the character of a series of criminations and recriminations bandied across the floor. At the same time, I suppose, any discussion in this Parliament can hardly be unprofitable; and, if it results in some principle of action being laid down for the Government to follow, it may have very good results. The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Haggart) has, I think, stated the practice heretofore existing very fairly—that postmasters should not be held accountable for their political conduct. It is impossible, in some cases, to get persons to act as postmasters, for the trifling remuneration that is offered. It is very evident that it is unreasonable to expect that citizens of the country should part with most important political privileges in exchange for such remuneration. In the course of his speech the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) announced the principle upon which he proposes to go. I understand him to say that he would insist upon an attitude of strict neutrality on the part of the postmasters. If that is the intention of the Postmaster General it must be that he will deal out the justice to postmasters whether Liberal or Conservative; and if he intends to enforce strict neutrality on all postmasters, there can be no great hardship in compelling them to abide by that rule. They accept the office on that condition. If that is the course to be pursued, I would suggest to the Postmaster General he will find a very good opportunity for the application of that rule in the cases cited by the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), who has stated in his place in Parliament to-night that two of the postmasters in his county took the stump against him and were extremely active and strong partisans. If the hon. Postmaster General really intends to enforce the rule he has enunciated, he can prove his sincerity—or rather, as I do not doubt his sincerity, I should say he can prove his impartiality—by taking action in such cases. When the whole matter has been settled and a course marked out, it will be fair to both sides, and postmasters may know where they stand.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bell) wish me to answer?

Mr. BELL (Picton). Yes.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. To deal with the two cases referred to by the hon. member for East Simcoe and these alone would not be a reasonable application of the principle. But I will say this: If the House desires to apply that principle generally throughout the Dominion in respect of all postmasters, Liberals and Conservatives, who transgressed the rule during the last general election, I am prepared to put that rule in force throughout the Dominion. But I did not intend to say that I was going actively into house-cleaning in respect to the past. As to the future I intend, as far as I can do so, to enforce strict neutrality on the part of postmasters generally. That applies to all postmasters, Liberal and Conservatives.

Mr. WILSON. Does that apply to the man getting $10 or so a year?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I have given my answer. While it would not be fair to pick out the two cases suggested, I am prepared, if the House says so, to take the eleven thousand postmasters in Canada and have this principle applied to the whole staff. I will say that in my own riding, as an illustration, I am free to admit that postmasters on both sides have not considered it an offence to take part in politics; and knowing that in my own riding Liberal postmasters have offended against the rule as well as Conservatives, I have not disturbed one and do not intend to. At the same time I have had occasion on the platform to rebuke one, at least, because of the extent to which he went in his partisanship; and I even had to tell him from the platform that if my party succeeded at the polls it would be worse for him. However, when I really got here, I repented of that, so I have disturbed nobody in my riding.

Mr. BELL. I would suggest to the hon. Postmaster General that finding himself now in the wrong, and dissuaded by the contemplation of the state of affairs that would exist if he were to apply his rule and insist on strict neutrality in all the postmasters of Canada, it would be much better for the service, and for his own comfort, and for the reputation of the Government, if he would resort to the old rule that was laid down by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals, that postmasters should be held to be a class by themselves, and should be allowed to exercise all the privileges as citizens and as voters of Canada.

Mr. DAVIN. I have heard the remarks of the Postmaster General with regret, because I have observed—

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think the hon. gentleman spoke yesterday.

Mr. DAVIN. No, I did not.

Mr. McMULLEN. You have spoken every day on some question.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, I have had a sweet-voiced example in the member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), and I am trying to follow in his steps, but at a great distance. Sir, I heard the remarks of my hon. friend the Postmaster General with regret. I have observed his course since the present party came into power, and have observed it with admiration, because on the whole it furnished a marked exception to the conduct of his brother Ministers. I have observed that in most cases I have taken cognizance of through the newspapers, my hon. friend did in every case give an investigation, and in no case, so far as I could judge from the newspapers, did he condemn a man without trying him first. He did not adopt the principle of hanging him first and trying him afterwards. But to-night we have him furnishing a sinister exception to his own good rule, and the influence of a supporter of his has been too strong for his virtue, and has warped him from the high stand he took. The stand he took last session, and the stand the Prime Minister took was, that no man would be dismissed without trial. But in the case of this person, the hon. Minister, a lawyer, says that if this accused man will make an affidavit that he is not guilty of any of the crimes charged against him, then he will give him an investigation. Why, Sir, so monstrous a proposal was never heard of—so monstrous a proposal from a lawyer of high standing, and from a man who has furnished a better example to himself. He proposes that a man accused, in order to have a chance of being heard, of having the charges against him investigated, shall make an affidavit in which he may possibly trip, and in regard to which he may therefore subject himself to a charge of perjury. Somebody behind me appealed to the sense of generosity of the Postmaster General. I appeal to his common sense, to ordinary decency, I won't talk of justice—to abandon the sinister and degrading position he has taken up in regard to this case, and follow the example he has set himself, and give that gentleman a chance of being heard. Why not hark back to that good course he entered upon, and which was in accordance with the pledge given in Parliament by the Prime Minister and by himself, that no man would be condemned without a fair trial? Why not hark back and say to his supporter from Lincoln (Mr. Gibson) you have forced me into a false position, you have forced me to walk aside from the high course that I have taken in other cases. I must not continue in this course. I must allow this man to be heard. That is a very proper course for him to take and I urge the Postmaster General to take that position. It is the only position consistent with the pledges that we have had from that bench. But, Sir, after ten months of experience with those pledges, what are we to think of them? Every pledge in regard to the most serious as well as to the most trifling thing, is broken. Every day is revealing to us this one cardinal truth about the Ministry, that their pledges are as false as dicers' oaths. We can place no confidence whatever in anything that they say. They tell us one thing that sounds fair, and a few months afterwards while the words are still ringing in this Parliament, we find that they have departed from them. I would appeal to the hon. gentleman; from Philip in a less judicial condition; I appeal from the hon. the Postmaster General, influenced to an unjust course by a powerful supporter, to his own good record in the cases that have come to my knowledge; and I ask him in regard to this special case, to say that he will not take a step that will mar a good record, and a good reputation, and be contrary to justice, and to the demands of common decency.

Mr. McHUGH. This subject has been pretty well threshed out in the House, and I did not intend to address the House in regard to it; but owing to some remarks made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Clancy), and also by the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), I desire to recall some things to their minds that perhaps they have forgotten. The member for Bothwell tried to defend the civil service of this Government by making attacks upon the servants of another Government. Well, I do not intend to follow that line of attack more than to say that the action of the civil servants complained of by the member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) was very different from any action I have ever heard of on the part of the servants of any local government in political contests. The ex-Minister of Railways and Canals says that neither he nor his predecessors ever discharged a post office official on account of his political partisanship. I think that I can remember when they did so, and I will recall one case to the attention of the hon. gentleman. I will read him a letter that was written by the hon. member for North Victoria (Mr. Hughes) to the ex-Postmaster General. This letter is dated at Lindsay, July 18th, 1892 :

Lindsay, 18th July, 1892.

Dear Sir Adolphe,—I have not heard a word from your department yet anent Minden and Coboconk post offices. I find that the feeling among our fellows here is still very strong. The Grits, finding a change probable at Minden, are getting a petition signed among their own crowd asking that this office be given to W. Curry, brother of the man who now holds it. At last account, only sixteen of Mowat's Ontario Government officers had signed it ; only one Conservative supports W. Curry, and he is J. H. Delemere, father-in-law to Curry. Delemere is financially indebted to Curry, and is forced to do things he does not care to do, but his brothers are in Ontario offices. However, this one is a good, loyal fellow, but inclined to blow off at half-cock.

I wish the office vacant as soon as possible, and shall then name you my man. Meantime, kindly bounce them.

That is signed by the hon. member for North Victoria.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who signed it ?

Mr. McHUGH. Sam Hughes. On the strength of that letter the postmaster at that office was dismissed. We are told by the hon. member who brings forward his charge that the Reform party were going to appoint a bouncing committee, but if we do so, we are only taking a letter from our predecessors. The present Government are perfectly capable of dealing with the civil service, and will have to account to the country for the way in which they deal with it, and I am perfectly satisfied they will deal with it in a manner which they and their friends will be able to defend when called upon to do so. It has been said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the only defence made by the Government was the production of one letter. Here, however, is one that is not nearly so old, and there are no doubt many like it.

Mr. HUGHES. I am delighted that the hon. gentleman has blundered into giving me an opportunity to state the facts of the case. What are they ? In the first place, in regard to the Minden post office, the postmaster robbed the Government, as the official sworn evidence taken at the public investigation—no back hole and corner business—shows. I demanded an inquiry from the ex-Minister of Railways, who was then Postmaster General. This was about the time when he became Minister of Railways and Canals. It was handed over to the late Postmaster General (Sir Adolphe Caron). The investigation was held publicly ; witnesses were examined and it was proved that the postmaster had defrauded the mails, and that he had brought himself within reach of a criminal prosecution. The evidence is in the Post Office Department, and can be produced. What was done ? When a newspaper office in a rural district is sending its mail bag out, it is taken for granted that the newspaper men are honest, and that they are not putting dry goods, parcels, political literature or other matter not post-paid in the mail bags, but that they contain newspapers sent directly from the office. What happened in this case? This hon. gentleman and his ring in Lindsay had been filling these bags with Reform literature, which was not addressed to anybody—thus leaving themselves open to be sent to the penitentiary, if the law was pushed to the extreme. But the postmaster in Lindsay was not specially culpable, probably because he took it for granted that the newspaper offices were honest. The mail clerk on the train possibly was not culpable, because he took it for granted that the mail bags contained nothing but newspapers which had been sent from the newspaper offices. But the postmaster at Minden did know it, for he received and opened the bags. What was the excuse given? He said : I received them ; I did not send them to the dead letter office ; I did not report the culprit ; I did not give them out through the post office. Let hon. gentlemen opposite turn up the evidence, and they will find these are the facts. Why did he not give the reform literature out at the wicket? Because, as he said in his sworn evidence, he would have had to put half a cent stamp on each document. How, then, did he get them distributed to the people? He swore that he took them out of the door of the office and gave them over the counter. So, with his right hand he refused to hand them over the wicket because they would cost half a cent each, while with his left hand he passed them over the counter, and he thought they were free. The department held that this man had robbed the Government. They did not send him to the penitentiary, but they simply dismissed him. Another case was that connected with the Coboconk post office, and I do not think the hon. gentleman will receive many thanks from the people there. I will not refer to it at length here. I notice that the Postmaster General got out directly these offices came up. Certain parties came down here and muzzled around to see what they could find. Six months ago, they did the same thing, and they struck a snag. What are the facts about the Coboconk office? On four separate occasions transactions occurred, the last of which merited, not dismissal, but committal to the penitentiary, and yet in three of those cases I interfered to save the officers. They were allowed to retain the office on the distinct pledge and guarantee—this all appears in the evidence in the Post Office Department, which hon. gentlemen can obtain if they are inclined to do so, and they will find that the facts I have now stated are fully borne out—that this young man on whom the offence was saddled could not be employed in the post office in any capacity. Yet the post office inspector was not more than twenty miles away before that young man was back again. Then the postmaster was removed.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What did you do with the young man?

Mr. HUGHES. We let him go.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was he a Tory?

Mr. HUGHES. No, he was a Grit—they were both Grits. There was another officer dismissed by me, and he was a fishery officer. He had been collecting fines from people for illegal fishing, and making no returns to the department at Ottawa, but putting the money in his pocket. Those are the three individuals I have had the satisfaction of dismissing, and in every case a public investigation was held, a report sent to the department and the evidence filed in the department, and all hon. gentlemen opposite have to do is to go and get it. To-day, half the post offices in North Victoria are filled by Reformers: Gelert, Irondale, Furnace Falls, Blairhampton, Maple Lake, Dalrymple, Dartmoor, Sadowa, Bexley, Carden, Horncastle, Ragged Rapids, Glenarm, Islay and Powles Corners. Every one of those offices is held by a Reformer. Several of them are my most bitter opponents in committee work, in preparing voters' lists, in speaking on platforms and they take a prominent part both in general and by-elections, and I have never made any complaint so long as they conducted properly the business of the office—I never cared whether they voted for or against me, or spoke for or against me, so long as they conducted their offices properly. But I assure hon. gentlemen opposite that so soon as these officers rob the mails, and I have the patronage of the county, and can get other men to fill the positions, they will be dismissed. Since these gentlemen have come into power the Postmaster General has dismissed one postmaster, for what cause I do not know, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has allowed himself to be made a tool of by some one, and he has dismissed James O'Brien, Thomas Johnston, Douglas Sinclair, M. Wellwood, Thomas Batty, Thomas Leary, J. Mortimer, George Hewitt, A. Martin, all fishery guardians. Several in the Railways and Canals Departments have also been dismissed.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The guardians are not appointed by me at all.

Mr. HUGHES. They are appointed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. They are temporary, and are appointed by the overseer.

Mr. HUGHES. The Minister suggested to me the other day, that I had better take charge of his department. He has admitted since that I was right and that he gave a wrong answer then.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. No, I did not give a wrong answer.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman said that Mr. Archibald Bradshaw was a Fishery overseer for North Victoria, and Mr. Bradshaw has no more to do with North Victoria than has the man in Timbuctoo.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Read your question and my answer.

Mr. HUGHES. My question had reference to the fishery guardians in North Victoria, and the Minister gave me the fishery overseer for South Victoria. On a subsequent occasion he was forced to give the names of the fishery guardians for North Victoria, and he gave them to me like a little man. I know that under the former regime the names of these men were reported to Ottawa, and they were recommended to the overseer from Ottawa, and not from any one in the riding. I never had the impudence to ask the overseer to accept my nomination. When I recommended a man it was to the Department here at Ottawa, and the fishery overseer was notified from the Department as to who was appointed. I do not know what the present rule is but I know what the former rule was.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I never changed it.

Mr. HUGHES. Then that is how they were appointed, and yet they have been all dismissed. Three officials of the Railways and Canals Department have been dismissed and a Customs officer has been dismissed, and altogether sixteen officials in North Victoria have been dismissed since these gentlemen came into power, besides some minor officials whom it is not necessary to refer to. I intended to bring this matter before the House on my own account, but the hon. member for South Victoria (Mr. McHugh) fell into a mistake and gave me an opportunity of placing this on record. If he goes to the Post Office Department and produces the papers it will be found that in reference to the offices at Minden and Coboconk, that every word I have said is borne out by sworn evidence in the department.

Mr. McHUGH. I have the report of Mr. Spry, post office inspector, who held the investigation, and I think I had better read it for the information of the House. Here is what it says:

Regarding these cases, as the charges are nearly all of a political nature or have a political tendency, I consider it would not be proper for me to express my opinion upon the merits of the case, and I beg, therefore, respectfully to submit the evidence for your consideration.

That is the report of Mr. Spry, the inspector.

Mr. HUGHES. Now read the evidence.

Mr. McHUGH. That is the inspector's report based on the evidence.

Mr. DAVIN. That is merely a newspaper account you have read ; it is not an official document.

Mr. HUGHES. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McHugh) has produced a report which says nothing, but he dare not produce the evidence.

Mr. BERGERON. This discussion has taken such a wide range that I may perhaps be permitted to make a few observations. If I have any surprise at all, it is that our friends on this side of the House should be astonished at the course followed by the Government in this matter. I have a few similar cases in my county where officials have been dismissed, but I expected that from this Government and am not at all astonished. During the time that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Tarte) was parading in my county, and when I had to attend to my duties in Parliament, a Liberal postmaster in my county prevented the Conservative papers from reaching the people of the parish, and he was caught sending the papers away. There was complaint against him, and after an investigation was held, it was found he had violated the rules of the department and was dismissed. He was replaced by another man on my recommendation. It is hardly necessary to say, that immediately on the new Government coming into power the new postmaster that I recommended was dismissed without any investigation whatever, and the former postmaster reinstated. I do not complain of that, but I do say that we will settle it the next time the Conservatives come into power. In Beauharnois, an excellent postmaster, probably one of the best we ever had, a very respectable merchant, kept the post office, and upon the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works that gentleman (Mr. Doutre) was dismissed without investigation, and without any means being taken to see whether the accusations against him were true or not. I have since been told by the Postmaster General in this House, that he was dismissed on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works, who was a candidate against me in the late election. I suppose there is no use complaining about this ; I am rather surprised that more officials have not been dismissed in my county, and indeed I expect some every day. I can tell the Postmaster General that the postmaster in St. Stanislaus at the present time is working in the elections night and day. However, he is working on the Liberal side, and I suppose the Government see no harm in that. The postmaster who was dismissed by the late Government and reinstated by the present Government, is working night and day, not only electioneering, but his office is used as a Liberal committee room. If it is very bad for the Conservative postmasters to work during election time, I fail to see how it is a very good thing for a Liberal postmaster to do the same thing. Hon. gentlemen opposite have said some very hard things in reference to the manner in which the present leader of the Opposition dealt with employees when he was in power. Let me give an incident which will tend to show that the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) dealt very leniently with some of the public officials. Before I entered this House Mr. Beique was superintendent of the Beauharnois Canal, and that gentleman opposed me on the hustings. He was a stump speaker, spoke very well, and he did his utmost for the candidate of the Mackenzie Government. After I was elected the Conservatives wanted Mr. Beique to be kicked out, and the Liberals wanted to keep him in his position. After consulting with the Prime Minister at the time I adopted a middle course, and Mr. Beique was allowed an investigation. It was proven, as everybody knew, that Mr. Beique, when superintendent of the canal, had appeared on the hustings and worked hard for the Liberal party. He had called Sir John A. Macdonald names that were looked on down there as very bad—a fanatic, an old Orangeman, an old Freemason, everything that in the eyes of Mr. Beique was likely to change the minds of Conservatives. He called Sir Hector Langevin a thief. When an investigation took place, these things were proved. So far as his duties were concerned, some little things came out in the investigation, but probably nothing sufficient to procure his dismissal without further consideration. When the matter came here, Sir Charles Tupper was the Minister of Railways and Canals, and he examined the report of the investigation. I was a young member of the House then, and he said to me, "I have more experience than you, and I tell you that dismissals are very bad things unless they are justified by very strong evidence. So far as political reasons are concerned, they do not amount to anything at all. Sir John Macdonald does not want anybody dismissed for having said that he was a Freemason or an Orangeman or any such thing, and Sir Hector Langevin would not allow me to dismiss any man for saying that he was a thief. They do not want to take any revenge. So far as the work is concerned, if you insist on the dismissal of Mr. Beique, I will dismiss him, but I am an older man than you, and if I have any advice to give you, I will advise you not to do so. I followed his advice, and Mr. Beique was retained in his position, notwithstanding all that he had done. I mention this to show that the Conservative party were more generous than they have received credit for being in the last few days. Mr. Beique was kept on that canal until 1895, when he himself asked to be superannuated, and he was superannuated by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart), after having been on the Beauharnois Canal eighteen years, after having spoken for his party on the hustings, and after having been, as it is called now, an offensive partisan.

As I am speaking about these matters, I might remark that there have been other dismissals on the Beauharnois Canal. Five lock-masters were dismissed the other day, and I am not surprised. I am only surprised that they are not all dismissed, because the reasons given against these five are not any stronger, I believe, than what could be brought against all of them. I believe that every lock-master on the Beauharnois Canal have been appointed since I have been a member of this House. They are nearly all Conservatives, but some Liberals were appointed, and they all voted for me in my elections. These five lock-masters did not do anything but vote. They are poor men, and they were dismissed summarily without any reason being given and without any investigation, on three days notice, and were replaced by the most violent Liberal politicians in the county. I do not complain of it, because it will be to my advantage. Those appointed are already running after me to ask me not to disturb them when we come into power again. One of these new lock-masters, on the day before nomination day for the local election, the day before yesterday, a man named Marchand, on lock 6, who replaced a very good man named Julien, was at Beauharnois. Everybody would suppose that a man who had only been appointed about a week before would have been at his work. He is a new man, and does not know any more about locking than one of these pages. But he was at Beauharnois, behind a bar, serving liquor, and he was the worse of liquor himself before the day was over. These things have a most demoralizing effect on the employees of the canal and the people of the county generally. Now, some gentlemen have been speaking very much about investigations being held; but I am not in favour of investigations if they are to be like one that took place the other day. All the lock-masters are threatened with dismissal; but they are not dismissed, because the local Liberal candidate said: "Don't dismiss them before the election, or you will take votes from me." Of course, they will be dismissed after the election.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Do you think you will get them now?

Mr. BERGERON. Yes, at this election and at the other one too. There was no investigation of any one of these cases or of the case of the Beauharnois postmaster; but there was an investigation the other day of the case of the Valleyfield postmaster—why? Not because it was necessary to do the same work that was done at Beauharnois, but simply because a young lawyer who had nothing to do and wanted money, asked to be appointed commissioner. He was appointed, and I had it from the Postmaster General the other day that he gets $13 a day. He is not working on the post office case, but he is working on the hustings in the county every day. That is the kind of investigation we are granted, and for that reason I say do not give us any investigation; kick them out without investigation.

I want to bring up another matter, but I will not do it to-night; I will move before going into Committee of Supply in regard to a matter of greater importance than all we have been talking about to-night. But I wanted to bring up these cases to show the liberality of Sir Charles Tupper when he was a Minister of the Crown, and to show that these men in my county are dismissed without ceremony. But I want to say one word in favour of the Ministers, which I am sure will surprise them. I believe they are not as guilty as they are supposed to be. I believe they would not, on their own motion, have made such dismissals as they have made. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Blair), I am convinced, would not himself have dismissed these employees on the Beauharnois Canal. He knows nothing about them. He has dismissed men who have never been accused of anything wrong in the service, but who did their duties thoroughly. He may ask the superintending engineer in Montreal, or Mr. Collingwood Schreiber here, and I am sure that neither of them will say anything against the men who have been dismissed, so far as their duties are concerned. So far as politics are concerned, they voted for me, I believe. My hon. friend has dismissed them simply on the recommendation of the Minister of Public Works. How did that happen? My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works knows nothing at all about them. I am convinced; but during the election he unfortunately promised about 900 positions in the county, where only about 75 are to be given. Everybody may imagine the piles of letters he gets every day, and as you can come here from my county in three hours, there were deputations on deputations up here asking for positions, until at last a man gets bothered and says purely and simply to the Minister: You must get positions to satisfy those who are bothering the life out of me. Under the circumstances there is some excuse for the Minister, but I deplore their weakness in yielding to such demands.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 7th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 98) to incorporate the Lindsay, Haliburton and Mattawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Hughes.)

Bill (No. 99) respecting the Restigouche and Victoria Railway Company.—(Mr. Wood, Hamilton.)

Bill (No. 100) to incorporate the Victoria, Vancouver and Eastern Railway and Navigation Company.—(Mr. Maxwell.)

Bill (No. 101) respecting the Montreal and Pacific Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Brodeur.)

COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION.

Mr. BAIN. With the consent of the House, I propose to move concurrence in the second report of the Committee on Agriculture and Colonization. I may in explanation say, that it is with the view to get before the public at the earliest possible moment, information with respect to the facilities that are being furnished by the Government for the shipping of perishable products by cold storage, and the efforts they are making to secure the favourable introduction of our perishable products into the English market. The committee felt that the earlier that evidence was distributed through the country, the more likely it was to prove beneficial. We have asked for the printing of forty thousand copies; perhaps four or five thousand will be necessary for the Department of Agriculture, and the balance will be distributed through members of the House. We are all anxious to get it to the Printing Bureau without any possible delay.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved:

That henceforth to the end of this session, Government orders have precedence immediately after questions to be put by members, on Wednesdays and Thursdays.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it the intention of the Government to give Monday afternoon to Public Bills after six o'clock? There is a pretty large number of Public Bills on the list, and I would like to know how Monday is to be divided.

Mr. BERGERON.

The PRIME MINISTER. We had not thought of that, but if it be the desire of the House, there can be no objection to have the order of Monday substituted by the order of Wednesday, that is to say, notices of motion in the afternoon, and Public Bills in the evening.

Mr. CASEY. Certainly that would be an improvement. But is the hon. gentleman quite certain that he needs to take both those days from us at once?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes, quite certain.

Mr. CASEY. Very well, then I think the arrangement suggested would be the only one that would be fair to Public Bills, because there are several such Bills that have been promised a further hearing.

Mr. SPEAKER. With the consent of the House, the motion will be amended by adding the words:

That the order of Monday, henceforth to the end of the session, be the order of Wednesday, under Rule 19.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY—REPLY TO ADDRESS.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) presented a Message from His Excellency.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

ABERDEEN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I beg to thank you for the Loyal Address which you have adopted in reply to the Speech with which I opened the session of Parliament.

I receive with satisfaction your assurances that the measures to be submitted to you will receive your careful consideration.

Government House,
14th April, 1897.

INQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask whether copies that were ordered by the House of all petitions and other documents bearing on the changes made in the quarantine regulations between the United States, and Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, and particularly changes made at each station in the personnel of the officers employed to carry out the quarantine regulations—whether they are ready? The order of the House was made early in April.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I do not expect that they can be brought down before next Wednesday.

Mr. DAVIN. I would also like to ask the Minister of Interior when we shall have copies of all correspondence between the Department of Indian Affairs, at Ottawa, and the officials of the department at Regina and at Winnipeg, respecting the furnishing of supplies to the St. Paul Industrial School; and also, correspondence between the department at Ottawa and Hudson's Bay Company at Winnipeg. That order was made more than a week ago, and there are only a few papers.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I have not got the papers ready to-day, but I will try and have them for the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

QUEEN'S JUBILEE—MILITARY CONTINGENT.

Mr. HUGHES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the acting Minister of Militia when he will be prepared to submit to the House a statement regarding the officers who are selected to accompany the regiment to England?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I think at the next sitting of the House I will be able to give the list.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. FOSTER. I wish to renew my request for the return I asked for early in the session with respect to A. P. P. It is desirable that it should be brought down before we go far into the Estimates. I refer to the return respecting active political partisans.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It will be brought down sometime next week.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. SPROULE. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I desire to make a personal explanation. Last Tuesday when certain items were under discussion with respect to the salaries of certain employees in the civil service, reference was made by myself to the increase of salary given to Henry and Rothwell. At that time, in answer to a remark made across the floor, I said:

It is, at least, pleasing to know that the hon. gentleman does not agree with his friends when they were in power before, because, if my memory is correct, they were the parties who adopted the principle of the statutory increase, and it has been acted upon ever since.

That was when it was decided to increase the salaries of some of the civil servants but not to grant the increase in other cases.

But it is unfortunate that the hon. gentleman should have selected for promotion the two clerks he has selected, because, if my memory is not at fault, the two clerks among others were the subject of considerable controversy in the House a few years ago, and his friends behind him moved a motion which was equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in the Government because the same two clerks were not dismissed.

Afterwards the Minister of Marine and Fisheries asked:

Which two clerks?

I replied:

Mr. Henry and Mr. Rothwell. There was a very long and heated discussion over the matter in this House, and some very hard strictures were passed on the Government because they did not dismiss those two men on account of the irregularities which were carried on in the department with their knowledge and consent; and now these two same men are selected for promotion. It is, at least, a justification of the late Government for what they did not do.

Referring to having them dismissed. Further on I said:

Then, the hon. gentleman must have a very bad memory. If he takes the trouble to look up "Hansard," he will see that he is entirely astray. I do not say that these gentlemen are worthy of condemnation because we defended their conduct at that time. What I say is, that the very fact that they are selected for promotion and an advance of salary is a justification of the late Government in defending them.

What I wish to say is this, that my attention has since been called by one of those gentlemen, Mr. Rothwell, to the fact that there was nothing in his conduct that was blameable, that he was not among the number referred to in the House. At the time I was led to believe that he was one of those reported by the Privy Council and suspended for irregularities in conduct. In looking up the record I find that he was not one of those men. Those who were censured were K. J. Henry, H. H. Turner, F. Nelson, L. C. Pereira. I was in fault to that extent in my remarks—I thought he was one of those men. I wish to say this: I did not desire in any way to reflect on their conduct or to say a word against them, but it was merely to remind hon. gentlemen that while there was a good deal of controversy over the conduct of these officers a few years ago, it was a justification for what the then Government had done in defending them and refusing to dismiss them. That is the meaning I intended to convey in my remarks, and not reflect on either the integrity or the character of those officers.

Mr. HAGGART. While on this subject, I may say that I have received a note from the same gentleman in regard to a remark I am alleged to have made in the debate the other day. It is stated in "Hansard" that I said Mr. Rothwell was one of those who were suspended. I never said anything of the kind: I knew Mr. Rothwell was not suspended. I was aware that Mr. Rothwell was one of those who was up before the committee, and who was fined to the extent of one month and a half's salary.

SUPPLY—DISMISSAL OF A. McCALLUM.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I wish to ask the Minister of Public Works if he can furnish any information with respect to the dismissal of McCallum, lockmaster and foreman of the works on the Lièvre ?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS (Mr. Tarte). Mr. McCallum, as the hon. gentleman has stated, has been dismissed. He has been dismissed on the strength of a letter which I hold in my hand, and which I will read. The letter is as follows :—

Ottawa, 13 avril 1897.

A l'Honorable J. Israel Tarte, Ministre des Travaux publics, Ottawa.

Monsieur le ministre,—Je vous demande la destitution de M. McCallum, éclusier, aux Petits Rapides, et de son assistant, Simon Raymond. McCallum a reçu instruction de votre département, en janvier dernier, d'avoir à consulter Angus McMillan pour le choix des travailleurs à l'écluse. McCallum n'a pas tenu compte de cet avis, et ce n'est que par hasard que McMillan a appris à la fin de mars que telles instructions avaient été envoyées à McCallum. Quant à Raymond, il a pris une part active et violente contre moi aux dernières élections.

Je vous suggère le nom de Hugh Gorman, de Buckingham, pour remplacer McCallum, et celui de James Brazeau, Poupore P.O., P.Q., pour remplacer Raymond.

Votre dévoué,
(Signé) HENRI BOURASSA.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will ask the hon. gentleman, who is so fortunate as to be equally familiar with both languages, to read the letter also in English.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS: In a few words, I may say that Mr. McCallum was lockmaster at Petits Rapides. He was not a permanent employee; he has been employed for some time, but these men are engaged by the year. In February he was advised to consult Angus McMillan in regard to the selection of men to be employed. He did not take any notice of the instructions sent to him by the department, and instead of doing so, he continued to apply to our political opponents regarding the selection of the men. Mr. Bourassa learned these facts and went to the place, and investigated the matter. I know Mr. Bourassa very well—he is very well known to members of this House. He wrote the letter I have just read, which conveys the facts I have stated. On the strength of his letter, I have dismissed the man. I will now read the letter in English, as the hon. leader of the Opposition desires :

Ottawa, April 13th, 1897.

To the Honourable Mr. J. I. Tarte, Minister of Public Works, Ottawa.

Sir,—I request you to dismiss Mr. McCallum, lockman at Petits Rapids, and Office Assistant
Mr. HAGGART.

Simon Raymond. Mr. McCallum received instructions from your department, in January last, to consult Angus McMillan about the selection of the workmen to the lock. McCallum took no heed of the notice, and it is only by accident that McMillan learned at the end of March that such instructions had been sent to him. As far as Mr. Raymond is concerned, he took an active and violent part against me during the last electoral contest.

I beg to suggest to you the name of Mr. Hugh Gorman, of Buckingham, to replace Mr. McCallum, and the name of James Brazeau, Poupore P.O., P.Q., to replace Raymond.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) HENRI BOURASSA.

I dismissed the man because I found out, not only by this letter, but from other information, that McCallum had simply laughed at us. He was in the employ of my department, and I was very well disposed to keep him where he was; but I think every member of this Parliament will agree with me, that when a Minister finds out that one of the employees does not carry out his orders faithfully, but rather tries to embarrass the Government of the day; then that employee is no longer entitled to be retained. That is the principle by which I have stood in the past and which I intend to stand by in the future. The employees of my department who have shown any disposition to serve faithfully, have no reason to complain. I have treated them well to the best of my ability; but when I find that one of the officials does not want to serve this Government faithfully, I will dismiss him without any mercy whatever.

Mr. FOSTER. The somewhat heated manner in which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Tarte) gives the mere explanation which I asked, would rather lead me to suppose that his case is not as strong as it might otherwise be. He is the Minister of the department and so ought to have full knowledge of the circumstances. I gleaned my information from other sources, and my information is necessarily fragmentary, but I am going to ask my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) to listen to the information that I have, and I am going to ask the members of the House to listen to it as well, to form a judgment; if not upon the information now given by both the hon. gentleman and myself—at least to be in a position to receive further information.

My hon. friend has simply read a letter of a member of Parliament in which that member of Parliament, evidently wishing to have Mr. McCallum and Mr. Raymond both dismissed, indited an epistle to the Minister, and without giving any reasons other than mere assertions, makes a peremptory demand for the dismissal of both these men. On that information—no, not information—but on that peremptory demand from the member of Parliament representing the country, the Minister of Public Works thinks he is perfectly justified in cutting off the official heads of two gentlemen who have been in the department for a good many years, and against whom, in their work, the Minister has not said a word. The reason that this Mr. McCallum has been dismissed (according to the Minister who relies upon the letter he has read) is, because Mr. McCallum received an order to consult a certain gentleman as to those who were to be employed, and, of whom material was to be bought, and that he paid no attention to it. Now, let us see what light some correspondence which I happen to have, throws on that matter. I find here a letter written by Mr. Coste on the 24th October, which reads as follows. It is a letter written to E. D. Lafleur who is resident engineer in Ottawa :

I have to authorize you to employ Mr. McCallum, lockmaster at the La Lièvre, as foreman of the works of repairs to be executed. He is to employ Mr. Duncan McMillan on the work, and to take his recommendation with regard to the employment of any men that may be required.

Yours obediently,

LOUIS COSTE,

Chief Engineer.

At that time, evidently Mr. McCallum enjoyed the confidence of the department, and he received a letter from Mr. Coste representing the department (transmitted through Mr. Lafleur) for his employment, and he was told to consult the party man in the neighbourhood who seemed at that time to be Mr. Duncan McMillan, and from whom he was to take his orders as to what men were to be employed, and I suppose, as to those from whom the material was to be bought. That was on the 24th October. On December 30th, I find a letter written to this gentleman, chiefly with reference to the details of the work, and plainly showing that he had still the confidence of the department. At the end of this letter the admonition is given to him :

Please complete the work as soon as possible. I am directed by the chief engineer to tell you not to make any changes in your usual staff until you are ordered to do so. You will, therefore, continue to employ Mr. Simon Raymond.

Evidently, somebody had been trying to have the assistant Mr. Raymond dismissed. I would hazard a guess as to who that was ; very probably the same gentleman who indited that peremptory epistle to my hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) to have the two of them dismissed. However, the department in its coolness at that time, thought it ought to have charge of its own employees, and therefore, Mr. Lafleur in writing to Mr. McCallum tells him positively, that he is directed by the chief engineer to tell him not to make any changes in his staff and to keep on his assistant Mr. Raymond. In January comes a change. On January 26th, 1897, there is a letter from Mr. Laurent, resident engineer, to Mr. McCallum in which he says :

I am directed by the chief engineer to instruct you to apply to Mr. Angus McMillan,—

Who is, I believe, a brother of Duncan McMillan—

—and not to Duncan McMillan, with regard to the employment of men and the purchase of material required for the work of repairs now being carried out.

Mr. McCallum had still the complete confidence of the department. But, the department had been informed, probably by the same writer of the letter, that Mr. Angus McMillan was a more important man to consult and to have the patronage than Mr. Duncan McMillan, and so the orders of the 24th October are changed, and from this time on it is to be Mr. Angus McMillan who is to be consulted. He is to have the supreme command, and he is to say what men, if any, are to be employed, and from whom supplies are to be purchased. Mr. McCallum, as a good officer, obeys the orders of his department, and on the 17th March he promptly answers that letter, and he says :

Mr. Angus McMillan refuses to have anything to say in regard to the employment of men or purchase of material required for the work of repairs, &c., unless paid for such services.

Yours truly,

A. McCALLUM.

There is another point that comes up in the correspondence. My hon. friend (Mr. Tarte) said that Mr. McCallum laughed at him—that was the heinous offence—laughed at him in the department, but the record shows over Mr. McCallum's own hand, that as a loyal officer, he carried out the instructions that were given him, consulted Mr. Angus McMillan, and was informed by Mr. Angus McMillan, that he would not have anything to do with it unless there was something in it for him, and unless he was paid for his services. That letter was sent on the 17th of March. On March 20th that had been before the department, and had been considered. Mr. McMillan's refusal had been considered, and an urgent wire went out to Mr. McCallum, still in the confidence of the department :

A. M. McCallum,

Lockmaster, River du Lièvre Lock.

Push without delay repairs to slide. Engage men and purchase materials required yourself.

ARTHUR ST. LAURENT,

Engineer in Charge.

Now, there is something wrong somewhere, and the only reason given by my hon. friend for this dismissal—that he did not consult Mr. Angus McMillan, and laughed at the department, and consequently was to be punished—is disproved, as far as this evidence goes. Mr. McCallum received the letter ; he saw Angus McMillan ; Angus McMillan refused to go further unless there was something in it for him ; that was properly and quickly reported to the department ; only a day intervenes ; the next day a wire goes out, saying that if Mr. Angus McMillan does not choose to do anything, he, Mr. McCallum, should go on and purchase materials and employ men himself. That is all clean and clear up to that date. Then some one gets in his deadly work. On the 13th of April—that was a very interesting time in the province of Quebec—representations are made ; the member for that county is active ; something must be done, and he sends a letter to the department. On the 13th of April this letter goes out :

Sir,—I am directed to inform you that your services as lockmaster will not be required after the 15th instant, and have to ask you to transfer the whole of the Government property under your charge to Mr. Hugh Gorman, of Buckingham, who has been appointed in your place. Mr. E. T. Smith, of this department, will accompany Mr. Gorman to the lock to-morrow, and take stock of all articles belonging to the Government. Please acknowledge receipt of this letter.

That is on the 13th of April—they give men short notice under this regime ; he is to be decapitated on one day's notice. On the 13th the letter goes ; on the 14th he receives it ; on the 15th off comes his head. That, of course, is despatch, and for a business Government and a business head of the Public Works Department, there is nothing like celerity and despatch in such cases. Following directly on that, the astonishment of Mr. McCallum finds vent in a very modest epistle to the Department of Public Works, in which he says :

I received a letter from the department on the 14th, dated the 13th ult., stating that my services as lockmaster at the River du Lièvre lock would not be required after the 15th—one day's notice—and no reason given. Will you kindly let me know the cause of my dismissal? I think it is only fair that I should know.

And much oblige,

Yours respectfully,

A. M. McCALLUM.

A very respectful letter, conceived in good spirit, and written in a gentlemanly and respectful way. There you have this side of the correspondence, as far as I have it. Mr. McCallum was doing the work ; there is no evidence that he was not doing it well ; he was a trusted officer of the department ; he got his orders to whom to go for his instructions ; he went to the man to whom he was ordered to go ; a little while afterwards, he got his order, "Do not go to Duncan any longer. Angus is the man" ; he went to Angus ; Angus says, "I won't do anything unless I am paid" ; he reports to the department ; the department instructs him to go on with the work, and engage men and purchase materials himself ; he goes on ; he is told to keep Mr. Raymond, whom some one evidently wanted dismissed, but only to take his orders from headquarters ; and now both of them are dismissed. I submit that the evidence before the House shows that this is an instance of a double dismissal made without any reason, and that it has a purely partisan aspect. My hon. friend has been too quick, I think, to act as the judge and at almost the same moment to wield the executioner's axe ; and I am afraid he has done both without having an investigation by any proper officer and without having any evidence to warrant him in doing so. Now, I want to repeat what I said before, that Ministers are simply, after all, the executive of this country. They do not own the country ; they do not own the fortunes of poor labouring men. Poor labouring men have some rights to fair and decent treatment, whatever Government is in power ; and the question with me arises whether they get this fair and decent treatment under such despatch and such methods as were used in this case, if my information is correct, by the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Mr. FOSTER

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS.
Mr. Speaker, the facts as stated by my hon. friend are about correct. Instructions were first sent to Mr. McCallum to ask advice from Mr. Duncan McMillan. It was a mistake in the name, which was due to the fact that Angus McMillan and Duncan McMillan are brothers. On the 26th of January, Mr. McCallum was clearly directed to ask advice from Angus McMillan, who happens to be a Liberal, while Duncan McMillan happens to be a Tory heeler. My hon. friend has been a Minister, and he knows right well, as all the members of this House know, that the conductor of works should always take advice from the friends of the party in power. Mr. McCallum got a clear intimation that a mistake had been made, and instead of taking notice of the letter that was sent to him directing him to take advice from Mr. Angus McMillan, he went on taking advice from the friends of the Tory party. The hon. gentleman is wrong in supposing that I did not take care in the matter. The letters prove that I took all the necessary precautions. I am not anxious to make this dismissal, because it is a pretty difficult job, as every one knows. I would rather keep the good employees I have than dismiss them. My hon. friend the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) may laugh ; but let him look at my department as it is composed to-day, and he will find that I have kept nearly every one of the officers there. He will find that I have kept nearly every one of my officers there. I have only dismissed men who were not useful, and among those dismissed were just as many Liberals as Tories. In this case I dismissed this man because he did not carry out my orders. I am very sorry to have had to dismiss him, because I think in the past he was a good employee, but we might find good employees in the ranks of the Liberal party. If the Conservative employees who are with us to-day want to serve us faithfully

I will not dismiss one of them, but if they do not I would ask my hon. friend if it would not be my duty to dismiss every one of those who will not be faithful.

Mr. FOSTER. When the hon. gentleman says us, does he mean the country's service or his personal service, for the time being?

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. For the time being we are here, and have had imposed on us the duty of governing the country. The country has changed its masters.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not know that the country had a master. I supposed that the country was master.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. That is a pretty small distinction, too fine for me altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. The facts of the case are clear enough, and they serve to elucidate the position taken by the Government in such matters, but I think that out of this case the hon. gentleman might take a lesson.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The hon. gentleman has in his hands today a correspondence which has never been brought down to this House, and which was given out by some of my employees.

Mr. LISTER. Stolen.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to a point of order. I will have no man in this House shake his finger in my face and say I have stolen correspondence.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I did not say that.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say that you did, but the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), who sits behind you, did. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) must at once withdraw that expression.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Lambton did not say that the hon. gentleman had stolen the correspondence, but he did say that the correspondence had been stolen.

Mr. FOSTER. It is just as bad for me to have stolen correspondence in my hands and used it as if I stole it myself. Will the hon. gentleman make good his statement that it was stolen? Every letter and every line that I read, went to Mr. McCallum from the department, and Mr. McCallum had a perfect right to use it in his own defence.

Mr. LISTER. If the hon. gentleman says that if these letters were stolen, he is as guilty as the thief—that is the English of it—I reply that in law he does not occupy that position, unless he has them knowing them to be stolen, unless he received them knowing them to be stolen, and I make no such accusation.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the Speaker's ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose that technically the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) is right when he says that the letters might be stolen without any imputation being cast on the hon. gentleman who used them.

Mr. FOSTER. But he did not say that.

Mr. SPEAKER. He says now, and I am very glad to hear him say so, because, as the remark was thrown across the House, it was susceptible of a different imputation, and I am glad he withdrew it.

Mr. LISTER. I had no intention whatever of charging the hon. gentleman with stealing.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I am very glad indeed to hear the explanation that has been given, but I cannot understand how a letter written by the chief engineer to his assistant, Mr. Lafamme, found its way into the hands of Mr. McCallum. I know something about the case. The instructions of Mr. Coste to his assistants cannot have found their way into Mr. McCallum's hands in the natural order of things, and I happen to know, I think, from whom the correspondence was given out. I have already dismissed some of my officers who, I know, were dishonest men, and I am very much afraid that I will be obliged to do something of the kind again. We are not going to be dupes. Let the faithful employees know that they have nothing to fear from us, but let the traitors understand, at the same time, that they are going to be treated as they deserve. This is equal justice to all. This Government is here, we are here to stay, I think, as far as I can see, and not to be betrayed. I know that in past days, when I was a newspaper man in this place, I happened to know a great many things that were given out by employees of the day. We are not going to submit to the same treatment; we are not going to be betrayed, without at least trying to find out the guilty parties. Again, I say, let the faithful employees understand that they have nothing at all to fear, but let those who want to be active partisans of the party opposite step out or be prepared to be dismissed every time they are caught.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call my hon. friend's attention, if he will allow me, to the fact that in all this general skirmish, which was very nicely gotten up by my hon. friend, he missed the only point. I stated that when the instructions were sent to Mr. McCallum to consult Mr. Angus McMillan, he did consult Mr. Angus McMillan, and Mr. McMillan refused to act, that Mr. McCallum reported that to the department, and that the department then ordered Mr. McCallum to push on the work, buy the materials and employ the men himself. Not one document has my hon. friend—he may have it under his hand—put in to weaken in the least that position. That is the kernel of the whole thing. My hon. friend will be the first to admit that if Mr. McCallum carried out those orders and reported to the department and then received orders from the department to go on by himself, he is not to blame.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. The facts of the case are not at all as stated by my hon. friend. Of course, Mr. McCallum tried to make good his case, but what he did was this. Instead of simply going to Mr. McMillan and asking him what men he was going to employ, he asked Mr. McMillan to go there and stay there all the time. In other words, he made it impossible for Mr. McMillan to be at all useful to us. In other words, he played the game of a very strong opponent and tried to laugh at us, and the one who laughs last laughs best.

Mr. SPEAKER. This discussion is on a motion to go into Supply. Any subject can, of course, be brought up on that motion, but I wish to draw the attention of the two experienced gentlemen who have just been speaking that I am afraid they have assumed that the House was in committee and have spoken more than once, and I hope they will not do so again.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to ask a question of the hon. Minister of Public Works. He says we are not to be betrayed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. These hon. gentlemen seem to understand it, but I do not. What is the hon. gentleman doing that he is afraid will get the light of day?

Mr. McNEILL. I wanted to ask the hon. Minister whether any opportunity was afforded to this gentleman to meet the charges made against him publicly in the House.

The MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS. I thought the case was so clear that there was no use at all wasting public money on it. Moreover, these employees are not permanent, and I am perfectly free to dispense with their services whenever I like.

Mr. McNEILL. I understand that, of course. But it was a question whether this gentleman had done something to make him deserving of dismissal. I understand now that the Minister has really never afforded this gentleman an opportunity to explain himself. I feel that we have a right to appeal to the Prime Minister to say what this is coming to.

Mr. FOSTER. Before we go into committee, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) not being present, I would like to call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that in the Bank Note correspondence some letters have evidently been omitted, by oversight, of course. I asked for all letters and I would like to have the correspondence complete.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) spoke of the previous contract. Does he mean the letters too?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. The hon. Minister of Finance will find that four or five letters written to himself, and, maybe to one or two of the other Ministers—probably one of them to the Prime Minister—have not been included in the return. I would like to have all the letters.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I will make a note of it.

Motion agreed to, and the House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Department of Inland Revenue, including $600 to A. Clement, the private secretary of the Controller, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $38,540

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like the Controller of Inland Revenue to explain this item.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). On page 16 of the Estimates will be found the details of the whole staff as follows:—

Commissioner	$ 3,200
Assistant commissioner and chief inspector	3,000
Chief clerk and secretary.....	2,400
Chief clerk and chief accountant.....	2,000
First class clerks, 4 at $1,800, 1 at $1,450, 1 at $1,400.....	10,050
Second class clerks, 6 at $1,400, 1 at $1,350, 1 at $1,150, 4 at $1,100.....	15,300
Third class clerks, 1 at $680, 1 at $550....	1,230
Allowance for private secretary (A. Clement) to Controller, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act.....	600
Messengers, 1 at $430, 1 at $230.....	760

It will be noticed by comparing this with the estimates of the previous year that the amount asked for this year exceeds by $290 the Estimates of last year, and also that there is one additional second class clerk. It happens in this way: Ever since June, 1894, we have had a temporary clerk, Mr. Hughes, who has been continually employed except for six months. In case of the absence through sickness, &c., of any officer, Mr. Hughes, owing to the experience he has acquired was able, as he has always shown himself willing, to take the place of the absent officer. He is one of those who have given the most satisfactory service in the department. I may be asked: Why do you promote him and make him a second class clerk instead of passing by the ordinary routine and making him first a third class clerk? Mr. Hughes is well qualified to be made a permanent clerk and we are anxious to put him on the permanent staff. Under the law, 49 Vic., chap. 17, sections 21, 22 and 23, we could have appointed him a third class clerk. But, unfortunately, this has been repealed by 53-59 Vic., chap. 15, which provides for the appointment of third class clerks being discontinued. Therefore, it is impossible to appoint now a third class clerk, and we must either continue to keep Mr. Hughes as a temporary officer or appoint him to the second class. He was placed there by our predecessors, but throughout his connection with the department he has done such good service that we are anxious to keep him permanently, therefore, we put him among the second class clerks which raises the number from 11 to 12. It may be asked: With the addition of a second class clerk how is it that you add only $290 to the expenses. I will explain that briefly. Mr. Nettle, who received a salary of $1,750; was superannuated at the age of 82. Hon. members may remember that I explained last session the difficulty I had to gain Mr. Nettle's consent to his superannuation. However, ultimately, without resorting to any violent physical means which I feared last year would be necessary to bring about his superannuation, he graciously assented to it. Mr. Nettle has been replaced by a second class clerk, Mr. Doyon, who receives $1,400. Then, Mr. McCarthy, a second class clerk, died during the winter, and he has been replaced by a new clerk who only receives $1,100. Here is an economy of $300. Hon. gentlemen will understand how, upon these two, we have made an economy of $600, and this would allow us, if the committee sees no objection to it to reward the faithful service of Mr. Hughes by promoting him and making him a second class clerk as he deserves to be. And I hope this favour will be granted.

Mr. FOSTER. Might I ask my hon. friend who this favoured individual is?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Mr. Hughes.

Mr. FOSTER. What salary was he receiving as a temporary man?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. $500.

Mr. FOSTER. And my hon. friend has appointed him at $1,100?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have not appointed him at $1,100; I only ask leave of the House to do so. This is the only thing that I can do. The law says that the salary of a second-class clerk shall begin at $1,100, and that is the minimum salary fixed by law. As for his being a favoured individual, I beg to state that I found him in the office when I came there; that he was appointed by my friends opposite, like nearly every other officer in the office, and that he has always given me the greatest satisfaction, and I am happy to say the same of every officer in that office. I admit myself that to go from $500 to $1,100 is certainly a step which does not appear justified at first sight; but the law does not allow us to appoint a third-class clerk now, we can only appoint a second-class clerk.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend sees what he has done in this year of economy. When hard-working and deserving clerks all through the service are refused their customary $50 increase, he is taking a man who is temporary, who is getting $500 per year—

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have not appointed him.

Mr. FOSTER. Of course, my hon. friend has not appointed him, because he can not go so far, even with all the power the Government have, as to appoint a man until this House says he should have a salary—unless my hon. friend pays him out of his own pocket, which would be even too generous for my hon. friend. Now, here are seven or eight hundred clerks, the large proportion of whom, I suppose he will agree with me, work just as hard, and just as diligently, and do their work just as well as this gentleman, Mr. Hughes. These clerks in this jubilee year of economy, have been docked the usual increase of $50, no matter how faithful their services may have been they cannot get this increase. Here is a gentleman who is a temporary clerk, not on the permanent establishment at all, and consequently less burdensome to the public service than if he were on the permanent staff. My hon. friend goes to work and raises him from $500 to $1,100, adding $600 to his salary. Now, this gentleman has not even the recommendation of having been an old temporary servant. In 1894, I think my hon. friend said, he was appointed; that is only three years ago. Does not my hon. friend think that there is a good deal of injustice, not only in the first consideration I stated, but in this other consideration, that you take a man only three years in the service, a temporary man and you give him $1,100, increasing him by more than 100 per cent, while other deserving men all through the service cannot even get their $50 increase. My hon. friend says he likes the young man—if he is a young man, I do not know him—he likes him, and he thought something ought to be done for him. He could have done something for him in the writers' class, provided for by Parliament, who can go up to $600. He had a chance to raise him gradually under the law from $500 to $600, by giving him so much per year. Those steps were not fast enough; all the rest of the service can take no step at all, but this gentleman is boosted from $500 to $1,100.

and put upon the permanent service, and made a charge afterwards in superannuation, and all that comes from adding to the permanent service. Now, my hon. friend may have been good-natured and all that, and the young man may be a very deserving young man, but that appears to me to be a glaring case of injustice. It is more than right for Mr. Hughes to add $600 to a salary of $500; and for a young man only three years in the service, it is a little too much. No other man in the service gets it. There again the irresponsible will of the Minister comes in to override the plain intention of the law. He comes down here with the force at his back and asks that force to make an enactment by which all the precedents of the civil service shall be swept away. Then does not my hon. friend see another injustice? How many third-class clerks has my hon. friend in that department?

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Two.

Mr. FOSTER. These men have been in the employment for years and years. Are they worthless men? Even those men cannot have an increase. They look for promotion. If there is to be a new second-class clerk appointed, naturally those that are in the third-class think they ought to have the step, and if these gentlemen, under that very salutary rule, have been passed over, there must be some good reason for it. But altogether it looks as if my hon. friend was led away by his good nature, and that, in following the dictates of his good nature with reference to Mr. Hughes, he has perpetrated a very great injustice to all the other members of the civil service.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. There is something intensely comical in the accusation of the hon. gentleman. He says that I have perpetrated a great injustice. I would like to know what injustice is perpetrated when I come before the House and ask the House to allow me to do what I now propose? If the House allows me to do it, then, according to my hon. friend, it is the House that will be perpetrating a great injustice. The hon. gentleman says I wish to favour this man above any others. To show how entirely the charge is without foundation, I may tell my hon. friend that if I met Mr. Hughes now on the street, I would not know him. I only know him by his work, I do not know him personally. I know he was placed there by hon. gentlemen opposite, and they have made a good choice in appointing him. Now, the law does not allow me to do anything more for him unless I make him permanent, and the only way in which I could make him permanent was to make him a second-class clerk. Now, I declare to the House that instead of wanting to use the force of the Government in this matter—and I was painfully struck when I heard the hon. member say that I had the force at my back and that I had only to use it—I beg, Mr. Chairman, to move to amend that item and to return to the estimates as they were last year, namely, make it eleven second-class clerks instead of twelve. Then I hope my hon. friend will see that I have no sinister motive, but I was merely trying to do what I consider was right.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, my hon. friend is not quite just to me. I leave it to the House if I imputed any sinister motive. The only thing I said was that my hon. friend, in his good nature, had probably gone too far. Now, I have nothing to say against Mr. Hughes. He was appointed by us, and may be a good man; I dare say he is; and if my hon. friend is satisfied with his work, that is a recommendation that he is a good man. I was only pointing out that this was a most extraordinary increase to give to a young man only three years in the service.

Mr. CAMERON. I am glad the Controller of Inland Revenue has taken that step. The Controller of Inland Revenue will always find himself wrong when he undertakes to promote to a higher position and a double salary any person employed by the late Administration. This may be a very good man, and a very useful man, but there does not appear to be the slightest justification for increasing his salary from $500 to $1,100, especially in view of the fact that the Government have rightly decided that the usual increase shall not be given except for meritorious services only. Now, with these observations, I must say that in looking over the Auditor General's Report, and the other information that has come to my hands, I believe that the Department of Inland Revenue is still the most expensive department in the whole Government of Canada, both the inside and the outside services. I find by the Auditor General's Report that there were last year in the employment of the Inland Revenue Department, I think about fifty-four clerks, including temporaries, and not less than thirteen extra clerks, including seven ladies.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. No.

Mr. CAMERON. Then the Auditor General is all wrong. According to his report for 1895-96, there was that number of clerks, including thirteen extras, seven of whom were females. The Department of Inland Revenue should be run with a less number of employees. If I am mistaken in regard to these figures, then the Auditor General's report is wrong. Besides, the salaries paid are too high. I should like to know why the Commissioner of the Department of Inland Revenue should receive $4,000 a year; why he should draw two salaries for discharging practically the same duties? I believe this is the only department, with one exception, in which the deputy receives $4,000 salary. Why should he receive $3,200 as deputy of the department and $800 more in connection with weights and measures? Four thousand dollars a year salary is too much for this officer. In the interest of the Canadian taxpayer, that amount should be cut down, and I trust when the hon. Controller has had further time to consider the circumstances, he will see his way clear to cut down not only the salaries of the inside but of the outside service of the department. Looking over the reports of the department and the reports of the Auditor General one is astounded at the sums paid to the outside service. The present Controller is not to blame, because this expenditure is due to the system introduced by hon. gentlemen opposite; but after this session the responsibility will rest on the head of the department and the Government, and it will be necessary to apply the pruning knife to that branch of the public service. The hon. gentleman should not be alarmed or terrified because in doing his duty hon. gentlemen opposite from the back benches to the front benches denounce members of this Administration when they dispense with the services of some of the employees because their services are not required; and allege that they are treated as having been removed from the public service, not because they were not required but because of some political or other considerations. Let the Ministers discharge their duty, and when they find officials, either in the inside or outside service, whose services can be dispensed with or whose numbers can be reduced, let them apply the pruning knife, and if necessary let the political hatchet be used and let their heads be cut off. The people of this country have not placed the members of the Government on the Treasury benches for the purpose of keeping in office men whose services are not required, and they have not placed them in power for the purpose of increasing salaries, but rather for the purpose of reducing salaries, when reductions can be made in the public interest. The public servants do not pay for the maintenance of the service, but this burden falls on the taxpayers, and they have a right to be considered. While I make these remarks, I do not attach blame to the Controller of Inland Revenue, but I do attach blame to the system and to hon. gentlemen who preceded him in office. The present Controller has the opportunity now of serving his country faithfully, as have other members of the Administration, and the people will hold him and them to strict account for the expenditure and for its reduction in his department. Unless services must be dispensed with and men must not be in the service to do nothing except draw salaries. I should like to know from the Controller how $2,226 has been expended in travelling expenses last year? Also, why no less an expenditure than $360 is required for newspapers for the office in the course of a year?

We do not pay the officers to read the public press. Of course I do not object to the Minister and the deputy reading the newspapers during office hours. I am not referring to the Auditor General's report of 1895-96; I have not seen the Auditor General's report for this year, and I hope these amounts have been cut down, for I really cannot understand why $2,226 should be expended for mileage for three of the hon. gentleman's employees. No doubt they travelled on passes—at all events it is very likely they did so—and I do not see the necessity of incurring that expense, especially when there are inspectors and officials throughout the country who are capable of attending to departmental business, and do attend to it to a certain extent. The outside as well as the inside service requires a thorough overhauling and a system of economy instituted, and I tell the hon. Controller that next session the people will expect a very considerable reduction to be made not only in the inside but the outside service of the Department of Inland Revenue.

Mr. BRITTON. I desire to say a word or two at this time because I rather regret that the Controller of Inland Revenue made this motion, if this officer referred to is really as deserving as the hon. gentleman states. It is not possible at all times to do exactly what is right by the whole service without sacrificing some particular individual, and some latitude must be given to any hon. gentleman administering the department, and more particularly when he first comes into the department, in regard to the selection of men and paying them the salaries they are really worth. I know the tu quoque argument is never a good one, and that it never justifies any act done by this Government to say that a similar act was done by the preceding Government, and yet hon. members are tempted to use it when they meet with carping criticism in regard to all these items. I agree with the principle of promotion. If this system prevails, it should be open to all the officials. I have in mind the case of Mr. Dickson in Kingston, who was appointed by the Mackenzie Government, and who, according to all reports and inquiries made in the department is a first-class man in every respect, very well up in his work, of excellent habits, one who has always done his duty most faithfully, yet who from 1878 down to the present time has never received any increase of salary or promotion. Three or four years ago a person not familiar with a single detail with the work of his office, and who had never been in the public service, by name Grimason, of Kingston, was appointed deputy collector at Kingston at a salary of $1,300. Yet Mr. Dickson, who was entitled to promotion, never received it, but a new man was brought in and appointed to the position. If that has been done—and it has been undoubtedly in many cases—by hon. gentlemen opposite, it comes with exceeding bad grace for them to criticise appointments such as those made by the Controller of Inland Revenue when he has just entered on the duties of his office.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I regret the Controller of Inland Revenue so quickly abandoned his guns. This officer, of whom I know nothing personally or officially, has won his good opinion by the merit of his work. The Controller also stated that he did not know of this official except as his work came before him, and his work seem to entitle him to better pay than he had been receiving. The objection of the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) did not go so far as to suggest that the hon. Controller should in no way reward merit in his department. The chief complaint that has been made upon this side of the House is that a very great injustice has been done to many meritorious officers by depriving them of their statutory increase which in many a sense might be considered their vested rights. Outside of the technical rules of law under the Civil Service Act, the House knows that a large number of meritorious men in the service have been deprived of this statutory increase which they had hitherto been led to regard as a right. Whatever the powers of the Government may be, there is a strong case against the policy pursued by them, because the Government in this instance and in several others have assumed rather an inconsistent attitude. While depriving wholesale these men of their legitimate reward, they have singled out individuals, and this man one of them. The member for York (Mr. Foster) did not so much object to a proper reward of merit as to the extraordinary discrimination that was being introduced. The case seems to me to be one of the strongest that could be put before Parliament on behalf of many deserving officers in the different department. For instance, in the departments with which I am the most familiar, I know of men without whose services the department would be very badly handicapped, and in regard to whom very special circumstances exist. In the hydrographic service of the Marine Department, there were men appointed, wholly without regard to politics, for that special branch. The staff of the Kingston College were asked to report upon the names of graduates who from their mathematical examinations seemed to be peculiarly fit for that position; and the names submitted by the staff of the college were accepted. These young men were told what the opening really amounted to. They were led to believe—not by any absolute contract, I admit—but they were led to believe by myself as head of the department, looking at the manner in which public servants had hitherto been treated, that for meritorious work and competency and faithful attention to their duties, their progress would be gradual, and from year to year their salaries would be increased. I may say that none of these men have communicated with me, but they undoubtedly accepted their commissions under that understanding, and this case seems to be one of many in the service where we have obtained specially trained men at very low salaries; these men believing that there was a career before them in the civil service of Canada. Looking over these estimates, I find that the statutory increases are omitted, and that really amounts to bad faith on the part of the Government towards officers of that class, as well as other officials of standing and merit. It is absurd to say that while such a rigid rule of economy is adopted, it is fair to single out either temporary or regular employees for special reward and special treatment, as in this case. I venture to submit to the hon. the Controller that if he feels he cannot take the course of granting a large increase to this exceptionally good officer, whoever he may be, that instead of dropping the whole addition to his salary, the Controller should reduce the amount somewhat, notwithstanding the inconsistent position in which he would still be left, and the injustice under which many other officers of the service would be suffering. As a temporary officer, this gentleman can even be granted, under the law, an increase. After the case which the hon. the Controller has made out for this official, I hope he will not drop him altogether, so far as that increase is concerned.

Mr. McMULLEN. Any person who will look over the list of officers connected with the Inland Revenue Department must come to the conclusion at once that it is entirely over-manned, and comparing it with some other departments of the service, I say that it is not only over-manned, but that it is over-salaried as well. In the Department of Customs there are thirty-one clerks, paid $38,600, whereas in the Department of Inland Revenue there are only twenty-six clerks and they are paid $38,540. In addition to that sum, $800 extra is granted to the Commissioner. I should like to know why the Commissioner of Inland Revenue is paid $3,200, which is $400 more than is paid to the Commissioner of Customs and why, in addition to that, the Commissioner of Inland Revenue gets an extra allowance of $800 as Commissioner of Standards? That makes Mr. Miall's salary $4,000 altogether. I would like to know on what principle you pay the Commissioner of Customs $2,800 and the Commissioner of Inland Revenue $4,000? I say, Sir, that there is ample room for the pruning knife in this department, and I endorse the remarks of the hon. member for Huron (Mr. Cameron). I can easily understand that gentlemen opposite are a little sensitive in urging reductions, because it is their own appointees who draw these salaries. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen opposite would rather that the Controller of Inland Revenue had not moved to strike this $600 out. It may perhaps hurt a political friend of theirs, and some little feeling may arise owing to the fact that they challenged the prudence of giving this $600 increase. I am glad they did. It is the only good act the ex-Minister of Finance has performed this session, and I hope he will repeat it in many instances.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) would only support me.

Mr. McMULLEN. I will. I want to say here and now, that unless this $800 for the Commissioner of Standards is dropped, when it comes to the Supplementary Estimates I shall myself vote that it be struck out. I believe that the ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), when he was acting Minister of Inland Revenue, struck this $800 off on one occasion.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I never was acting Minister of Inland Revenue.

Mr. McMULLEN. Possibly it was the leader of the Opposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then, if it was the ex-Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Costigan), I would like to know who reinstated it as a charge on the country. Perhaps it was done during his absence. At all events, I hold it is wrong that $4,000 a year should be paid to any one man; and I now beg to notify my esteemed friend that when we reach this item in the Supplementary Estimates, I shall move, if necessary, that this $800 be struck out. I hope that before next session the pruning knife will be applied in this department, whosoever's head comes off, as there is ample room, so as to bring the expenditure of the department down to proper and prudent dimensions. At present the expenses of this department are altogether too great.

Mr. BENNETT. When a few weeks ago, it was announced in the papers that the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue was to be transferred to another sphere—to the position of Lieutenant-Governor of the Northwest Territories—the statement was received with a little doubt. When, later on, it was rumoured that he was to go to the province of Ontario as Lieutenant-Governor, that also was received with some doubt and misgivings as well. But, from the onslaught which has been made upon the hon. gentleman to-day by his old friends, I think his first exclamation must be, "Save me from my friends." I wish to ask the hon. Controller of Inland Revenue a question. A little while ago—so the event must be quite fresh in his memory—a Mr. Bolster, who was in his department, was superannuated. May I ask him whether that was done with a view to economy, because the man is in the prime of life; and also, whether it is his intention to appoint a successor to the position.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. Eight officers of the Department of Weights and Measures have been superannuated, and it is not the intention of the Government to replace them.

Mr. BENNETT. I have to thank the hon. gentleman for the answer, although I think it must bring to the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) a sigh of regret, because I understand that he has lately given the assurance that he could not support a prominent Liberal in my riding for the position, because he had a man himself for the post.

Mr. PETTET. I would like to ask the hon. Minister how many hours the civil servants work each day, and also how many weeks' holidays they have each year.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. They have three weeks holidays during the year, and the office hours are from half-past nine to four each day; but whenever they are required to continue their work further, I keep them.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I heard only the latter part of the discussion on this item, which refers particularly to the appointments of second class clerks in the Inland Revenue Department. I see it is proposed to increase the number by an additional second class clerk. I wish to say a few words; and perhaps I am in this happy position that the gentleman who has been named was not in the department in my time; but I know of his services, and I have been led to understand that no more efficient officer has been engaged in that department than the gentleman named. I know he was called in whenever extra work was to be done, on account of his capabilities, his industry, and the satisfaction he gave in every engagement he had in the department; and I was glad to learn that the department had secured his services by making him permanent and giving him a position in keeping with his capacity. While objections seem to have been taken to an increase of that kind in the department, I think I can myself congratulate the hon. the Controller on the fact that in his estimate he has not been obliged to ask Parliament to set aside the Civil Service Act. There is nothing in the Act contrary to the provision he makes; while I find that in other departments the Ministers who have, properly, recognized the services of public officers—I say properly, because I suppose they are acting on the merits of each individual case—have been obliged to ask Parliament to declare that the salaries shall be so much more than they have been, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act to the contrary. Now, I would be very sorry to learn that the ability of this man is not to be recognized, and I hope the hon. the Controller will press the recommendation he has made to Parliament. With reference to the question put to me by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) in reference to another matter, when it comes properly before the House, I shall be very happy to give him the information he desires—whether the $800 was taken away from the Commissioner of Standards by my authority or recommendation, and by whom it was restored. It was done away during my time, therefore I have to assume the responsibility as a member of the Government for that reduction. I also accept the responsibility of its restoration, even with more pleasure; and when the time comes when the hon. gentleman says he will attack the item, I will give any further information I can on the subject.

Mr. LISTER. I hope the hon. the Controller of Inland Revenue will be firm in his determination not to restore this item. If the friend of the hon. gentleman opposite has any complaint to make, that complaint must be levelled against the ex-Finance Minister and his friends. I do not know anything about this gentleman, but the ex-Finance Minister, with all his experience challenged the item which proposed to increase the salary of this gentleman by some $500. The Opposition occupy a somewhat funny position. They come before the House and find fault with the Government for having increased this man's pay. The Government, or the Controller of Inland Revenue, strikes out the item, and now hon. gentlemen opposite, one after the other, get up and say that he ought to restore it. If the Controller had resisted the criticism of the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster), all the following of that hon. gentleman on the other side would have got up and said: What a dreadful pretty extravagant Government this is to be sure—increasing this man's salary to the extent of $600. Now that the hon. Controller has taken their advice, be it good or bad, the whole cry is to put the item back again. This gentleman is probably a very worthy man, the Controller of Inland Revenue may have taken all these matters into consideration, and if hon. gentlemen opposite, who have left office only a short time ago, had thought proper to remain silent, the item would have carried. They thought proper, however, to challenge it, and this, being an economical Government, at once took the advice of the ex-Finance Minister and struck the item out. If the hon. Controller were now to restore it, his friends would feel that he was a very weak man indeed. The increase is struck out and the item must stand as it is, and if this gentleman has any fault to find, he must find it with his friends on the other side.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE (Sir Henri Joly de Lotbinière). I think I ought to be allowed to make a few explanation after what has been said, not only on the one side of the House, but on the other. With regard to what has come from this side, I have accepted the advice of my hon. friends. I am quite willing to admit that I have a great task before me in limiting the expenditure of this department. There is one branch of the department, to which I shall have occasion to refer later, the Department of Weights and Measures, in which I hope, with the consent of the House, to be able to make a considerable reduction of expenditure. Already we have superannuated eight officers in that branch, and I certainly see my way to superannuate a great many more without doing any injustice to any one or to the country.

Mr. MONTAGUE. While my hon. friend is on that point, will he give us the names of those he has superannuated?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I would suggest that the hon. gentleman should wait until the weights and measures items come up.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I only asked because the hon. gentleman seemed to have them at his fingers' ends.

The CONTROLLER OF INLAND REVENUE. I have not the names here, but shall read the divisions. In the division of London and Windsor we saved $1,200; Belleville and Kingston, $1,300; Toronto and Orillia, $1,000; St. John's and King's, N.S., $800; Lévis and Yarmouth, $1,000; Winnipeg, $1,000. These are the different items, but I have not the names. I am quite willing to accept the advice given me by my hon. friends on this side. I know that I have a very serious task to perform, and I shall do my best to accomplish it. My hon. friend opposite alluded to the likelihood of my leaving this department in order to become, I think, Lieutenant-Governor of some place or another. I do not know why people want to send me everywhere but to the department in which I take so much interest, to which I am ready to devote all my time, and which I am anxious to improve in every possible way, both as regards reducing expenditure and increasing its efficiency. At one time people sent me to China as Aide-de-Camp to Li Hung Chang. At another time, I was to become Lieutenant-Governor of the province of Quebec. Again I was to become Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario, and then Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west. The other day when the House was opened, and when some of my colleagues appeared in the magnificent uniform which becomes them so well, I was asked why I did not wear one, and I replied that I did not know exactly what position I was going to be in and therefore had not ordered my uniform. A short time ago I was informed by the newspapers that I was going to be made inspector of cheese factories, and I expect that by and by I shall be appointed to the position of inspector of ginger beer bottles or something of the kind, so that I must know exactly what I am going to be before getting my uniform.

To come back to the question before the committee, I explained why I put the name of Mr. Hughes among the second class clerks. According to law, I do not see how I could make him permanent unless I did so. My hon. friends opposite took for granted that I was bound to pass this item when I simply asked the consent of the House to it, and the moment there was the slightest dissent I asked the House that the name be struck out. The name is struck out and I will not ask that it be replaced. As I said a moment ago, I am quite open to every reproach that may be launched against me by my friends as well as hon. gentlemen opposite for not having, during the time I have been at the head of this department, done as much perhaps as I should towards reorganizing and improving it and especially diminishing the expense. I accept these reproaches for myself but not for the officers with whom I have the advantage of being associated and who are faithfully doing their duty. When my hon. friend speaks of the Commissioner of Inland Revenue, Mr. E. Miall, he speaks of a man who has done a great deal for that department and who has done a great deal for the civil service, and whose services entitle him to the consideration of every one in this House and the country at large. I do not know what I would do without his help, and am glad to render him that justice now. When the question comes of reducing his salary, I think that I can show the House that it would be an injustice to diminish now the salary to which he is entitled and which he has so well earned. I am not going to make comparisons between his salary and those of the other deputies; but if compelled to do so, when the time comes, I will show that he is not the only Deputy Minister who receives a salary of that amount; and that some receive higher salaries, and shall be glad to go into the details of his services, the scientific acquirements and knowledge which his position requires, and show the amount of study and experience required in order to conduct this department.

My hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Cameron) spoke a moment ago of the innumerable staff which he finds in my department—seven ladies in fact and I do not know how many temporary clerks he found there, The whole staff of the department now consists of twenty-six officers, including the messengers and one temporary clerk, Mr.

Hughes, who has already been referred to, and two ladies, Miss Lawless and Miss Herring. These are all the extra officers employed. I do not know that I have ever seen the two ladies who are employed in the department, but I know they do their duty faithfully, because every day I see their writing in documents that come before me. Comparing with the past, I can show that there has been considerable reduction. In 1887-88, there were thirty officers instead of twenty-six, and the amount asked was $41,890, instead of $38,540, the amount now asked for. But while this reduction has taken place, there has been an increase of revenue from $6,504,000 to $8,941,086.

Department of the Secretary of State..... $34,950

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The House will observe that there is a reduction there of about $2,460. This is made up as follows:—Two second-class clerkships are abolished at $1,400 each. Per contra there are a number of small statutory increases which accrued during preceding years. Eight began on the 1st October. These are complete.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman mention who the second-class clerks are who are dropped?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Messrs. Arcand and Mathon. There is a statutory increase of $25 began on the 1st January, two of $37.50, the balance of statutory increases granted 1st April, and two statutory increases, now running, which were omitted from the Estimates of the current year.

The Department of Militia and Defence... $41,050

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The House will observe here a decrease of $4,465, the estimate for 1896-97 having been $45,515. One of the first-class clerks retired, whose salary amounts to $1,550. Another of $1,800 is to be retired, and one substituted at $1,400. This makes a decrease in round numbers of $2,000 in the first-class lists.

Mr. HUGHES. Will the hon. gentleman give the names of those who are retired?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Messrs. Larose and Bacon.

An hon. MEMBER. Colonel Bacon?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Yes. In the second-class there is a reduction in the number from fifteen to twelve, caused by death or resignation. In two cases, officers at $1,400 are replaced by others at $1,100. In the other class there is a reduction in number from five to four. One salary of $1,000 is abolished and one officer has been appointed. In the lowest class there is a reduction in the number, from four to three, with the saving of $352, making in all the saving I have made $4,465, and a reduction in the number of officers of four.

Mr. FOSTER. Are all the positions estimated for filled at the present time?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I understand they are.

Mr. FOSTER. We have not had the pleasure of having the Minister of Militia (Mr. Borden) with us this session. We have missed his presence, of course, and are sorry for the reason, which is illness, I believe. Has the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) any information as to whether we may expect the Minister of Militia to be present this session?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have been, for many reasons, as hon. gentlemen can understand, deploring the absence of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden). I was in some hopes that he could join us, if not this week, by the end of next week. He reports himself as much better, as, no doubt, hon. gentlemen will be glad to hear, and I trust he will join us next week. But, of course, that must depend on what his medical adviser will permit.

Mr. HUGHES. Of course, the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) will understand that I am not attempting to embarrass him. But I would draw his attention to the fact that one of the retiring officers of the department was in another position in the service of the country as brigade major before he became an officer at Ottawa of the Militia Department. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, knows that the time during which this gentleman served as brigade major does not count for superannuation allowance, unless by the grace of the Government. I would most respectfully ask the Minister to take into his serious consideration whether the officer who is retiring should not be allowed for the time during which he gave his services to the country as brigade major as well as for the time he has served as an officer in the department here. It has previously been proposed in the House that brigade majors and district officers commanding should come under the Superannuation Act, but this has not been done yet. In this case I would urge the hon. gentleman to give this matter his best consideration.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I trust that my hon. friend, the Minister of Militia, will be present in person, as I have stated, within a few days. I need not assure the House that his disposition is to do all that the law will allow him to do in cases of that kind. I have not looked into the matter myself, and I could not form an opinion off-hand as to what could be done, but I think the department may be relied upon to give the matter every reasonable consideration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

The Department of Railways and Canals, including $2,000 to L. Shannon, and $1,800 to J. E. W. Currier, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $39,230

Mr. HAGGART. There seems to be some changes here, and I would ask the head of the department to explain the reasons.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). So far as there have been any changes in my department, I think they are apparent on the face of the Estimates, page 18. In the first instance, the former secretary of the department has been superannuated, and there is no longer an officer receiving the salary which was received by that gentleman. There is the sum of $600 which, of course, will have to go into the calculation as to the general result in this department—that sum is to be paid as a superannuation allowance, and has to come out of the former salary, the difference being the sum which has been saved by doing away with that officer. There has been no filling up during the past year, nor is it proposed to fill up the two vacant first-class clerkships which I found when I entered the department. Provision is being asked this year for six only, in place of eight last year. There is no difference in the second-class clerks. As to the third-class clerks, so-called, it will be observed that I am only asking that provision will be made for eight, which will be one less than was provided for last year. So that there is a saving of the salary of the secretary of the department, the salaries of two first-class clerks, and the salary of a third-class clerk, subject, first, to a reduction by the amount of the superannuation allowance, and secondly, by the increase which it is proposed shall be given to the accountant, who is made a chief clerk, that is $200 to Mr. Shannon, and the addition to the salary of Mr. Currier. Mr. Currier's salary appropriated to him as a first-class clerk last year, is $1,487.50. In addition to that, he received a very large portion of the sum allowed for private secretary. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Currier, who was his private secretary, has continued to be my private secretary, and I propose to allow him, if the committee will consent, a salary of $1,800. I also ask provision for a private secretary, a portion of which appropriation will be required for another gentleman to assist me in that capacity. I find it quite impossible to get along with one private secretary, the work in the department is so very considerable that I require the assistance of another man, and in these Estimates I ask that provision be made for him.

Mr. HAGGART. My principal reason in asking this question was to direct the attention of the Minister to the reasons for the superannuation of the secretary of the department, and particularly the reason why he has been allowed such a small superannuation. Would the hon. gentleman please explain why he passed over the law in superannuating that gentleman, and why he gave him a less superannuation than the law allowed?

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman is correct in that statement; I think Mr. Balderson receives the full amount of the superannuation which the law allows. There has been no proposal to add any term of years to his term of service. I have not done that, but I felt, in the first place, after the experience which I have had in the department, that we did not require to continue the services of Mr. Balderson in that capacity. He is no doubt a very competent man, and I felt that his abilities might be, with more advantage to himself, and perhaps to the general advantage of the country, directed in some other channel than that of secretary to my department. He had not enough to do to keep him continually employed, and I found that it was possible to make an arrangement under which the chief clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister would be able to discharge the duties of secretary of the department in connection with his own, which he has undertaken and which have been assigned to him, and which he performs without any addition to his salary. That arrangement has been made, it is working satisfactorily, and under those circumstances I feel that I was not called upon to continue a highly paid officer in the department when I could dispense with his services without any injury whatever to the public service, and without impairing the efficiency of the staff of the department. That is my sole reason I can assure the hon. gentleman, for making the arrangement. As to Mr. Balderson having been allowed less superannuation than the law contemplates, I cannot accept that statement, because no such arrangement has been made, he gets the full allowance.

MR. HAGGART. The hon. gentleman is aware that the secretary of his department is a statutory officer, it is required by law that there shall be a secretary of the department as much as a deputy head and a Minister of Railways and Canals.

THE MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The statement of the hon. gentleman is not entirely new to me.

MR. HAGGART. Perhaps it is new to the committee, to whom I am addressing myself. The secretary is as much a part of the department as the Minister and the deputy head of the department. The office is a statutory one, in which there are certain functions to be performed by the secretary as provided for by Act of Parliament. The law allows, of course, the superannuation of any officer, for the several reasons that are assigned in the Order of Council. I suppose the superannuation of Mr. Balderson was for the purpose of promoting economy in the public service. Under that clause of the statute the hon. gentleman had a perfect right to recommend the superannuation of that gentleman for that purpose. This is the clause:

If any person to whom this Act applies, is removed from office in consequence of the abolition of his office for the purpose of improving the organization of the department to which he belongs, or is removed or retired from office to promote efficiency or economy in the civil service,—

I suppose this was done for the purpose of promoting economy. I shall deal with that afterwards, and show, I think, conclusively that there is no economy secured in his department on the ground of superannuation.

—the Governor General in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of a permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service.

I think that clause requires that when you superannuate a person, after giving him what he is entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, it is obligatory to add ten years to his actual term of service.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he regards the clause to which he refers as absolutely mandatory, compelling an addition of ten years to the term of service?

MR. HAGGART. The clause states that the Governor in Council may grant an officer such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service. If an officer is superannuated on that ground, I say the clause is mandatory, and there must be an addition of ten years to his term of service.

THE MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. No.

MR. HAGGART. If the hon. gentleman will grant a fiat so that this officer can go before the Exchequer Court, he will endeavour to ascertain what the law is. My opinion in regard to the law is that it is mandatory in that sense, and if an officer is superannuated under that clause of the Act he is entitled to an addition of ten years to his term of service.

MR. McMULLEN. When two years ago the hon. gentleman superannuated a very considerable number of inspectors of timber at Quebec and Montreal, did he add ten years in each case to the term of service?

Mr. HAGGART. They did not come under that clause.

Mr. FOSTER. They came under a Special Act.

Mr. McMULLEN. Their offices were abolished and the men were superannuated, and their offices were not filled.

Mr. HAGGART. They were not superannuated; a gratuity was given to each of them.

Mr. McMULLEN. Some of them were superannuated and some were given gratuities.

Mr. HAGGART. However, that is the interpretation of the Act, according to my view, and I do not think it can bear two interpretations. In regard to the plea of economy that has been put forward as a reason for discharging this gentleman, it will be observed that the Minister does not do away with one clerk. This man is thirty-eight years of age. There are three chief clerks. Instead of changing his position and giving him the opportunity of doing some other kind of work, if he was not required as secretary, the hon. Minister promoted another clerk to a chief clerkship. The hon. gentleman now brings down estimates to the amount of $39,230, and I brought down estimates to the amount of $42,062. The test as to whether the amount required by the hon. gentleman is less than the sum we needed must be judged by the amount expended. The whole expenditure on what is called the inside service of the Department of Railways and Canals is about the same now as was asked when I had charge of the department. So, there has been no saving, except, perhaps, a few hundred dollars, less than a thousand dollars; and if the superannuation allowance to Mr. Balderson is added, the amount expended on the inside service last year will not exceed the sum now asked. But it is on the plea of economy that the hon. Minister dismissed the secretary and chief clerk of the department. As to the ability of Mr. Balderson as secretary of the department, let me draw attention to his record. He was selected by the Auditor General to enter his department on 1st January, 1883. He was a young man of distinguished ability. He passed with marked honour his course in Toronto University, he was a medalist and one of the honour men of his year. He commenced at a salary of $800 per annum, and his services proved so valuable to the Auditor General that, in 1884, he recommended an increase, and Mr. Balderson was promoted to a second-class clerkship at $1,100 per annum. He served until 1888, when he was transferred to the Post Office Department as my secretary, he receiving simply the yearly increase of $50. Afterwards he was transferred to the Department of Railways and Canals. I have never heard a word from the head of the department that this gentleman failed to perform his duties in a most satisfactory manner. This officer could not have been removed on the ground that he was an active political partisan. If it was not thought desirable to retain Mr. Balderson as secretary of the department, the hon. Minister, who has rearranged the chief clerks, could have asked him to fill one of those clerkships. Is it fair play that a young man who has bright prospects should be induced to enter the civil service, and after fifteen years' service be superannuated on $682.50 a year? I say the law makes it compulsory on the Minister to add ten years to his service. If such is not the opinion of the Minister and the Government, Mr. Balderson asks that he be given an opportunity to appeal to the courts, and he thinks, from the advice he has received from legal gentlemen throughout the country, he is entitled to that addition to his service. I estimated for some clerkships which I intended to fill, but I did not fill them, and the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) does not intend to fill them either. He thinks he has clerks enough in his department, and he is getting along with exactly the same staff as I had. Sir, I wish to dispel from the minds of hon. members, the idea that there is any economy whatever in the proposition of the hon. Minister of Railways. Adding the $600 for the superannuation of Mr. Balderson, the expenditure of that department will be as much as it was before. I may say, that Mr. Balderson filled a position with credit in the office of Auditor General; and when he left that office, I received a letter from the Auditor General in which he states: You have taken away from me one of my best clerks, and I will look to you to see that a man equally as good as he shall be appointed his successor. There can be no complaint against Mr. Balderson, and there can be no reason for his dismissal—for it is a virtual dismissal—than that he happened to serve me efficiently as private secretary. He was honest and faithful in the discharge of his duty, and I believe it to be my duty now, to bring to the notice of the House the injustice which has been perpetrated in his case. A young man in the prime of life, a most efficient officer, and a gentleman who had the brightest prospects before him of any young man in Canada when he was induced by the Auditor General to enter his department; after fifteen years' faithful service, when he was entitled to nearly $1,200 superannuation under the law; he has been sent out to commence life again with a superannuation of $682 a year.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I can assure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) that I am, and have been for a long time, quite familiar with the provisions of the Civil Service Act which he has read. There is nothing new in the reading of these sections by the hon. gentleman, so far as I am concerned nor do I suppose that there are many gentlemen in the House who are not to a greater or lesser degree familiar with this provision in the Act. It came under my personal observation very soon after I became a member of the Administration and the meaning of the clause has been passed upon and has been considered fully not only by individual Ministers but by the Department of Justice or rather the Minister of Justice as well. I am bound to say with all deference to the firm and clear, and positive opinion which the hon member (Mr. Haggart) has expressed; his view is not coincided in by the members of the Government or by the Minister of Justice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) allow me to ask him a question. Was he not in a position to add ten years to the term of service of this officer?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That is not the contention which has been put forward.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But I ask the hon. gentleman the question?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I frankly acknowledge that Mr. Balderson was in a position to ask an addition of ten years to his term of service, and I say further, that the Government was in a position to refuse that application. Therefore, while this official had the discretion to make the application, we had equally and ample discretion, under this Act, to refuse it. Under this clause, it must always be in the judgment and discretion of those upon whom the responsibility rests of carrying the Act into operation, as to whether in each and every individual instance, the case is one in which we are entitled to decide or not in favour of the applicant. That is the view which is entertained by the Government upon this clause of the Act, and that view is entirely contrary to the view put forward by the hon. member (Mr. Haggart). The matter I suppose will have to rest there. It may be possible, and no doubt in the opinion of the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Haggart) this was a proper case in which to exercise the discretion which the law confers upon us. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman in that opinion. I formed the best judgment which I could upon the facts which were in my possession. Mr. Balderson is a young man, a very capable young man no doubt, a man who may be all that his friend, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) has claimed for him; and I should say, that all that would probably stand him in good stead, in almost any business in life in which he may seek to engage. Take the case as presented by the hon. member (Mr. Haggart) himself, and I do not believe that it is one which at all appeals to the charity of the members of this Government, or to the charity of the country. Take a young man of the extraordinary abilities which are credited to Mr. Balderson, and I think $682 a year is a very fair allowance for him to receive for all time from the country, to start out on a new career. If Mr. Balderson deserves all the high encomiums which have been pronounced upon him—and I do not question them for one moment—he possibly may regard it as a distinct advantage to himself that he has been relieved from the position which he held in the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. DAVIN. Is Mr. Balderson not bound to hold himself in readiness to be called upon by the Government to take a position if necessary?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There may perhaps be something in what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) says. He may owe some military service to the country, but I do not think he is under any obligation to the department.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes, under obligation to the civil service. This Government, or a succeeding Government, can call him to the service again and abolish the superannuation.

The PRIME MINISTER. Is he bound to accept?

Mr. MONTAGUE. He is bound to accept, or else lose his superannuation.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. That may be; and I presume that was in the mind of Parliament when it framed this eleventh clause to which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) appeals. But it does not alter the case in any way, nor distinguish this particular instance from all the other instances in regard to which we are called upon, from time to time, to apply this clause.

Now, passing from that, I wish to make one observation to the committee upon the general subject of the economies which have been practised, as a result of what has been done by me in the department. The committee will bear me out in saying, that I sought no comparison, and I invited none, between the hon. gentleman's (Mr. Haggart's) administration of the department and my own. I am not going to say, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) did not administer his department, so far as the management of the civil service branch of it is concerned, with a due regard to economy. I will not say that he did not do his best to reduce the cost as far as possible, and as much as he deemed consistent with the public service. Therefore, I do not see why the hon. gentleman (Mr. Haggart) felt it necessary to invite any particular comparison, as I certainly did not do so, although I am quite willing that the House should make the comparison.

Mr. HAGGART. My remarks were with reference to your claim that you superannuated Mr. Balderson on the ground of economy.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is no question as to the superannuation of Mr. Balderson being a distinct saving. It may not be a large sum, and a saving of $1,600 a year or $1,700 a year may not appear very strongly to my hon. friend, but there has been a saving, and will be, so far as I can judge, to all time, of $1,600 or $1,700. During the time I have been in the office, I have seen very little of Mr. Balderson, and I have found it difficult to ascertain just what duties he has performed. They have not been much, if any, so far as I have had the means of judging; and I have had no difficulty, in accordance with the views of the head of the department under me, in concluding that the department would not suffer by doing away with the office, or rather not so much doing away with the office, as doing away with the officer, because the office is still retained. To the saving of $1,700 thus effected, we should perhaps add the salary of the first-class clerkships, two of them, which were unfilled at the time the hon. gentleman retired from the department, and which I may fairly charge against him, if he wants a comparison between the present and past Administration, because he admits frankly that it was his purpose to fill those offices. So that there is a saving of $1,700 in the salary of the secretary, the saving of two first-class clerkships, and the saving of one third class clerkship, less a slight increase made in the salary of the accountant. This is only a saving of about $4,000, but I felt that, if I could effect that saving without in the slightest degree weakening the staff of the department or impairing the efficiency of the service, it was my duty to do it.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Did the hon. Minister of Justice give his written formal opinion on this? And if so, would the hon. gentleman have any objection to bringing that down?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am not quite sure at the moment whether we had any written opinion from the Minister of Justice, but if there is one, I shall be very glad to bring it down.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the hon. Minister answer the question put to him by the late Minister, whether the Government would have any objection to grant Mr. Balderson a fiat, so that he may test the question in the courts?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think I may say this much to the hon. gentleman, that when Mr. Balderson applies to me in that sense, I shall be very glad to consider the question and to give him a reply. I do not think I ought at the present moment to be asked whether, in a suppositious case which may not arise, the Government would take a particular course.
Mr. BLAIR.

It being Six o'clock, the Committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 50) respecting the Atikokan Iron Range Railway Company.—(Mr. Dymont.)

MINING DEVELOPMENT AND ADVISORY CORPORATION.

Mr. MAXWELL moved second reading of Bill (No. 82) to incorporate the Mining Development and Advisory Corporation of British America (Limited.)

Mr. FOSTER. We wanted some explanations of this Bill.

Mr. MORRISON. The applicants are applying in this case for incorporation as a company to carry on a general mining and smelting business in the province of British Columbia; and provisions are also being made for their engaging in the business of examining and reporting upon properties, and also advising persons who are desirous of entering into mining in that province.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). Does not that come within the company's Act?

Mr. MORRISON. I think that does come within the company's Act; but section 12 of this Bill states that section 18 of the Companies Act shall not apply. With that exception, of course, the Bill will come within the Companies Act. There is nothing exceptional otherwise in the clauses of the Bill, so far as I understand, they are the usual clauses, and when the Bill gets into committee we will be prepared to give the fullest explanation on each clause.

Mr. FOSTER. What struck me about it was that so far as I can see the powers you are asking are just exactly the powers which all those mining companies get, and which they get by charter under the Companies Act. I do not see why there is any reason for this company going outside the general rule unless it wants something extraordinary. If it wants something extraordinary, it would be well worth looking after.

Mr. MORRISON. If we can get something extraordinary I do not suppose we would be above taking it; but this Bill, as I understand, does not contain any extraordinary clause, and in fact every provision here seems to be the usual provision in Bills of this kind.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SECOND READINGS.

SUPPLY.

The House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

The Department of Railways and Canals, including $2,000 to L. Shannon, and $1,800 to J. E. W. Currier, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $39,230

Mr. McNEILL. Had the hon. Minister of Railways completed his observations before dinner?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I think so.

Mr. McNEILL. I would like to call the Minister's attention again for a moment to this clause, because I think that he must surely have misapprehended the opinion that was given by the Attorney General. The clause as it stands, is in these words:

If any person to whom this Act applies is removed from office in consequence of the abolition of his office for the purpose of improving the organization of the department to which he belongs, or is removed or retired from office to promote efficiency or economy in the civil service, the Governor General in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind.

When may he do this; and how may he do this? "After adding ten years to his actual term of service." The hon. Minister need not shake his head. If he looks at the clause and reads it over, he will find it is the only possible construction that can fairly be placed upon the words. The clause is equivalent exactly to what it would be if those words were inserted after the word "may," and it would perhaps have made the meaning a little more apparent, but would not have been any stronger, because this being the operative clause, and the strongest clause, it is put at the end of the sentence where the strongest clause ought to be. It would, perhaps, I say, have been a little clearer had this clause of the sentence been inserted after "may," and

If any person to whom this Act applies, is removed from office in consequence of the abolition of his office for the purpose of improving the organization of the department to which he belongs, or is so removed or retired from office to promote efficiency or economy in the civil service, the Governor in Council may, after adding ten years to his actual term of service, grant him, &c.

That is the only possible explanation of the clause. I venture to say that if the hon. gentleman will consult legal gentlemen on his own side of the House, he will find that the overwhelming opinion of the best legal minds will be to that effect. It may be that an opinion has been given to the effect that this is optional. In a sense it is. It is optional whether the Government give any superannuation allowance at all. But it is a condition precedent to making this compensation referred to here that they shall add ten years to begin with—it is "after adding ten years," which is not optional but imperative. It is after adding ten years that the Government are to compensate for loss and make further allowance for the removal from office. If the Minister will consult the Attorney General on the subject, no doubt he will find that legal authority holds that this is the only possible construction of the clause. So much with respect to the legal aspect of the case, so far as my lights go. I want to say one word more to my hon. friend, and it is that I cannot at all take the view he seems he adopted with respect to this gentleman.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Does the hon. gentleman think the Government should have added ten years to his term of service?

Mr. McNEILL. The gentleman should have had ten years added under his moral claim, and he must have ten years added on the legal ground.

Mr. DOMVILLE. What are the moral grounds?

Mr. McNEILL. I was about to say, when I was interrupted, that I cannot agree with the view the hon. gentleman took of the moral claim this gentleman has upon the department. The fact that he is a young man, from my point of view, only makes his claim stronger and his vested rights greater. If he had been commuting his salary, the younger he was the larger the amount of commutation he would have received. It seems to me that when a young gentleman of distinguished ability reaches the position attained by this gentleman, he has a stronger claim, a larger claim, than an older man. He has more opportunities of getting advanced in the service, and he is in possession of those opportunities much more fully than a man of advanced years; and to say that because the man is a young man, his claims from this point of view are to be ignored, is to argue the wrong way about. If it were, as my hon. friend to my surprise suggested, a matter of charity, the case would be very different. If it were a mere matter of charity, then the older man, who would not be so well able to provide for himself, would have a much stronger claim than the younger man; but I venture to say that this is no claim for charity, and I repudiate on behalf of the gentleman whose claim is now under discussion, the idea that his is in any sense a claim for charity on this House and this country. What we are dealing with is a moral claim on the part of this gentleman, and not only a moral claim but a legal claim under the statute; and whether he has a legal claim or not, I say he has a moral claim. He has certain vested interests which have been interfered with, and certain rights for compensation for interference with those vested rights, and so he is not asking charity but right, justice and fair-play, and he asks that the moral obligation which rests upon this House and the Government and the people of this country should be given effect. The facile cynicism with which these moral claims seem to be ignored and set aside and resort had to nice and technical legal constructions to avoid equitable claims, bodes no good but evil to Canada, if persevered in. It has a very sinister aspect, and the future of this country will be seriously affected if the Government of the day sets the example of ignoring moral obligations and endeavouring to get rid of equitable claims by hard and fast and nice legal distinctions.

Mr. McNEILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And legal claims, too.

Mr. McNEILL. Yes, but I am specially dealing with the other side of the question at the present time. Nothing could be worse, no more evil lesson could be taught to the people than that the Government should pursue a course of that kind. I do not wish unduly to occupy the time of the House, but I thought it was only right to make the observations I have made in regard to this matter. I wish to repeat that this gentleman is not coming here asking for charity, that he is coming here pressing a moral claim and a legal claim on the attention of the Government; and while I believe as much as any hon. gentleman opposite that it is necessary we should exercise every due economy in the public service, still I believe, as I have already said, there are many things even more important and valuable than economy. There are certain great principles which we must observe and maintain, and however valuable economy may be, when economy comes into conflict with those principles, it must go to the wall. If economy does not go to the wall, and dollars and cents are considered of more value than the maintenance of those great principles of justice and honour, then it will be an evil day for Canada.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) has presented his case to the committee in its two-fold aspect, and he has presented it very fairly. I find no fault with the manner in which he has made the claim on behalf of this young man Balderson. I regret to say that I cannot agree, either with the view which he takes of the moral obligation of the Government, or of the legal interpretation to which that section is entitled. As to the moral obligation, I cannot think there were any circumstances in this case which made it my duty to recommend to the Governor in Council the exercise of the discretion, which unquestionably rests with the Government under the section which has been quoted.

Mr. McNEILL. I hope that the hon. Minister (Mr. Blair) did not misunderstand me. I hope I made myself clear. I do not say, that there is not an option under the section, but I say, that if the Government exercises the option and determines to give superannuation, then there is no option whatever with regard to the ten years.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I quite understand the view which the hon. gentleman presents, but I was dealing, and I think fairly, with what I may call the moral aspect of the question. Assuming that the view which the Government has taken of that section is correct, then, the most which the section imposes on the Government is, that it shall exercise discretion in respect to each individual case. I was unable to conclude that this case was one which made it my duty to recommend an addition of ten years to the term which this gentleman had served. I am bound to say, that the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) always takes a fair view of matters with which he has to deal—he tries to, at all events, though perhaps he does not always succeed—and I regret that his view as to the course which I ought to have taken in this matter does not correspond with mine. Feeling that the responsibility rested upon me of determining whether or not I ought to recommend the Governor in Council to add any period of years to the term which Mr. Balderson had served, and having the opinion which I had, I was bound not to report in his favour. I did so conclude, using the very best judgment which I could bring to bear on the whole question. I am free to say that I did not consider that a young man like Mr. Balderson, with his admittedly great ability to succeed in some other sphere of life, should have anything at all added to the superannuation allowance which the law gave him. On the contrary, I rather consider that as a reason against giving him an extra allowance. If we had been putting out of the service a man who had been for a considerable period in office, who, by reason of his long service had, perhaps, disqualified himself from taking up any other occupation, I would then have thought that there were circumstances which would make the case different from those which obtain in the present instance. The contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) must altogether rest upon whether or not he has taken a correct legal view of the clause. I would venture to say that none of the hon. gentlemen opposite who have had to interpret this Act, will state now that the late Government put any different interpretation upon the clause from what we have done. I will tell the hon. gentleman very frankly, that it is not a new question at all from any point of view. I have been only a few months in the Government, and hardly any sitting of the Treasury Board, of which I happen to be a member, has taken place at which this section has not come up for consideration. The section has been considered carefully, and I think a unanimous conclusion arrived at, as to what it means. That conclusion, as to the meaning of the clause, is entirely different from that at which the hon. gentleman has arrived. Let me submit to the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) one or two reasons, and I think he will admit himself to be in error. If the section means what the hon. gentleman claims, it means that the Treasury Board, or the Governor in Council, if you will, has no discretion; but that in every case in which a person is superannuated for the reasons mentioned in that clause, he is entitled to ten years, if he is entitled to anything. You would be flying directly in the face of the interpretation which the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) put upon that clause, if you are to allow him any less than ten years. I may be in error, but I think the late Government have, time and again, added an extra term of years less than ten. They have allowed ten years in many instances, but in as many, and perhaps in more they have added, perhaps, two years, perhaps five. Since the present Government have come into power, we have had under our direct observation cases in which a less term than ten years have been allowed by the late Government. If I am correct in assuming that the contention of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McNeill) is that we have no discretion at all except to allow the full ten years.

Mr. McNEILL. That is my contention.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman is right in that, then it is clear, beyond peradventure, that that is not the interpretation which has been uniformly put upon this clause by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentleman has fallen into a very natural error, and one which any one might fall into who reads the section hastily. He has not given sufficient emphasis, nor attached the proper importance to the words “not exceeding,” which are the qualifying words in that section.

Mr. McNEILL. There is no reference to the ten years in the words “not exceeding.”

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. There is where we fundamentally differ. The interpretation which hon. gentlemen opposite have put upon this clause is, that these words have nothing to do with the concluding portions of the clause, and I will show why. The Act says that the Governor in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance, as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such sum, with ten years added.

Mr. McNEILL. Oh, no.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The ten-year portion of the clause is intended to be read as the outside limit, beyond which the Government cannot go.

Mr. McNEILL. Will the hon. gentleman read the clause.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. It says:

The Governor in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would be entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service.

Now, the words “not exceeding” are the controlling words in that clause—and the object of Parliament was to confer upon the Governor in Council a discretion to enable them not only to allow a superannuation allowance in respect of the actual number of years which the officer had served, but, if they chose, to add a certain time, though not exceeding ten years, additional. That is what that means. If it does not mean that, then I must call upon hon. gentlemen opposite to explain how it is that in the numberless instances which I believe can be referred to, they have done such gross injustice to the civil servants of the country who have been superannuated under orders passed by them, and in whose cases they did not pretend to allow the ten years, which they were in duty bound to allow, if the interpretation now put forward by them is to be accepted, and in reducing which they must have been perpetrating this moral wrong, and flying directly in the face of an Act of Parliament.

Mr. McNEILL. I must say I think the hon. gentleman's reading of the clause is very extraordinary. The clause reads in this way :

May grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not exceeding that.

Mr. McNEILL. No, it is not exceeding what he would be entitled to if he had retired in consequence of infirmity of body or mind. What my hon. friend has suggested is, I think, the most extraordinary perversion of the meaning of plain English words that I have ever encountered. So far as the argument is concerned, that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have not construed the clause in this way, whether a mistake has been made in construing the clause, I do not know. I understand that the cases where men have not had the full ten years added are not similar to this case ; but I daresay some member of the late Government will be kind enough to explain to the House how that matter really stands. So far as the clause is concerned, I think it is as clear as it can be.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals was under the impression this afternoon that an opinion had been obtained from the Minister of Justice. From what he said subsequently, it would appear that that was not an opinion after any formal reference to the department, but possibly a flying opinion, and it no doubt expressed his views as given. It would be, I think he will agree with me, exceedingly happy if the Minister of Justice had in this case been asked to look very carefully into this case. I take it that the hon. Minister of Railways, notwithstanding the strong view he has expressed in regard to the interpretation of that clause, will admit that it is not singularly well drafted.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The same might be said of a good deal of the Act.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Quite so, but the hon. gentleman will see himself that that last clause, coming after the adding of ten years to the actual term of service, enables an argument to be urged that would have been impossible had that idea of his been more happily expressed by the draftsman. I am not at the moment prepared to express a strong view one way or the other with regard to that. Not having heard the whole of this discussion, I do not know how far I may be repeating what has been said by those who think this clause is open to the construction under which special consideration would have been given to the case of Mr. Balderston. At the moment, I am inclined to think that there are words in that clause, independent of these last words, "after adding ten years to his actual term of service," that indicate that there was to be special consideration and treatment in a case of abolition of an office. The clause itself on its face is a special clause. It takes away this particular class of cases from the ordinary operation of the Act. It makes the case of the abolition of an office a case by itself, and language is used which, so far as my memory goes, is only found in the case of the abolition of an office. Now, the hon. gentleman said—and there would be a great force in his remarks, if he is accurate, but he is speaking merely from information, and that not very certain—that the practice under the late Government, or that has prevailed, has been in the direction of his view. My memory at the moment is different. There may possibly be one case.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I will give you the case of one Mr. Smith, who was allowed five years.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. In my time there were cases where ten years were added when an office was abolished. I am safe in saying that not during my time on the Treasury Board or in the Department of Justice was this question ever mooted. So that, instead of it being settled by practice, that offices have been abolished without special allowance over and above the ordinary superannuation. I am of opinion that investigation will show that the practice has been the reverse. But in any event that question has not in recent years been raised at all. Being now raised, it seems to me that it calls for more serious consideration than has apparently been given to it. I am not at all attempting to make light of the hon. Minister's opinion from a professional point of view. He knows very well what I mean by a reference to the law department of the Government. All departments are controlled in these matters by that department, for the sake of uniformity, among other reasons, in regard to the administration of the laws; and I certainly think that this question is not only very interesting indeed, but that there is much in this clause which will bear out another construction than that which the hon. Minister of Railways seems inclined to put upon it. For instance, instead of saying that where you abolish the office you may do that by superannuating the officer, the language is of this special nature, that in that case the Governor in Council may grant the officer such gratuity or such superannuation allowance—not as provided for in this Act, but as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office. There is the superannuation, and, if I am right in the view I take at the moment, there is something more—I am leaving aside the addition of the ten years, there is the fair compensation for the loss of office, not from any of the reasons mentioned, such as bodily or mental infirmity, or age. There must be this special provision.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. May, not must.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Must, for this reason. It says the Government may, in that case, superannuate, but they must take care that there is, in the language of the Act, a fair compensation for the loss of office.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. They must take care that they do not exceed a certain limit.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite right, they must not add more than ten years, but they must add something, be it a month or a day or ten years. It seems to me there is a good deal of foundation for the argument that, over and above the ordinary provision of the Superannuation Act, an allowance should be made such as would fairly compensate for the loss of office, and which, in no case, must exceed the ten years' limit. I would like to call attention to what seems to be the rather extraordinary position in which the organization of that department will be found, unless the hon. gentleman contemplates asking for further legislation. Should the present intention prevail, there will be one man holding the following positions: Mr. Schreiber will be Deputy Minister of Railways and Canals, Chief Engineer of Railways, Chief Engineer of Canals, Secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and he is practically secretary of the Railway Department, because his secretary, Mr. Jones, is to act as secretary of that department.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. He is to be the secretary.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. There is this extraordinary position. We have heretofore had two officers, so to speak, the secretary of the department, who, according to the legislation constituting the office, has been the supervising officer of the whole department, acting under the direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Deputy Minister or Chief Engineer and head of the technical branch of that department, who was bound to report to this supervising officer. Now you have the extraordinary position whereby the Chief Engineer and Secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council is actually bound to report to his own private secretary. Surely that was never contemplated by the legislation. Again, at the moment I cannot give the exact reference, but the hon. gentleman has been long enough in office to see the importance of the point, that under the different Acts on the Statute-book, since there was constituted the office of Secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals there are important duties which the officer holding that office can alone perform. It may be that the legislation has gone further than I think it has and provided that the acting secretary may perform those offices, but the only provision is that, during the absence or sickness of the actual secretary of the department, the acting secretary may legally perform the functions which the legislature has put in the hands of the secretary. So that the point arises according to which the hon. gentleman, if he desires to do away with that office, will have to come to this House for amendatory legislation. Whether the hon. gentleman proposes to revise the legislation and abolish the office I do not know. Perhaps he will say whether he proposes to continue the private secretary of the Chief Engineer Department in the office as acting secretary.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Yes, I have already arranged that.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. So that we are left with a state of things such as has never before existed in that department, or in any department under this Government or any Government similar to our own, under which a high and important officer, discharging very responsible duties, instead of reporting to a practically independent officer of high grade and actually in touch with the head of the department, actually reports to his own private secretary.

Mr. McMULLEN. Let me give the hon. gentleman some cases that will be interesting as showing the policy adopted by his party when called upon to interpret the clause which has been the subject of debate to-night. Here is a man, Major C.

Tanguay, a clerk in the Department of Agriculture, who had served 28 years, and who got an allowance of $784 when superannuated, and the reason of his retirement was abolition of office. There was not a year or a month or a day added to his term of office. Here is another, Mr. Gardner, who had a salary of $1,000 and served thirteen years and who got a retiring allowance of $260. His office was abolished but there was not a day added to his term of service. Here is the case of a Mr. Davis, who got a salary of $2,800, and had served thirteen years, and who had two and a quarter years added to his salary after his office was abolished.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. He got an addition.

Mr. McMULLEN. In the other cases there was no addition.

Mr. HAGGART. How many years was he in office?

Mr. McMULLEN. I see he served thirty-two and a-half years and got two and a quarter years added.

Mr. HAGGART. He got the full allowance.

Mr. McMULLEN. You added the full allowance in that case but in the others you did not.

Mr. HAGGART. What were their offices?

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Tanguay was a clerk in the Department of Agriculture, his salary was $1,400 a year. He had served twenty-eight years and was retired with a retiring allowance of $784, and opposite his name appeared the memorandum "abolition of office." So, his office was actually abolished and there was neither a day nor an hour added to his time. Mr. S. Gardner had $1,000 a year, as an employee of the Department of the Interior. He had served thirteen years, and there was not an hour added to his term. They gave him the magnificent sum of $260 as retiring allowance and his office was abolished.

Mr. HAGGART. What was his office?

Mr. McMULLEN. He was immigration agent at St. John's. It is quite evident that hon. gentlemen opposite did not in the past interpret this clause in the way they do now in pressing their contentions upon the House. The hon. ex-Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) was very guarded, I notice, in the statements he made. But these three cases exactly meet the points he raised. I admit that not more than two and a quarter years were added in the case mentioned. But no more could be added because it brought it up to the limit, $3,500 which is the largest retiring allowance that they can give to any—

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I guarded myself on that point particularly.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Evidently, in this case, as I intimated, that same thing did happen. I felt before rather sure, and I feel now very positive, that the point had never been raised. Certainly I do not recollect it.

Mr. HUGHES. In regard to the retirement of Mr. Balderson from office, I may say, with those who have addressed the House on this side, that I think the case is somewhat hard. He is a young man who took the highest honours during his course in the University of Toronto and matriculated winning one of the medals of that institution. He began life as mathematical master in one of the collegiate institutes in Ontario. Had he remained in the teaching profession, he would, no doubt, have become one of the leading masters in the province of Ontario, and would have occupied most distinguished positions in the country from an educational view point. He was not an applicant for a position under this Government, but he received an offer from the Auditor General's Department, and was induced to go there on representations from the Government. The position offered to him he accepted and was promoted step by step until he became secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, and we find that to-day there is no charge made against him of being unfit for his position or having been a partisan. Now, turning to the section of the Civil Service Act, the view that is expressed by the hon. member for Pictou, the late Minister of Justice (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), undoubtedly, to my mind—to a lawyer's mind, that I have yet to learn that all legal knowledge is confined within the limits of the lawyers' heads—is correct. We find that the Government may grant such gratuity or superannuation allowance as may fairly compensate him for his loss of office. I maintain that an allowance of six hundred odd dollars is not a fair allowance to Mr. Balderson for his loss of office. If he had remained a teacher in the province of Ontario and became one of the fellows of Toronto University, he would undoubtedly have occupied a much higher position than he was occupying in the department and would not have been subject to be turned out in the world as he is now. This affair will more or less have the tendency to injure his future. He cannot possibly return, at his age, to the educational arena, the only one he is fitted for.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Why not?

Mr. HUGHES. For the simple reason that younger men have come to the front and are occupying these positions, and if Mr. Balderson were to step into the arena it would be impossible for him to attain the high position he would have held had he never left the teaching profession. I think the Minister of Railways and Canals will do me the credit to say I am not a partisan in this matter. I think that Mr. Balderson is entitled to such an amount as will compensate him for his loss of office. The ordinary superannuation will not fairly compensate him for his loss of office, there is no doubt of that. Any one who knows his attainments, who knows what he threw up to come here at the request of the Auditor General's office, must know that $500 does not fairly compensate him for his loss of office. What does this next clause mean? It means, as the hon. ex-Minister of Justice has said, that the Superannuation Act provides that if taking the number of years an officer has served does not provide him with a fair compensation for his loss of office, the Government may have an opportunity to add five or ten, but not more than ten years to his term of service in order that he may be fairly compensated. Now, as a matter of fair-play between man and man I think Mr. Balderson is entitled—

Mr. MCGREGOR. As between man and man, the allowance for superannuation is a very large one for the time he served.

Mr. HUGHES. I mean to say that Mr. Balderson, had he never entered the civil service could have been in receipt of a much greater allowance than the sum he is receiving under this Act. It may seem a pretty good allowance for an ordinary man, but I want the hon. member for Essex (Mr. McGregor) to understand that Mr. Balderson is an extraordinary man. His career in Toronto University and here has marked him as a man of more than ordinary mathematical ability, and one who should not be treated by any Government as Mr. Balderson has been treated here. I would ask the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to look fairly into this matter, in the light of this clause, and if he will not allow Mr. Balderson to bring the matter up in court, let him make Mr. Balderson a fair allowance, and not merely his bare superannuation allowance. They say: Oh, he is a young man and can earn a living elsewhere. The next section precludes his entering into any other vocation in life. To all intents and purposes, under this Act, he must hold himself ready on the call of the Government to resume his duties in office, and, if he fails to do so he must lose not only his chance of office, but his superannuation allowance. It says:

Every person who receives a superannuation allowance, and is under the age of sixty years, and is not disabled by bodily or mental infirmity, may be called upon to fill, in any part of Canada, any public office or situation for which his previous services render him eligible.

Then it says in conclusion:

If he refuses or neglects to do so, he shall forfeit his said allowance.

So that if Mr. Balderson chooses to join the legal profession, or to resume his duties as teacher, or to go off and become a miner, why, he might possibly be called upon to resume his duties here.

Mr. MACDONALD. It is not very likely.

Mr. HUGHES. Never mind. What is the meaning of this section of the Act? We are taking the Act as it reads. He would, at all events, have to hold himself in readiness to return to his duties, and if he failed to do so, he would lose his superannuation. Now, I trust that the Minister of Railways, at the entrance of his career, may preserve the name that he has had. I am glad to say, in his own province for fair and square dealing. I am satisfied that if he will give an impartial consideration to this case, he will do justly by Mr. Balderson: and if he cannot grant him the ten years additional to his service, then let him grant him what the section calls for, such a gratuity as will fairly compensate him for his loss of position. I maintain that under the Order in Council retiring Mr. Balderson, he has not been fairly compensated for his loss of the office.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to say one word with regard to Mr. Balderson. I have known him very well for a great many years, and I believe him to be a thoroughly efficient man. He lived in the town from which I come, for some time, and I know he is looked upon as a very able young man. I would not, for a moment, contribute to any slur upon his ability, or anything of that kind. I believe he is a thoroughly capable young man, and passed his examinations with great credit.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wish to prolong this debate, nor is it necessary to go over the ground that has been so ably taken by hon. gentlemen who have criticised this transaction. But I must say that I think any intelligent man listening to this discussion, would be very much embarrassed to arrive at the reasons which have induced the Minister of Railways and Canals to make it necessary. Now, Sir, I had the honour to be Minister of Railways and Canals for many years, and there is no person, perhaps, better able in this House to speak as to the necessity of such an officer in this department, than myself. At the same time that I was Minister of Railways and Canals there was a very able deputy Deputy Minister, and in addition to the Deputy Minister, there was the chief engineer of the Railway Department and the chief engineer of the Canals Department. In addition to these three gentlemen, there was a secretary whose time was devoted from morning until night, and very often until late in the night, in order to discharge duties absolutely necessary and essential to the proper conduct of that department. He was clothed under the law with very important functions that at this moment, according to the Minister of Railways and Canals, cannot be performed at all. I maintain that, notwithstanding that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of that department is himself a lawyer, he is to-day violating the law of the land in the administration of one of the most important departments in the public service.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. In what way?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will tell the hon. gentleman in what way. The law assigns duties of a most important character to be performed by the secretary of that department; the law directs the Governor General in Council to appoint a secretary to the Department of Railways and Canals, and assigns him important functions to be discharged. Sir, you have no secretary in the Department of Railways and Canals.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are a little in error in that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well, then you are in error in stating to this House that you have abolished that office. If you have not abolished the office, the appointment of a secretary of Railways and Canals still exists, and then this House has not been treated with candour by the estimates which you have laid upon the Table of this House, which profess to detail the mode in which the department is organized, and in which the office of secretary is left vacant. I put that to the hon. gentleman; and I say that inasmuch as the law assigns important functions to a secretary which can only be performed, not by a private secretary to the chief engineer, but by an independent secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, that office still exists. But you declare to this House that you have abolished that office, and you have got rid of one of the most able, one of the most independent officers, a gentleman of the highest standing and character, as testified to by yourself, and by every other gentleman on that side of the House who has spoken. Here is a gentleman that was brought into the public service, not seeking the office, a gentleman not connected with party. The Auditor General, holding his office as a parliamentary officer independent of the Government, and with wide discretion as to the parties he employs, goes out and searches for the ablest man, the most reliable and independent man, that he can get to perform important duties connected with the Auditor General's office, and he invites and presses this man, who had distinguished himself before, and who was known to him as a man of the highest character, and of the greatest ability, and he takes him into the public service. You have driven him out, Sir, and I tell the hon. gentleman that he has inflicted the greatest discredit he could inflict upon that gentleman who had thus been invited and brought into the public service. The hon. gentleman has not only inflicted all the injury that he could upon him, but he has damaged his future. It is said that he may go abroad; the hon. gentleman said himself that he would have been disposed to look with greater charity upon this transaction, if the gentleman was not so able. What has the hon. gentleman done? Why, Sir, so far as his act is concerned, he has branded this man with the disfavour of the department, he has driven him out of the high position that he held in the public service, and he has vacated an office without abolishing the office that the law of the land declares is absolutely necessary to the proper working of the department. Sir, is that calculated to raise the civil service of this country? Is it not desirable, in the interest of the public service of Canada, that men of high character, that men of great ability, should be tempted to come into the civil service? Will they do so when they find that after fifteen years of laborious service in discharging their duties in the most efficient manner, they are driven out of office by a pretended abolition of their office? I say pretended abolition of the office advisedly, because either the office has been abolished or it has not. The hon. gentleman says he has not violated the law because he has got a secretary. Then I say that this estimate that is put on the Table of the House is a delusive estimate, because there is no secretary in this department, but the office of the secretary is left vacant. I understand the matter perfectly. The hon. gentleman could not remove this man from his office, he could not get the sanction of the Governor General to the removal, because he could bring no charge against him. The man's character and standing, and his devotion to the public service were such that the only way the hon. gentleman could get rid of him was by pretending to abolish the office. And yet he says the office is not abolished, he says the law is not violated, because he has got a secretary, and yet he has not got a secretary in the Estimates. Why, because he could not have got the vacancy, unless, as I say, he had pretended to abolish the office. In my judgment, a most serious damage has been inflicted upon the public service. Suppose that to-morrow the Government sees that it is desirable to bring into the public service a man of high character, a man of ability, and standing, and education, a man who has distinguished himself; let the Government make him an offer of a position in the service, and he would say: No, thank you. If men like Mr. Balderson are to be driven out of the public service with reputations tarnished—because it is tarnishing a man's reputation to get rid of him in this way—then I say you do a great injury to the public service. Why did not the hon. gentleman do him the justice, in the exercise of the judgment which he himself admits he had power to do, of adding ten years to this man's service for superannuation, and give him something like a respectable retiring allowance.

On a paltry $600 a year the Minister of Railways and Canals has turned adrift Mr. Balderson, who was brought into the public service, and has got rid of him. Why? Because he did not require him? When I had the honour of being Minister of Railways and Canals, with an able and efficient Deputy Minister, Mr. Trudeau, with an able and efficient engineer of railways, Mr. Schreiber, and with an able and efficient engineer of canals, Mr. Page, with all these three officers there was abundant work to demand the untiring and assiduous labour of the secretary of the department. Now, what is the position? Mr. Schreiber, a man of great ability, standing and character, is there occupying the combined position of Chief Engineer of Railways, of Canals, and Deputy Minister, the whole of these important functions being performed by one man, whereas formerly they were performed by three men. Yet the Minister declares there was no employment for the secretary, an officer charged with the duty of superintending all the work of the department that is not absolutely technical and professional. I am sure there is no hon. gentleman on either side of the House who at this moment can understand and who will admit that any legitimate reason sufficient to carry conviction to any intelligent mind has been adduced to show that it was in the interest of the public service and in order to save public money that this officer was got rid of. There is now the astonishingly ridiculous spectacle presented of the Deputy Minister of that great department, the Chief Engineer of Railways and the Chief Engineer of Canals and the secretary of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, all combined in one officer, reporting absolutely to his private secretary. Such a spectacle was never presented by any Government that professed to carry on public affairs with any regard to the maintenance of an appearance of doing public work in a proper way. The hon. gentleman by this act has taken a step that will reflect no credit on himself, no credit on the department, and no credit on the Government of which he is a member. There is an Act respecting the Department of Railways and Canals. What does it say? It provides that there shall be a secretary appointed, and it says that in the absence of the secretary or of his inability to act, the Minister may, in writing, authorize some other officer of the department to act for the time in his stead. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) seems to be very anxious to turn away attention from the position in which the Minister is placed, and it would be a little more respectful to the House if the hon. gentleman, on an occasion like this, did not exhibit the appearance of feeling that the hon. gentleman to whom he defers so much, requires to have attention drawn away from what is being said.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I am listening.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By attempting to interrupt the statements made on this, which is one of the most important questions that can occupy the attention of this committee.

Mr. DOMVILLE. As the hon. gentleman refers to me I wish to say—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for King's should have more respect for himself than to present himself in that light.

Mr. DOMVILLE. Does the hon. gentleman refer to me?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DOMVILLE. What have I done?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is most improper on the part of the member for King's to endeavour to occupy the attention of the Minister at the time his attention is being called to a great dereliction of duty.

Mr. DOMVILLE. We are all tired of the hon. gentleman's ramblings.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The law provides that there shall be a secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals. The Minister has shown this House that there is no secretary of the department, that there is no such officer as is named in the Act, and that he is not taking a vote for such an officer. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman has declared that he has abolished the office of secretary of the department. Am I correct?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. You are not correct in that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then how does the hon. gentleman superannuate Mr. Balderson, if he has not abolished the office? My hon. friend (Mr. Haggart) has handed me the Order in Council superannuating that officer. It says:

That, to promote economy in the public service, Mr. John H. Balderson, secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, be, from the 1st July, 1897, placed upon the retired list, with an annual allowance of six hundred and eighty-two 50-100 dollars ($682.50), calculated as under, the Treasury Board having reported accordingly.

Age, 38; service, fifteen years; average salary, past three years, $2,275 per annum; and that Mr. Balderson be granted leave of absence from the date of this Order in Council to the 1st July, 1897, the duties of the secretary of the department to be performed, during such absence, by the secretary of the Deputy Minister and Chief Engineer, without increase of salary.

This was done on account of the hon. gentleman's anxiety to get Mr. Balderson out of office. The duties of secretary of the department have to be performed in the absence of the secretary of the department by the secretary of the Deputy Minister and chief engineer, without increase of salary. But the authority on which I mainly rely is the hon. gentleman's own statement made half a dozen times to-day, that the office of secretary of the department has been abolished, and that a certain amount is thereby saved. The Estimates show the organization of the hon. gentleman's department. Is there any secretary provided? No. The office of secretary is left vacant and no provision is made. The hon. gentleman having abolished that office, I would like to know how the work of the department is to be conducted. During the absence of the secretary, before the office was abolished, the Minister could have appointed another person to perform the duties, but he could not do so after the office ceased, because it is only in the absence of the secretary or in the event of his inability to act that the Minister has power to appoint. The business of the department is, therefore, being carried on at this moment in violation of the law of the country. These important duties with which the secretary is charged under the law, cannot be performed by any person in the absence of a regularly appointed secretary as provided in this Act. Here is what the Act says :

The secretary of the department shall, unless otherwise directed in any case by the Minister, keep separate accounts of the moneys appropriated for, or expended on, each railway or canal under the management of the Minister ; he shall submit such accounts to be audited in such manner as is appointed by law, or by the Governor in Council ; he shall have charge of all plans, contracts, estimates, documents, titles, models and other like things relating to any such railway or canal ; he shall keep proper accounts with each contractor or other person employed by or under the department ; he shall see that all contracts are properly drawn out and executed ; he shall prepare all certificates upon which any certificate for the payment of money is to issue ; he shall keep minutes of all proceedings of the department ; he shall prepare reports and conduct, under the direction of the Minister, the correspondence of the department ; and, generally, he shall do and perform all such acts and things pertaining to the business of the department as he is, from time to time, directed by the Minister to do and perform.

Mr. Jones is a gentleman of high character, of excellent standing, and of great ability ; but Mr. Jones is the private secretary of the Deputy Minister, the secretary of the Chief Engineer of Railways, the secretary of the Chief Engineer of Canals, and of the Secretary for the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, and notwithstanding all his industry and all his ability, and I grant he has both, his time is more than occupied now in discharging these duties, without having the duties of Mr. Balderson thrust upon him. Any member of the House acquainted with that great department must know that. I do not hesitate to say, that the Minister of Railways took this course to get rid of a gentleman he did not want in the department, and the mode in which he has done it, is alike discreditable to himself and damaging to the public service of Canada.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I have not said anything against the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper), nor have I paid much attention to what he has said during the present session, and I do not see why he should have picked me out, in the midst of a debate, to criticise me. To-day in Canada we are looking to the great future, and we are not particularly interested in what the hon. gentleman may have done in the past. He and his generation are things of the past. When I chose to speak to the Minister of Railways on a private matter, it is extremely rude of him to call attention to me before the House, when I was really doing nothing that could affect him in any way. To listen, day after day to this continual wretched criticism about some one who has been dismissed, or superannuated, makes me think that I have been sent to Parliament for nothing else than to defend civil servants whose services the Government have dispensed with. Is the country to be taxed for gaslight and electricity, to hear such petty things as this? If the hon. member (Sir Charles Tupper) did himself justice he would have left me alone. I am aware that in the past I have called down his criticism, but I am here to-night in defiance of him and his wishes. In olden days, he could crack the lash over me, because I had the honour to support him, if it was an honour, but to-day I will not permit him in this House to make such remarks about me, when I have not in any way given him cause to do so. If the hon. gentleman can tell us anything new and fresh, I will be only too glad to hear what he has to say. I respect men older than myself, but I say, that he is trespassing on the time of the House by repeating over and over again, references to this young man who drew $2,250 a year from the country, and who he claims has been so outraged. If Mr. Balderson's abilities are so great he can earn his living elsewhere. The hon. gentleman said that a slur was thrown upon Mr. Balderson, but what effect can that have, when he has a good character from the hon. Baronet from Cape Breton, who so lately, in Europe was hand and glove with the aristocracy—

An hon. MEMBER. You are going over there soon.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My time is coming and I shall apply my time to the best advantage. I shall try to get some lessons from my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper), because probably he can put me on the right lay over there. Mr. Balderson can point to the high character given him by a late Minister of the Crown, and it will no doubt be found useful to him in seeking other employments. The Minister of Railways does not say that he dispensed with Mr. Balderson for any other reason, than that it was not necessary to have him in the department, and there is no slur in that. I do think, that this House of Commons can occupy its time better, than by having members on the opposite side jumping up one after the other, to discuss little questions like this which the country is not interested in. Six hundred dollars a year for a young man of 38 years, will provide $30,000 insurance for his family at the time of his death. He has youth and ability, and he can get work elsewhere. But my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) lays down the doctrine, that all the men he and his Government have appointed to office are to remain there as long as they choose whether the Government of the day or whether the country wants them or not. He seems to think that the farmers and the taxpayers of this country should supply an extravagant superannuation allowance for young men who have ability and who are well able to work. The farmer when his time for work is past, and the officers in banks, and other people in private situations, do not become pensioners when they cease to occupy their positions. I am glad to see, Sir, that we are to have the superannuation Bill amended, and that the time will soon come when these officials who are well paid during their term of office, will have to provide for their families at their own expense, just the same as people in other walks of life have to do. I do trust that my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) will not again have occasion to castigate me.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear. I hope not.

Mr. DOMVILLE. The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear," but he will not be here for very long. He is going over to Europe—

Mr. HUGHES. Are you going together?

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend is too facetious. We have often heard of Major Sam, but we do not want to hear from him to-night. In due time we will hear from him; he may reply to me. But I was sorry to see the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) show such excitement. Why such excitement? Why lash himself into such a fury? One would think that somebody connected with him was hurt. The Minister of Railways and Canals, has not, I think, discharged any of the people the hon. member put in office. I saw the statement the other day that his connections were drawing at one time some $30,000 a year among them all. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals has not discharged any of them yet, although he might properly do so before he is done.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow me to tell him that if he were to search the county of Cumberland from end to end, he would only find one relative of mine drawing a salary to the extent of $200 a year. That is the only extent.

Mr. DOMVILLE. My hon. friend has confined himself to Cumberland. I was not confining myself to Cumberland at all. But let that go; it is not neither here nor there. But I hope the hon. member for Cape Breton will call attention to me whenever he thinks it necessary, and I will undertake to call attention to him in a way that he would prefer I did not. I have not been connected with this House for twenty-five years for nothing. I have been very civil since I have been here this session, but if necessary I can make myself just as unpleasant to the hon. member for Cape Breton as he wanted to make himself to me to-night.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I desire, Mr. Chairman, at all times to treat the hon. member for Cape Breton (Sir Charles Tupper) with the respect which befits his position and his advanced years; but I am bound to say to him that he will be making a very large draft on my forbearance if he thinks it necessary to insult any gentleman in this House who happens to be for the moment, while he is speaking, engaged in conversation with me, or who ventures, while he is enlightening Parliament, to ask my ear for a moment. Now, I have said nothing, and I do not desire to say anything, which will be at all disrespectful to the hon. gentleman. I want to assure him that while he was addressing this committee with such heat a few moments ago, I was following him with the utmost attention. I was submitting myself to him, so that, if it were possible for him to arouse a shade of feeling, I might be made the subject of that feeling. I wanted the hon. gentleman to stir me up a little. But I am bound to confess to him, with all frankness, that the fuss and fury which he has exhibited to-night for the hundredth time has entirely failed of its purpose. I have heard this over and over again until it has become absolutely nauseating. I am only a new member in this Parliament, but I would have thought that the hon. member who has filled a conspicuous place in the public eye, who has, no doubt, for a long term of years been connected with important events in the history of this country, would have been able to rise above this incessant and perpetual talk on the subject of dismissals. When the hon. gentleman does speak, he always indulges in superlatives. There is nothing ordinary for him. No event on which he is remarking is of a commonplace character. It is of the gravest importance, of the utmost significance, of the profoundest interest, until we find ourselves soaring away above everybody's comprehension, and we are lost in the immensity of the subject engaging the hon. gentleman's attention. Now, I submitted myself to the hon. gentleman's influence with every desire to get under that influence, and I entirely failed.

One or two things the hon. gentleman did say which I think it only fair to remark upon. He insisted on assuring this committee that I had said, not once, but many times, that this office was abolished. I told the hon. gentleman that I had made no such statement. I did make no such statement. I think I did say once, but I immediately corrected myself, as "Hansard" will show—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statement is made in the Estimates which you put on the Table.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman made the statement, and I think he ought frankly to abide by it, and let me answer the statement just as he made it. He repeated over and over again, notwithstanding my denial, that I had deceived and misled the committee, by telling them that I had abolished the office. I say, and say it confidently, that I made no such statement. I believe I did inadvertently make the remark, but I immediately followed it up by saying that I had rather abolished the officer; I abolished Mr. Balderson.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman tell the Governor General, when he got his sanction, that he was abolishing the officer and not the office?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman wants to know, I had no conversation with the Governor General and told him nothing. All that the Governor General was told has been told to the hon. gentleman in the paper he has in his possession, and that paper does not state that the office was abolished or that it purported to abolish the office. I happen to know enough—and if I did not know, others associated with me in the Government knew enough—to say that we could not abolish the office, because the office is created by law, and can only be abolished by law. We do not need the hon. gentleman to tell us that. Profound and vast as is his knowledge on all subjects, he does not know that particular fact any better than the present Minister of Railways and Canals or the Government—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman, then, explain to the committee—

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. If the hon. gentleman will have one moment's patience, I will explain.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not wonder that the hon. gentleman does not wish to be interrupted.

Mr. BLAIR.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I do not understand why the hon. gentleman gets so furious over these trifling matters. I thought he would have been large enough to handle small subjects in a manner appropriate to them; but, instead of that, he wants to discharge artillery at every fly he sees. Nothing will do him but "most profound," "of the greatest importance," "extreme gravity," "tremendous interest," as though the pillars of the constitution were coming down when any little thing occurs that does not happen to meet with his entire approbation. Now, I suggest to him that all this sound, this fury, this indignation, this wrath is simply thrown away. I do not know whether it affects any of the gentlemen associated with him; but it does not make a particle of impression on the minds of any of those on this side of the House. Let him take my word for it, he has been battering away in this fashion for so many years that the subject has become weary, stale, flat and unprofitable. The whole manner of it has become unprofitable, and has certainly lost interest even to a small fragment in the country. Let him come down to the level of ordinary life, and discuss things of ordinary size as rational men would discuss them, and he will find that what he desires to go to the country will have much greater interest than it has when delivered in the manner in which the hon. gentleman delivers himself on such questions. Now, I claim that the hon. gentleman misrepresented me and that I did not state what he has more than once attributed to me. We do not pretend to abolish the office for the very simple reason that we have no power to abolish it. But we have power to abolish the officer, we have power to do away with an unnecessary officer. The hon. gentleman tells us about the magnitude of the duties which were imposed upon the secretary of the Railway Committee in his day. Well, if he has given us anything like an accurate statement of the condition of affairs in the office in his day, I can only assure him that things must have entirely changed. I can assure him that it would put me to very serious difficulty to tell what were the actual duties which were discharged by the secretary of the Railway Committee further than the formal, the official, the largely mechanical duties which we know the law enforced upon him. While I have not said anything, and while I do not intend to say anything in the slightest degree reflecting upon the gentleman who filled that office, Mr. Balderson, I am justified in saying that the duties which did devolve upon him and which he did discharge were not such as to make any very serious drafts upon his time or of such a character that they could not be adequately and efficiently performed by Mr. Jones, and I have the opinion and the report and judgment of the Deputy Minister in favour of the course I have taken. The Deputy Minister advised me that, in making reforms in the department and reducing the cost of administering it, it was a proper and convenient and most reasonable thing to do to dispense with the secretary of the Railway Committee, and hand over the duties of that office to some other officer in the department.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman lay that report on the Table.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. What report?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The report of the Deputy Minister advising that the office of secretary should be abolished.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman, I suppose, will say to-morrow that I stated that the Deputy Minister had made a report to me in writing?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. I have not stated whether he did or not give a written report. It would be time enough to ask me to lay the written report on the Table when the hon. gentleman learns that such a report has been received. I do not say that it has or has not. It is quite open to me to have conversations with my deputy and to take his opinion in the ordinary conversational way, if I choose. I am entitled to do it and may act upon an opinion so given, if I choose, and will continue to take such means of ascertaining the opinion of or obtaining information from the officers of my department, in a conversational manner or otherwise, and confidentially, or otherwise, as may commend itself to my judgment. Now, the hon. gentleman is exceedingly anxious, he has made a great discovery, he has discovered that there is something irregular in these Estimates, he has discovered that we have made no provision whatever for a secretary of the department, and that therefore things are getting involved and chaos is bound to result. Let me set the hon. gentleman's mind at rest, because I would not have him leave the House in the state of uncertainty and anxiety which would be likely to ensue if the facts were not fully understood by him. Immediately upon Mr. Balderson ceasing to be secretary of the department, an Order in Council was passed appointing Mr. Jones secretary of the Railway Department, so that there is no such chaotic condition existing in the department as the hon. gentleman would have us believe there is. There may be some grave anomaly in the appointment, there may be some serious objection to Mr. Jones becoming secretary of the Railway Committee, but if there is I must confess I have not discovered it, and I can assure the hon. gentleman that no such objection has occurred for one moment to the mind of the Deputy Minister. We are therefore now labouring under the impression, although it may be a complete hallucination on our part, that there is no injury likely to ensue in the administration of the department because we have added the duties of secretary of the department to those which have been hitherto performed by Mr. Jones.

Now, I pass to another charge made by the hon. gentleman. We are assured, and solemnly assured, by him that there is something misleading, something highly misleading in these Estimates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman says "Hear, hear." He is entitled to the credit of having made a discovery; he has actually found a mare's nest at last. He has found that we are deceiving Parliament by the manner in which our Estimates are presented. What is the cause of his indignation? It is that we are not asking Parliament to vote any salary for the secretary of the Railway Department. But is there not a very good reason for our not doing that? I apprehend there is. The reason why we have not any salary in these Estimates opposite the title of office of secretary is because we are not going to pay him any salary. Why should we put in a salary when we do not intend to pay him any? Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain to me where this marvellous error comes in when we are assigning the duties of the secretary of the department to another gentleman in the office and are paying him for the duties which he performs in connection with both offices the salary he formerly received for one. It is to me an utter impossibility to see how I can be guilty of misleading the House in any respect in the Estimates which I have brought down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat paid himself a very poor compliment, but I do not feel disposed at all, after the weak and laboured effort which he has made to defend an indefensible cause, to question his judgment. He found that we were using very heavy artillery to kill a fly, and I think the hon. gentleman has depicted himself in terms not at all flattering to himself. The hon. gentleman says that I have made a discovery. Well, I tell the hon. gentleman this, I have been a member of this House for a good many years, and it has always been the practice in making up Estimates, when an office has been abolished, to put in italics, just as the hon. gentleman has done, the title of the office and leave blank where the salary comes in. The italics are used for the purpose of drawing the attention of the House to the fact that the office has been abolished and the salary saved. I am in the judgment of gentlemen on both sides as to whether that has not been the invariable practice. But what do you find here? You find the office of secretary and chief clerk, which Mr. Balderson held, put in italics, and you find the salary for the last year in the column for 1896-97 and none in the column for 1897-98.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. We do not intend to pay him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In his re-organization of the department, the hon. gentleman has left out the secretary altogether. He admits that the law compels him to have a secretary and that he cannot carry on the business of the department without one, and yet there is no secretary in the organization of his department, and he led the House to believe that he had made arrangements by which the chief clerk was to perform these services that formerly devolved upon the secretary. The Act which detailed elaborately the duties to be performed by the secretary. The hon. gentleman undertakes to tell us that the duties of the private secretary of the Deputy Minister, the private secretary of the Chief Engineer of Railways, the private secretary of the Chief Engineer of Canals, the private secretary of the Secretary to the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, are all to be performed by this gentleman who has been holding the position of private secretary to the Deputy Minister. No person in this House or out of it who has the slightest conception of the immense transactions of the Department of Railways and Canals can fail to understand the importance of having a high officer like the secretary of the department to overlook and supervise all that portion of the official duties that were assigned to that office. But the hon. gentleman proposes to have all this transferred to the private secretary of the Deputy Minister, who, instead of, as under the law, reporting to an independent officer, the secretary of the department, who is the medium of communication between the Minister and his officers, is to report to the Minister's private secretary. I have no hesitation in saying that nothing approaching this has ever been announced in this House in reference to the management of any department whatever. Now the hon. gentleman says that he has "abolished the officer." That is exactly it, Sir, that is the whole story. And the only way he could "abolish the officer," was to put this scheme forward of transferring duties of the utmost importance to a private secretary who, in the work he has to do as private secretary to the Deputy Minister, has quite sufficient to occupy all his time. Why, Sir, does not the hon. gentleman know the duties that were assigned to the secretary of the department? What were they? The secretary was to have charge of the law clerks and clerks, the accountant and clerks, the correspondence clerks, the record room clerks, the mailing and stationery clerks, the copying clerks, and messengers. The entire administration and management of that important department were all under the secretary, the chief engineer having charge of official duties on the other side. On the technical subjects connected with the engineering department, railways and canals, bridges, hydraulic works, &c.—all the technical officers were under the control of the chief engineer, while the others were under the control of the secretary. It is now pretended to assign all these who were formerly under the control of the secretary to a gentleman who is private secretary to the Deputy Minister. I have no hesitation in saying that the ablest man you can find can fill every hour of the time usually devoted to the public service and many more to the discharge of his duties as secretary of the Minister and chief engineer of canals. I speak with thorough knowledge of the subject. I am quite sure that the committee will feel that this is a most lame and impotent statement which is put forward by the Minister in defence of what is admitted to have been his aim and object, and what he has succeeded in accomplishing, and that is, not abolishing the office, as he said, but of "abolishing the officer." Ay, Sir, there's the rub. There is the real intent. If the hon. gentleman thought Mr. Balderson was too able, too astute, too capable a man for him to have in his department, if he wanted to get rid of him, why did he not, knowing Mr. Balderson's high character and standing before he came into the service and during his eighteen years of service here, transfer him to some other department and secure some one else who would suit his mode of transacting public business better? The hon. gentleman said he had a report from Mr. Schreiber. I took it for granted that on such a question of reconstructing a public department and removing an officer charged with most important functions, there must have been a written report. I never dreamed that the mode of conducting public business under his administration had fallen so low that grave matters of this kind were treated as of so little importance as to be based upon mere conversation instead of being fortified with the report of his chief engineer. Surely the hon. gentleman knows that in his department there is a memorandum for the guidance of the secretary pointing out what he is to do. The secretary is to have a general supervision of the corresponding clerks, the law clerks, the clerk of the Railway Committee, the recording clerks, the accounting clerks, the mail and stationery clerks, and the messengers, and to see that they occupy the rooms allotted to them and no others. The hon. gentleman knows that every day in which an officer is absent from duty is to be noted in the attendant's book in red ink, stating the reasons for his absence, whether on leave, through sickness or otherwise. He knows that all inward correspondence is to be sent to the Deputy Minister as soon as marked and registered in order that he may note action to be taken thereon. The secretary's duty is to receive and open all this correspondence, all this mass of correspondence that comes from every part of this wide Dominion, note it, enter it, and have it sent to the Deputy Minister for the action to be taken upon it. All outward correspondence is to be sent to the Deputy Minister before being signed and despatched. All the correspondence he maintains with the important officials and public officers all over this Dominion is to be prepared by the secretary and sent to the Deputy Minister before being signed and despatched. All reports of Council are to be sent to the Deputy Minister for examination before being presented to the Minister for signature. A most important part of the secretary's duty is to prepare these reports to Council. All contracts—and I draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this little matter that comes in at the end, and it is not a very unimportant one—all contracts are to be sent to the Deputy Minister to lay before the Minister for execution. All these multitudinous duties, all this labour that occupies the most constant attention, not only through the office hours of the day, but far into the night, under Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, under my own, and under the administration of those who succeeded me—all these duties which were performed by the secretary are swept aside by the hand of the hon. gentleman whose only ambition was to "abolish the officer."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Now, the hon. gentleman commenced his observations to-night by a statement that I fully believe explains the reason why he regards the question of dismissals from office as a trivial one. The hon. gentleman, in the plenitude of his importance, during last session, got his friends into great trouble by a declaration that, so far as workmen were concerned, who were mere employees, and not regular officials, he had not time to look into their case, and he proposed to send them about their business whenever a hungry office-seeker, either the member for the county or a defeated candidate, claimed the place for one of his friends. That was the statement that the hon. gentleman made last session. It was a statement that he was obliged materially to qualify, but which, I believe, he has carried out to the letter. I believe the hon. gentleman treats every official in this country holding a position below that of a Minister of the Crown, as utterly insignificant in importance, too small a matter to occupy the attention of this House, or of any person in this country. I undertake to tell the hon. gentleman that he will meet with a rude awakening; I undertake to tell him that this contemptuous attitude which he has assumed towards the public officials of this country, will be fully recognized by the intelligent people of Canada, and that a time of reckoning will come when he will feel that, instead of strengthening his own hands or the Administration of which he is a member, he was cutting the ground from under their feet and placing them in the most ignoble and unenviable position. The hon. gentleman may feel that it is a small matter to take the bread out of a poor man's mouth, as he says he is prepared to do, whenever any hungry office-seeker comes to him and says he has a friend that he wants to put in his place—for that is the declaration that the hon. gentleman has made. Not only is the hon. gentleman treating in this manner every employee in the public service, from the humblest to the highest, but he is going to treat all their claims as utterly unworthy the slightest consideration at the hands of this great magnate, who, having been raised to a much higher position than he has ever been accustomed to occupy before in his life,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPER. Yes, I say that the hon. gentleman is clothed with an amount of power, an amount of influence, and has the destinies of thousands of people placed in the hollow of his hand to-day, which gives him a position that he never occupied before, or anything analagous to it, and which seems to have completely turned the hon. gentleman's head.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, turned the hon. gentleman's head, and led him to stand up in this House and treat with utter contempt the claims of the operatives of this country to the bread they were honestly earning in the public service. Now he intends to carry that principle into the ranks of the highest officials. Sir, I repeat that a more damaging blow has never been struck at the character of the public service of this country. This case is one that will not bear the light of day being let in upon it for one single moment. He has in this way got rid of an able officer of high character, he himself has vouched for his ability and his standing, and the mode in which he performed his duties. And yet be it remembered that this man was brought into the public service, he did not seek it, but he was himself sought by a gentleman of the high position of the Auditor General; and, in driving him out of the service in this way, the hon. gentleman has struck a blow at the character of the public service that is not easy to overrate. Sir, this discussion will go forth through the country, and the country will form its own judgment on the arraignment of the hon. gentleman here to-day, and the utterly inefficient manner in which he was able to meet it, and the humiliating position in which he has been placed by his inability to meet the charges that have been brought against him.

Mr. DAVIN. I think the Minister of Railways will admit that the real question before this House, and, I humbly submit, before this country, is whether he has fairly, to use the language of this clause, compensated Mr. Balderson. I have been one of those who have been opposed to superannuations. I was opposed to superannuations long before the matter was taken up by the late Government; and this Government, in taking it up, is only following in the wake of the late Government. Therefore, I am not speaking to-night in favour of giving excessive superannuation to any Government official whose services may be dispensed with. But the question raised now is, whether the Government has carried out the intention of this clause. I listened to both speeches of the Minister of Railways, and I must say that he avoided the real question with great skill. I differ slightly from the view taken by the hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill); and I was not able to hear the speech of the hon. member for Pictou. But I may say, with reference to some of the remarks that have been made, that the question seems to me to be very important, whether the Minister of Railways has carried out the intention of this clause. In my view, this is really a question of interpretation. I want to look at this matter as a lawyer. I want to consider the interpretation of this statute. Here we have a number of instances, prior to this clause, under which superannuation may be given, and then comes the clause which provides for the case of a man being superannuated and sent out of the service under these circumstances:

If any person to whom this Act applies, is removed from office in consequence of the abolition of his office for the purpose of improving the organization of the department to which he belongs, or is removed or retired from office to promote the efficiency or economy in the civil service,—

Well, palpably, this case of the removal of Mr. Balderson comes under one of these heads. He is not removed because he is incompetent or because of any blemish in his conduct. The Minister of Railways tells us expressly that he does not come under any other clause but this 11th clause.

—the Governor in Council may grant him such gratuity or superannuation allowance as will fairly compensate him for his loss of office, not exceeding such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or of mind, after adding ten years to his actual term of service.

Now, I could not agree with the way the Minister of Railways dove-tailed the ten years on to the earlier part of the clause. This clause is a charter for the civil servant, and it is also a guarantee for the public. It is a charter for the civil servant, because it provides that, if his career is broken, if the Minister takes a man who has entered on a career and is in full vigour of life, and breaks his career, tells him, You must go out of the public service, this clause is a charter for that man that he should be treated in a certain way. On the other hand, there is also a guarantee to the public that under the circumstances a Minister or a Government will not err on the side of generosity. The Government is prevented from giving him more than could be given to a man who, after the same term of service, left the service because of age or infirmity, with ten years superadded. I will not go the length of saying that you may not put what I hold would be a strained interpretation on the clause, and say that this is the maximum that is allowed by it, but it is optional with the Government to go beneath it. I will not say that that could not be contended, but I hold that is not the natural construction of the clause. I have been glancing over some cases that would bear on this point, and I say here, speaking in the presence of lawyers whose opinions on subjects of this kind are entitled to a weight that I would not be prepared to ask the House to attach to any utterance of my own, that if a man sent out of the public service under the conditions prescribed in this clause, were to have his case go before a court, that court would inevitably, in my opinion, decide that the fair compensation to make him for his loss of office would be a sum not to exceed such as he would have been entitled to if he had retired in consequence of permanent infirmity of body or mind, after adding ten years to the actual term of service. Where the Minister of Railways and Canals failed in his earlier speech—in his later speech he did not touch the point—was when after touching on the matter briefly, he proceeded to take up this position: He took the amount of superannuation granted to this gentleman, for whom I do not profess to speak, for I am not advocating the cause of Mr. Balderson, and the cause I am advocating I will presently state, and the hon. gentleman said that in his judgment the amount given to Mr. Balderson was sufficient. But he does not give us the grounds on which his opinion was formed. The hon. gentleman also made some reference to charity, and I really thought he was not quite just to himself, or to this clause of the Act, or to the House or to the country. We have had to-night remarks made by an hon. friend of mine, who I think is not now in the House, in which he seemed to think that the question whether or not a clerk in the public service was justly dealt with or not was wholly beneath the dignity of this House, was a matter of so trivial a character that hon. members should not consume gas or electric light in order to consider it, or waste his precious time, or make any extravagant claim on his attention. That is not the view I take, it is not a doctrine in accordance with British law or British institutions that obtain in this Empire, or in that august Parliament whence we draw our example and our inspiration. The most humble individual in this country if wronged by any man, no matter how highly placed, has a right to be heard. The question whether he has been wronged or not is a question of ample importance to occupy our time, and in no fitter occupation could this Parliament of Canada be engaged than that of inquiring whether or not that man was wronged. I know very well that throughout the country there is a diffused opinion against superannuation. I share that opinion myself. But I do not believe that among the people of this country you will find any percentage, who, while they wish to get rid of what is confessedly a bad system—a bad system at least as most of us think, and at all events those who think with me in regard to the matter—would wish to strike an unjust or unfair blow at any individual. I speak here now not for Mr. Balderson, I speak for something much more important—I speak for the justice of Parliament. I speak for the justice that is in the bosom of the Canadian people, and I say that while I respect the great ability of the Minister of Railways and Canals, and while I listened with all the deference that is due to the distinction of his office and to his own personal distinction, I think the hon. gentleman fell short of attaching that importance which the people will attach to the question whether justice has been done. I will in this connection make an appeal to the hon. Minister. I say that with a clause like that in the Act—it is true we have one distinguished lawyer saying it is not well drafted, and confessedly there is a difference of opinion as to its interpretation, although I do not share the doubt as to its interpretation—the Minister will do injustice to himself, to Parliament and to the people of Canada, and injustice to morality if he will not say that a fiat shall issue so that this question may be tried, whether or not the hon. gentleman did what this statute says shall be done, fairly compensate this young man. I do not plead for the man—I am not pleading for him now; but I say it is most important that the impression should not go abroad, an impression that may be shared by people outside of partisan feelings, that a Minister has done a kind of underhand injustice to one of his officers. I do not say the hon. gentleman has done so, I am guarding myself in that respect; I am not saying that the Minister of Railways and Canals has wilfully done any injustice to this young man. I am going to give him credit with having fairly weighed the situation, and that in the terms of the Order in Council he thought he was doing what was right and fulfilling whatever behest was contained in that clause of the Act. But with the diverse opinions, apart from all partisanship in regard to what he has done, it is the hon. gentleman's duty to see that a fiat issue, and that the question goes before the Exchequer Court to decide whether or not the Government have fairly compensated this young man. Although I have not risen in the interest of Mr. Balderson, and although I have risen in a higher, larger and greater interest than that of any individual, let me say this in regard to him. I hardly know him; I have met him once or twice in the Department of Railways and Canals when I have gone there on business, and I have also met him as secretary of the late Minister of Railways and Canals when he was Postmaster General. He is going on to middle age, and the Minister of Railways confesses, what Mr. Balderson's career bears out, that he is a man of ability. He is a man that could have shone in a professional career. Can any one reasonably contend, that if in the middle of a man's life like that, you take the career to which he has devoted himself and you snap it in twain, that you have not done that man a great wrong, and that you are in a position to put your hands in your pocket and say: You are a young man, you are a man of great ability, you can go into something else, or you can go abroad. Is it so easy a thing to commence a new career? Is it so easy a thing, above all, to commence a career, on the part of a man who has been in the public service for years, when we know well, that it has become an axiom in regard to men who have spent 12 or 15 years in the Civil Service of England or here, that it unfits them for wrestling in the other walks of life. Clearly, here it is a pure question of compensation, and I say that the proper way is to take the course which will secure that the provisions of this clause shall be measured out impartially and with even-handed justice to this young man.

I want to say a word, before I sit down, in regard to a remark that was made respecting the leader of the Opposition. My hon. and gallant friend (Mr. Donville) complained, that there was something stale and old in what the hon. the leader of the Opposition gave the House; and the hon. the Minister of Railways said—I took down his words—that, they had been listening to what the hon. member for Cape Breton had said about this man Balderson for so many years, that it was stale, flat, and unprofitable. Sir, I thought that this matter about Balderson had only come up recently. I thought the dismissal had taken place only the other day; but any way, it is only a small slip, and I shall not dwell upon it.

What I want to point out is this: That the opinions that up to a few months ago were the opinions that had been advocated by the leader of the Opposition; these opinions that he had in England and elsewhere advocated with his great energy, an energy that was felt in England and was felt in Canada; these opinions, and these banners, and these watchwords, have been taken by you opposite there, and the Minister of Railways, and the Prime Minister, and the rest of you, are boasting of these opinions to-day. The only new thing proposed to this House, and the main new thing that will be agitated in this country in the immediate future, has been proposed by the leader of the Opposition this session. These men opposite got up and talked of the leader of the Opposition, in a way that I thought was almost indecent; and yet the only new thing that has been proposed in this Parliament, is the new departure in favour of manhood suffrage, and that has been proposed by the leader of the Opposition. And Sir, in that respect the leader of the Opposition has been consistent with his great past, because he has been in the forefront of every new movement and at the top of every climbing wave, from the first time he entered public life. When I saw the hon. and gallant member (Mr. Domville), who is not in the House now, who had been a follower of the leader of the Opposition, and who had received many courtesies and kindnesses from him, when I saw that gentleman cast a slur on the hon. member for Cape Breton, merely because he is a man in his 77th year, my thoughts recurred to other times and other events. Sir, I have seen Lord Palmerston in his 80th year, still the grand old Palm, leading the great Liberal party of England, and his name was a terror to the enemies of the Empire the world over. And, do not suppose for one minute, that the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) merely because the hand of 77 years is upon him, has lost any of the brightness of his intellect, or the vigour of his undaunted and fighting spirit. If there was even a sign of age upon that grand old man I would say:

Fear not: 'tis but a passing spasm; the Titan is unconquered still.

When I saw a man, who had received many a time and oft, favours from the leader of the Opposition, strike at him, merely because in the opinion of that gallant gentleman he was old—why, Sir, the man who did it is an older man than the leader of the Opposition; he has not as many years but he is practically an older man. When I remember, what I knew to be a fact, that from my late illustrious leader (Sir John Macdonald), and also from my present leader (Sir Charles Tupper), that young-old-gentleman from King's or whatever else he is, had received many favours, I could not help thinking of the lines of Moore:

Yes, fed every day (and this makes it a dark case)
With the choicest of sops from the lion's own pan,

He lifts up his leg at the noble beast's carcass,
And does all a dog so diminutive can.

It was an unworthy cause for the hon. gentleman (Mr. Domville) to make, because, if we gave honours and decorations for political services, the breast of the leader of the

Mr. DAVIN.

Opposition would be covered with stars. I have no desire in any way to minimize the claims on the country of the hon. gentlemen opposite, but they must bear this in mind, that if service in department, and service in this House, and turning away their attention from their private business, gives them a claim on Canada—and it properly gives them a claim, for I know that there are men in that Ministry and men in the Liberal party who have made great sacrifices for Canada—if they thereby have a claim upon the consideration of Canada, as they have, surely there must be great claims centering in the present leader of the Opposition. It was an unworthy spectacle for the honourable and gallant gentleman (Mr. Domville) to make the display that he made. I felt, Sir, that I could not sit down without making these few remarks on that incident.

The Minister of Railways and Canals is a lawyer, and I have no doubt he has given consideration to that clause. I assure him that I am not speaking from the standpoint of a partisan but from the standpoint of a citizen of Canada, and in the interests of justice, and in the interests of the dignity that should attach to the way our affairs are conducted in this House, and speaking as such, I say, that there is an appearance of the too-clever-by-half about the way that Mr. Balderson has been got rid of. I say that the compensation to which he is entitled, is a compensation that should be measured by an equitable interpretation of that clause, and that the equitable interpretation of that clause should be declared by an impartial court.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not intend to delay the committee more than a moment after the very brilliant, eloquent and logical speech which we have had from my hon. friend (Mr. Davin); but I would like to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals to be kind enough to turn for one moment to clause 3 of the Act. He will find there that:

The Governor in Council may grant to any person who has served in an established capacity in the civil service for ten years or upwards, and who has attained the age of sixty years, or is incapacitated by bodily infirmity from properly performing his duties, a superannuation allowance calculated on his average yearly salary during the then last three years, and not exceeding the following rates.

That is the compensation which is to be given to the civil servant who is incapacitated by bodily infirmity. Now, if my hon. friend will turn to the 11th clause, he will find that it deals with something entirely different. It deals, not with the case of a man who is incapacitated, but with the case of a man who is ready and willing and able to continue to perform the duties of his office, and who has had (as my hon. friend has expressed it so graphically), his career broken by the Government in the interest of the country. Surely no reasonable man will suggest that the compensation which is to be given in the latter case should equitably be only equal to the compensation given in the former case. The Act deals with the two cases on a perfectly different basis, and it says that there shall be something more done for the man who has had his career broken. It follows very much the line which had been adopted in the mother country, but a very few years before in the Irish Land Bill of 1880 or 1881, when compensation was given to the tenant for disturbance. Even a tenant from year to year was compensated for disturbance, and the tenant was entitled to a lump sum equal to many years rent of the farm. Following the same principle, the framers of this Act have held that the vested right of the civil servant being interfered with, he is entitled to a certain compensation for disturbance; that is to say, ten years are to be computed and added to his service before his case is dealt with in the same way as you would deal with the case of a man who was obliged by misfortune to leave the service. It is utterly impossible for any reasonable and fair-minded man to say that the two cases should be dealt with in the same way, and the Act deals with them in perfectly different ways.

Mr. HAGGART. Before the resolution is adopted I have a few remarks to make in reference to the clause which has been so ably discussed by my two hon. friends who have preceded me. The hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) adopted the 'tu quoque' argument in reference to the interpretation of the clause 11 which has been so much discussed. He stated that no matter what interpretation lawyers might put upon the clause, the interpretation put upon it by the late Government was entirely different. I was astonished at the hon. gentleman making that statement, because, having been in the Government for a long time, I did not remember a case in which any such occurrence ever happened; and when the hon. gentleman quoted from a return to the House of the superannuation retiring allowance, I thought I surely had been mistaken as to what the late Government's view of the law was. First of all, he quoted the superannuation of Mr. Tanguay, and said he had been receiving a salary of $1,400, that his office had been abolished, and that he received a superannuation allowance of $784. The hon. gentleman never read "age and abolition of office." He never read to the House the return as it was placed on the Table of the House. There was no other possible manner in which the Government could deal with the case.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did the fact of the man's age prevent your carrying out the Act, and adding ten years to his time of service?

Mr. HAGGART. We had the right under the age clause to add ten years to his time of service; but the clause of the Act providing for superannuation for age, directs that he shall receive a certain allowance, and he received that allowance. What was the age of the gentleman who was superannuated? Seventy-three years. The hon. gentleman quoted another case, that of a Mr. Gardiner, immigration agent at St. John. What was his age? 'Seventy-nine years; cause of superannuation, abolition of office.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was any addition made to his time of service?

Mr. HAGGART. No, he came within the qualifications required by the Act. It provides what the superannuation shall be over the age of sixty years. The third case mentioned by the hon. gentleman was that of Mr. David. At the time of his superannuation he had been thirty-two and a half years in the Government service, and so only two and a half years could be added to his time, as thirty-five years is the utmost time under the Act for which an allowance can be given. So that the hon. gentleman's 'tu quoque' argument based on these cases does not amount to anything. The first gentleman was superannuated on account of age and abolition of office, the second I have no doubt, on account of age, and the third had two and a half years added to his service to entitle him to the utmost superannuation the law allows. A few minutes ago I asked the hon. Minister of Railways if he would be kind enough, under the circumstances, to grant a fiat under which the gentleman interested might bring his case before the courts. The hon. gentleman said that if a petition were sent to him, he would take it into his consideration. I do not know what technical meaning he may put upon the Act. But does he not know that when that Act was before the House, the then leader of the Opposition, the Hon. Edward Blake, took the view that any man in this country, whoever he was, had as much right to sue the Crown, following the precedent set in Great Britain, as any individual in the country, and that the application for a fiat was only a very prefunctory matter. These hon. gentlemen, in their mightiness, however, have given a different interpretation to the Act. The view was ably supported by the then leader of the Opposition, Mr. Blake, that any man who thought he had a claim against the Government of this country or Her Majesty, had as much right to go into court and bring an action as he would have in the case of a claim against a private individual. But now, forsooth, he has to petition His Mightiness the Minister of Railways and Canals for the liberty to bring an action, who will take it into his serious consideration whether he shall grant the petition or not. Now, what are the reasons assigned by the hon. Minister for the abolition of this office? Here are the words he has put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General, and I ask whether these words give a correct statement of the facts or not:

That, to promote economy in the public service, Mr. John Balderson, secretary of the Department of Railways and Canals, be, from the 1st of July, 1897, placed upon the retired list, with an annual allowance of $682.50.

Was it for the economy of the public service that this was done? The hon. gentleman's words are contradicted by the estimates he has brought down to this House. By these estimates he asks a vote of $38,230 for carrying on his department during the next year. Is that an economy, adding to it the superannuation allowance to Mr. Balderson, compared with the expenses of the department for the last year? It is not. The amount which the hon. gentleman calls for this year, adding to it the superannuation allowance to Mr. Balderson, is as great as the expenditure of last year.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. No.

Mr. HAGGART. I have the information at my hand, and can give it to the hon. gentleman, if necessary. If necessary, I will read out the details for the benefit of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman says: Oh, it was for the purpose of economy that I got rid of this officer, and I did not do away with the office. I was of the opinion of the leader of the Opposition, that the hon. gentleman said that there was no necessity for the office. The hon. gentleman has corrected that, but I have weightier information at my hand here. In these estimates, he says that there is no necessity for the office. He knew that the statute provides that there shall be a secretary, he knew that a great many things done in his office, that a great many acts of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, unless certified by the secretary, would be illegal, so that there is absolute necessity for a secretary. The hon. gentleman saw the position he was in, and he said that he merely intended to superannuate the officer and did not intend to do away with the office or violate the statute at all. But the course which the hon. gentleman intended to pursue is predicted by the estimates he brought down; and if he intended to follow that course, he should have introduced into this House a Bill to alter the law of the country with regard to the Railway Department. He saw the position he was in, and, to protect himself, he said: Oh, no, the office of secretary is not to be abolished at all. I am going to give it to another person, and another person has been appointed acting secretary.

Mr. HAGGART.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. Not acting secretary, but secretary.

Mr. HAGGART. Secretary without salary. The Order in Council, which I have in my possession, and which was furnished by the Clerk of the Privy Council to Mr. Balderson, who had a perfect right to it, says:

The duties of secretary of the department to be performed, during such absence, by the secretary of the Deputy Minister and chief engineer, without increase of salary.

That does not come within the meaning of the Act. Was there an enforced leave of absence of the secretary? There is no word of it in the Order in Council. That order simply states that:

The secretary of the department be, and from the 1st of July next is, removed from his office.

What authority has the hon. Minister to appoint an acting secretary from now to the 1st of July? The only authority, under the Act, is contained in these words: "In the case of the absence of the secretary." But the secretary was not absent, he was there performing his duties. The statute says: "In the absence of the secretary or his inability to act." Those are the only two reasons which justify the Minister of Railways in appointing a temporary secretary. There is, I maintain, no absence of the secretary of the department. The hon. gentleman says he gave him leave until the 1st of July, and that the other party was appointed by Order in Council. The Order in Council does not say anything about leave. It says that Mr. Balderson be, and from the 1st of July is, placed upon the retired list. He is, therefore, secretary of the department until the 1st of July, 1897. Then, it says, "the duties of secretary of the department to be performed, during such absence, by the secretary of the Deputy Minister and Chief Engineer. But the hon. gentleman cannot appoint a secretary until the 1st of July, 1897.

The hon. gentleman put the words into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General that, in the interests of economy, he intended to dispense with the secretary of the department. As I have said, there is no economy in it. I challenge the hon. gentleman to rise in his place and show that there is $500 economy in it. The simple fact of the matter is this as the hon. Minister said himself. A gentleman who was in every way well qualified for the office, who was induced to leave the other walks of life for the purpose of entering the civil service, is, at the mere whim of the Minister of Railways and Canals, sent out into the world in defiance of the statute. The hon. gentleman said that he had seen the statute, that his attention had been drawn to it, and he intimated that the interpretation he put upon it should prevail over that put upon it by other parties who have not his intelligence and information, and that that should put an end to discussion. But I think the hon. gentleman has found out that there are other parties in the House who are just as intelligent and as capable of giving a legal construction to a statute as he is, and that there is ample room for difference of opinion. The hon. gentleman may be right, and I may be wrong, but there is certainly some justification for the position I have taken. At least, it is worthy of consideration, and the common justice which Mr. Blake, when leader of the Opposition, said was the basis of the amendment made in the law, under which, according to his interpretation, the fiat should be given, as a matter of course, to every one, no matter how humble, in the community, who thought he had a claim against the Government which should be adjudicated upon by the courts, should be extended to this man. The hon. Minister of Railways ought, at least, to have stated that the Government would act upon the interpretation given by the Hon. Mr. Blake, and that, as a matter of course, a fiat would be granted at once, on a petition being presented to the Governor General in Council by the party aggrieved. I have no particular friendship with the gentleman who was secretary of the department. He was my private secretary and he performed his duties as such faithfully and honestly. I believe him to be a capable and honest civil servant. I have no particular feeling in the matter one way or the other. But what I say is that no graver injustice was ever done, no greater blow was ever struck at the civil service of the country. And the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) states that the time of the House is being taken up by minor matters like this. The hon. gentleman seems to think that an act of injustice done to an individual in the community is not to be considered in this House, that the individual has no right in that respect because the amount is a trifling one, but more than the individual is injured in this case, for this affects the whole civil service. The information given to His Excellency the Governor General upon which he acted is unfounded. No economy is secured in this department by the dismissal of this officer. When His Excellency was induced to put his signature to this order of dismissal or superannuation, it was upon grounds which are not fair, upon grounds upon which my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), my hon. friend from Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) state were never contemplated by the Act. So that justice even under the Civil Service Act was not done to Mr. Balderson. No clearer wrong was ever done, no greater blow was ever struck at the civil service than the superannuation of this person upon the grounds stated in the Order in Council.

Mr. McMULLEN. I cannot allow the remarks of the ex-Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Haggart) to go unchallenged. The hon. gentleman's first address this afternoon was based upon the assumption that in the case of the removal of a civil servant ten years had to be added to his service if the office was abolished. I drew attention to four cases, which I marked and sent across to the hon. gentleman. He read three, and one he did not read, which is clearly on all fours with the case of Mr. Balderson. That is the case of A. Dingman, inspector of agencies in the Department of Indian Affairs, salary $1,800, served 13 years, age 68. I would like to know if age precludes the addition of ten years to the term of service. The hon. gentleman did not answer that. The statute does not say anything about it. This gentleman was superannuated for age and economy and abolition of office, and they gave him $468 retiring allowance and there was not a year added to his service. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, will challenge that statement. I will send the paper across to him again. This is a case clearly in point with that of Mr. Balderson.

Mr. HAGGART. Is the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) not aware that Mr. Dingman petitioned for superannuation?

Mr. McMULLEN. The return says that he was superannuated and his office abolished.

Mr. HAGGART. And he petitioned for superannuation.

Mr. McMULLEN. It does not say so. You abolish his office after he had served 13 years, and you add nothing to his time. Does the hon. gentleman want to see it again; I will send it across to him.

Mr. HAGGART. Why, in this very paper the hon. gentleman refers to age is stated as the reason for superannuation, the same as in the other case.

Mr. McMULLEN. No.

Mr. HAGGART. Yes, it is. Here is the case—A. Dingman, inspector of agencies, and reasons for superannuation are: "age, economy and abolition of office."

Mr. McMULLEN. Does the statute provide that owing to a man's age, years are not to be added to his time of service if his office is abolished?

The Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, including $1,900 to F. K. Bennetts, $1,600 to S. Lelievre, $1,100 to F. Chadwick, $800 to G. G. Kezar, $700 to H. W. Lothrop and $500 to L. Burns, which may be paid, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Civil Service Act..... $29,700

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). When I took possession of the office, after having looked into it, I came to the conclusion that the work could be done with a much reduced force, and, after having consulted the deputy head upon this point, the views which I had formed were confirmed. The office has been reorganized in a way which I shall now explain. The deputy head remains as before, so also do the chief clerk and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Among the first class clerks there is a change. There are still to be three first class clerks; but one of those in the office when I entered it, Captain Lee, is to be superannuated. Mr. Bennetts, who was in the service gets an increase of $200. Mr. Lelièvre is to be promoted from the second class to the first class. The reason why I made this promotion is because I found it impossible to carry on the business with a single private secretary, and I have to have the service of another man. Having a great deal of correspondence in both French and English, I found that my secretary, though a very competent man, could not overtake the work. I selected Mr. Lelièvre who was in the office, and, as he has had considerable work added to his ordinary duties, I decided to give him the promotion. In the second class clerks, there has been a promotion, that of Mr. Lelièvre, and there will be two additions. There is a promotion from the third class to the second, that is of Mr. Chadwick, who was in the third class at a salary of $900 and who is now to receive $1,100. There is to be an appointment in the person of Mr. Boudreau, who has been acting as my private secretary. In the third class clerks there is a diminution of four. One, Mr. DeBrisay has been transferred to the Public Works Department, and Mr. de Lanaudière, Mr. Lefebvre, and Mr. Bliss will be superannuated. Mr. Kezar will receive an increase of salary of $150 a year, and Mr. Lothrop the same. In the messengers' branch, Mr. Burke, who was an old messenger, will receive an increase of $150, making the new salary $500. The staff to-day, then, will be composed, after these changes, with this difference from what it was when I took possession of the office. Mr. Payne has been transferred to the Railway Department, and Mr. Campbell has been brought into the place of Mr. Payne. Captain Lee is to be superannuated; Mr. de Lanaudière is to be superannuated; Mr. Lefebvre is to be superannuated; Mr. Bliss is to be superannuated, and Mr. DeBrisay has been transferred to the Public Works.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What amount has been charged upon the superannuation in connection with the Privy Council office?

The PRIME MINISTER. I could not say. I do not think the Treasury Board has passed upon it yet.

Mr. DAVIN. It would seem to me that if the salary, for instance, of Mr. DeBrisay, which will still be paid from the public chest, is added on to get this $30,600, taken in connection with the superannuation allowance of Captain Lee, it will be found there has been no economy?

Mr. LAURIER.

The PRIME MINISTER. How is that?

Mr. DAVIN. Because the public will pay just as much as before.

The PRIME MINISTER. Not at all. The public will continue to pay for the services of Mr. DeBrisay certainly. He was working in the Privy Council office, and he is now giving his services to the Public Works. He will be paid in the future as he was paid in the past. But Captain Lee will not be paid, nor will Mr. DeLanaudière, nor Mr. Lefebvre, nor Mr. Bliss. These four men go out of the service, of course, they will be superannuated. Whatever charge that may entail upon the country, and the Treasury Board has not yet passed upon those cases, that charge must be less than the charges which have hitherto been entailed upon the country. Moreover, if I find, or if any Minister going into the department comes to the conclusion that the work can be done with this reduced staff, will my hon. friend pretend that he should not carry out the economy, and that the staff must remain as it was? Is it not the duty of the Minister, under these circumstances, to reduce the staff so as to have the same amount of work performed at a less cost to the country?

Mr. HUGHES. Will the Minister say the ages of these four gentlemen who were superannuated?

The PRIME MINISTER. Captain Lee, I think, is a man between 50 and 60; the others are about 30 or 35.

Department of Customs..... $38,600

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. What has become of the chief clerk?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). It is proposed to dispense with the services of the chief clerk, whose salary was $1,800. There are some increases for some of the other officers, amounting to $412.50. We hope to effect a saving of $1,387.50.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What superannuation did the chief clerk get?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No superannuation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Why was he dismissed?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Well, he is not dismissed. He has only been in the service since June last, and speaking from memory, I think it is proposed now to give him a gratuity.

Mr. HUGHES. Who was the chief clerk?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Mr. Webster.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the reason for dismissing the chief clerk ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. To effect a saving in the expenditure of the department.

Mr. HUGHES. Is the office abolished ?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. Not formally abolished. The office was only filled in June last. I think there was no chief clerk for some two or three years, at any rate. I think Mr. Webster came in in June, 1896, and by a reorganization of the staff, we expect to be able to effect this saving.

Geological Survey..... $50,525

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). There is a reduction of $150; in other respects, hon. gentlemen will see that the items are identically the same.

Mr. HUGHES. Are there no superannuations, and others appointed in their places ?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. So far as I am aware, there are not. I do not see the Minister of the Interior present, but I believe there are no changes of any kind.

The Department of Trade and Commerce.. $9,500

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The only alteration is the sum of $37.50. That was the statutory allowance granted last year, which has been carried out.

Mr. DAVIN. What purpose distinct from the report of the Customs Department is to be served by the report from the Department of Trade and Commerce ? I am not carping at it all, because I have found it useless, and I ask with a view of making it more useful.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. It contains a lot of information tabulated in a fashion supposed to be in a more convenient form for general use, than the information contained in the Trade and Navigation Returns. The items are divided in such a fashion that anybody at a glance can see what has been the current of trade for five or six years together, and also with what nations our trade is chiefly carried on, and how far it is increasing or diminishing with those particular nations. The information no doubt could be extracted from the Trade and Navigation Returns, but it is not possible to do it without going through minute calculations, which are made in the Trade and Commerce report. There is likewise a considerable amount of information with respect to treaties with other countries, and the reports of the several agents that are or have been lately in the employ of the department.

Mr. HUGHES. I take the liberty of suggesting to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the report of his department would form a very useful book to be circulated among the various colleges and educational institutions in all the provinces of the Dominion, as well as in foreign districts. I have frequent application from the masters of leading schools and institutions in various ridings, for information of this kind. The Trade and Navigation Returns are bulky, and hard to understand by many. We have in the past been getting the Statesman's Year Book, but that has got so bulky it is almost useless. I would suggest to the Minister that the report of his department would perform a useful service if it were supplied to the leading educational institutions throughout the country.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I may say to my hon. friend that I have already asked for a larger quantity for that express purpose; but most of the additional number has already been applied for on the part of the High Commissioner. I will bear in mind the hon. gentleman's suggestion, and so far as Council will sanction increased expenditure, I will endeavour to have trade and commerce reports placed in the hands of the various bodies to which he has alluded.

Office of High Commissioner for Canada in England $9,150

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is, I believe, almost identically the same sum as was voted in previous years. It may be found, however, to obtain some small increase in the Supplementary Estimates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I saw with extreme regret that the statutory increases have been withheld from the clerks in the High Commissioner's office, in conformity with the rule applied to the service here. I am sure if any hon. gentleman will take the trouble to ascertain the qualifications possessed by those officers, they will come to the conclusion that the salaries, especially of the third-class clerks, are extremely low. They are, I believe, without an exception shorthand writers and in every instance very good accountants, as well as good correspondents. If the First Minister will investigate this matter, I think he will admit the propriety of looking further into it; in fact, I think when he returns after his visit to London, he will entertain the opinion that from the secretary down to the third class clerks, those officers are entitled to further consideration, and I shall be very glad if it is given to them.

Resolution to be reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock (midnight).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 10th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, a certificate of the election and return of John Gunion Rutherford, Esq., member for the Electoral District of Macdonald.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 102) respecting the Ottawa Gas Company.—(Mr. Belcourt.)

POSTMASTER GOULD, BARTONVILLE.

Mr. HUGHES (for Mr. McCleary) asked :

1. When was R. T. Gould appointed postmaster at Bartonville, Ont.?
2. Has he been dismissed from that position?
3. If so, were charges made against him, and by whom?
4. Was an investigation held as to the truthfulness of such charges?
5. If no charges were made, why was Mr. Gould dismissed, if such has taken place?
6. If Mr. Gould has been dismissed, has his successor been appointed? If so, who is he?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). 1. He was appointed on the 7th December, 1893. 2. His appointment has been cancelled. 3. There were no charges against him. 4. There was no investigation. 5. Mr. Gould's appointment was cancelled in order that his predecessor in office, Mr. W. J. Gage, who was unjustly dismissed in November, 1893, might be restored to his position. 6. Mr. W. J. Gage has been re-appointed to the office.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That will be a very good precedent for me, by-and-by.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). You can use it by-and-by.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron) asked :

When will the report of the commission appointed to investigate the affairs of the Kingston Penitentiary be brought down?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The report of the commission appointed to investigate the affairs of the Kingston Penitentiary is now engaging the consideration of the Minister of Justice. It is expected that it will be brought down at an early day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

EXHIBITION AT STOCKHOLM.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. Whether a person styling himself "Dr." Walton Jones has been appointed Canadian commissioner to the Exhibition at Stockholm?
2. Whence derives he his title of Dr.?
3. Is he an LL.D. or a Ph. D. or a D.C.L.? If so, from what university?
4. How long has he lived in Canada?
5. What are his qualifications for the position of commissioner to Stockholm?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. No person has been appointed Canadian Commissioner to the exhibition at Stockholm. 2. I am unable to say. 3. Dr. Jones is understood to be an LL.D., but the correspondence in the Department of the Interior does not show of what university. 4. It is within the knowledge of the department that Dr. Jones has resided in Canada since 1893; that he may have been a resident for a much longer period. 5. As Dr. Jones has not been appointed Canadian Commissioner to the exhibition at Stockholm, his qualifications for that office have not been considered.

CORRESPONDENCE IN THE INDIAN DEPARTMENT.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

The hon. the Minister of the Interior said on May 4th. in Committee of Supply, in regard to the Indian Department: "I may tell the hon. gentleman that one of the first things I encountered in connection with the department was a deluge of letters in which my attention was called to the fact that people had written letters one, two, three, four, and even five years ago and had not received any replies."

1. How many letters does the hon. gentleman seek to indicate by Noachian word "deluge"?
2. Who are the writers of the letters?
3. How many letters had remained unanswered (a) one year, (b) how many two years, (c) three years, (d) four years, (e) five years?
4. Did the Minister inquire from the permanent head of the Indian Department whether such letters had been received, and if unanswered, why?
5. Will the hon. the Minister give a list of the letters which are left unanswered?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). In reply to the hon. gentleman's first question, I may say that the word "deluge," which was used in a former debate and to which the hon. gentleman refers, is a very common English word which a person of ordinary common comprehension can readily understand. It does not require any explanation even for a person of ordinary comprehension, much less for a gentleman who is so eminent for his scholastic attainments as the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin). To the second and third question I beg to say, I have not at present the information at my disposal which would enable me to answer these questions. I hardly think

I would be doing my duty as the head of the department if I use the time of the clerks of the department in acquiring information for the purpose of answering questions which are evidently frivolous. In reply to the fourth question: There is no permanent head of the Indian Department, and therefore the letter was not referred to him. In regard to the fifth question, I am not able to give the list the hon. gentleman asks for.

INDIAN OFFICE AT REGINA.

Mr. DAVIN asked:

1. Whether it is the intention of the hon. the Minister of the Interior to remove the Indian Office at Regina to Winnipeg?

2. Whether any, and what clerks in the Indian Department, Regina, have been notified that their employment will cease, and when?

3. What will the Indian Commissioner's staff in future consist of?

4. What clerks from the Indian Department, Regina, does the Minister propose to remove to Ottawa?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). 1. Yes. 2. If any clerks in the Indian Office at Regina have been so notified they have been notified by the Indian Commissioner, who has not yet reported the action taken, and it is, therefore, impossible at present to answer the question definitely. 3. The commissioner's staff will probably consist of three persons taken from the office at Regina. 4. There is no present intention of removing any of the clerks from the Indian Department, Regina, to Ottawa.

POSTMASTER AT ESQUIMALT.

Mr. PRIOR asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a telegraph operator as postmaster at Esquimalt, B.C.?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The matter referred to has never been before the department.

TREATY BETWEEN GREAT BRITAIN AND JAPAN.

Mr. McINNES asked:

1. Has the Government received any communication from the Imperial authorities, asking if the Canadian Government intended to accept the provisions of the treaty lately entered into between Great Britain and Japan?

2. If so, what was the Government's reply to such communication?

3. Has the Government taken, or is it the intention of the Government to take any action under the said treaty, or otherwise, which would interfere with the right of Canada to prohibit, restrict or otherwise deal with Japanese immigration?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Yes. When the Government came into office they found a communication from the Imperial authorities asking the Canadian Government to accept the treaty between Great Britain and Japan, which has been before the Government for over a year. The present Government considered the matter, and determined to answer that they would not be bound by the Japanese treaty.

INDIANS OF PEACE RIVER DISTRICT.

Mr. OLIVER asked:

Is it the intention of the Government to treat with the Indians of the Peace or Athabasca River regions during the present season for the occupation of those regions by settlers?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). This question has never been brought to my attention since I have taken charge of the department, and I am not able to express any intention in regard to it at the present time.

LOCAL JUDGE IN ADMIRALTY.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked:

1. Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a local judge in Admiralty of the Exchequer Court of Canada, in lieu of the late Honourable George Irvine?

2. Or, is it the intention of the Government to amend the Exchequer Court Act as to allow the appointment of a second judge of the Exchequer Court with residence at Quebec and exercising the jurisdiction and functions of local judge in Admiralty?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to announce its policy on this question during the present session?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). It is the intention of the Government to appoint a local Judge in Admiralty to the Exchequer Court of Canada, in lieu of the late Hon. George Irvine. The question whether the Government will amend the Exchequer Court Act, is now under the consideration of the Government.

TRUSTS AND COMBINES.

Mr. BENNETT (for Mr. Henderson) asked:

1. Is the Government aware that there exists at the present time in Canada, any trust, combination, association or agreement of any kind among the manufacturers of any article of commerce, or the dealers therein, or any portion of them, to enhance the price of such article or in any other way to unduly promote the advantage of such manufacturers or dealers at the expense of the consumers, and where such disadvantage to the consumer is facilitated by the customs duty imposed on a like article when imported?

2. If so, in what manufactures do such trusts or combines exist?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to reduce the duties at once on any articles affected by any such existing trust or combine?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). From general information obtained by them, the Government believe there are in Canada some associations of the character mentioned in the question, but the information in their possession is not sufficient to call for a reduction of the duties at present.

ST. ANDREW'S RAPIDS, RED RIVER.

Mr. JAMESON asked :

1. What steps have been taken by the Government to ascertain the cost of construction of such works as are necessary to render the Red River navigable through the St. Andrew's Rapids ?

2. Has the Government procured an estimate of the cost of the works ?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to proceed with the work, and if so, at what time ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding). In the absence of the Minister of Public Works I beg to answer the question as follows :—1. A thorough survey has been made. 2. Yes. 3. The matter is under consideration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman object to state what the estimate was ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I am not able to answer the question, but I shall call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the inquiry made.

MR. WILLIAM MCGIRR.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Will the Minister of the Interior say what notification Mr. Wm. McGirr received of his superannuation, and whether he is receiving the same treatment as all other officials whose services are being dispensed with? Whether all others have not received leave of absence until the 30th June?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). Mr. McGirr received notice of his superannuation on the 2nd April. The rule in the Department of Indian Affairs is to pay an official who is placed on the retired list up to the end of the month in which he received notification, and this rule will be applied to Mr. Wm. McGirr. It is not true that all other officials whose services are being dispensed with have received leave of absence until 30th June.

HUDSON'S BAY EXPEDITION.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. What are the conditions of charter between the Government and the owners of the "Diana," engaged in the Hudson Bay expedition?

2. What is the price per month?

3. What is the value of the vessel?

4. Is she insured? If not, why not?

5. If she is lost, who is responsible?

6. What is the length and beam, horse-power and tonnage (net and gross) of the "Diana" ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The conditions of charter are : "Diana" to be placed at the disposal of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, from the 1st of May to the 1st of December, for the sum of $9,800, payable in monthly instalments of $1,400 in advance. The ship to be insured by the Government for the benefit of the owners for the sum of $40,000. In the event of loss or abandonment, the Government to be responsible for the proportionate hire to the date of such loss or abandonment. Government to find master, officers, engineers, firemen, crew, coals, provisions, engine-room and boatswain's supplies. "Diana," length, 151 ft. 2 in. ; breadth, 27 ft. 1 in. ; depth, 16 ft. 6 in. ; net tonnage, 275 tons ; gross tonnage, 473 tons ; horse-power, 70.

Mr. FIELDING.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Is it registered horse-power or nominal ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Registered.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the rate of insurance ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The ship is to be insured by the Government. I do not know whether insurance has been effected or not ; we have applied for it.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman says the Government will be proportionately liable for the vessel up to the time of abandonment or loss.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I have read the terms of the charter party.

Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.) If the vessel is frozen in, will the Government be liable ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. We have hired the ship for seven months, from 1st May to 1st December, at a rental of $9,800.

HUDSON'S BAY EXPEDITION—OFFER OF MESSRS. MILBURN & COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. What was the offer per month of Messrs. Milburn & Company, of England, for the ship "Port Perie" for the expedition to Hudson Bay?

2. Did the offer include the ordinary insurance?

3. What is the length and beam, horse-power and tonnage (net and gross) of the "Port Perie" ?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The offer of Messrs. Milburn & Company, was £700 sterling or $3,500 per month. For seven months that would amount to $24,500. The ordinary insurance, namely, £5 5s. 0d. per annum was included, but what risks that would cover is not known. The charterers, however, were to find and to pay the crew, engineers, coals, stores, provisions, and all port charges. The extra insurance, if it could be effected at all, would be about £10 10s. 0d. per cent, or $2,800 for the time occupied. It is not known whether such insurance could be obtained. Net tonnage, 1,928 tons : gross tonnage, 3,109 tons : length, 353 feet : breadth, 39 ft. 4 in. ; depth, 27 ft. 5 in. ; horse-power, 450.

SEED GRAIN—NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

1. What number of farmers in Manitoba and the North-west owe for seed grain sent them by the Government for use on their farms ?
2. What number owe for seed grain as bondsmen for other farmers ?
3. How much is owed the Government in the former case ? How much in the second ?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The chief clerk of the department who has charge of this matter, informs me that the statement cannot be prepared before two or three days, as it involves a large amount of work. I will have to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) to wait until it is prepared.

MAIL CONTRACTS, ANNAPOLIS COUNTY.

Mr. MILLS asked :

Is Lewis A. Dickie a contractor for carrying the mails in Annapolis county ? If so, what is his route ? When did his contract commence, and by the terms of said contract how long was it to continue ? Has said contract been renewed ? If so, when was it last renewed, and for how long ? Is this contract to be terminated ? When and for what reason ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). Lewis A. Dickie is contractor for the following mail services in Annapolis county, viz. :—Bridgetown and Dalhousie West, and Bridgetown and Lawrencetown. The Bridgetown and Dalhousie West contract commenced on the 1st October, 1896, and the Bridgetown and Lawrencetown contract on the 1st July, 1896. Both of these contracts were renewals of the former contracts on the same terms and conditions without tenders being invited, and are the usual four years' contracts, terminable on three months' notice. The contract for the Bridgetown and Dalhousie West mail service will be terminated on the 1st August next, as it was represented to the department that if tenders were invited a lower rate would be obtained. The other contract has not yet been considered.

QUEBEC BRIDGE COMPANY.

Mr. DAVIN asked :

Whether the Hon. Mr. Dobell has become a director of the Quebec Bridge Company ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I have to inform my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) that the Hon. Mr. Dobell is not a director of the Quebec Bridge Company.

NORTH-WEST MOUNTED POLICE.

Mr. OLIVER asked :

1. What is the number of the officers, of non-commissioned officers and of men at present actually belonging to the North-west Mounted Police Force ?
2. How many officers and of non-commissioned officers will be retained after the proposed reduction has been made ?
3. On what terms are the officers, the non-commissioned officers and the men, whose services are to be dispensed with, to be retired ?

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). The present strength of the force is : 47 officers, including five surgeons and two veterinary surgeons, and 664 non-commissioned officers, constables and special constables, making a total of 711, all told. In regard to the second and third questions, I have to inform my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) that a scheme is now being perfected to decrease the force without impairing the efficacy of this service. It is not possible to give all the details at the present time, but all the details will be given when the Estimates are being discussed.

THE NEW YORK "SUN."

Mr. MILLS (for Mr. Maclean) asked :

Has the attention of the Postmaster General been called to a scurrilous attack on Her Most Gracious Majesty the Queen in the New York "Sun" on Tuesday last, and whether it is the intention of the Postmaster General to allow that journal to circulate through the Canadian mails ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). The attention of the department has not been called to the article in question ; nor have I myself seen it. I have not the slightest idea of what it contains. I have inquired of Mr. LeSueur, the secretary of the department, who informs me that the department has never yet suppressed any foreign newspaper coming to Canada, simply because it might contain an attack upon any members of the Royal family.

Mr. MILLS. I have the paper here and have just read the article. I may say that it is a most scurrilous attack.

ENQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. FOSTER. In the early part of the session a return was ordered with reference to the commissioners appointed, and their reports, as to partisan officials. It would facilitate matters if we had the return before we proceed with the Estimates.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Orders have been issued to the departments concerned to prepare the return, and I hope to have it at an early date.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

John Gunion Rutherford, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Macdonald, introduced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) and by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton).

BRITISH COLUMBIA SALMON.

Mr. MAXWELL moved for :

Copies of all papers, correspondence and telegrams relating to charges made affecting the quality of British Columbia salmon sold in the British market.

He said : In asking for this order, it may not be inappropriate if I call the attention of the House to the charges which have been made on this subject. A great many hon. members know that the salmon industry is one of our principal industries in British Columbia, one in which we British Columbians take considerable pride, in which millions of dollars are invested, and the value of which to the province is worth many millions more. The cannery men of that province have worked hard in order to raise the quality of these fish, and in order to command the British market for their sale ; and, after great perseverance, labour and expense, they hold at the present time the chief position in the British market. Not long ago a startling letter was published in one of the leading newspapers in London to this effect :

THE DANGERS OF FISH FOOD.

To the Editor of the "Globe," London :

Sir,—While in British Columbia last summer, I read a reprint in a Yorkshire paper of an article published by you upon this subject, in which it was suggested that "all tinned fish should be given the go-by." Being at the time in the thick of the salmon-canning industry at Steveston, Fraser River, I was much interested in the statement, and made particular observations of the whole canning process. The recent case of direct poisoning from tinned salmon at Poole induces me to trouble you with a few facts supplementing your advice. I say direct poisoning, because it would probably be impossible to trace the number of deaths due indirectly to the eating of tinned salmon. The large, very large number on record of undoubted poisonings, however, makes the subject of the gravest importance. And as very few but the cannery proprietors and their Chinese coolie employees reap any material pecuniary benefit from the industry, it becomes a duty to endeavour to have the present dangerous and criminal methods of canning immediately abolished. There is ample time before the ensuing canning season to have new and effective measures established, so that no more of these veritable death-traps may be thrust upon the working classes' market. Indeed, the cargoes of last year's pack aboard certain ships shortly expected at Liverpool should be carefully examined officially before being permitted to be sold, and in one instance, at least, I would say on oath, seized and destroyed !

Allow me to state why I make this assertion. At a cannery at Steveston I saw fish received from the fishermen in large and small lots, varying generally from thirty to thirty-five fish, and kept piled upon one another just as thrown in from the boats, for several days, until something like two or three thousand fish were on hand, before cleaning and canning, so as to save the expense of steam, &c. The thermometer is rarely below 70 degrees, and often 90 degrees, Fahr., in the shade during the greater part of the canning season; so that you may imagine the condition of the fish first received, which would be underneath the later lots, at the time of putting into the cans. The Chinamen who gut the fish use the keenest knives, constantly ground and sharpened, but are often unable to make a clean cut or to prevent the flesh tearing away, owing to its rotten state. But however bad the fish is, it is canned. This is the usual state of things, but I have seen at the busiest times so many as 15,000 or 16,000 fish piled up three or four feet high, and the stench arising abominable. When there were such quantities, the fishermen's catches had been supplemented by some thousands which came from the traps near Point Robert, U.S.A., some twenty miles distant, and which were collected by a steamboat about twice a week. The manager of the cannery had an interest in the traps, and sold the fish to the canning company. I saw every lot of trap fish, and not one lot was good on delivery, except the last and smallest lot (about 300 fish), which was received in comparatively cold weather, at the end of the season. I called the manager's attention to the fact of the fish being tinned in a bad state, and he stated that his fish were better than those of any other cannery, although I saw them put into the tins in a putrid condition ; and pushed my finger right through some of the fish before they were cut ! The carbonic acid gas generated in a tin of such fish surely must be deadly !

But no matter how bad the fish may be when put into the tins, no smell arises after the long cooking they get. The tins are soldered up and put into rapidly boiling water and kept boiling hard for an hour, when they are pricked to let out the steam, &c., and immediately resoldered and put into a retort and subjected to a heat twice that of the boiling water for another hour. But if the fish were fresh and good when gutted, there is another element of danger in the method because the fish after gutting are washed in the river water, which, in addition to its normally dirty state and prolific of products of decomposition, is, at the canning season, really shocking from the fish offal, which is all dropped from the canneries into the water through holes made for the purpose in the flooring ; and as every bit of the riparian land at Steveston is occupied by canneries, and eddies obtain all along in front of the buildings, the accumulation of offal which washes up and down and to and fro, makes of the water a breeding pond, so to speak, for bacterial organisms. I was informed by a competent authority that it takes six weeks or two months after the canning is finished for the river to get anything like clear of the offal, a good deal of it remaining to decay. This is the "water" in which all Fraser River salmon is "cleaned" before putting into the tins.

In making and soldering the tins, too, muriatic acid is used in dangerous quantities. If the cannery proprietors were less greedy of profit, this dreadful state of affairs might be abolished, and a fairly wholesome article put upon the market. There is an abundance of pure water easily obtainable from New Westminster, and at small cost, and if Government inspectors were appointed to see that such pure water was used, and none but fresh fish dealt with, and to stamp every tin, the poisoning would be reduced to a minimum. They had, I believe, to adopt some such plan in Newfoundland and Eastern Canada, with regard to barrelling codfish, &c. White men, too, should be employed in place of the Chinese coolies, who are of the filthiest, and handle every bit of salmon in such manner that I am sure no one who saw the tins packed would ever again voluntarily eat the contents. This year is supposed to be the "big" year for salmon. Every fourth year has hitherto proved the largest, and the present is the fourth from the last "big run." Something should be done beforehand. Last year's pack, on arrival, should be thoroughly overhauled first, as a warning, and all loss to the packers would be richly deserved. The salmon cannery business was in the past exceedingly profitable, so that during the last few years the canneries have trebled in number; but, as a consequence, the fishermen get four or five times as much for their fish, and the competition in business has greatly curtailed the profits; and many proprietors are trying to form companies of their concerns. In a prospectus lately published in this city, it was stated that the daily consumption of salmon in England was not less than 121,370 pounds. Therefore, all the more necessity for Government supervision to prevent the criminality I have attempted to describe.

The cannery I refer to—the name of which I will readily give—and many others also, artfully provide so much as can be against exposure by adopting many brands or labels, all tins containing exactly the same kind of fish and packed in precisely the same way, so that the order of the jury in the Poole case to have all fish of the same brand destroyed was of little good. It is the output of this cannery that I would seize on arrival in England. I should be glad to furnish you with further and comprehensive details relating to the subject, which comprises many features not even touched upon here, and which cannot be adequately dealt with in a letter which, I fear, I have already made far too long, and for which I beg to apologize. Kindly make what use you please of my information.

Your obedient servant,

C. WOOD,

14 Kirkmanshulme Lane, Longsight, Manchester,
March 8.

P.S.—Several of the employees in the cannery spoken of were stricken with typhoid fever last summer. One, a fireman, recovered after three or four weeks' serious illness, and another, a watchman, died; both of these were whitemen. I am prepared to swear to the accuracy of the whole of the above.

I think you will agree with me that the charges made by this gentleman in the London press are very serious. They are all the more serious because he claims to have seen every one of these things which he describes. It is difficult to imagine what influence such a letter might have upon the minds of the people, and evidently the intention of the writer was to strike a blow at the salmon industry in British Columbia. It is no surprise to us to find that the "Globe" itself should, in an editorial, speak as follows:—

DEATH IN THE TIN.

The revelations of the canned fish industry, as carried on in British Columbia, are of such a nature as to demand the most searching investigation. Mr. Wood, who frames this indictment, offers, it will be seen, to supply additional evidence should it be required. The charge he brings forward is nothing less than an imputation that enormous quantities of fish are so dealt with as to give them an absolutely poisonous character. Whether this applies to one particular cannery or to all is comparatively of little consequence. The British consumer has no means of discriminating between the different brands; he buys and eats on the assumption that every possible care was taken to tin the fish while fresh and well cleaned. Our correspondent shows that this is not the case: the fish are stacked like hay and corruption sets in long before the canning takes place. Not only that, either, but the cleaning is performed in foul water, full of decaying offal. But we must leave our readers to gather the full details from Mr. Wood's letter; there will be few among its readers but will endorse our opinion that the matter urgently calls for thorough investigation, "without partiality, favour or affection." It is with much regret that we feel called upon to give this warning, calculated as it is to seriously injure a British colony. But the number of deaths traced directly to the consumption of canned fish would render it almost criminal to keep back disclosures which, if found to be true, trace this mysterious mortality to the fountain head. We are quite prepared to receive indignation's denials of our correspondent's statements, but something more than that will be required to allay public misgiving.

In another part of England we find an influential paper stating:

The regulations of the canned fish industry, as carried on in British Columbia are of such a nature as to demand the most certain investigations.

And this paper goes on in pretty much the same style as the editorial I read from the "Globe." I need hardly say that, so far as my own personal knowledge in the matter is concerned, this man's letter is a tissue of lies. I have no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) will be able to tell us something, not only of what the department has done, but also of the character of the man who made these charges. I have the information myself, but I am sure he has it likewise. I believe our cannery men have a conscience, and pack their fish according to the best and cleanest methods. I have frequently seen them at work, and I never saw anything of all this which Mr. Wood says actually happened. So far as the water itself is concerned, we all know that there is not a purer stream in the world than the Fraser. It is a mass of cold ice water coming from the mountains and rushing on with such impetuosity as to make it comparatively clean. Of course, the banks of the stream are more or less soily, and that colours the water to some extent, but in reality it is comparatively a pure stream. We know likewise that the cannery men have a large share of pure water in the cannery into which they put the fish, and that the fish are also salted before they are put in the tins, so that there is nothing can possibly happen in the canning out there. I may say that this letter caused considerable consternation in British Columbia, and I am sure that the House, and the province of British Columbia in particular, will be glad to know what the department has done in order to contradict the misstatements of this gentleman in England, and I am sure that the department will leave nothing undone to restore confidence in the public mind with regard to the canned salmon industry of British Columbia.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). There is, of course, no possible objection to bringing down the papers called for. The salmon industry, as we all know, is a most important one and allegations such as those made by Mr. Wood in a leading London journal would be calculated, if not promptly contradicted, to do untold injury to that industry. The first knowledge which the department had of these statements was contained in the following telegram, received on the 11th of March, from the High Commissioner in London :—

C. Wood writes to the paper from Manchester, that at a Steveston factory last year salmon remained days before canning; saw salmon tinned in putrid condition, and manager stated his fish better than other canneries. Says use river water for washing fish, source of danger from decomposition offal; that typhoid fever was prevalent, and that muriatic acid used dangerous quantities making soldering tin. Have asked for name factory. Please make inquiries and cable. Statements injurious to trade.

And the next day we received the following telegram :

Wood's letter nominally refers one cannery, Steveston; but by inference covers canneries generally. Described present methods canning as dangerous, criminal. Says also, no one who saw tins packed, Chinese coolies, would ever again eat contents. Name factory not yet ascertained.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Was that in March of this year?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes. Immediately on receipt of these telegrams I referred them to Commissioner Prince, who has a thorough knowledge of the salmon-packing business, for report.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Who is this Wood?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. I did not know at the time, but I find by the papers that he was a clerk employed by one of these salmon men who had gone to British Columbia, and visited the rivers, and, returning to England, made the statements over his signature. As these statements were published in a very prominent journal, they were calculated to do untold injury to the industry. Commissioner Prince authorized me to forward this cable to London, which I did the same day as Sir Donald Smith's telegram was received :

Professor Prince, Dominion Commissioner Fisheries, who personally inspected British Columbia salmon canneries, and is thoroughly conversant with methods canning there, concurs with local fishery inspector, who is equally well informed about facts, in giving unqualified contradiction to Wood's statements cabled by you respecting salmon pack. Wood's statements are direct variance all other official and other information possessed for years by department. Give fullest publicity this contradiction.

This was signed by myself. I may say that the same evening I received a further cable from the High Commissioner saying that Wood declined to give the name of the factory or write further particulars, though in the letters to "The Globe" he had said he was ready to do so. The cablegram proceeded that Wood is :

Not averse give information and other particulars personally, if his expenses to London paid. Says lost money through improper canning at factory. Hopes to receive information through you from Steveston canneries, supported by fisheries inspector.

My cable crossed this one, and we heard nothing more about the matter until the arrival of the papers from London, when we received from the High Commissioner a letter acknowledging receipt of the cablegram which I had sent, and which I have just read, and going on to state :

On the morning of the 16th instant, a further letter was received from Mr. Wood, a copy of which is inclosed. It was a reply to my letter of the 13th instant, a copy of which accompanied my former letter.

Mr. Colmer took the opportunity of personally seeing the editor of "The Globe," in order that he might be fully aware of the steps that had been taken, so far as possible, to investigate the charges brought forward by Mr. Wood, and show him your telegram. He informed Mr. Colmer that, as Mr. Wood gave his full name and address, he inserted the letter—which he would not have done, had it been written under a nom-de-plume. Mr. Colmer pointed out the injury which might result to an important industry in British Columbia from general charges such as those which had been put forward. At the same time, he remarked that the trade was necessarily one which had been built up on the reputation of the product as a wholesome popular article of food, and that the business could not have developed to anything like its present dimensions, had the canning been carried on according to the methods mentioned by Mr. Wood. Further, that the consumer is not likely to purchase an article that does not commend itself to him, and that any complaint about the food being unwholesome would inevitably lead to a prosecution on the part of the public health authorities. Besides, that neither the retailer nor the merchant would be prepared to accept the loss that would certainly follow, and that the manner in which the business is conducted on this side provides, therefore, the best possible protection for the consumer.

The editor recognized the force of what Mr. Colmer said. It appears, from what he said, that Mr. Wood had mentioned the names of two ships, the "Tercera" and the "Glenogil," in his letter, as having on board some of the salmon to which he specifically referred. The information was not, however, published, for obvious reasons. He promised to insert a letter from Mr. Colmer, and to make some editorial comment in the matter. Inclosed please find cuttings from yesterday's issue of the paper, giving Mr. Colmer's letter and the comments.

On receipt of my cablegram containing Commissioner Prince's unqualified contradiction of Mr. Wood's statements, Mr. Colmer wrote a letter to the "Globe" which I need not read, as I have already given the substance of it. There was also published, about the same time, a letter from Mr. Robert Ward, one of the canners in British Columbia, contradicting the statements. Mr. Wood refused to give the name of the canner, which he had promised to give, and, ultimately, proceedings were taken against him in the criminal court by one of the canning companies called the Federation Salmon Canning Company, charging him with an offence under the Libel Act. He was brought up before Mr. Headlam, the commissioner in the police court, and, after some evidence had been given, he expressed regret for what he had done, and undertook not to publish any more statements of the character complained of. And so the matter dropped.

The statements made, as my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell) says, if permitted to go unchallenged and uncontradicted, might, and probably would, have caused great injury to this important branch of industry. I am happy to say, however, that whatever injury might have been effected by Mr. Wood, if his statements had gone uncontradicted, were more than neutralized by the cablegrams from this side and the letter of Mr. Robert Ward. There is a large number of other papers which I will be happy to bring down, according to my hon. friend's motion, which will prove interesting to those who desire to follow the matter further. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. Maxwell), however, that notwithstanding the unqualified contradictions which have been given by the officials of the department, and by Mr. Ward, and others, there are still people in British Columbia who persist in asserting that there may be a modicum of truth in some of the statements which Mr. Wood made. I merely make that statement for the purpose of warning my hon. friend that there are those in British Columbia, I fear, who are supplying Mr. Wood with many of the statements he published. The papers, when they are brought down, if he reads them, will show that to him. I repeat today what I stated a day or two ago, that in a short time Mr. Prince will go to British Columbia and remain for the larger part of the canning season, for the purpose of making a personal inspection of the fishing business and of the manner in which the fish are canned, so that he may be enabled to speak authoritatively and beyond doubt from personal knowledge as to this industry. I hold in my hand a memorandum, which I need not read, from Mr. Prince, speaking of the personal investigation he made some years ago. So far as he is concerned, he entertains the highest opinion of the skill and knowledge brought to bear by the British Columbia canners in putting up the salmon product. He seems to think that they are far ahead of the canners of the maritime provinces, and of the canners in the adjoining American territory. He fears that the Americans who can in the Sound, a few miles south of British Columbia, owing to the fact that the quality of their fish and the manner of their preparing it for market are not so high as the character and quality of the British Columbia salmon, are accustomed to label their salmon with British Columbia labels, and that possibly in that way some English consumers of this valuable food product may, at times, be led astray. I may say, that this matter is also one which will receive a very strict investigation at the hands of Mr. Commissioner Prince when he goes to British Columbia in a short time. The industry is an enormous one, the value of it runs up in the millions, and it behooves the department, of course, of which I am the head, not to slacken in its efforts to have the industry placed upon the best possible footing so that there shall not be left the shadow of a doubt in the minds of any of the great buyers or consumers in England, of the nutritious and honest character of the salmon which is put up for sale on the London market.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH PEROTT POST OFFICE.

Mr. MILLS moved for :

Copies of all petitions, letters, notices, bonds, papers and documents in relation to the establishment of a post office in the county of Annapolis, called "North Perott," and the appointment of Mr. Alfred Spurr to the postmastership of said office.

He said : I move for an Order of the House for the papers according to this motion, because I was not satisfied with the answer that I received from the hon. the Postmaster General to the question I put to him on April 5th. The answer was so inconsistent with my knowledge of the facts with reference to that post office at North Perott, that I deemed it my duty to call for the papers, for there may be, perchance, some papers on file that may have been overlooked by the Postmaster General. My knowledge of the affair is this : The people of North Perott, time and again, asked, by petitions and by letters, for better postal accommodation at North Perott. Those petitions, those letters and those desires were duly placed before the Government of that day, and I received a notice from the department in the regular way calling upon me to make a recommendation for the Postmaster General for the new post office to be called North Perott. I recommended for that post Mr. Alfred Spurr. I am informed by Mr. Alfred Spurr that he received a notification from the Post Office Department asking him to enter into the obligations required for the execution of a bond, and he did execute a bond, and gave two bondsmen, James A. Spurr and George E.

Corbett; and this bond was sent to the Post Office Department. Now, notwithstanding these things having been accomplished, I am still informed by the Postmaster General that there has been no office established at North Perott. If the department has seen fit to take no notice of this postmaster, Alfred Spurr, and have come to the conclusion, perhaps, that the bondsmen were no good, or something of that sort, it may be that they have an excuse for abolishing the office. Surely the desire of the people should be considered by the Postmaster General, and I think that if the Postmaster General reconsiders this, he will go on and establish a post office at North Perott. It is a settlement that requires better postal accommodation; the people ask for it, the people desire it, and the people should have it.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). From the memorandum furnished me by the secretary—I did not have the handling of the records myself—the position of the matter in connection with the North Perott post office, is as follows:—That a nomination has been made for a postmaster for the proposed office at North Perott, and another nomination was made. The office was offered to the nominee, who declined it, and since then no further action has been taken towards opening an office. The inspector reported that the prospective revenue of this office would be about $15, and the salary of the postmaster would about absorb the most of that revenue. I have no objection whatever to the order.

Motion agreed to.

VIRGINIA POST OFFICE, N.S.

Mr. MILLS moved for :

Copies of all petitions, letters, notices, correspondence, bonds and papers in relation to the establishment of a post office in the county of Annapolis, called "Virginia," and the appointment of Mr. Ezekiel Banks as postmaster for such office.

He said: The remarks that I made with reference to the proposed post office at North Perott may also apply here. On April 5th, I asked :

" 1. Was there ever a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., called 'Virginia' ?

" 2. Was Ezekiel Banks made postmaster of that office ?

" 3. Is there such a post office now or such a postmaster ?

" 4. If not, why not ? "

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (for the Postmaster General). There has not been a post office established in the county of Annapolis, N.S., under the name of "Virginia."

Now the facts, according to my personal knowledge of the case, are these: There were petitions, letters, and requests of different kinds, from the people of the settlement of Virginia, a rising settlement in the back country of Annapolis county. They held a meeting of the settlement and appointed a chairman, and Mr. David M. Wright was appointed secretary. At that meeting it was voted unanimously :

That we require a mail twice a week; also voted that the post office be at or near John B. Coombs. Voted that the mail days be requested to be Wednesdays and Saturdays.

Signed, DAVID M. WRIGHT, Sec.

These matters were placed before the Government by myself, and I received a notice from the Government that such a post office had been established called Virginia, and I recommended that Mr. Ezekiel Banks be appointed postmaster. This Ezekiel Banks filed his bonds and entered upon his duties, and received the mail for fourteen weeks, coming from Clement's Vale to Virginia, and that mail was carried by one Alfred Brown. But after the present Government came into power he ceased to be postmaster, and naturally considers that he has been badly used in the matter, as well as the entire people of that district. They desire postal accommodation; they are four or five miles away from the post office, some of them six miles. Although it is not a very large settlement, still there are hundreds of post offices throughout the country in just such places, and the wants of these people should be attended to in some manner as well as of people living in cities. I would therefore ask the Postmaster General to take this matter into his consideration and establish that post office at Virginia; and if he does not see fit to appoint a man at my recommendation, let him appoint somebody else at somebody else's recommendation. I do not care so long as there is a post office established there. Let the recommendation for postmaster come from the Attorney General of Nova Scotia or Hon. W. H. Ray. I do not care so long as the people of Virginia receive postal accommodation. I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that Alfred Brown actually carried the mails between Clementsport and Clement's Vale for fourteen weeks, and has not received one cent of payment. This matter should be taken into consideration. The work having been done, the man should be paid.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). There is no objection to the Order of the House moved for. I am instructed by the department that the proposed post office would be within about two miles of an existing post office; that the revenue is estimated at about $15 a year; that there would be expense in carrying the mails from the terminus of the existing railroad to this post office; that there would also be expenses in connection with the salary of the postmaster. My hon. friend seems to think that because notice has been sent deciding to establish a post office, that such establishes a post office. I presume when the department used the word "established," and says a post office has been established, it means that a post has been fully equipped not only as regards the department at Ottawa, but that a postmaster has been installed in the office, and that the office has been duly gazetted as a place for receiving Her Majesty's mails. It is in that sense, I presume, that the department furnished me with the information that the post office had not been established.

Mr. MILLS. This man E. Banks actually received the mails for fourteen weeks, and the mails were carried by Alfred Brown for that time.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It may be so. Those might all be preliminary arrangements with the view to establishing an office there. That is the only explanation I can give. However, all the papers will be produced and the hon. gentleman will then see exactly what is the legal position of the matter.

Motion agreed to.

POSTMASTER AT ANNAPOLIS, N.S.

Mr. MILLS moved for :

Copies of all letters, telegrams, papers and correspondence in relation to the resignation of Mr. Arthur W. Corbitt, as postmaster of Annapolis Royal, N.S.; the appointment of Mr. Henry A. West; the dismissal of said Henry A. West, and the appointment of Mr. George Andrew Hardwick to said office.

He said : On April 7th of the present session I asked the following question of the hon. Postmaster General :

1. When was H. A. West appointed postmaster of the town of Annapolis Royal, Nova Scotia?
2. Has the said H. A. West been dismissed from the said position? If so, when?
3. Was any complaint preferred against the said H. A. West of malfeasance in office or offensive partisanship? If so, by whom?
4. If any complaint was made, was the said H. A. West apprised of such complaint, and was any investigation held? If so, by whom?
5. If said H. A. West has been dismissed and no complaint made, why has he been dismissed?

The Postmaster General replied as follows:—

After the defeat of the late Government, but whilst they were still in office, it was represented to the then Postmaster General, the Hon. Mr. Taillon, that Mr. A. H. Corbitt, the then postmaster at Annapolis, was prepared to resign his office on condition that Mr. H. A. West was appointed in his stead, such representation being contained in a certain telegram dated the 27th June, 1896, sent by John B. Mills, M.P., to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, then Solicitor General, in the following words:—

"Annapolis, N.S., 27th June, 1896.

"Annapolis postmaster, Corbitt, will resign, if Harry A. West can be appointed in his stead. Do this if possible. Important. They won't disturb West. I have resignation for Ottawa.

"(Sgd.) JOHN B. MILLS."

Such representation was then communicated to the late Postmaster General by a letter dated 29th June, 1896, from the said Sir C. H. Tupper, by letter in the following words:—

"June 29th, 1896.

"My dear Mr. Taillon,—Pray initial inclosed papers, and ask Colonel White to put them through. Corbitt resigns, and Mills of Annapolis recommends Harry A. West as successor.

"Yours sincerely,

"(Sgd.) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

"To Hon. L. A. Taillon, Postmaster General." Thereupon the Hon. Mr. Taillon did, on the 29th of June, 1896, six days after the defeat of his Government, appoint Mr. West to said office. That it having been brought to the knowledge of the present Government that Mr. Corbitt's resignation was not unconditional, but was only given in consideration of the office being given to Mr. West, and it appearing that such action came within the spirit of section 137 of the Criminal Code, which declares that every one is guilty of an indictable offence who sells or agrees to sell his resignation of any office or any consent to an appointment or resignation, or agrees to receive any reward from the sale thereof, the Government deemed it their duty to vacate an appointment made to fill the vacancy thus improperly brought about, the making of which vacancy under which circumstances, appears to come within the class of evils sought to be remedied by the Criminal Code. Hence Mr. West's appointment was cancelled.

That answer, I may say here, if made beyond the walls of this House, would have been followed by a libel suit, because the information before them, based entirely upon a telegram sent by myself to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, that "Corbitt will resign if Harry A. West is appointed in his stead," could not be strained by any legal ability or acumen so as to bring the case within the Criminal Code. But in order to accomplish their own desires in this matter, they did so strain it, and said it came within the Criminal Code, and hence this appointment must be cancelled. If any hon. member will look at the telegram he will see the fact was that I held Corbitt's resignation in my hand when I sent the message. I have not seen the papers in the department, but I know what they contain. Corbitt's resignation was unconditional, and that telegram was sent five or ten minutes before I boarded the train on 27th June, 1896, at which time I held Corbitt's unqualified and unconditional resignation in my hands. So there was no qualification and no condition as regards Corbitt's resignation. But this Government, composed of no less than ten lawyers, has come to the conclusion that this action comes within the Criminal Code of Canada, and hence this man West must be punished, because forsooth on this paltry evidence it is considered by them that this man has done something which is covered by the Criminal Code. What are the facts with respect to this matter? They are these. On June 27th, 1896, Corbitt placed his resignation in my hands. The Government having been defeated, I did not at that time deem it desirable that I should suggest a good Conservative for the appointment, for I knew that as soon as the Conservative Government resigned, he would be turned out of office. But, if we were to have a Liberal, if we were to have a Grit, I was going to have a respectable one, and I suggested the name of Harry A. West, a man who had always opposed me, a man who had not only voted against me, but had subscribed to the Liberal funds to my own certain knowledge, not only in the last election but in the election before. Therefore, I recommended that Harry A. West should have that appointment, and the notice of his appointment came to Mr. West on the 29th June, 1896, in the following words:—

Post Office Department, Canada,
Ottawa, 29th June, 1896.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that you have been recommended to the Postmaster General as a fit and proper person to be appointed to the postmastership of Annapolis, in the electoral county of Annapolis, in the province of Nova Scotia, and Dominion of Canada, and that, if you are prepared to furnish the necessary security, your appointment to that office will take place in due course.

The inspector of the Halifax division, Mr. Macdonald, will furnish you with all necessary instructions in regard to the security required.

It will be further required that you and any person whom you may desire to employ as assistant, shall, in conformity with the Post Office Act, before entering any post office duty, subscribe to the oath (or declaration) of office, and shall also take the oath (or affirmation) of allegiance, in accordance with the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886, Chap. 112, with which you will be supplied by the inspector.

I am, sir, your very obedient servant,
WM. WHITE,
Deputy Postmaster General.

To Mr. Henry A. West, Annapolis, N.S.

A letter from the inspector was also forwarded to Mr. West, calling upon him to furnish bonds to the extent of $1,000. The letter from the inspector was as follows:—

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, 1st July, 1896.

Sir,—I inclose herewith notification of your appointment to the postmastership of Annapolis.

You will be required to furnish a guarantee company's bond to the amount of $1,000. I inclose herewith forms of application to the recognized companies, one of which you will please select, fill and return to me as soon as possible. The amount of the annual premium will be $4, which sum you will please remit to me.

The inclosed oaths must be taken by yourself and your proposed assistant, and returned to me.

On completion of the necessary preliminaries, the office will be transferred to your charge.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
CHS. J. MACDONALD, Inspector.

Mr. Henry A. West, Annapolis.

That letter was handed to Mr. West on the 1st of July, 1896. Mr. West complied with Mr. MILLS.

the provisions; he furnished his bonds, his assistants took the oath; he had two assistants in that post office which was not a $15 post office, but which was a post office in the town of Annapolis Royal, one of the most important post offices in the western portion of Nova Scotia. The order of the transfer of the post office from the late Postmaster Corbitt was also given to Postmaster West. Then, when the Conservative Government resigned there was a confirmation of this appointment. It was always recognized that Mr. West was a good Liberal, and except in the minds of a clique in Annapolis town, it was not in the mind of any one but that the appointment was a good one. Mr. West was an honest and respectable man; there was not a more respectable man in the western portion of Nova Scotia.

An hon. MEMBER. Notwithstanding that he was a Grit.

Mr. MILLS. Notwithstanding that he was a Grit, as my hon. friend says. There are a great many just such men in Annapolis county who are personal friends of mine. After the present Government came into power Mr. West received the following letter, dated Ottawa, 24th August, 1896:—

Letter of Appointment to Postmastership.
Post Office Department, Canada,
Ottawa, 24th August, 1896.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that the Postmaster General has been pleased to appoint you to be postmaster of Annapolis, in the electoral county of Annapolis, in the province of Nova Scotia, and Dominion of Canada.

You are, therefore, hereby authorized to exercise all the functions and discharge all the duties appertaining to the said office, according to law.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
WM. WHITE,
Deputy Postmaster General.

Mr. Henry A. West, Annapolis, N.S.

This letter has, what we in law consider to be of more weighty significance, namely, it has the seal of the Post Office Department attached thereto. Mr. West entered fully upon his duties. He had two young men there employed, and everything passed off without a whimper or a word: not a sign was given to him that he was to be dismissed; no charge was made against him of malfeasance in office, nor of partisanship, nor charge of any kind whatever. But behold, on 18th January, 1897, the first intimation he ever got of any change in his circumstances was the following letter:—

Post Office Inspector's Office,
Halifax, January 18th, 1897.

Sir,—I beg to inform you that the Postmaster General has decided to cancel your appointment as postmaster of Annapolis, and has instructed me to transfer your office at an early date to the charge of Mr. G. Andrew Hardwick.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,
CHARLES J. MACDONALD,
Post Office Inspector.
Mr. H. A. West, Postmaster, Annapolis.

That was the first intimation Mr. West had of any change being made in his position as postmaster of Annapolis. As a reply to that letter, Mr. West wrote as follows to the Postmaster General :—

Annapolis, N.S., 19th January, 1897.

The Hon. W. Mulock,
Postmaster General, Ottawa.

Sir,—I am to-day in receipt of a letter from Mr. Macdonald, post office inspector for this division, informing me that he had instructions from you to cancel my appointment as postmaster for Annapolis.

I must say, to be summarily dismissed in this manner is most unexpected, and, in justice to myself and family, I beg to ask for an explanation, for up to the present moment no charge whatever has been brought against me, and I am completely at a loss to know the cause of my dismissal.

I hold a confirmation of my appointment from yourself, and surely, unless some cause is given, it will certainly be a piece of gross injustice to be thrown overboard in this way, and I would respectfully ask you to reconsider your decision until an investigation is made. My father had always been an active Liberal up to his death last year, as my friend Judge Forbes, of Halifax, can inform you, and never asked nor received a Government favour during his lifetime, and I am as strong a Liberal as he was, and the party has always received my support and assistance. I feel positive I have been in some way misrepresented by some one, and I trust you will, in justice to myself, investigate the matter before proceeding further, and if no charge is substantiated, I would ask you to kindly rescind the order for dismissal.

Your obedient servant,

H. A. WEST,

Postmaster.

The Mr. Forbes referred to in this letter is Mr. Frank Forbes, ex-M.P. for Queen's. In reply to that letter, Mr. West received the following :—

Post Office Department, Canada,
Ottawa, 23rd January, 1897.

Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 19th instant, requesting to be informed of the reasons for your removal from the postmastership of Annapolis; and in reply, am to inform you, that upon full consideration of the circumstances under which you were appointed to the Annapolis office in the month of June last, from which it was apparent that Mr. Corbitt, the former postmaster was induced to resign by the promise that you should succeed him, the Postmaster General decided to cancel your appointment.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

W. D. LeSUEUR.

H. A. West, Esq., Annapolis, N.S.

Now, what information had the Government, or what information had they, that :

It was apparent that Mr. Corbitt, the former postmaster, was induced to resign by the promise that you should succeed him.

Is there a scintilla of evidence before us? If there is I want the Postmaster General to show it or the Government to show it. If they base their evidence on that telegram, it does not amount to a snap of your finger for, when I sent that telegram, I sent it in haste, about five minutes before I stepped on the train on my way to Ottawa on a very important mission for myself, when I would not be very particular what sort of telegram I would send. However, it was sent, but I had in my hand at the time the unqualified and unconditional resignation of Mr. Corbitt. If an investigation had been held, there would have come out what I will now read to the House. I will give the solemn declarations of both Mr. Corbitt and Mr. West in reference to the matter, and these men are well known in the county of Annapolis as highly respectable and reputable men, who would not put in a solemn declaration statements that are not true. This is the declaration of the late postmaster, Arthur W. Corbitt, giving his reasons for resigning :

I, Arthur W. Corbitt, of Annapolis Royal, in the county of Annapolis, gentleman, do solemnly declare, that I was postmaster for the town of Annapolis Royal for about fifteen years previous to the month of July, 1896. That in said month of July, 1896, I resigned said office, and Henry A. West was appointed in my place. There was no collusion between said Henry A. West and myself with regard to my resignation of or his accepting said office, and there was no consideration of any kind for my said resignation, nor have I received any consideration or any agreement for any consideration from any person whomsoever.

Owing to the fact that I was becoming advanced in years, I had for some time had in contemplation the resignation of said office; and I resigned said office on account of my age, as aforesaid, and not otherwise.

I never, directly or indirectly, sold or agreed to sell my resignation of said office, or my consent to such resignation, or received or agreed to receive any reward or profit from the sale thereof.

I never, directly or indirectly, received or agreed to receive any reward or profit for any interest, request or negotiation about said office, nor under pretense of using such interest did I make any such request, nor was I concerned in any such negotiation, nor did I solicit, recommend or negotiate in any manner as to any appointment or to my resignation of said office, in expectation of any reward or profit.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

ARTHUR W. CORBITT.

Declared before me, at Annapolis Royal, in the county of Annapolis, and province of Nova Scotia, this 15th day of April, A.D. 1897.

HENRY DWIGHT RUGGLES,
Notary Public for Nova Scotia.

Mr. Corbitt is long past the allotted term of three-score years and ten. I have also the solemn declaration of Henry A. West :

I, Henry A. West, of Annapolis Royal, in the county of Annapolis, merchant, do solemnly declare, that I was appointed postmaster for the town of Annapolis Royal, and took charge of said office on the fifteenth day of July, 1896. Said appointment was confirmed by the present Dominion Government under instrument or writing dated August 24th, 1896, signed by William White, Deputy Postmaster General, and bearing the seal of the Post Office Department of Canada. In the month of January, 1897, I received notice in writing from Charles J. Macdonald, post office inspector for Nova Scotia, that my said appointment had been cancelled by the Postmaster General, and that the office would be transferred at an early day to Mr. G. Andrew Hardwick; which said transfer was made February 1st, 1897. I had received no intimation previous to said notice from said C. J. Macdonald, of any charge against me, and no reason was given in said notice for my said dismissal.

There was no collusion between said A. W. Corbitt, the late postmaster at Annapolis, and myself with regard to his resigning and my accepting said office, and no consideration of any kind for his said resignation, nor has said A. W. Corbitt received from me any consideration or any agreement for any consideration of such resignation.

I never, directly or indirectly, purchased or gave any reward or profit for the purchase of the resignation of said office by said A. W. Corbitt, nor for his consent to such resignation, nor did I agree or promise so to do, to any person whomsoever.

I never, directly or indirectly, gave or procured to be given any profit or reward, or made or procured to be made any agreement for the giving of any profit or reward, for any interest, request or negotiation about said office, to any person whomsoever.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true, and knowing that it is of the same force and effect as if made under oath and by virtue of "The Canada Evidence Act, 1893."

HENRY A. WEST.

Declared before me, at Annapolis Royal, in the county of Annapolis, and province of Nova Scotia, this 15th day of April, A.D. 1897.

HENRY DWIGHT RUGGLES,
Notary Public for Nova Scotia.

I may further state that I have not spoken to Postmaster Corbitt since the year 1891; I have had no communication with him with reference to this matter. He resigned his office, it was given to me to recommend an appointment, and I recommended the very best Liberal I could find—Mr. Henry A. West. The appointment of Mr. West, however, did not suit. Pressure was brought to bear upon the Hon. Attorney General Longley, if the truth is to be given to this House—pressure from a clique in Annapolis town. He was asked: "Use your influence to put West out; West was appointed by Mills, and that very fact is sufficient to justify you in putting him out and putting in our man, Mr. George Andrew Hardwick." So Mr. Longley used his influence with the Government. He boasted on the 27th of June, the very day I left Annapolis and sent that telegram, on the court-house steps of Annapolis, that the people of Annapolis had made a great mistake in not sending him to represent them, as they would then have had a very important Minister to represent the county of Annapolis. If the truth were known, Mr.

Mr. MILLS.

Longley was thoroughly disgruntled with the people at Ottawa for throwing him overboard. To give his own language, he said: "I have shaken the tree, and the Finance Minister has picked up the plums." Mr. Longley had to be appeased in some manner, and the Government took this method of appeasing him. I do not care how many lawyers there are in the Government, I say that any man who can say that the evidence before the Government can bring this case within the Criminal Code of Canada, is no longer fit to be a lawyer; yet the Postmaster General, who is a lawyer, says the Government have come to the conclusion that it comes within the Criminal Code of Canada. The Government have for Minister of Justice Sir Oliver Mowat, an eminent man. I do not believe that Sir Oliver Mowat has come to that conclusion, and I do not believe there is a lawyer in existence who will take the evidence as placed before this Government, and will honestly and conscientiously say that this case comes within the Criminal Code of Canada. Taking the evidence with which I supplemented this case, the whole matter is perfectly absurd. It is a disgrace, a blot upon the Government, to treat a man in the way Henry A. West has been treated. The practice in which the present Cabinet Ministers appear to glory is to strain themselves to discover and then condemn and punish without a hearing, as they have done in this case.

What has taken place within the knowledge of all of us? Mr. Francis G. Forbes was returned from Queen's County a member of this Parliament on the 23rd of June. He vacated his seat by taking the office of tide-waiter. He accepted the office of tide-waiter or some other such office in Prince Edward Island in order to make way for the present Finance Minister. He afterwards resigned that office and was appointed County Court Judge in Nova Scotia. One of our leading journals at the time, in noticing this shuffle, did not say much of Mr. Forbes's capabilities as a judge in law, but emphatically affirmed that he was a good judge of an opportunity. Then, again, what have we in New Brunswick? We have Mr. King, who was returned a member of Parliament for one of the constituencies in New Brunswick, voiding his seat by accepting the position of postmaster. What for? It was in order that he might afterwards become a senator, and he is now senator at Ottawa. Then, what was the case of the late-lamented Senator Béchard? He resigned; Mr. Tarte sits in his place, and Mr. Béchard was made a senator. Then there was Mr. Devlin, who also resigned and was afterwards appointed to a lucrative position in Ireland. Will any one say that these people did not know what their reward was going to be before they resigned? Will any one tell me that Mr. Francis G. Forbes, when he resigned, did not know that he was booked for a betterment? No one who knows the man will say that such was the case.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I say so.

Mr. MILLS. Of course, I have to accept the hon. gentleman's affirmation. Does he say that Mr. Forbes did not know?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE. I do.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman may possibly understand what was running in Mr. Forbes's mind, but I have considerable doubts of his statement even though it comes from the present Finance Minister.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Did Mr. McKeen know?

Mr. MILLS. I do not know. I am only putting the facts before the House, and people may draw their own conclusions. I say this, that if the Government came to the conclusion that there was collusion between ex-Postmaster Corbitt and ex-Postmaster West, we have infinitely more reason for concluding that there was collusion in these matters of Mr. King and Mr. Forbes and Mr. Béchard and Mr. Devlin, and that they came within the Criminal Code of Canada. It is more logical for any lawyer to say that these cases came within the Criminal Code of Canada than to say that the matter of ex-Postmaster Corbitt and ex-Postmaster West did so. That is what I submit, and I simply put the facts before the people, and let the people judge for themselves. I do not pretend to say what was in the mind of this man or the other, but simply state the facts. I know Mr. Forbes well enough to know perfectly well that he would never have resigned his position as member of Parliament for Queen's County unless he was convinced that he was booked for a betterment.

Mr. LANDERKIN. What would you think of Mr. McKeen? Tell us that. You know him pretty well.

Mr. MILLS. As I have said before, the hon. Postmaster General referred to the criminal law, he even went so far as to give us the section, in his reply to my question, and the section, section 137, reads as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly—

(a) sells or agrees to sell any appointment or resignation, or receives or agrees to receive any reward or profits from the sale thereof;

(b) or purchases or gives any reward or profit for the purchase of any such appointment, resignation or consent, or agrees or promises to do so.

The hon. Postmaster General, in answering my question, quoted those two subsections A and B, which shows that he had looked in to the matter and placed upon record his opinion. I must confess that I have not much respect for the law of the hon. Postmaster General; I must confess that I have not much respect for his legal knowledge if that is a sample of it. There is not a lawyer in Canada who will take the evidence of that telegram, or anything else they may have, unless it was an affidavit of lies—and if so, they must bring down the affidavits here in reply to this motion—who will come to the same conclusion. The hon. First Minister said that no one would be dismissed from office without an investigation unless it had come to the knowledge of the Minister that he was guilty of undue partisanship. If it has come to the personal knowledge of the Minister in this case, how has it come to his knowledge what has come? The only thing we have in the House that has come to his personal knowledge is the telegram I sent, which shows, upon the face of it, that I held at that moment the resignation of Mr. Corbitt in my hands. I have not seen the papers, but I know that the resignation was an unqualified one, and as I have not spoken to Mr. Corbitt since 1891, there could never have been between him and me any reference to that matter. He resigned and I was called upon to make the appointment, and I made it. I appointed the best, the most respectable Liberal I could find in Annapolis to that office, and he has been turned out without an investigation. He held the office for a few months, no doubt believing he would hold it for life, or for a reasonable time, at all events, and he went so far as to make his family, and other, arrangements for carrying on the office. He engaged assistants, the young men were there. Now where are they? They are out of the country altogether, in the United States seeking for other employment.

Now, if ever there was a case where tyranny has been exercised, this is that case. If ever there was a case in which the action of the Government should be condemned by the people, this is that case. Wherever this case is known in Annapolis county, the action of the Government is being condemned, except by a few personal enemies of the parties concerned—and every one has his personal enemies. It should be condemned by every right-thinking Liberal in this House; and I know I am looking into the eyes of dozens before me who, hearing these facts, if we could get at their inner consciences, would be found to condemn it, as it should be condemned.

Mr. FOSTER. Is there no defence?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). If the hon. gentleman desires me to speak on the question, I will.

Mr. FOSTER. I love to hear the hon. gentleman speak.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Mr. Speaker, the facts connected with this matter as appearing on record, perhaps should not be interpreted in the light of events that happened last June. But these events, while not, perhaps, material in connection with the formal act of dismissal, are not irrelevant to the matter in hand. The Government that preceded the present Administration was defeated at the polls on the 23rd of June last. Mr. Corbitt, the postmaster at Annapolis, so far as anything that appears in the department shows, had no intention of resigning that office until after that defeat. The first communication on record is one from the hon. gentleman from Annapolis (Mr. Mills) in the form of a telegram to the then Solicitor General (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper), offering the conditional resignation in question. My hon. friend (Mr. Milis) explains that in case he should have misstated the case there were, at the time, disturbing and pleasing circumstances more important at the moment to him, more pleasant, and therefore, very properly, more fully engaged his mind. If the hon. gentleman did not fully state the position of the matter, the mistake, of course, is his. He states that his nominee was a good Liberal. I am not aware that the Liberal party transferred the patronage of the riding to the hon. gentleman who made this motion. I am not aware that the person recommended by him was the choice of the Liberal party. There is a circumstance, perhaps, not connected with the matter, but yet it might go to indicate that the appointment of the Liberal in question was hardly made because he was a Liberal in politics. I am told that it is the advantage of the hon. gentleman who made this motion that he is not altogether a stranger to his nominee, Mr. West. I am told—it may be a mere coincidence—that Mr. West is a son-in-law of Postmaster Corbitt. I am told that the hon. gentleman who made this motion is likewise a son-in-law of Postmaster Corbitt, and that therefore Mr. West and the hon. gentleman who made this motion are what are commonly known as brothers-in-law. And so, perhaps, the desire to benefit a member of the Liberal party was not the dominant object of my hon. friend in telegraphing on the 27th of June to push through in all haste the appointment of his Liberal friend. Perhaps what he urged was more particularly the appointment of his brother-in-law, thinking that his brother-in-law being a Liberal, the Liberal party would not disturb him in the office. I think that we can cast aside this reference to the Liberal party by the hon. gentleman who made this motion. If they desired to have a representative in office they would probably choose a mouthpiece of their own; they will, at all events, when they have to deal with the Liberal Administration which is now in office here. Now, my hon. friend has proceeded to read affidavits and make statements concerning matters of which we have no record of any form in the department. The department has on record a telegram from the hon. gentleman himself, not an unconditional resignation of Mr. Corbitt, I presume—I have not had a chance to overhaul the papers to see if there is not an unqualified resignation. But when the hon. gentleman proceeds to say that he had an unqualified resignation in his possession, I ask him why he did not send up that unqualified resignation without qualifying it himself. Why did he hold on to the unqualified resignation, and send instead thereof a telegram in the following words:—

Mr. MULOCK.

Annapolis, N.S., 27th June, 1897.

Annapolis postmaster, Corbitt, will resign, if Harry A. West can be appointed in his stead.

Where is the unconditional resignation in this telegram?

Mr. HUGHES. That telegram was not sent to the department.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It was sent to the Solicitor General and the Solicitor General transmitted it to the Postmaster General with the request that he would act upon it. The telegram proceeds:

Do this if possible. Important. They won't disturb West. I have resignation for Ottawa.

(Sgd.) JOHN B. MILLS.

How is it, if this postmaster intended to resign unconditionally, he did not send his resignation in the regular way, instead of placing it in the hands of a representative of the party that had been defeated at the polls? The resignation in the telegram carries the qualification that it is only to be used in the event of the Government being parties to the deal and appointing the son-in-law of the person who holds the office. A straight bargain is to be made with the Government, a direct bargain and sale between the Government and the former postmaster. That is what is on record, unless the hon. gentleman discredits his telegram and says it never had an existence in fact. I have the original papers here, and here is the telegram to Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper in the very words I gave in my answer to the question that was asked me. And attached to the telegram is Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper's letter in the following words:

June 29th, 1896.

My dear Mr. Taillon,—Pray initial inclosed papers, and ask Colonel White to put them through. Corbitt resigns, and Mills of Annapolis recommends Harry A. West as successor.

Yours sincerely

(Sgd.) CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

To Hon. L. A. Taillon, Postmaster General.

The "inclosed papers" referred to consist of the telegram from the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mills). In the margin of this letter of Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, are the initials of Mr. Taillon, which means, according to the practice of the department, the appointment of the person named in the letter. So that there we have the Government in possession of these two documents, and two documents only, the telegram from the gentleman giving this unconditional resignation, the direct transmission of that telegram by a member of the late Government to his colleagues, and the action of the late Postmaster General on those papers, acting upon that supposed deal and transferring the office to the nominee Mr. West. Sir, there was a direct bargain and sale of an office. The resignation was not an unconditional one; it was a simple conditional resignation upon the consideration of the son-in-law getting the office instead of the father-in-law. All this matter that my hon. friend reads is entirely off the record. We have no knowledge of it, it is not binding. He may introduce extraneous matter now, but the plain fact remains that the late Government, acting upon this telegram, was proposing this improper deal. Now, my hon. friend refers to the Criminal Code. I did not proceed upon my own opinion, I did not proceed upon my own construction of the law. The Criminal Code that refers to such matters, is as follows:—

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells or agrees to sell any appointment to or resignation of any office.

Now, leaving out that part of the section which does not apply, the clause reads: Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells a resignation or an office. The selling of the office is giving the office to another man for a consideration, a valuable consideration.

Mr. POWELL. That is a new version of the law.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. It may be a new version of the law, but one of the highest legal authorities in this country, at all events, has expressed his opinion that this transaction was contrary to the spirit of that section.

Mr. POWELL. Who is he?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. Sir Oliver Mowat. I did not take action myself, on my own responsibility, nevertheless I would not have hesitated to do so. I submit that the transaction, quite apart from the circumstances, was one that should not have been allowed to stand, it was not a resignation in ordinary course. I will admit for the sake of argument, that a defeated Government may carry on the Queen's business, by appointing in the regular course; but that is a wholly different thing to creating a vacancy after the defeat of the Government in order that the defeated Government may exercise patronage. In this case there was an attempt to forestall the duly constituted Government that was about to be called in, there was an attempt to anticipate their duties. There was no necessity for this resignation so far as appears of record, but the whole transaction was an attempt to make use of the powers of a defeated Government, of a moribund Government, and if they had had any regard for the propriety of the situation, they would not have been parties to that improper deal. It was an improper transaction, so far as appears of record, in all these lights. It was an improper transaction for an hon. gentleman to be mixed up in this supposed deal; it is an improper thing for him to stand up in this House and profess that he was choosing a good Liberal to represent the Liberal party, when he knew full well that he was recommending a person who had, as a relative, at all events, so far as this Conservative nominator is concerned, much higher claims than as representative of the Liberal party. When did the hon. gentleman become so in love with the Liberal party that he picks out a Liberal in his riding and asks the Government to place him in office? Sir, commencing with that one wrong, that one improper act, the transaction is tainted with impropriety from that time until its conclusion, and the only time there was any purification or redemption for the transaction, was when it was righted by a duly constituted Government. My hon. friend says this transaction was inspired and instigated by the Hon. Mr. Longley, but that the people of Annapolis are entirely against it. Why, Sir, assuming that Mr. Longley is responsible for this transaction, never since he appealed to the people of Annapolis for support did he receive so large a measure of support as he did a month ago since this transaction took place. If that is the voice of public opinion, then the public of Annapolis at the polls endorsed Mr. Longley with a more marked degree of confidence than on any other previous occasion.

Mr. FOSTER. On 60 cents a ton for coal.

Mr. MILLS. And a deal with Whitney.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. That is one instance the hon. gentleman may refer to, but when the hon. gentleman says that the people of Annapolis are bursting with indignation against Mr. Longley, I think he ought to give them credit for not being purchasable by improper means, but rather, as the hon. member for King's (Mr. Foster) says, they are standing up for their ideas of virtue. No, Mr. Speaker, I think that Mr. Longley will be able to take care of himself in the future as he has done in the past few weeks as far as this act is concerned. I think this Government will be quite able to select the office-holders themselves, instead of appealing to the hon. gentleman from Annapolis to nominate Liberals when vacancies occur. I think, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing further that need trouble the House at this moment. I take full responsibility for the appointment, I defend it and endorse it in every respect; and if any other such transactions are brought to my notice, I will deem it my duty to pursue the same course as I did in this case, to submit the question to my colleagues, and to act upon their unanimous advice, as I did in this case.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman has worked himself up into that condition of feeling in the consideration of this case that, encouraged by the successes to which he has referred, the accidents of political life, he will pursue a bold policy, even if it be a cruel policy, and an absolutely unjustifiable one. I give him full credit for that, but he was not always so confident, he was not always so certain as to the correctness of the line upon which he had ventured in this very case. The hon. gentleman tells us today, as he felt it necessary to bring to his aid some other authority than the spirit which he displayed in this discussion—he tells us that the Minister of Justice has been consulted, that a great authority, such as the Minister of Justice undoubtedly is on questions of law, has given an opinion. And what is the opinion? The opinion is as to the spirit of an act. We know the spirit of the Government in connection with this matter, and it did not require Sir Oliver Mowat to stretch his legal conscience very far to be able to give the hon. gentleman the consolation of believing that the spirit of the Act was not wide enough to forbid the perpetration of the acts to which the hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) has called the attention of the House. But I wonder whether the Minister of Justice considered the spirit of that same act, and considered the spirit of several other transactions with which he was so very intimately connected. If we are to assume that the construction of the Postmaster General is correct in regard to the Criminal Code, it may be a very bad matter for Mr. West, and it may be a very bad matter for Mr. Corbitt; but I wish to point out that it is equally a bad matter for Sir Oliver Mowat, it is equally a bad matter for the Minister of Finance, for the Minister of Railways, and the several parties to the deal, as the hon. gentleman expresses it, that was had with this gentleman. There was a deal, a bargain and sale, if the hon. gentleman's argument be right, if his construction of the Criminal Code be sound, and there was a deal between Sir Oliver Mowat and the present Prime Minister, between the Minister of Finance and Mr. Forbes, also between the Minister of Railways and Canals and Mr. King. In each of these cases, as I shall show before I resume my seat, the evidence is on the same line as the evidence in this case, if not a little stronger. These are cases that it will be necessary to consider if the House comes to the conclusion that the extraordinary construction of the Criminal Code given by the Postmaster General be correct. But before going into that question, I should like to call the attention of the House to the letter of 30th January. It was an official letter going from the department under the supervision of the Postmaster General to the parties in question. This insinuation, and more than an insinuation—this very serious charge was not made in that letter, which was written perhaps under some protection of privilege. He did not couple the names of Corbitt and West in connection with that provision of the Criminal Code outside the walls of this House. No doubt after hearing the hon. gentleman's exposure of the extraordinary attitude assumed by the hon. Minister, he will take good care not to make those charges or insinuations without being sheltered and protected by the privilege that he here enjoys. The letter of 30th January is evidence that the Postmaster General at that time, at all events, knew there was no connection between the facts of this case and any criminal conduct, and that such a position was absolutely absurd. If, however, the hon. gentleman expects that we are to take seriously the construction he put on the transaction, it becomes necessary to ask hon. members' attention to the extraordinary circumstances that surround it. For that purpose, dealing first with the case of Sir Oliver Mowat, and following the hon. gentleman's own line of interpretation, I may say that such an interpretation will bring Sir Oliver Mowat within the same provision of the Criminal Code, and that is section 137. There is the same evidence of bargain and sale and the same evidence of a deal. I am not saying that such a monstrous construction of the code is sound, but that is the construction given by one of the hon. gentleman's own colleagues in a transaction in respect to this letter. After negotiations between the present Prime Minister and his colleague the Minister of Justice, Sir Oliver Mowat wrote, when the present Prime Minister was leader of the Opposition, in the sense in which one of the Prime Minister's colleagues now considers to be a negotiation for an office, a deal for an office, a bargain and sale for office, all being not only venal but highly criminal acts and within the Criminal Code. Sir Oliver Mowat wrote to the Prime Minister a long letter, of which the following was a part:—

When first the application was made to me, some weeks ago, to give up my position as Premier of Ontario and become candidate for a seat in the House of Commons, with a view to accepting a position in the Dominion Reform Government, which is confidently expected to follow the general elections, the proposal seemed to me to be out of the question, there being in Parliament, under your leadership, many able men and the general elections being likely to add to that number.

And he goes on later in the letter to discuss the proposal in regard to taking an office. This is not a question as to whether it was conditional, though the condition obtains in both transactions, but the parties are arranging in regard to acceptance of an office under the Crown. The Postmaster General thought that the action in the case now before the House was criminal and entirely unjustifiable.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). A senatorship is not an office under the Crown.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. The offer to Sir Oliver Mowat, as the hon. gentleman well knows, when he asked him to resign his position as Premier of Ontario, was not only the offer of a senatorship but also that of a member of the Government, and he said so in this letter, because, with his characteristic modesty, Sir Oliver said there were in Parliament many members under the leadership of the Prime Minister who were as fully entitled to the position as he was. Heaven forbid that, either as a lawyer or as a public man, I should accept such a monstrous and ridiculous construction of a transaction of this kind as the Postmaster General has put forward, but I am testing the absurd and ridiculous position in which he has placed himself in answering the question put to him in the House, and afterwards in seriously debating it and by attempting to bring those two gentlemen, as he said, within the spirit of the Criminal Code. Certainly any fair-minded man, I hesitate not to say, would hesitate before he brought that sort of a charge against men outside the House, the man making it occupying a position of privilege; unless the men were within the letter of the law any one would hesitate in expressing an opinion that they have brought themselves within the spirit of the law. I venture to declare, knowing the hon. Minister of Justice as I do, that Sir Oliver Mowat never intended that the weight of his name should be dragged into a debate here or anywhere else in regard to Corbitt or West.

Mr. MILLS. Did the hon. Postmaster General get the opinion of the Minister of Justice in writing?

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I doubt whether the Minister of Justice ever had such a proposition put before his department either verbally or in writing; or that any such absurd question was sent to the Department of Justice. The Postmaster General could not himself say that these men brought themselves within the provisions of the Criminal Code, but there was an unfair and utterly unjustifiable attempt to make the public believe that they had brought themselves within the code, because every one does not understand what is meant by the spirit of the code or the letter of the code. Those men are not guilty of crime, even in the opinion of the Postmaster General; he has not gone that far and is not prepared evidently to go that far, and I am glad to see that he does not go that far. But while it is admitted that those gentlemen have not brought themselves under the provisions of the code, the impression is spread abroad that they have been actually guilty of the offence. But in order to carry out this analogy, to show how ridiculous is the position of the Postmaster General, I want to refer to the case of the present Finance Minister. What is the position of that hon. gentleman, if the contention of the Postmaster General be correct? There was a bargain and sale, here was a deal between the Finance Minister and a former member of this House.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. You would like to turn out the Finance Minister, too.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Why does the hon. gentleman say so? If the hon. Minister were not entitled to his seat, I would be prepared to give my opinion on the matter being called to the attention of the House. Let me proceed and illustrate the position in which the construction of the code given by the Postmaster General places some of his colleagues. According to the hon. gentleman's argument, a bargain and sale was made. It makes no difference what was the understanding made with Mr. Forbes, who had represented Queen's for some years, and who accepted a sub-collectorship of a port in Prince Edward Island at a salary of $125 a year. There was an understanding that Mr. Forbes should not altogether be lost track of in that office, and that his career would not end as a sub-collector of customs at Tignish, or some other place in Prince Edward Island. It is even stated to me by friends on this side of the House, that Mr. Forbes openly stated when he left here, that he would have judicial perferment in his native province, and that he did not give up public life with a view of becoming unknown in the future. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) has placed his colleagues in an unfortunate position, in view of that understanding and in view of that resignation of Mr. Forbes, followed by the accession of the Finance Minister to this Parliament—and I believe the exchange was good for Parliament, no matter what I may think of the Finance Minister. The Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) in coming into Parliament under these circumstances, was, according to the idea of the Postmaster General, guilty of a bargain and sale, and corrupt deal, and he came within the spirit of these serious provisions in the Criminal Code.

So in the case of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Blair). That hon. gentleman (Mr. Blair) was even bolder about the business than the Finance Minister. In St. John, on the public platform, he talked about the way in which he got into Parliament, and spoke of his attempt being first directed towards borrowing a senatorship. Talk about the bargain and sale of office; here was a Minister of the Crown, a colleague of the Postmaster General, stating to the electors in New Brunswick that he found it impossible to borrow a senatorship for a little while.

And what was done in connection with that bargain and sale? Why, the Postmaster General must have passed sleepless nights over that transaction, because a member of this House was approached, and a member of this House was retired to a nominal office, and his seat vacated, and he at once placed in the Senate where he is at this moment, and presto, the Postmaster General had a colleague in the person of the Minister of Railways. The elements which are so objectionable to the Postmaster General in the Annapolis case, appear in those two other cases in a still more glaring light. Let us transpose the names in this telegram, and let us see the position into which the Postmaster General has so unfairly and uncharitably dragged his colleague. Let us take the first telegram, and see how it works out :

Annapolis.

To Postmaster General.

Forbes will resign, if Fielding can be appointed in his place. Do this, if possible. Important. They won't disturb Fielding. I have resignation for Ottawa.

Then again :

Pray initial inclosed papers, and have them put through. Forbes resigns, and Longley, of Annapolis, recommends Fielding as successor.

Any one knowing the Minister of Finance and Mr. Longley the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, will understand how willingly Mr. Longley would lend his name as a recommendation to the present Finance Minister for a position in this Cabinet. We could make this even more interesting by reading the name of the Minister of Railways into the correspondence. For instance:

King will resign, if Blair can be appointed in his stead. Do this, if possible. Important. They won't disturb Blair. I have resignation for Ottawa.

And so in the letter to Mr. Taillon, a very easy transposition of these names could be made. If that be so, and if there is any sense in what the Postmaster General says ; if his construction of the spirit of the Act will hold water, there is no doubt that the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Finance are in a very awkward position, and they have the serious opinion of the Postmaster General to contend with.

But, there seems to be another charge against postmaster West, and it seems that this other was the real offence. Mr. West got no reason for his dismissal other than that stated in the letter of January 13th, namely, that his predecessor had been induced to resign on the promise of Mr. West's succession to the office. That is the offence that we have been discussing, not put in the language, the offensive language if I may say so, used by the Postmaster General in this House. But the real offence came out in debate, and that was, that in some way or other the present hon. member for Annapolis (Mr. Mills) is indirectly connected with Mr. West. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) dwelt for a long time on that feature of the case. He spoke about conditional resignations, and a casual listener might have supposed that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) brought this transaction within the provisions of the Criminal Code. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) founded his argument on the telegram of the 27th June, 1896, and the letter of the 29th of June, which was my own. But the hon. gentleman will not, on reflection, claim that the offer of a civil servant to-day, that he will resign if his brother, or if his father, or if his son be appointed, comes within clause 137 of the Criminal Code. The hon. gentleman values his position at the bar too highly to offer any opinion of that character. What is there in either of these letters outside of unfair suspicion, outside of the ex parte statements that may have been made to the Postmaster General, and outside of party exigencies ; what is there, at the worst, except the simple fact that the offer was made : If you can appoint West, I, an officer of the service, and old at that, will resign in favour of West. No Minister on the Treasury benches will say that that is within the spirit of the Criminal Code, or, that it can be visited with punishment of any kind whatever. There was nothing clandestine in this. The correspondence was sent in the most open manner to the Postmaster General, and there was no suggestion that these papers should be treated in any other way than they have been. He was asked in my letter to initial the matter and to put it through, and his initials were required for the action to be taken by the Deputy Postmaster General at that time, and having taken the action the foundation for it remains on record. These two letters constitute, as the Postmaster General has told us, the evidence upon which he has dismissed this man. I am satisfied that no fair-minded man will say from reading that correspondence, that there is anything more than a conditional offer of resignation. I am certain that neither Sir Oliver Mowat, nor any member of the legal profession in the Cabinet will say that that transaction comes within the spirit of the Criminal Code.

Now, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Mulock) referred to Mr. Longley's majority in 1897. I may tell him, that so far from this transaction having assisted Mr. Longley—if that be an argument in the matter—I find that Mr. Longley had 76 votes in Annapolis town in 1894, and, that after this indefensible treatment was accorded to Mr. West, Mr. Longley had 64 instead of 76 votes in Annapolis at the last election.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Copy of the report of the commissioner appointed to investigate into the charges made against the postmaster at Cobourg and the collector of customs there, and others implicated in such charges, and the evidence taken in such investigation, and all papers, letters, telegrams and documents filed in such investigation, and all correspondence to and from the Government relating thereto.—(Mr. Cameron.)

Copy of the evidence taken by Inspector Fletcher when investigating charges made last November against the postmaster of Northfield, British Columbia.—(Mr. Davin.)

Return of all correspondence between officers of the militia and others with the Minister of Militia and the Major General Commanding relating to brevet promotion and General Order 73, 1896.—(Mr. Bain.)

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

EXPORT DUTY ON PULP-WOOD.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I want to take the opportunity of bringing a matter of considerable urgency before the Government. I am glad to see the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) in his place. I mentioned to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) that I would take the opportunity at 8 o'clock of drawing the attention of the Government to this matter. I have received a communication stating :

The season for peeling the bark from pulp-wood has now arrived. It lasts two months. The custom is to peel wood now, and ship it next winter. It is very important to know if the Government, in case they impose a duty on pulp-wood, will allow that peeled this spring to be exported free of duty next winter. Unless the Government will declare that they do not intend to impose an export duty, or that, if they do impose one, they will allow wood peeled this spring to go out free of duty, no one will dare to contract for peeled wood, and in that case very little will be done.

I do not, of course, expect a declaration from the Government on this matter, but as it is one of great urgency, and as it was intimated by the Minister of Finance that the Government would state their policy upon this question at a later period, I wish to draw the attention of the Government to the importance of making as early a declaration as possible of what their policy is to be ; and if it be to impose a duty on pulp-wood, I hope they will state that that which is peeled now will be allowed to be shipped next winter free of duty. I will leave this memorandum in the hands of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The matter, I perceive, is one of importance. Of course, the hon. gentleman does not expect an answer immediately, but I will take note of the matter, and will give an answer at the earliest possible moment.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Mr. McMULLEN moved second reading of Bill (No. 29) in further amendment of the Civil Service Act. He said : In moving the second reading of this Bill, I desire to state as shortly as possible the reasons why I consider it necessary that some measure of this kind should be placed on the statute-book of this country. Any person who has read the reports of the Civil Service Commission, that of 1881 and that of 1892, which inquired into the question of improving the condition of our civil service, must come to the conclusion that there are considerably more civil servants in this country than are really required. I have given these reports considerable attention, and after a thorough and careful perusal of them, I have come to the conclusion that there is no other way in which the civil service of this country can be reduced to proper proportions and made efficient to render the services to which the country is entitled in return for the ample salaries that are paid, than by the appointment of a board of civil service supervisors. I do not want to deprive any Minister of the patronage of the department over which he presides ; that is not intended. It cannot be expected that any Minister is going to watch so closely the details of the work performed in his own department as to be able to judge accurately the exact number of civil servants that should be employed, and the amount of work performed by each. That duty devolves largely upon the deputy head of the department. It is admitted in the reports to which I have referred that most of the deputy heads, partly out of sympathy for those placed under them, do not desire to reduce their staffs. They are not personally interested, and they cannot be expected to handle the staffs of their departments with that measure of economy that would secure to the country an ample return for the money paid and the staffs provided. A board of civil service supervisors is not a new thing. In some of the Australian colonies such a board exists. Its duties are very well defined—to inspect the several departments, to readjust the labour of those departments, to report to the heads of the several departments recommending certain changes, and to ask the concurrence of the heads of those departments therewith. I do not say that the Bill I have submitted is the best that could be framed. It may be amended and improved, but what I contend is that some measure of civil service reform is absolutely necessary. I have stated that, in my humble opinion, there are thousands of civil servants in the service of the country more than is absolutely required, and I have reached that conclusion from a perusal of the reports of the various Civil Service Commissions which have inquired into the matter. No one who examines those reports can come to any other conclusion. In the evidence given before these commissions, the statement is made in several cases clearly and distinctly that there are more civil servants than are really required. In the report of 1881 you will find, at page 21, the following recommendation by the Civil Service Commission :

Having arrived at the conclusions above stated as to the advantages of the system we recommend, we have now to propose the means for giving effect to our suggestions. This, we believe, can only be satisfactorily accomplished by the constitution of a Board of Civil Service Commission as free from political influence as the judiciary happily is. Through the action of this board we propose to refer all those cases which have hitherto hampered and impaired the administration of the civil service. We propose that this board shall be composed of men holding an independent position and capable of commanding general confidence. It should consist of three members, one of whom should be a French Canadian, and they should be appointed in the same manner and hold office on the same tenure as the judges. We believe that the judgment and decisions of an impartial tribunal thus constituted would command the respect and confidence of the public and of the service.

Then again they state further :

It has been made abundantly manifest to us that, as stated in the order of reference, there are in the service men who, from causes therein named, are not and never will become efficient public servants, and that the number employed is largely in excess of the requirements of the service.

This, we believe, is mainly due to the prevailing manner of making appointments and promotions. We have found, too, that there are men working side by side, performing duties of an identical character, between whose salaries there are material and unreasonable differences.

That I take from the report of 1881. Then let me take the report of 1892. In the report the commissioners recommended :

A Board of Civil Service Commissioners shall be constituted, consisting of five members, to be from time to time appointed by the Governor in Council

From time to time, either by direction of the Governor in Council, or of its own motion, to inquire into and report upon the state and management of the business of the several departments of the service and the conduct of the persons employed therein, so far as relates to their official duties.

That is the recommendation of the board of 1892. Then we have, in Appendix Q of the same report, evidence of the over-manned condition of the departments :

Mr. McMULLEN.

As long as politics and politicians, party and patronage have so much to do with the working of a Government department, and judging from the reports of all Civil Service Commissions during the past twenty years, I do not believe the civil service can be very much improved unless the Government really intend to reorganize or reform all the departments, unless common sense and businesslike system, principles and management are introduced into all the branches of the Post Office Department, and every man employed, from deputy to messenger, realizes he is earning his bread and butter and his services are recognized, it will be impossible to expect all clerks to work efficiently. Before an improvement can be carried out, it is necessary that all idlers, loafers, incompetents and redundants should be "weeded out," as they are and always have been a nuisance, if no help to any official or efficient clerk, and a disgrace to the service.

* * * * *

In fact, too many men and women are appointed to the civil service merely to give them the means of receiving pay or salary, and many of them not educated or qualified for office work.

That is in the report of 1892, and it clearly proves that the departments are altogether over-manned. Hon. gentlemen opposite, wherever there was room at all to put an additional clerk, crowded one in, and the result is that to-day we have employees in the departments far in excess of what is absolutely necessary. Now, we know perfectly well from the evidences we have met, when we come to pass the Estimates, the growing tendency, from year to year, on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite to make new appointments by dividing up work, and thus finding places for men who never should have entered the service at all. To such an extent has this been carried on that it has become a matter of great moment to devise a means by which the service may be reduced to its proper proportions, and these superfluous men dispensed with. It is not right that the country should be loaded down with an enormously expensive staff, which is not giving any fair return or measure of service for the money they receive. I am satisfied that if the head of each department were to set to work and attempt to make these reductions, he would be met on all hands by ardent appeals not to dismiss some of those unnecessary clerks. There may be some in the service with families wholly dependent on them who are entitled to the sympathy of the Minister, but a case came under my notice in which a most ardent appeal was made to continue a man in office simply because he happened to be the son of a widow. I investigated the case myself, and I found that the appeals made on his behalf to the department were entirely fictitious. There was no ground whatever for sympathy under the circumstances. The other members of the family were employed, earning fairly good salaries, and quite capable of living without the salary of this young man. By the method I have outlined in this Bill, I believe a lot of those men will be got rid of. The fact of the matter is that the civil service has been turned into a breeding ground of indolent men and loafers, because idleness will produce loafers. Men in the service are standing around virtually doing nothing. I do not say that the service is entirely composed of men of that kind. I quite admit that there are splendid men in it. I quite admit that there are a great many put there that were failures in other callings in life, who tried many things, and at last have been foisted on the country through the efforts, possibly, of the representatives of their constituencies appealing to the Government or in some other way. We know that there are plenty of that stamp there from the abstract I have read of this report in 1892. An officer who had been thirty years in the service declares that the service is full of loafers and idlers, men who do not perform the service for the country for which they are paid. Under these circumstances I hope the Government will lend their confidence and assistance to the passage of this Bill. I believe that if they do, it will relieve them of a great amount of trouble. These supervisors, if appointed, will go through the departments, inspect the work that has been performed and will easily detect those who are doing little or nothing in the service. They will be empowered, if the Bill passes, to dismiss these men. They will be called upon to report to the head of the department in such case, what they have done. At the end of each year a statement will have to be presented to the House within fifteen days, just as now in the case of the superannuations, giving names of those servants whose services have been dispensed with, and stating fairly and distinctly the reasons why. I think that this will result in a very considerable reduction in the numbers of civil servants. But what I consider will be far better in the interests of the country is that the service will be just as complete and just as satisfactory. I have given a good deal of consideration to this question; I have read the several reports, and I have come to the conclusion that there is no method by which we can purge the civil service of unnecessary, incompetent men except by some such method as I suggest. That is the reason of introducing this Bill, the second reading of which I have now the honour to move.

Mr. SPROULE. While I fully agree with the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) that some change is desirable, in the interests of the country in order to secure economy, still I think that if the Bill passes it will be far from accomplishing what the hon. gentleman aims at. The Bill seems to be very crude, very brief, and would be of very little use if it were crystallized into law. Some of its defects are so apparent that they may be seen at a glance. Some defects which the hon. gentleman hopes to remedy by this Bill would not be touched at all. My first objection is that the effect of the Bill will be to create three new offices, to be filled by men who hold office during good behaviour and can only be removed on a joint address from the House of Commons and the Senate—three irresponsible officers who are to hold their places so long as they endeavour, according to their own lights, at all fairly to discharge their duties. It must be apparent to any one that these three officers cannot understand the demands of the service in the various departments. They are not clothed with power to arrange the service in the various departments so as to economize labour. They cannot do as a man would in his own private business—arrange the labour under his direction so as to make the best use of the time; but they will be obliged to leave the work go on according to the system arranged under the superintendence of the Minister or Deputy Minister in each department. This being so, it will be impossible for them to say that a smaller number of men must do the work. It is provided that the board of supervisors may suspend or remove civil servants. For what? For misconduct or unfitness. Who is to be the judge of the fitness or unfitness? Is not that man the best judge who is charged with the responsibility of distributing and supervising the work of these officers from day to day? Or would it be more likely that a stranger coming in, whose duty it is to inspect the books of the department once a year, though he is to have access to the department at all times, will understand the fitness of the men rather than the chief clerk or Deputy Minister under whose eye they are working from day to day? I think it would be unreasonable to expect it. If the supervisor acted at all, it would be upon the recommendation of the men whose duty it is to take cognizance now of the work of these civil servants. If this board were constituted under the present law, I think it would practically be of little value in improving the service. While I admit that there is great need for some such measure it should be a very comprehensive measure that will cover the whole ground and put the civil service under some other authority than the political authority. I do not think that this Bill will accomplish that object. Even if the Bill were to pass, we should soon fall back into the old channels. When a civil servant was discharged pressure would be brought to bear on the head of the department, and if the Minister happened to be friendly to him, that might be easily enough to secure his reinstatement, competent or incompetent, regardless of the judgment of the board of supervisors.

Mr. CRAIG. I have been looking at this Bill, and I would like to state some objections that occur to my mind, and which, no doubt, will occur to the mind of the public. I first ask: What is the object of this Bill? As stated by the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen) who has introduced it, the object is a very good one. But I think that the accomplishment of that object would depend in a great measure upon the composition of this board of civil service supervisors. If the members of this board were all appointed from the Liberal party, I think that the natural conclusion on the part of the public would be that the board was appointed not to improve the service so much as to get rid of a good many Conservatives who are now in the service. I do not say that that is the object that the hon. gentleman has in mind, but I repeat that, if all the members of the board were appointed from the Liberal party, that would be the object apparent to the people, and especially to Conservatives throughout the country. If a board like this is to be appointed, it should be appointed in such a way as to give confidence to the country and to carry out the object sought which is the improvement of the civil service. I think that a Bill of this kind should not be introduced in this House by a private member, but should be introduced by the Government and be taken charge of by the Government who would then have full responsibility for the measure. In looking at the Bill as it stands, it seems to me that there are some objections apparent on the face of it, as stated by the hon. gentleman who preceded me (Mr. Sproule).

I find there are to be three members of this board. Now, why three members? It is stated that one of the duties of this board is to inspect all books kept by members of the civil service:

All books kept in those places should be open to their inspection, and should be inspected by them at least once during every fiscal year.

Now, the question comes to my mind, What is meant by the word "inspect" there? Does it mean merely turning over the leaves and looking at those books to see if the writing is clear and orderly, or does it mean a thorough inspection? I hold, if it means a thorough inspection, that it will be impossible for these men to inspect all the books in the course of a year, and it says they are to inspect them at least once a year. Then, the question arises, Are all three to inspect the books, or may one inspect one book and another inspect another book?—only in that case, I think the matter is made still worse because then the whole responsibility, instead of resting on the three members of the board, would rest on one member of the board, and we might just as well have one member as have no real responsibility. So I think that is one very great defect, because if we are going to have three, all three should be responsible and all three should know the circumstances of each case, and I think that would be impossible under the circumstances. But their duty is not only to inspect the books once a year, but I find that they are to be clothed with very great powers in regard to dismissals. Now, there are three reasons given for which they may dismiss any employee: First, misconduct; second, unfitness; and, third, if they consider he is not required. Well, now, I imagine that they might be given power to dismiss for misconduct. It says when the servant is clearly shown to be guilty of misconduct. If he was guilty of misconduct that everybody could see the misconduct, there might be some force in that; but as has been already asked, Who is to be judge of what misconduct is? Is the Government, is Parliament, to lay down a rule by which misconduct should be known, or is that to be left entirely to this board, consisting of three, who, as I say, may belong to one party? And is the employee in the civil service to be left entirely at their mercy as to what is misconduct? We know that misconduct is a very wide term. It may mean something very bad, or it may mean something which hardly amounts to anything. Yet if they say that he is guilty of misconduct, without any trial, with just their own word for it, then they are to have power to dismiss him. It seems to me that that is a very great power indeed, it is clothing them with far too much power. I think if they are to have power to dismiss for misconduct, then the word "misconduct" should be defined by this Bill, and should be defined by this Parliament. But if he be not guilty of misconduct, and still they want to get rid of him, what is the next step? Then this board may dismiss him if they consider that he is unfit for the discharge of his duties. Well, now, that is giving them still more opportunity to get rid of a man whom they want to get rid of. They can say, He is guilty of misconduct, or, We do not think he is fit to discharge his duties, he does not discharge them in a way that, in our opinion, he ought to do. If they decide in their own minds without any standard at all, that he is unfit, then by this Bill they would have the power to discharge that employee and dismiss him from the service. But he may not be guilty of misconduct, and he may not be unfit, even in their opinion, to discharge the duties of his office, and yet they have another power at their disposal, that is they may say that he is not required. They may say, We do not say that he has been guilty of misconduct, we do not say that he is unfit to discharge the duties of his office, but we do say that he is not needed in the service. Now, what greater power can they have? I think this is giving them greater power than the Government themselves would take. The Government now assumes this power. They have said in this House that they will not dismiss any member of the civil service unless he is proved guilty of offensive partisanship. They have laid down that opinion; and here they propose to constitute a board that shall be able to dismiss any man from the civil service just because they want to do it. I am not saying they would do it, but I am saying they will have power to do it if this Bill becomes law. Not only that, but the board does not need at all to give the employee a chance to defend himself. If he is charged with misconduct he may have no opportunity to defend himself at all. They may say, You are guilty of misconduct. Well, that settles the whole question. The Bill says they must report to the Government and report to Parliament within fifteen days after Parliament meets, but then the mischief is all done so far as that is concerned. He may be out of office months before that time, he may have to turn himself to something else, and he may be branded before the country of being guilty of misconduct without an opportunity of defending himself. Then he has no chance to prove that he is not unfit, and it may be said that he does not require to, because he can show his record. But he is subject entirely to this board, composed of three members. Besides, so far as I can see in that Bill, there is no appeal from their decision in time to do him any good. Now, as I said before, the effect of this Bill depends altogether on the composition of this board. At the present time, as the Liberal party is in power, I will say that if the three members of this board were members of the Liberal party, it would be very difficult to make the country believe that this board would be impartial. It would be almost impossible to make them believe it, such is the position of politics to-day; and I think the civil service employee would a great deal rather have things left as they are, and trust to the Government itself to deal with his case than to have a board of this kind judging him and pronouncing sentence upon him. Of course, it is said that the object of the Bill is to improve the service. Then if this Bill is to be pressed forward, I think there should be no question that one member of this board should be a Conservative. I notice in the extracts read by the hon. member for North Wellington, that the board proposed in his Bill is called an impartial board. Well, I should call an impartial board at the present time and in the present condition of affairs, a board composed of, say, two Liberals and one Conservative. If the finding of the board is not unanimous then, of course, the Conservative member would be entirely overruled; but if three men were picked out who were fairly impartial, as impartial as we can find men, if two Liberals and one Conservative were appointed, then this board might do some good. But if all three were Liberals, then I am afraid there would be very little confidence felt in this board throughout the country, and I am afraid, almost, that we would find that a great many of those who were dismissed would be Conservatives, especially as at the present time a great majority of those in the service are Conservatives, and that is where the difficulty would come in. Now.

Mr. CRAIG.

Sir, this Bill, I think, is directly contrary, as it is proposed, to all the principles of the Liberal party. Instead of being a Bill which gives a man every chance for his liberty, it would give a man no chance at all for his liberty. The same board would be judge and jury and executioner. I think, under these circumstances, that we ought to hesitate before we give our assent to this Bill. I would say again in conclusion that I think a Bill of this great importance should not be introduced into the House by a private member, but if we must have a Bill of this nature, let it be introduced by the Government, let them take the responsibility, and let them try to frame a Bill which will give satisfaction to all parties.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not suppose that the House is going to read this Bill a second time without the Government showing its policy upon it.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Certainly not.

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to ask my hon. friend if he will say what he is going to do?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The matter to which my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has directed the attention of the House is no doubt one of very considerable importance. The proposed scheme is novel so far as this Parliament is concerned, and differences of opinion have been expressed in this House to-night, as might reasonably have been anticipated under the circumstances. The debate, no doubt, has had the effect of directing attention to the matter, and perhaps a further opportunity of considering the scheme would be in the public interests. I would therefore request my hon. friend, after this discussion, which has brought out some useful expressions of opinion, to allow the Bill to be withdrawn for the present, and he may again introduce it at a later session, after the public have had a fuller opportunity of considering its provisions. I listened to my hon. friend's remarks, and he will perhaps permit me to say, lest some misunderstanding might arise, that I am sure he did not intend to characterize the whole civil service as unfaithful servants. It may be there are some whose services to the public could be very well dispensed with; but speaking of the large staff with which I have more or less to do, representing, perhaps one-third of the whole service of Canada, I would not be doing my duty by them if I did not say that on that staff are to be found as faithful men as in any walk of life. Of course there are exceptions, and those exceptions have to be dealt with by legislation. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will withdraw the measure now.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have no desire to press on the consideration of the House this Bill in any hurry. My conclusions have been formed from the attention I have given to the organization of the civil service during the last fifteen years. I have no desire to appoint a board of this kind for the purpose of decapitating a lot of Conservatives, as the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Craig) has stated. I am not actuated by any such motive.

Mr. CRAIG. I did not attribute any such motive. I said if the services were composed wholly of Liberals, the country might look at it in that way; but I did not attribute to the hon. gentleman the motive he has suggested.

Mr. McMULLEN. My only desire is to have the civil service purged of unnecessary and incompetent men. While I respect the statement made by the Postmaster General, I say this, that I have read the evidence of one of the officers of a department who said that he had been in the same room with men for thirty years who were incompetents and loafers. Now, incompetent men must be there when such evidence is given by an officer over his own signature.

Mr. SPEAKER. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that he has no right to reply. I understood he was going to make a proposition to withdraw the Bill.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have been asked by the Postmaster General to consent to the withdrawal of the Bill. I should like a more definite statement from the Government with reference to this Bill before I consent to withdraw it. There is, however, an evident desire to have a short session, and it appears to be the feeling on both sides of the House—

Mr. FOSTER. That is a good statement to sit down on.

Mr. McMULLEN. The hon. gentleman need not talk about backing down, because he knows I am not accustomed to do that kind of thing. I state now to the House that I give the recess to the Government for the consideration of this question. I will, however, take the earliest opportunity next session to introduce the same Bill, and I will press it to a division, unless some move has been made in the meanwhile in the direction of purging the civil service of the unnecessary number of officers we have there to-day.

Bill withdrawn.

WOOD MOUNTAIN SCOUTS.

The House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davin:

That in the opinion of this House the time has arrived when the claims of the Wood Mountain Scouts to secure scrip or land warrants for services rendered by them during the rebellion, should be settled.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier.) I had not the advantage of being in the

Mr. McMULLEN.

House the other day when the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) moved this motion. Looking at the remarks he made on that occasion, I find he is prepared, so far as he has an opinion on the subject, to advise the Government at once to grant scrip to the persons who are known in this motion as the Wood Mountain Scouts. I have had occasion since I have been in the department over which I now preside, and having the North-west Mounted Police under my charge, to look over the claims of these men. They are comparatively few, and if these stood alone, probably it would be possible to deal with them at once in the manner suggested, that is to say, by granting scrip to those who, during the rebellion in 1885 acted on the American frontier as scouts in order to preserve peace in that part of the country and in order to prevent the invasion of our territory by American half-breeds. My hon. friend is aware of this, that there are to-day in the North-west more than one class of Her Majesty's subjects pressing for claims to be adjusted. There are not only the Wood Mountain Scouts, but there are several parties who are petitioning the Government and strongly urging on the Government that many of the claims for losses accruing during the rebellion have not been satisfied. We have received numerous petitions, from all parts of the territories, and especially from the seat of the rebellion, stating that many of Her Majesty's subjects who suffered at the time grievous losses have not yet obtained the satisfaction which they ought to obtain. Another class of claimants are also pressing their views on the Government. My hon. friend is aware that the half-breeds have petitioned for the extinguishment of the Indian title and to be treated as the Manitoba half-breeds were treated. The Manitoba half-breeds were treated in this way: In 1870, when we took possession of the country, the law which was then passed was to the effect that all those half-breeds at that time, that is all the heads of families and all the children born before 1870, were entitled to scrip. The head of a family received 120 acres of land and a child born before 1870 received 240 acres. A commission was issued in 1885 to settle the half-breed claims. Shortly after the opening of the rebellion, they were settled with under that law, that is to say, the half-breeds of the North-west were treated in the same manner as the half-breeds in Manitoba had been treated, and arrangements would go back to 1870 and not before that year; whereas, the claim now put forward by the half-breeds of the North-west is that the date of their claims should go back to 1885—that fathers of families and children born since 1885 should receive scrip. I am not prepared to say whether it would be fair or unfair, just or unjust to accept these claims made by the half-breeds. But one point I want to press on the attention of my hon. friend is this: It is the intention of the Government during the recess to investigate all these claims, those of the Wood Mountain Scouts, those of the half-breeds for additional scrip in order to extinguish Indian claims arising out of rebellion losses, and in so far as possible, to acknowledge all these claims for scrip. I would therefore ask my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) not to press his motion further at the present time. I may add this: My hon. friend is aware that the scrip which has formerly been given to compensate half-breeds or others, has not been a source of profit to those in whose favour it has been issued. My hon. friend will, I think, agree with me, that the scrip issued in the settlement of claims has been squandered, and that it would perhaps be advisable for the Government to endeavour to find some method, by which the scrip thus issued should be more profitable to the parties receiving it, than has been found to be the case up to the present time. That is a question, as to which also, the Government intend to have some investigation. I repeat, that it is the intention of the Government, during the recess, to investigate all these claims. This is a subject which will be taken in hand by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior with a view, first of all, to ascertain how far and to what extent these different classes of subjects of Her Majesty are entitled to compensation for losses, for service, or otherwise; and secondly, if they are entitled to compensation, whether scrip is the better way to compensate them; and, again, if scrip is issued, what would be the best method to be followed, so that the scrip might be as profitable to them as possible. This being the statement I have to make to my hon. friend, I hope he will not press this motion further, and that he shall be satisfied to leave the case in the hands of the Government, reserving to himself of course, upon a future occasion—if this settlement we have to offer is not satisfactory to him—to have liberty of action to move in the manner which he thinks best in the interests of those he represents.

In so far as this claim of the North-west mounted scouts is concerned, I may say that my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) has shown on all occasions (whether his friends were in office or not) the most creditable efforts to have these claims considered. He has not succeeded so far, but I hope that perhaps the day is not far distant, when his efforts shall be crowned with success.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I am going, Sir, to act on the suggestion of the Prime Minister. But, preliminary to saying a few words in regard to the ideas propounded by my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier), I may be allowed to say, that in acting on the suggestion of the Prime Minister, I am going against the views laid down by some of his colleagues and by some of his principal supporters. If the Conservatives were in power and the Prime Minister of the day suggested to me to withdraw that motion, and I acceded to his request, we should have heard in this House some jeers and we should have had in some of the Liberal papers in the west, and probably in the enlightened Liberal journals of Toronto, statements that I had backed down. That, Sir, would not deter me from doing what is the right thing to do. I wish to point out, now that there is a Liberal Government in power, that in the interests of parliamentary life and in the interests of the country, the usefulness of a member of Parliament, be he Liberal or Conservative, is limited, if it be erected a principle in the minds of the people, that whenever he moves a motion in this House he is invariably to divide the House. That is a proposition that would not have received much welcome at the hands of the supporters of the Prime Minister in other days. But, now that he and his friends have the responsibility of office on their shoulders, it is a proposition which will be pleasing to them. I must say for the Prime Minister, that when he was leader of the Opposition he never descended to lay down any such principle, which he as a statesman knows, limits the usefulness of a member of Parliament on whichever side of the House he sits. I am not afraid, Sir, to do at the suggestion of the Prime Minister what I would do if my own party were in power. When the leader of a political party, having a majority in this House, tells you that he intends to consider the views that you have placed before him, and that he will do his best to embody and crystallize your views into legislation; what on earth, except clap-trap, is to be had by dividing the House? There are occasions I grant you, and those occasions I have availed of when my own party was in power, when a member should divide the House, as in 1891, when I divided the House and reduced the majority of the Government to fourteen. Statements have been made, even this session (but I cannot refer to a past debate), statements have been made from time to time in this House, that I have put forward propositions, and that in no case did I divide the House. Well, Sir, I have been looking over "Hansard," in respect to a remark that was made by one of the colleagues of the Prime Minister, and I could give him a pretty long session if I undertook to show the number of times I divided the House, and even opposed my own party in fighting, sometimes for the half-breeds in the North-west, and sometimes for the farmers, and accomplishing things which to-day the statute-book shows that I accomplished.

My hon. friend the Prime Minister, very properly says, that this question is one that concerns the Wood Mountain scouts, the half-breeds generally, and it was probably a lapse of memory that he did not mention the North-west Mounted Police. I am exceedingly glad the Prime Minister is determined to take up all these claims, and especially the claims of the North-west Mounted Police. In that rebellion they behaved as gallantly as any other set of men. Why is it that they have been refused the reward that has been given to others; why is it that they have been refused the decorations that have been given to others, except in rare instances? Why should they have had this injustice, as I hold it was, dealt out gratuitously to them. I am exceedingly glad, therefore, that that question is about to be taken up. I am exceedingly glad that the claim, generally, of the half-breeds will be taken up, and above all, I am glad to have the assurance, that during the recess the Government will consider the claims of those gallant men, who, on the border that divides Canada from the great republic below, so controlled the turbulent half-breeds and Indians who were ready to burst into fire and flame at the bidding of Riel, and who on that perilous border guarded the interests of Canada and performed as effective work as was performed by any in that rebellion.

I am quite sure, Sir, that when the Government looks into the matter they will find that in the Mounted Police there are men who will stand out in their true colours as having behaved heroically for Canada. I am also sure, that even if their attention be directed to corps after corps of those who fought in that rebellion, no corps, or no body of men among any scouts, will they find more gallant, and more chivalrous, than the Wood Mountain scouts. I look upon the promise of the Prime Minister as a guarantee, and I hope fondly that we shall not be disappointed. I take the promise of the Prime Minister as an assurance that the claim of these men will at least be satisfied. The Prime Minister referred to the fact that I had fought for scrip for others. He seems to have forgotten that, in regard to the volunteers in the North-west Territories who were deprived for some years of the scrip to which they were entitled, I moved year after year against my own friends when they were in power; and that in 1891 I divided the House and brought down their majority to fourteen, when Sir John Thompson came across the House and told me that he would put all my Bills in the Government paper, and he did so. It was in that year that I got the second homestead question settled, as well as several others. I do not throw that out as a hint to the hon. gentlemen behind the Prime Minister; but they may be certain that if they want to carry anything, the best thing they can do is to reduce the majority of the Prime Minister, and we on this side will give them all the support we can in doing that. I have only to say that I believe now, from the promise we have had, that after this matter has been considered by the Government, Canada will be no longer in the position that while hundreds have been rewarded for the services they have rendered, these poor but gallant people at Wood Mountain have been left without the scrip which they are entitled to. I beg, at the suggestion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier), to withdraw my motion.

Motion withdrawn.

MOUNTED POLICE PENSIONS.

Mr. DAVIS (Saskatchewan) moved second reading of Bill (No. 59) to amend the Mounted Police Pension Act, 1889. He said: This Bill requires very little explanation. As the law now stands, a member of the North-west Mounted Police must serve twenty-five years before he is able to retire from the force with a pension. By the amendment I propose, a man will be allowed to retire and draw a pension after serving twenty years, if he wishes to do so. The Bill does not interfere with the scale of pensions or prevent a constable remaining in the force for twenty-five or thirty-five years; the longer he remains the larger his pension. But I think it is a hardship for a man to be forced to serve twenty-five years before he can draw a pension. When we consider the conditions of climate and the hardships which these men have to undergo, often making winter trips 200, 300 or 400 miles, and sometimes having to camp out with the temperature at 45 below zero, it is evident that a man will soon be used up, and when we consider that in England the men only have to serve 21 years in order to retire with a pension for life, I think 20 years is long enough for a man to be required to serve in order to be entitled to retire in a country where the conditions are such that men have to endure the hardships they have in a new country like the west.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). So far as I am personally concerned, I can see no objection to this Bill becoming law. It is proposed to reduce by five years the time of service which entitles a man who serves the country in the Mounted Police to retire with a pension. At present he has to serve twenty-five years, and my hon. friend suggests that he be required to serve only twenty years. At the same time, he properly remarks that if the principle of the Bill is adopted, the amount of the pension would be correspondingly decreased; that is to say, instead of a man receiving the same pension that he would receive after twenty-five years service, he would be entitled to twenty-twentieths of the amount. I had hoped to receive from the members from the North-west Territories generally some expression of opinion on this question, with which they are perhaps more familiar than we are from the east; and, as I have not yet had the opportunity of having their opinion, I will conclude by moving that the debate be adjourned. In the meantime, I would say I would be in favour of the Bill, and unless I hear to the contrary from those whose opinions I am bound to respect in this matter, I shall have great pleasure in seeing that this Bill becomes law.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 61) further to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: I do not think there will be any difficulty about this Bill, because with its main clause I know the Government agree; and when we get into committee, if there is any doubt upon the second and third sections, we can eliminate them. The main section of the Bill provides for getting rid of a grievance. That grievance is this, that a rancher who has probably any amount of herds, and any amount of sheep, and any amount of horses, unless he has ploughed land which is not susceptible of ploughing, and cultivates it arably when it is not susceptible of being cultivated arably shall not own a piece of land in the North-west Territories. I know that the getting rid of this grievance will commend itself to the hon. Minister of the Interior, who is familiar with these matters.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I think I can, on the whole, assent to the principle of the first section of this Bill, and I have no objection whatever to it passing its second reading, with the explanation which the hon. gentleman has made, that he does not insist on the second and third clauses, with regard to which I think there may possibly be some question.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

MOUNTED POLICE ACT.

Mr. DAVIN moved second reading of Bill (No. 62) to amend the Mounted Police Act, 1894. He said: This Bill has a provision with regard to promotion from the ranks in the Mounted Police force and recruiting the staff of officers which will prevent men being appointed officers who have not served in the ranks or were not graduates from the Royal Military College. My hon. friends on the Treasury benches will remember that when they were in Opposition, they held the views I have given expression to and have embodied in this Bill, and I am credibly informed that they still hold the same opinions. Not only will this legislation be productive of good in the force, but it must be useful especially to the hon. First Minister, as Superintendent General of the Mounted Police, and I will tell you, Sir, why. It will put him in this position, that when people pester him for appointments on the force of their sons who have failed in every mortal thing and are not graduates of the Royal Military College, he will be enabled to say to them: "What can I do, the appointments are a statutory matter, and unless certain conditions are fulfilled I cannot do anything." It will be thus of great advantage.

Mr. LANDERKIN. It would have been a few years ago, but not now.

Mr. DAVIN. I am so fond of my hon. friend that I cannot bring myself to say anything harsh to him even when he interrupts. He is so pleasant to look at that I love to look at him. He is like Keat's Thing of Beauty—"a joy for ever." The next section is this:

The Civil Service Superannuation Act shall apply to all commissioned officers of the force, and their service shall be computed from the time they enter the ranks.

Of course in committee I could not insist on that second clause, because it might be considered as adding to the burdens of the public, and, therefore, if the Government should allow the Bill to go into committee and object to that clause, I will drop it. But let me point out that nothing so necessary could be done with regard to the Mounted Police, and the reason is evident. Suppose a man is a sergeant-major in the force, he can retire as such with a very good pension, but let him become a commissioned officer and have to retire a year after, his superannuation will be calculated only from the date of his commission, so that you could safely say, as I have said myself to deserving sergeant-majors, who were properly ambitious to hold the rank of commissioned officers: Would it not be better for yourself and family that you should remain sergeant-majors? They would admit that it was better from the point of view of superannuation, but still the natural desire to hold the rank they were entitled to led some of them—I could give their names if it were proper to do so—to choose promotion although it would imperil the allowance that would be given them on retirement.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am not prepared to say that there may not be something meritorious in the suggestions of the hon. gentleman, but still I would ask him not to press this Bill unduly until we have had some occasion to confer together as to how far this Bill may be necessary. I do not think that the appointments which have been hitherto made in the force are such as to warrant so drastic a measure as this. The manner in which the officers of the force have been recruited is according to the following system:—

First, by promotion from the ranks.

Second, graduates and cadets of the Royal Military College, at Kingston.

Third, officers who have served in the active militia of Canada.

Fourth, special appointments.

There are forty-two officers in the force exclusive of surgeons. Their previous services are as follows:—

17 have been promoted from the ranks.

1 has been transferred from the Indian Department.

1, Superintendent Gagnon, was appointed on the organization of the force.

6 were cadets of the Royal Military College, Kingston.

13 from the active militia of Canada.

2 commissioned officers of the British army.

2 farming in Manitoba or the North-west Territories.

So that, after all, the special appointments have been very few, and if the hon. gentleman himself had had the management of the force, I doubt whether he would have followed a different system. Such being the case, perhaps, my hon. friend will agree with me that, as there has been so far no abuse of power that I can see, there is no occasion to limit the selection of the force as proposed. However, this is a matter as to which I am open to conviction and argument. I am anxious to administer the force in such a way as to meet as far as possible the views of those who, like my hon. friend, represent the North-west Territories. I would not presume to insist on my own views in preference to those of others in this matter, who have had perhaps better facilities for forming a judgment. I came to the administration of the force with very little, indeed no experience at all. But taking the administration of the force on the whole, as I found it, with the exception of perhaps a little too much politics, I think that when any politics which may have found their way into the force are eliminated, as I think they ought to be, and the force become an absolutely military body and nothing else, it will be a most creditable body. It is already a very creditable body and has given great satisfaction, and with a little more effort would give absolute satisfaction. I do not know whether I would surprise my hon. friend but I am inclined to be somewhat conservative with regard to this force.

Mr. DAVIN. The hon. gentleman does not surprise me at all.

The PRIME MINISTER. With regard to the second proposition of my hon. friend, I do not think there is any reason for introducing it into the law because I think the Act, as it is, meets the case. I refer my hon. friend to section 10, of the Police Act, which reads as follows:—

Whenever any officer or member of the force is serving with the militia as a military force, by order of the Governor in Council, every such officer and member of the force shall be subject to "The Militia Act," and any Act amending the same, in the same manner and to the same extent as the active militia are subject thereto.

In any such case the commissions of the officers of the force shall, for the purpose of seniority and command, be considered equivalent to those issued to the officers of the militia of corresponding rank, from the date of their respective commissions, according to the following scale, that is to say:—

Mr. LAURIER.

Commissioner, as lieutenant-colonel ;
Assistant commissioner, on appointment, as major ; after three years' service, as lieutenant-colonel ;

Senior superintendent, as major ;

Other superintendents, as captains ;

Inspector, as lieutenant ;

Senior surgeon, as surgeon ;

Assistant surgeon, as assistant surgeon ;

Veterinary surgeon, as veterinary surgeon.

Mr. HUGHES. Do I understand that these that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has read are proposals ?

The PRIME MINISTER. No, that is the law. I made the statement just to show my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) that there is no occasion whatever for the second section of this Bill. I, therefore, move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. DAVIN. Would my hon. friend (Mr. Laurier) tell me the section he quoted from ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Section 10, of the Mounted Police Act.

Mr. DAVIN. I rather think that the Prime Minister misinterprets that section. I was not unaware of that section, but it applies only when the members of the force are serving with the militia. The North-west Mounted Police officers, unless when they serve with the militia have no rank whatever except titular. If they have to be exchanged from the Mounted Police into a militia corps they do not get an ad eundem, as a university of equal standing with another would give to its graduates. And also the hon. gentleman, if he will excuse me for saying so, missed the point of my second clause. What it provides for is not official rank, but solid cash in the shape of superannuation ; and I am sure that that will commend itself to him. I do not think I was able to impress my argument about that upon him. My argument is this : Suppose a man has been 25 years on the force and has reached the rank of sergeant-major. He can retire with the full pension of sergeant-major. But if he becomes inspector and retires twelve months after that, he has a superannuation calculated on twelve months' service. Is not that an injustice ? What is required is that it shall be provided that his superannuation shall be calculated from the time he joins the force, which is palpably just. I would urge that upon the Prime Minister, and I hope that this part of the measure will commend itself to his judgment. His argument, if he will allow me to say so, is based upon a misunderstanding of my Bill, and also, if he will not misunderstand me, on an erroneous interpretation of the tenth section. That would apply to the Bill I introduced last year or the year before, which had a clause in it providing for the rank of the officers. I thought I had that in the Bill this time, and it is through an oversight of myself or of the draughtsman that it does not appear. I have a memorandum to have it inserted in committee. But, in regard to the Bill as it stands, that argument has no application whatever. What I would suggest, with all deference to the Prime Minister, would be that he should allow the Bill to be read a second time, and do me the honour to give me the conference of which he spoke; and probably he will be able, to favour the Bill, if only in part. If he only selects the second clause, we shall have accomplished something. I can assure him this is not an attempt at toy legislation, but the outcome of a desire to benefit the force over which he presides.

The PRIME MINISTER. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) will serve his interest better if he allows the debate to be adjourned.

Mr. HUGHES. I presume that the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has inadvertently left out of the list of those from whom selection may be made for the offices named, qualified officers from the militia of the country.

Mr. DAVIN. That was probably an inadvertence.

Mr. HUGHES. That will be a matter for amendment in committee. I think that the principle of the Bill is good and I would commend the second section of it to the Prime Minister. I think he will find a good deal of merit in it. It is customary in some cases to allow two years' service in the ranks or in a non-commissioned position to count for one year in a commissioned office. However, he can talk that over with the hon. member for West Assiniboia. I would suggest to the hon. member for West Assiniboia, when the Bill gets to committee, if it does get to committee, to insert the clause I have spoken of regarding the officers of the militia.

Mr. DAVIN. I have noted that.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

DOMINION LANDS.

Mr. DOUGLAS moved second reading of Bill (No. 60) in further amendment of the Dominion Lands Act. He said: It is not necessary that I should detain the House more than a moment. The Bill has already been explained and it is exceedingly simple. It is well known to the House that under the late Act settlers who had performed their duties prior to June, 1889, were allowed to homestead a second time. In performing their duties for the second homestead they were called upon to leave their first homestead and reside upon the land. That has been felt to be a grievous burden and not in the interests of the settler, and the Bill contemplates doing away with the residence, while leaving the law with regard to the improvements the same as before. The Bill also contemplates that the son of the settler who makes the entry shall not be required to reside upon the land while making the improvements. The tendency of the law as it now stands, morally, has not been good. It has been the custom generally to sleep upon the land at night and make the improvements, but it was not in reality actual residence, and this entailed a burden upon the settler without any corresponding gain to the Government. To do away with the residence clause in this case would take nothing from the Government treasury and would relieve the people of a very considerable burden. I may also state that in the case of sons of settlers residing alone on the lands under these conditions it has been fruitful of evil especially to their health and some have even lost their mental balance and have found their way into our public institutions in consequence. Therefore, we will be very glad to have this Bill pass. I move the second reading, seconded by Mr. Lewis.

Mr. DAVIN. With the explanation given by my hon. friend (Mr. Douglas) I heartily support the second reading of his Bill. I may point out to him that he will have to make some change in order to make the Bill square with the explanation, but, as explained, I entirely concur with him. But as explained, I entirely agree with him. I think it is most desirable that if the farmer's son wants to homestead, he should be able to perform his duty without going through the farce that has often been gone through, and which my hon. friend has described as going and sleeping there, and yet boarding at home. It does not, as he said, and it has not been conducive to morality, nor to successful farming, and it has been very useless. I think it is desirable that if there is land within five miles of a farmer who has sons, the lads should be allowed the homestead and perform their duties while living under the paternal roof. I entirely support my hon. friend's Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SOUTHPORT, BELFAST AND MURRAY HARBOUR RAILWAY, ETC.

The House resumed debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Martin for:

Copies of all correspondence, petitions, resolutions and other papers in possession of the Government relating to the proposed branch railway from Southport to Belfast and Murray Harbour, and other proposed railway branches in the province of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member has the floor by consent of the House, as the adjournment of the debate was moved by another hon. member. It was the understanding at the time that the hon. gentleman should have a right to resume his speech; but it is not the rule, it is the exception.

Mr. MARTIN. When I had the honour of saying a few words not very long ago upon this motion, I showed that considerable dissatisfaction exists in the province from which I have the honour to come, in regard to railway expenditure. I think I pointed out to the House and made it very clear, that large railway expenditures had been made in different parts of this Dominion, and that the system introduced in the early days of confederation and continued to this day, have not been applied to Prince Edward Island. I also pointed out that Prince Edward Island had been, as it were, the pioneer in railway construction, and I think I made it clear to the House that Prince Edward Island as a province had contributed more to railway construction than any other province in the Dominion, according to its population. I read a statement which showed that Prince Edward Island had contributed out of its own resources the sum of $15,400 for every mile which we have to-day in that province, and that the province of this Dominion which approached nearest to that sum had only spent something like $4,656 per mile. I also made a claim that since Prince Edward Island entered confederation the expenditure on railways was greatly in excess of the amount stipulated as necessary in the financial arrangement made with Prince Edward Island. I think I succeeded in making that pretty clear. I was proceeding, Mr. Speaker, to refer to some misleading statements in some of the reports of the Department of Railways and Canals, as well as the report on the Public Accounts. But before I resume that branch of my subject, I wish to offer a further tabular statement in regard to expenditures made by the little province of Prince Edward Island. Hon. members may say that this is not relevant, but I think, considering the departure that was made in 1883 by Parliament in regard to railway subsidies, that it is very pertinent indeed, because I think I can show from the Statistical Year-Book and the utterances of hon. members in this House, that the object which this Parliament had in making that departure in 1883 was to relieve the provinces of the burden of railway construction. I can prove that this Dominion has gone into railway construction in different parts of Canada and did not apply that policy to Prince Edward Island, and that that province had had, as it were, to pay out of its own resources the money for railway construction which the other provinces have received out of Dominion funds. I have here a tabular statement which will support my contention a little more fully, if that were possibly required.

Mr. SPEAKER.

* Less than $1 per head.

I am fully justified in saying that there was more progress made in Prince Edward Island in regard to railway construction than in any other province of the Dominion. It is very unjust and unfair to say that a province which believes in railways and which had more than its share of railways at its own cost when it entered confederation—because I have brought to the notice of the House the fact that in 1875 there were only 4,856 miles in the Dominion, while Prince Edward Island had at that time 200 miles—had not built its share, and much more than its share, of railways. Two hundred miles of railways would represent one-twenty-fourth of the railway mileage of the Dominion in 1875. To-day, however, we find that Prince Edward Island has only one-eightieth, and that the large addition to railway mileage we have in the Dominion has been made at the expense of the Island. I have here a return which was brought down in 1896, from which it will be seen that in subsidies the large sum of $42,713,468 had been paid out in railway subsidies alone, besides $62,500,000 in the Canadian Pacific Railway and $55,000,000 on the Intercolonial Railway—in all $160,213,468. No doubt Prince Edward Island is paying its share of the interest on that expenditure, and so where a claim is made for railway construction by the Island, I do not see how the Government or this House can treat it otherwise than by extending to the province that justice which is due to it. I will show this House that where the provinces—and this is true especially of Prince Edward Island—has paid large sums, the Dominion Government has paid very little, and where the Dominion Government has paid largely, the province has paid little or nothing at all. If hon. gentlemen will turn to page 645 of the Statistical Year-Book they will find that the Dominion Government has expended $153,996,778 on railways in this country up to June 30, 1895; of course there may have been some expenditure since. Beside, there have been 50,000,000 acres of land granted. I take it that we may estimate that land at a value of $1.00 per acre. That, in round figures, would give a total expenditure in the neighbourhood of $200,000,000 for railway construction in this Dominion. I do not think I will be very far astray in saying that the debt of this country is represented by money invested in railway construction, in canals and other public works. I wish to show what share of that expenditure has gone to Prince Edward Island. Two hundred million dollars expenditure, counting the population of the Dominion at five million, gives an expenditure per head for railways alone of $40. How much has been expended in Prince Edward Island? The expenditure there for railway construction has been something like $600,000; and in order to be fair, I will add to that sum the amount of $20,000 a year which was added in 1888, and represents at four per cent a capital of $500,000. Five hundred thousand dollars added to $600,000 will give in round figures an expenditure by the Dominion Government on railways in the Island equivalent to $10 per head, counting the population at about 110,000, which is as near as we can make it. According to that calculation, we arrive at this conclusion: that the Dominion Government have expended $200,000,000, or $40 per head throughout the Dominion, while in Prince Edward Island the expenditure has been $1,100,000, which gives a rate of $10 per head, or a difference against the Island of $30 per head. That amount multiplied by the population, leaves the island short of railway construction the sum of $3,000,000, which is pretty nearly the estimate I laid before the House on a previous occasion. When the question was before the House on a previous occasion I stated that the report of the Minister of Railways and the Statistical Year-Book were misleading in this respect, and the fact that the minds of hon. members are not clear as to the amount of money spent by Prince Edward Island, arises from reading the report of the Minister of Railways, and the compilation by Mr. Johnson, who prepares a very clever book known as the Statistical Year-Book, which in many respects is a credit to this Dominion. If my hon. friends will turn to page 12 of the annual report of the Minister of Railways and Canals they will find the following:—

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION EXPENDITURE.

Before and Since Confederation.

The following shows the total amount expended by the Government for construction of railway works, or granted in aid of such construction: embracing the period prior to confederation and extending down to the 30th of June, 1896.

The statement goes on to point out the amount expended on the Intercolonial Railway, $55,267,044. The expenditure on Prince Edward Island railways is stated at $3,750,575. I ask the House if that is a fair statement. Is that a statement that will bear examination? I think I shall be able to show that that statement is not in accordance with the facts, and that the Island itself as a province has paid most of that expenditure. How such a statement has crept into the report, I cannot say. It may be said that this mistake has only occurred during the past few years; but I have looked back at the reports of the Minister of Railways for some years, as far back as 1876, and I find this error has been continued from year to year, attention apparently never having been called to it. On page 23 I find that the Dominion Government is represented as having spent $3,114,735 on the Prince Edward Island Railway. I am at a loss to find out the ground on which the Minister of Railways places that statement in this report. I think it is entirely misleading. I find in the Public Accounts that a sum of $3,750,000 is set down among the assets of the Dominion for the Prince Edward Island Railway. The railway is worth that I suppose, and there is no doubt that it is an asset, but I think the Government should have put a foot note to it, in order to state that that railway did not cost them a penny, because when Prince Edward Island entered into confederation, she handed that railway over to the Dominion as a gift, for them to operate.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). Would my hon. friend (Mr. Martin) take the railway back, and run it at the expense of the Island?

Mr. MARTIN. We might reconsider the terms if my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) would open the question, and see whether or not we would part company with the Dominion altogether.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. MARTIN. I do not know, but we might take him at his word. I do not think my hon. friend (Sir Richard Cartwright) has been very generous to the province, and I believe that almost every project advocated for the benefit of the Island has been opposed by him. Some years ago he opposed giving our little province $20,000 a year, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce then said, that the Government was opening the door wide for corruption. The hon. gentleman may remember, that at one time he referred to Prince Edward Island as one of the shreds and patches of the Dominion. Time has its revenges that may now come home to the hon. gentleman, in view of the fact that the men who occupy the most prominent positions in the Government to-day come from the so-called shreds and patches, and nearly crowded the hon. gentleman out. The figures I shall give to the House to-night I shall take from the blue-book, and everything I say I shall have a statement from an official document to support me. I have met hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, and we have talked about Prince Edward Island, its isolation and the difficulties we have in crossing to the mainland in winter. They tell me: Oh, but you have a very fine system of railways on the Island, and I answer them: We have not to thank the Dominion for that. Almost every hon. member of this House that I have met, is under the impression that the Dominion Government has built us those two hundred miles of railway that we have in the province. But to return to the statement in the Public Accounts, which counts as assets of Canada $3,750,000 for the Prince Edward Island Railway. It was a very profitable investment for Canada. They spent $600,000 on the Prince Edward Island Railway, and to-day they call it an asset of $3,750,000. Lord Beaconsfield, in 1875, purchased from the Khedive of Egypt $20,000,000 worth of shares in the Suez Canal. Six years later Mr. Gladstone admitted that those shares doubled in value or an increase of 100 per cent in six years. About the same time Prince Edward Island handed over to the Dominion 200 miles of railway, which cost that province $3,150,000, but which the Dominion received gratis. In 22 years the Dominion, having meantime spent about $600,000 extending it 13 miles for improving and providing for wear and tear, place it down as assets in the balance, of $3,750,000, or an increase of 700 per cent, against 100 per cent in the shares bought by Lord Beaconsfield. Had the Dominion Government invested as largely as Lord Beaconsfield, and if the speculation turned out equally profitable, those assets would not now be $3,750,000, but $75,000,000.

Now, Sir, I am going to lay before this House a statement from the public accounts of the year 1873, when Prince Edward Island entered the confederation, and this statement will show who paid for the Prince Edward Island Railway. If hon. gentlemen will turn to No. 12, Part IV. of the Public Accounts of 1873, p. 12, they will find that when Prince Edward Island entered the Dominion, it was entitled by Imperial Order in Council to the sum of $4,701,050, which was placed to the credit of the Island at confederation on the 1st of July, 1873. I believe that the mistake that has been made in regard to the Dominion Government paying for our railway, arises in this way. In the first place the Dominion actually paid the bills for this railway, but they charged the province with them. In the Public Accounts for 1873, I find the following, which I will give in tabular form, every dollar of which was charged against Prince Edward Island:

July 25	To Provincial Secretary on account of land damages, P. E. I. Railway,	81	07
Total		$3,144,214	41

All these items total up to the sum of $3,144,214.41 paid in the first instance by the Dominion Government and charged to Prince Edward Island. When these sums were paid by that province out of the sum which went to the credit of Prince Edward Island, $4,701,000, all that the little province had left was a little over $1,000,000, and from that day Prince Edward Island lost the interest on $3,144,214.41, and the Dominion was the gainer. And to-day, forsooth, after burdening itself to the amount of $28 per head, against between $8 and $9 per head by the other provinces, when Prince Edward Island comes before this Government and makes a demand for railway construction in the province, how are we met? We are met with the statement, "Oh, these blue-books do not bear you out." I put this statement against the blue-books, and if those blue-books are misleading, it is time they were looked over and corrected. I tell this House that when Prince Edward Island spent, as it did spend, $28 per head for railway construction, it did something for which it should obtain a great deal of credit. Hon. members may remember that when this Dominion undertook the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, it was held forth for the admiration of the world that the great Dominion of Canada had undertaken a work which was to become a factor in binding the different parts of the Dominion together; but the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway only entailed on the taxpayers of this Dominion the sum of $16 per head. Divide the sum which Canada contributed to the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway by the population of Canada and you will find that it does not very much exceed $16 per head, while the province of Prince Edward Island has contributed out of its own resources the large sum of $28 per head for railway construction. Not only was a hard and fast bargain driven between the Dominion Government and the province of Prince Edward Island at the beginning with reference to the handing over of the Island Railway to the Dominion, but I have in my hand a return to an address of the House of Commons, dated the 17th of March, 1875, "for copies of all papers and correspondence between the Dominion Government and the Prince Edward Island Government relative to the construction of the Prince Edward Island Railroad, and the transfer of the said railroad to the Dominion Government." Not only did the Dominion Government make a hard and fast bargain with the little province of Prince Edward Island, that it should hand over its railway for nothing to the Dominion Government, but sent down to the province an engineer to see that the railway was fully equipped and in every particular up to certain specifications which that Government imposed upon the contractors. The Dominion Government then exacted its pound of flesh—whilst to-day this great Dominion shelters itself behind a supposed impossibility in carrying out its compact with Prince Edward Island. And now we are met with the statement, "We would like to do justice to Prince Edward Island, but did you pay for your own railway? That is not very clear from the Public Accounts, or the report of the Department of Railways, or the Statistical Year-Book." I think I might as well refer to the Statistical Year-Book, though I do not attach any blame to the gentleman who compiles the statements in it, because he has been misled by the reports of the departments from which he compiles them. At page 645 of the Statistical Year-Book, section 1012, you will find the following summary statements of aids granted to railways constructed and under construction by Governments, to 30th June, 1895:

Dominion Government.....	$153,996,778
Ontario do	7,265,533
Quebec do	16,463,115
N. Brunswick do	4,056,300
Nova Scotia do	2,936,916
Manitoba do	2,626,612
B. Columbia do	37,500

Is there a cent there for Prince Edward Island? Not one. That is the way hon. members are misled in regard to Prince Edward Island. The very books the Governments issues to the public are misleading in this respect. After the statement I have read, I do not think any hon. member can stand up in this House and say that Prince Edward Island has not contributed largely to railway construction; and when that province which has so generously contributed out of its own resources for railway construction, and is to-day paying the interest on large sums of money expended in other parts of the Dominion—when that province comes before this House and puts in a claim for a small amount for railway construction, I do not think it should be met with a refusal. I think there is a spirit of honour and justice and fair-play in this House, and I hope there is also in the Government that rules this country, though I am sorry some of them are absent to-night. I hope that long-delayed justice will at last be rendered to that province. I am sure that if hon. members study this question, they will no longer be willing to see the smallest province of the Dominion paying its share of interest on moneys which have been used for building railways in the great provinces of Ontario and Quebec and all over the Dominion, and give a deaf ear to all appeals for railway construction in Prince Edward Island. I hope that the present Government will take hold of this question and put the little province of Prince Edward Island on a proper footing in this respect. I think I need not apologize for taking up so much time, and I do not think that I would have been justified in saying less.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). As it is desirable that the gentlemen more immediately connected with Prince Edward Island should have an opportunity of replying to my hon. friend's arguments, unless indeed he accepts the sporting offer I make him to take back the railway and run it himself, I think it desirable that we should adjourn the debate in order to give my hon. friend the opportunity of replying. I move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

RAILWAY COMMITTEE.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). By unanimous consent of the House, I move that the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) be added to the Railway Committee.

Motion agreed to.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 11th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Bill (No. 103) respecting the Canadian Fire Insurance Company.—(Mr. Landarkin.)

Bill (No. 104) to incorporate the Restigouche Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

THE LOBSTER FISHERY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to a matter of very great importance to my constituents in the Island of Cape Breton. It will be remembered that the hon. Minister (Mr. Davies), stated that he was considering with great care the important question of the close time for lobster fishing. I have received a communication from a gentleman of great experience in that matter, and I think it desirable that my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) should have these views before him when he is considering the matter. The writer of this letter says:

Sir,—I have packed lobsters in Cape Breton during the past thirteen years, and on the mainland of Nova Scotia for ten years, and this experience enables me to give you fairly accurate information on the subject. When the eggs or berries first appear on the female lobster, they are black and remain so for several months. These black eggs are formed on them at one season of the year, but principally in April, May and June in Nova Scotia proper, and in May, June and July in Cape Breton. As these eggs develop, they change from black to red or brown until finally two small black points, like eyes, can be seen through the skin of the egg, and a few weeks after this the young are hatched. In Nova Scotia proper, the red or brown eggs appear about the 15th June, while in Cape Breton they do not develop to this stage until about the 15th of July. The young are hatched in Nova Scotia proper about July 15th, and in Cape Breton from August 15th to the 30th, according to the locality. The hatching season in Nova Scotia then is from July 15th to July 31st, while that in Cape Breton is from August 15th to August 31st, perhaps a little earlier from Isle Madame, in Richmond West.

The season for everything in Cape Breton is later than on the mainland. Trout and salmon spawn later here. Birds hatch later, and crops of all kinds are later. To have our lobster season regulated by the conditions that exist in the mainland is contrary to nature. We do not ask to have the season lengthened, but to have it adjusted. The present law gives us from January 1st to July 15th, or six and one-half months. All we ask for is three months, May, June and July. Why close our Cape Breton canneries fifteen days later than those of Yarmouth, while Yarmouth begins three months earlier than we can, and when the lobster here spawn at least five weeks later than there? I have never seen soft-shelled lobsters in Cape Breton until late in August, while in Nova Scotia proper they cast their shells early in July.

It is of the utmost importance that the law regarding spawn or berried lobsters be enforced, and packers should be compelled to observe it. This can best be effected by having packers save the eggs, and hatching them in cans built for the purpose.

Size.—The law regarding size can never be enforced, so long as canneries are permitted to operate at all. At least 50 per cent of the lobsters packed consist of these undersized fish, and fishermen who can scarcely earn enough to support themselves now, would be in a sorry condition, if deprived of half their scanty earnings. The secret of success in protecting the fisheries lies more in the preservation of the eggs than in anything else.

Heat or temperature is necessary for the development of lobster eggs. At present writing (May 5th), this coast is blocked with fields of drift ice from Richmond to Cape North, while the canneries in Nova Scotia are in full blast. Is it not, therefore, conclusive that our season for spawning is later on this coast? Fishermen and packers of other districts complain when Cape Breton asks for three months' fishing, while not one of them would be satisfied with that short period. We ask for a special season here, on account of our geographical position, which causes different conditions than those which exist on the mainland.

I have the honour to be, &c.

I am sure my hon. friend (Mr. Davies) will appreciate the strength of the statements which are made here, as to the entirely different conditions of the lobster fishery in the Island of Cape Breton, from those which exist in other parts of Nova Scotia. I am certain that the hon. gentleman will be prepared to give very full consideration to the strong reasons which are pointed out in this letter, not for an extension of time, but for an adjustment of the time so as to do equal justice to each section of the country.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I need hardly say to the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) that I shall be very pleased to give every consideration to the representations made in this letter, on this important subject. If we conceded the correctness of all the statements of alleged facts made by this gentleman, the conclusion he draws might be perhaps irresistible, but, from the information at my disposal at the present time, I am not prepared to accede to the correctness of all these statements. I have read an immense mass of literature on this subject, sent from different parts of the Dominion, and I find it almost impossible to get any two men who have great experience in the industry, to come to the same conclusion with reference to the time that the lobster berries are hatched. There is a great deal to be said against a uniform time, where conditions are different. The same arguments which are urged from Cape Breton are urged with great force by the lobster packers in Prince Edward Island, and I have not been able so far to accede to their demands. Last year, the hon. gentleman who preceded me in the department, received a large number of communications similar to this, and he referred them to Mr. Bertram the inspector of fisheries in Cape Breton. Mr. Bertram made the report which I read the other day, representing that the conditions around Isle Madame in Richmond county, I think, were not materially different from the conditions along the south-east coast of Nova Scotia; but, that the conditions further north on the Island of Cape Breton were somewhat different. Mr. Bertram said, that with a good deal of diffidence he was inclined rather to advise the department that they might extend the time for ten days without injury to the industry.

I call the attention of the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) to a very important fact which must not be lost sight of, and that is, that the size of the lobster is gradually diminishing. The reports we have from the inspector of fisheries and from others indicate that to be an indisputable fact.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is stated here.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. That being the indisputable fact, it weighs somewhat with me in coming to a conclusion. The scientific gentleman Mr. Prince, by whose advice I am somewhat guided, largely guided, is considering the matter very carefully, and before very long I hope to be able to make an announcement to the House as to the conclusions which he and I have conjointly reached. I hope our conclusions shall be the same. I should be very sorry to form a conclusion adverse to his, and I have reason to believe that we will be able to come to some arrangement which may not be unsatisfactory to all concerned.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Marine to two orders of the House of last September; one calling for the reports and correspondence respecting the appointment and dismissal of the sub-agents of the Department of Marine and Fisheries at Port Pictou; the other for the reports, correspondence and reasons for dismissal of Mr. Daniel McLean, captain of the Pictou Island lifeboat, and the appointment of Mr. Alexander Currie. The papers have not been brought down yet.

SUPPLY—DUTY ON FARM IMPLEMENTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into committee, I have got a few remarks to make. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) told us that a tariff had been constructed by the Government which they were not too proud to alter, and I think it is exceedingly desirable that he should be told, and that the hon. Finance Minister (Mr. Fielding) should be told, at the earliest possible moment, that their tariff is not satisfactory to the North-west Territories, a fact which I think they have learned, not merely from this side of the House. Sir, the tariff has been received with profound dissatisfaction and disappointment, not merely in the North-west Territories, but amongst the farmers of the whole of Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I hear an echo of "noes"; but if I look at the papers which express the opinions of the farmers of Canada—if I look at the weekly "Sun," which expresses the opinions of the farmers of Ontario—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIN. It used to at one time, I believe, when hon. members were on this side of the House, but now it does not. This Government is very powerful, but there is one thing it cannot do: it cannot manufacture public opinion. The public opinion is there; they may shut their eyes to it; they may adopt an ostrich policy, and hide their heads in the sand. I will tell you why the tariff is unsatisfactory to the farmers of Canada: it belies all the promises made to the farmers by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier), by the Controller of Customs (Mr. Paterson), by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), and by a dozen others—by my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), who, although he is not in the Government, while he does not play the cards, overlooks the hands. I can assure these hon. gentlemen that there is profound dissatisfaction amongst the farmers of Canada, especially amongst the farmers of the North-west. If hon. gentlemen will not believe me, I have in my hands the Winnipeg "Free Press," which may be said to be an independent supporter of the Government. Since this Government came into power, this paper has given it a general support, and this is what it says about the way the tariff is received in the North-west Territories:

If the Dominion can buy its cottons and woollens and all those other articles which it is thought necessary to protect with heavy duties, more cheaply in a foreign country than it can make them for itself, why tax the country to maintain those industries? That used to be the Liberal policy, but it is not embodied in the present tariff. * * * The North-west approved of the Liberal fiscal policy, as laid down in the platform adopted at the Ottawa Convention. That policy was opposed to protection in any form, and declared for the utmost freedom of trade consistent with the requirements of the revenue. * * * A step in this direction was made in freeing barbed wire and binder twine, although perhaps more extreme than was necessary. A longer and weightier step would have been made if the duties on agricultural implements had been scaled down to ten or twelve and one-half per cent, and it is all the more regrettable that this was not done, when we realize that substantial reductions might have been made without prejudice to those industries. The implement makers are to-day better off than they were under the old tariff. They lose something of the protection against foreign manufacturers, but for this loss they have more than a compensating gain in the reduction of the duties on their raw material. They can now manufacture at so much less cost that the Government would have been fully warranted in reducing the implement duties to a very low point, and still leave the makers in a position to hold their own against foreign competition. The saving in duty that might have been made on one binder, would be more to the average farmer in Western Canada than would pay his small binder-twine tax for five years. Here was an opportunity lost. The "Free Press" does not make this point because of local prejudice or partiality. It recognizes that the farmers of Western Canada have as much right to stand their share of the public burden as any other. But, in the interest of the whole Dominion, whose hope is in the Northwest, it is necessary to encourage settlement here, and the most effective encouragement is to make the lot of the settler as light as possible. The opportunities for this are not confined to implements.

I wish to-day to confine myself to the subject of implements used by the farmer, and I want to ask the attention of those who are engaged in revising the tariff, or manipulating it, to the way in which the farmer of Canada is treated, especially the farmer of the west, for whom I speak. I will take five articles in which the farmers of Canada, especially the farmers of the North-west Territories, are deeply interested. On these articles the duty remains as before, namely, 20 per cent. In the year 1895-96 Canada paid in duty on harvesters and binders, $26,216, of which Manitoba and the Territories paid $23,939, or 91 per cent. We imported 1,628 seed drills, worth $40,496, paying a duty of $8,099, of which Manitoba and the Territories paid $6,994, or 86 per cent. Of horse-rakes, we imported 747, worth $13,583, on which we paid a duty of $2,721, of which Manitoba and the North-west Territories paid $1,616, or close on 60 per cent. Of mowing machines, we imported 2,172, on which we paid a duty of $14,467, of which the west paid $7,694, or more than 50 per cent. Of ploughs, we imported 3,187, worth $51,443, on which a duty was paid of $10,288, the west paying of this $7,613, or nearly 74 per cent. Here are five items in which the farmers of the North-west are deeply interested, and on which we pay a vast percentage of the duty. Then, again, we were told, not merely in Winnipeg, but in Prince Edward Island, that either agricultural implements would be made free or the duty upon them brought very low. Yet the duty on agricultural implements has not been touched, but, on the contrary, those who manufacture them are placed in a much better position than before, because of the reduction of the duty on iron. But not only that, not only will the farmer pay his share of the duty but he will pay henceforth his share of the bounty on iron as well. Those gentlemen who went about the country, and their language is still ringing in our ears, saying they were going to relieve the farmers, that not a vestige of protection was to remain, that everything in the shape of raw material was to be free, that the farmers were to be liberated, that the manacles were to be taken from their ankles, and that they were to be taken out of the slough in which they were, and who inspired such confidence by their oft-expressed determination to do all these things that we had artists limning and painting and embodying, with their artistic genius, all that was to be done by the Liberal party for the farmers—these gentlemen have accomplished what? Not a single duty has been taken off, but the tariff remains just as it was before. In support of that statement, let me give you the evidence of a witness, an unimpeachable witness, the same to whom I have already referred. That witness used to be in 1895 and down to June, 1896, a brilliant sun in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, but how it will strike them now, I really do not know. I take the following from the "Sun":

BROKEN PLEDGES.

The National Liberal Convention, convened in Ottawa in 1893, resolved: That the customs tariff of the Dominion should be based, not as it is now, upon the protective principle, but upon the requirements of the public service; that the highest interests of Canada demanded the removal of this obstacle to our country's progress by the adoption of a sound fiscal policy, which, while not doing injustice to any class, will promote domestic and foreign trade and hasten the return of prosperity to our people; that, to that end, the tariff should be reduced to the needs of honest, economical and efficient government.

Here is the comment of the "Sun" on the tariff brought down by this Government:

The Liberal Government, in 1897, placed a duty of 5 cents a gallon on coal oil, which is equivalent to an ad valorem duty of 60 per cent. The old duty of 6 cents a gallon brought to the Treasury only $685,000. This duty is based on the protective principle. So are the duties of 4 cents a gallon on vinegar, 35 per cent on wall paper, 35 per cent on knitted goods, 27½ per cent on biscuits, 35 per cent on lead pipe, 35 per cent on window shades, and a great many others which might be enumerated. We are of opinion that every duty which exceeds 25 per cent, is unquestionably based on the protective principle. If the Government had kept rigidly to the "needs of honest, economical and efficient government," the tariff might have been safely reduced to 25 per cent.

Will any man doubt for one moment that I speak by the book when I say that the farmers in Canada, the farmers in Ontario and the North-west, are dissatisfied? Why, even in Quebec we have evidences of dissatisfaction. I could quote a paper published in Chicoutimi, which is not an agricultural paper, but occasionally gives its attention to agriculture, and it condemns strongly the features of this tariff, and amongst others that feature of taking off the duty from Indian corn. I am sorry the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) is leaving, because I am going to call him in as a witness, and I feel satisfied that the inspired words of that great Liberal will have more influence with the Government than anything I could say. With regard to this tariff: Is it possible, says this witness, for this Government to do anything by wholesale? Must they tinker out every proposal they make? And again he says:

The hon. gentleman's proceedings have done this, at any rate: they import an element of great uncertainty into the trade and business of this country.

Sir, it will be remembered that we listened to a speech from the Finance Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Controller of Customs and others, and we asked for information, we asked for light, we asked for some intimation as to what the tariff was going to prove. And when these hon. gentlemen sat down, after making those speeches, we were as ignorant as when they stood up. And to this hour they do not know themselves how they stand with regard to certain features of the tariff, or how that tariff is regarded by those who are more particularly interested in the only portion of it that some people who do not understand it have received with favour—the preferential clause. We learn from what was stated in another place that, up to a few days ago, not a word has this Government received from any Minister of the Crown in London, as to how the English Government regard this preferential clause. Listen to my witness.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What witness?

Mr. DAVIN. The Minister of Trade and Commerce. Here is the witness and here is what he said:

Mr. FOSTER. But he is not here.

Mr. DAVIN. Oh, we have him in spirit and his spirit is much more pleasant than his concrete existence:

We asked him to let us know what his calculations were as to the extent to which these varied changes would affect the revenue of the country. What was the answer we got? We wanted to know the loss of revenue that was likely to accrue in consequence of the reductions of duties; but the hon. gentleman did not know. We asked to know the loss which was likely to accrue from the bounties he proposed to give;—

Mr. SPEAKER. Is the hon. gentleman referring to a previous debate?

Mr. DAVIN. I am referring to the debates of 1894. I am, too much on my guard, Mr. Speaker, to be caught in that way. You have barred me out of the whole animal kingdom, insects and all, which I thought were fair prey for the imagination and fair subjects for simile, and am therefore under a very wholesome dread of your ruling:

—but the hon. gentleman did not know. The hon. gentleman told us that it was all guess-work, and that the result of his lucubrations was, in brief, this: that he was about to make a leap in the dark, and he did not know where he would land.

I myself have described this tariff as higgledy-piggledy. Now, here is what my witness said of it, and mark how suitable are his words:

I do not say that no relief is going to be given, but I say that, for a thoroughly revised tariff,

I never saw more disturbance, with more pitiful results. If I were going to coin a word for it, I would be very apt to describe it, not exactly as a tariff of shams perhaps, but certainly as a tariff of makeshifts. There is no sort of finality about such a tariff as that. The hon. gentleman will find that you cannot stop here. He will have to go further. He will have to make more concessions. He will find himself compelled, whether he likes it or not, by reason of the very concessions he has given and of the very steps he has taken, to surrender or to quit.

And again :

We have a tariff embodying no principle ; we have a tariff which I have declared, and I think, rightly, to be merely a makeshift tariff. There, and there alone, perhaps, hon. gentlemen have been consistent.

And now I ask the attention of the Controller of Customs to this :

We find a reduction of two and a half and five per cent in cases in which four times that reduction should have been made. I am sure the Ministers do not know, and I think the trade cannot yet judge, how far the abrogations of the compound duties and the substitution of very considerable ad valorem duties will, for the time being, produce any substantial relief. It may, in the long run, by reason of mechanical improvements constantly going on in mechanical processes, but I doubt exceedingly if much of the readjustment is at all fair. Take a case—

Mark this, Mr. Speaker, how prophetic this is :

Take a case with which I am somewhat familiar, the article of agricultural implements. It is right there should be a reduction.

If it is right why did he not make it, had he not a hand in framing the tariff? But no reductions were made. "We find reductions of from 2½ to 5 per cent." Why, Sir, a clever writer in the "Mail" has made an analysis of the actual reductions in this tariff before us, the reductions under the preferential system, and he has used very expressive language, though I do not know that it will be regarded as parliamentary. He says the Government did a clever Yankee trick before they brought down the reduction, that they increased the duties before reducing them under the preferential rate. "First, he butters them up and then he slithers them down." The "Mail" goes into a calculation showing these reductions, and a very interesting one it is. I made an abstract of it. The greatest reduction made, according to this is 3¾ per cent, as compared with the tariff of 1894, and yet these gentlemen are representing to the country that they have made great concessions to the people, and have effected great reductions. The writer in the "Mail" takes carpets, for instance. That duty was 30 per cent, maximum 35 per cent, minimum 26½ per cent. And what is the difference between that and the present duty? Simply 3½ per cent. On shawls, the duty was 25 per cent, maximum 30 per cent, minimum 22½ per cent. And what is the difference between the duty under the late Government and that imposed by the very clever gentlemen who sit opposite? The difference is 2½ per cent—the 2½ that excites the scorn of the hon. gentleman who strutted out a few moments ago determined to hear no more—he knew what was coming.

Mr. DAVIN.

And the Bengal tiger has ceased to be brave.

The following are some further items :—

	Old Duty.	Maximum.	Minimum.	Reduction under New Tariff.
	pc.	pc.	pc.	pc.
Linen	30	35	26½	3½
Dress goods.....	22½	25	18¾	3¾
Laces	30	35	26¼	3¾
Sewing thread.....	12½	15	10¼	2¼
Cotton fabrics.....	30	35	26¼	3¾
Braids	30	35	26¼	3¾
Musical instruments....	25	30	22½	2½
Cutlery	25	30	22½	2½

The reductions, therefore, Mr. Speaker, are 3¾, 2½ and 1¼ per cent. And mark the corn of my witness of such petty reductions. He says :

We find reductions of 2½ per cent and 5 per cent in cases in which four times that reduction should have been made.

Oh! my prophetic soul! The prophetic element in this speech has now the endorsement of history, as truly inspired prophecy must surely have.

I repeat,— says our witness.

—speaking generally and looking at this tariff as a whole, that I believe you have about the maximum of disturbance and the minimum of real relief, and it is not an insignificant consideration, that you have imported a great element of uncertainty into trade and commercial transactions. So far as the people have been relieved, good; but at the same time it does appear to me, that when you are overturning the whole tariff, some reasonable or substantial relief, vastly greater than that proposed, might have been afforded.

That is exactly what we say. You remember, Mr. Speaker, because you were a member of the House at the time, that I propounded some years ago the doctrine of scientific protection. I contended that things may be done under a tariff based on scientific protection that cannot be done under a tariff based on protection by the rule of thumb or on free trade. On that ground I differed, as I have shown, from the tariff put forward by Sir Leonard Tilley in 1879. I told the farmers of the west that. And I told them in the last election that they would never get relief on these implements from a Liberal Government. I told them that, notwithstanding the assurances they had, they would not get that relief. But I said: You can get that relief from a Conservative Government that believes in protection, if it proceeds on a scientific basis. Now, in regard to that, a paper in the west that differs from the "Free Press," and would, in fact, say anything that suited certain persons that are believers in the present Government, tries to make a comparison between my criticism of the Foster tariff and my criticism of this tariff. I said that the Foster tariff was a very bold tariff. It did not confine itself merely to 2½ and 5 per cent reductions, as I showed at the time. On the contrary, in regard to these very implements that I am now interested in mainly, in this speech, it took off 15 per cent—reduced them from 35 per cent to 20 per cent. We expected, of course, that the Liberal Government would go more than one better than that. We expected that they would take off at least 15 per cent, or make them free. Now, it would seem that I have, to some extent, made a convert of the witness I am citing. I do not think I have thoroughly converted him. He seems to lean for a moment to the idea of scientific protection. I do not think I was very successful. I was somewhat like the shipwright of Sir Hugh Allan. Sir Hugh bought a schooner that had belonged to a butcher, designing to use it in doing the coasting trade in Ireland. The name of the boat was changed from the name of the butcher to the "St. Patrick." Sir Hugh went down to the dockyard and saw the shipwright working at the effigy. He asked him what they were doing? The foreman shipwright said: "I have a hard job in hand—to make a saint out of a butcher." I have a hard job in hand to make a scientific protectionist out of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright), but I do seem to have been to some extent successful, judging from this quotation:

Putting the whole case together, I say, that for a protective tariff, scientifically constructed, if such a thing be possible—some people say it is, but I have my doubts—but for a protective tariff something is to be said;—

There is the Minister of Trade and Commerce——for a revenue tariff a very great deal is to be said; but for this amorphous botch nothing is to be said.

Take this present tariff, which nobody can describe, which its author heralded with eulogies of free trade, for this amorphous botch nothing can be said. Hear again our witness:

It is neither fish, flesh nor red herring. It really does nothing at all but disturb everybody, make a certain number of corners, which will appear as we go through it in minute detail, and conciliate for a time, until the elections come on, a certain number of gulls, whom the hon. gentlemen have deluded in times past.

Now, Sir, could anything be more appropriate? It is quite clear, the temporarily dominant party and their gulls believe in humbug. Let us build altars to humbug, and let us peal out from steeples of humbug and steeples of sham, notes glorifying a policy gulling the people. Now, Sir, hear our witness as to the capacity of the Government, and this is really very fine:

One thing I must congratulate the Government upon, and that is their capacity for swallowing, not only their own previous professions upon the subject, but their predecessors', too.

This is a mere sketch of his colleagues, but it is dashed off in glowing colours from the rainbow palette of a political Rubens. You will remember what Biglow says:

A merciful Providence fashioned us holler,
A' purpose that we might our principles swaller.
It can hold any amount of them, the belly can,
And bring them up whole again, like the pelican.

One thing our witness is specially strong on, is the importance of the United States market and the folly of retaliation. Mark what he says about retaliation, and retaliation is one of the cardinal principles of this tariff:

Did Mr. McKinley impose, or threaten to impose, new taxes? The House will remember that straightway the hon. Minister of Finance imposed new taxes.

And he indicates that he was a great fool for doing so. He goes on further:

The Government, largely by their own foolish conduct, has barred us out of one market; at any rate, it has done nothing, and is doing nothing, to secure us access to the American market.

And this leading member of this Government proceeds to dwell on the importance of the American market to this country, especially to the people of the maritime provinces and to the North-west. Now, Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind another feature of the new departure of hon. gentlemen opposite, we are not ignorant of the fact that leading men opposite were hand in glove with Mr. Dana, of the "Sun," of New York; we are not ignorant at all of the intimacy that existed between Mr. Dana, of the "Sun," and leading Liberals of Canada, nor of the communications that took place between them, nor of the projects that certainly some of them mutually cherished with that very objectionable United States editor. Bearing in mind their glowing loyalty now, and the large amount they try to make out of the preferential feature of this tariff, without knowing at this moment whether England will accept it or allow it to go into operation, here is what our witness again says:

And the only true and real valuable market is the market which extends for three thousand miles along our southern border. You must remember that, when you talk of the British market, you talk of a market in which no special privilege is, or can be, given to us.

So that at that time, and it is not very long ago, we thought the fact that we could get no special privilege there, was a matter for some serious consideration. And again:

But after all said and done, you are not going to get the English people to give you any special privileges or to pay more for wheat, or Canadian beef, than they can buy it for in open market. Disabuse your minds at once and for ever of that idea. The British people cannot do it, and the British Government, whether they be Conservative or Radical, have not the faintest intention of doing it either.

Now, in connection with this, he spoke about the duty on iron. In the same speech he indicates that the duty on iron should have gone. Now, Sir, I want to give the witness's description of protection, that protection which is now admitted by the "Globe," which is admitted by every paper, Liberal and Conservative, in the country, to be still in this tariff of this Liberal Government. This is what our witness says of protection:

Protection, Sir, is like the measles: in itself it is not very formidable, but it has very dangerous secondary symptoms, and the most dangerous of these is, as I have often pointed out, the inevitable and terrible corruption which, under the system of protection to manufacturers, is the certain consequence of protection.

And again:

The Government have done worse. They have introduced a debasing and degrading element in the body politic. If there was no other reason, if all they say as to our material progress was true, as I know it to be false, it would be enough for ever to condemn the protective principle in the eyes of honest men, that, wherever you have protection, you have corruption, and corruption in the highest degree. Protection and corruption are political Siamese twins.

And yet, Sir, he walks between the legs of the two Siamese twins, now worshipping them with the zeal of a devotee.

They have never been separated in this world, and I do not think they will be in the next

Then he goes on to announce his policy, and what do you think his policy is? What is the policy of my witness who now is a member of the Government that has kept the protective principle of his predecessors and added their protective principles to it?

You demand our policy; you demand mine, and you shall have it. I announced it years ago. My policy, from first to last, ever since this infamous system was put on the statute-book, has been to do away with protection, how I do not care. If free trade would do it, I was for that; if continental free trade or reciprocity with the United States would do it, I was for that.

Mr. DAVIN.

And, therefore, meaning discrimination against England.

Always and at all times, from the time I was Finance Minister until the present hour, I have set my face like flint against recognizing in any shape or way the tyranny of protection.

Sir, tell it not in Gath. The same man who uttered that here in this House in 1894, who told us then that from the time he was Finance Minister he had set his face as a flint against protection, who told us from his place that that tariff that was in his hands, which is admittedly a protective tariff, was a tariff that he was going to introduce himself in 1876—why, Sir, it is terrible.

Sir, they demand our policy. Well, Sir, they shall have our policy. Our policy is death to protection and war to the knife to corruption.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, and I am afraid the shadow of corruption has already cast its upas influence over you.

Sir, we strike, and we will strike, for liberty and freedom from this system of protective taxation; and I tell the hon. gentleman, that we will not rest until the slavery they have imposed upon us, has become a thing of the past, and until Canadians are free, as Canadians ought to be.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say that the feeling in the North-west at the present moment about agricultural implements is not merely one of disappointment, but a feeling that they have been deceived, that promises have been made to them which have not been fulfilled. They have read these protests of the leading financial critic of the Opposition for eighteen years, and with these protests ringing in their ears, and resting in the hearts of many of them, they have a right to expect something very different from what they have received. Now, Sir, my hon. friend the Prime Minister, referring a few days ago to an indiscretion of one of his supporters, the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) said, that he wished to have more business and less poetry. There is sometimes a great deal of business even in poetry, and a poet down by the sea has managed to put a great deal of matter and business in some verses that bear closely on the tariff. These verses place in a light that will not rapidly pass away the treacherous action and broken promises of the Liberal party. The verses are as follows:—

A statesman spoke to a statesman
In the hush of the midnight hour:
By a fluke we have won the battle,
By a chance we have gained the power.
We have promised to make a tariff
That shall be a joy to those Who live in the land that the poet calls
Our Lady of the Snows.

We have lied to the sunburned farmers
Who sweat through the toil-long day
On the league-long western furrows,
On the dykes of Fundy's Bay,
And to the fishers who face the spindrift
When the bitter norther blows,
The men who make up the strength and wealth
Of Our Lady of the Snows.

We've promised them freedom in traffic,
We've promised them freedom from toil,
We've promised to break up the "robber combines,"

For the tiller of the soil.
But we've helped our friends whenever we could,
We have made it rough for our foes,
And we've saddled the same old "robber combines"

On Our Lady of the Snows.

Said a statesman unto a statesman :
In my province by the sea,
I talked Free Trade, and I talked Repeal,
It was all the same to me
So long as I got me back to power
In the land where the Mayflower blows,
And I made no shift to cut adrift
From Our Lady of the Snows.

So now we'll give them the loyalty cry
In this, the jubilee year,
And if it takes, our salaries are safe,
And there's little else to fear.
But if preference in trade can be carried out,
There is never a one of us knows,
So we'll have a try to blind the eye
Of Our Lady of the Snows.

Said a statesman unto a statesman
In the flush of the morning bright :
The gudgeons have taken the tempting bait
That we fixed for them over night.
We have fooled the poet, we have fooled the people,
For how long, God only knows,
And we'll stick to the wreck while there's money to get
From Our Lady of the Snows.

In regard to the implements, there is general dissatisfaction, because the relief has not come that might reasonably have been expected, and because the promises made by the Government have not been kept. I, therefore, move :

That all the words after "that" be omitted, and the following substituted :—That good faith with the western farmers demands that agricultural implements should be placed on the free list.

Let me say here that the disappointment is general, as is shown by the fact that this motion is moved by a member from the west and seconded by a member from the east. I do not make this motion as a vote of want of confidence, but in order to obtain the opinion of this House on the question, and because I want to impress on the minds of members of the Government when they are making changes in the tariff that they should place agricultural implements on the free list.

The ACTING SPEAKER (Mr. Bain) read the amendment.

Mr. DAVIN. With the permission of the House I will substitute the words :

Good faith with the western farmers on the part of the Government demands that agricultural implements be placed on the free list.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Too late.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This is very posterior.

Amendment negatived.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Post Office Department, amount required to pay those officers of the Savings Bank Branch engaged in the balancing of and computing interest on depositors' accounts, to 30th June, 1897..... $2,850

Mr. FOSTER. What is the cause of the increase ?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr.
Mulock). That covers an extra allowance of $100 because of the increased number of savings bank accounts, so many cents extra being paid on each account.

Civil Service Examiners..... $2,450

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Are the examinations carried on the same as before ?

The PRIME MINISTER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of this increase of $150 ?

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr.
Fielding). Better let the item stand if it is objected to. I have not the papers now.

Contingencies—Privy Council Office..... $7,500

Mr. DAVIN. I want to call attention to the fact, that in 1894 it was declared on the authority of the great financial critic of the Opposition, that this country could be run for much less money than it was run for. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) then declared that it was absurd that $36,000,000 or $37,000,000 should be spent by Government, and he declared that it should not cost more than $813,000 to meet the claims of Civil Government. And yet, what have we at the present moment ? We have $44,000,000 asked for by this Government, three years after one of the leading colleagues of the Prime Minister declared, that it was a monstrous thing to ask $37,000,000.
In regard to this item I say, that we ought to commence right away and prune down the expenditure. We have a Government in power pledged to a reduction of expenditure, pledged to give relief to the agriculturists, pledged to give relief in regard to coal oil, pledged to give relief in regard to iron and timber, and still more deeply pledged to the curtailment of expenditure.
But, instead of the pruning knife being used, instead of the banner of economy being elevated by these gentlemen, we find that the expenditure is placed at over $44,000,000. I will not take the responsibility of moving a reduction of this item, but I say, that it will be a scandal to the country, and it will be a thing the country will ask us all to give account of, if with a Government in power that is pledged to economy, we do not see, in regard to every item, whether we cannot reduce the burdens that the people are groaning under. I have shown already that on five items the farmers of the North-west pay on an average from 75 to 85 per cent of the duty on the things that come into this country. That is a serious matter, and there is not an item in these Estimates that the farmers do not pay their share of. We have heard from you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Lister), in your eloquent and impressive manner in this House and elsewhere in the past, and we have heard from distinguished members in the Liberal party in the same strain, strong words condemning the high expenditure. We have heard from you, Mr. Chairman how the farmer was bled white, and we have heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce ask indignantly: Are we to be taxed to death? Mr. Chairman, I echo his words here to-day, and I echo your words: Are we to be taxed to death; are we to be bled white? Sir, the amount of money that at the present time is asked to carry on the business of the country is so great, that the most sanguine amongst us must feel alarmed as to whether or not we can face the future. If, with a Liberal Government in power, a Government pledged to economy, a Government that when in Opposition declared that it was a scandal to spend from $36,000,000 to $37,000,000; if the first thing they do is to ask for over $44,000,000 to run the country, what are we to expect for the future. If they do these things in the green tree, what shall we have in the dry? If they do these things when they are young in power, what shall we have when the more sinister elements of the party have asserted themselves with more vigour, and more force, and more persistency, and more organization than to-day? These $44,000,000 look menacing as to the amount that will be asked for by hon. gentlemen opposite in the future. If we on this side of the House, do not protest vigorously this year, we shall have them next year asking probably for $45,000,000, and pledged as they are to economy, they will go on, year after year, adding to our expenses. Mr. Chairman, I for one am determined to hold these gentlemen opposite to their professions in regard to economy, and I will call attention at every suitable opportunity to the painful contrast between their loud promise and their poor performance.

Mr. FOSTER. What items are included in sundries?

Mr. DAVIN.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Telegrams, cab-hire, travelling expenses, newspapers and petty items of that kind.

Mr. FOSTER. How much for newspapers?

The PRIME MINISTER. I cannot tell at the present time, but they are just about what they were under the last Administration. I do not think the number of newspapers has been increased by five.

Mr. FOSTER. I would call my hon. friend's attention to the very strong declaration made the other evening by the hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Cameron), who stated his creed in very emphatic language. My hon. friend does not seem to have profited by that.

The PRIME MINISTER. What was it? I was not here to profit by it.

Mr. FOSTER. I would rather he would consult his friend himself.

Contingencies—Department of the Secretary of State..... $5,500

Mr. FOSTER. Would my hon. friend tell me who are employed and paid under the item for clerical assistance. We have always had the impression from hon. gentlemen opposite that this was a very much over-manned department. I see it is kept up pretty well in the regular list.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is reduced $637.98.

Mr. FOSTER. But only $256.66 on clerical assistance. Has my hon. friend the names of those employed?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I have not the names, but I think they are the same as those employed in 1896, except one or two changes. I think I heard that one lady got married. I will get the names.

Contingencies—Department of the Interior $18,395

Mr. FOSTER. We would like an explanation of this.

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). The increase in the salary of J. A. Bollard is the item which perhaps requires explanation. Mr. Bollard was employed in the civil service in September, 1884, at $1.25 a day. He was transferred in 1887 to the Department of Agriculture, and his salary was increased later to $600 a year. When the immigration work was transferred from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of the Interior, this gentleman was brought with the Immigration Department, and his salary was reduced to $400. I therefore found this young gentleman, after having been ten years in the service, receiving a salary of $200 less than it was some four years ago. If he had been treated in the way that other employees had been treated, his salary would have been $750 or $800; and in view of the length of his services and their satisfactory nature, it seemed only fair to me that he should receive an increase, and most unfair that his salary should have been cut down to $400, as it was by the late Government. Careful inquiry failed to elicit any possible reason for the action that was taken. Nobody seems to know any reason why he was treated in that way. It is not because I have any special interest in the gentleman himself, but because I think he was unfairly treated as compared with other employees, that I have made the recommendation that his salary should be increased to $700, which is a fair salary compared with the salaries of other clerks doing the same class of work, and not doing it any better than he is. The other special item is $395 for T. W. Hodgins. Mr. Hodgins has been employed in the department as a temporary messenger since 1887. For several sessions, however, another assistant was obtained in the department, and Hodgins was given leave, without pay from the department, to act as a messenger during each session to the parliamentary library, so that he would receive a better salary than he was being paid in the department. He has not passed any civil service examination; but, notwithstanding this fact, he would be eligible to be continued in the department as temporary messenger had his employment in the department not ceased at the expiration of the 31st of December, 1895, Parliament having been called for the 2nd of January, 1896, and Hodgins having been given leave to accept employment during the session as a messenger, and not having been paid for the 1st of January, 1896, by reason of the fact that he was not technically in the employ of the department on that day. One day elapsed between the end of the year, when he was given leave to come over here, and the commencement of the session on the 2nd of January. The Deputy Minister of Justice advised the department that he did come within the rule, and he was left out apparently because nobody had taken the trouble to protect him. Of course, he was not aware of the provisions of the Act, and could not do it himself. I found, however, that Mr. Hodgins was there performing the duties as usual, and Mr. Burgess said he thought it was a hard case and that he ought to be provided for, and I believed that to be the correct view. His services are required, and it would be a mistake to dispense with them and put on somebody else. In connection with this vote, I may say that $600 of the salary of my private secretary is paid out of it.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman could find no reason for the treatment given to

Mr. Bollard. If he would look into the matter carefully, he would find that Mr. Bollard's is not the only case. There were quite a number of transfers at the time when the Immigration Department was removed to the Department of Agriculture, and at that time a large number of temporary employees were dispensed with or put on the permanent list. Those put on the permanent list were men who were entitled to be put on, under the civil service law, as having been there since 1882. They were eligible to appointment without examination, but the civil service law requires that the first appointment shall be at the minimum salary. These men had the choice of becoming permanent, beginning with the minimum salary, and a number of them took it. Mr. Bollard's case was not the only one. There were about a dozen in the Railway and the Interior and some other departments, so that I am not saying that Mr. Bollard's services are not worth the $700, but I say that when he receives this treatment and has his salary raised on that ground, if the head of the department will look into the matter he will find a dozen cases of the same kind, and cases in which clerks were longer in the service than Mr. Bollard, who was there from 1884.

Contingencies—Auditor General's Office.... $2,500

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). This is an increase of $700, which the Auditor has asked for, in view of the immense amount of work and the bulky volume he gets out. And no doubt he expects to have still heavier work and wishes to be fully prepared for emergencies.

Mr. FOSTER. On that consideration I would not object to the increase. No doubt his labours will be considerably enlarged, but would it not be possible to have the volume made a little less bulky? My impression is that it largely now defeats its object in being so bulky that it is almost impossible for a man to wade through it. I know that the pockets of my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) have had to be greatly enlarged of late in order to enable him to carry round this book, as his vade mecum.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will consult with my hon. friend from North Wellington.

Mr. FOSTER. For the convenience of others, does not my hon. friend think something might be done to whittle down this volume? The accounts in it are very largely duplicated, as they appear, in numerous cases, in the departmental accounts, and it seems to me the bulk could be diminished without lessening its intrinsic value.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I will confer with the Auditor General on that point. It deserves consideration, for the volume is a bulky one, I admit.

On the other hand, we must bear in mind that it is an advantage to have all these things in the one place. The public at large do not find it easy to have access to our various departmental reports, and one bulky volume is better than a dozen. I have no doubt that the Auditor General will be glad, for the sake of himself and his staff, to reduce the size, provided he may do so without laying himself open to the charge that he is endeavouring to excuse our infamies while he always gave expansion to those of my hon. friends opposite

Mr. FOSTER. I have not the least doubt that the Auditor General will deal perfectly fairly with hon. gentlemen opposite, just as he did with us.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). I was about to suggest whether it would not be better to discuss this in the Public Accounts Committee, where the Auditor General would be present.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. That is a good suggestion. I rise merely to say, and it will come with greater force from this side, that it is a pity the Auditor General does not follow more closely the English practice. I have had several times occasion to look into the Auditor General's Report over there, who has a vastly greater expenditure to examine into, and his report is smaller than ours. If he attempted anything like the system of the Auditor General of this country, his volume would be enormous. I do not think any public interest is served by the publication in full of correspondence with the different departments over most trifling matters. Attention might be called to such expenditure, but I do not see that it is necessary to fill page after page with little discussions between deputy heads and the Auditor General with regard to comparatively insignificant matters, involving an enormous amount of clerical work. I think the work would be far more satisfactory if the practice of the Auditor General of England was followed, and that is the practice which, I think, our Auditor General followed when he began his career.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. The point is well worthy of consideration, but I think the suggestion of my hon. colleague that we should discuss this matter in the Public Accounts Committee is one we should follow. That committee is in a position to investigate the subject and would very likely strike out something or make some modifications in the present system. It could be discussed there whenever the hon. gentleman likes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say a word or two. I consider that the Auditor General's Report is the most valuable book that is issued from any of the departments in Ottawa. There is no blue-book issued that is more generally inquired for or more closely and carefully read. I believe the people of the Dominion are becoming generally informed as to the receipts and expenditures of the several departments and of the general management of affairs, and they are getting that information more by the perusal of the Auditor General's Report than any other document that is issued by the Government. I do not at all challenge the action of the Auditor General in increasing the size of the volume. He has had extended experience as Auditor General, and I think he has proved a most valuable officer to this country in discharging his onerous duties. He has frequently brought to light in that report matters that have deeply interested the people of this country and that have been largely discussed on the floor of this House. I am sorry that the ex-Finance Minister (Mr. Foster) appears to find the book so voluminous that it is almost useless to him. After he has sat in Opposition for fifteen years, as I did, and has as closely perused this volume, he will find no difficulty. He will grow accustomed to it. I recommend this volume to his attention, and I hope he will read it closely and will grow as familiar with it as I have become. When he has done so, he will respect and commend every page in that valuable volume.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Contingencies—The Dept. of Customs—

Clerical and other assistance.....	$2,770
Printing and stationery.....	2,000
Sundries	2,730

$7,500

Mr. FOSTER. I am sorry to see that the economical Controller of Customs has raised one item of his Estimates.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. He has reduced it $300 on the whole.

Mr. FOSTER. What he cuts off counts for nothing, of course. It is the increase that attracts attention.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman refers, no doubt, to the addition to the item for clerical and other assistance. There is an advance of $30 granted each year to the extra employees till they reach a maximum of $600. There are five of them getting the addition of $30 and one other whose salary requires only $20 to bring it up to the maximum. This makes up the $170 of increase. Then there is a decrease in sundries of $400, making a net saving of $300 on the item.

Mr. FOSTER. That opens a new phase of the question. I must ask the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) to that and also that of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright). It was stated by the Prime Minister and others that the statutory increases were to be cut off.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. To be.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, and that has been stated with reference to the year for which we are now voting the Estimates. We were told that they were cut off in every case except those that had accrued during the previous half term. Now the Controller of Customs gives expression to the principle that in the writers' class the statutory increases which are provided for by the law have currency. Is the Government going to be consistent or not? If statutory increases are cut off from one class of clerks, how is it that they are given to the other? I would like to have an explanation from the Minister about that.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. This, the hon. gentleman will see, is for the extra clerks, whose maximum salary is $600, and I am providing to give them the increase of $30 in those cases where they are below the maximum, and in one case where it requires only $20 to bring the salary up to the maximum that is provided for. Does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) take exception to that?

Mr. FOSTER. The principle was laid down that the Government are going to do away with statutory increases in all other departments. I have heard that enunciated and have seen it carried out in the Estimates. But the Controller of Customs states a different principle—that so far as one class of clerks are concerned, namely, the writers (who are by law made eligible to increases in exactly the same way as the others are) this system of statutory increases is to be continued, while it is discontinued with respect to the others. The Government ought either cut it off these or else give it to the other classes. My own view is, and I have previously stated it, that the statutory increases ought to be given to all those who deserve it. But the Government surely has no defence for giving it to one class of clerks and denying it to the others. I think I ought to have an answer to that. I think I must have an answer to that.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. My answer is that the salaries are too small in some cases, and I think these clerks deserve an increase. The maximum salary is $600. I ask the hon. gentleman if he objects to this proposal.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend is not going to cow me by demanding to be told if I object to it. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well what my criticism is, and so do all the members of the Government. Are they going to answer that criticism or are they not. I take the same position now that I took the other day. I say that the better principle is to give every deserving clerk his statutory increase. But, surely, there must be consistency. The dictum of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Sifton), which he caused to be made public before he became a member of the Government, about the time he assumed his present position, that he had made a condition that he should be allowed to do as he liked in his own department cannot be carried out by Ministers under the form of Government we have. One Minister must do the same as another in regard to questions of general policy. Here seems to be a clear contradiction as between members of the Government on a question of public policy, and it is that that I want to have cleared up. I must appeal to my hon. friend the Prime Minister, whether he is to have the same principle throughout or not.

The PRIME MINISTER. I am sorry to say I have not followed the discussion.

Mr. FOSTER. That is not my fault, but, for the sake of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) I will state the point again. I understood the Government to have adopted this as their policy with reference to increases of salary to clerks. It was stated here by all the responsible Ministers who have so far passed Estimates that they have changed the old principle. The old principle, which has been acted on for many years, was that the statutory increases of $30 and $50 should be given each year to deserving clerks on the representation of the Deputy Minister to the Minister. Now, the Government say: We are going to sweep away all these statutory increases, and we are going to allow each Minister to pick out the deserving ones as he pleases and give what he pleases, and can get the committee to assent to. On that principle the Minister of the Interior picks out eight, and made increases up to $100 to $250 to their salaries, leaving out all the others. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries picked out two, I think, and gave them increases, and all the rest got no increase at all. So that hereafter the principle is to be one of selection, and statutory increase goes. If the Minister thinks there is a deserving increase he comes down and signalizes that case, and asks for a vote. Now, when the Controller of Customs comes up he speaks of a class that had not been spoken of before, that is a class under the civil service, under the law just the same as the others, the writers' class, which come in at $300 or $400 and may go up to maximum of $600 by regular statutory increase, the same as from minimum to maximum in the other classes. Now, the Controller of Customs states in explaining his Estimates that he has added the $30 increase all the way through. He is doing what I think is the right thing to do. I argue that it should be applied to the whole civil service, and I ask the Government to explain the inconsistency of applying it to three or four classes and taking it away from the others. My own impression certainly is—and I do not want it to be weakened in the least—my own impression is, more particularly with regard to the lower grade of clerks, that it is a great injustice to take away from them the little accretion that they get for faithful service upon the expectancy of which they entered the service. Now, there are a dozen or more in the civil service today that went in from the time that I became a member of Parliament. cases in which those young men applied to me and I placed the matter before them in this way: Here is the law, here is the custom. You go in and be a good clerk and do your duties well. You go in at the minimum of $400 and you get your $50 increase until you get to the maximum, then you will have a chance for promotion. But all this is now swept away, and I want to know where the consistency comes in, if you sweep it away in one Minister's department and keep it in another, if you sweep it away in certain classes and keep it in other classes of clerks. I wish the Government would go back to the old principle, guarding it, if you please, in this way; giving no increase except when the case has been inquired into, has been reported upon by the Deputy Minister and approved by the Minister, if it is found that he is really a good clerk. That would keep back the non-deserving class, but it would give the deserving clerks their increase upon somewhat of a principle. I would like to see that done, and if that were done I would find no fault with what the Controller of Customs is doing. But we all see that there is an inconsistency somewhere, that the Government is not acting upon a certain principle.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). The hon. gentleman draws no distinction. These, as I have explained, are extra clerks.

Mr. FOSTER. No, not in a way.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. They are extra clerks, and I have taken the responsibility of asking the committee for something that will enable me to give them $30 a year more, in certain cases.

Mr. FOSTER. That is a very good afterthought.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. No, it is what I explained from the first. If the hon. gentleman wants to take the ground that one of those that I consider is doing her duty faithfully, receiving $360 or so, is not entitled to any increase, well, I suppose I will have to consent to strike it out. But I have taken the responsibility of recommending these increases. They are not on the regular staff, as the hon. gentleman knows, they are extra clerks whose services are continued from time to time. Some of them entered the service at a low rate. I suppose we are not bound to give them any increase at all, but I have taken the responsibility of recommending it.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend, if he wants my views, can have them in short order. I think it is a shame to take any deserving people who entered at a rate of $300 a year, under a law which contemplates an increase of $50 per year, and take Government service out of them, and not give them their increase. I think it is equally a shame to take a third class clerk in at the small sum of $400 on a basis which for years has been the basis practically carried out, and which is contemplated by the law, and get service out of him for the Government, and not give him his increase, if he is deserving. That is my opinion as to both of these cases. But the Government still go on with their inconsistency of applying their rule to one class and not applying it to the other. My hon. friend slid out on his skates on this assumption: Well, then I will come down on the principle that I think these are all deserving of an increase, and I will ask the committee to increase the whole of them. That is not a principle of selection, that is a principle of wholesale addition.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. CRAIG. None of us on this side object to the increases. What the hon. member for York (Mr. Foster) is trying to do, is something which I am afraid he will fail in doing, he is trying to make the Government act consistently. But I think he may give that up, and let these increases go. I feel satisfied myself that from what the Controller of Customs has said, this estimate ought to be passed, that these parties ought to have this increase. While I think the Government should be punished for acting inconsistently, I do not want to see these clerks punished for the sins of the Government; therefore I would support this increase.

Mr. McNEILL. I would urge very strongly upon the Government to reconsider, if possible, their position in a sense favourable to these men, not merely those who are under discussion now, but all those who were induced to come into the service under a well-defined understanding that they would get that recompense for their services which they believed they were going to get when they entered the service. Now, there can be no doubt that these men, when they entered the service, understood that they would have $50 of an increase annually up to a certain point, that then they would get promotion and that their salaries would then go on increasing—I mean if they were deserving, if they did not do something that was improper. That was the distinct understanding, there was no kind of misunderstanding, there was no doubt whatever in the minds of any one of them with regard to that. I have heard these young men over and over again speak of it, we all know that this is what was understood. I do not think the Prime Minister would say for a moment that that was not the understanding. I do not mean to say there may not have been some abuses. I do not mean to say that these statutory increases may not sometimes have been given to men who had acted in such a way as not to deserve it. Well, that ought to be corrected. Let there be a firmer hand over these clerks in future, and if any of them do not deserve an increase, or if the Deputy Minister is not prepared to say that they deserve it, and if the Government do not believe that they deserve it, then by all means withhold the increase.

The PRIME MINISTER. That is what we are doing.

Mr. McNEILL. But don't lay down the rule that, as I understand, is being laid down now, that this increase does not come as a matter of course to the deserving clerk. I understand that the rule laid down now is that it does not come as a matter of course to the deserving clerk. I say that there is a moral obligation upon the Government and upon the people of this country to pay to the deserving clerk that $50 increase regularly. I do say to-day, as I said before, that if dollars and cents are going to overbear justice and honour in Canada, it is a bad lookout for Canada. I urge strongly upon the Government that, however they may desire to promote economy—and I am with them every time in their efforts to promote economy honourably—let them not allow their desire to promote economy interfere with the principles of justice and fair-play between man and man.

The PRIME MINISTER. Since my friend appealed to me a moment ago, I will give my views upon this question. I do not at all agree with my hon. friend that there is an implied contract between the Government and every clerk who enters the service that he should have a yearly increase of salary. The old system was one which could not but lead to abuse, because the impression was general, not only among the clerks but even among hon. members of this House, that every clerk—that every deserving clerk—as my hon. friend puts it—was entitled to a yearly increase of $50. The impression prevailed that every clerk was in this sense a deserving clerk and entitled to this increase, and in fact every clerk got it. The reason the law was not observed arose from a different cause. I quite agree that every deserving clerk should have a reward, or that some hope of advancement should be held out to him. At the same time it is not very difficult to obtain clerks, it would not be difficult to obtain members of the service to fill it to the brim, even without such inducements; but as a matter of simple justice a man who does good service, or better service than the clerk who sits beside him, should receive a larger reward than the man who does not render so much value to the country. I think my hon. friend will agree with me in this; but we find that the impression is prevalent everywhere in the service that every clerk is entitled to that increase of salary, and therefore in order to put a stop to that impression, we had to take somewhat drastic measures, which we did take. So that my hon. friend will, no doubt, be prepared to admit that the exception has confirmed the rule, for one or two ladies have received increases. They appeal to the chivalry of the hon. gentleman, and I do not think the hon. gentleman objects to this item specifically.

Mr. FOSTER. Quite the opposite.

The PRIME MINISTER. The exceptions prove our consistency. The Controller of Customs did not give a promiscuous increase to every clerk, but he increased the salaries of two or three ladies whom he thought to be deserving, and I am very glad that the item, although criticised, at least in substance is approved.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish there were many more items of the same kind. My objection is that there are not enough of them.

The PRIME MINISTER. We will try and do better another year.

Mr. McNEILL. Where the Prime Minister and I fundamentally differ in regard to this matter was pretty well laid down when he referred to the old system as being an objectionable system. It might be an objectionable or a bad system. I am not here to discuss whether it was a good or bad system, but it was the existing system, and there was an idea prevalent among those who entered the service that it was the rule of the service that a clerk should receive an increase of $50 a year. If the hon. Prime Minister thinks it was a bad system, it is quite competent for him to change the system, and let those coming in under the new system understand what the new system is. But I hold that so long as there were clerks induced to come in under the old system, whether it was a good or bad system, those civil servants should have the benefit of what the hon. gentleman himself says was the "prevailing" understanding in the department at the time.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I want to take issue with one remark made by the hon. Prime Minister, as it seems to me to be incorrect. The hon. gentleman said that they found when they came into power that practically all the clerks received $50 increase yearly, whether they were deserving or not. Admitting that to be so, that was a reflection on the conduct of the deputy heads which was not altogether to their credit. I do not think the hon. gentleman was correct in making that statement without qualification, because in one department with which I had to do the statutory increase was quite a valuable force in the hands of the deputy in connection with his control over the staff, and I have a distinct and clear recollection that in one or two cases, on consultation with the deputy, the statutory increase was withheld for cause, because the deputy would not make the necessary recommendation. The point on which I take issue with the hon. gentleman is, that because this law has not been properly administered, deserving servants admitted into the service on the plain understanding that if they did their work satisfactorily they would receive that statutory increase, are now shut out. I think that is violent treatment. If the law has not been properly carried out and proper discretion exercised by the Deputy Ministers, that was a matter between the political heads and the departmental heads; but surely those men, with each of whom a quasi contract had been made, should not suffer unless they were themselves guilty of some wrong. Whatever the law may be, I think its application is exceedingly severe with the system such as has obtained, and which has enabled the Government to secure admittedly good men, as the Postmaster General himself admitted in regard to his very extensive department the other day, when he said there were men in it who were a credit to the department and a credit to the civil service of Canada.

The PRIME MINISTER. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. Yes, and no one will say that this remark is not of general application to all the departments, and that certainly not very generous treatment is extended to any officer in the service, certainly not every good officer; and it seems to be unworthy of Canada and of the Canadian Government to suddenly cut into the emoluments of those men for the reason the First Minister has given, namely, because the existing system had been imperfectly administered and it had been deemed to be a bad system.

Mr. SPROULE. What I object to is this, that while the old law and regulations provided that every diligent and efficient clerk should receive an annual increase of $50, the interpretation of the present Government is that this shall apply only to those whom they decide are entitled to it. That amount was considered a fair increase of remuneration to induce clerks to show diligence in the departments. But hon. gentlemen opposite have departed from that principle and from what was considered to be a salutary rule, and have taken it into their own hands to make increases in special cases, those increases ranging from $50 to $200 per annum. That seems to be a large increase to make at one time, and for this change of policy no good reason has been shown to the committee up to the present time. It is susceptible of this interpretation at least, that the Minister at the head of a department may have his own special favourites to whom he may give a larger increase than the merits of the case would demand, while to the great bulk of the civil servants he gives no increase whatever. If $50 was a fair increase in the past it ought to be a fair increase now, and I see no reason why the Minister should give an increase of $150 or $200. If the increase of $50 was given in special cases it would be in the direction of economy, and it would at the same time be carrying out the spirit of the Civil Service Act. It cannot be denied that the salaries of most of these civil servants are high when compared with the salaries of equally efficient persons in other walks of life, and an increase of $50 to a young man, would be considered a fair annual addition to his salary. I do not see any reason why the Government should give $200 extra at one jump.

Mr. McMULLEN. The present Government have a perfect right to take whatever course they consider right in the interests of the country. For the last eighteen years, as a general rule, increases were given indiscriminately in every department, and the Government will be justified before the people in putting an end to this. My own impression is that the proper way would be to hire clerks at the intrinsic value of their work and pay them for it. While I am opposed to increases as a general rule, yet at the same time there may be exceptions to that rule, and this case may possibly be an exception. We know what the leader of the Opposition (Sir Charles Tupper) has done in past years, and I understand that he has expressed himself that he would rather defend an increase of $100 than attempt to justify a reduction of $5. That has been the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite during the time they were in power. It may happen that there is a wheel within a wheel, for in turning over the civil service list, I find that there are five McNeils, and also the name of Sproule appears.

Mr. SPROULE. No relation of mine.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen opposite may be pleading for their own relations in this matter.

Mr. SPROULE. How many McMullens?

Mr. McMULLEN. I do not know of any, but at all events we find these names in the civil service list. When these hon. gentlemen opposite are advocating an indiscriminate increase of $50 for each civil servant, possibly they are thinking of the interests of their own relations. I have not the slightest doubt that there is not a civil servant in Ottawa to-day who, if he or she resigned, there would not be a dozen to fill the place at the same salary, and probably fill it equally efficiently. In some instances the Minister may find it necessary to recognize the services of a very efficient clerk by giving him an increase, and that clerk may be working at a very small salary, as in the case in the present instance submitted by the Controller of Customs. These are not really statutory increases but they have been made customary by the Conservatives when in power, and I believe that the present Government will be sustained by the country in cutting them off.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Mr. McNEILL. I may say to my hon. friend (Mr. McMullen) that if I had any relative in the civil service, I should not at all be ashamed of it, and I should not have thought of replying to what the hon. gentleman has said, except for this reason, that perhaps the argument which I have been endeavouring to lay before the House might to some extent be discounted if it were thought that I was speaking on behalf of a relative of mine. For the information of the House, and for the information of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McMullen), I wish to state that I have only two relatives in this country, and that neither is in any way connected with the civil service of Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I believe that on this side of the House we are all prepared to support the Controller of Customs in granting these increases which he has proposed. That hon. gentleman says that after careful consideration he has found these officers deserving, and he therefore asks the House for this small increase to his salary. There are two important questions to be considered in this connection. One is, justice to the civil servant, and the other is, what course is best calculated to secure that efficient and energetic civil service upon which the good government of the country to a very considerable extent depends. I do not hesitate to say that the policy pursued by both parties in Canada down to the present time was a true and sound policy. That policy was to require at the end of each year the Deputy Minister of the department to report as to what officers, by reason of their efficiency, were entitled to this small annual increase. That policy naturally would have the effect of stimulating the officials to a better performance of their duties than if they found that whether they worked industriously and efficiently, or neglected their duties, they were not affected one way or the other. The hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said—and I am not inclined to dispute it—that that system has rather grown into an abuse, and that it had become a matter of course that the annual increase should be given to every civil servant. If such a practice as that had grown up, it is quite right that measures should be taken to check it, and that the increase should only be granted to those who are entitled to it because of a careful and efficient performance of their duty. But I think the Controller of Customs had an additional reason for the course he has pursued in this matter. The practice of an indiscriminate increase has been suspended by the present Government, the reason for that course, as given by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, being that the civil service had become a very onerous charge upon the country, and that it was desirable to lighten that charge. I would meet that proposal with the suggestion that if a smaller number of persons could efficiently perform the duties of the public service, then, as vacancies arose, and they arise constantly, they might not be filled, and in that way the service might be reduced to as small a number as could perform the duties; and I would still continue the practice of giving the annual increase to those civil servants who, by careful and faithful performance of their duties, show that they are entitled to it. But the Controller of Customs, very properly assuming that that change was to be made in the practice, by which the annual increase was not to be given to all civil servants, has drawn what I think is a very proper distinction between the general staff of the office and those writers who are brought in at $300 or $400 per annum, under the expectation of annual increases in their salaries until they receive a fair remuneration for their services. There are two reasons why I think that course should be adopted by all the departments. Wherever there are persons who are not in the civil service, but who have been induced to take the position of writers in the hope of ultimately reaching a position that would bring them into the service, if they perform their duties faithfully, I think, both in justice to them and in the interest of the civil service itself, that you should stimulate them by giving them this increase. It must be remembered that they come in at a salary at which it is absolutely impossible for them to live—to obtain their board and clothing—or if they do, only by the greatest possible economy; but they enter with the hope that their remuneration will be gradually increased until they receive a little above what is required to provide them with the absolute necessities of life. I am glad that the hon. Controller of Customs has adopted this course, and I would like extremely to see the same course adopted with reference to that class of employees by the other members of the Administration, with the view of stimulating them to the faithful discharge of their duties, and with the view of inducing persons of character and standing to enter the service.

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS. The last speaker seems to have grasped the point which was lost sight of by others who have spoken. The statutory increase of $50 does not apply to the class of persons to whom the hon. gentleman has alluded, because they are not properly-speaking members of the civil service, but extra clerks. But I am permitted to recommend, under an Order in Council, that a certain increase be given to the parties whom I have in my mind, and who are deserving of the increase.

Contingencies—Post Office Department... $40,000

Mr. SPROULE. There seems to be a very large increase here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, a decrease.

Mr. SPROULE. Will the hon. Minister explain how it is brought about?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. SPROULE. It is sometimes quite as important to explain why there is a decrease as why there is an increase.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mullock). The whole decrease in this item is for clerical and other assistance. The words explain themselves. We have reduced the staff.

Mr. FOSTER. Has the hon. gentleman followed the same rule as the Controller of Customs, and made provision for increases for the writer class?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. I think there is no provision for any increase.

Mr. McMULLEN. I most heartily commend the effort made by the hon. Postmaster General to reduce the expenses, and I beg to reply to the long harangue which we had from our esteemed friend the hon. member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), to draw his attention to this matter. I hope he will recognize that this is in the right direction.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat is wonderful in some respects. He is ready to approve of everything, anxious to approve of everything. When the Controller of Customs violates the rule laid down, and gives the statutory increase to every one of his writers, my hon. friend rises and approves; and when the hon. Postmaster General gets up and declares that he has not given the statutory increase to his writers, my hon. friend is the first to get up and approve of that. My hon. friend said a little while ago that there are wheels within wheels. There are some wheels that are not going around just as they used to in this House.

Contingencies—Department of Agriculture $15,000

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have an explanation of the increase.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I am very glad to be able to explain the increase. As a matter of fact the item of $7,500, which was in the Estimates last year for clerical and other assistance, has been found inadequate. When I came into the department last summer, I found that there was a large staff of temporary clerks, whose salaries could not all be paid out of the item in the Estimates, and in 1895-96 the sum of $9,000 was actually paid. This present year, 1896-97, I hoped to be able to reduce this extra assistance to such a point that I would get it within the item of $7,500, but notwithstanding the fact that I have dismissed some seven or eight of these temporary clerks, I find that this year I shall be obliged to ask for a supplementary estimate, of a little over $2,000, to cover these assistants, really making the expenditure, under this item, $9,000 this year, as it was last year. I therefore ask that for the ensuing year we should vote the amount of $9,000, so as to be sure that I will not have to ask next year for a supplementary vote. But I am satisfied that I will be able to bring the expenditure some $400 or $500 under the amount of $9,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to call my hon. friend's attention to what I consider is a case of injustice and ask him to see whether he cannot remedy it. He has in his department quite a large number of temporary clerks, in the Patent Branch especially. I draw his attention to the case of a young man named Bassett, from King's county, N. B., my own county, who came up here in 1886, and was appointed temporary clerk in the Marine Department. He did his work well, and in 1890 was transferred from the Department of Marine and Fisheries, bounty work, to the Patent Branch of the Agriculture Department, where he remained until 1895. I invite my hon. friend to ask the officers of his department whether they have not found that this man was always faithful and attentive to his work and a clerk of more than ordinary ability, who did his work to the entire satisfaction of his superior officers? In 1895, he was made permanent at the same salary he was receiving as temporary clerk, $550 a year, not a large salary, and from 1895 to 1897 he has been in that department as a permanent clerk. Now he has received notice that on the 1st of July next his services will not be required. He did not engage in any political work but stuck to the office. Although a personal friend of mine he did not go to New Brunswick, nor did I ask him to, but he remained here and worked faithfully and well. My hon. friend has fifteen or sixteen temporary clerks in his department. He has some that have been taken in since this man came there, some who were taken in last year, and I think he is doing an injustice to this man by dismissing him from his position, the duties of which he performed to the utmost satisfaction of the department, and keeping on or putting on temporary clerks in his place. If there is any fair rule to go upon—and my hon. friend will, I think, admit that there is—the preference ought to be given to the older clerks, if not so old as to be inefficient, and this young man was not. I would ask my hon. friend to consider the case and consult with his officers and I hope he will be able to retain the services of Mr. Bassett. I am not asking any favour and neither is the young man. There is no charge of offensive partisanship against him or of inefficiency. On the contrary he has always proved highly commendable. He was permanent but has been given his dismissal from the 1st of July, and temporary clerks have been taken on during the year and are being kept on. It is on that ground that I appeal to the hon. Minister to look into this case and see whether he cannot remedy the injustice, because I certainly think it is unjust to treat this man in this way.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am very glad indeed to give the hon. gentleman a full explanation of this matter. I quite agree in what he says with regard to Mr. Bassett's non-interference in politics, because politics had nothing whatever to do with his dismissal, and I have had no complaints of his having taken any part in the elections nor in any political movement at all. But I required to reduce very considerably the staff of the Patent Branch. For that purpose I consulted the leading clerks and deputy heads to find out in what way reorganization could be best effected and economy brought about. With that view, I asked the gentleman who is now acting as chief clerk, Mr. Lynch, to give me a scheme by which he could reduce the number of employees in the branch and rearrange the work so that fewer men could do it. He brought me a complete scheme, apportioning to each individual the work he thought he was best adapted to perform, and in that scheme I found Mr. Bassett's name left out. I do not know Mr. Bassett even by sight. I believe I met him with the other employees when I first came in and shook hands with all the clerks, but from that day out I have not spoken to him. The hon. gentleman says that there are temporary clerks who have come into the department since Mr. Bassett was dismissed. I think the hon. gentleman is incorrectly informed. Only one has come in since I have been in office, and that is a young lady stenographer, whom I engaged in the place of the stenographer who was there at a much higher salary, and whom I put on some work in the Dairy Commissioner's office, which he is able to perform and which an ordinary stenographer could not. No other clerk at all has come into the department since, so that the hon. gentleman is somewhat in error. The hon. gentleman takes the ground that we should dismiss the temporary clerks before dismissing the permanent ones. That is the only possible ground on which discrimination would be made in favour of Mr. Bassett, but I do not accept altogether that principle. We have temporary clerks who are really permanent because they have been in the departments some fifteen years doing their work efficiently and doing work which others, if put into their places, even permanent clerks, would not do as well. I do not think any hon. gentleman would ask me to remove a temporary clerk who is doing special work, and who has been doing it for a number of years, in order to put in his place a permanent clerk who has only been in the department a short time. It happens that the work which Mr. Bassett was doing can be done without him, and I did not feel justified in keeping him on. As the hon. gentleman says, I have nothing against him in any respect whatever. I believe he was efficient enough and did his services as required, but in the interests of economy I felt that I was justified in dispensing with him. As a favour to Mr. Bassett, I gave him leave of absence and am paying his salary until the end of the year as a gratuity, because he was not entitled to anything under the Superannuation Act, not having been sufficiently long in the department. So far from having any idea of doing injustice to Mr. Bassett, I have tried to treat him with every consideration.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher) to give me the names of those who are to be paid from this appropriation for clerical assistance and the dates when they came into the department.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). The following is the list asked for by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) :—

Name.	Salary.	Entered Dept.
	$ cts.
Miss G. Fitzgerald	912 50	1890
Miss M. W. Casey.	821 25	1891
Miss G. Bowden...	638 75	1885
T. H. Morgan....	600 00	1887
L. A. Kingsmill...	547 50	1885
G. Bury.....	547 50	About 1890
U. Dorion.....	547 50	1881
M. Casey.....	540 00	1882
E. A. Rodman....	450 00	Three months ago.
J. Kilgallon.....	400 00	Several years ago.
F. S. Armstrong..	400 00	1891
H. J. Hamilton....	400 00	1890
M. Casgrain.....	400 00	Several years ago.
Miss Braden.....	400 00	About three years ago

— Lafleur, $300. He entered the department in the census branch about three or four years ago ; became a messenger in 1896.

G. O. Gorman, $300. A messenger ; has been in department for many years, in charge of models in the model room.

This is the list of clerks who are expected to be paid out of this item. This does not cover quite the $9,000, but I may point out to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) that it is occasionally necessary to engage temporary clerks for a short time, and I have thought best, in order to make provision ample for the work of the year, to have a few hundred dollars more than sufficient for the staff at present engaged.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to make a long story of this. I think that the statement I made early in the afternoon is fully borne out by the facts given by the Minister. I find that there are sixteen temporaries who are to be kept, and the provision is made for some other help which may be necessary. Now, Mr. Bassett, of whom I spoke in the afternoon, came into the service in 1886. Of these names by the Minister, I find that Miss Fitzgerald came in 1890, Miss Casey in 1891, G. Bury six years ago, E. A. Rodman, three months ago, Kilgallon, some years ago, Braden, three years ago, and Lafleur three years ago. That is, quite a considerable number of those clerks who have come into the service, in one way or another, several years after Mr. Bassett, who has been dismissed. Now, Mr. Bassett's case is not an easy one for another consideration, that under the law which was passed two years ago, he was not eligible to be placed on the superannuation list, his age being a little over forty-five at the time that he was appointed; so that he gets nothing at all in the shape of a superannuation. Those are the facts of the case, and I think my hon. friend might have retained Mr. Bassett, as an old servant and a good servant, and not done any disservice to his department, or any injury in any way, and at the same time done a simple act of justice, I think, to Mr. Bassett and his friends.

Contingencies—Dept. of Marine and Fisheries—
 Clerical and other assistance..... $ 2,000
 Printing and stationery..... 6,000
 Sundries 2,000
 $10,000

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Davies) if the item for clerical assistance covers increases for the third class clerks?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. There is a small increase given to Mr. Quinn, a young gentleman who came into the department about eighteen months or two years ago. He was recommended very highly to me by the accountant of the department. I do not recollect the exact amount of the increase, but I think it is $33.30.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the only increase?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, that is the only increase.

Department of Trade and Commerce..... $6,350

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman will note there is an increase of $750; but I expect to save about that sum in civil government proper. The circumstances, I may say, are these: That I am about to lose the services of one lady at a salary of $700, and I will have to replace her by a temporary clerk at some $400 or thereabouts, and I will want a couple of hundred more for sundries in the department, I think, including expenditures of last year. The hon. gentleman knows that when I lose a third-class clerk I cannot replace him except by appointing a second class clerk.
 Mr. FISHER.

Mr. FOSTER. I want to point out to my hon. friend that he is violating the canons, he has mixed up his sundries with clerical and other assistance, and it would be well, for the sake of perspicacity, to keep it in line with all the others, and, as was contemplated at first, keep the clerical part by itself.

Mr. DAVIN. I would like to learn from the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether my impression is correct, that it is contemplated to do away with the office of Minister of Trade and Commerce, carrying out his own views, and restore the old state of things, and also move in the direction of getting rid of the sixteen Ministers which he used to denounce in other days?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member does not intend to do away with himself.

Department of Agriculture..... $49,242 50

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). There is a considerable reduction, amounting to $2,745. I found on the death of the Commissioner of Patents that I could make some alteration in the administration of that branch of my department, and for the purpose facilitating these changes and making that branch, I think, more effective, I took upon myself to superannuate Mr. J. F. Dionne, who was the chief clerk of that branch, and in his place I promoted Mr. W. J. Lynch, who had been a first class clerk at the highest salary which a first-class clerk may obtain, and put him at the bottom of the list of chief clerks, at the same salary. He is there now.

Mr. HUGHES. Is that the gentleman who drafted the report for you concerning the removal of this clerk that was spoken of a little time ago?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Yes. He is now the head of the department under the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, who is acting as deputy commissioner of patents.

Mr. HUGHES. He is now running the department.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The Deputy Minister of Agriculture is running the department, and the chief clerk is in charge of the rooms of the department under the Deputy Minister of Agriculture, who is now acting as the deputy commissioner of patents. I found that I was able to reduce the number of first class clerks in this way, and I also reduced a number of third class clerks from twenty-three to twenty.

Mr. FOSTER. One of them by promotion.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. No, the additional second class clerk is my private secretary, whom I put into the department as second class clerk, he not having been formerly in the department, but having been paid last year out of the contingencies of the department the amount which we assigned to the secretaries over and above the ordinary allowance in the Estimates for secretaries.

Mr. HUGHES. What was the salary of the late commissioner?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. $2,800. That does not appear in these Estimates because it was a statutory increase, and I propose to introduce a Bill into the House before the end of the session to do away with the office, and do away with the salary.

Mr. HUGHES. What is the salary of the present chief clerk of that department, Mr. Lynch?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The salary of the chief clerk whom I have promoted, is the same as it was before. He is now chief clerk at the bottom of the list, at $1,800. Last year he was at the head of the first class clerks at $1,800, and his salary remains the same as it was last year.

Mr. SPROULE. Could the Minister tell us how long Dionne was in the service, what superannuation allowance he is getting, and whether any time was added to his service for the purpose of making that superannuation larger?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Mr. Dionne was appointed to the service in 1865. His last promotion took place in 1894, when he was made chief clerk. His salary last year was $1,900. Mr. Dionne was superannuated with the usual allowance; I cannot tell exactly what it amounted to, but no years were added to his service. He received a superannuation that will be proper for a salary of $1,900 and the number of years he has served.

Mr. SPROULE. When was he superannuated?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. His superannuation will take effect on 1st July, when the Estimates we are now discussing will come in force. I have given him leave of absence until that date, wishing the new arrangements to take effect from 1st April.

Mr. SPROULE. What is his age?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. If I remember rightly, it is seventy-two; at all events, he is quite an old man. The hon. member for York asked me whether my secretary was now receiving $1,700 a year. I answer, no; I only allow him $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. Then what will become of the other $200?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It will not be spent.

Mr. FOSTER. I advise the hon. Minister not to take it, if he is not going to use it.

Dominion Police..... $22,000

Mr. FOSTER. There is a slight increase, I believe.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. This is the amount which has been voted for several years. For some reason there was a proposed decrease of $539, but it is proposed to revert to the original estimate.

Salaries and contingent expenses of the Senate $63,188

Mr. FOSTER. How do these increases occur, for they seem to be very large?

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. If the hon. gentleman will turn to the details, he will find that the Senate is setting this House a good example. In miscellaneous items there are many decreases, running through different branches, and amounting altogether to $17,000. The salaries and number of officials remain as heretofore, but in reporting debates and stationery there are very considerable decreases, and smaller decreases all along the line.

Mr. FOSTER. There are decreases in pages, sessional messengers and charwomen. The Senate is going to do with half the number of pages, half the number of sessional messengers, one-third the number of charwomen and about one-half the quantity of stationery formerly required. This looks to me a little suspicious if the House of Lords is going to give up its equipment.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I believe the real fact is, that they took a little more money.

Mr. HUGHES. I notice that the usher of the black rod is still continued. I understand the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is anxious to have the office abolished.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. Does my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes) covet the place?

Mr. HUGHES. I have a much better one. I am not in search of office, but perhaps some of the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House might be looking after it.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. That pillar of the constitution is not yet to be removed.

Salary of the Deputy Speaker..... $2,000

Mr. TAYLOR. I would like to inquire where the Deputy Speaker is now, and where he has been for the last three or four weeks.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE. I am happy to inform the hon. gentleman. I rather think his health has required a change of air to the latitude of the province of Quebec. Whether he was in Quebec or Montreal I cannot say, but he will be here shortly, I have no doubt, to report for himself.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have been informed that he has been taking an offensive and active part in politics for the last three or four weeks, stumping the counties in the province of Quebec. He is an officer of this House, and as such should be here to attend to his duties. To-day when the Speaker left the Chair he had to call on one of the hon. members to preside, and that has been the custom for the last three or four weeks. Now, if we can get on, by having hon. gentlemen who are willing, as you, Mr. Chairman, are willing, to preside in the committee, I think we can dispense with a Deputy Speaker. I therefore move that the item be struck out.

Mr. DAVIN I read a few days ago with great profit, a speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce delivered in 1894, in which he stated that he did not see the necessity of having a Speaker and a Deputy Speaker, any more than he saw the necessity of having sixteen Cabinet Ministers. At present we have sixteen Ministers of the Crown, but the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) does not seem to suffer greatly by the companionship of fifteen Ministers around him; in fact, he has grown sleek and happy ever since he passed from this side of the House to the other. I have great respect for the judgment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has been a long time in Parliament, and when he so recently as a few years ago declared that there is no necessity for two Speakers, and when we have had for the last week such a flagrant demonstration of the futility of having a Deputy Speaker, it is nothing short of a reproach to this House to have one. Let me ask you, Mr. Chairman (Mr. Lister), is it not a scandalous thing that the farmers of this country, the farmers of Ontario and the farmers of the North-west Territories should be taxed to pay the salary of a Deputy Speaker who is not here to attend to his duties, but who is away on a political stumping tour? The farmers of this country have waked up, to look into their household affairs, and to ask how their money is spent? They have a literature and an organization of their own, and things of this sort can no longer be done in the unblushing manner that we have seen for the last week. The Deputy Speaker away playing the part of an offensive partisan. He is an officer of this House, and he should sit in that Chair perfectly impartial as Mr. Speaker does when he is there. We cannot suppose that a gentleman taken from either side of the House will be as impartial as one who is devoting his whole time to preside over our proceedings, but if we are to have a man presiding over our committees, and presiding in the Chair when the Speaker is absent as a paid officer of this House, that man should not, while the House is sitting, at all events, fall into the indecency of going into his province to act the part of an offensive partisan. I say it is a scandal, and scandal or no scandal, in the interest of the taxpayers, and in the interest of propriety, I shall support the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. ROGERS. It is a wonder to me that the hon. gentleman from Leeds (Mr. Taylor) and the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) have not seen this salary of $2,000 in the same light years ago as they do now. I agree to a certain extent with what they have said, and I would be very glad to move an amendment that the salary of the Deputy Speaker be reduced by one-half, namely, $1,000. I believe it is necessary to have a Deputy Speaker on certain occasions, in case of the illness of Mr. Speaker, and therefore I move as an amendment that $1,000 be the salary of the Deputy Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER. You cannot do that. There is no amendment allowed.

Mr. FOSTER. The position taken by my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) in making this motion, has good ground for it. It is not taken simply for the fun of the thing, and it is not taken as some hon. gentlemen opposite may think, because we on this side of the House are opposed to having a Deputy Speaker. The ground upon which that motion is based, and the ground upon which I propose to vote for it, is that we have had a most indecent exhibition apparent in this House during the last week or ten days. No one asks that a member of Parliament who comes here, representing either the Liberal or the Conservative party, shall be perfectly impartial. That is asking a little too much of human nature. The members who are sent here by their constituents on certain party bases, are here to represent the principles, and to vote for the policy, of their party. We cannot expect them to be thoroughly impartial, but, Sir, when the members of this House elect an officer of this House, and pay him a competent salary, it is at least to be expected that he shall not outrage proprieties, and that he shall not pit himself against either side of the House. What would you think, Sir, with regard to the Speaker who is the First Commoner, and who has to preside impartially over this House, if when an election were going on in the province of Ontario, he should throw off his robes and hie away to the province, and engage in a heated political campaign? What would you think of the First Com-moner coming back here, and attempting to preside over this House in a perfectly im-partial way. It is quite true that he might be able to bring his mind back to perfect impartiality, after he returns, but there is not a man sitting on either side of the House who would not say that the Speaker had de-meaned his office and had conducted himself in a way unworthy of it, if he should throw off his robes and go down to a political parti-san struggle in a by-election which took place when the House was in session. The Deputy Speaker occupies the place and succeeds to the dignity of the Speaker, when the Speaker is absent, and the Speaker is very often absent from this House. The Deputy Speaker then takes that Chair, and presides impartially, or is supposed to pre-side impartially, over this House. When the House is in committee he is also ex-pected to preside. He is a representative of the dignity and impartiality of the House; we pay him a salary, and we expect him to be in his place; but instead of that he takes the part of the veriest partisan. He goes down to the province of Quebec and orates, as my hon. friend says, and elec-tioneers, away from his duties here. What has taken place? The cardinal principles on which these men opposite have been mas-querading for the last six or eight months has been that offensive political partisans ought not to be officers. The very moment an offensive political partisan is scented in an officer, if he is a Conservative, his death warrant is signed; off goes his head. Hon. gentlemen opposite, in order to keep them-selves consistent, have also stated on the floor of this House, the Premier amongst them, that if offensive political partisanship is shown by officers of the present Gov-ernment, they will see that justice is done, and that a Grit shall be no more an of-fensive political partisan than a Tory. Here is their own officer, nominated and elected by themselves to preside over this House, and paid a salary of $2,000 for doing it. Here is their own officer assuming the part of a political partisan of the most offensive type, going down to the province of Quebec and engaging in heated political discussion while the House is in session, and while his duties imperatively demand his presence here. Tories who have gone off for a single day to attend a single political meeting, though it could not be said that their duties were not perfectly attended to in the mean-time, have been dismissed because, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, they have forgotten to keep themselves entirely free from poli-tical partisanship. Here is a man who deserts his impartial place as an officer of this whole House, who is paid by the whole

House, and who goes and commits acts of the veriest political partisanship. And yet hon. gentlemen sit opposite and think the country will do anything but laugh in their faces when they talk of the principle of the civil service being purged of offensive political partisanship. I protest, and will continue to protest, against such a prosti-tution of the position of an officer of this House, and will vote on every occasion to have this vote reduced or struck out. I end by saying, as I said at the first, that it is a most indecent spectacle which is presented to this country and this House.

Mr. McISAAC. From the statements made by the hon. member who has just sat down, we may assume that in his view it is an inde-cent spectacle for a Deputy Speaker of this House to engage in a political contest. I think every person will admit that for an officer of this House to engage in a provin-cial contest is a very different thing from an officer of this House engaging in a federal contest. The charge made to-night is that the Deputy Speaker of this House went to his own province of Quebec and took part in the provincial elections to-day. If that is a charge against the Deputy Speaker to-day, what do hon. gentlemen opposite say of the Deputy Speaker of the last Parlia-ment, who not only went to take part in the provincial elections in his own province, but went to the province of Nova Scotia. I call the hon. senior member for Pictou (Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) to corroborate the statements I make here to-night when I say that at the time of my by-election in the county of Antigonish in 1895, he and the Deputy Speaker of this House went down there and stumped that county from one end to the other. If an officer of this House is to be censured because he takes part in a provincial campaign, surely hon. gentlemen opposite will condemn the con-duct of their own Deputy Speaker for hav-ing at the opening of the House gone and stumped that county for a whole week, as-sisted by the hon. member for Pictou and another member of the late Government. When this fact is brought to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite, I think they will certainly drop the charge against the De-puty Speaker.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman can get away from the question by referring to the con-duct of the late Deputy Speaker. In the first place, the Conservative party never took the extreme attitude in regard to offi-cial partisanship that hon. gentlemen oppo-site take. In the second place, the late Deputy Speaker attended the session in the year to which the hon. gentleman refers, and performed all the duties of his office. The election to which the hon. gentleman refers took place before the session opened. The Deputy Speaker of that Parliament, in-stead of being absent during the session, was actually here performing his duties from the opening of the session to the end of it. He was in one section of the county of Antigonish two days. What part he took in the contest the hon. gentleman knows better than I do, because I was not with him.

Mr. McISAAC. You were on the platform with him.

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER. I saw him in the county. He was there doing what he could to vindicate Conservative principles and to assist the party to which he belongs. I do not dispute that at all; but the House was not in session, and neither the Conservative party nor any other party had ever propounded the stringent and unreasonable rule which the Liberal party have propounded with regard to political partisanship. But this is a motion put under very different circumstances. Here we are not only in session, but we have reached that period of the session when the Deputy Speaker's presence is particularly necessary here, and he is absent from his post. I may refer to some other reasons why this motion should be acceptable. The hon. gentleman who last spoke took part in the late provincial campaign in Nova Scotia, and had to suffer a reduction in his indemnity for the number of days that he was absent. Why should a different rule, even in that sense, be shown to an officer holding the position of Deputy Speaker of this House? For all these reasons, I think the suggestion that an expression of the opinion of this House should be given is timely, and I will vote for the motion.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would find no fault at all with the Deputy Speaker of this House for taking part in a by-election when the House is not in session. The Deputy Speaker has taken part in elections both in the province of Quebec and elsewhere. If a member is absent during the session, the law provides that his indemnity shall be docked for the days he is absent; but the sum of $2,000 is paid to the Deputy Speaker as a salary specially that he may be here to perform his duties during the entire session. We have been in session six weeks, and the Deputy Speaker has not been here one week, but instead has been stumping all the time in the province of Quebec. Are we going to pay him $2,000 for going throughout the province of Quebec and stumping? I say that it is an outrage for the Deputy Speaker to have taken this course, and I think it would be wrong to vote him money for doing duties which he has not performed, especially when we can get on just as well without a Deputy Speaker as with one, as we have done so far this session.

Mr. MACLEAN. The rule of conduct which governs the Speaker ought to apply equally to the Deputy Speaker. Every one will agree that it would be wrong for the

Sir CHARLES HIBBERT TUPPER.

Speaker to take part in elections while the House is sitting; and if the former Deputy Speaker did what he is said to have done, he did wrong. I hope the hon. First Minister will at least assure us that hereafter such a glaring breach of the proprieties and of parliamentary rules will not occur again.

Mr. CRAIG. I think it will be acknowledged by all sides of the House that the Deputy Speaker should be considered impartial by everybody, and in order that he should be so considered, he ought not, during the term of Parliament, take an active part in politics. I do not know whether that view has been taken in the past or not, but it would be a good rule to lay down for the future. Apart from this consideration, the Deputy Speaker ought to be here discharging the duties of his office. I have noticed that he frequently is not, and this cannot fail to lead the House to believe that we can get along without a Deputy Speaker at all. For my part, I think it is a good thing to have a Deputy Speaker. It has been found by experience that we need one at times. Not very long ago we had a session when the necessity forced itself upon us, and we never know when such another great necessity may occur. I feel perfectly free to speak as I do on this question because I do not intend to support this motion, but I do insist that the rule ought to be laid down by the hon. First Minister that in future the Deputy Speaker shall not take an active part in any election, by-election or otherwise, during the course of any Parliament for which he was elected Deputy Speaker. The necessity for that rule is obvious. He is supposed to be impartial and to replace the Speaker when required, and all admit that it would be very unfortunate if the Speaker should go out and take an active part in any elections, whether Dominion or local, between which I do not think we can draw any distinction. The hon. member for Antigonish (Mr. McIsaac) said the course of the Deputy Speaker did not amount to anything, because this was a provincial election, but it is a party election all the same, and the conduct of the Deputy Speaker in taking an active partisan interest in it must weaken our confidence in his impartiality. It would be a good thing now that this matter has been brought up, to settle it once for all, and I hope the hon. Prime Minister will lay down the rule that while a member of this House holds the important position of Deputy Speaker, he should not take an active part in politics, but should, unless prevented by sickness, be always on hand here to do the work which he was elected to perform.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very sorry to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Craig) say he is not prepared to support this motion. I did not think it could be possible to offer a motion in this committee more deserving of support. If we are to have a Deputy Speaker—and there are many in this House and the country who think we could get along very well without one, as we did for a long period—we should have one who will occupy the same position in relation to this House as the Speaker does. You, Mr. Speaker, could not engage in elections without incurring the condemnation of every member of this House and of every intelligent man of this country. If that be your position, Mr. Speaker—and I believe there is no one in this House who would more willingly admit that position than the gentleman who leads this House—why should your deputy be allowed to abandon the House and desert his duty in order to take part in local elections? I regret very much that my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Craig), in his extreme good nature, should feel unable to support this motion. It is a motion which I hope will be sustained by every member on both sides who values the independence of Parliament and the position which the Speaker of the House occupies and which the Deputy Speaker occupies. I do not expect the members of the Government to support this motion, because I have under my hand evidence of the lengths to which they are prepared to go in this local election in the province of Quebec. I have received to-day the following telegram from Valleyfield:—

Lock broken this morning on Beauharnois Canal. A new lockmaster just appointed in place of an old and reliable employee. The new one is the man who was serving liquor in a bar-room at Beauharnois on the day of nomination. All Conservative employees notified yesterday not to vote, on peril of dismissal. Will show you the letter.

J. G. H. BERGERON.

There is an indication of the extent to which the Government are prepared to go. They are prepared to turn out reliable and valuable employees engaged in a most important part of the public service, the management of the canals. They are prepared to risk and destroy public property by dismissing old reliable and trustworthy men who understand their duty and putting in their places men who are incapable and unreliable. This man no doubt was drunk.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, if this man was serving out liquor in a bar-room on nomination day, the probability is that he who served out liquor to other people would drink it himself. At all events, the fact remains that public property is destroyed, while in the charge of this man who was appointed in the place of a reliable and trustworthy employee. In addition, it appears that this Government have notified the employees in the province of Quebec that if they vote in the provincial elections for a Conservative candidate they will forfeit their offices. I do not expect the Government to support this motion, but every independent man in this House I expect to vote for it, not out of any feeling towards the individual, but out of respect for the principle. I expect every independent man to put on record the declaration that, so far as he is concerned, he is not prepared to stand before the intelligent people of the country and justify the desertion by the Deputy Speaker of the high and important position he holds in this House in order to take part in a local election. I believe that the intelligent electorate of this country will mark with their approval the action of every man who discharges his duty here as an independent representative of the Speaker, by insisting that the man whom we elect to represent the Speaker, when the Speaker is not in the Chair, should attend to his duties and do nothing which would lead us to lose confidence in his impartiality

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). I am sorry that the wise remarks which have just fallen from the lips of my hon. friend from East Durham (Mr. Craig) have not been heeded on his own side of the House. It may be as well that at this juncture we should have an understanding as to the duties of the Deputy Speaker. If it be the opinion of this House that the Deputy Speaker should act just as the Speaker does, for my part, I have no objection to the establishment of that rule. But that has not been the rule that has prevailed up to this time. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek to apply to the present Deputy Speaker a different rule from that which was applied when they were in office and one of their friends was Deputy Speaker. It has been a rule of all parties in this House and in the mother country as well that the Speaker of the House should be above party politics, that the duties of his office, while he is in the Chair, should make him absolutely impartial. There is no case on record of a Speaker of this House or of the House of Commons in England taking part in an election. Those gentlemen who have occupied the Chair in this House have understood the duties of their office, and never have we had the spectacle of a Speaker interfering on the stump or otherwise in a political contest. But if that has been the rule applied to the Speaker, hon. gentlemen opposite know as well as I do that while they were in office no such rule was ever laid down for the guidance of the Deputy Speaker. While I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the manner in which the Deputy Speakers who formerly held that office have discharged their duties on the floor of this House, hon. gentlemen opposite know as well as I do that, outside of this House, the Deputy Speaker was as much a partisan as any of us. Why, Sir, a crime is imputed to the Deputy Speaker of this House to-day because he took part in a provincial election which has been going on in the province of Quebec. If it be a crime for an hon. gentleman occupying that position to take part in an election, and if it is to be the rule that he should not do so, for my own part, I am quite willing to apply that rule in the future, if that be the sense of the House. If it be a fault in the Deputy Speaker to have taken part in a local election, I say that it is a ten times greater fault for the Deputy Speaker to take part in an election to this House. Why should a Deputy Speaker not be allowed to take part in an election? We are told that it is because it may interfere with his impartiality on the discharge of his duties while in the Chair. But if that is to be the rule laid down as applied to general elections, it must be manifest that that rule must apply with ten times greater force to elections to this House. Never, to my knowledge, has it been made a crime hitherto for the Deputy Speaker in former Parliaments to take part in an election, and we all know that all former Deputy Speakers, and especially the hon. gentleman who was Deputy Speaker in the last Parliament, never scrupled taking part in elections to this House. It has been my privilege to meet the late Deputy Speaker (Mr. Bergeron) on the platform again and again in the province of Quebec. I met him in the election in Jacques Cartier in 1895, in the Montreal Centre election in 1895; I met him in Two Mountains. I met him in Soulanges—and in almost every election that took place in the province of Quebec. More than that;—not satisfied with taking part in the elections of Quebec he went to Nova Scotia to speak to the Roman Catholic French electors of Antigonish. No one questioned the right of the Deputy Speaker to exercise his rights as a citizen. It might have been in better taste, perhaps, not to have done it. But I am only showing what has been the rule observed so far as the Deputy Speaker is concerned, and I cannot conceive with what grace or justice or equity the hon. gentleman (Sir Charles Tupper) reproaches the present Deputy Speaker for having taken part in a provincial election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) allow me to ask him if he ever knew before the scandal of a Deputy Speaker deserting the House during a session to go away and take part in an election?

The PRIME MINISTER. I have only this to answer—that the scandal of the Deputy Speaker deserting the House to take part in a provincial election does not approach in magnitude the scandal of the Deputy Speaker taking part in an election to the House. What was the late Deputy Speaker doing in the cases to which I have referred? He was taking part in an election to the House which he was to preside over. Surely that is ten times a greater scandal than the Deputy Speaker taking part in a provincial election—and as to that I place myself in the judgment of every right-thinking man in this House. As to the charges made by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) as to what took place in Beauharnois, I have to say that public opinion as to the conduct of the Government will not rest upon a mere telegram of this kind; the conduct of the Government is open to criticism from everybody and under any circumstances whatever.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh, give us a rest.

Mr. DAVIN. I can tell hon. gentlemen that they had better not try that on. I object on principle to a Deputy Speaker. And now let me read what my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) said in 1894:

What on earth do we want with fifteen or sixteen Cabinet Ministers?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. He was referring to extinct volcanoes.

Mr. DAVIN:

It would be treason to say it, or I would ask: What do we want with a couple of Speakers?

Now, that is what I re-echo.

The PRIME MINISTER. Two years after.

Mr. DAVIN. How does the hon. gentleman know that I did not thoroughly endorse it then?

The PRIME MINISTER. By your votes—that is the only way.

Mr. DAVIN. If he or any other gentleman had asked for a vote on this question, I would have voted with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIN. Certainly I would. Now, here is the position we are in: Here is a gentleman appointed to a position whose duties are almost perfunctory. There may be times when it is necessary to have somebody to take the place of the Speaker. Before we appointed a Deputy this was efficiently done by a member of the House, and we have members of this House quite as capable of acting as efficiently in the Chair as is the Deputy Speaker at the present time. What I wish to point out is that this gentleman is paid $22 a day, counting upon a session of three months, for merely sitting in that Chair as Deputy Speaker. He is paid $2,000 for a session of about three months. My hon. friend from East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) will be able to calculate what this represents in the form of the crop upon a good well-managed farm. Why, Sir, that is thirty-six bushels of wheat at 60 cents a bushel that we give that hon. gentleman per day for occasionally sitting in the Chair. We give him a farm larger than a homestead, we give him a homestead and a pre-emption, well managed and well farmed, for sitting occasionally in the Chair and preside over our committees. Sir, let me say that although you (Mr. Lister) and I have crossed swords in debate, although you do not get a cent for sitting there, you discharge the duties as efficiently as the Deputy Speaker; and if you were to sit in the Chair behind you, I have no doubt that the same dignity that characterizes your presidency over our committees would characterize you in that Chair. Yet we have not to pay you a cent, nor is the hon. gentleman unwilling to give his services, nor is there any hon. gentleman on either side of the House that would be unwilling. Yet, Sir, when we ought to be retrenching, we pay the Deputy Speaker $2,000, $22 a day for a session of ninety days, and then when he is away ten or twelve days stumping, we give him $22 a day for stumping, thirty-six bushels of wheat at 60 cents for stumping in Quebec. Why, Sir, it is pretty hard, and I think we ought to have the Patrons supporting my hon. friend. Certainly I am not going to throw a well-managed wheat farm of 320 acres away on the Deputy Speaker to perform a perfunctory office, especially when he does not come here. Now, let me say one word with regard to the practice in England. The Deputy Speaker is not called, if I remember rightly, Deputy Speaker in England; he is called Chairman of Committee; and he always belongs to the party in power. But I think I can say with authority that such a thing as the gentleman occupying that position in England taking part in partisan warfare, is not known, although he is a good party man. If we are to have a Deputy Speaker—which I deprecate, I will vote for this motion. But we do not need the officer, and I hope we will abolish the office.

Amendment (Mr. Taylor) negatived: yeas, 32; nays, 50.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the resolution be reduced by $1,000.

Mr. SPROULE. It does seem to me that some hon. gentlemen in this House who have been so very active in the past in condemning the Deputy Speakership as needless, are guilty of inconsistency in voting as they did on the last motion. I am surprised at those hon. gentlemen, above all others, who belong to the organization known as the Patrons, because they have invariably condemned this as one of the needless expenditures in the House. I can understand why many members of this House believe that we require a Deputy Speaker; I, for one, believe that we require a Deputy Speaker; but while believing that, I also believe that for the sake of the position that he occupies, and for the sake of his own reputation, he ought to be here discharging his duties while the House is in session. Now, some hon. gentlemen in the course of the debate, endeavoured to argue that the late Deputy Speaker did the same; but I failed to hear any one of them say that the late Deputy Speaker took part in a Dominion or provincial election while a session of Parliament was going on. Outside of this, I am of opinion that there can not be the slightest objection in the world to the Deputy Speaker taking part in either election, according to his political proclivities; but I do think that while the House is in session he ought to be here attending to his duties.

Amendment (Mr. Foster) negatived: yeas, 36; nays, 51.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier). Before the resolution is carried, by way of commentary upon the proceedings we have just seen, let me remind hon. gentlemen opposite that once upon a time, on the floor of this House, a vote of censure was moved against the late Mr. Gorman, editor of the Ottawa "Free Press," for having written an article blaming the late Speaker, Mr. White—who I must say was a very good Speaker—for having left his seat during the session of the House to go and take part in a political campaign.

House of Commons—Salaries..... $71,025

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation concerning the reduction in salaries?

Mr. SPEAKER. The decrease is caused by the difference of $800 in the salary of the late Assistant Clerk and the present Assistant Clerk, the salary of the new appointee commencing at the minimum of $2,000, and the difference of $300 between the salary of the late Mr. Demers, assistant French translator, and the new appointee who commences at the minimum salary of a second class clerk. That makes a reduction of $1,100. The additions were as follows:—$100 caused by the promotion of second class clerk, and $12.50 required to give the French journals clerk the increment to his salary. The total reduction is $1,100 and the increase $120.50.

Mr. HUGHES. I cannot allow the remark made by the Prime Minister to pass unchallenged, that the late Speaker of this House had been charged by Mr. Gorman with having taken part in elections. The charge was not that Mr. Speaker White during the session took part in elections, but that he attended a convention during the recess; and there was not one word of truth even in that charge.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the Prime Minister should make an apology to the House. He owes some duty to truth as well as a common member, and if he made a statement of that kind and there was not one word of truth in it, the Prime Minister should at least make the amende.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL. The item has been disposed of.

Mr. TAYLOR. I notice in the details of salaries there is a decrease of $800 in the office of Assistant Clerk. What became of the Assistant Clerk who was here during last session? Has he been superannuated? If so, what amount does he receive, and why was it necessary to superannuate him?

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that the late Assistant Clerk resigned his position by letter sent to me, and his office has been filled by a gentleman, as I have explained, who commences at a salary of $2,000, there being a saving of $800 effected in that particular. The gentleman resigned because he knew very well that the efficiency of the service of this House might probably be increased by his resignation. So far as regards superannuation, the Committee of Internal Economy has recommended the Government that he be granted superannuation allowance according to his term of service, with about three months added to make the round term of fifteen years.

Expenses of Commons, sessional and extra clerks, &c..... $14,200

Mr. FOSTER. The committee would like to have a statement from the Speaker as to the extra clerks.

Mr. SPEAKER. The details are all on page 33.

Mr. FOSTER. Have there been any more changes than those detailed last year?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, there have been. I will give the names of the sessional clerks. C. W. C. Tabor resigned and was replaced by F. L. Fairweather. J. S. Masson resigned and was replaced by A. D. Weeks. W. W. Kenny resigned and was replaced by E. F. Neville. R. F. Bain resigned and has not been replaced, because I think the list is complete.

Contingencies, including $300 for clerical assistance for the leader of the Opposition $17,400

Mr. SPROULE. There is a reduction here of $10,000.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. gentleman will look at page 34 he will see that the reduction is entirely on stationery. For a number of years past the annual appropriation for stationery was $12,000, which included distribution of small trunks of stationery to members, the last distribution being in August, the expenditure coming out of the vote of last year. As the House decided last session that no distribution of small trunks should be made this session, the Clerk and I decided that $6,000, in addition to the regular appropriation, would carry us through this financial year, covering the two sessions. Consequently the amount appropriated for the current financial year is $8,000.

Mr. FOSTER.

Mr. FOSTER. The amount of $8,000 is an abnormal sum?

Mr. SPEAKER. That is a saving for 1897-98 of $4,000, the usual annual sum being $12,000.

Mr. FOSTER. What stationery is now distributed to members?

Mr. SPEAKER. Hon. members get the stationery they require and a few trifling articles that can be obtained out of the reduced appropriation.

Mr. HUGHES. I believe in economy, but not in a cheeseparing policy. A member who attends to his duties during the session is entitled to all he gets in the stationery trunk, for he will use the stationery and more. Now this year each member has received a bundle tied up with a string. It is beneath the dignity of this House to send out such a parcel for the sake of saving a few hundred dollars—it looks like a country grocer's parcel. I believe in economy, but not in this small cheese-paring sort; it is equal to the attacks made on napkins and other trifling expenditures at Rideau Hall—it is that kind of politics.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Will the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) calculate the saving in bushels of wheat?

Mr. HUGHES. I understand there is a saving of $4,000; the usual sum is $12,000 and the amount now asked is $8,000. I think members should not only have the stationery they require for use during the session and during the recess, but that it should be done up in a proper parcel, for it will be used in the service of their constituents. I also think they should have the franking privilege for any work they do for their constituents during the recess.

Mr. CRAIG. I wish to say a word about this very matter. One night when I went to my room I found a bundle of stationery tied up with paper and twine, and I was wondering what I would do with it. I do not know how I am going to get it home. If the Government give us stationery tied up in this way, the least they might do would be to pay the express charges, as it will take more to send it home than it is worth. I think it is rather a poor way to send around stationery to members of this House. However, I rose to speak of something which concerns the dignity of this House and that is, that the stationery supplied to the members of the Senate is better than the stationery supplied to the members of this House. I was going to say that that was an outrage, but I do not know whether you would call it that or not. I see no reason why a Senator should get better stationery than a member of the House of Commons. I think a member of the House of Commons is just as good as a Senator, and in fact sometimes it is a little harder to get into the House of Commons than into the Senate. If there is to be any difference at all made, we ought to get better stationery than the Senators do. I hope that those who have charge of the matter will bear this in mind, and afford a remedy next session. Perhaps it might be done in order to make people anxious to get into the Senate, but I presume there are a good many anxious enough to get there now without offering them this further inducement. Speaking seriously, I do believe there should be no distinction made at all. I think the stationery supplied to the House of Commons might be improved a little, and that it might be made equally as good as that supplied to the Senate.

Publishing Debates..... $40,000

Mr. SPROULE. I intended to say a few words in reference to the reporting of the debates, but as this is for "publishing debates" perhaps it would not be exactly apropos. I have noticed at different times this year, that the reporting is very bad, and I do not understand why it should be so, because we have usually had very good reporting in the past. I am not aware that there are any changes in the staff of reporters, but I must say, that, sometimes, it is a good deal more trouble correcting a speech than it is making it. I think it would save us a great deal of work if we had closer reporting. It may be as some of the reporters complain, that we occasionally speak very fast, but I do not know that we are any worse in that regard now than we have been in the past, and yet, in my opinion, the reporting is very much worse this year than heretofore.

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). It is about as good as the speeches.

Mr. CRAIG. It is only fair to say of the reporters, that any speeches of mine are well reported. I have not had to make any complaint.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should say that my experience has been entirely different from that of my hon. friend (Mr. Sproule) behind me. I have been on recent occasions, as on previous occasions, surprised at the wonderful accuracy of the reports of the debates of this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Considering the difficulty that often presents itself, through a little ebullition on one side of the House or the other; how the reporters get the debates reported with such marvellous accuracy, has always been a surprise to me.

I feel, that in justice to these gentlemen, I ought to say that my experience is different from that of my hon. friend.

Contingencies in connection with printing of Voters' Lists..... $2,500

Mr. SPROULE. If it is intended to do away with the franchise law, what do you require this for in the year 1898. There must be something wrong. You cannot be sincere when you say you desire to do away with the franchise law.

Salaries, officers of the Library..... $16,650

Mr. FOSTER. There is a decrease here. How has that been effected?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). There appears to be an increase of $387 for third class clerks and a saving of $1,275 in second class clerks, leaving a general decrease of $912. I think it arises out of Mr. Thayne's superannuation, because of illness.

Mr. SPROULE. Are there the same number of third class clerks as before.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. Yes, there is a third class appointed in the place of a second class clerk and that makes the reduction.

Mr. FOSTER. Who has been appointed?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The gentleman appointed to fill the vacancy caused by Mr. Thayne's superannuation is a son of the Hon. Wm. McDougall, of Ottawa. I think his appointment will meet with general approval.

Books—Library of American History..... $1,000

Mr. FOSTER. What is done with this money?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. The sum has been voted for several years to buy books on American history.

Mr. FOSTER. It is a tremendous sum for American history. It would buy almost one volume.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES. It would buy more than that.

Archives..... $8,000

Mr. FOSTER. What is the explanation of the increase?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). For several years past Mr. Brymner who has been in charge of this work, has been asking for an increase. It is evident, from my examination of the affairs of the branch, that the work of historical research in this country, in London, and in Paris, in connection with our archives, has been considerably hampered for lack of funds. Hon. gentlemen will, I am sure, appreciate the work which Mr. Brymner has done. His report is sought for by all those who take the slightest interest in the history of our country, and I am quite satisfied that the House will sympathise with my desire to extend that work. For a number of years back the vote has been just the same each year, with this exception, that for a time there was an assistant to Mr. Brymner appointed, a gentleman who worked in Paris at a salary which was voted by the House each year as a special salary. This official died about a year and a half or two years ago, and since that time the work in Paris has practically ceased. The archives of the early history of this country are largely in the public libraries in Paris; that is to say, for the period during which this country was occupied by the French, and for some time afterwards, when constant references were sent to Paris in regard to occurrences in this country by the original French inhabitants. This work is very important for the proper investigation of our early history, and I thought it was desirable that it should be recommended and continued on a larger scale than before. There are also a number of things in this country which Mr. Brymner has not been able to investigate owing to the lack of funds; and I felt satisfied that it was a work which the reading people of the country would desire to see carried forward more actively than it has been. Under these circumstances, I feel justified in asking for this slight increase in the grant.

Mr. SPROULE. Has Mr. Brymner got any assistant, or how many are engaged at the work?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. There is no other salaried official connected with that branch except a clerk, Mr. Duff, who appears in the civil list of the department, and who is also engaged in the work here in Ottawa. There is no official away from Ottawa who is on the civil list. All the other expenditures, for the transcription of documents and the carrying on of historical research are paid out of this grant. There is a staff of copyists in London, and a few in Paris; and in this country we have to make copies of documents which are scattered about in various places. For instance, at this moment Mr. Brymner is very anxious to copy some documents which are in charge of the Anglican Cathedral in the city of Quebec, documents of great historical importance, of which we have at present no copies in our national archives. All work of this kind is done out of this grant, and it has not heretofore been sufficient for properly carrying it on.

"Patent Record" $9,000

Mr. SPROULE. Is this for publishing the "Patent Record?"

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is for the printing and publishing of it.

Mr. FISHER.

The work in connection with it is done in the department by the clerks of the patent branch. This is all paid to the printing department.

Collection and compilation of Criminal Statistics (Chap. 60, R.S.C.)..... $1,800

Mr. FOSTER. Are these any good at all?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I believe the legal fraternity of the country want them.

Statistical Year-Book..... $4,000

Mr. SPROULE. I think we ought to have some explanation of the reduction in this case. If it is intended to give us a smaller number, I think it is a very bad kind of economy, because this is one of the valuable books which is looked forward to with a good deal of interest when it comes out. In my part of the country school teachers want it, and commercial men want it, and we cannot supply the demand. Instead of reducing the number, I think the hon. Minister would be going in the right direction if he gave us a larger number.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The hon. gentleman has got entirely on the wrong track. I am going to publish a great deal larger number than ever before; but by making a considerable reduction in the volume of the book, I am going to lessen its cost. Last year it reached near 1,000 pages. This year I am going to have it within 500 pages, by excising from it a number of opinions, by condensing the tables, and by bringing together tables which are duplicated in different form, and making one table serve for two or three. There were several things in the last volume which we have cut out altogether. A large portion of that volume was occupied with the results of the census. It is a practical compilation from the census of 1891.

Mr. SPROULE. They would not require to be in, of course, in the succeeding year.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It seems to me that at this period, some six or seven years after the census, it is quite time to drop the census and let us have some new statistics. Last year's book had become so bulky it was practically losing its utility, and I think it very important that it should be kept down in size. Having gone over the matter carefully, with Mr. Johnson, the Statistician, I am quite satisfied that the work now being prepared will contain all the necessary information and statistics in a much less bulky form. The Statistician, under my direction, has started out with the intention of bringing the book down to less than 500 pages whereas now it is nearly a thousand. I intend publishing this year 3,000 English and 1,000 French copies, I think.

General Statistics..... $3,200

Mr. SPROULE. What is the explanation of the reduction ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. We have dispensed with the services of a number of extra clerks. Speaking from memory, some five or six have been dispensed with, and this saving is the result.

Aid to Agricultural Societies..... $7,000

Mr. SPROULE. What societies are receiving aid ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The agricultural societies in the North-west Territories. I have not the list, but each year this sum is voted and distributed. A certain sum is given according to membership, and no society is allowed to receive more than $250. This and last year the number of societies asking for aid has become so large that the maximum has not been reached by any one society. About 20 or 25 societies in different parts of the North-west Territories participate in this vote.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know whether this is the proper place to speak of it, but would like to inquire whether the hon. Minister has made arrangements to pay the debts incurred in connection with the exhibition at Regina last year ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. While that has nothing to do with this vote I may inform the hon. gentleman that I am investigating the claims in connection with this exhibition which was gotten up under the patronage and auspices of the Lieutenant-Governor of the North-west Territories. I am investigating the claims against that gentleman or that association, which have not been paid, in order to see whether they are just and proper and whether this House should be asked to pay them.

Mr. SPROULE. There will be an item for them ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. That will depend on the result of my investigation.

Experimental Farms..... $75,000

Mr. McMILLAN. In looking over the report I find six teamsters are employed during the whole year and four stablemen. That is a large number of gentlemen employed upon a farm of that description. I run a farm as large myself, and I think there should be some explanation in this. I do not think it necessary to have six teamsters on that farm during the whole year. It may be necessary during the summer, but I should like to know what they do during the winter.

Mr. DAVIN. Something like the Deputy Speaker.

Mr. McMILLAN. The hon. gentleman is rather late in finding that out. I discovered it years ago. His conversion is very late.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I believe the teamsters are engaged the whole winter. I confess I have not the full details of the farm work this evening, because I did not expect these items to come up, but I can tell the hon. gentleman this, that up to the present time I have not undertaken to make any changes in the management or organization of the Experimental Farm. I came into the department some months ago, and found my attention very much occupied by various outside matters, quarantine matters, cold storage, which required the greatest care and thought to work out, a problem which I felt was extremely urgent in the interests of our people, some matters in connection with cattle quarantine and human quarantine, and the reorganization of the service in my own department and especially the Patent Branch. Feeling that I could not undertake everything at once, I simply left the Experimental Farm until such time as I might be able to spend a few months practically on the field with the men and see what was being done. I trust to being able to do that this spring and the early part of the summer, and hope to be able to reorganize where I find it necessary. I am not prepared at this stage to say what I think necessary and what not, as I have not sufficient knowledge of the details to lay a scheme before the House. Under the circumstances, I thought it best to let the farms work along as they have been doing until I could take up the reorganization. I do not desire to criticise the management of these farms, as that may be all right. There may be nothing to reorganize. I cannot say until I have investigated more completely than I have had time to do yet what may be required to be done. Therefore, I feel compelled to ask the House to vote the same sums as have been voted in past years, and if I find I can make reductions I will do so, notwithstanding the fact that the vote is the same amount as formerly. On the other hand, if I find, at the end of the year, that I can see my way to spend more money on the farm profitably, if I find that it is in the interests of the country to do so, I shall not hesitate in asking this House for a larger vote and have no doubt the House will grant it. If any hon. gentleman wishes to put questions in detail, I shall try to answer as well as I can, but have not at my hand to-night the memorandum which Professor Saunders had prepared for me.

Mr. McMILLAN. I have tried year after year to press upon the Government the idea that the farm proper and the experimental work should be kept apart, so that we might know in reality what the farm proper, that is as compared with a general farm, costs us. We all know that the experimental part could never pay, and I, for my part, believe, that the experimental work is the part we have been most benefited by. There is one grass seed that was shown to us by Professor Saunders in the Agricultural Committee, that, I believe, will prove of lasting benefit to the North-west country, one of the greatest benefits that have been conferred upon it. But I do want to see what money is spent on the farm proper and what on the experimental part. I notice that we have six teamsters employed on the farm during the whole year. I observe also that 505 loads of manure were brought to the farm and there is a charge of $201 for labour in connection with that manure. I do not understand why this charge should be made, with six teamsters on the farm all winter. Surely they should be able to handle all the manure on the farm without extra cost.

Mr. MCGREGOR. That is probably the cost of buying the manure.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; this is for labour over and above the cost of the manure. While certain things connected with the experimental part of the work are of great benefit, I know that the amount spent on the farm requires careful looking after. The sum of $40,000 is set apart for the Central Farm. I know that the Minister is doing his best to expend that money to the greatest advantage, and I will not say any more. I merely give these hints in order that the hon. the Minister may have an opportunity to attend to the matters that I suggest.

Mr. HUGHES. I am glad to see the leader of the Government (Mr. Laurier) in his place. I would like to call his attention to what I am sure he will be glad to correct. A little time ago he made a statement in reference to the action taken in this House when Mr. Gorman was brought to the notice of the House for an article in which he had charged that the then Speaker had taken part in an electoral campaign. It transpired that the article did not refer to any contest going on while the House was in session. The charge was that the Speaker had attended a convention. The fact was that he did not attend the convention and the charge was entirely unfounded. I am sure that if the hon. the First Minister will look up the record of that time he will see that what I state is correct. I am speaking from authority.

The PRIME MINISTER. I would not contradict the hon. gentleman's statement, but my impression was that the Speaker had attended a convention not for a Dominion but for a provincial election.

Mr. HUGHES. He was charged with having attended the convention but he was not there.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. Fisher). I would like to say a word in reply to my hon. friend from South Huron ply to my hon. friend from South Huron details here of the expenditure on the farm, which I did not think I had. The hon. member for South Huron has said what I quite sympathize with, and which, perhaps, deserves a word or two of explanation, if the patience of the committee will allow it. In the Central Experimental Farm but a small proportion of this amount, $40,000, is spent on what may be called the farm work proper. At this Central Farm are the scientific officials who have to deal with all the experimental stations. The director of the Central Farm is director of all the farms, and, though his salary is charged to the Central Experimental Farm, his work extends over all the farms. We have besides the director, Professor Fletcher, the entomologist; Professor Shutt, the chemist, and Professor Craig, the horticulturist, whose work extends practically over the whole country, though their salaries and expenditures are charged to the Central Experimental Farm. We have, besides, at the Experimental Farm, the whole distribution of the seeds and plants and trees, which consumes a great deal of time and costs a great deal of money. Hon. members are well aware of the fact that the Central Experimental Farm sends out every year large quantities of seed grain, and various other seeds for experimental use throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion. That is done by the desire of hon. members, and the seeds are sent to those whose names are furnished by the members. This business is entirely apart from the work of the farm as a farm. At the same time, it is a work that demands the labour of seven or eight men for between two and three months every winter, and also involves a considerable amount of cartage. When hon. members are informed that this year over 50,000 samples of seed grain have been sent out from the Experimental Farm to every part of the country they can understand the amount of labour that is involved in this part of the work. These seeds must be carefully selected, put up in proper packets, labelled and posted, and the posting of itself means a great deal of labour. In addition to that a careful record has to be kept of every such sample sent out, and a form must be sent instructing the individual to whom the seed is directed how he can best utilize it for experimental purposes, and asking him to fill out a report showing the results of the experiments. I regret to say that the percentage of instances in which these reports are sent back to the Central Experimental Farm is comparatively small, and the results are not properly commensurate with the expenditure and the trouble involved. At the same time, there are some results and there is some satisfaction, and I doubt if the members of this House or the people from the country will be willing to do away with this feature of the Experimental Farm work—and I do not propose to do away with it, for the present, at all events. But I want to draw attention to the fact that all this expenditure is charged to the Experimental Farm, though it has nothing to do with the running of the farm as a farm. Besides that we have a great many visitors to the Experimental Farm. All through the summer season there is a constant succession of individual visitors, and, during several months of the year, a large number of excursion parties come to the farm and have to be attended to. These visitors require a great deal of attention. A large portion of the staff have to stop their work and go about and show the visitors what there is to be seen and explain everything to them, and, generally, to treat them as visitors might properly expect to be treated when they come to the Government institution. This work is a serious interruption of the ordinary farm work, even the ordinary labourers, having, in many instances, to stop their work to attend to visitors. I am not making complaints, because I think these visits are one of the best means of familiarizing the people with the experimental work going on at the farm which is of such value to the people of the country at large. It is of inestimable value to the people to become acquainted with the work going on and the results which may follow. Still the fact that these excursion parties and a large number of visitors come all through the year, and especially during summer when the work is most driving, does interfere with the economical management of the work which my hon. friend from South Huron desires, as I desire, to see carried on. The hon. gentleman, speaks about teaming and manure. I may say that the farm is a large farm, that it is a hungry farm, and one which does not have so much stock in proportion to the area as, perhaps, would be to the advantage of the farm as a farm pure and simple, and for the maintenance of the fertility of its soil. The result is that up to the present time, at all events, the teams during the winter have been to a considerable extent employed in drawing manure from the city to the farm. There is an item in this key to my estimate of $700 for manure and fertilizers, a portion of which I believe is spent in buying stable manure, and a large portion of it is spent in buying artificial fertilizers, for two reasons: In the first place, to help the fertility of the soil; and, in the second place, to try experiments with fertilizers and with different crops. There are on the farm a large range of experimental plots, where different fertilizers are experimented with, where mixtures of fertilizers and special and general fertilizers are tried side by side, so that we can see the result of the different foods given to the soil, and be enabled thereby to give advice to the farmers throughout the country as to the best use of these artificial fertilizers. This all requires some money, and I am sorry to say that in this country these artificial fertilizers are a little higher in price than would be to our advantage. The Experimental Farm buys a considerable quantity of them every year, and utilizes them chiefly for this purpose. In addition to this, I want to point out that upon the Central Experimental Farm is a seed testing department, where any farmer throughout the country can send seeds which he has either raised or bought, and find out whether they would stand the test, and whether they are sufficiently good to enable him to expect confidently that they will return what he might fairly hope from sowing them. There is another part of work which is of considerable advantage, and which perhaps occasions as much interest as any thing that goes on on the Experimental Farm, although it is not essentially what you may call farming. I refer to work in connection with the arboretum, and with the forestry investigations, not only at the Central Experimental Farm, but especially in Manitoba and at Indian Head in the North-west Territories, where experiments are carried on in regard to the forestry propagation of trees and plantations. This work is one that I think is of the utmost value, and has already resulted in considerable benefit to our people in the North-west Territories and on the plains. I trust that in the near future still greater advantage will be reaped from the work that is being done. I would like to draw the attention of the House and the country especially to the splendid results which have been chiefly accomplished at the Indian Head Farm in the way of forestry plantations, and in the way of experiments made to ascertain how forest trees can subsist and thrive in the comparatively dry portions of our North-west Territories. We are sending out large numbers of small trees which have been tested and found successful, and are asking the people throughout those Territories to try planting them. We are sure from the results already attained that by means of these experiments, and if people will only adopt the information and advice which have been given them, and are being given them, by the officials of the Experimental Farms, we will be able in the present treeless and arid plains of the North-west to bring about a much more satisfactory climatic condition, and to bring about the successful raising of crops there which heretofore have been of very doubtful success. These things are of the utmost importance from an economic point of view, and I think that the House and the people of the country at large, the more they understand this work which is being carried on, the better they will be satisfied with the application of the money of this country and the valuable results which are likely to accrue from it. There is another branch of work which, while not perhaps equally valuable, is still of value, I think, to the people of our country, and that is the orchard work and the propagation of the experiment of ornamental trees and plants. One of the greatest difficulties which we experience is the fact that our country homes are comparatively cheerless and unattractive, and I feel that it is a very practical business to find out those trees and shrubs which will be hardy everywhere throughout our country, which will be easy to manage, require but little care in their treatment, but which will, if planted around our country homesteads, make them attractive, make them ornamental, and make them desirable residences, so that the people will be better contented to remain in them instead of leaving them for foreign lands, or going to our own cities. This work is being done very successfully. There is to-day established a large arboretum which you may observe on one side of the high road going to the farm. On the left hand side as you approach the farm, there is a tract of land which has been of comparatively little use for agricultural operations heretofore, but which has now been laid out, and is being laid out all the time as an arboretum. Besides being of this practical utility in obtaining information for the improvement of our country homesteads all through the country, it is becoming a source of great interest to botanical students and people who desire to know about the different trees and plants of our country, and also about those foreign trees and plants which are desirable in our country, and which there have been successfully planted and tried. This is a matter which requires a considerable outlay, it is a matter which requires a great deal of attention and care, because such an arboretum, if not neatly and trimly kept, would not attract much interest. But to keep such a large area of land in proper condition, and make it interesting and attractive to visitors to the farm requires considerable outlay. But I must say that I consider, farmer as I am, and practical man as I think I am, that this is practical work which it would be deplorable if we did not continue to keep up and enlarge. Therefore, I consider that the experiment is one which is valuable in the interests of the farmers themselves throughout the country, as well as to those who may be more particularly interested in the purely ornamental side of the Experimental Farms. If there are any other details or question which the hon. gentleman would like to ask, I should be glad to answer them.

Mr. McMILLAN.

Mr. SPROULE. I do not rise to find fault with what is being done, because this is a very valuable work, no doubt, and no doubt it is well done, for the hon. gentleman tells us that he has not made any changes from what existed heretofore. Nor do I wish to subject the hon. gentleman to the painful task of talking much, because I notice from his voice that he is suffering considerably from the arduous work to which he has been giving himself lately in the provincial campaign.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I get my reward to-day.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. gentleman says that the large number of visitors going to the farm require a good deal of attention from the farm hands. I think that is all right, and it is what should be done, it is one of the ways that the work is advertised, and one of the ways in which the people are educated. But I notice from year to year going to that farm that there is no shelter, comparatively speaking, for the crowds who go there; and if it happens that the weather turns out showery or unpleasant, there is no place where these people can sit down for lunch unless they go into the stables or some of the outbuildings, which would be very uncomfortable for them. I think there should be provided for them something like the summer house we have here, and there should either be a well dug or a water supply secured in some other way for the convenience of those visiting the farm. I am sure that the visiting public would appreciate these conveniences very highly, and I hope the hon. gentleman will bear this in mind, and that it will be one of the things that he will attend to. Now, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how many head of stock they have on the farm at the present time.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I cannot tell off-hand, but I think it is the same number as we had last summer. Some steers were bought last fall, I think, between sixteen and twenty. During the winter these were put under experiment and were sold a short time ago, the experiment having been concluded. Aside from that, the barn was full. But I cannot tell the hon. gentleman how many cows or how many animals there are at the present moment on the farm.

Mr. SPROULE. On what principle is the distribution of seed grain conducted? How many samples are sent to one person?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. As a general rule only one sample is sent to an applicant. In some instances, when we know the farmer and he has made a satisfactory report and thereby shown an interest in the matter, we send him more than one sample. As a general rule members of this House are asked by circular to send in the names of any persons to whom they wish grain samples to be sent. In addition Mr. Saunders has at the farm a mailing list, containing a large number of names of farmers, all over the country to whom bulletins and farm reports and samples of grains are sent. I do not think it is usual to send more than one sample to each individual.

Mr. SPROULE. In connection with the distribution of the report, I may mention that on looking over the list kept at the farm I found it contained a good many names of men who had moved from the addresses given and had gone elsewhere. The list should be revised from time to time. From what percentage of those to whom samples have been sent have reports been received?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I asked Mr. Saunders that question one day, but he was not able to tell me. He has made no returns. I remember asking him if the number would be about 40 per cent, and he said it would be more than that; but after discussing the matter a little longer, he said he was doubtful. I think probably 20 or 25 per cent would be nearer the mark than 40 or 50 per cent.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister has intimated that a great many samples of seed grain are tested with respect to their vitality. Could the hon. gentleman tell the committee what proportion comes from the farmers in the country and what proportion from the experimental farms?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. Nearly all the samples received for testing purposes come from the farmers; occasionally some are received from gardeners. When the testing was first established seedsmen sent in samples, but there are very few received now. I cannot tell how many samples have been received, nor what the results of the tests have been, except in a general way. The officer in charge told me that the samples were remarkably good and the percentage very high.

Mr. SPROULE. The hon. Minister has told the committee that about 50,000 grain samples were distributed this year. Is it usual to test the vitality of the different kinds of grains sent out?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. The grain sent out is grown on the experimental farm and is very carefully selected. No grain is sent out except in appearance it is thoroughly good. I cannot tell the hon. gentleman whether each field or crop is tested; I do not think that is the general rule.

Mr. CRAIG. I was very much gratified, as no doubt all the members on this side of the House must have been, to hear the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture with respect to the experimental farms. These have been subjected in the past to much adverse criticism by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I was very much delighted—for I do not know anything about farming—to hear that this Central Experimental Farm, and I suppose the other farms generally, have been conducted properly and in a manner advantageous to the country and in the interest of the farmers at large, and also to hear the opinion expressed by the Minister that the experimental farms are of very great advantage to the farmers of this country. I agree with him in this respect—and I repeat I am not a farmer—because I observe that in the progress of time and the changes going on, farming in order to succeed must be conducted more and more on scientific principles, and I think it only proper that a large sum of money should be devoted to these experiments in order to instruct the farmers as to the best way to proceed in order to secure the best results. I never gave my vote for any appropriations with more pleasure than for appropriations that are for the benefit of the farmers, because they labour under a great many hardships at times, and we must admit after all that the farmers form the basis of most of the prosperity of the country. I was very glad to hear that the Minister is disposed to do all he can in this direction; and if he requires more money that he will ask Parliament for it, and I can assure him that so far as I am concerned I will always be willing to give my vote for generous appropriations that will benefit the farmers and the country.

Printing and distribution of reports and bulletins of farms..... $4,000

Mr. SPROULE. Is this item for the publication of the reports of the farm, sent out for distribution by the different members?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. This vote is for the distribution of the farm reports and of bulletins. This item was asked for the first time last year. The farm report has become a pretty bulky volume, and for general distribution I do not think it is quite so useful as smaller and shorter bulletins, which the average farmer can read more easily and carry in his mind more effectively. Another difficulty with respect to the farm report is that it can only be got out at a somewhat late period of the year. During the winter and early spring there is often information of what has occurred during the last season which it is very important the farmers should know before spring operations, and for this purpose this winter I caused the issue of one or two bulletins for the purpose of giving information before the farmers commenced their spring work. I hope in the future that this will be done to an even greater extent than in the past, because I feel it is very important that the result of experiments should be placed before the farmers as quickly as possible and in as handy a form as possible. I propose to largely increase the issue of small bulletins from the farm, the cost of which will be taken out of this vote.

Dairying Service..... $30,000

Mr. SPROULE. What is this vote used for ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It is out of this vote that all the work done by Prof. Robertson, in his capacity as Dairy Commissioner, is paid.

Mr. SPROULE. How many assistants has Prof. Robertson now ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. He has a second class clerk in the department whose salary is not taken out of this vote, but out of the ordinary vote of the department. He has two instructors in Prince Edward Island. We having withdrawn from the management of the cheese factories in the island, it will be their business to act as instructors and inspectors in the manner that the instructors in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec act, visiting the factories and aiding by advice and instruction the makers, and testing where required. Those two men are engaged for the season, and are paid salaries and travelling expenses also. That is the only expenditure which is to be made this year in the province of Prince Edward Island. Hitherto, we have run a number of cheese factories there, but the time seemed to have arrived when these factories ought run on their own basis without assistance from the Government. The work in Prince Edward Island was understood to be of a temporary character, and only until such time as the business which was new should be established on a firm basis. A little over a year ago the Government gave notice to the people in Prince Edward Island, that they would to a certain extent withdraw from this work last year, and that this year they would withdraw altogether. I have carried out that arrangement and have this spring withdrawn from the work in Prince Edward Island, with the exception of these two officers as inspectors and instructors.

Mr. SPROULE. Is this the only locality where that kind of work is carried on ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. In Nova Scotia we have a dairy factory connected with the Nappan farm. That is run under Professor Robertson out of this vote, and a gentleman is engaged there as instructor and manager, and spends his time looking after that particular creamery, travelling through Nova Scotia, speaking at various agricultural meetings, giving instructions wherever he is asked to, going to factories not under the Government, and advising where difficulties have arisen ; and during the winter, attending meetings and carrying on a dairying school in the province of New Brunswick for two or three months. Besides that, last year and again this year, we have a gentleman in British Columbia whose business it is to travel about the province giving instructions, and encouraging the people to enter into dairying work. Last year, out of this vote there was also a certain amount of work done in the North-west Territories. As the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sproule) will see when we come to the vote a little later on, I am going to extend that work largely this season, but still, a portion of this vote will have to be devoted to that, because the creameries which we expect to run in the North-west Territories--a certain number of them at all events--will not pay their running expenses, and the deficit will have to be taken out of this vote. In addition to that, out of this vote, there is a grant made to the dairy school in the province of Quebec. For some years Professor Robertson managed that dairy school. Last year it was still under his charge, although it was really managed by the Assistant Commissioner, Mr. Chapais. This year I am withdrawing Professor Robertson's management of that school, but for the purpose of keeping it on, I give them a grant out of this vote to help them in their work.

Mr. FISHER.

Mr. SPROULE. How much does the Quebec school get ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. It gets $3,000 out of that vote. I think I have now mentioned all the officials outside, whom Professor Robertson has under him this year.

Mr. SPOULE. Have you any employed in the North-west Territories and in Manitoba ?

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I have two instructors who are going to look after the establishment and the maintenance of the creameries in the North-west Territories. They will be engaged all summer, and their salaries will have to come out of this vote.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As this is an extremely interesting subject and the House is very thin, and the hour is late, and a great deal of work has been done, I would suggest that we should stop at this point in order that hon. gentlemen may have an opportunity of considering these questions later.

The MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE. I am agreeable.

Resolution to be reported.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier) moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 10.55.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 12th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

W. B. MOORE, FUEL INSPECTOR, INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. BELL (Pictou) asked :

1. Are there any reports on file in the Department of Railways from W. B. Moore, lately fuel inspector on the Intercolonial Railway?

2. Do these demonstrate any economy as resulting from the service of the said inspector?

3. What was the bill for coal on the Intercolonial Railway in 1887, 1891 and 1897?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. Yes, there are reports on file in the Department of Railways and Canals from W. B. Moore, lately fuel inspector on the Intercolonial Railway. 2. These reports refer to the quality and weight of the coal. I believe that Mr. Moore, when the office was abolished, sent correspondence to the general manager at Moncton, showing the savings which he alleged he had made in the cost of fuel, under his management. The general manager is of opinion that the statement is exaggerated. 3. During the year ended 30th June, 1887, there was paid for soft coal, $293,484.84; during the year ended 30th June, 1891, there was paid for soft coal, $511,395.70; during the nine months ended 31st March, 1897, there was paid for soft coal, $344,292.98. The amount of bills paid in each year do not either show or correspond with the actual consumption for the year.

JAMES McLEAN, OF ANTIGONISH.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. Have the services of James McLean, of Antigonish, as foreman carpenter on the Intercolonial Railway on the division extending from Stellarton to Strait of Canso, been dispensed with?

2. If so, when, and for what reason were they dispensed with?

3. How long was Mr. McLean in the service of the Government, and what was his record?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). 1. The services of James McLean, of Antigonish, were dispensed with at the instance of Mr. McIsaac, M.P., on his representing that to his own knowledge Mr. McLean had taken an active and offensive part in the late Dominion elections. James McLean was in the service of the Government for thirty years.

DISMISSALS ON THE WELLAND CANAL.

Mr. McCLEARY asked :

1. Why were F. Donohue and H. Kearns dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 24, Welland Canal?

2. Why were J. Smerdon and T. Bonewell dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 23, Welland Canal?

3. Why were R. Camp and Wm. Boyle dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 22, Welland Canal?

4. Why were F. C. Berryman and J. Winton dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 21, Welland Canal?

5. Why were J. Renter and J. McMurray dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 20, Welland Canal?

6. Why were A. K. Brennan and J. Hill dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 19, Welland Canal?

7. Why were G. Newton and J. Cook dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 18, Welland Canal?

8. Why was W. Galbraith dismissed from his position as lockmaster on Lock 17, Welland Canal?

9. Why were T. Burley, R. Laughlin and J. Holland dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 16, Welland Canal?

10. Why were R. Wright and G. Detlor dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on Lock 25, Welland Canal?

11. Why were A. Upper and Joseph Cook dismissed from their positions as lockmasters on the Guard Lock, Welland Canal?

12. Why was George Misener dismissed from his position as bridge tender at the Quaker Bridge, Welland Canal?

13. Why was R. Grisdale dismissed from his position as lockmaster on the Port Robinson Lock, Welland Canal?

14. Why was George Upper dismissed from his position as bridge tender on the Allanburgh Bridge, Welland Canal?

15. Why was W. Upper dismissed from his position as bridge tender on Marlatt's Bridge, Welland Canal?

16. Why were S. Bradley, S. Pettigrew, E. Smith, W. Cave, A. Martin, H. Aikens, W. Clark, J. Hulty and J. Coyle dismissed from their positions as Government employees in the gate-yard, Lock 21, Welland Canal?

17. Why were E. Fraser, T. Wilson, W. Neil, J. McMullen, H. Dell and Robert Hoover dismissed from their positions as Government employees on the repairs, Welland Canal?

18. Why were H. Vanderburgh, Wm. Jones, S. Ratcliffe and J. Hudson dismissed from their positions as carpenters on the Welland Canal?

19. If charges were made against any, was an investigation held as to the truthfulness of the same?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). None of the persons named in the question were dismissed from the employ on the canal. At the close of navigation, in the fall of last year, the employees were notified that their services were not further required, but they were given to understand that they would be informed, before the opening of navigation this spring, if they were to be taken on the work again. Very few of the persons employed on the canal have been regarded in the department as permanent employees. It may be true that on one or more of the canals a practice had grown up of buying and selling the places of lockmasters and bridge tenders, and many persons having bought these places from those who had influence with the late Government, or with members of Parliament, might have come to consider that they had thereby acquired a permanent title to employment; but inasmuch as no portion of the purchase price passed into the Dominion treasury, such a transaction could not be regarded as conferring any such right upon the employee. Before selecting the staff for the current year, I gave explicit instructions to the Superintendent of the Canal, Mr. Thompson (as I did to other superintendents) that he was to take up the list of the employees of last year and give to persons on that list the preference who had given satisfaction in the past, and who had not made themselves obnoxious by active partisanship or participation in the last general elections. Mr. Thompson was further informed by me that I would not countenance the putting off of good men, who had not interfered in politics, simply to make vacancies. Mr. Thompson prepared the list, and I see no reason to doubt that the instructions I gave him have been followed, and that the men taken on the canal for the current year were chosen in strict conformity with such instructions. Neither do I see that the number of changes in the employees, as enumerated in the question just asked, are considerable, in view of the fact that out of a total of 170 persons employed on this canal there appear to be only 45 persons whose services were dispensed with.

SADOWA POST OFFICE.

Mr. HUGHES asked :

1. Who is postmaster at Sadowa, in North Victoria?
2. How long has he held this office?
3. Why was Mr. Thomas Hart relieved of the office?
4. When was he notified that he was to be relieved?
5. When was he relieved?
6. Was there an investigation?
7. Who is mail carrier for Sadowa office?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). William Reid is postmaster. He has held the office since the 1st of January, 1897. The change in the postmaster was made in consequence of certain representations which were made to the department as set forth in a petition signed by Thomas Morton, and others, testifying to the inconvenient locality of the then post office. The petition contains the following statement :—

That the post office at Sadowa may be taken from the place where it is at present, lot 26, concession 9, township of Dalton, and that it be placed on lot 25, concession 8, Dalton, the latter place being where it was first established and kept by Mr. John Vanvlack for at least nine or ten years. Mr. Thomas Hart, of lot 26, concession 9, Dalton, then rented lot 25, concession 8, Dalton, from Mr. Vanvlack for three years; and, in transferring the office from Mr. Vanvlack to Mr. Hart, Major Sam Hughes changed the location from lot 25, concession 8, to lot 26, concession 9, Sam Hughes being on a visit at Hart's at the time, Hart being a strong adherent of Sam's, and Mr. Hart kept the office on lot 25, concession 8, for three years, when Mr. Vanvlack sold lot 25 to William Reid, and Mr. Hart moved to his own place, lot 26, concession 9, and has kept the post office there for about two years, to the great inconvenience of the majority of the residents of this locality, as some of the patrons of the office who live to the west of the office would have to go at least five miles by the public road for their mail, and a number of the residents to the south do not go to the office, as it is so much farther than it was when on lot 25, concession 8, but have their mail addressed to Seabright.

The petition goes on to recommend very strongly that William Reid be appointed postmaster. The correctness of this petition was certified to by a letter, dated November 13, 1896, from Mr. R. J. McLaughlin, of Lindsay, who states :

I inclose you a petition which has been forwarded to me by the chief residents of the township of Dalton who get their mail at Sadowa post office, asking to have the post office restored to its original position on lot 25, concession 8. I know, from being in the neighbourhood, that the present situation of the office is very inconvenient, and I would recommend that the prayer of the petitioners be granted. Mr. William Reid, the present owner of lot 25, in the 8th concession, would make an excellent postmaster, and I would recommend that in order to carry out the change he would be appointed.

CIVIL SERVICE ACT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. Has the hon. the Minister of Justice ever given a formal opinion as to the proper construction of Section 11, Chapter 18, Revised Statutes of Canada?
2. If so, when?
3. Is the present Minister of Justice of the opinion that under this clause a civil servant entitled to superannuation may be retired without adding, for the purpose of computing the superannuation allowance, ten years to his actual term of service?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. Yes, he has. 2. On the 26th of August, 1896, to the Treasury Board. 3. Yes, that is his opinion.

JUDGES OF COUNTY COURTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. How many judges of county courts in Canada, if any, hold commissions without special legislation of the Canadian Parliament, independently of the Supply Act, authorizing their appointment or fixing their salaries?

2. What are the names of such judges and in what districts do they act?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to introduce legislation respecting the appointment or salaries of these judges?

The SOLICITOR GENERAL (Mr. Fitzpatrick). 1. One. 2. J. E. P. Prendergast, Eastern Judicial District of the province of Manitoba. 3. Yes, but not necessarily this session.

APPOINTMENT ON STR. "NEWFIELD."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. Is the following statement appearing in the press correct?

"Halifax, May 6.—Judge Johnston to-day convicted John Batfield and Charles Brennan for robbery on the highway. Both are late appointees by the Ottawa Government to the steamer 'Newfield.' They stole gold and money from the mines from Cariboo about a month ago. Batfield was sentenced to Dorchester for two years and three months, and Brennan two years with hard labour. They will be taken to Dorchester Saturday morning."

2. If not, what are the facts?

3. If Batfield and Brennan were appointed to the "Newfield," upon whose recommendation were they appointed?

4. If they were put in the places of men dismissed, what was the record of the men whose places they took?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). The department has no information whatever with regard to the statements made in the newspaper clipping. The names mentioned do not appear on the last pay-list received by the department, and no appointment of the men mentioned was made by the department or with its knowledge.

APPOINTMENT OF G. McDONALD, SUB-COLLECTOR, P. E. I.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper) asked :

1. Having reference to a return to Parliament, 1896, "Further correspondence (7d) respecting certain proposed appointments and Orders in Council, did His Excellency at any time approve of the appointment of G. McDonald, sub-collector, Prince Edward Island?

2. Under which head, if any, of the classification in the memorandum of His Excellency's Secretary, dated July 8th, 1896, (included in said return) does the Government consider the recommendation of Mr. McDonald's appointment came?

The CONTROLLER OF CUSTOMS (Mr. Paterson). 1. His Excellency did not at any time approve of the recommendation of Mr. McDonald. 2. The recommendation, as afterwards appeared, came within the class to which His Excellency's objections did not apply. One of the officials in making a classification of the numerous recommendations made by the late Government, placed Mr. McDonald's name on the wrong list.

The vacancy in the office continued and subsequently another gentleman was appointed to fill it.

GASPE LIGHT-SHIP KEEPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER (for Mr. Foster) asked :

Has the light-ship keeper at Gaspé been dismissed? If so, what was the reason for his dismissal? Was any charge preferred against him or investigation held? Who has been appointed in his place and at what salary?

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say, the light-ship keeper at Gaspé, John Ascah, was not a regularly appointed official of the Department of Marine and Fisheries. He had a contract with the department during the year 1896 for maintaining a light-ship on the Peninsula Bank, Gaspé Basin, and to keep a crew of two men on board at $400 for the season. The department furnished illuminating apparatus and oils. Tenders were invited by letter for the season of 1897. Two tenders were received, the lowest being $400 per annum which was accepted, therefore no dismissal took place. The contract was simply awarded to the lowest tenderer. No charges were preferred against Mr. Ascah and no investigation was held. The last question is answered by the above answers. The present contractor maintains the light-ship for $400 per annum, which means the season of navigation.

MAIL CARRIER AT STRATFORD.

Mr. LANDERKIN (for Mr. Cameron) asked :

1. Who is the mail carrier employed to carry letters from the letter-boxes to the post office, Stratford?

2. When was he first so employed? Has he been continuously so employed since?

3. Were tenders called for, for that service?

4. What salary or allowance does he receive?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. Mulock). In reply to the hon. gentleman, I beg to say : 1. Thomas Stoney is the contractor for the Street Letter Box service in Stratford. 2. Mr. Stoney has been contractor for this service continuously since the 1st October, 1887, the date on which he entered upon the service. 3. Tenders were not called for the service, the present contract being a renewal of its predecessor on the same terms and conditions from the 1st October, 1895. The service is now being put up to tender. 4. The rate is $441.25 per annum.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. DAVIN. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. Yesterday, while you, Sir, were out of the Chair, and the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) was in your place, in the absence of the Deputy Speaker, and after I had made a motion to which I had spoken, the hon. member for Wentworth just read the question and is said to have declared it "lost," which I have no doubt he did. But the mover of the motion, who happens to have the honour now of addressing you, Sir, got up and with him rose some twelve or fourteen others, and demanded the yeas and nays. The hon. member for Wentworth hesitated a little, but the hon. leader of the House, I think, nodded to him and said "lost," and thereupon the hon. member for Wentworth left the Chair. Now, I do not know whether my version will coincide with that which may be given by anybody else in this House, but I feel bound to rise, not for any personal motive, but in the interest of the freedom of debate. Nor do I rise to complain of my hon. friend the member for Wentworth whom I have known and long respected, and who, it would be hard for me to believe, would do anything that would be unworthy an honourable man. I rise solely in the interests of the freedom of this Parliament and the freedom of debate, and I desire, Sir, to call attention to what is laid down in the text-books as the duty of the Speaker when putting the question :

When the debate on a question is closed and the House is ready to decide thereon, the Speaker proceeds to "put" the question. The proceedings in taking the sense of the House on a question are similar in the Senate and Commons. Members for and against a question are distinguished in the Senate as "Contents" and "Non-Contents"; in the Commons as "Yeas" and "Nays." The House generally expresses its desire for a decision on a question by demanding at the close of the debate that the members be called in; and in that case, the Speaker does not read the question until the Sergeant-at-Arms has reported that the members have been called in. In many cases, however, the question is put without calling in the members. The Speaker rises in his place and asks: "Is the House ready for the question?" If it is evident that no member claims the right of speaking, the Speaker proceeds to put the question by reading the main motion, and then the amendment or amendments in their order, as the case may be. Having read the question on which the decision of the House is to be first given,—

I suggested at the instance of my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) that, with the consent of my seconder, I would slightly amend the question, and I understood the Speaker for the time being (Mr. Bain), to put the amendment, which, of course, makes the case much stronger in my opinion. We rose to canvass the opinion of the House on the amendment whether I should be permitted to amend the question or not.

—Having read the question on which the decision of the House is to be first given, he takes the sense of members by saying: "Those who are in favour of the question (or amendment) will say 'Content' (or 'Yea'); those who are of the contrary opinion will say 'Non-content' (or 'Nay')." When the supporters and opponents of the question have given their voices for and against the same, the Speaker will say: "I think the Contents (or Yeas) have it;" or "I think the Non-contents (or Nays) have it;" or "I cannot decide." If the House does not acquiesce in this decision, the Yeas and Nays may be called for.

In the Commons upon a division the Yeas and Nays shall not be entered on the minutes unless demanded by five members.

The yeas and nays were demanded. Twelve or fourteen got up.

In the case of important questions, the members are called in when it is proposed to close the debate and decide the matter under consideration. The moment the Speaker orders that the members be called in, no further debate will be permitted.

My hon. friend, who was presiding in your absence, Mr. Speaker, did none of these things. He did hardly any of them at any rate. I believe he read the question but did not put it formally in that way, and when we demanded the yeas and nays he, mistakingly and no doubt meaning to do right, left the Chair and consequently deprived the people of Canada—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, Mr. Speaker, deprived the people of Canada of knowing how the members of this House would vote on the question then placed before them.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Did you intend to vote for your own motion?

Mr. DAVIN. That seems to strike hon. gentlemen opposite as intensely humorous, and no doubt recent events have given them an enviable facility for cachinnation. But this is not a matter for joking; it is as important to that side as to this that the rules of debate and the rules governing divisions should be observed, and above all it is important to this side, when we are confronted with a majority flushed with cumulative victories, and who may be tempted, therefore, in the intoxication of power, to perpetrate acts that, in sober second thought and consideration, they themselves would deeply regret. I may call your attention to what May says:

When debate on a question is closed, the question must be put, which is done in the following manner. The Speaker, rising from the Chair, states or reads the question to the House, beginning with "The question is, that." This form of putting the question is always observed, and precedes (or is supposed to precede) every vote of the House, except in cases where a vote is a formal direction, in virtue of previous orders.

In the Lords, when the question has been put, the Speaker says: "As many as are of that opinion, say 'Content';" and "As many as are of a contrary opinion, say 'Not content':" and the respective parties exclaim "Content" or "Not content," according to their opinions. In the Commons, the Speaker takes the sense of the House by desiring that "As many as are of that opinion, say 'Aye'"; and "As many as are of the contrary opinion, say 'No.'"

Now, I did not hear my hon. friend who was then in your place take any such course.

On account of these forms, the two parties are distinguished in the Lords as "Contents" and "Not Contents," and in the Commons as the "Ayes" and "Noes." When each party have exclaimed, according to their opinion, the Speaker endeavours to judge, from the loudness and general character of the opposing exclamations, which party have the majority. As his judgment—

I call your particular attention to this, Mr. Speaker :

As his judgment is not final, he expresses his opinion thus: "I think the 'Contents' (or 'Ayes') have it," or "I think the 'Non Contents' (or 'Noes') have it."

Not "I have given my decision," not "lost," which would make the Speaker for the time being the tyrant of the Chamber, but "I think the 'ayes' have it."

If the House acquiesce in this decision, the question is said to be "resolved in the affirmative" or "negative," according to the supposed majority on either side: but if the party thus declared to be the minority, dispute the fact, they say: "The 'Contents' (or 'Not Contents'), the 'Ayes' (or 'Noes') have it," as the case may be; in which case the Speaker puts the question a second time, in order that the numbers may be counted, by the process which is termed "division."

This does not apply to us here.

The Speaker, directly the debate is closed, puts the question, and when the voices are taken, gives the order that "strangers must withdraw." One of the Clerks at the Table then turns a two-minute sand-glass, pursuant to Standing Order No. 28, and, while the sand is running, the door-keepers set in motion the "division bells" in every part of the building, to give notice that a division is at hand. When the sand has run out, the Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order No. 29, so soon as he shall think proper to direct that the doors be closed, cries: "Order, order," and immediately the Sergeant, and the door-keepers and messengers under his orders, close and lock all the doors leading into the House and the adjoining lobbies, simultaneously. Those members who arrive after the doors are shut, cannot gain admittance, and those who are within, cannot leave the House, until after the division is concluded.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident from May and from Bourinot that the putting of a question in this House is a deliberate and solemn act, and not a thing to be done so furtively but that any member who can muster four supporters has the right to have the "ayes" and "noes" counted. Having given an account of what occurred, and having, with great deference, called the attention of the House to the law of Parliament on the subject, I will respectfully ask your ruling.

The PRIME MINISTER (Mr. Laurier).
My hon. friend from Western Assiniboia (Mr.

Davin) has, if he will permit me to say so, given himself undue trouble in quoting authorities in support of positions which nobody denied. There is no question as to the law of Parliament which governs the divisions of this House; they are well known, and no one needs to be reminded of them. But I differ from my hon. friend as to the facts upon which he wishes to apply these rules. My hon. friend (Mr. Davin) made a motion, and it was put from the Chair. My hon. friend behind me from Brant (Mr. Somerville) puts the question to the hon. member for West Assiniboia whether he intended to vote in favour of his own motion. There is some pertinence in his remarks, because he will remember, after the motion was made, he wanted to correct it or amend it. I objected to the words proposed being included in the motion. Therefore, the question was put as stated by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. Ample time was given to ask for the "yeas and nays," if he had intended to do so. But the sense of the House was evidently against my hon. friend—not only on this side, but on both sides of the House. The Speaker for the moment in the Chair—my hon. friend from Wentworth (Mr. Bain)—finding that there was a great prevalence of opinion against that motion, declared it lost. Then came the main motion whether he should leave the Chair or not, and, after ample time had been given, he declared it carried. Then my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) tried to get friends about him to the number of five to call for the "yeas and nays." But he was altogether too late; the main motion had been carried. The one thing to which I attach importance, and the one thing I submit to the judgment of the House—and this is the only ground on which he can raise the question—is that ample time was given him to have the vote recorded if he had demanded it at the proper time. But he demanded a division only after both motions had been declared lost and the other carried. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) knows more. He knows that, according to the rules of the House he has more than one opportunity to test the feeling of the House upon the question which he had yesterday before us. It will be open for him on many future occasions if he wishes to avail himself of them to-day or to-morrow or any other day to test the feeling of the House upon the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yesterday afternoon, having occasion to leave the Chamber for a short time, I called upon one of the most fair-minded and experienced members of this House, the hon. member for Wentworth (Mr. Bain) to take the Chair. When I came back, I found the House in Committee of the Whole. On looking at the record of yesterday's proceedings, I find:

Mr. Fielding moved, That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.

Mr. Davin moved in amendment thereto, That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted instead thereof:— etc., etc.

And the question being put on the amendment; it was negatived.

And the question being put on the main motion; it was agreed to.

I think that the only thing I can look to is this record of the proceedings; and the propriety of that ruling, I think, will be evident to the House, hon. members having already heard in the arguments addressed to me that there is an absolute difference of opinion as to the question of facts. My only guide must be the record of the proceedings of the House.

Mr. DAVIN. I will not go into that question—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. DAVIN. Have the hon. gentlemen heard me yet? The suggestion made to me by the Prime Minister (Mr. Laurier) I accept.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have nothing to do with that. That is a matter of future arrangement. There is nothing before the House and—

Mr. DAVIN. I am not going to speak on this matter; the thing is done with your utterance, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. MEMBER. Sit down.

Mr. DAVIN. Has not the Speaker called the Orders of the Day? Mr. Speaker, you having called the Orders of the Day—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. DAVIN. I understand the Speaker has called the Orders of the Day.

The MINISTER OF MARINE AND FISHERIES (Mr. Davies). That does not give the right to speak, does it?

Mr. SPEAKER. The Orders of the Day have not been called.

SUPPLY—DUTY ON FARM IMPLEMENTS.

The MINISTER OF FINANCE (Mr. Fielding) moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. DAVIN I now rise, Sir, to move that:

Good faith with the western farmers on the part of the Government demands that agricultural implements and lumber be placed on the free list.

Yesterday I made an argument as to the necessity from the point of view of policy, and the duty from the point of view of good faith, of placing implements on the free list. I attach more importance, if possible, to the Government keeping faith with their pledges, than even to the policy of placing implements on the free list. I consider it of the utmost moment to the welfare of this country, that when men climb into these great positions, whatever promises they have placed before the country, they should fulfil. I am not alone in thinking that. A paper connected with which is one of the greatest minds in the Empire dealing with that very matter, refers to the case of Sir Robert Peel, and comparing what Sir Robert Peel did with what is being done by the leader of the present Government. This great publicist declares there was this difference: That Sir Robert Peel was perfectly consistent, whereas in the present case the leader of the Government has failed to carry out his promises and his pledges, and the recriminations that are made against him by gentlemen on this side of the House are perfectly just. This writer says:

In another column, Mr. Mallory analyses the new measure, and points out, citing chapter and verse, that it is a misnomer to call it a Bill for the relief of the farmer. Notice has been given in the House of a resolution, demanding that, at any rate, farm implements and the workmen's tools shall be free.

That is the resolution of the hon. member for East Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas), and my hon. friend has a question on the paper at the present time which shows what they are expecting in the constituency of Eastern Assiniboia, represented as it is by a gentleman who was elected as a Patron, but who now, I believe, is a declared Liberal.

That motion seems to us quite inadequate to meet the case. It does not go to the root of things. The proposed duties on iron and steel are higher, taking them all round, than the proposed duty on the finished implement; that is to say, under the new, as under the old, tariff protection is to be extended, not to the Canadian maker, but to his foreign competitor, who obtains iron and steel at first cost. It would be unjust, therefore, to call for free implements without prefacing that with a demand for the repeal of the iron and steel taxes, or for such a reduction as shall leave them no more than 20 per cent. It is desirable, however, if the views of independent men throughout the country are to be expressed at all, that a resolution of wider scope should be submitted. Here is an apt one, taken bodily from the Liberal platform: "That we denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours." Amid the general humiliation over the Liberal apostasy, it is only right that the party should be compelled to spend a bad quarter of an hour in publicly swallowing its old creed.

What this distinguished writer suggests is that a plank from the platform laid down here in Ottawa in 1893 should be placed before this House, and that the hon. gentlemen should be challenged whether they can vote for it now or not. More recently than that time, the Prime Minister spoke in this very House, and this is what he said, in April, 1894 :

The produce of the farmer has been driven to the lowest point, but what he has to buy is sold to him at an increased price, as compared with the price in England. What is the lesson to be deduced from this state of things? It is this—and this is the proposition we rely upon on this side of the House—As the price of agricultural products has been reduced to the lowest point, it should be the aim of the tariff to reduce the prices of manufactured goods to the lowest point. The farmer is bound by his circumstances to sell in the freest and cheapest market; so, also, ought he to be privileged to buy in the cheapest market, consistent only with the imposition of such duties as are necessary for raising the revenue of the country. That is the proposition on which we stand, and it is a proposition perfectly fair, perfectly just, perfectly equitable—so fair, so just, so reasonable, and so equitable, that the Government dare not attack it openly. And yet they cannot adopt it. Why? Because they are chained and yoked to a system which is the reverse of just, and fair, and equitable.

And yet the hon. gentleman is self-chained and self-yoked to the detestable system that he then denounced. Yesterday I quoted from a colleague of his, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, words just as strong; and here is the language used in a still more recent year by the gentleman who sits at the present moment on the right of the Premier (Mr. Davies), and what does he say :

Protection always generates extravagance, I do not care where it be applied.

And again, speaking of the National Policy, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries said in this House, in 1895 :

We condemn it, in the first place, because it is a system which wrings from the people millions of dollars for Treasury purposes more than the old tariff.

And yet they have given you a tariff so near the old tariff that the highest difference is $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent, and it goes down to $1\frac{1}{4}$ per cent. I have put lumber into this motion, and I will tell you why. My hon. friend from Lisgar (Mr. Richardson), who lives in Winnipeg, and who I am glad now to see in the House, knows that we have in the North-west a lumber combine; and he knows well that over the vast prairie where we have no trees, the farmers have to build houses from bought lumber, and when you have a high duty on lumber, suppose you have 20 per cent, every house the farmer builds, the cost of every plank of lumber that he puts into it, and that he has to buy—the cost of that may be divided by five, and the quotient is what is exacted from the farmer who builds a house. Therefore in my opinion, lumber should also be placed upon the free list. Now, Sir, having laid this question before the House yesterday at considerable length, I will not dwell on this at any length to-day. I consider that the House is possessed of my argument in regard to implements, and at an earlier period I made the argument in regard to lumber, when I also quoted a distinguished man on the other side of the House in favour of placing lumber on the free list, I quoted from the "Hansard" what the Minister of Trade and Commerce said; I quoted also his important supporter, the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Edwards), who said that lumber should be on the free list, thus supporting my contention. I move :

Good faith with the western farmers on the part of the Government demands that agricultural implements and lumber be placed on the free list.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I wish to say a word or two on the subject covered by the amendment. As representing an agricultural constituency I want to state to the House that we have a proposal before the Government, by which we are not asking for free implements but for such concessions as would be equally advantageous as those suggested in the amendment. In consequence of this fact we are not disposed to support the amendment before the House. We have no desire to ask the Government to grant special concessions and advantages to any particular class. It has been my position to declare that I did not desire to represent any people who clamour for special class legislation, or to ask that implements or anything else they may need should be placed specially on the free list. I believe everything should bear its share of the public taxation. We do not want class legislation even though it be to the farmers' advantage. I do not desire to be tied down to that principle, but to be free to administer justice to all classes and to all interests. So we are not in a position to vote for this amendment, but we desire to call attention to the proposition already before the House which we believe will meet the case.

Mr. ROGERS. A few of the members met together when the tariff was brought down and talked it over. We were not quite satisfied with it, although we felt that it would afford some relief, but we desire further relief especially in regard to agricultural implements and other articles affecting the farmers. A motion to make a corresponding reduction on agricultural implements with the reduction of duties made on iron, which forms the raw material, now stands on the Order paper, and I seconded it and will stand by it. Also, we wish to be reasonable and withdraw the principles of protection gradually from our industries. Again, I say we are not satisfied, but we feel that the Government will make further efforts to lighten our burdens. Under those circumstances, I cannot support the amendment.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I am thoroughly in accord with the hon. members from the west in regard to the position of the farmers.

As a farmers' representative I hope we may have the burdens of taxation lightened on them so soon as the Government can do so. We should not, however, expect too much at once. We promised our farmer friends that we would in time remedy the evils existing, and this is being gradually done. We should not expect further reductions to be made until the finances of the country will permit, but when there is an adjustment between expenditures and receipts the Government will, I am satisfied, not forget the farmers, but will do something in the direction indicated by my hon. friend (Mr. Rogers). I do not think the farmers desire to embarrass the Government, but they view the tariff introduced as a step in the right direction. The Government perhaps have not met the wishes of the Opposition by making wholesale slaughter, and thus allowed them to say that the Government have killed the country, but the Government have shown the people that they are willing to consider all interests alike; at the same time, it must be remembered that men must look to their homes and factories, for the time must come when each industry must stand on its own bottom. The handwriting is on the wall against combines. Combines must disappear, and legitimate labour and legitimate industry considered; and later on, not this session, but when the income equals the expenditure, which I believe it will do under the proposed tariff, then we will be able to turn to our farmer friends and do something to assist them further than we have done up to the present. I might have said something the other day from the standpoint of my own people in regard to coal oil, but I bore in mind the fact that the people in the west have interests as we have, and that a reduction of one cent per gallon on oil and other concessions, namely 1½ reduction from tank vessels, making 2½ cents per gallon reduction in all, is an earnest of the good intentions of the Government and that our interests are being looked after. I do not wish to take up the time of the House longer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOMVILLE. If I were on my feet every five minutes as are some hon. gentlemen opposite, they might perhaps say "hear, hear." Some hon. members bore the House on every occasion; they show the House that they have the cacoethes loquendi. The other night I was on the point of suggesting that some hon. members might prepare their speeches at home, dispense with their reading, and hand them in, as they do at Washington, to be printed in "Hansard." This would save the time of the House, it would spare our feelings and reduce the cost of Government, because every speech made by hon. gentlemen under circumstances show they are unnecessary, is so much time and money wasted and is thereby adding to the burdens of the farmers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOMVILLE. If hon. gentlemen on the other side, instead of saying, "hear, hear," would curtail what they call their sharp criticism, it would be better for the country. I saw my hon. friend from York (Mr. Foster) smile just now, but he has nothing to smile at. East and West the people have told him and his friends that they are sick and tired of them. They told them that in King's, they told them that in Nova Scotia, and they told them that again yesterday in Quebec. They have been turned down by the people, and they will be turned down for a very long time to come. I have not troubled the House much this session, but I should not be interrupted when I speak for the farmers, those noble farmers of King's County who knew their duty and did it. King's County is an agricultural county, and it knows what is right, and it showed its wisdom. The people of that county show their appreciation of their representative when they send a man here who is willing to say a good word for them, and who does not waste their money by offering factious opposition as gentlemen opposite are in the habit of doing. My county is perfectly satisfied with the course the Government is taking, and they have every confidence that the Government will do what is right.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker, before alluding to the point of order to which I shall call your attention, I have one sentence to interject. The daily recurrence of the hon. gentleman who has moved this motion, seems to justify a statement made to me today by a gentleman on his own side of the House, who said: It seems there are only two parties in this House, the Government and Mr. Davin.

The point of order is, that this motion is substantially the same as the one which was negatived yesterday. Allow me to quote from Bourinot, beginning on page 401:

But when a question has once been negatived, it is not allowable to propose it again, even if the form and words of the motion are different from those of the previous motion. Sir Erskine May says on this point, which is one involved in much difficulty: "The only means by which a negative vote can be revoked is, by proposing another question, similar in its general purport to that which had been rejected, but with sufficient variance to constitute a new question;—

I submit that in this case there is not sufficient variance to constitute a new question.

—and the House would determine whether it were substantially the same question or not." *

* * * If an amendment has been negatived, a similar amendment cannot be proposed on a future day. It has been decided, however, in the Canadian Commons that an amendment is in order when it comprises only a part, and not the whole, of a resolution previously voted on by the House.

Well, Sir, I think this motion comprises the whole of the motion rejected yesterday, with an addition, but I submit that the addition is not sufficient to constitute it substantially a new motion. We have refused to declare that agricultural implements shall be admitted free, and we are now asked to declare that both agricultural implements and lumber should be admitted free. I think, Sir, as far as agricultural implements are concerned, the motion is out of order and cannot be put to the House in its present form. I submit the whole question, Mr. Speaker, to your ruling.

Mr. DAVIN. May I be allowed to say one word, Mr. Speaker. When gentlemen elected here as Patrons declare, as I understood them to-day, that they do want—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) has spoken, and he can only speak again to the point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. I am going to do that, Sir. What I want to say is this: That if hon. gentlemen object to this motion because of a point of order, I wish to give the reason for the course I take—

Mr. SPEAKER. That is not the point of order.

Mr. DAVIN. After the declaration of these gentlemen—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. In my judgment—of course it is subject to the decision of the House, and the House may disagree with me—the amendment has been sufficiently changed to bring it within the competence of this House to deal with. Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. DAVIN. Lost on division.

Mr. CHARLTON. Don't you want to see if the motion will be carried?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Have I not the right to speak, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. Certainly, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) has a right to speak on the motion.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I do not wish to allow this motion to pass without stating my position in reference to this question, for if I did so, my silence might be misinterpreted. I stated my position very clearly when I spoke in the Budget debate. I then said I was disappointed, and that I believed that many people in the west were disappointed, because there had not been a larger reduction in the duty on agricultural implements. I entertain the same view at the present time. I also pointed out then, that there was some encouragement in the fact that the duty on coal oil and certain classes of implements had been reduced. I entertain the same opinion at the present time. I also pointed out, Sir, that there had been very considerable reductions generally, and that free binder twine and barbed wire had been conceded as a benefit to the farmers. As the prow of the vessel was pointed in the right direction, and as we had assurances that it was only an instalment we had received, I could not see my way clear to vote against the Government on the question, believing that it would not be in the interests of the Dominion as a whole, and certainly not in the interests of the province of Manitoba and the North-west Territories, that this Government, which has done a great deal in the direction of reducing the duties, should be hurled from power, and that the high priests of protection should be returned, to restore high duties on these articles.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) had put his motion in a different way, I might see my way clear to support it, but in its present form it practically amounts to a vote of want of confidence in this Government. I am not prepared to vote want of confidence in the Government at the present time. I am prepared to say that I am disappointed that the duties on these articles have not been reduced as we had reason to expect they would, and if the hon. member (Mr. Davin) had put his motion in such a way as to state that it would be in the interests of the farmers of the Dominion of Canada that the duty should be reduced on these articles, I certainly should be prepared to vote with him. I pointed out last session, that I thought a motion of this kind came with peculiarly bad grace from the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), for he it was of all others, who rose in this House and denounced these duties, and then when the vote came—I think I am speaking within bounds when I say—he took to the woods.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Richardson) is saying what is not correct. It is not a fact what he stated. I do not suppose the hon. gentleman means to say what is false, but what he says is not true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Then, perhaps I might qualify that by saying that if he did not take to the woods, he probably crawled under the barn.

Mr. DAVIN. I will ask the hon. gentleman to point out to what he refers. The hon. gentleman cannot say that in any way I shirked the support of my motion. If he says that I did in any way, either directly or indirectly, he is saying what is not true.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I certainly would not like to be put in the position before this House of stating anything that is not absolutely true. I am sure the House understands these expressions sufficiently well to apply them. I know that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia has had the habit, in the last twelve or fifteen years, of taking to the woods or crawling under the barn on all possible occasions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Western Assiniboia says that he did not crawl under the barn, I think the hon. member for Lisgar should withdraw the statement.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I am prepared to say, that if the hon. gentleman rises in his place and says that he never took to the woods or crawled under the barn, I will apologize for the statement and withdraw it.

Mr. McLENNAN. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. RICHARDSON. However, I just wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I sat down for the purpose of giving the hon. member for Western Assiniboia the opportunity of saying whether he had or had not; but inasmuch as he has not seen fit either to affirm or deny the soft impeachment, I may perhaps be allowed to conclude my remarks by saying—

Mr. DAVIN. I understand that the hon. gentleman wanted me to say something. Well, what I have to say is this, that the utterance of the hon. gentleman—you seem to understand it, Mr. Speaker; I don't—if it means that I at any time in this House did not support the resolutions I proposed, he is uttering what is an objective falsehood.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am sorry the hon. gentleman has put himself out of order by saying that the hon. member for Lisgar has uttered a falsehood.

Mr. DAVIN. I said an objective falsehood.

Mr. SPEAKER. Whether objective or subjective, falsehood is not a word that is in order in this House. The hon. gentleman can very easily, as well as any other hon. member of this House, make a contradiction to a statement without using language which puts him out of order.

Mr. DAVIN. I was using the language of Schlegel, who is a pretty high authority on language. However, I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think the hon. gentleman treats the Chair with the respect that promotes the dignity of this House, when on this occasion—I am not referring to any other—the hon. gentleman quotes an authority outside of this House, Schlegel, instead of accepting the authority of the Chair. I do not think that is respectful to the Chair. Whether the Chair is right or wrong, its ruling should be accepted.

Mr. DAVIN. I bow to the ruling of the Chair; but, with great respect, I submit to you that when the hon. gentleman makes a statement which I characterize as incorrect, it is your duty to ask him to withdraw it.

Mr. LISTER. What was the statement?

Mr. DAVIN. The statement was made in the vulgar style that belongs to the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Western Assiniboia cannot learn to respect the Chair, I shall have to take means to make him do so. I shall have no more discussion whatever on this question.

Mr. SPROULE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. When an hon. member makes a statement regarding another, and that hon. gentleman in reply emphatically denies the statement, is it not right for the hon. member to withdraw the statement or accept the denial, without trying to say the same thing in another way?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the question which the hon. member has just propounded is a most fair one. When an hon. member makes a statement charging improper conduct against another hon. member, and the hon. member who is charged denies it in proper language, that declaration should be accepted unhesitatingly and without equivocation. The unfortunate trouble in this case is that a slang expression is used, which the hon. member for Western Assiniboia says he does not understand himself; and the hon. member for Lisgar said that if the hon. member denied the truth of that expression, he would accept the denial. I think it is a pity that the time of the House should be further wasted in that respect. If the hon. member for Lisgar charges the hon. member for Assiniboia with improper conduct as a member, and the hon. member for Western Assiniboia makes a distinct denial of the charge, the hon. member for Lisgar should at once accept that. I desire most earnestly to keep up the dignity of this House, and to keep members on both sides of the House from using language across the floor which could in any way be considered objectionable in any other assemblage of gentlemen.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, I shall probably be allowed now to continue my remarks.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Oh, keep quiet, gentlemen on the other side. I have the floor, and I am going to say what I have to say if it takes all day. I may say that since I have been sitting here an hon. member has come to me and mentioned that the hon. member for Western Assiniboia voted against free binder twine in 1891. I would ask him to state to this House whether he did so or not.

Mr. DAVIN. I do it with the greatest possible pleasure. In 1891 I had never heard from my constituents one murmur on that subject; but in the following year, after I had gone back and had spoken to them and found what their opinions were, I came here and advocated a reduction of the duty on binder twine, and here I see it accomplished. It is my motion of last year which has led to the reduction of the duty on binder twine and on barbed wire fencing, and the Minister of Agriculture is carrying out my policy with regard to creameries and cold storage.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wish to conclude by saying that I do not see that any good object is to be attained by voting against the Government on this occasion. Ever since the recent reduction of the tariff was announced, the members from the west have been urging the Government to make certain concessions in reference both to coal oil and agricultural implements, and I have the strongest reasons for believing that when these concessions are obtained, it will be found that a most important reduction in the duties has been conceded both on agricultural implements and on coal oil. If I wished to make a demagogue of myself, I could act as certain hon. members might do. But the members from the west have been patiently working, and are patiently working to secure their ends, and they are doing it in an earnest and hopeful, and I think I am safe in saying a successful manner; and they will attain these ends. Viewing the matter in this way, it is my intention to vote against the motion of the hon. member.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to draw the attention of the House to the statement made by my hon. friend who has just sat down in his concluding sentences; it is a statement of some gravity. Members on both sides have rights as representatives of the people in Parliament. My hon. friend who sits at my side, in the exercise of his right, criticised the Government for the line of policy they have adopted with reference to agricultural implements, and he brings before this House a motion to disapprove of the policy of the Government in the tariff they have brought down, with reference to agricultural implements. He naturally expects that all those who favoured the reduction on agricultural implements or free agricultural implements will support him on this ground of public policy, but the very moment that he brings this matter to the vote, an hon. gentleman on the other side arises and says in fact—no English language could make it more apparent—that the North-west members have been closeted with the Government and the Government has made them promises which justify them in opposing this motion. In that the Government were simply carrying out the policy of my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding), who, before he would take the country and this Parliament into his confidence, made a little bargain with the faithful as to what he would do with the duty on coal. Thus the thing goes on and private members on the Government side are told what the Government is going to do with reference to tariff changes, while the rest of the House is kept in ignorance. I call the attention of the House and the country to this. It is the continuation of the same unjust, the same uncandid, the same tortuous policy which these gentlemen have carried on from the first. In my opinion, we ought all to be treated on the same footing, and no single member of this Parliament should be in a position to rise and state, when a debate is taking place on the tariff or on any part of it, that he is not going to oppose the Government because he has been taken into its confidence and knows that the Government intends to reduce the tariff or make some other arrangement that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. FRASER (Guysborough). Speaking for myself, I would be prepared to make the statement which the hon. member for Lisgar did (Mr. Richardson) here or elsewhere on any occasion, and I would feel warranted in making it on this very just ground, without having had any communication whatever with the Government, namely, that the Liberal party having agreed to a policy, when the Government take one step in carrying out that policy, they are bound, so long as it remains the policy of the Government, to take the next step. It does not follow, because my hon. friend may have made such a statement, that there has been any particular communication between him and the Government on the subject. Surely when a policy is agreed upon, any hon. member has the right to say that he expects the Government, who have already accomplished a portion of their policy, will, as soon as possible, move in the direction of completely carrying it out. For my part, I accept the instalments that have been given, and speaking as a member not having the confidence of the Government more than any other member that supports it, I desire to say that there has been no such arrangement arrived at as that mentioned by the hon. the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Foster), either with the Government as a whole or the Finance Minister in particular. I, for one, supporting the Government am confident that it is the desire of the Government to undo as fast as they possibly can, the mischief perpetrated by hon. gentlemen opposite. Aye, more. Sir, the country understands that, and the country fully appreciates the difficulties under which the Government labour. The country accepts at the hands of the Government the relief which has so far been given, and have faith in the purpose of the Government to go further in the same direction as soon as they can possibly do so. The country has confidence in the adherence of the Liberal party to principle and in the purpose of the Government to act in accordance with the principles in which they believe and which they have publicly stated. In this respect, we have at least a standing which hon. gentlemen opposite have not. They have never promulgated a policy, but have always just taken hold of any makeshift that they thought would serve the moment and tide them over an election. They have not put on record in any convention any definite policy as we have done. I think it exceedingly unfair that the Finance Minister should have insinuated that the Government have been holding private seances with their supporters and saying to them: Take this just now and we will give you more later on. Surely he understands that no great party, if it respected itself—and certainly the history of the Liberal party is not such as would justify the contrary supposition—could fail to move in the direction it has always moved in and carry out the principles it has always advocated.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) said a few moments ago, that in 1891 he did vote against this binder twine resolution because he had not then consulted his constituents in the North-west and did not know their views, but that after he had met them he changed his views and adopted theirs. Well, the hon. gentleman's memory must be at fault, because I find that, in 1893, the Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) introduced a resolution in favour of admitting binder twine free into this country, and I find that the hon. member for Assiniboia spoke in favour of that resolution but voted against it.

Mr. DAVIN. I want to show the hon. gentleman that my memory was not at fault. And the very reason given by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to-day was my reason. He spoke in favour of my motion, but says he is going to vote against it, because it is a motion of want of confidence.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Lisgar occupies a somewhat different position than that of the hon. member for Assiniboia. The hon. member for Assiniboia now poses, and has pretended for some time to pose, as an independent party in the House. As the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) has said, it appears that there are in this House only two parties, the Liberal party governing the country, and Mr. Davin, the member for West Assiniboia. Let us look at the position in which the hon. gentleman finds himself. At present he is very zealous in behalf of these poor farmers in the North-west, notwithstanding the fact that the Government have reduced to a large extent the taxation which bore so heavily on them.

Mr. DAVIN. They have not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman now rises and poses as the friend of the farmers. Why? Because he knows that within a short six weeks or two months he will be called on to face the electorate of West Assiniboia, and he wants to make out that he, and he only, is the friend of the farmer in the North-west. Sir, the men who supporting the Government from the North-west to-day have done infinitely more for the farmers of that country than the hon. gentleman has done in all the ten years he has been in this House. What has the hon. gentleman done? He tells us that in 1891 he voted against binder twine, because, forsooth, he did not know what his constituents desired; but when called on to explain his course in 1893, he says: It is true I spoke for and voted against it in 1893, but then I was supporting the Conservative Government, and, therefore, I swallowed my principles for the sake of supporting that Government. What should such an hon. gentleman expect to be able to obtain in this House for the farming population of the North-west? In another six weeks he will have to face the electorate again, and it will not take the vote of the returning officer to defeat him. If I may be permitted to predict the result of the election, he will be defeated by hundreds.

An hon. MEMBER. He will take to the woods.

Mr. LISTER. I do not say that, because, like my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), I do not know exactly what that means. Let us look at the matter further. In 1893 he spoke in favour of taking the duty off binder twine but voted against it. In 1892, and again in 1894, when the same resolution was introduced into this House, he spoke in favour of it, but when it came to the vote, he was outside. As an hon. member says, he crawled under the barn. How is it, if the hon. gentleman is so zealous in the interests of the people of that country, that he could not take time to record his vote in favour of the motion he pretended to support? How the hon. gentleman should blush, when he goes before the electors of that country, to be obliged to admit, that he spoke in favour of a motion which was a boon to the people of the country, and voted against it. How he will have to blush when he is confronted with the records which show that on two other occasions he spoke in favour of a motion which was in the interests of the people of that country, and had not the courage to stay in the House and vote for it. Sir, I have only looked partially into the record. The research is an interesting one. I wish to tell the hon. gentleman that if time permits, I intend to search out his record since he came into the House, and I venture to say that such contradictions as I have shown will be found to be almost innumerable.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Before I am called upon to record my vote upon this resolution, I wish to express my opinion in regard to the reduction of duties on agricultural implements. As I represent a rural constituency, I suppose I shall have to express my opinion lest a false interpretation be placed upon my vote. The farmers, in my constituency, are reasonably satisfied with the reductions that have been made, and believe that as soon as the Government has sufficient money to meet the requirements of the public service, they will seek to reduce the duties on some of these articles considerably. Therefore, I feel that at the present juncture I would be doing an evil both to the Government and to the country in supporting a motion made by a person who has brought it before this House for the purpose of compromising the position of the Government. Now, I understand—

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) has called the member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), a "person."

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Mr. Speaker, I was just about to remark—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order. Take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) is surely not serious.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, I am serious, because I assume that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) used that term, as he evidently did, in a sarcastic and slighting way.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). You are very imaginative. You should write a novel.

Mr. BENNETT. It was said in a most slighting way.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I was about to remark that in 1891 when a resolution was put to place binder twine upon the free list, my hon. friend from West Assiniboia stated that after consultation with the farmers of the west he found that they were perfectly satisfied, that they were getting binder twine and other articles as cheap as were the people in any other part of the country, and not only of that country but of Dakota and other states of the union. Therefore, when he says to-day that he gave a vote not knowing the sentiment of the people at that time—

Mr. DAVIN. I did not say that. I said I had not heard a murmur against it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very well. Is it not strange that a gentleman representing the farmers of West Assiniboia for years, have attended the meetings week after week where this most important question was discussed, should not know the sentiments of the farmers; and when they met in Regina in 1891, as stated in the speech made by my hon. friend in that year, for the purpose of discussing prices. According to that statement, a number of farmers were there from Dakota and compared the prices that they paid in Dakota with those paid by the farmers in Manitoba. Is it not strange that the hon. gentleman should say: I never heard a single murmur from any of the farmers with respect to the increased price of binder twine by reason of the duty.

Mr. DAVIN. In 1891?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). That is in 1891.

Mr. DAVIN. No, before that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Very well. In July, or thereabouts, the farmers would have purchased binder twine for the year, and the question would naturally not come before them before the next year. But, in March of the following year, my hon. friend (Mr. Davin) came back from the west with an entirely different opinion upon the subject of binder twine. That leads me to suppose that this change in the opinion of the west had not taken place between one harvest and the March of the following year without my hon. friend knowing it. This is what he said in 1891 when he discussed the importance of putting binder twine upon the free list:

We have the sons and brothers of these farmers in the North-west. Is it to be supposed, for one moment, if they were paying more, as compared with the prices in Dakota, for binder twine, that I would not have heard a complaint?

Now, it is certain they were paying more during that very season than in the United States, and here was a gentleman supposed to represent the interests of the farmers of the west, and he says he never heard a complaint. Further on, he says:

I have never heard, in my constituency, one word of complaint as to the price of binder twine. He was speaking in July, it will be remembered. He went on:

We have had, within a few weeks, in Regina, a large number of farmers from Dakota, who were interviewed as to prices of things in Dakota and Regina, and they declared, with regard to all things farmers use on their farms and in their business, down to the clothes they wear and the food they eat, the prices in our North-west compared advantageously with those in Dakota.

Now, there was an admission that the duty did not increase the price of these articles one farthing. If, in 1891, the duties did not increase the price of these articles, how is it that the hon. gentleman is so anxious in 1897 to reduce the duties so as to reduce the prices on these same articles? Now, my hon. friend went home after that. He was anxious to come back here again. He went before the farmers and the farmers said: Mr. Representative, if you wish to go back and teach such doctrine as you did last session in Parliament, you need not expect to go back at all. The result was that he came back in 1892 with a different policy, and different views.

Mr. DAVIN. I rise to a point of order. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that anybody in my constituency said that to me?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I suppose they did.

Mr. DAVIN. I beg to say nobody said it to me.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). In 1892 the hon. gentleman came back, and a similar resolution to the previous one was brought before this House by some member of the Liberal party, and now, instead of saying that he never heard a complaint, the hon. gentleman spoke in this wise:

In the North-west, in the constituency from whence I come, and in other agricultural constituencies, a great interest is taken in this question, and at one of the last meetings held in my constituency before I came away, before a very large and crowded meeting, I was asked what I thought of the duty on twine, and I had no difficulty whatever in complying with their unanimous request that in Parliament I would express the opinion that I expressed to them there.

Now, you must remember that in 1891, as he says, he voted against the free admission of binder twine. In 1892 he moved that binder twine be placed upon the free list. In 1893 this is what he said:

I wish to enforce, with whatever little weight remarks of mine may have, the contention of the hon. gentleman who has put this motion on the paper, that the tax on binder twine should disappear.

Now, if he was consistent in 1891, and if he was in touch with the people then and knew their feelings, how was it that he had a different opinion in 1891 from that he held in 1892 and 1893? Now, his opinion has changed also upon other matters. In 1894 he was not in favour of free coal, he was not in favour of free barbed wire, he was not in favour of free agricultural implements; but he was in favour of free binder twine, and now in his attempt to compromise the position of the Government, he has again changed his policy. Let me draw his attention to a resolution he moved himself on the 13th of February, 1893:

That the duty be reduced upon barbed wire, agricultural implements, coal oil and cottons, and that binder twine be placed on the free list. Now, I would ask my hon. friend how is it that when he has held those different views during those three consecutive years, he comes here to-day with an entirely different policy. I will say, in concluding my remarks, that I am still of the opinion that I have always held, that so long as we have an incidental protection or a direct protection, no matter which, that incidental or direct protection should be extended to all the industries of the country in an equal and in an equitable manner. I do not think it is fair to place the products of one industry free upon the market, while giving protection to others side by side with it. Therefore, I believe that as far as the Government go at this time, they have reduced the duty upon agricultural implements to a reasonable extent, at least; and if we take it as a first instalment, we look forward to the time when they will be in a better position than they are to-day to give us more advantage in that direction.

Mr. TAYLOR. I did not intend to occupy the time of the House, as I was of the opinion that the Government were anxious to get into Supply. But as nearly two hours have been taken up by their supporters, I think it is but fair that a few words should be said from this side of the House. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) stated that he could not support the motion moved in amendment by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) because it was a vote of censure on the Government. Well, I could support it if it only went that far, if the motion was to censure the Government for not having carried out the promises that they made to the farmers of the west when they promised that they would place agricultural implements, coal oil, coal and iron on the free list. I think they are entitled to the censure of every honourable man in this House, no matter which side he may sit on, from the fact that they did make those promises, and they have not carried them out. But the motion goes further; it says that agricultural implements should be placed upon the free list. I would vote against the motion because it goes that far. I am a protectionist, I believe in protecting the industries of this country, I believe in protecting the labour of this country. My hon. friend from Frontenac (Mr. Rogers), whose constituency adjoins mine, would oppose the amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia, and holds out to the farmers of this country that the present Government have been doing a great deal for them. Well, now, I have gone carefully through the tariff that the Government have brought down. The Government have said that they would abolish specific duties; they have come down practically with the same tariff that they found prepared for them by the preceding Government. In the old tariff there were 198 specific duties; to-day in the tariff as brought down by the Finance Minister there are 135 specific duties left in, only sixty-three in number less than they found in the old tariff. Now, reading the old tariff and the new, reading the new tariff from the papers that reported it, line after line, item after item, there is no change, it is practically the old tariff. But they have hit it in a few places, to the great injury of the workingmen of this country and of the farmers of this country. Now, I will tell the hon. member for Frontenac that the farmers of his constituency feel as the farmers in my constituency do with regard to what this Government have done for them. I represent, perhaps, as large an agricultural constituency as there is in the province of Ontario, and at the same time I reside in a town having a population of about 4,000, where there is more manufacturing done, according to the number of the population, than in any other town in Ontario, or perhaps in Canada. I think that the tariff now proposed by this Government injures the farmers and the manufacturers and the workingmen, more than any proposition that could be made. Now, let us see how it will affect the farmers. I have gone through the various items in which the farmers are chiefly interested, to see what this Government has done for them, and here is how I work out the advantage that the farmers will receive. Taking an average farmer, living on 100 acres of land, growing perhaps a thousand bushels of grain per year, having a family of five or six persons, he will be benefited to this extent by the changes proposed by this Government: They have reduced coal oil 1 cent per gallon. The average farmer will use twelve gallons of coal oil per year, and therefore will effect a saving on his coal oil per year of 12 cents. The average farmer will use 200 pounds of sugar in his family per year. They give him the benefit of a reduction of 14 cents per hundred pounds. But the price of sugar will not be reduced any, because they charge the same price on the raw sugar that the old Government did, but they give a little less protection, $1 in place of $1.14 per hundred on the sugar manufactured outside of the country. However, I will give the farmer the benefit of the 14 cents reduction on the 100 pounds of sugar, and if he uses 200 pounds, he will effect a saving of 28 cents. Then on the small hand tools and agricultural implements the old tariff of 35 per cent is reduced to 25 on tools such as hoes, rakes, scythes and forks. The average farmer, in five years, will use up one axe, two hoes, five rakes, two scythes and two forks, which, at the market value, would amount to $3.95. A reduction of 10 per cent from 35 to 25, will give the farmer a benefit of 39 cents in five years on those articles. On barbed wire the average farmer will save in duty about $1, and upon binder twine about 50 cents. Now, these various savings amount to $2.29 per year, which is all the benefit the farmer will receive from all the reductions in the tariff. Now, we will take the debit side to see how much the farmer loses by the changes in the tariff.

Mr. MACDONALD. What about nails, hardware and a hundred and one other things?

Mr. TAYLOR. The share of the taxes the farmer has to pay on the bounty given to the iron manufacturers will more than counterbalance all he will save on the few nails and other hardware he uses on his farm; the farmer is the man who will pay the big proportion of the bounty that is given to these iron manufacturers, and it will more than counterbalance all that he saves on his hardware. The average farmer will pay 25 cents a year more duty on the rice that he consumes in his family.

Mr. MACDONALD. He pays no more.

Mr. TAYLOR. He does pay more. The duties are raised on the uncleaned rice, which change has shut up all the rice factories in our country and driven the men working in them out upon the street.

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). If my hon. friend will look into the matter, he will find that the duty on rice is not raised.

Mr. TAYLOR. The price will be raised 25 cents, and that has already closed our factories. The Government have raised the duties on cottons 2½ per cent. The average farmer will use $40 worth a year, which would be equivalent to an increased outlay of $1. The average farmer will produce on his 100 acres of land 1,000 bushels of coarse grains, peas, oats and barley, and the Government by placing corn on the free list will thereby reduce the price 5 cents per bushel on the 1,000 bushels of coarse grains, causing a loss to the farmer of $50. In support of that contention, I should like to read extracts from a letter written by C. B. Watts, published on the back of the "Flour and Grain Trade Bulletin," issued a few days ago. He says:

The free importation of corn will have the effect of further reducing the value of our bran and shorts, and will also have a very injurious effect upon the prosperity of the farming community, as it will bring down the price of all their coarse grains to price of feeding corn now that American corn can be brought in free of duty at the low freights which can be obtained at American points. The seriousness of this is evident, when we consider the enormous quantities raised by the farmers of Ontario, which last year was as follows:—Oats, 83,000,000 bushels; peas, 17,000,000 bushels ; barley, 12,000,000 bushels ; corn (shelled), 18,000,000.

As American corn is being used in some parts of the States for fuel, or left to rot in the fields, for want of a profitable market to ship to ; the free admission of corn into Canada will be a great benefit to the American farmers, and it is easily seen that it will enter into active competition with all the food products our farmers raise. The less we get for our bran, shorts and flour, the less will we be able to pay the farmers for their wheat.

Mr. ROGERS. You do not believe it is so.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes ; the farmers of my county and the farmers of Frontenac believe it. I conversed with many of them on Saturday, and they were all satisfied that owing to free corn, their coarse grains would depreciate in value 5 cents per bushel. From the farmers' standpoint, therefore, I protest against the contention that the tariff now introduced will prove beneficial to the farmers, because in my opinion it will be very injurious and to the average farmer it will mean a loss of $50 per year. Now, as to the workingman—how will it affect him ? What benefit will he receive from the reductions in the tariff ? The tariff plank in the platform of the present Government when in Opposition was that they would admit the necessaries of life free and place the taxes on luxuries. Have they done so ? In what position are the necessaries of life ? Are they not all charged with those so-called obnoxious specific duties ? Have hon. gentlemen opposite lowered the duties on meats—they did so a little on flour, but on all agricultural products that are necessaries of life to workingmen they have not done so. I should like to know in what way they have lowered the duties on the necessaries of life, and on what luxuries increased duties have been charged.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Did you not say a moment ago that the Government had lowered the duty on wheat ?

Mr. TAYLOR. They have lowered the duty on flour only 15 cents a barrel, and that will not have much effect as regards the workingman—it will not affect him probably more than 5 cents. I have worked out these calculations. The Government have increased the duty on tobacco ; that may perhaps be considered a luxury. An hon. friend behind me says that it is the poor man's luxury. They have also increased the duty on the poor man's grog, whisky. But what have they done with respect to the Cabinet Ministers' wines and champagnes ? They have not advanced the duties on them, but they have increased the duties on whisky which is used as a medicine and is the poor man's drink, if he drinks at all.

Mr. TAYLOR.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Are you opposed to the increase of duty on whisky ?

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, I am, for this reason, that I believe it will bring about a worse state of affairs than at present exists, and that it will increase smuggling to a very large extent. The present duties are quite high enough. If the Government want to raise more revenue, let them impose increased duty on Cabinet Ministers' and the rich man's wines and champagnes. Here, then, are all the benefits the workingman receives from the changes in the tariff : he gets 12 cents reduction on 12 gallons of coal oil which his family will use during the year ; he will obtain a saving of 28 cents on sugar, making a total of 40 cents. He will pay 25 cents more for rice, $1 more for cotton, and he will suffer a reduction of $50 equal to 10 per cent at least on his wages.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. TAYLOR. I claim the right to conclude my speech, then I will allow the hon. gentleman to proceed.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to ask—

Mr. SPEAKER. Any interruption is allowed only as a matter of courtesy.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will extend the courtesy when I get through. The average workingman makes $500 a year, but he will have to suffer 10 per cent reduction in his wages in order to meet the competition of foreign manufacturers if our manufacturers are to live in this country. Some of the factories in my own town have already inaugurated a 10 per cent reduction, while one factory closed on Saturday for good. Those losses will amount to $51.25, which the average workingman will have to submit to owing to this tariff, and the benefit he will receive from the reductions in the necessaries of life will be 40 cents a year, leaving the workingman $50.85 worse off than if the tariff had remained as it was before the present Government came into power. I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to a few statistics I have taken from a very valuable report he has just issued, as I desire to call the attention of the farmers and workingmen to these figures, because the farmers are as much interested in having labour employed in this country as are the labourers themselves in obtaining work here. The labouring man is the farmer's best customer. The report to which I refer, which was issued a few days ago, shows this state of affairs. We imported from the United States in the years 1894 and in 1896, as follows :—

	Value. 1894.	Value. 1896.
Binding attachments.....	$ 1,475	$ 3,766
Cultivators		21,483
Drills	4,207	40,243
Forks	1,373	6,408
Harrows	4,729	18,729
Harvesters and binders.....	75,573	130,780
Hces	276	1,052
Horse rakes.....		12,903
Lawn mowers.....		977
Mowing machines.....	36,159	73,578
Ploughs	11,198	51,679
Reapers	421	2,330
Scythes	17,379	22,430
Spades and shovels.....	14,005	23,596
Threshers	3,558	23,805
Carriages	253,044	1,224,352
Total	$423,397	$1,658,111 423,397
Increase of imports.....		$1,234,714

This gives the total imports from the United States in 1894 at $423,397, and in 1896 at $1,658,111, or an increase last year over 1894 of $1,234,714. Now, what does that mean? It means that one million and a quarter dollars were sent from Canada to the United States, to employ foreign labourers in that country. The farmers of Canada are not allowed to send their produce to the United States to feed these workingmen, and so this million and a quarter dollars goes to benefit the people of the United States, and our nation is that much the worse off.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). How much do they buy from us?

Mr. TAYLOR. Not one dollar's worth of these articles, nor any other articles that we manufacture here.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). They bought $3,000,000 worth from us.

Mr. TAYLOR. Of what articles, my friend? not any articles that required a day's labour. They bought the raw material and that is all. The farmers of this country and the workingmen of this country want, that instead of the tariff being lowered it shall be made defensive enough, so that the products of any foreign country, whether the United States, or England, or Germany, or Belgium, or anywhere else, shall be kept out and the labour employed at home in Canada. We are told in the Liberal newspapers, and we are told by gentlemen on the opposite side of the House that we now have a Cabinet of business men who know how to run the country on business lines. I have been looking over the complexion of this model Cabinet to see the number of business men in it, and what do I find? I find that the Prime Minister is a lawyer, as well as nine of his colleagues, in the persons of Mr. Sifton, Mr. Davies, the Minister of Trade and Commerce—

The MINISTER OF TRADE AND COMMERCE (Sir Richard Cartwright). I am not a lawyer.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. the Solicitor General, the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals, the hon. the Postmaster General, the Controller of Inland Revenue, the Hon. Mr. Geoffrion, and, in the Senate, the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat and the Hon. Mr. Scott. Ten lawyers compose this Cabinet of business men. The Controller of Customs is practically the only business man in the Government, but he is not allowed to have a voice in the Council where his business ability would be of some service to the country. They shut the business man out, but they have a couple of practical newspaper men in the persons of the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Public Works. They happen to have a doctor, but he is away sick, or he might give them a little medicine to cure them from making such a tariff as they are now administering to the farmers and workingmen of this country. They are not the Cabinet that the people outside of this House expected.

An hon. MEMBER. They have a farmer.

Mr. TAYLOR. Yes, I forgot the farmer. They have one gentleman farmer whom they are holding up to the farmers of this country as a model practical farmer. I do not know that the hon. gentleman has ever done much practical farming, but so far as I can see, he is administering his department on the good lines that he found laid down for him by his predecessors, both in respect to creameries and model farms. He has adopted the policy of cold storage and he is practically carrying out the policy laid down for him by the practical Government which was in office until last June. He is sensible enough, as a sensible farmer ought to be, to follow in the footsteps of his predecessor. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have not yet received the full policy of the Government on the coal question. There is something held back, and therefore I will not discuss the question until the Government make known their policy in that respect. I presume, if they carry out the promise that was hinted at, we shall have the poor man's fuel tax in the near future. The Government and their supporters talked about clerical errors in the last tariff, but I will be more than surprised if there are not a number of clerical errors to correct before this tariff is completed. When the Ministers get through receiving the deputations that have arrived in Ottawa from one end of the country to the other, I have no doubt that there will be a number of clerical errors to explain away before their tariff is finally adjusted. I rather think that my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) will have to apologize, because he informed the House at the beginning of this session, that the Government were delaying bringing down the tariff so that when they did bring it down it would be perfect, and there would be no clerical errors in it. He will no doubt have to take back his announcement, and turn round and back up the Government in explaining a number of clerical errors which they have made in the tariff as proposed to this House. If they do not do so, the explanation of a Liberal in Gananoque made to me when I was home on Saturday will fall to the ground. The gentleman said: That this Government went round the country, spent thousands of dollars in consulting the farmers, the manufacturers, and the workingmen, and they were advised by nine out of ten of these people to make no changes. He further said: They went back to Ottawa, never looked at the evidence, and they brought down a tariff that a dozen school boys could bring down a better one; they went into making changes for change sake, and they bungled the whole business. If these clerical errors are not corrected, then, in my opinion, the workingmen of Canada will have to stand a reduction of from 10 to 25 per cent in their wages, or else they will have to leave the Dominion and work in a foreign country, where our farmers cannot send their produce after them to feed them. The farmers of this country do not want the duties removed so as to injure the manufacturing industries, and consequently destroy their home market. They know that to-day there is competition enough among our manufacturers to bring goods down to the lowest price they can be produced for. There is not an article manufactured in Canada to-day, which is not being sold practically at cost, owing to the close competition. The labouring men are getting a fair day's wage, and the farmers are getting a fair price for their produce, and so between the farmers and the labouring men there is a fair interchange of products, and both industries are moving along side by side, and producing wealth in Canada which will not be produced if manufactured goods have to be imported, as they will have to be, from foreign countries as they will be if this tariff goes into force. Notwithstanding that the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) may have to admit that a number of clerical errors have been made, I hope that before the Government finally announce the completion of the tariff, they will admit these clerical errors, and endeavour to adjust some of their blunders so that our manufacturers can make a living, and employ the workingmen of Canada at home.

Mr. STENSON. I did not intend to take any part in this debate until I heard the speech delivered by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), belittling so much the benefit that would accrue to the farmers from the tariff that has been brought down by this Government. The hon. gentleman computes the number of gallons of coal oil used by each farmer at twelve gallons a year, and the reduction in the cost at one cent a gallon. I think that is scarcely fair, because the reduction in cost will certainly be greater, as a result of the privilege of having coal oil carried in tank vessels, which is supposed to reduce the cost one cent and a half per gallon more. But taking the hon. gentleman's own figures as the amount of the reduction in the cost of coal oil, sugar, axes, scythes, barbed wire and binder twine, the hon. gentleman admits that each farmer will benefit to the extent of $2.31, which, according to him, is not worth considering. It might not be if only one or two farmers in his constituency were benefited by this. But, taking my own constituency as an example, mostly a farming community, numbering over 5,000, on that basis we arrive at the nice little sum of $11,550, which will be saved in that county alone by the new tariff. This is something worth considering, leaving out of the question all that will be saved by bringing in coal oil in tank vessels.

My hon. friend pretends that the farming community are suffering a loss from the placing of corn on the free list. Well, I do not think that doctrine would do very well in my county, for the people there are not only pleased with this change, but they have been asking for years that corn be allowed to come in free so that they could use their milk to better advantage in fattening hogs, the coarse grains they could get in our own country not being just what is required in dairying communities. I would put the benefit to my constituency alone from the placing of corn on the free list, as equal at the very least, and I think very much higher than the benefit afforded by all the other articles mentioned by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor), that is to say, $11,550. I think it would not be an exaggeration to say that the benefit obtained by my constituency from the introduction of free corn will be double that.

With regard to the increase in the duties on cottons, I would just remark that when the preferential tariff is taken advantage of by the British manufacturers, instead of losing anything by this increase in the duty on cottons, we in our part of the country will be benefited by it. The cottons will be cheaper than they were before, under the late duty. So that the farming community have nothing to lose, but everything to gain by these changes in the tariff.

I must take exception to the hon. gentleman's remarks with regard to the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). In my part of the country his remarks would not be taken seriously, because there the hon. Minister is known as a gentleman farmer, it is true—because he is a gentleman in every sense of the word; and he is not only a gentleman farmer, but a practical farmer as well, and able to give instructions to farmers who have not had the opportunities he has had of becoming educated as a scientific farmer. I know that his instructions have been beneficial to the farmers of my district, even more so than the advantages they will reap from this new tariff for many years. If we make a comparison between the present Minister of Agriculture and his predecessors in office, I think it will be wholly to the advantage of the present Minister of Agriculture. Even if he were not a practical farmer, he is a gentleman farmer, whereas his predecessors were not farmers in any sense of the word. I do not know whether they were lawyers or doctors, but I believe they were not farmers. That was the opinion among us when we saw the results of their operations in the Department of Agriculture. But we shall have the benefit of the experience and knowledge of the present Minister of Agriculture, in connection with the means he has provided for having our butter and cheese placed on the English market in a proper state, and in a state to command the highest price. This will be of greater advantage to the farmers of this country even than the benefits which we reap from the tariff.

I will just say one word in conclusion with regard to the remark made with reference to an absent Minister. I will only say that I regret that the hon. member should have got up in this House and taken advantage of the sad accident that has occurred to one of our Ministers to refer to it in a sarcastic manner instead of sympathizing with a fellow-member so seriously hurt.

Mr. ROCHE. Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to engage the attention of the House for more than two or three minutes, and I will not depart from the subject under discussion, namely, the duty on agricultural implements. I have already delivered my speech on the Budget, and therefore, unlike some other gentlemen, I have no speech to make on the Budget to-day. I have always noticed that when the Government have a particularly bad case to defend, there is no one on that side of the House so ready to jump up and defend it as the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister); and the worse the case the readier he is and the louder is his voice in defence of the same. He engaged the attention of the House for five or ten minutes on a subject entirely foreign to the one before us, charging an hon. member on this side with voting one way and speaking another. The hon. gentleman need not come to this side of the House to get an example of that; he has only to look at the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) to find a brilliant example, for that hon. gentleman has spoken in one way and he is going to vote in another way on this occasion. That hon. gentleman is going to perform the act of which he accuses an hon. member on this side, in his own elegant language, of getting under the barn. No one is better acquainted with the profuse promises held out to the farmers of Manitoba that agricultural implements would be placed on the free list than the hon. member for Lisgar. He is the editor of a paper which has been crying out for years past for free agricultural implements; and now, when he is asked to back up his principles, if they are principles, by his vote, you find him swallowing those principles for fear of embarrassing the Government. The hon. member for King's (Mr. Domville) takes the same position, and has congratulated the Patrons on coming to the support of the Government on the ground that they will not embarrass the Government by voting against them. When a similar motion was brought up last session by the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), the hon. member for Lisgar gave as an excuse why he would not support him, that he had every confidence that when the time came the Government would do every justice to the farmers of the North-west, and place agricultural implements on the free list. He declared that the reason why he did not vote in favour of that motion was because it might have the effect of assisting the hon. member for West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) in the election which he thought that hon. gentleman would soon have to face. That election may not, and I hope it will not take place. Very likely it will not, but if it should, I am confident that my hon. friend from West Assiniboia will derive very great support from the farmers of his riding for having brought up this motion and standing by it like a man. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) himself will have to undergo another election, and no doubt will find that the farmers of his constituency will resent the attitude he has taken in this House to-day. The hon. member for Huron (Mr. Macdonald) has declared that the farmers in his constituency are perfectly satisfied with the reductions that have been made on agricultural implements. I would like to know to what reductions the hon. gentleman refers. To my mind, there has been no reduction at all except in the duty on the raw material which enters into the composition of the machines and of which the manufacturers derive the benefit. But the protection to the manufacturers of agricultural implements is the same to-day as it was under the late Government, 20 per cent, so that, as a matter of fact, the manufacturers receive greater protection to-day, because besides the reduction in duty on the raw material, they enjoy the same protection on the manufactured article that they did before. The farmers of the hon. gentleman's constituency must be very easily satisfied if he voices their sentiments.

Now, this motion calls for the condemnation of the Government for not having kept faith with the farmers of Manitoba. I know that the Government have broken faith with the people of that country. While I am not pledged to my constituency to vote in favour of free agricultural implements, my opponent made this proposition a drawing card in his election and every Liberal member in Manitoba did the same. Quotations were printed, and freely circulated from the speeches of the leaders of the Liberal party, promising that if returned to power agricultural implements would be placed on the free list. We now call on those hon. gentlemen to keep faith with the farmers of the North-west. I intend voting in favour of the motion of the hon. member for West Assiniboia, and I am sure that in doing so, I am voicing the sentiments of the farmers of my constituency, who are in favour of the free admission of agricultural implements, the greater portion of the duty on which is paid by the farmers of our western country, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. And I am confident that those hon. gentlemen from Manitoba who vote against this motion will, in doing so, certainly not represent the sentiments of their electors, and I am equally confident that their punishment will come when they have to go back to their constituents for re-election.

Mr. CRAIG. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House very long, but think it only due to myself to explain the vote I give on this question. Before doing so, however, I may be permitted to refer to one or two matters. I think it is only right for me to say that so far as my knowledge goes, the hon. member for West Assiniboia has always in this House lifted up his voice in favour of the farmers in the west. I am sure that even hon. gentlemen opposite must admit that no man has drawn more attention to the needs of the farmers of the great North-west and Manitoba than my hon. friend from West Assiniboia. It has seemed to me at times that the western members on the other side were rather jealous of my hon. friend, and imagined that their efforts were somewhat thrown into the shade when compared with his. I was rather amused at the statement made by the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) reflecting on the conduct of the hon. member for Assiniboia in not voting in favour of free agricultural implements and free binder twine when the late Government held office. Now, the hon. member for West Assiniboia explained that he did not vote in that way because the motion was one of want of confidence in the Government. Yet, singular to relate, while the hon. member for Lisgar rises to condemn my hon. friend from Assiniboia for having taken that course, the hon. gentleman proposes to follow exactly the same course himself to-day. In attempting to depict the conduct of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) he makes use of some elegant similes. For instance, he describes the hon. member for Assiniboia as climbing a tree and crawling under a barn, apparently quite regardless of the fact that these similes apply just as effectively to himself.

There was one statement, however, made by the hon. members from the west supporting the Government, especially the hon. member for Lisgar, and that is that they accept the tariff, as it stands to-day, because it is only an instalment; and whether they have had the assurance of the Government or not to this effect, they led the public to believe that they have had assurances from the Government that the present tariff is only an instalment and that they are justified perhaps in looking for great reductions in the future. Well, that may be satisfactory to hon. gentlemen opposite, but the House should require something more, and the country looks for something more definite. In itself, that is a very important statement, but I think it is the duty of the Government to take the House into its confidence and inform us whether these hon. members who have spoken have any right to make such statements to the House and country. The hon. First Minister should let this House and the country know whether it is a fact that the present tariff is not, even for a few years, to remain unchanged, or whether it is only an instalment, and that in a very short time the farmers in the west and all over the country will have further reductions. There is one point concerning the western farmers and agricultural implements, which should not be forgotten, and that is that the Conservative Government did not lose sight of the claims of the farmers in the west, and I am satisfied that they were to a considerable extent induced to take this course by my hon. friend from Assiniboia. They took into consideration the situation of the farmers in the west and what did they do? They reduced the duty on agricultural implements from 35 to 20 per cent. That was done by a Conservative Government, and it seems to me that the farmers in the west ought to recognize this fact. It seems to me that they ought to recognize the fact that the great reduction that was made, was made, not by hon. gentlemen opposite, but by the late Government. The late Government also reduced the duty on binder twine from 25 to 12½ per cent. I cannot of course refer to any previous debate, but the other day I see by the papers—I was not in the House at the time—the hon. first Minister, in answer to a question concerning the sale of Kingston penitentiary binder twine to Mr. Hobbs at London, said that no stipulation was made as to price, because it was not considered necessary, the reduction in the tariff having caused such a keen competition that there was no complaint on that score. If that be the case, I do not see what need there was for any necessity to reduce the duties still further to 10 per cent. This, however, is another question which I shall discuss when we are in committee on binder twine. The amendment says that good faith to the western farmer demands that agricultural implements and lumber should be made free. While I am not going to stand up here and defend the consistency of the Government, because that point I will let them settle with their own supporters. I feel bound to explain the vote I intend to give on this question and I wish to say that, whether hon. gentlemen opposite be consistent or not, wherever they maintain protection I will not condemn them. Why? Because I am now, and have been ever since I entered the House, a protectionist, a moderate protectionist. I am not a political protectionist—not a protectionist from politics, but, as a Canadian, looking at the question as a business man, in the interests of this country, looking at our situation, lying, as we do, alongside the United States, and having to compete with cheap labour from Germany and the countries of the old world, I believe that moderate protection is to this country an absolute necessity. And so, I say that I am not going to condemn the Government when they have maintained protection. Under these circumstances it would be impossible for me to support the motion of my hon. friend (Mr. Davin). And why? Because if I support this motion, in a short time I may be called upon to vote for an amendment declaring that good faith on the part of the Government with the farmers or workingmen of Ontario and Quebec demands the abolition of all protective duties. I do not want to vote for that, and, for the same reason, I do not want to vote for this resolution. I do not intend to vote for any resolution which would place me in the position of seeming to be in favour of free trade for this country or of doing away with moderate protection to the manufacturers of this country. The Liberal party, in so far as they have maintained the protective principle have really endorsed the policy of the Conservative party. Sir, I find no fault with them for doing that. It is true that in doing this they have not been consistent, for they denounced this policy unsparingly throughout the country. I know that in my own constituency one of the speakers against me, a prominent member of the Liberal party, advocated free trade, and, no doubt, in that way gained a good many votes. But, I am willing to overlook their inconsistency, so far as this resolution is concerned. I repeat that, so far as the Liberal party have maintained protection they have endorsed the policy of the Conservative party, and I do not intend to condemn them for that. Whatever I may say of their consistency and of their good faith with the farmers of the west, I am not going to vote that I wish to have them adopt free trade. I shall be obliged to vote against the motion of my hon. friend. How the members from the west shall settle any questions arising between them and their constituents is their own concern, and not mine. But, for myself, I intend to vote as I have always voted—in favour of moderate protection for the workingmen and farmers of this country.

Mr. OLIVER. On this motion, I desire to say—if the House will forgive me for taking the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) seriously—that I consider the motion a very proper one; and, as a western man, feeling a certain amount of dissatisfaction with the tariff brought down by the Government, I shall be most happy to support the motion—provided the hon. gentleman can show me that when his motion is carried and the Government have been turned out, the new Government that will come in will give effect to the motion. But, until he can show that, until he can show that the people of the western country and the agriculturists of Canada would be benefited by turning out the present Government and bringing in their opponents, he can certainly not expect me or any western man or any agriculturist or representative of an agricultural constituency to vote for his motion of want of confidence in the present Government. The difference between the position as it is to-day on the motion of the hon. gentleman and the position as it was on the motion that has been alluded to during this debate, as proposed, I believe, by the present Postmaster General (Mr. Mulock) in favour of free binding twine—and the hon. gentleman from Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) spoke in favour of that motion and voted against it—is this: Had the hon. gentleman (Mr. Davin) voted as he spoke on that motion and succeeded in turning out the Government on that proposition and in bringing in their opponents, the new Government would have given effect to the motion, whereas to-day, if we carried this motion and the present Government is turned out and the Opposition comes in, the motion will not be given effect to, and we shall be in a worse position than we are to-day ten times over. That is the difference and that is the reason why there is no inconsistency in any hon. member representing an agricultural constituency, even though he is not perfectly satisfied with the present tariff, voting confidence in the present Administration as compared with their opponents, who have declared themselves on every point and on every occasion as strong protectionists; that the manufacturers of Canada were their first interest and the farmers of Canada did not enter into their consideration. If there was anything to be gathered from the address of the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) who is the whip of the Opposition, or from the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Craig) who has just sat down, it was that wherever else the farmers of Canada may look for help they need not look for it from the present Opposition. It may suit hon. gentlemen on the Opposition benches to propose votes of want of confidence, to propose catch motions. There are many genlemen on this side of the House who represent strictly agricultural constituencies, but it should not be supposed that for that reason they are simply cabbage heads, and are going to vote against the interests of their constituencies on a motion put forward even by the very astute member for Western Assiniboia (Mr. Davin).

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CALGARY AND EDMONTON RAILWAY COMPANY.

On the Order,

House in committee on Bill (No. 33) respecting the Calgary and Edmonton Railway Company.—(Mr. Osler.)

Mr. GILLIES. I am requested by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Osler) who is promoting this Bill, to ask that it be allowed to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to know why the hon. gentleman wishes this Bill to stand.

Mr. GILLIES. Mr. Osler is unavoidably absent this evening, and asked me to make this request to the committee. What reason he has for asking it to stand, I do not know, but I think he is entitled to have his request granted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Let it stand, then.

LANGENBURG AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

The House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 51) respecting the Langenburg and Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Richardson.)

(In the Committee.)

On the preamble,

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will make a few explanations in regard to the object of the Bill, and leave the Minister of Railways and Canals to explain the amendment which he proposes to introduce to this Bill, as well as to other Bills which will come before the House. The object of this Bill is to enable the Langenburg and Southern Railway Company to connect with the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company. That is a road that has been constructed west of Gladstone, a point some twenty or twenty-five miles north-west of Portage la Prairie. The Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company has been constructed from Gladstone, 100 miles north-westerly into what is known as the Dauphin country, and it is proposed to further extend that railway this year, I think, some twenty-five miles. As explained in the Railway Committee the other day, this Dauphin Railway is in reality the Hudson Bay Railway, or, to put it perhaps more correctly, the subsidy of $80,000 per year which was granted some years ago by the Dominion Government to enable the construction of that road to proceed from Winnipeg, or a point near there, to the Saskatchewan River—that aid of $80,000 per year has been transferred to this Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company, and under that aid, one-half the mileage has already been constructed. Therefore, this company, I presume, has secured from the late Dominion Government this aid of $40,000 per year for this Dauphin Railway Company. Doubtless the intention is to obtain the balance of the $40,000 to enable the construction of this road to proceed to the Saskatchewan. Now, the importance of that work will doubtless be conceded by all hon. members, for if it is decided that the Hudson Bay Railway is a feasible undertaking, if it is decided that these Straits are navigable and that we will have navigation for a sufficient period to secure the success of a commercial route from Hudson Bay to Great Britain, then there will be constructed this important link between Portage la Prairie, or Gladstone, up to the south shore of the Saskatchewan River, almost half the distance. Now, this Bill which is before the committee asks the extension of the charter, I think, for two years. The charter was obtained some two years ago, and they now seek an extension for an additional two years. They have power under their charter to connect with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I may say that the length of the road is some seventy miles, extending from the town of Langenburg, in eastern Assiniboia, down to the Canadian Pacific Railway, and they now want permission to connect with this Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company as well as with the Canadian Pacific Railway. I think this is all the Bill proposes.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS (Mr. Blair). I wish to make just one remark with reference to this Bill, and what I am about to say with reference to this Bill will apply to some of the other Bills which are upon the Order paper for reference to committee this evening. During the discussion before the Railway Committee of this and the other Bills to which I refer, I intimated that I thought it would be desirable that a clause or a new section should be added to each of these Bills which, on the face of it, would contain a recognition of the power of Parliament to enact any legislation which might be regulative of the manner in which, and the extent to which, these companies should issue bonds, and also give running rights which might be desired by other companies over the lines of railways incorporated by the particular Bill; and I said that I had not been able to direct as much attention to the subject as I desired, but that I would at a very early moment, prepare a clause which I would have moved when the Bill came before the House. I am aware it would not be in order for me to propose an additional clause to the Bill in committee, but I wish to give notice that I shall have a clause moved on the third reading which will cover the ground I have now particularly mentioned, and which I think it was understood by the members of the committee generally I would move later, and which it would be desirable to have added to the several Bills.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should like to suggest to the Minister of Railways that the amendment, so far as I can understand it from the remarks he has made, will be evidently one of very great importance and will affect railway schemes very materially. I should like to suggest to him that as it is of such importance, it ought to take the form of an amendment to the General Railway Act. I think it would be very unfair that a company which had received incorporation should be placed in a different position from other companies, and I should like him to take into consideration whether he does not think that the amendment he proposes is of sufficient importance to become part of the general Act. Of course, without seeing the amendment it is difficult to judge its effect, but I must suggest to the hon. gentleman and the committee that it would hardly be dealing with the company fairly when it had been incorporated, had built a considerable portion of the line, and had invested considerable money, to insert in its Act a provision which would affect its financial position very materially, such provision being different from any contained in the Acts of other companies. I should like the Minister to consider that point, and I think he will see it is desirable, if the House agrees to the amendment, that it should be made a part of the General Railway Act, and be not applied to one company and not to other companies.

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS. The hon. gentleman does not carry in his mind fully the purport of the discussion which took place before the Railway Committee. I intimated there that it was not impossible that the Government might conclude to adopt a somewhat drastic policy with respect to all these questions, and it might conclude to propose to Parliament the creation of a commission, which would have very large powers in respect to the control and supervision of railways generally. I could not speak definitely at all on that subject, because it had not been possible for the Government as a Government to consider and come to a conclusion upon the matter, and of necessity, therefore, whatever might be the decision at which the Government might arrive, it would be impossible to give effect to any such intention by proposing legislation at the present session of Parliament. It would be a very large subject, it would require to be very carefully studied, thought out and prepared in the form of a measure, and the best we could do was to hope to introduce such a measure at the next session of Parliament. But in the meantime, I thought it desirable that we should not incorporate any more railway corporations without, at all events, inserting in their charters a clause to which they would be subject hereafter, that if Parliament should adopt later a general law those companies which were previously incorporated would be subject to its provisions. It was mainly to prevent the possibility of it being hereafter said that the companies now being incorporated could fairly claim exemption from the operation and effect of any such law, if any such law were hereafter passed, that I thought such action would be proper, and in that decision I think the committee generally agreed with me, the idea being such as I have now mentioned. It would be no advantage to add any such clause now to the General Railway Act. When I referred to inserting an additional provision it was simply intended as a declaration that companies, in the event of such legislation, if any, being passed by Parliament, should be regulated as regards the particulars I have mentioned.

Bill reported.

IN COMMITTEE.

Bill (No. 52) respecting the James Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

Bill (No. 56) respecting the Medicine Hat Railway and Coal Company.—(Mr. Lount.)

RESTIGOUCHE RAILWAY AND BRIDGE COMPANY.

On the order,

Second reading Bill (No. 104) to incorporate the Restigouche Railway and Bridge Company.—(Mr. Domville.)

Mr. McALISTER. This is not printed in both English and French.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not see that it is printed in French.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Could we take up Bill 103, respecting the Canadian Fire Insurance Company?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I do not see that it is printed in English or French; and, as we have passed this order, and it has not been read by the Clerk, I do not think it would be in order to have the Bill read the second time now.

Mr. DOMVILLE. I beg to move that Bill 104, an Act to incorporate the Restigouche Railway and Bridge Company, be read the second time.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. The Bill has not been printed in French, and the objection has been taken to the second reading.

Mr. DOMVILLE. It is not customary to object when a Bill is printed in English.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

SUPPLY—THE DUTY ON FARM IMPLEMENTS.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia West (Mr. Davin) is perhaps regarded by some members of this House as intended to advantage the hon. gentleman, and possibly to disadvantage some of the other gentlemen who represent the west. At the same time, it seems to me that the introduction of this resolution at this time is not altogether unfortunate, because it gives us an opportunity to discuss the attitude of the Government now that it is in power as compared with the attitude of the gentlemen who compose it when speaking in the country without the responsibility of office before and during the elections. The hon. member for Assiniboia West, in maintaining that the Government has not kept good faith with the western part of Canada, has enunciated a proposition that ought to secure the assent of every one who remembers distinctly what statements were made by those hon. gentlemen in support of their policy during the years they were in Opposition. It seems to me that there was a certain amount of animosity, even of bitterness, shown in the manner in which the hon. member for Assiniboia West was attacked in the House. When it was announced by hon. gentlemen opposite that he stood practically a lone man in this House, in taking the position he did, it might have been expected that the great party sitting opposite would have treated him with some generosity and kindness. But both the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) and the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) showed anything but tenderness or generosity in dealing with the hon. gentleman. They did not seem to think that the lonely position to which they assigned him required them to treat him with any kindness. In fact, the whole of that side of the House seemed to join without any hesitation in endeavouring to crush our friend from Assiniboia West. I am sure that those who know that hon. gentleman and have watched his career, those who have listened to and read his speeches in this House, know that it is quite unnecessary for any one here to speak in his defence. Since he has been in this House he has developed a knowledge of the rules of the House and a readiness in debate which renders him equal to any encounter that may be thrust upon him. At the same time, it seems to me that he was perfectly within his right in the motion he was introducing; and even if it could be argued that his intention in introducing it was to better his position in his own constituency, it seems to me that those who oppose him most vigorously could be charged with doing the same thing. The hon. member for Lisgar accused him, not directly, but in the manner of language he used, of shirking a vote, of being ready in the interest of his party to abandon his position, and even after speaking in favour of a motion, to avoid a vote upon it. Now, the hon. member for Lisgar is not in a good position to attack the hon. member for Assiniboia West in that respect. Even if he can allege that the hon. member for Assiniboia West is willing to sink his own convictions to avoid embarrassing his party, the hon. member for Lisgar has given proof of his desire to avoid embarrassing his party, not only this session, but last session as well. Last session, when the hon. member for Assiniboia West moved a precisely similar amendment, the hon. member for Lisgar spoke in favour of it, saying that it voiced his sentiments and opinions, and after all he voted against it. At this session, when almost an identical resolution is introduced, the hon. member for Lisgar again announces himself in favour of the amendment, and again gives us to understand that he is going to vote against it. Why does he do this? Simply to serve his own interests. And why does he condemn the hon. member for Assiniboia West so strongly, and endeavour to hold him up to ridicule, for following a line of conduct which he is closely imitating at this moment? The hon. member for Lisgar has taken a line that will leave him free to vote in any way he pleases in this legislature. Last year, the point was taken that it was improper to vote on the resolution of the hon. member for Assiniboia West, because as the Premier said, it was asking for an affirmation on this subject six months before the tariff would be introduced. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Richardson) on that occasion voted with the Government and against his own convictions because it was too soon, and now he has gone to the opposite extreme, and is prepared to vote with the Government and against his own convictions because it is too late. So that within those two extremes, he has practically given himself latitude to do anything at all that is in the interests of the Government, and his own also, we must assume.

As I have said, I do not think it necessary at all that I or anybody else should champion the cause of my hon. friend from West Assiniboia (Mr. Davin), but as that hon. gentleman is precluded by the rules of debate from replying in his own behalf, I shall take this opportunity to show that the sweeping assertion made by the hon. member for Lisgar and other hon. gentlemen opposite with regard to the conduct of my hon. friend is not borne out by the facts. In 1891 my hon. friend introduced a resolution, which I find in the "Hansard." with reference to second homesteads, and pressed that to a vote, even after being asked by the Hon. Mr. Langevin, who was then leading the House, not to press it to a division. My hon. friend persisted, despite that request, in pressing his motion, and in the vote obtained he largely reduced the majority of the Government which he was supporting. So that the sweeping assertion made to-day by hon. gentlemen opposite that the hon. member for Assiniboia lacked the steadfastness and the courage to stand by his own doctrines in the House is not consistent with the facts. I am sure that any one who knows my hon. friend and admires him, any one who knows how great an ornament he is to the Parliament of Canada, does not require to have such an assertion put to the test, and is pleased to learn, when it is put to the test, that it cannot be substantiated.

The ground upon which I maintain that such a resolution as this should be introduced at present is because it enables the Parliament of Canada to consider what has been the course of the Government with reference to that most important question, the decision of which has been placed in their hands. It may be argued that the Government of Canada is not bound to fulfil its pre-election pledges: it may be argued that utterances of gentlemen in their constituencies before election cannot be held to bind the Government which they support. I hold, however, that it is not in the interests of the country, that such a doctrine should be announced and such a precedent established by this House. It is not in the interests of any country, in which we have the Government and the Opposition appealing to the electorate upon certain issues, and in which each party has deliberately decided in favour of a certain policy, and to present it to the country, that the party elected should fail to carry out the policy upon which it appealed to the people. I maintain that if there is any sound principle upon which the Government and the Opposition can go to the country and appeal to the people as to a jury, it is that when a party attains power on certain avowed principles and programme, it is bound to give them effect. But when that party, after its return to power and after Parliament meets, laughs at all its promises, appears intensely amused when they are recited, looks upon them as a huge joke, in which not only the Ministers of the Crown but their supporters join, and ridicules the idea that doctrines publicly stated by public men are not to be laughed at and repudiated the moment the party is put in a position to carry them out, that party and Government should be shown up to the country in their proper light. Why, it makes a perfect mockery of an appeal to the people, if we are to substitute for the decision given at the general elections, which ought to be and, we suppose, does embody the judgments and opinions of the country, something entirely different. It would mean that the success of the party is to be attained by any means whatever, and afterwards to be used solely for the advancement of personal interests and to suit the convenience of the members who compose the Government. Such a position as that, I need scarcely say, it is not to be supposed for a moment the people of any country, more particularly the intelligent people of a country like this, are going to condone or pardon, and it strikes me that if it be true that the party in power has pledged itself to certain views and opinions and is now deliberately failing to carry them out, it will follow that the country will soundly condemn them, on the first opportunity, for that neglect of duty and failure to fulfil their promises. Therefore, it seems to me that it is most important in the interests of the country that this attitude of the Government should be held up to the view of the country on every possible occasion. Is it to be held for a moment as doubtful whether or not the Government has been pledged to the doing of the very things recited in the resolution of the hon. member for West Assiniboia? I think there can be no question whatever that by the utterances of the First Minister and his supporters, by resolutions adopted by hon. gentlemen opposite, by the specific promises referred to by the hon. member for West Assiniboia, this Government were pledged on these things and secured the support of the people of Canada on these pledges. The Government has not fulfilled them. And why? Because this Government is not disposed to stand by the position it took during the election, but is presenting to this country, instead of a revenue policy tariff or free trade tariff, a tariff which is the product of opportunism produced for the purpose of satisfying, in a measure, everybody and if possible displeasing nobody, a policy which leaves it in the power of the Government, in the course of such time as they choose to take for the purpose—at the end of the session or at the next meeting of Parliament, or some other time—to reduce the tariff or go back to protection or go a little further in the direction of revenue tariff, just as they please. But it is no fulfilment of the pledges and promises made to the people and no such fulfilment can be found in the tariff. The hon. member for Lisgar considers it safer and better for his constituency to trust this Government than hon. gentlemen on this side, but in so doing he is violating the pledges upon which he was elected and upon which the Government were returned to office. Some very-extraordinary propositions have been laid down here to-day. For instance, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Fraser) regards the tariff as a step towards the fulfilment of the promises made by the party now in power, when in Opposition, to give us a revenue tariff. He regards the measure in which the Government have fulfilled their promises in reference to these questions, of binder twine, barbed wire, coal oil and the other items mentioned, as a step towards a revenue tariff. There is this to be said about the tariff we now have, you may call it what you please. The speech in which the hon. Minister of Finance introduced it was one from which, as he proceeded, it was impossible to tell what was going to be the result. He might have given you anything he pleased at the conclusion, and you could not have said that it was not, in a measure, foreshadowed in the speech. The tariff the Government have submitted to us is not a revenue tariff. Why, the very items upon which some members asked the confidence of the country on the ground that the Government have fulfilled their pledges are not at all in the direction of a revenue tariff or free trade, but are positively and decidedly protectionist in their nature. For instance, take one article that has been dwelt upon by some hon. members—free corn. Is that a step in the direction of a revenue tariff? Is it not rather decidedly a protectionist measure? If corn is to be made free and if, as hon. gentlemen say, it is to the advantage of the farmers that it should be made free, is not that a violation of the first principle that ought to be held by a man in favour of free trade or of a revenue tariff? Is not this building up and assisting one portion of the producers of the country at the expense of the rest? Is it not diverting money from one class of producers to assist another? It is an attempt, and an attempt carried out to the full, to give protection to the feeders. It is as much a measure of protection as the giving of bounties to the producers of iron. It is a violation of all free trade principles and free-trade policy.

Mr. MCGREGOR. Free corn, a violation of free-trade principles?

Mr. BELL (Pictou). It is a violation of the doctrines of the free trader.

Mr. MCGREGOR. How?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). We are not free traders.

Mr. BELL (Pictou). I have already explained, but I have no objection to repeat what I said. I notice one gentleman tells us that they are not free traders. I made that discovery during the election, when we were waging our contest against them. I found then and in the contest in the country the same state of affairs that exists to-day in this House and in this Government. I found that they were free traders in one place and protectionists in another, that they were free traders when they addressed themselves to one class of the community and protectionists so far as they addressed themselves to another. There was not, so far as I

Mr. BELL (Pictou).
