Mr. Speaker, those deficits are due first of all to administrative inefficiency on the part of the Canadian National. If its administration is experiencing difficulties, the government should take measures to sell the company to the Canadian Pacific as private industry can make it a profitable business. The government does not know how to administer companies under its jurisdiction. Instead of presenting deficit budgets, it should propose balanced budgets in order to render the best possible services to the Canadian people as a whole.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, in beginning my remarks on the provisions now under consideration, I should like to comment on a statement I made concerning the ship Christina.

A Conservative member told me that the ship was bought for $70,000 and that today, following improvements, it is worth $3 million. That is true. The fact remains, however, that I did not have the figures with me at the time. Nevertheless, I should like to point out that, in 1932, the owner of the Christina also bought six cargo ships for a song. He paid $20,000 for each one of those ships, which had cost $1.2 million to build.

During a depression, conditions are very different. We understand how a man could have made a million dollars out of a single purchase. That is precisely what I am criticizing the government for. It sold its ships at a ridiculous price instead of allowing the transaction to take place in Canada. Thus it allowed a few men to get rich at the expense of the nation. Millions of dollars were wasted during a depression, at a time when Canadians did not even eat three meals a day.

That is why we are asking questions today concerning the moneys to be provided. It makes us think, because we do not know exactly for what purposes these funds will be used. There was no lack of supplies in the thirties, and yet Canadians could not eat three meals a day. When war came in 1939, the government found a way to raise the money required to pay for the greatest carnage ever seen. Today, when we are asked to authorize Her Majesty to grant loans directly to Air Canada or to guarantee issues of Air Canada securities to the tune of 130 million, we can surmise that Air Canada has to cover a deficit in its operational reserves for the period ending on June 30, 1969.

The hon. member for Beauce, Mr. Rodrigue) referred a while ago to the transfer of the Air Canada overhaul base from Winnipeg to Montreal. Experts have said that the base should be transferred, or Canada would lose $10 million a year; if the Winnipeg base is not closed by 1973, $30 million will be wasted. If there was a wastage during the thirties when there was extreme poverty, there is a similar situation today. If we are asked today for moneys to be granted to Air Canada to allow it to balance its budget, we should take into account the technical reports recommending that the main jet aircraft maintenance services should be in Montreal.

Those recommendations were repeated afterwards by the Thompson Commission. We can even go as far back as 1957 and analyze the situation existing then when the Wallace Clark Co. of New York recommended the unification of all maintenance bases in Dorval. Finally, in 1962, Air Canada announced that the transfer of the Winnipeg base would take place progressively and be completed in 1966. From then on, politics came into play. To avoid any controversy, in 1963, Air Canada had to ask the Dixon Spear Co. to make a new survey and to find out what policy Air Canada should follow as to its maintenance, overhaul, and storing services, from 1964 to 1973. The said company stated that the maintenance base in Winnipeg should be closed as soon as possible, if Air Canada's operations were to be efficient and economical. Indeed, this report showed that Air Canada would lose more than $10 million if the Winnipeg base remained open until 1966. We are now in 1968, and there are still people who do not want this base to be transferred to Montreal.

Personally, I am not against Winnipeg being able to provide jobs to its workers, for those people need employment. But what I object to and what I find ridiculous and what I merely call discrimination is that in Lauzon we have more than 1,000 workers to whom we had promised repair work on a ship, and that ship, mentioned again the other day, was merely a ghost ship.

An expenditure of $450,000 should be made, but they could not find the necessary funds to enable these Lauzon workers, and I have not heard—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Is the hon. member able to prove there were 1,000 workers in the Lauzon shipyards?

Mr. Dumont: I have here a report from the president of the labour union that states, in effect, that over 2,000 workers are unemployed in Lauzon; it is not only 1,000, but 2,000 unemployed workers, 2,000 bread-winners.

The government accepts a deficit of $10 million in Winnipeg, but is unable to grant an amount of $450,000 to give work to these people. We have not seen the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) rise and intervene to ask for this just society that we hear so much about.

This is rather an unjust society, and with the complicity of the Liberal members who, as was said lately by Mr. Claude Ryan, follow blindly the Prime Minister every time he raises his little finger, the ship has disappeared and it has become a ghost ship. Such repairs would have cost practically nothing compared to the deficit in Winnipeg. This is proof, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that Quebec does not have an adequate representation claiming justice for our people. Mr. Laberge, who sent a press release recently in which he stated, with regard to the overhaul base in Winnipeg, that political patronage would, once more, override the interests of the Canadian people.

If we continue to waste $30 million in order to help workers in Winnipeg while not even one member for the Lévis area has the guts to get up and request at least an equal amount, then I say that the province of Quebec simply labours under injustice.

We will say, for a long time in history, that instead of a just society, we had an unjust government.

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I only have a few words to say, and my créditiste friends are to blame who inspire me each time they take the floor in this house.

I was slightly amused to hear the hon. member speak of the Christina which it seems was sold in 1932 for a ridiculously low price; I have only one thing to say about this; the price was ridiculously low, Mr. Speaker. Many things were bought for ridiculously low prices during the last depression. I shall mention one case, that through which one of the spiritual fathers of my friends the Créditistes, came by his wealth. I shall even name him. I mean Mr. Henri-Georges Grenier who gives a helping hand to my Créditistes friends. On occasion he even writes their speeches—or at least he did. He has quite a propensity for Créditisme.

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I should like to enlighten the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) who has just said that a certain individual writes speeches for the members of the Ralliement Créditiste. I want the house to understand that this Mr. Grenier, has never written my speeches.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, naturally, I have great regard for the word of my friend, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), but a Créditiste member told me what I have just said. I value the word of the hon. member for Abitibi—maybe there are things he does not know—but I also value that of one of his colleagues.

Therefore, I shall conclude by saying that Mr. Grenier—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Champlain is rising on a point of order.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) has suggested a member of the Créditiste party has told him what he has just repeated; being from the riding next to that of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, I fear that some will think that it is the hon. member for Champlain—

Canadian National Railways

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I think that there is no point of order here and I would ask the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) to please limit himself to the motion for third reading of bill No. C-124 now before the house.

Mr. Mongrain: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Nevertheless, the house has probably noticed, that I was answering the remarks of my friend, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont). I listened to him with pleasure and attention, and the proof of it is my reaction. He inspires me, you see. You allowed him to go on; you too seemed to find him interesting. So my remarks are by no means, insulting, and that is all I am going to say.

I wish to tell him one thing of which he is probably unaware. During that same period, the depression, the citizen whose name I mentioned and who was a pioneer of the Social Credit doctrine, had acquired for about $50,000 a sky-scraper of sorts. The price was ridiculous, but those were the depression years. He himself resold it for $190,000 immediately after the end of the depression, and today, you could not get it for $500,000.

I cannot understand all this fuss about the bill before the house. What has this Christina to do with it? It conjures up some nice love-story and brings us a bit of relief after some of the things that we hear in this house.

Mr. Laprise: May I put a question to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières?

Mr. Mongrain: Certainly.

Mr. Laprise: Would the hon. member for Trois-Rivières agree to repeat publicly, in the press, or on a rostrum, the accusation he has brought in this house, where he is covered by his parliamentary immunity.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, have I made an accusation? I feel rather that I have recalled a fact that is not necessarily a crime, far from it. I say that it was a good transaction, that the things were done after such a fashion at the time. Business was transacted like that in private, and it happened often also in the public life. The matter has no connection whatever with this bill. You are quite right to call me to order, Mr. Speaker; I was just trying to entertain the house a bit.

Mr. Caouette: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) rises on a question of privilege.

[Mr. Matte.]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) said a while ago that Mr. Grenier's transaction or transactions at Trois-Rivières could have been made at just about any time. He mentioned that Mr. Grenier had been a Créditiste for many years. I should therefore like to point out to the member that he is misinformed. As a matter of fact, Mr. Grenier has never been a Créditiste. He was promoting social capital and family capital in Trois-Rivières. The former mayor of Trois-Rivières must remember that.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, I see that the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste is not aware of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I believe that honourable members will agree we have somewhat departed from the standing orders of the house and digressed from the consideration of Bill No. C-124.

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Mongrain: You will nevertheless admit, Mr. Speaker, that they were the ones who departed from standing orders and that I merely answered them.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Mongrain: To return to Air Canada—

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Mongrain: I could perhaps sit down and you would then allow them all to rise on questions of privilege. This would pass the time.

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The honourable member for Lotbinière is rising on a question of privilege.

Mr. Fortin: I should like to point out to the Chair that it is not the Créditistes who have departed from standing orders but the honourable member for Trois-Rivières himself. Moreover, he agrees with what you said a while ago to call him to order. I think that he does not talk about the bill because he is scared, because he would have to criticize too much the operation of the Canadian National Railways. Let him talk about the C.N.R.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. There is no question of privilege. Order, please.

Mr. Mongrain: I am not reluctant to talk about it, but my friends will not give me the time to do so. Three, four or even five of them rise on a question of privilege. As there are eight or ten of them, some more will perhaps rise.

The member for Frontenac has set out another idea a moment ago, suggesting to oppose Bill C-124, because Air Canada is squandering $10 million in Winnipeg and that it will be $30 million in a few years. The hon. member seems to forget two things: first, this money is used to help the provincial economy; there is something else besides, which he might not know, but this problem has been of concern to this party for some years. It is about to be solved. If he is willing to wait for a few weeks all his worries will disappear.

I heard part of the speech made by the member for Témiscamingue. I found him interesting, as usual. I always listen to him with interest Mr. Speaker. I feel inspired by him too. He might be right about the service of the C.N.R. in his area. It is possible, I have not been to the Abitibi region, and to Rouyn-Noranda in particular, by train for a long time. I go by car usually and I suspect that my hon. friend does too. He is probably right. However, I have had the opportunity, say in the last five or six years, to make several trips aboard C.N.R. trains in Quebec and in other provinces.

It is rather strange but I did not see the things he did. I will admit that some things are not perfect in the C.N.R., for instance the way employees are treated in some stations, some services. I will also agree with the hon. member that the C.N.R., or the C.P.R. for that matter, has not always been human with the employees and in many cases has been radically inhuman. I will agree with the member any time on that. However, as far as what he said about the service is concerned, I must point out that there is a substantial difference between the service given in Abitibi and Témiscamingue and that on other lines; I noticed it myself and many people have told me the same thing.

Nowadays, contrary to what used to be 20 or 25 years ago, the Canadian National gives an excellent service; it is much better than on the trains of the Canadian Pacific. For example, on a train between Montreal and Ottawa, a perfectly bilingual and very polite conductor gives all sorts of explanations to passengers. I also travelled throughout Canada recently. I do not want to engage in a discussion with the member for Témiscamingue because he may have noticed something which I failed to see. I think that the Canadian National service is to a large extent better than that provided by the Canadian Pacific as the latter gives the impression of trying to discontinue its passenger service as soon as possible.

After what I have just said, I would not like my hon. friends from the Ralliement Créditiste to have a heart attack every time I rise to speak, for I bear them no malice. Those are facts, Mr. Speaker, I have spoken about in a friendly spirit. I would not have brought up the subject had they not done so in the first place. I have nothing more to say, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would have a few—

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is brought to my attention that the hon. member has already participated in the debate and evidently he cannot speak a second time. Does the hon. member for Trois-Rivières wish to accept a question?

Mr. Matte: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. member for Trois-Rivières.

Mr. Mongrain: I am always happy to help my friends to learn something.

Mr. Matte: Would the hon. member for Trois-Rivières tell us whether he was, during his last trip, a passenger aboard a Canadian Pacific train or one of the Canadian National which he has just praised?

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Speaker, our friends of the Ralliement Créditiste are foxy. Last week, on leaving Ottawa, I had the pleasure to travel with my friend aboard the Canadian Pacific. It was a most enjoyable occasion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mongrain: We both had a rather enjoyable conversation. I was glad it happened and I would like it to happen again. However he does not know that I returned to Ottawa with the Canadian National and this is an almost weekly occurrence.

Royal Assent

You see, Mr. Speaker, how much our friends on the other side are in need of information.

[English]

Is it the wish of the house that we proceed to the next order of business in view of the fact that arrangements have been made for royal assent in just a few moments?

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it might meet the wishes of hon. members if we began the next order of business, which is a complicated one, after royal assent has been given, that is, at eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Mongrain.]

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

• (6:00 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions (papers), private bills, public bills.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

PASSPORT APPLICATIONS, JAMES EARL RAY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North) moved:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all applications and/or other documents leading up to the granting of a passport and/or passports to Mr. James Earl Ray, the alleged assassin of Martin Luther King.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is a request for the production of two applications which must have been completed by one James Earl Ray and one or two other people in relation to two Canadian passports which were found in the possession of the accused at the time he was arrested and taken to the United States by the proper authorities.

The first question which might be asked is, why do I feel this information should be forthcoming? I have in my hand an application for the issuance of a passport. As all hon. members will agree, a passport issued to a Canadian citizen arms that individual with identity not only in his own country but, with proper documentation, the right to enter other countries throughout the world. It is a very important document. In certain spy rings documentations are forged, including passports of various countries. Therefore the issuing of a passport to a Canadian citizen is very important because a passport is one of the most important documents issued to any of us during our lifetime.

In examining the application form, which has been very carefully prepared by the department, we find that the information required includes proof of the individual's name, date of birth, identity, place of birth, height, colour of hair and eyes, weight, occupation and visible distinguishing marks. An applicant is also asked about his marital status. If the applicant was not born in Canada he must show proof of Canadian citizenship. A passport is then issued to a Canadian citizen, as I understand it, after he has signed a declaration. A declaration of a guarantor must also be completed. This is usually completed by a person in a certain category—a solicitor, a notary public, a member of parliament or a clergyman. That individual guarantees that the facts disclosed in the application are correct and that he personally knows the applicant. He then takes a solemn declaration in accordance with the law.

I might say for the record that perhaps too many of us do not analyse these documents carefully until a matter such as the one now before us comes to our attention. If the guarantor happened to be a solicitor such as myself the declaration would state: "I, Eldon Mattison Woolliams, declare to the best of my knowledge and belief that the statements made in this application are true."

That is the first point. Whoever made the declaration in respect of the passport application of James Earl Ray must first have declared—and this is a very serious matter—that all the statements made by the applicant were true to the best of his information and belief. In order to make such a declaration one must have knowledge of the applicant. In other words, such a declaration is not made lightly. The person you go to see is generally your solicitor, clergyman or member of parliament, a person you know and who knows you. People in this category make declarations in respect of applicants for passports; they declare that they have known them for a number of years.

An hon. Member: A member of parliament is not included now.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member says that a member of parliament is not included now. He used to be. Some members of parliament, like myself, are also solicitors and we are in a dual capacity. You declare that you have personally known the applicant for a number of years. Two years is the minimum. It used to be much longer. You specify the time you have known the applicant. Usually the declaration is made by somebody who has known the applicant for ten years. After you have sworn that you know the facts contained in the application are true and you have known the applicant for at least two years, you sign the declaration and it is attached to the passport application. A photograph of the applicant is also included in the passport application. The person making the declaration must certify that the photograph is that of the person making the application.

What are the facts in this regard? We are told by the C.B.C. what happened in this case. We were not told by the government because we cannot get this type of information from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). I do not know why we cannot get this type of information from him, but that is the situation. I do not know why he would want to hide it. We cannot get this information from the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith). Perhaps they are so cautious about giving information that even if it is not harmful it is not given to us.

We have not been able to obtain from the government information as to who actually signed the declaration or how many applications were made. But the C.B.C. tells us that two applications were made. We know that the person who obtained these two passports, James Earl Ray, has been charged in the United States with the assassination of Martin Luther King. James Earl Ray is an escapee from a penitentiary in the United States. He entered Canada legally or illegally, and after getting into this country he made an association, female or otherwise. I am certainly passing no judgment so far as she is concerned because I do not think she enters into the picture except in a social way. She knew this person and probably felt sorry for him. We know that many of these fellows can con people. They look like ministers of the cloth, but when you find out their character you realize what they are.

In any event, Mr. Speaker, this man came into Canada and met somebody unknown, also an American. They were probably connected through one of these crime syndicates we have been talking about. The deal was made. This matter is not before our courts. James Earl Ray stands charged in the United States with the assassination of a Nobel prize winner who did a great deal to bring together the two races in that country. There is some suggestion that Ray was merely there as a bluff for somebody else and did not commit the act of which he is charged. However, that will all come out in the trial to be held in the future. I see that he has now changed solicitors. But that is not the complaint I am making, Mr. Speaker. My complaint is that here we have a Canadian or Canadians, two of them, who made a solemn declaration, first that they knew that the facts contained in the application for passport were correct and, second, that they had known this person for two years and knew him to be a Canadian citizen.

When we asked questions of the Solicitor General and the Minister of Justice in respect of this matter we received the same kind of answers as we received in respect of Hal Banks. We now find out that two passports, not one, were involved. We have found this out because you can get more information from the C.B.C. than from this government. It appears, as I say, that two passports were obtained by this man. Section 10 of the act requires a commissioner to take an affidavit to satisfy himself that the deponent's signature is genuine, and then personally to administer the oath to the deponent. It provides for a fine up to $500, and not less than $25. That is in the statute.

It is difficult to obtain information from the Solicitor General or the Minister of Justice. They are great buck-passers. If the question is a little difficult for the Solicitor General to answer, he says it is not within his jurisdiction and is a question for the Minister of Justice, and vice-versa. Sometimes they throw up their hands and say they do not have jurisdiction to deal with the matter. The Minister of Justice is responsible for justice in Canada, but laying charges under the Criminal Code is the function of the attorneys general of the provinces. I will come to grips with that problem in a few moments.

The fact that a crime has allegedly been committed by one or two Canadians with reference to this application is a serious matter. It means that perjury has been committed or a false declaration has been made in contravention of the Criminal Code of Canada. I will read the relevant sections of the Criminal Code in a few moments. I would have thought that the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General, whose function it is to administer justice in this country, would have made sure that the most serious charges were laid in respect of completing an application for a passport, knowing the facts contained therein to be wrong, in order that a gangster of another nation could take advantage of the passport. This is why I have been asking questions about the matter; it is not that I hold any brief for James Earl Ray. People throughout the world had a great deal of sympathy for Martin Luther King. However, I am talking about the administration of justice. This is my great concern, as it is that of most people in the world wherever they may live.

To the service of criminal justice, the great concern of men on earth, we must bring the best and most dedicated talents among us. This is why the responsibility for the administration of justice in this and other countries is supposed to be given to men who rise above party politics. Such men are appointed to this position if they have these qualities to administer the law of the country. Under our system it falls to the party in power to appoint such a man. When a man is appointed to this position he is supposed to devote himself to the welfare of the citizens of the nation and rise above partisan politics. These people we must train and perfect. We must bring out the best in all who serve. The direct impact of police, judges and corrections officers on the well-being of every Canadian increases steadily because we live together to a greater degree than ever before. We cannot afford less than the best. We must engage in a continuing conversation, a free interchange of experience. Effective co-ordination among all agencies is necessary, and research and development should be available for every criminal justice need. Surely, Mr. Speaker, this is the very least we can hope for from a minister of justice.

What is the situation here? I repeat that two declarations were made by two guarantors who swore falsely—they must have—about the facts contained in the passport applications. They could not truthfully say they had known this man for two years because during some of this time he was incarcerated in the United States.

Someone has suggested that a travel agency may have been mixed up in this matter. If travel agencies in Canada are completing such declarations to obtain passports for people, then this is putting a heavy responsibility on the personnel of the Department of the Secretary of State.

Now I should like to come to the reason I want this information. Let me ask this question: How did Ray get the two passports? We know that the people in the passport office are overworked and that there are too few of them. So far as members of parliament are concerned we all agree that the people in the passport office are very helpful when we ask for special privileges for constituents who want the procedure expedited so they may go overseas to visit their relatives. When we submit an application in the morning we often get it back in the evening. The people in the passport office do a tremendous job which they perform with the degree of responsibility one would expect from public servants. But they are overworked; they receive thousands of applications which they do not have time to process properly.

How did James Earl Ray get these two passports, and what about the two false declarations? Who are these people who have not been charged either with perjury or with making a false declaration? These two men have not been charged by those responsible for the administration of justice in this country. I do not think this is a flimsy matter because here we have a man who is charged with taking the life of a Nobel prize winner, a foreigner and a gangster who came to Canada and obtained two Canadian passports. If we are going to take this lightly what will happen to the administration of justice in this nation under this or any other government? Will Canada slowly drift into the carelessness of the United States where lawlessness is rampant rather than the rule of the law, which we respect and which is for the protection of our families? If we relax our rules in this regard we let down the administration of justice.

I read with great interest the article in Maclean's magazine about the great reformer, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He was not in the house very long before being catapulted into the prime minister's chair. He did not bring about any reforms when minister of justice, and I am not criticizing that, but I read the other day that he was a great minister of justice. I suppose he was great because he was silent; at least, we did not know what he was doing. The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has already received acclaim in Maclean's magazine which says that he will be a great reformer—not jam today, jam tomorrow. We have had some great ministers of justice in this nation from the two national parties. I can think of Mr. Lapointe who had the respect of every Canadian of whatever political philosophy, and others such as Mr. Fulton. Whatever we may have thought about them they were men of integrity who wanted to see the law enforced properly.

Why were these charges not laid? The flimsy excuse has been given that one man has been charged under the commissioners of oaths act of the province of Ontario under which people wrongly issuing a passport or signing an application for a passport for a gangster from the United States are fined $25. What is the position of the Department of Justice in this regard? Is it the minister's fault, or whose fault is it? Let us take a serious look at the Criminal Code of Canada. Section 112 reads as follows:

> Everyone commits perjury who, being a witness in a judicial proceeding, with intent to mislead gives false evidence, knowing that the evidence is false.

Such a man is guilty of perjury. Then we have other sections with regard to perjury, false declarations, false affidavits and false oaths under examination for discovery in the presence of officers of the court. Then we have section 113 which reads as follows:

> Everyone who commits perjury is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for 14 years, but if he commits perjury to procure the conviction of a person for an offence punishable by death, he is liable to imprisonment for life.

Of course section 114 will have to be brought up to date but it shows how serious it is to take a false oath when giving evidence at a trial, whether civil or criminal. Perjury is a very serious offence if you make a solemn declaration under oath knowing that your statements are false, and particularly if you induce an officer of some department of the government to do an administrative job such as somebody did for this man. I am not suggesting for one moment that the minister has anything to hide—surely he has not—but I cannot understand why he would not get up and say, we will file those two documents and we will give this information to the opposition, whose function it is to do their job and find out facts from the government. This is all I am doing. It is my responsibility to see that the government is doing its job.

In this case I do not think the government is doing its job and I do not think the minister is doing his job. I know that the minister is a busy man, but once this matter was brought to his attention he should have said, as graciously as I would have thought he would—I have always found him to be a gracious and nice man—certainly we will find these two documents and if there is a need for an investigation we will ask the police to interview these two people or one person, whatever may be the case, with regard to the application. Is there anything to hide? I do not know why the government is frightened with regard to these things, and it is not the only government that has shown such fear; I have seen ministers from other parties do it also.

An hon. Member: I do not think he is afraid.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody has said he does not think the minister is afraid. The hon. member must be an idealist who has just arrived in this place. I have seen it and others have seen it. Let us take a look at some of the other sections of the code. Section 114 reads as follows:

False Statements in Extra-Judicial Proceedings. Everyone who, not being a witness in a judicial proceeding but being permitted, authorized or required by law to make a statement by affidavit, by solemn declaration or orally under oath, makes in such a statement, before a person who is authorized by law to permit it to be made before him, an assertion with respect to a matter of fact, opinion, belief or knowledge, knowing that the assertion is false, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

I am reading now from Crankshaw's Criminal Code of Canada which does not have all the amendments, but the following section is the same. It is a continuation of section 114 and reads as follows:

It will be noted that the offence under s.114 above refers only to "extra-judicial" matters. It is, therefore, distinguishable from an offence under s.112 or 113 which are applicable to "judicial proceedings" as defined by s.99 (c).

This of course means giving evidence in a trial and making a statement you know to be false which leads to a conviction of some kind. If the charge were capital murder the person making such false statement could be committed for life. The section continues:

There is no definition of "extra-judicial" matters but the application of s.114 is restricted to situations where a person—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret I have to interrupt the hon. member to remind him that his time has expired, unless he has the agreement of the house to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

Mr. Woolliams: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker. The section continues:

—(not being a witness in a judicial proceeding) is "permitted, authorized or required by law to make a statement by affidavit, by solemn declaration or orally under oath".

As I see it, that section applies to the making of a solemn declaration that all the facts about the application are known to you and also to the declaration that the applicant has been known to you for at least two years. Whoever completed that declaration in this case told a lie, first, that the facts in the application were true—it is a lie because the fellow was not resident in Canada and was not a citizen—and, second, that he had known the person for at least two years. It is not likely that he did know him for two years, and if he did this only compounds the crime because James Earl Ray had just escaped from a penitentiary.

Section 118 reads as follows:

Signing Pretended Affidavit.

Every one who

(a) signs a writing that purports to be an affidavit or statutory declaration and to have been sworn or declared before him when the writing was not so sworn or declared or when he knows that he has no authority to administer the oath or declaration,

(b) Using Pretended Affidavit.—uses or offers for use any writing purporting to be an affidavit or statutory declaration that he knows was not sworn or declared—

(c) Writing Purporting to be Affidavit.—signs as affiant or declarant a writing that purports to be an affidavit or statutory declaration and to have been sworn or declared by him, as the case may be, when the writing was not so sworn or declared, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.

I have referred to sections 112, 114, 116 and 118 of the Criminal Code and made a differentiation between those sections which apply to persons making false statements under oath or swearing a false oath in connection with judicial matters, and other matters which are not judicial. The latter reference applies to the matter before us. As a member of parliament trying to do a job, I would have hoped that when I asked, that these documents be filed the documents would have been filed. If the documents show two people signed, different people who signed affidavits or declarations, then that is a question for the law officers of this nation, both federal and provincial, to look at in the light of the sections of the code, and lay the appropriate charge. This is the course that should have been adopted, rather than laying a little summary conviction charge under the Commissioner of Oaths Act. If this newspaper article is true, that is what should have been done. I have no information other than would be revealed in the documents, and that is why I am asking this minister now to file the documents so that I may learn the facts. There may be more to this matter than I can see; and if there is, why cannot members learn about it?

We have been told that because the matter is before the courts it is impossible for us to have these documents. We have been told that the matter is sub judice. This rule only means that we should not say anything to prejudice the accused. It is not an umbrella for the government to hide behind, and say that they do not have to disclose these documents. Rules are to be used for the protection of people and are not intended for the government to hide behind. The government should make these documents available so that we can find out the names of the persons involved. Is this going to prejudice the accused? Is it going to prejudice the accused in connection with this particular charge?

These documents should be filed because investigation may reveal that other charges should be laid. Then a member of parliament who is doing his duty, taking his responsibility, could bring the matter to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) who, in turn, could bring it to the attention of the appropriate officers and a proper charge could be laid. I want to ask this question: What is the Minister of Justice hiding? Why does he put me in the position where I have to debate this motion, when he could have merely filed the two documents? When we get an answer to that, we might ascertain the information in these documents.

I want to draw just one analogy, and then I am through. Since there is a new administration in the United States, today I asked the Minister of Justice whether he, through the proper diplomatic channels, would ask the new administration when they take office to review the political or administrative decision in respect of Hal Banks. Certainly this was not a court decision, because the United States court ruled that Mr. Banks should come back to Canada to stand trial on the charge of perjury. In fact, what would have happened when he came back here was that he would have been in the little old penitentiary, waiting for his appeal or serving the three or five year term, whatever it was. When I asked that question of the minister, he said I was learned in the law, and I know he feels he is learned in the law. He said the courts had made a decision in that case. The courts had made a decision, and they made a decision in favour of returning Mr. Banks. However, Mr. Rusk made another kind of decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest the hon. member is now going beyond the terms of the motion now before the house, which is that certain papers relating to a specific case be tabled at this time.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but I am drawing an analogy between the circumstances that existed then and those which exist now, to explain why they will not produce these documents, why they will not give that answer. These circumstances are obvious, but I do not know them now. It is for that reason I want the documents. We know what the newspaper story said, whether it is true or not—that the Democratic party got $100,000. Then Mr. Rusk made an administrative, political decision.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member and ask him to respect the rule which requires hon. members to confine their remarks to matters that are relevant to the motion before the house. The hon. member knows, much better than I do, that this type of motion permits a debate which is limited in scope. The only thing that ought to be discussed at this time is whether or not certain papers should be produced. We should not be discussing the substance of the case behind the documents, but we should limit our discussion to whether the papers should be produced. There is a considerable number of decisions by previous very learned Speakers to this effect. I know the hon. member is quite aware of the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate your confidence in me, Mr. Speaker, when you say I am aware of the rules of debate. These things are interlinked with the reason for the refusal to produce these documents. We have to satisfy the government, either by a sales job to show that they have nothing to fear, or a sales job to show that no matter what they fear they should fulfil their responsibilities. We have to get the facts. However, I shall let the analogy drop at that. As I said, it was an administrative and political decision which was made, so the statement made this afternoon was not correct.

Since I am over my time, may I ask in conclusion: Were two passports issued? Who completed the two applications? Who made the two false declarations? What criminal charges will be laid? What kind of investigation is being made? When will this lengthy investigation end, so the people can be brought to justice? I refer to the people who embarrassed the department so far as the documentation is concerned. This half hour could have been saved if the government had fulfilled its responsibilities. I do not believe—or I would hope—they had nothing to hide. However, even if they did, they have a responsibility to produce these documents.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the officials of the Department of External Affairs intend to give serious consideration to his comments.

On the other hand, the government has nothing to conceal. On the contrary, it wishes to co-operate fully with the law. In fact, the case is pending before the courts and consequently it is sub judice.

It can be expected that during the trial, the documents referred to by the hon. member will be brought before the court. Consequently, they will automatically become public. The hon. member will then have no trouble finding out the details thereof. Therefore, I would ask the hon. member once again to withdraw his motion.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I must apologize now, Mr. Speaker, for the fact that I was born and raised in British Columbia, and lived there all my life except for occasional forays into eastern Canada. As a consequence, I did not have much opportunity to learn the French language. The simultaneous translation system was not functioning from French into English while the hon. gentleman was speaking, so I heard only the last part of his remarks. He seemed to be saying that this matter is before the courts and is therefore sub judice. Eventually, the information will become public. In view of that fact he asked the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) to withdraw his motion. This is the sense of what I got from his remarks.

I am not speaking for the hon. member for Calgary North in this situation, but I believe this is precisely what the president of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) said on November 6 when this matter was raised. The hon. member for Calgary North did not agree, and the matter was transferred for debate. I presume the same answer will now be forthcoming.

There are two or three matters that disturb me about this situation, Mr. Speaker. One is whether or not this case is sub judice. Another is the proposition that was put forward by the hon. member for Calgary North, that on the surface—and there has not been any argument about this to the contrary—there are instances of somebody having signed a passport application as guarantor in a false manner; that there is here an element of somebody having perjured himself or having signed the passport application knowing that his declaration was false. This, Mr. Speaker, at least from what we have been able to find out so far, is factual and correct; certainly no one has argued to the contrary.

That being the case, Mr. Speaker, and since this question has been a matter of public knowledge for some time, it seems to me that the law officers of the crown, or the attorney general of whatever province might have jurisdiction in the case, should have been seeking out the individual or individuals who may have signed such documents in order to lay appropriate charges against them.

If, Mr. Speaker, law officers of the crown or law enforcement agencies are, in effect, going to disregard the possibility that someone might have perjured himself or made a false declaration, thus commiting an illegal act, then all this does is to help bring the law into disrepute, to treat it as nought. Surely if there has been a false declaration and a criminal act committed by whoever signed as guarantor, then such situation should be dealt with as a separate matter by the law enforcement agencies. But to hide under the proposition—as I submit is the situation—that the matter is before the courts is, I think, disregarding the consequence to which I have referred.

I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what exactly is before the courts here. All I know is that this is what the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) said the other day, as reported at page 2481 of Hansard:

> The Minister of Justice has already informed the house that this case, involving a passport application to which my hon. friend has referred, is now before the courts. The matter is therefore sub judice at this time, but we expect that the documents in question will become public knowledge—

—during the court case.

I do not want to enter your field, Mr. Speaker, of making a ruling as to whether or not a matter is before the courts or is sub judice. However, I do submit that if the President of the Treasury Board, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), the government, or the minister's parliamentary secretary, who again just raised the issue whether this case is sub judice, were really serious in their contention, then the President of the Treasury Board should have raised this point the other day, should have made the necessary order, and this debate should not have been permitted to proceed in any manner at all.

In Beauchesne's fourth edition, Mr. Speaker, there are two references in the index to matters being sub judice. One refers to citation 149 and the other to citation 152. I will deal with citation 152 last because I do not think it is the citation that applies; it alludes to references to the commissioner of taxation, the board of railway commissioners, to judges or the judiciary by way of a personal attack upon the individuals holding those offices; it does not make reference to the issue whether or not a certain case is before the courts.

However, Mr. Speaker, citation 149 does make such reference, where it states:

> Besides the prohibitions contained in standing order 35, it has been sanctioned by usage both in England and in Canada, that a member, while speaking, must not:—
> (c) refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending;—

This citation, Mr. Speaker, does, I think, refer to matters that are sub judice. If the government were serious in putting forward a case to show why these documents should not be produced in response to the motion now before us, then the government should have proceeded further and protected the rules of the house by arguing on a point of order that the matter should not be proceeded with in this manner. The mere fact that passing reference only was made to this point, and this not by way of a point of order, is really an admission on the part of the government that they do not have a sub judice argument.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, what we have is simply an over-infection of the secrecy complex that has been so evident during the current parliament. I suggest there has been an overreaction on the part of ministers of the crown to the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), that if there are any cabinet leaks the minister responsible will lose his job; that if there are any conversations conducted by cabinet ministers with members of the press gallery or others concerning internal matters or matters brought before caucus, then heaven help the individual, he will no longer be a cabinet minister. I am sure that the President of the Treasury Board, normally a very generous and helpful minister, is thinking along this line and has interpreted, I submit in a wrong way, the Prime Minister's edict about secrecy. The course adopted does, I submit, reflect this secrecy concept of government, that things that normally should be revealed are not revealed.

I am not going to embark upon a discussion of whether or not we should be secrecy oriented or oriented toward the public disclosure of matters, unless the situation demands otherwise. The fact that the government did not bother to argue the matter procedurally under citation 149 is, I think, an indication of how shallow and shaky is their ground for claiming that this matter is before the courts and sub judice.

The other aspect to which I referred, Mr. Speaker, which was the continued lack of assiduousness in prosecuting or ferreting out individuals who apparently make false declarations, indicates the government's condoning of an act that tends to disregard the full force of the law, and thereby participates in the process of bringing the law into disrepute. After all, Mr. Speaker, if the government does not prosecute persons who make false statements of this kind, then others of like mind who seek to get a passport by false means may be able to do so with impunity, as a result of which our whole process of law would tend to break down. The simple exposure of documents to parliament and to the public would assist immeasurably in promoting proper enforcement of the law.

Before I close my remarks I hope you will permit me to wander slightly outside the rules of debate, since what I am about to talk about does not come precisely within the subject matter of the motion. We have been referring to passports and, in a secondary way, to the passport office. I agree with the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Harkness), that the people in the passport office have an accommodating, friendly, and generous approach toward the public when dealing with passport applications. The members of the office are overworked and do not receive credit for the amount of work they do. That casts certain reflections on the government service, and the appropriate minister might keep this in mind when considering how much money ought to be allocated to the passport office.

To take a case in point, recently, when Hercules aircraft were to fly to Biafra and transport various commodities, the people in the passport office gave friendly and generous help. Because the government could not make up its mind, some of them had to go back to the office in the middle of the night at a moment's notice. They did so willingly, although no doubt with some grumbling after having gone home and settled down for the night. They had the required passports and documents ready in short order, even though barely a moment's notice had been given to them.

I have made these remarks, well aware they may be out of order but aware also of your generosity, sir, and your feelings of humanity toward the public service. I thank Your Honour for permitting me to make these remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

Motion (Mr. Woolliams) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house wish to proceed to the next notice of motion?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Could that stand, Mr. Speaker. May we call it seven o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: The time being seven o'clock I do now leave the chair.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

WAYS AND MEANS

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 20925-1, 21045-1, 22001-1 and the heading thereto, 22002-1 and the heading thereto, 22003-1 and the heading thereto, 26325-1, 40938-1, 42761-1 and the heading thereto, 42762-1 and the heading thereto, 44043-1, 44047-1, 47600-1, 56400-1, and 69315-1 and the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

The Chairman: The text is attached to Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday, October 22, 1968.

Mr. Gray: I am pleased to have the opportunity of presenting the Customs Tariff resolution to this committee. I presume that hon. members have before them, as I have, a copy of the ways and means budget resolution of October 22.

As you will have noted, Mr. Chairman, the tariff resolution is a formidable affair of some 195 pages. I think it is fair to say, however, that the committee's task in examining this massive resolution should be less onerous than might appear at first sight. This is because the first ten sections, comprising 150 pages, represent the reintroduction in this parliament of proposals which were placed before the twenty seventh parliament over a year ago, and which were subjected to detailed examination in committees of that parliament, either the committee of the whole or the finance committee, and in fact have been in force on a provisional basis for some time.

In this connection it will be recalled that in the budget speech of October 22 the Minister of Finance referred to three sets of tariff resolutions which had been tabled by his predecessor in the last parliament, and which he was reintroducing. Probably it would be well for me to repeat, now, part of the explanation which the minister provided then, for it is relevant to this stage of our discussions.

The first set of resolutions involves for the most part what might be described as housekeeping tariff amendments. They were introduced originally in the budget presented on June 1, 1967. They reappear as sections 1, 2 and 3 on pages 4 to 8 in the general resolution before us. I believe the three resolutions just mentioned were considered in the committee of the whole in the last parliament.

The third, and by far the largest, of these sets of resolutions were those tabled on November 6, 1967, implementing Canada's commitments, other than those on chemicals and plastics, under the Kennedy round agreements. The rates set out in these resolutions came into effect on a provisional basis on January 1 of this year. They were referred to the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and after a series of public hearings the committee recommended them to the house for favourable consideration.

Parliament, however, was dissolved before any of these resolutions could be enacted. An order in council was therefore passed on April 25 under authority of section 22 of the Financial Administration Act, continuing in effect the proposed reductions in duty. The Minister of Finance announced at the time that collections of the increases in customs duties proposed on a few imported products were being suspended, but that it was the government's intention to ask the next parliament to enact legislation implementing both the reductions and increases, effective from the dates originally proposed in the resolutions. The resolution now before the committee will, if enacted into law, have this effect.

Those sections of the resolution which begin on page 153 relate to chemicals and plastics. They are new in the sense that they have not previously been before the house, and in that they are to come into force not later than January 1, 1969. As the Minister of Finance pointed out in the budget speech, they flow from the Tariff Board report on chemicals, under reference 120. The first volume of the board's report was tabled in this house in June 1966. The revised volume formed the broad basis for our Kennedy round negotiations on chemicals and plastics.

During the Kennedy round negotiations Canada undertook to introduce the concessions offered on chemicals and plastics not later than July 1. It was not, in fact, possible to implement the proposed new chemical and plastics schedule by that date. Accordingly, it was agreed with our trading partners that Canada could delay putting these concessions into effect until not later than January 1 next. It was also agreed, as an interim measure, that Canada would make reductions in the rates of duty on a number of chemicals and plastics in terms of the present tariff nomenclature. These were made by order in council for the period July 1 to December 31.

As to the tariff structure followed by the board, the industry proposed and the board recommended the adoption of the so-called Brussels nomenclature for most of its new tariff schedule. Both the industry and the board considered it was particularly suitable in a field of such complexity as chemicals and plastics. This nomenclature is used by the major trading countries, with the exception of the United States; it is a system for classifying goods under headings which are grouped into chapters and sections.

An integral part of the Brussels nomenclature are rules and notes which clarify the scope of the various headings. The board recommended that these rules and notes be adapted for Canadian use and that the Customs Tariff provide that the governor in council may prescribe such rules and notes. This is provided for in section 12 of the resolution on page 153.

When the tariff items relating to chemicals and plastics were referred to the Tariff Board for study the board was directed not to make any general changes in preferential margins—for example, in the difference between the British preferential and most favoured nation rates of duty. Generally speaking, at the time the board submitted its report chemicals of a kind produced in Canada were subject to duty at 15 per cent British preferential and 20 per cent most favoured nation, and those not produced at rates of free B.P. and 15 per cent M.F.N. Chemicals moved from the "made in Canada" category to the "not made in Canada" category or vice-versa on the basis of administrative rulings by the Department of National Revenue.

The schedule proposed by the board is very long. On an extensive list of chemicals produced in Canada identified by name, the recommended rates were 10 per cent under the British preferential tariff and 15 per cent under the most favoured nation tariff, with rates of free British preferential and 15 per cent most favoured nation on a number of residual tariff items providing for chemicals not produced in Canada. The structure proposed by the board, particularly with regard to the British preferential tariff, would be less flexible than the present tariff.

As the minister said on October 22, the board's proposals have given rise to many representations urging a less rigid system, and it seemed to the government that both the present flexibility and the results intended by the board could in fact be achieved. Accordingly the resolution proposes that a 10 per cent British preferential duty, instead of the free rate proposed by the board, be established for certain items in chapters 915, 928 and 929 of the schedule beginning on page

155. Under section 11 parliament is being asked to grant authority to the governor in council to lower this duty from time to time. This authority would be similar to that set out in the Customs Act to reduce or remove duties on articles used in Canada manufactures.

A somewhat similar situation exists with regard to certain plastics. Here also, in the light of additional information brought forward after the report on reference 120 was received, the Minister of Finance decided to depart somewhat from the board's recommendations, as was explained in the budget speech, in order to meet representations to the effect that the board's proposals provided no assurance of protection when new products are made in Canada.

I should like to make only three points regarding these modifications. First, they are within the scope of the Kennedy round commitments negotiated at Geneva. Second, they succeed, I think, in meeting in large part criticisms which Canadian chemical producers made about rigidities inherent in the board's original draft schedule. Third, they are consistent with the intent of the board's recommendations.

I referred earlier to the fact that the Kennedy round tariff resolution was examined, and favourably reported on, during the last session of parliament by the standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs. I had the honour of being chairman of that committee during its hearings on these Kennedy round tariff changes. I would like to pay tribute at this time to the members who served on the committee during those hearings, for their serious study of the changes and their courtesy and co-operation at that time.

In its report that committee recommended the subject matter of the resolution to the house, subject to these comments. I should like to inform the house that the government has taken positive action on these suggestions, and I should like to comment briefly on each of them before resuming my seat.

The first comment or recommendation of the committee's report to the house was that great care should be taken in drafting Canadian legislation based on the new international anti-dumping code, and that the anti-dumping bill be referred to the committee. Both parts of this recommendation have been acted upon, and I have no doubt that the house will shortly receive a report on this matter from the standing committee on finance.

The committee's second comment related to non-tariff barriers. Dealing with non-tariff trade barriers is, of course, a long and difficult task but, as recommended, the government has and is intensifying its efforts to deal with and counteract any adverse effects on Canadian trade from present and future barriers of this sort. To this end we have sought and obtained the co-operation and help of Canadian producers and exporters.

In its third comment the committee recommended that close attention be paid to the operation of the adjustment assistance and the machinery programs to see that their aims are in fact being met. I am glad to report to this committee of the house that in respect of each of these programs the record to date appears satisfactory. As regards the adjustment assistance program a matter for particular gratification is that as yet no one has made out a case for assistance on the grounds of serious injury, or the threat of serious injury, as a result of Kennedy round cuts in the Canadian tariff. There is now every reason to expect that it will not be necessary to use the $10 million authorized for direct loans to assist in cases of injury in the current calendar year. On the other hand, a substantial number of applications have been approved, or are under active consideration, relating to technical assistance or loan guarantees in connection with projects to modernize or expand Canadian productive facilities to take advantage of new or enlarged export opportunities.

The machinery program appears to be operating smoothly, and to the general satisfaction of Canadian users and manufacturers of machinery. In view of the concern which was expressed in some quarters last fall about administrative problems inherent in the program, it is remarkable and reassuring that it now seems to be taken almost for granted. The Minister of Finance has informed me that apart from participating as a member of cabinet in the consideration and approval each week of a machinery remission order proposed by his colleague, the Minister of Industry, he now seldom receives comment on the program.

There are, however, two aspects of the program about which I should like to say a word. The first is the matter of appeals, which was discussed at some length by the finance committee in January. Provision was made that recommendations of the machinery and equipment advisory board may be appealed by a dissatisfied party to a review board, which will be set up if and when required. However, to date no requests for such appeals have been received, and consequently no review boards have had to be established.

My other comment relates to the scope of the program, what is included in it and what is excluded. In this connection you will recall that its scope was defined largely in terms of machinery and equipment which formerly were classified under 18 pre-existing tariff items. During the past year the predecessor of the Minister of Finance, the present Minister of Finance and also the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, have received a number of representations regarding the scope of the machinery program, some suggesting that it be expanded to include additional kinds of machinery, and others suggesting that certain products be excluded from it. They decided not to propose any changes at this time. However, it is their intention that the program be reviewed from time to time in the light of developments. Changes may be proposed in some future budget, if deemed desirable in the light of domestic and international considerations.

This concludes my remarks at this stage, Mr. Chairman. If it is your wish to call each of the 20 sections of the resolution individually, I will be glad to add further comments on each section as it is called, either at this stage or later stages of debate, comments on what these tariff changes will mean and have already meant to the positive development of Canada's trade to what I think is the general benefit of our country.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Chairman, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance has outlined the general intent of the resolutions, which deal with certain propositions introduced in the June 1 budget of last year and also on November 30. Fundamentally the meat of the thing concerns the Kennedy round discussions. He mentioned that parliament was dissolved and as a consequence threw the gearing of these things out of kilter. It certainly was dissolved. We find all these things are heaped up. I am quite serious when I say this government is trying to indicate that we are not getting enough business done, but here it is trying to shoulder all this stuff, which goes back to June 1, 1967, into one brief fall session. However, sir, the opposition still has some rights in this house.

I would comment on one other statement the parliamentary secretary made. He was chairman of the committee at that time. He made a very able chairman and I would like to compliment him on his conduct during those committee hearings. Indeed, I think he was the most able chairman with whom I ever served on a committee. But as a consequence of having sat on that committee I am sure he will appreciate that I personally still have some reservations, and I think honestly so.

Having said that, I should like to suggest that as a result of these lengthy committee hearings last January I sincerely hope the Kennedy round adjustments will mean freer trade for Canada, and that trade will not be all one-sided. Canada should not only be importing more from outside; it should be exporting more to other countries.

The parliamentary secretary said that the Kennedy round neglected to take into consideration non-tariff barriers, which to me are most important. Let me give one small example. As I understand it, the United States copyright act is much more severe regarding productions going into the United States than our Copyright Act is in respect of productions coming into Canada. This situation must be considered seriously. My understanding is that the United States copyright act is almost prohibitive, so far as Canadian productions are concerned.

I have not been a member of the committee since it began studying the white paper on anti-dumping, which was produced by the government, but I gather that the proposed anti-dumping amendments will provide less protection to Canadian industry than now exists. At least the evidence points to this situation. The new anti-dumping legislation is not going to protect our industry to the extent it is now protected, and under the conditions which now exist we have cause for complaint.

We have heard certain rumblings, and I assume it is safe to say that is all they are at the moment, from the other side of the border which we must consider of interest in respect of this whole Kennedy round procedure. Other countries and nationalities are interested in this, but in view of our tremendous trade with the United States—and I admit this is a two-way street—we must face the fact that more products come into this country than go to the United States. This is what disturbs me.

It is my hope that when the Kennedy round suggestions are finally implemented we will have greater export trade, or an export trade equal to our import trade. We have heard reports emanating from our great neighbour to the south that the United States will not be happy about the implementation of some of these Kennedy round adjustments. I trust there will not be any retaliation in this area.

It is not my intention to say anything further at this stage. As the parliamentary secretary has said, there are many pages in this budget resolution. I could not deal with them all in detail at this time. We shall wait to see the bill when it is presented. Let me again express my sincere hope and prayer that this measure will accomplish what the Canadian government thinks it will accomplish, although I have some personal reservations.

Mr. Saltsman: On this occasion, Mr. Chairman, looking at the resolution based on the Kennedy round, I think it is appropriate to point out the great opportunities opened to this country as a result of free trade. Let me point out also the great dangers inherent, unless we are prepared to take a number of steps in harmony with trade liberalization.

This party has always favoured a freeing of international trade in the interests not only of this country but those of the international community. We believe that the liberalization of trade will bring the nations of the world closer together, enabling us to join in opportunities in the future. The concern felt on this side of the house under present circumstances arises from the fact that to a very large extent Canadians are not masters in their own houses, so far as industry is concerned. Much of our industry is under United States domination, with the result that we have less opportunity to pursue foreign markets than we might have. The capital and know-how which has come our way from south of the border has not been priceless. This has not been just manna from above, but has been accompanied by serious implications affecting our sovereignty, and our ability to be productive.

When we consider raw materials we must obviously realize there has been little or no problem in the past. The raw materials exported by Canada have generally entered the countries of our major buyers either free of duty or with relatively little duty. In the United States particularly, where many of our raw materials are needed, the situation has been such as to permit the entry of large quantities of our natural resources. This situation will not change very much as a result of the present situation.

Our real difficulty arises because of the nature of secondary manufacturing in this country and our inability to ship these goods around the world. Lower tariffs in themselves will not solve the problem. Nor will free trade in itself provide a solution. This is true particularly because our industry is dominated by international corporations whose purpose is to serve the best interests of the corporate structure, rather than the best interests of this country. This means that even where opportunities exist for export we are not always able to take advantage of them because a corporation may find itself in competition with one of its branches in a foreign country.

The Watkins task force, commissioned by the government to look into this matter of foreign ownership and its effects, has pointed out the very great dangers inherent in foreign ownership of industry. The suggestions it made to the government have not been followed. The task force suggested several things the government has not seen fit to accept.

It might be instructive to look at some of the areas in which we have had either free or liberalized trade, in order to see what has happened under free trade circumstances. One of the areas worth examining is the farm machinery industry. We have had free trade in respect of farm machinery for a long time. What has happened as a result of free trade? Canada was a great manufacturing nation of farm machinery. We had every reason to believe that we could become even greater and that the balance would tip in our favour. Instead of that, over the period in which there has been free trade in farm machinery our exports of farm machinery have been about one-third of our imports. We have not really benefited substantially from free trade. If we look at the figures for 1963 we see that the exports in that year were $104 million as against $293 million for imports.

There was recently a strike at one of the plants of a very large Canadian manufacturer of agricultural equipment. The question involved was that of wage parity. The argument of the company was that it could not meet wage parity with the United States, for a number of reasons. One of the arguments of the company was the lower productivity in Canada. The company commissioned a report by a reputable firm in the west. That report was supposed to document the company's position as to why in this country they could not meet wage parity with the United States.

This was after many, many years of free trade. One would have assumed that the free movement of goods back and forth across the border would have meant that wage parity could have been achieved, because there was no reason for lower productivity in Canada vis-à-vis the United States. If it had been a question of difference in transportation costs, the people involved were quite prepared to accept this as one of the limitations, but the problem went away beyond just the question of transportation costs.

A Canadian who read the report prepared for the company, and their arguments, must have felt enormously depressed because of what companies such as this had done to the Canadian economy. In effect, they had concentrated all their modern plants, their automated plants, in the United States during the free trade period, and they had concentrated all their labour intensive plants in Canada. They were simply saying to Canadians: You will either accept lower wages than those of American workers, or we are not interested in locating our plants in Canada. They were saying, in effect: You must permanently accept a lower standard of living and give us a premium, or we are not prepared to invest further in this country and bring you up to the same level and standard as American workers.

This is a shocking indictment of free trade in the farm machinery industry—and this was a Canadian company. This plainly illustrates how much importance can be attached to the integrity of the owners of such companies. It is a shocking indictment of what happens under free trade. I bring this matter to the attention of hon. gentlemen opposite so they may realize that free trade is not a panacea in itself, that unless we have active government intervention in our economy, unless there are specific guide lines to international corporations in this country, every Canadian will be the loser. Free trade will not automatically give us a higher standard of living or even a more rational structure unless the government makes an effort to ensure that these companies operate in the long term, best interests of Canadians.

If we have to pay a bonus for each of the industries operating under free trade, the liberalization of trade will prove to be a disaster to this country. If we stop and think about it for a moment, we will understand why they are exacting this bonus. When an investor has a choice of obtaining a return in his own country as against a similar return in another country, even assuming that both countries have stable governments, are politically compatible and their laws are reasonable, he asks for a premium to move outside his own area of political jurisdiction. Since much of this industry is becoming more and more oriented to the United States market and to the needs of American corporations, that premium will be asked of every industry in this country operating under free trade, if left to its own devices.

Let us look at the oil industry. It is sometimes pointed out that the rationalization of the oil industry in the west has been of great benefit to Canada. I think some doubt must be expressed about just how beneficial it has been. We are still a net importer of oil. Much of our productive capacity is running away below its potential. In some areas this industry is running at about 35 per cent of the capacity of our wells. We are still importing oil, rather than having our wells operate at the volume at which they are capable.

An arrangement has been made between Canada and the United States for the movement of oil back and forth across the border, but this arrangement has been largely dictated by the needs of the international oil companies to suit their purposes and their interests, and to some extent to suit the foreign policy interests of the United States rather than the specific interests of Canada. It is my understanding that in respect of the policy we now have regarding oil there was some very substantial, behind-the-scenes arm twisting. This was during the period of office of a Conservative government. I understand that we obtained whatever arrangements we have at the moment only by threatening to build a pipe line to Montreal. The threat of building a pipe line to Montreal and taking Canadian oil at that point was one of the ways in which we got the oil companies to give us larger entry quotas into the United States. But even those entry quotas into the United States carried a price tag on them. We then had to take offshore oil, under agreed conditions, at the port of Montreal. Despite the precarious nature of these arrangements we still have a deficit in trade in respect of oil, of all things.

Let us consider another product with regard to which Canada is supposed to have an enormous advantage in terms of production. I refer to nickel. Recently there has been a shortage of nickel, which has affected foreign as well as domestic users. Our domestic producers were not able to get enough nickel for their own use. At that time increased shipments of nickel were being made out of the country in raw form. It was quite apparent—and there is on the record a statement to this effect by the then minister of trade and commerce—that the needs of the foreign buyer for raw material would be met first before the needs of the Canadian manufacturer; that this was really the No. 1 priority of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

In the long run this policy has meant we have been condemned to be sellers of raw material and to be obligated to deliver raw material rather than develop in this country our own secondary industry. What I have said about nickel is probably equally true of copper in periods of shortage. I believe the time has come when with regard to products of this type the Canadian government must establish priorities and stabilize prices for our industry, in order to stimulate and encourage them in the secondary processes of raw materials. Under free trade this will not happen.

In recent years, since the introduction of the Canada-U.S. auto agreement, the government has taken great pride in pointing out the increased export of automobiles and parts to the United States under that agreement. Yet in this area also, while admitting there has been some improvement in the balance of trade in respect of automobiles and automobile parts, progress has not really been very rapid. Many of the advantages that we hoped to gain from this agreement have not been fully realized. Consumer prices and production facilities have not increased as rapidly as they should have, and we had every reason to believe that both of those things should have happened. I believe there are reports in the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which indicate that under this agreement productivity in Canada is as high as in the United States. Again there is a tremendous resistance on the part of the automobile companies, which are almost entirely American, to grant wage parity in Canada; and even if this were done, the fact that the value of our dollar is somewhat lower than the value of the U.S. dollar indicates that we are a long way from wage parity with our U.S. neighbour.

With regard to trade with the United States, we find that according to the 1967 figures respecting motor vehicles and parts we still have an imbalance of trade with that country amounting to almost half a million dollars. This is an enormous imbalance of trade, and although it is somewhat better than it was a few years ago we are a long way away from reaching the objectives which we felt we were entitled to reach. The difficulty in the Canadian economy is that so much of the development that goes on in this country is designed to meet the best needs of international corporations, usually U.S. corporations, rather than the best needs of the Canadian people. I believe we have a right to say to these companies: We are happy to have you in this country and we think there are opportunities, but there are opportunities for us as well; we believe you can do well but you have to recognize our best interests at the same time as you are here making your profits. Surely this is not too much to ask. Yet when we take a look at the range of government policies, there is very little in them to move industry in this direction.

A while ago there was some talk of voluntary guide lines. At the same time it was said they would be completely useless. There was also some talk of perhaps improving those guide lines, but to what extent we do not know. Yet I believe we should not be talking in vague generalities about guide lines. This government should know what the needs of the Canadian people are, they should know what the problems are—everybody else seems to—and they should insist that we get the best arrangements possible to fulfil the needs of this country. Free trade could very well result in the loss of industry or the slowing down of industrial development in this country. It is unfortunate but true that much of the industrial development that has taken place in this country has taken place because of the tariff structure. Whatever can be said about the tariff structure, it still must be said that it has had the effect of inducing some industrial development that might not have taken place otherwise. This is not to argue for the retention of the tariff structure which I think runs counter to modern thought and the long term needs of the country, but it is to point out that that tariff structure did serve some purpose and its removal could create grave dangers.

Recently I received a letter from an industry in my area which had anticipated that certain manufacturing facilities would be set up in this country. Following the conclusion of the Kennedy round and the implementation of legislation flowing from it, that industry which spoke of locating here does not now think it is necessary to do so. It believes now that it would be just as easy for them to ship from their head office in the United States.

Free trade in itself is not an answer, and I believe Canada needs what the Watkins report called a new national policy. There was a national policy in this country years and years ago, and whatever its defects may have been it did serve to create this nation and to form the general outlines of Canada. I should like to read from the Watkins report what it has to say about a national policy:

> The old National Policy served Canada in its day, as an instrument of nation-building and a means of facilitating economic growth. The challenges have changed and a new National Policy is required. The nation has been built, but its sovereignty must be protected and its independence maintained. A diversified economy has been created, but its efficiency must be improved and its capacity for autonomous growth increased.

What should those new instruments of national policy be? One of them, as suggested by the Watkins report, is a Canada development corporation, a corporation owned by the people of Canada that would step in to fill the void that exists in many areas and would ensure that much of the future growth and development of this country is in Canadian hands. The Watkins report called for a state trading agency to ensure that we do not lose sales to overseas countries because of United States policy, and of extraterritorial procedures of the United States.

We really do have a state trading company now in Canada, but it is not being used for that purpose. I think the Canadian Commercial Corporation could really do the job if it were given proper terms of reference. We have to be more willing to use crown corporations, to make up for the deficiencies of international corporations, and to challenge these corporations when they do not act in the best interests of this country. We should use adjustments boards to try to rationalize much of the industry in this country that finds itself in difficulties. Some of the industry that will be hurt will not be able to reorganize itself on an individual basis. It may be that these individual companies may have to be organized within the framework of the entire industry, and assistance and encouragement would have to be given to an industry to develop a more rational and efficient structure than is the case at present.

But above everything else, Mr. Chairman, this country must have full employment policies. Unless there are full employment policies, the adjustment will be difficult and crucial, particularly so in some areas of Canada that are now suffering higher than average unemployment. Under full employment many possibilities exist and the stresses and strains of moving into modern ways, of accepting the challenges that are inherent in freer trade, can be met. But when you have higher than necessary unemployment as exists in this country, free trade might have the effect of exacerabting the situation. Therefore, I think it is equally incumbent upon the government, when it is talking free trade and introducing resolutions regarding free trade, to indicate to us that they will introduce full employment policies.

It is difficult to ask for this kind of commitment from the parliamentary secretary, particularly so when the Minister of Finance has recently brought in a budget that negates any attempt at full employment. The minister's budget, in the face of this resolution, has been a disaster. It is as though he had no idea that such a thing as free trade were going on; it is as though he had no idea of the problems that might be created under free trade conditions; as though he closed his eyes and turned his back on the problem before him.

However, this House of Commons will during the debates in the coming days try to focus the nation's attention on this problem, and to indicate that while we welcome the increased opportunity for reduction of tariffs around the world, we are very much aware of the other policies that must be concurrent with such liberalization of trade. We intend to press for such policies.

Mr. Perrault: When we are engaged in a discussion of trade policies and tariff policies, Mr. Chairman, I think perhaps it is appropriate to say something about the immense trading potential which exists in the Pacific rim nations. Those of us who come from British Columbia, owe a great deal of our prosperity to our bourgeoning trade with Japan and other nations in the Pacific. We are perhaps, more conscious of the growing potential of trade with the Pacific rim nations than are the people of some other provinces in this country. We are aware of the vast potential, and we want to remind other people in Canada that while trade with the United States is very important, and while trade with Europe is very important, while it is appropriate to discuss matters such as the ultimate creation of a North Atlantic free trade area, we must not forget the great potential of the Pacific. We must adopt progressive trade policies in respect of nations occupying positions on that vast rim, a rim which contains nations which represent trading potential even greater than that of Europe.

I know there are Canadians concerned with the competitive aspects of trade with nations like Japan, but in the view of most people who live in western Canada-British Columbia, Saskatchewan and Alberta—a vigorous effort should be made to develop even greater two-way trade with Japan and other Pacific nations. Canadian-Japanese two way trade may pass the $1,000 million mark this year. It appears inevitable, and this may come as a surprise to some members, that it will be only a few years before Japan replaces Great Britain as our second largest trading partner.

We in western Canada have found an outlet for many of our mineral products in the booming Japanese market. Yet, at the same time, we are aware of the fact that we have no monopoly on that Japanese market. While, we can congratulate ourselves on the great two way trade in which Canada and the Japanese nation are now engaged, we, as Canadians, must be concerned about the future of that trade. There are some Canadians who believe that Japanese trade holds out a great threat to Canadian jobs and the economy of our country. But I would remind this house, Mr. Chairman, that not only have exports to Japan been continuously growing to the benefit of British Columbia, Alberta and the western provinces—yes, and to the east as well—but they have always exceeded our imports from Japan by the rate of about three to two.

Reviewing these exports we find that grains, especially wheat and foodstuffs, make up one third of the total. Metals and metallic minerals, with copper ore leading, and uranium, the most important newcomer, make up one quarter; and lumber and pulp and paper make up a further sixth. Thus, these commodities form 75 per cent of our exports. It is interesting to note that included in the remaining 25 per cent are manufactured goods such as machinery, books and pharmaceutical products. Potash for fertilizer, which is important to our friends in Saskatchewan, is already an addition to our list of exports, and oil is another important product.

The statement has been made that since Canada's exports to Japan are predominantly raw materials, with wheat the largest single item, few jobs are created by this trade. Some of us in the west have attempted to contradict this sort of propaganda with respect to Japanese trade which comes from some other parts of Canada. This restricted view of Japanese trade and jobs may be true —as far as it goes, but it hides much of the job-creating effect of, for example, agricultural production. The actual sowing and reaping of wheat may require the labour of relatively few people, but wheat production requires materials produced in many other industries which give rise to further employment. For example it requires machinery for preparing the ground, sowing the seed, cutting and threshing the crop.

Wheat production also requires the use of fertilizer, transportation and storage as well as the use of banking facilities. Labour is needed to supply each of these factors and, to go back one stage further in the process of production, more labour is required to build the factories to manufacture the machines, and so on. Thus the total labour, direct and indirect, needed for wheat production is considerable, when the labour required at each stage is added up. A recent survey placed at over 75,000 the number of Canadians directly required to produce the whole of Canada's exports to Japan. And there are many other jobs associated indirectly with this valuable trade.

We in western Canada want all Canadians to know what this developing trade has meant to us in terms of prosperity. One of the reasons the west is one of Canada's most rapidly growing regions is because we have always had an open attitude toward trade. When we hear people in this house talk in terms of high tariffs and protectionism, adopting the attitude that we cannot lower tariff barriers because somehow it may endanger our economic security, we in the west simply say we have been competing in world markets for years. We have been selling our goods in non-protected world markets while we have had to buy many of our manufactured products from tariff-protected eastern industries. Let me assure you that in the process we have been competing very successfully, and we are doing very well.

Most people in western Canada, regardless of political party, now believe that Canadian technology, Canadian ingenuity and Canadian inventiveness have reached the stage when we can compete very successfully with many of the so-called sophisticated economies in this world. When we hear people in this House of Commons say: "Be careful about touching those tariff barriers; it may endanger jobs", we tell them, Mr. Chairman, that one way to become more competitive and to provide larger incomes for our people is by realizing the economies of scale that are possible only if we have larger markets in which to sell Canadian products. That is the key. If Canadian industry is able to sell in world markets expanded because tariff barriers are not as high as they are at the present time, we will have longer production runs and more productivity per worker. This is one way to increase the incomes of the people of this country.

While long term contracts and joint financing provided by the Japanese have been responsible in large measure for the prosperity of British Columbia's mining industry and other industries in western Canada, Canada is not the only source of raw materials. This, Mr. Chairman, is a fact that we in this house and the people of the country must realize.

For example, Mr. Chairman, there are significant developments in Australia. That country now provides 40 per cent of Japanese coal requirements, while Canada provides 5 per cent—although the new coal contracts will improve our share of this market. Although Canada represents a large potential source of iron ore for Japanese industry, we have no automatic market there. Some people think we have. India, Chile, Malaysia, Peru and Australia are major suppliers. India supplies 21 per cent, Chile 16.9 per cent, Malaysia 11 per cent, Peru 9 per cent and Australia 7 per cent. In the year 1966, the last available figure, Canada supplied only 3.4 per cent.

The immediate future, Mr. Chairman, is one of increased competition for this country in regard to Japanese trade, perhaps a smaller proportion of the market between now and 1975, from 1.9 million tons of iron ore this year to 1.4 million tons seven years from now. Competition will become tougher because our rivals are investing in handling equipment and port facilities that can accommodate the new generation of mammoth ocean freighters.

It is to be hoped, Mr. Chairman, that the government will continue to accelerate its efforts to improve ports in western Canada in order to help not only this nation but especially the products of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia to find easier and more efficient access to markets in the Pacific.

Canada is in a position, Mr. Chairman, to sell larger amounts of copper and other minerals to the Japanese market. Today the two commonwealth countries of Canada and Australia supply about one third of Japan's need for copper concentrate. Again, Mr. Chairman, competition looms in the form of Chile and the Philippines.

The point is that the Japanese market is vitally important to all Canadians. Many products that the Japanese have been able to purchase from Canada have been the result of two way trade. Yes, and they have spent money in Ontario and Quebec buying sophisticated equipment of various types. Some of the equipment has been computer equipment. All sorts of materials are being purchased in Ontario and Quebec with the dollars earned by the Japanese through their sales to Canada. That is why western Canadians say that this trade is vital to all of Canada.

Although the Japanese market is important to all Canadians, Mr. Chairman, it cannot be taken for granted; and neither can trade with the rest of this vast Pacific market. Early this year a group of economists met at Tokyo to discuss Pacific trade and development. Papers were presented by Japanese, American, Australian and New Zealand representatives, each of whom set out the role and objectives of their respective countries in the matter of developing Pacific trade. At this conference Canada was represented by three outstanding economists, one of them from Carleton University here in Ottawa. They were the well known Harry Johnson; Ted English of Carleton and Bruce Aitkinson of the University of Alberta. Conferences of this kind can be of immense importance to Canada, Mr. Chairman, and are deserving of the close attention and co-operation of this government.

In western Canada, Mr. Chairman, we believe that we should not divert all our attention to the north Atlantic free trade concept, or the North America free trade concept or the Caribbean area free trade concept when we talk of increasing our trade. Let us not merely send delegations down to South America, as important as those delegations are. Let us send a team of government representatives and representatives from the western and eastern provinces to make a tour of the Pacific rim. Let us send people from Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and B.C. to find out what kind of potential exists there for trade with Canada.

Under discussion at the Toyko conference—some hon. members know about this—was the possibility of at least an informal Pacific free trade area, a free trade area with vast implications for Canadians. At the January conference our Canadian representatives presented, in part, arguments that the Pacific area is one of the great potential areas for the Canada of tomorrow; and our representatives found some arguments in favour of this informal free trade concept.

Any Pacific free trade area, at least in the immediate future, would at first involve Canada, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and the United States. This would be the nucleus. Let us not back away from this concept. Let us not say that somehow it will endanger our sovereignty or that it will destroy Canadian industry. Let us not adopt these introverted, narrow, tunnel vision concepts of trade.

In the kind of world in which we live today, Mr. Chairman, there is no point in scowling at the rest of the world, in saying that we will keep tariff barriers so high that we cannot even see over them. The world is becoming smaller and smaller. It is a world where interdependence will be the key to the future. We have to develop interdependence with the nations that rim the Pacific. They must not be regarded as mysterious lands that have no potential for the products that we in Canada produce. We must not regard it as an area that can take only our basic raw materials, because I do not believe that Canadians want to be hewers of wood and drawers of water exclusively. We are in a position not only to provide raw materials of all kinds from all parts of the nation; we are also in a position to produce sophisticated equipment and the products of secondary industry. We should develop our secondary industry and accelerate exports of them as much as possible.

Canadians, Mr. Chairman, are going to become more and more familiar with the progressive, industrial giant that is modern Japan. We are going to become more and more familiar, I hope, with the potential of the Pacific. Taking Japan as an example, no other country points the way so strongly to the great opportunities for Canadian trade in the Pacific area. No other country has developed greater initiative toward freer trade in the whole Pacific area. We should joyously and generously enter into discussions to find out how to promote that trade to our mutual benefit.

Mr. McIntosh: First of all, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few remarks in connection with the closing statement made by the parliamentary secretary when he spoke about these tariff changes. I do not have his remarks word for word but, paraphrasing them, he said that these amendments would benefit this country.

As a representative from western Canada and of the prairie farmers, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister a question, and in doing so I draw his attention to the item on page 6 that reads as follows:

> Machines and tools, including blades, loaders, rippers, rakes and related operating and controlling gear; all the foregoing for use on internal combustion tractors entitled to entry under tariff item 40938-1:—

Why are these items taken off the free list and now made subject to British preferential tariff of 2½ per cent, most favoured nation tariff of 15 per cent and general tariff of 35 per cent?

The suggestion made by the two previous speakers in connection with the free entry into Canada of farm machinery is, as far as I am concerned, a joke, and it has been a joke for a number of years. I say that for this reason—and I am going to make a plea to the parliamentary secretary tonight to change the situation that has developed.

There are many members perhaps, Mr. Chairman, who do not realize that it is the responsibility of the Department of Finance to insert these tariff items into the resolution. However, once inserted the interpretation of the items is for the officials of the revenue department. To try to get these two together is an almost impossible task.

While the parliamentary secretary is looking up that item and getting ready to answer me I wish to say something more about the remarks of the hon. member for Waterloo with regard to free trade and farm machinery. I take it he did not approve of it. He seemed to object of it, saying it was not in the best interests of the country. I wonder if his prairie colleagues in the N.D.P. will support that statement when they go back to their constituencies. I hope they will rise and explain their stand on this issue when they have an opportunity.

I never thought I should agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour but tonight, for the first time, I think he spoke some sort of sense.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McIntosh: I commend hon. members of this house to read his speech and see what he said about the results of producing wheat. I agree 100 per cent with him. As he gains experience his performance in this house will improve.

The old number of the item I am referring to is 409(f) in schedule A. For some reason or other the numbers have been changed and the new item number is 42711-1, found on page 6. There is one change in the new wording where it says, "internal combustion tractors". I do not know why those words were inserted, since I presume all tractors are tractors powered by internal combustion engines.

I wish to refer the parliamentary secretary to three remarks the Minister of Finance made on October 22 when introducing these amendments. On page 1690 of Hansard for October 22 he said:

> —the governor in council be given authority to waive, reduce or restore these duties. This procedure will permit a shortening of the list of statutory tariff items in the plastics schedule.

On page 1692 the minister said:

> What I am proposing would be the fairest and best, all things considered, including the desirability of not adding to the rate of increase of prices and costs of production.

I do not think that statement is meant to apply directly to agricultural machinery, yet I assume the minister intends that the same principles shall apply to this industry, because agriculture is an industry.

I know I read those statements out of context. When the minister made those three statements I have just referred to he was referring to chemicals and plastics, as the parliamentary secretary said a few moments ago. I submit that the principles enunciated there should apply to agriculture, as well as to any other industry. The principles listed are, first, the one to do with regard to the desirability of not adding to the rate of increase of prices and cost of production and, two, the one covered by the words, "This procedure will permit a shortening of the list of statutory tariff items...".

One of three principles that has been recognized by the parliament of Canada for many years is that farm machinery or equipment should enter this country free of customs duty and excise taxes. I should like the support of hon. members from the prairies on this matter. I ask the government and the parliamentary secretary whether the government intends to follow this premise; will it allow farm machinery or equipment to be used on farms free entry into Canada. Most farmers, and I am sure most hon. members in this house, believe that the provision for such an intention of parliament has been provided for under schedule A, which I referred to a few moments ago.

Among other items in schedule A is found this wording:

> All other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery, n.o.p.

For the benefit of hon. members who do not know the meaning of those letters, they stand for the words, "not otherwise provided". I take it that that ought to cover all agricultural machinery and implements not provided in the foregoing—and there is a great big list here.

Officials in the Department of National Revenue for some reason do not agree with this interpretation. They have power to impose duty on those items, which I am sure parliament intended to allow in duty free. The difficulty or controversy arises from the interpretation of two expressions, the first of which is "agricultural machinery", and the other "agricultural implements".

I think most of us will admit that in this day and age there is not one piece of machinery, or any one implement that is used on the farm that could not be used for some other purpose, if the need arises. This is the point that the officials seem to be trying to stress. When an application is submitted to them, the officials challenge the entry of the item that is applied for on the grounds that it could be used for some other purpose. They do not allow it to enter duty free.

I ask, does the minister believe in the principles he enunciated in the three statements I referred to a few moments ago? Does he believe in the desirability of not adding to the rate of increase of prices and cost of production, and the shortening of the list of statutory tariff items? I suggest to the parliamentary secretary that both the minister's principles would be served and justice to the farmer would be served if there were a slight change in the wording of the tariff I have referred to. I suggest that where the wording now is, "agricultural implements" and "agricultural machinery, n.o.p.", it ought to be changed to read, "all equipment, apparatus, machines and implements for agricultural use".

If the parliamentary secretary will agree to that change I shall sit down and save the time of the committee. Otherwise I shall continue with my remarks. Perhaps the parliamentary secretary might indicate now whether he accepts my suggestion.

Mr. Gray: Perhaps the hon. member may wish to continue after he hears what I am about to say. Though I understand the motives behind his suggestions I am not in a position personally to accept his proposal. First of all I think the item he referred to in the proposed Customs Tariff and the preceding item are linked with our Kennedy round negotiations, and the agreement that came out of those international negotiations. Though my hon. friend's aims are certainly desirable, the changing in the wording he has in mind would not be consistent with the agreements with which we are involved.

My friend was asking about item 42711-1, if I am not mistaken?

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. McIntosh: Yes, number 42711-1.

Mr. Gray: This is a new item providing for rates of 2½ per cent British preferential, and 15 per cent M.F.N. for the front end loaders which are being excluded from item 40938-1, the preceding item. With the coming into effect on January 1, 1968, of the new machinery program provided for under item 42700-1, item 42611-1 is being deleted, so that these machines will be dutiable under the proposed item 42700-1 at the same rates but subject to remission in appropriate circumstances. Item 42711-1 thus merely ensured that for the period June 2 to December 31, 1967, inclusive, front-end loaders were dutiable at machinery program rates rather than at 10 per cent B.P. and 22½ per cent M.F.N.

Mr. McIntosh: I am sure the explanation given by the parliamentary secretary will not be looked on with favour by the farmers of Canada. This is not a new item. The piece of paper I have in my hand is over 20 years old, and farm machinery was allowed duty-free into Canada at that time. However, there will be plenty of time in which to continue this discussion. I am more than ever convinced that I have to try to impress on the government and on members of this house the need to get this one item changed under 409F, or at least to get some definition of the terms used upon which everyone will agree.

Am I right in my assumption that it was, and is, parliament's intention that agricultural machinery and implements intended for farm use be allowed into Canada duty free? I contend I am right in making such an assumption. I shall refer again to schedule A. I have read the item which refers to agricultural implements and machinery. For many years the people of this country assumed there was no difficulty whatsoever about getting agricultural implements into Canada duty free. I say it was the intention of parliament in those days that they should be admitted duty free, and that this intention has not changed.

I will refer the committee to items 409N 409-O and 409-Q. These items all refer to goods which are allowed entry into Canada free of excise tax and customs duty. Item 409-O refers to equipment for generating electric power when used for farm purposes only. Item 409-Q deals with auxiliary and internal combustion engines when attached to agricultural implements or machinery. Another in this group of items refers to electrical motors incorporated in or attached to agricultural implements or machinery. These items were not normally recognized as equipment or apparatus designed for farm purposes, or at least this was not the case when they were first placed on the schedule. But the articles mentioned were allowed free entry when used for agricultural purposes. I submit this establishes that the intention of parliament was that agricultural machinery or implements for farm use should be allowed free entry. On the basis of these examples it would seem to me that the intent of parliament was obvious; it was to assist farmers to keep down their cost of production so that they could compete in world markets. I believe this is still the intent of parliament today, but it is not recognized by the civil servants.

In case the minister or the parliamentary secretary should charge us with failure to make representations to the government on this matter at an earlier stage, let me point out that this issue has been raised on several occasions. It was last raised, to my knowledge, by the hon. member for Mackenzie, and I should like to put on record some of the remarks he made in the course of a discussion similar to the one upon which we are engaged tonight. They are to be found in Hansard—

Mr. Gray: Could I ask the hon. member a question? Can he indicate to me and to the committee where the items to which he is referring appear in the resolution before us?

Mr. McIntosh: Yes. This concerns the excise tax pertaining to farm machinery. I drew attention to the reference on page six to machinery and tools which are allowed free entry. The hon. gentleman has received a note, as is usually the case, from his officials. I shall refer to these letters and notes in a few moments and I do not think the hon. gentleman will like what I have to say. I am referring to the excise tax, which is being amended right now.

Mr. Gray: If I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, I think we are attempting to amend the Customs Tariff. We are not dealing with excise taxes at the moment. I was about to raise this point even before any matters were brought to my attention. I wanted to indicate to the hon. member that the section of the resolution with which we are dealing at the present time was considered and, I believe, passed by a committee of the whole of the previous parliament on December 14. I made some remarks connecting this resolution with the Kennedy round. Perhaps I might amend them by saying that the new machinery item 42700-1, which is related to one the hon. member originally asked me about, is part of the Kennedy round parcel, and that is why I atempted to suggest it would be difficult to consider at this time the specific point he was raising.

I should like to ask the guidance of the Chair as to whether we are in a position to discuss specific items which are not actually part of the resolution before the committee.

The Chairman: I would think not, but my impression was that the hon. member was talking about item 42711-1. I may be wrong, I thought it was perhaps by a slip of the tongue that he referred to the excise tax, and that he meant to say "customs tariff". Possibly the hon. member would like to clarify the matter.

Mr. McIntosh: I do not know what figures are being used, because they have all been changed. I intend to refer to the provisions of what is known as 409F. If the parliamentary secretary wishes to translate that into the new numbers, that is all right with me. If he thinks I am going astray, that is still all right with me. But the tariff is being changed right now and I am making the suggestion that while this is in process the Department of Finance should clarify what it is doing in making these changes. The Department of Finance puts these items in, and God knows who will be able to interpret them afterwards. The Department of National Revenue cannot do so. The Tariff Appeal Board cannot do so. When cases go before the courts, the judges have a heck of a time interpreting what is meant.

From time to time when discussing definitions in this house we have suggested that the Department of Finance recommend one dictionary that it will use, if there is dispute about any change in a word or about interpretation of a word. The department has refused to do that. When it is making these tariff changes I want those responsible to spell out what they mean by "agricultural machinery" and "agricultural implements" and, Mr. Chairman, I intend to stay on my feet until I get them to do that.

The parliamentary secretary was talking about the intention of parliament and about the idea that farm machinery and farm equipment are allowed into Canada free of tariff and excise tax. This is an erroneous statement, because as a consequence of the efforts of civil servants in the Department of National Revenue very few pieces of this machinery or equipment come into Canada free of tariff and excise tax.

As I said before, many representations have been made to the department. Recommendations have even been made by members of the Tariff Board that this entry be changed, but there has been no action from the Department of Finance.

I refer to the speech made by the hon. member for Mackenzie on July 30, 1963, as recorded at page 2813 of Hansard when he said:

> The minister is saying that this is a complicated procedure—

Just like the parliamentary secretary is trying to do right now.

> —through which we have to go before we can get an exemption. I recall, for example, that during the war the procedure was very simple. Eaton's and Simpson's had a blank form in their mail order catalogue and all you had to do was fill out the form to indicate that you were a farmer and that the particular item you were buying was for farm purposes. This was all that was required during the time of war. This method was devised by people who were getting a dollar a year. Now, however, we find this is an extremely complicated problem and the matter cannot be looked at for another year. This does not make sense.

That was five years ago, but no change has been made by the Department of Finance. I think it is high time that the government told farmers that it is not interested in lowering the costs of production of farm produce. In fact we have an example here—blame it on the Kennedy round if you wish—where the costs of production are going to be increased by the amount of the increase suggested here tonight.

My second argument that this item should be changed comes from the question, why does the government impose customs duty and excise tax on items to be imported? The obvious answer is additional revenue for the federal treasury and, more particularly, the protection of industry. I ask protection of what industry? Surely it is not just the manufacturing industry of eastern Canada? Surely the minister was not just referring to the manufacturing industry when he said he was desirous of keeping costs of production down? Knowing the minister as I know him, I am certain he had the agricultural industry in mind also when he made that statement.

As all hon. members know, both eastern and western agriculture are going through very difficult times. In fact so far as western agriculture is concerned it could be said that this industry is going through a transitional period, and the need for government protection and action is evident now, possibly more so than ever before. Evidence of eastern agricultural problems was demonstrated a short time ago when eastern farmers marched on Ottawa. I hope, as I said before, that eastern members representing rural ridings in this house will support my plea with reference to a change in this item.

Western agriculture is suffering from lack of markets for grain. It is facing the necessity of producing more competitive grades of wheat, and it is also facing the problem of increasing costs of production. By parliament today not recognizing the intent of the term, "all other agricultural implements or agricultural machinery n.o.p." we are contributing to an increase in the costs of farm produce.

Some will say, and rightly so, that the farmer has recourse from a denial by civil servants of free entry, by appealing to the Tariff Board. An action of this type is costly and in many cases more than the individual farmer can afford. As a result he pays the tax, as the civil servant expects he will. I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary that in the event a farmer won his appeal to the board, if the civil servant responsible for forcing the appeal in the first place were assessed the costs, then more farmers would receive the justice to which they are entitled under the laws of our country, and we would be following the intent of parliament when it inserted this one item in schedule A.

If there were any doubt in the mind of the person whose duty it is to decide whether a machine or implement is to be used for agricultural purposes, an end user's certificate could be requested. However such a proposal has never been accepted, to my knowledge, by the departmental officials. At least all my efforts in that direction have been fruitless.

The principal behind such a proposal is the same as that applied by the Saskatchewan government in the use of purple gasoline. If it is used for farm operations it is not taxable. If it is used for any purpose other than farm operations the violator is prosecuted. I would suggest that the same thing should apply here. If anyone gets away with importing machinery or implements under the guise of their being used for agricultural purposes, then it is up to the government to prosecute that person if he does not use them for those purposes.

If the minister will not accept the suggestion to change the wording of the item in question, then I ask that he arrange acceptance of an end user's certificate, stating the machine or implement applied for free importation is for farm use only, and if found being used for other purposes the violator should be prosecuted.

My third reason for requesting the minister to change the wording deals with the difficulty encountered in interpretation of the present two phrases. I think the minister will agree that if the term in the bill cannot be defined, then it is serving no useful purpose by remaining in the schedule. However, I suppose they intend to leave it in the schedule. Being there it is confusing and, as a result, creates unnecessary procedures such as appeals to the Tariff Appeal Board and to the courts. This has been the circumstance for years, and parliament has made no effort to change the situation. Efforts have been made by individual members, but these have not been successful.

As I have stated, members of the appeal board themselves have stated that the terms "machines" and "implements" have an elastic connotation, and they find difficulty in determining parliament's intent. Surely to goodness if board members themselves find difficulty in interpeting the things we put into the act, it is up to us to assume the responsibility for changing the words, so that they can understand what we mean. As I said before, if we do not know what we mean when we put these words into the act, how can we expect civil servants, or even judges, to know?

On the other hand in the only case I had time to read, the court in question gave a much broader definition to the terms than did the civil servants in the Department of National Revenue. Therefore I would suggest to the parliamentary secretary that if more farmers could afford to take their rejected appeals to the courts they would receive the benefit of the intent of parliament and the justice they have a right to expect in our society or, as the term goes now, in our just society.

Because the individual farmer has occasion only once or twice in a lifetime to make application for free entry, he hesitates to take his case to the courts, due to the cost factor. This additional cost factor he cannot afford, and this is one of the reasons civil servants in the department have been so successful in their denial of the farmer's right.

When dealing with officials of the department the farmer finds that every possible obstacle is put in his way in reply to his application. For instance, we find the following reply: "The decision is final and conclusive". Another comment used, in one of the letters I have here, is this: "There is no provision in the agricultural implements schedule of the Customs Tariff whereby pumps for use in flood type irrigation may be admitted."

I wish I had time to read many of the precedents outlined by civil servants in the department for the farmers. I should like to know at this time what is a precedent: Is it something that supports what the department is saying or is it something that supports what I am saying? Having regard to the nature of some of these letters, I think someone should be taken to task.

I wrote the Minister of National Revenue on September 16, as I have done on several occasions, objecting to the very definitely negative paragraphs put out by some of his officials and sent in the form of farm letters to my constituents. I said that the civil servants should endeavour to assist rather than hinder those who contribute to their maintenance. I suggest one of the tasks of civil servants is to help these constituents.

The officials give yet another reason for rejecting these applications, saying in one case that the equipment must be of an active rather than a passive nature. They use this reasoning when a farmer is trying to get a wagon box exempted, saying that it must be of an active nature. A wagon box, of course, has no working parts. When you try to get a pump exempted, I presume they come back and say that it must be of a passive rather than an active nature. Apparently these precedents can be used both ways.

I have been surprised to find that many of these cases taken to the appeal board have been decided in favour of the farmers, after it was proved that the machinery involved could be used to a great extent not only for farm purposes but for other industrial uses. If farmers could afford to take their cases to the appeal board I think they would get much better satisfaction.

Let me put it to the parliamentary secretary, that this procedure is unnecessary if parliament would change the wording to which I have referred, making it much easier for the courts to make a decision. I should like to go into everything the courts have said in respect of agricultural machinery, in order to give members of this house a better idea of the problems the farmers have been facing when they make these applications. Let me refer to one case I found, which dates back to June 22, 1954, and is found in volume 1 of the Tariff Board Reports, at page 316. The president of the Exchequer Court in his judgment said:

> It is, therefore, important to ascertain the ordinary meaning of the term "agricultural implements". If the defendant's friction disc sharpeners come within such meaning it is not necessary to consider the ambit of the term "agricultural machinery". The word "agriculture" is defined in the New English Dictionary, vol. 1, as follows:
> 'the science and art of cultivating the soil; including the allied pursuits of gathering in the crops and rearing livestock; tillage, husbandry, farming (in the wildest sense).'
> and "agriculture" is defined as:
> 'of or pertaining to agriculture; connected with husbandry or tillage of the ground.'

He continues and gives the definitions as contained in Webster's New International Dictionary, Funk and Wagnall's New Standard Dictionary, Webster's New International Dictionary—I suppose he is referring to another edition—and so on. After giving those definitions he then states:

I must now determine whether the defendant's friction disc sharpeners come within this ambit.

He concludes his judgment by saying:

It was also urged for the plaintiff that the term "agricultural implements" meant only implements that were actually used in tilling the soil or in such agricultural operations as seeding, harvesting or the like but did not include articles that were merely ancillary to such implements, such as the defendant's friction disc sharpener. In my judgment, there is no such limitation in the ordinary meaning of the term and, certainly the various classes of persons who dealt with or used the sharpeners did not consider there was any such restriction of meaning. They had no doubt that the sharpeners were farm implements, and therefore, agricultural implements. In my opinion, they were right.

I am quite sure, as I said before, that if farmers could take their cases to the courts they would win 90 per cent of them. In order that they do not have to do this I plead again with the parliamentary secretary to have the department change the wording of this one item.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface my remarks in respect of the Customs Tariff by congratulating the parliamentary secretary on his appointment and his able and competent chairmanship of the finance, trade and economic affairs committee during the last session. I should like also to congratulate the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce who negotiated the Kennedy round agreements on behalf of Canada.

The parliamentary secretary said he would be pleased to answer some of the questions that might be fired at him. Perhaps he is prepared to tell us how the government feels about the attitude of the United States in respect of the Kennedy round agreements, and particularly the anti-dumping policy. Apparently there is some difficulty in this regard in Congress, and there might be problems in getting it passed.

There has also been an attitude expressed by the French government in respect of accelerating the tariff items, and this would have a direct effect not only on the European Economic Community but also on trade with France and other countries. Perhaps the hon. member is prepared to make a statement in that regard.

Every time I think of the GATT, which is the general agreement on tariffs and trade, I think of the words "fait accompli", because these items were put into effect on January 1 of this year. As of this calendar date they appear to be of this nature; nevertheless we have to go through the necessary steps to make them law in this country. The first question that should be asked in respect of the GATT agreement is, what effect has it had on lowering the tariffs in Canada and on the Canadian economy? This question was referred to the Economic Council of Canada, which was commissioned to make a special review of the tariff structure. That council found that the effective protection afforded Canadian industry, under the Kennedy round agreements, had not been substantially reduced, and in some cases was substantially less than before.

Let me quote from an article which appeared in the Toronto Daily Star of September 12, 1968, in which the Prime Minister rejected further lowering of tariffs. This was in direct contradiction to the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada, that the Canadian tariff structure be reduced beyond the scope of the present Kennedy round commitments.

This article refers to effective protection and the degree to which Canadian producers could keep prices high without foreign competition. The article suggests that the impact on Canadian prices is expected to be very slight. I should say that this must be considered within the framework of the accelerated reduction of tariffs proposed by the council as one way of dealing with persistent prices which cause increased costs. The Economic Council of Canada made a special review of the Kennedy round agreements and suggested they afforded very little protection. Certainly the government did not follow its recommendations with regard to meeting the high cost of living, and the high prices that Canada is experiencing at this time.

If Canada is to have a strong economy both in terms of its productive strength and financial structure, we must have a free trade policy. This free trade policy must be determined by our monetary policies, our trade policies and the industrial structure under which we operate in this country. Referring first to our monetary policies, one finds some restrictions imposed on us by reason of our fixed exchange rate policies and our foreign exchange reserves, which at the moment must be in the neighbourhood of $2.55 billion. When I set forth the proposition that we must take a new look at our fixed exchange rate policy and our foreign exchange reserves, members of the government will say: Here is a New Democrat setting forth one of their wild-eyed theories.

I tell the parliamentary secretary that I am going to read to him the words of the Postmaster General in a book called "The Nation Keepers". The Postmaster General wrote an article in that book entitled "Foreign Guide Lines and Canada's Economic Future", and on page 214 of that book he says this:

If Canada pursues an aggressive free trade policy it is obvious that our fixed exchange rate policy will not work. We will have to go through so many fundamental changes in industrial organization that only a freely moving rate will be able to adjust to the productive process and measure our success or failure in achieving our aims. As J. E. Meade has written, there is no choice for free traders. "Free trade and fixed exchange rates are incompatible in the modern world." This is particularly true for a Canada which depends on trade, has a heavily protected manufacturing industry, and is much affected by the slightest changes in the economic policy of its neighbour. Freer trade will bring a more efficient use of our resources and expand our possibilities of growth, but these changes cannot possibly work their way through the economy within the constraints of a fixed rate.

The basic argument for fixed exchange rates is to protect the Canadian businessman from fluctuations in the value of the dollar. With a fixed rate he can plan; he knows what the costs of imported tools and machinery will be; he can measure precisely the net receipts from his exports. But why should the businessman be protected from risk and change? Is it not precisely the function of entrepreneurs and innovators to take advantage of economic change to control and direct the forces of change? By protecting the Canadian businessman from change, whether by tariffs or fixed exchange rates, we content ourselves with less than optimum performance and should not be surprised if our control over our economy lessens. Fixed exchange rates mean that we shape the Canadian economy to maintain an external equilibrium. For example, we are presently committed not only to maintain a fixed rate of exchange for the Canadian dollar but also a fixed ceiling to the amount of our exchange reserves. Our efforts, then, to employ more fully our human and material resources, including the 300,000 new jobs that we must find each year, must be circumscribed by these commitments. Exchange rates, which should adjust to the productive process, control and order our affairs. The whole weight of our economic policy is brought to bear on marginal problems, the problems of stabilizing a rate of exchange or maintaining rates of interest to control capital flows. We are forced to ignore the fundamental problems of growth and employment. Our balance on current account is approximately 2 per cent of our gross national product, and one would normally consider that economic policy directed to the composition and growth of G.N.P. would yield more satisfactory results than policies which have the effect of containing G.N.P. for the sake of maintaining a given balance in international payments.

These are the views of the Postmaster General with regard to the fixed exchange rate and foreign exchange reserves. One notes with satisfaction that the chairman of the Royal Bank of Canada, Mr. W. Earl McLaughlin, stated in today's Globe and Mail the same proposition, namely that Canada is hamstrung in its trade policies by reason of the fixed exchange rate and foreign exchange reserves. This is the first restriction that has been imposed upon us with regard to developing a free trade policy in Canada.

The second restriction is with regard to the industrial structure of the Canadian economy. This is why the problem of foreign ownership is so important to all Canadians. This is why the government sent forth the task force to study foreign ownership and the structure of the Canadian economy. Foreign investment in Canada as of 1964 amounted to $27 billion. As of now it is probably closer to $35 billion. Of that $27 billion in 1964, 80 per cent was American investment, 12 per cent investment of the United Kingdom and the balance that of other countries.

When one considers the Canadian economy, and more particularly automobiles, automobile parts and rubber products, being controlled by American investment to the extent of 97 per cent, chemical products of Canada being controlled by American investment to the extent of 78 per cent, and electrical parts and apparatus to the extent of 77 per cent, he can appreciate the magnitude of this problem.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it ten o'clock?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed perhaps I could refer to the business for tomorrow. We will be in committee of supply again. The first estimates we will be considering will be those of Mr. Speaker, on legislation. They will be followed by the estimates of the Department of Transport.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE—REPORTED CRITICISM BY MANITOBA SUPREME COURT JUDGE

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on October 28 I directed a question to the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith). My question arose from a decision rendered in the appeal court of Manitoba by Mr. Justice Freedman in a case in which a man, a citizen of Winnipeg, had been convicted of theft. In dismissing the case Mr. Justice Freedman expressed very serious criticisms of the handling of the case by the R.C.M.P. officers involved in making the arrest.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I have always believed that in Canada we should follow the procedures which have been established in the United States by the supreme court of that country, under which any person accused of a crime has the right to counsel, not just at the time of his trial but at the time of his being questioned by the police. Canadian courts have never followed this procedure although it is a pretty well established principle of British justice that a person who wishes to have counsel is entitled to have it. In the case to which I refer the person accused of theft told the R.C.M.P. officer that he wished to have counsel present when he was questioned. He was on the telephone with his lawyer. The R.C.M.P. officer took the telephone away from him, spoke to his lawyer and told him that he would not delay the questioning of the accused until the lawyer got there.

I want to quote briefly, because I think it is important, from the judgment given by Mr. Justice Freedman, which reads as follows:

> The facts surrounding this aspect of the case are disturbing to anyone who prizes the rights of individual liberty in a free society. Among these is assuredly the right, on being arrested or detained, to retain and instruct counsel without delay. This is a right enshrined in English common law, vindicated by many judicial decisions of high authority and clearly and unmistakably affirmed in the Canadian Bill of Rights...

Mr. Justice Freedman goes on to give the facts of the case and to quote from the statement made by the accused and by the lawyer of the accused in which the lawyer, Mr. Brock, said, among other things:

> I told Constable Taylor that I wanted to advise Ballegeer not to make a statement until I could talk to him but Taylor refused. I asked Taylor to relay my advice to Ballegeer but he said he would not do so.

The judge goes on to say:

> Here is a spectacle of a police officer wilfully, and alas successfully, frustrating the due process of law. What the constable did was wrong and unjustifiable, and his conduct cannot receive the sanction of the court.

I want to conclude by saying that I am concerned about this case. It seems to me that the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) has the responsibility not only of investigating what happened in this case but in making certain that the R.C.M.P. officers, not just the constables doing the work but the R.C.M.P. officials at the top, understand that citizens have rights and that the law gives them rights, so that the R.C.M.P. like any other agency of government, must live by the laws and rules which we have established.

It seems to me that this is an extremely important case and one which the Solicitor General should take steps immediately to clear up in no uncertain manner.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to tell the hon. member on behalf of the Solicitor General, who is away on official business and could not be here tonight, that we have taken note of his remarks. The judge on the appeal, however, has ordered a new trial, and under the circumstances the case is sub judice. Accordingly, no comment can be made thereon.

HUMAN RIGHTS—REQUEST FOR NON-DISCRIMINATION POLICY IN NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, on October 29 I directed a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, one which arose in my mind as a result of the refusal of the Supreme Court of Canada to hear again the case of Terrence John Whitfield v. Canadian Marconi Company.

These events took place some years ago. Mr. Whitfield was an employee of the Canadian Marconi Company working on the DEW line; and Marconi was fulfilling a contract for the federal government on that line. One of the conditions of employment which Mr. Whitfield signed was a condition which I do not understand, and certainly could not possibly justify. This is a condition which all employees were required to sign, namely that there would be no fraternization between any of the employees who came from southern Canada and the native population.

Mr. Whitfield, being a young man, and human, became interested in a young Eskimo lady named Ann Witaltuk. Despite the provision of the contract he had signed, he became friendly with her. I have an affidavit signed by the young lady which indicates that on one occasion she accompanied him to a social affair at the officers' mess at the R.C.A.F. station at Whale River. In order to gain entry to the officers' mess it was necessary to pass through a guardhouse leading to the works project. Miss Witaltuk recalls that the guard acting for the Canadian Marconi Company, at first stopped her from entering. Indeed he stopped both Mr. Whitfield and the young lady, saying he had instructions not to allow Eskimos to enter.

To cut a long story short, Mr. Whitfield was discharged. He subsequently sued the Marconi Company and his case was dismissed. I am not going to discuss what happened, except to say that it seems to be inconceivable that the government of Canada, which was enacted a Bill of Rights, a government which has passed the Fair Employment Practices Act, at a time when most provinces have passed a fair accommodation practices act, all of which certainly enunciate one simple principle that the people of this country are opposed to discrimination on the basis of race, colour or creed, should accept this situation.

I am not trying to rehash the Whitfield case. Surely, if we believe that we cannot condone the kind of thing which happened in the Whitfield case, then I should like the minister to adopt a very simple principle, that wherever the government does business with a company, whether it is giving a contract to a company, whether the company is doing work for the government or whether the government is giving a concession for mining, oil exploration or lumbering operations, the government should make it a condition of the contract with the company that there shall be no discrimination on the job or off the job in any way at all.

It seems to me I am making a very simple suggestion, and I can see no reason why this or any other government of Canada, in the light of the opinion about discrimination, should not agree to it.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Concern about discrimination has been expressed by several hon. members for many years, but more particularly recently by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Orange), the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I appreciate the opportunity of telling hon. members some of the measures that are being taken by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development; one in the form of a directive which was sent recently to departmental employees, enunciating certain policies. I do not believe time will permit the reading of the whole of it, but I will read some extracts.

I begin with the following:

> The Canadian Eskimos enjoy full citizenship, freedom, right and responsibilities as is the case with all Canadians regardless of origin, creed or colour...
> Government employees are expected to treat all Eskimos with whom they come into contact either by business association or socially in a manner calculated to maintain the respect we have or should have for one another in the spirit of the Canadian Bill of Rights.

It goes on to provide for investigation and for appropriate action to be taken where such policy has not been carried out by any government department.

This policy has been brought to the attention of all departmental employees recruited to work in the north. It also requires that departmental officials will bring this policy to the attention of all agencies and contractors doing work for the department in the north.

At a recent meeting of the advisory committee on northern development it was confirmed by all government departments involved that they will accept this policy, and it was subsequently confirmed formally that they were administering this policy vigorously with respect to any contractors within their area of jurisdiction. The policy embodied in that directive—which, as I say, I could not read in toto since time does not permit—was brought to the attention of the United States government and is now incorporated in the terms of the agreement administered by contractors on the DEW line system.

I would also refer to the statement made by the Minister of Labour on November 6, as reported at page 2470 of Hansard. With regard to the employment practices of the Northern Canada Power Commission I refer to the statement made by the deputy minister in his capacity as chairman of the commission, before the standing committee on Indian Affairs and Northern Development on November 5, page 3.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—"THE WAY IT IS"

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my appearance this evening arises from the program "The Way It Is" on C.B.C. television two days before the United States election, an election, sir, that I suggest was the cause of great anxiety not only to Americans but to the friends of Americans, including ourselves.

Part of the program that evening was a journalistic essay called "Listen, America" created by a cameraman named Yves Delaurot. It dealt with black power, with riots, with police brutality. It showed a burning Buddhist monk; it dealt with marijuana; and one scene showed many naked hippies at a love-in. Some of it, as Patrick Watson stated, was staged; but he did not indicate which portions were indeed so staged. Technically, I think it was well produced and the camera work was superb.

However, Mr. Speaker, I say of the show that its timing was poor. I say of this show that its theme was entirely one-sided and biased. Canadian Broadcasting Corporation employees in Ottawa have told me that it was obviously put into the program by an anti-American clique in the C.B.C. in Toronto.

I say of the show, Mr. Speaker, that its presentation was in the tradition of cheap journalism of the kind that would make the editors of Hush and Flash sit up and say: "I wish we could get away with that, but the police and the Postmaster General would not let us". I also say, Mr. Speaker, that part of this show was a play for perverts who rejoice in sadism. I say that part of the show was for those who like irregular sexual practices and obscenity.

I suppose, Mr. Speaker, that I will be met with some kind of argument to this effect: Well, after all, we must have freedom of expression. I do not have the right in our free society to go forth into the town square and shout four letter words. I do not have the right in our free society to throw ordure at another person.

But above and beyond the sheer lack of taste displayed in that particular program, or at least in that particular segment of it, I would say this, Mr. Speaker. We have had experience in parliament of dealing with the management of the C.B.C. We all recall the famed expression of a former minister who said the C.B.C. had "rotten management". We have had the "Seven Days" hearings. We have had hearings ad infinitum and ad nauseam in the time I have been in parliament and before. Yet, Mr. Speaker, no cure has been effected.

It is still obvious that there is no direct link between upper management and management at the level which would put this sort of trash on a television program. There is no effective management at the top. Who are the people who planted that journalistic essay in the program? Obviously they include some in important places, at decision-making levels, whose moral outlook is depraved and whose entire outlook is one of anarchy and nihilism. No wonder the editor of the Saint John Times-Globe wrote of this incident concerning, "The way it is", under the title, "The way it shouldn't be".

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, officials of the C.R.T.C. informed me that comments have been received about the program referred to by the hon. member. I know he understands very well that under the Broadcasting Act the C.B.C. has the right and responsibility to produce its programming free of government interference, and subject only to the law and the regulations of the C.R.T.C. I might mention, as the hon. member will know if he saw the program, that the film which he spoke about was clearly identified and introduced as a biased and one-sided presentation, and not a documentary, of certain issues confronting the United States of America.

I offer no judgment about the merits of the program. I invite the hon. member and others who are interested in it to express views to the C.R.T.C. and the C.B.C. in the matter.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.30 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 15, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1968-69

A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting supplementary estimates for the financial year ending March 31, 1969, was presented by Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board), read by Mr. Speaker to the house, and referred to the committee of supply.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO COMMUNIST CHINA

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform hon. members that the Canadian Wheat Board, following negotiations in Canton, has succeeded in concluding a sales contract with the People's Republic of China to provide for the export of 1.5 million long tons, 5 per cent more or less, of wheat to be shipped between December 1968 and July 1969 principally from Pacific coast ports.

This contract is under the provisions of the third long term agreement with China and consists of No. 4 northern and No. 5 wheat and limited quantities of Garnet and winter wheat.

Assuming that full tolerance is taken, the sale amounts to 58.5 million bushels.

Including the contract covered by this announcement, total sales under the third long term agreement amount to 6.3 million tons or approximately 235 million bushels. The long term agreement provides for a minimum of 168 million bushels and a maximum of 280 million bushels over the three year period commencing August 1, 1966, with the amounts for each year to be negotiated separately.

As in the previous contracts, payment terms for sales under the long term agreement are 25 per cent cash when each vessel is loaded, and the balance of 75 per cent in 18 months with interest. The deferred payment provision is made possible by a guarantee to the Canadian Wheat Board by the government of Canada.

I extend to the Canadian Wheat Board my sincere congratulations on this successful sales effort.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to hear the announcement by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who I believe has just returned from South America and I welcome him back. I think all hon. members would join me in saying we are very happy to hear that a new deal has been made with China. I think it should be emphasized and understood that, to quote from the statement of the minister which I received a second ago, the deal, including the contract covered by this announcement involves total sales under the third long term agreement amounting to 6.3 million tons or approximately 235 million bushels spread over a period of three years. So, if I understood the minister correctly, the contract provides for a maximum sale of 280 million bushels spread over a period of three years. Is that correct?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must make his statement. This is not the question period.

Mr. Woolliams: I appreciate that, Mr. Speaker, but I did not want to misquote the minister. However, I believe what I said is correct. One thing I should like to say is that I am very happy that the deal was made, because the government is now following the policy which was established by a previous government. There has been a lot of discussion—

• (11:10 a.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: There has been a lot of discussion with regard to the selling of grain to the communist countries. It was not so much a question of selling grain as it was a question of supplying credit to communist China. I am quite surprised to find that members opposite are endeavouring to shout me down when I am replying to a statement of this nature which is so important to western farmers. I want to repeat that the sales of grain to communist countries resulted from credit being made available by the former Conservative government. This practice has now been adopted by the Liberal government, although the Liberals criticized it at the time, and that has permitted this deal to be consummated. I want to congratulate the government and the minister for that.

There is one other point I should like to mention in connection with the statement that was made today. At the present time western farmers are in need of cash. There is a shortage of box cars at all elevator points in western Canada. If these box cars could be supplied the farmers could deliver cash crops other than wheat, thus obtaining much needed cash. I trust that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, now that the wheat board has consummated the deal, will have a discussion with the Minister of Transport with a view to making box cars available at the various elevator points in Saskatchewan and Alberta so that cash crops can be delivered and cash put into the hands of the farmers to assist them in this particularly difficult time which results from difficult climatic conditions.

Mr. Hees: And Manitoba, too.

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, in Manitoba and all the other provinces. I am glad my colleague mentioned Manitoba because I was not sure they were short of box cars in that province, since most of my mail has come from Saskatchewan and Alberta.

There is one other thing I should like to mention. At the present time the farmers are on a 3 bushel quota, but they are not able to deliver that quota because of this problem in connection with box cars. This is a situation which seems to arise every fall. I trust that now it has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport he will have discussions with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the wheat board and the railway companies, with a view to remedying this situation immediately.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, certainly the farmers in western Canada will be happy to hear this news. It means that we will have continuing sales to China, and will give the farmers hope that these sales will increase. I hope these sales will help the government to increase its efforts in moving toward recognition of the Peoples' Republic of China so that our trading position can be made more normal, and so we can look toward an expansion of trade with that country. If we hope to have an expansion of trade we will have to move toward making our relations with that country more normal for the people with whom we are expecting to do business.

I should point out at this time that the situation in western Canada is serious with regard to the sale and movement of grain. I just returned from there yesterday and the farmers who are threshing flax cannot get it into the dryers. If damp flax is not dried properly it will spoil in a very short period of time. In the area where I farm, between Rosetown and Biggar, the information I was given was that at both points, which are heavy delivery points, although there is a 3 bushel quota for shipping out damp grain the cars are just not available to move the grain out, and the elevators are filling up with out of condition grain which cannot be moved. I suggest there is not much point in having a quota if you cannot move the product. This is part of the whole picture, a very important part, and every effort has to be made to solve the problem.

Again I congratulate the minister and the government on being able to announce this sale. But let us not think, Mr. Speaker, that we have solved the problem, because we have not; the problem is still there.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, the minister says that he wishes to congratulate warmly the Canadian Wheat Board on having successfully made such a wonderful sale.

I do believe that this sale will help the western wheat farmer. It is important to note that the sale is for No. 4 and No. 5 northern wheat. The farmers will undoubtedly have to produce higher quality wheat while receiving a price for lower quality wheat.

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to say that the Canadian Wheat Board made a fine sale, but I should also like to know at what price we have sold this wheat. Have we sold it at a loss? I am in the automobile business, and if a car sells for $5,000, I know I could double or triple my sales by selling the car at half-price. I could then say that these are fine sales, but they would certainly not be profitable.

The minister still takes great care not to tell us for what price that wheat was sold. Will the government again have to pay subsidies to make up the difference between the price paid by China and the cost price to western farmers?

In any event, we have to dispose of this wheat, but not at a loss. Indeed, we should be able to dispose of it, because Canada is recognized throughout the world as the country that produces wheat of just about the best quality. In such circumstances, a good salesman sells the quality of his product and manages to operate not at a loss but at a profit; so, we should be able to find a way for the producers and the Canadian people to benefit therefrom.

PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES ACT

AMENDMENT TO DISCONTINUE ADDITIONAL PAYMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-129, to amend the Parliamentary Secretaries Act (fructus aequitur labori).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the Latin you have just read, fructus aequitur labori, indicates the essence of the bill. That phrase means "Let the remuneration equal the work." Our parliamentary secretaries have had some of their functions restricted by the Prime Minister's announcement that we are to have a system of ministers, acting ministers and second acting ministers. As a consequence the position of parliamentary secretary becomes more honorary than actual. The position of committee chairman is far more exacting. I therefore submit that we now ought to remove from the Parliamentary Secretaries Act the provision that there shall be paid an additional $4,000 per annum to parliamentary secretaries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—REPORTED STATEMENT AS TO CANADIAN COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister say whether the Minister of National Defence was stating government policy when he said, as reported from Brussels, that Canada will maintain at present strength Canadian forces in Europe assigned to NATO and defer indefinitely the reduction in size of our Canadian European air division?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the first part, Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes. On the second part, I do not know if the minister used the word "indefinitely". I doubt whether he did. If he did he meant "for a non-definite period" which might be short or long.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Prime Minister commit Canada to assign to NATO four modern antisubmarine destroyers equipped with helicopters?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the explanation is that these ships have been commissioned for quite a while. This is not a new assignment. As the house knows, under an arrangement with NATO these ships, built for the Canadian navy, are assigned automatically to NATO. This is not a new commitment; it is something which was decided by a previous government. It is merely a restatement of something that was done and announced before.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does this mean that this commitment is not subject to the review the government is presently conducting?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. All our NATO, defence and external policies in the area I have indicated are under review, including this one. These particular ships involve commitments which have been made before. There is nothing new here. The Minister of National Defence has announced that we are not going to decide to cut back on those orders until we decide it is necessary, if that is the case, as a result of our review.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Am I to judge then, from what the Prime Minister has said, that this is not actually a commitment that has been made to NATO but something that is subject to review.

Mr. Trudeau: It is not a new commitment, Mr. Speaker. That is what the conclusion is.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. I just want a simple answer if I can get it, Mr. Speaker. Does the government regard itself as having committed itself to providing these ships to NATO?

Mr. Trudeau: My answer could not be more simple. We have a certain number of commitments with NATO—land troops, air troops and ships—which have been made in the past, and the position of our delegation is that we are not drastically reducing or increasing these—

Mr. Diefenbaker: "Drastically".

Mr. Trudeau: —until the review has been finished.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Can I ask the Prime Minister to clarify the situation at this point? We gather from the press that there is an additional commitment of four ASW destroyers with helicopters. Does this mean the conversion of ships which are already under NATO command, or does it mean the new ones which were let by contract this year and which will not be ready for two or three years?

Mr. Trudeau: No, this is not a new commitment. These are ships which are under construction, or whose construction is to begin. The commitment has been made previously.

Mr. Forrestall: Get yourself straightened out.

Mr. Trudeau: Perhaps you can help me.

Mr. Forrestall: Anyone who knows what is going on in the maritime command could help you.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Winch: I certainly understand now why there is uncertainty with regard to this question, because now is confusion compounded. The Prime Minister has said that these are vessels now on order or under construction. They will not be available for three years. Does this mean that the review is over and that we are now committed three years ahead to the extent of four new ASW destroyers?

Mr. Trudeau: Of course not, no more than the troops or aircraft which are there now commit us for four years ahead. We can withdraw from NATO during the course of 1969 if we so decide; and the ships which have been committed to NATO, as in the case of the ground troops or the air troops, will follow the policy decision which is then made.

An hon. Member: Like medicare.

Mr. Benson: Did you vote against it?

Mr. Winch: Will the right hon. Prime Minister explain whether the information in the newspapers is correct that this is for one year only, and if so, what is the meaning of an additional four ASW in the next year?

Mr. Trudeau: It is not additional to any commitment which has been made previously, Mr. Speaker. It is a repetition of commitments already existing.

Mr. Stanfield: I was about to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the answer he has not given me, whether it is the view of this government that the minister of national defence in Britain was correct in saying that all members of NATO except France and Iceland had increased their commitments to NATO.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, that is not correct.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether these four destroyer escorts are not simply replacements for other ships which have become obsolete and have been taken out of commission. Are they not designed really to restore our commitment to NATO rather than to increase it?

Mr. Trudeau: I cannot give the answer to that, Mr. Speaker. I do know, once again, that these new ships are part of a previous commitment. They may be to replace former ships and they may be an addition which was agreed to in the past and to which we are committed.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the precise confusion that has been created as a result of the statement today by the Prime Minister and the anomalous statement that was made yesterday by the Minister of National Defence in Paris, would the Prime Minister agree to set aside a day on the return of the minister so that we in this house could find out once and for all which direction the government is going, if any?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I can see there is some confusion in the mind of my right hon. friend when he talks about Paris. He should know that NATO moved from Paris to Brussels.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: But, Mr. Speaker, with respect to a debate proper we can of course call the estimates—

Mr. Nesbitt: You didn't even know we hadn't an embassy in Taiwan.

Mr. Trudeau: —we could call the estimates covering that subject next week, if that is the arrangement among the house leaders.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should mention that a slip of the tongue is something that never happens to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister arises from this morning's news reports that the NATO defence committee has proposed demonstrative nuclear explosions. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether this kind of strange proposition has the concurrence of the Canadian government.

Mr. Trudeau: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I did not understand the context of these strange nuclear explosions.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Speaker, I think the question is important enough to bear repetition. This morning's news reports indicate that the NATO defence committee has proposed that there be, and I quote, "demonstrative nuclear explosions" within the territory under NATO command. Has this kind of proposition the concurrence of the Canadian government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot take issue with this because I know of no such decision by NATO. I have grave reasons to doubt that any such statement has in fact been made. I shall inquire.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister not agree that perhaps the Canadian people would be justified in feeling there are two policies of the government, one adopted in presentations to NATO and one adopted by the Prime Minister when speaking in this country?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that the question is argumentative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a Janus policy.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his statement today. Has the Canadian government made any new commitments with respect to NATO? He talked about past commitments, and fulfilling them. Are there any new commitments over and above those already made?

Mr. Trudeau: In the context of the discussions of NATO there have been no new commitments but, as concerns our relations with communist countries, we have increased our wheat sales.

[Later:]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. I do so in view of his acceptance of responsibility in regard to standing committees. In view of the fact that the defence estimates have now been referred to the standing committee on external affairs and defence, and in view of the importance of the recent NATO meeting, would the Prime Minister take under consideration, on the return of the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence, their reporting to the standing committee in order to bring it up to date on any governmental commitments made at the recent NATO meeting?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am told that the estimates are in the standing committee now, and hon. members can address the questions they wish to the ministers.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The estimates are before us, but it requires the consent of the Prime Minister and of the ministers to have them appear before us on this matter. I am asking whether the Prime Minister will take under advisement recommending to his ministers that they appear before our committee and bring the committee up to date.

Mr. Trudeau: I will take it under advisement, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I will change the subject somewhat, but before asking my question I wish to raise a point of order.

For over 15 minutes now supplementary questions have been allowed, which means that an hon. member or the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) have been able to ask seven or eight supplementary questions, when other hon. members who wish to ask questions cannot do so. Since the question period is limited to 40 minutes today, I think that we should be given a chance to ask questions not only about NATO but about other matters as well, and it seems to me that some hon. members should limit the number of their supplementary questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: I now come to my question, which is not a supplementary question. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce informed us this morning of a very interesting sale of wheat to China and I would like to ask him whether he could exert some pressure so that the surplus of a million pounds of Beauce maple syrup might be exported, even to China, if the Chinese want to eat good maple syrup?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the maple syrup situation in that area is somewhat difficult due to circumstances which the hon. member for Témiscamingue knows very well. There have been difficulties, and a certain quantity of maple syrup has to be reconditioned. I am assured that this product will be offered for sale afterwards.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister which is based on a report compiled by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Department of Manpower and Immigration to the effect that unemployment in October reached the level of 3.6 per cent or a seasonally adjusted rate of 5.1 per cent. In view of the fact that even the lower of these two figures is above what has been considered an acceptable level, and in view of the menace of this kind of thing to our society, can the Prime Minister say what steps the government is taking or what stepped up programs it is undertaking to combat unemployment in this country?

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the hon. member knows that from time to time I have taken exception to questions which would require ministers to answer in a rather lengthy way. The difficulty I have always had is not so much regarding the question but regarding the answer. When hon. members ask general questions they receive lengthy answers which consume five or ten minutes, and members will complain that the question period is being taken up with lengthy answers. I think questions which invite policy statements should be limited to asking a minister whether he proposes to make a statement on motions. I would hope the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could ask his question along those lines.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I would be glad to ask it that way, Mr. Speaker. In view of the urgency of this matter will the Prime Minister say that an early statement will be made to indicate what stepped up programs the government is undertaking to combat unemployment?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we had quite lengthy statements on this matter during the budget debate, and we will have a chance to make others on the estimates next week. As you prophesy, I could make a lengthy answer to this question to indicate that this increase in labour force unemployment is due to many factors, and to indicate what we are doing. Actually, Mr. Speaker, I have a lengthy answer here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of the urgency of this matter I wonder would the house agree to let the Prime Minister return to motions and give us this statement today.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Some members agree, others don't, so we will go on to the next question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who are the others?

HARBOURS

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF DECENTRALIZATION STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan) I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Has the decentralization study of the National Harbours Board, mentioned by the Minister of Transport when he was in Vancouver recently, been completed? If not, when will it be?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should make it clear that this is not a study by the National Harbours Board. It is a study which was done by a group of officials from the department and from the Canadian Transportation Commission, and with an input from the National Harbours Board, acting independently. The answer is that the report is completed. The hon. gentleman will be pleased to know that this is at least two or three weeks ahead of schedule, which I think is very commendable with respect to the gentlemen who were involved in it. I am hoping to read it over the week end and then perhaps to recommend it to the consideration of the standing committee on transport. This is something I would like to think about over the week end and then report to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister how the gentlemen from the department to whom he refers can act independently. If they have, have they done so at their own expense or has the department underwritten that expense?

Mr. Hellyer: They were directed to put into the report their own views without consideration for present departmental policies, past departmental policies or what they might believe to be future departmental policies. They were in that sense acting independently. The reason for this of course was so we would have their unrestricted personal views after looking at the evidence placed before them as a basis for consideration concerning what might be the best policy for the future.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Can the minister explain how they can be directed and act independently at the same time.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION TO SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question will be short and I think the answer likewise will be short. The question I wish to pose is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Will he refer the official languages bill to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling concerning its validity before proceeding further with it in this house, in view of the submissions made to him by J. T. Thorson, former president of the Exchequer Court of Canada?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have referred this letter to the Minister of Justice. If the hon. member will take note of a certain system that was instituted a little while ago he will realize that the Minister of Justice will be in the house on Monday.

TRANSPORT

HALIFAX—FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN PROVISION OF CONTAINER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport and say how happy we are to have him in the house two days in a row. We are very complimented indeed.

Is the government giving consideration to assisting the province of Nova Scotia and the port of Halifax in their plans to provide a first class through freight container service from overseas ports to the centre of this continent?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, it is anticipated that the estimates of the Department of Transport will be called later today. I think this might be a better time to discuss something as interesting and important as the future of containerization.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I simply asked the minister whether the government is giving consideration to this. All I require is a yes or no answer. It will not take more than two seconds.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): I have a supplementary question for the minister, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether he could assure the house that he will make some sensible statement when the estimates are introduced and in that statement refer in some depth to the containerization program.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do feel that this question should be asked when we are in committee.

RETURN OF CANADIAN BOX CARS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Mention already has been made of the fact that even though the quota is only 3 bushels to the acre there is a terrific shortage of box cars. I should like to ask the minister whether he would today communicate with officials of the C.N.R. and the C.P.R. and ask them to do their part in bringing back from the United States the very considerable number of box cars which are in that country and which belong to the Canadian railways, so they could be used at this time for the purpose of moving wheat.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to refuse anything to my right hon. friend. This afternoon I will phone the officials of the railways and the Canadian Wheat Board to make sure that his request is given attention.

[Later:]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a question supplementary to the one asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. When the minister is in touch with the railway companies would he ask them to do their best to supply box cars to areas in the northern part of Alberta, where the situation is desperate, and in doing so hopefully compensate for the failure of the government to provide early passage of the farm credit legislation and fix the interest rates under that legislation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

ADDITIONAL FERRIES ON BORDEN-TORMENTINE SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Can the minister advise the house whether his department is in the process of acquiring two additional ferries for use on the Borden-Tormentine service?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I do not think I am in a position to advise the hon. member in this regard, Mr. Speaker. As my hon. friend knows, the whole subject of transportation to and from the island is under very active consideration. I think it might only complicate or confuse the issue even further than it is at the moment if I were to answer part of the question without answering many other questions.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC ADVISORY BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with the ever increasing toll of traffic accidents. Are talks under way between the federal and provincial authorities concerning the setting up of the public safety board which was announced in this field about this time last year?

Mr. Speaker: I have some doubt whether the question is of sufficient urgency to warrant it being asked at this time, but I shall allow the minister to reply.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I asked the chairman of the meeting which I believe was held in Regina a few days ago to place this on the agenda. I have not had an opportunity as yet to obtain information concerning the results of their consideration. I will try to do that and have the information available for my hon. friend this afternoon.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Can a decision be expected in the near future with regard to the proposed site of the international airport which, according to certain rumours, would be built in Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I hope so, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I should like to know whether certain sites which had been suggested to the government with regard to the planning of the international airport have been excluded?

Mr. Speaker: This question could be placed on the order paper.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO DIPLOMATIC RECOGNITION OF MAINLAND CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. Inasmuch as Canada has just concluded a new wheat sale to communist China, will Canada now consider the immediate establishment of diplomatic relations with that country?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The subject is under consideration, Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows.

TRANSPORTATION

ATLANTIC PROVINCES—STUDY OF PROBLEMS BY STANDING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Would he make arrangements so the standing committee on transport and communications may resume its interrupted hearings in the Atlantic provinces on the subject of the specialized matters that were coming before that committee in that area? I ask this question in view of the fact that the committee does not have permission to resume its hearings in that area at the present time, and because government members on that committee are making every effort to frustrate other members of the committee in making such a request.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FINANCE

CONSULTATIONS RESPECTING PROPOSED SECURITIES COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the minister giving any consideration to the formulation of a uniform set of laws governing the sale of securities in this country?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is actively considering this matter. I should like to have the question directed to him.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, two days ago I replied to a question along the same line directed to me by the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

FISHERIES

PURCHASE OF SALT COD FOR SHIPMENT TO BIAFRA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the concern expressed by Newfoundland fishermen with regard to the very low prices being offered in the proposed purchase by his department of five million pounds of salt cod, can the minister advise whether he is aware of this situation and what steps are his department taking to ensure the payment of fair prices.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes; the minister is aware of the situation. I should also like to point out that the government has taken off the hands of salt cod fishermen in Newfoundland the equivalent of roughly 20 per cent of a year's catch for delivery to the International Red Cross.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is the government in a position to announce the setting up of a marketing board for salt codfish, as indicated yesterday in St. John's by the Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. Davis: This is an interesting proposal, Mr. Speaker, and I hope the government will be prepared to consider it. But it is not an item of government policy at the moment.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the minister tell us whether he has received any tenders for the purchase of the five million pounds of high protein food in question?

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, I am sure a number of tenders have been received. The deadline, however, has been extended to November 18 to ensure that we take up all the five million pounds of fish required for Nigeria and Biafra.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

WHEAT—ANNOUNCEMENT OF SALE TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce with reference to his statement of today regarding the sale of wheat to China. Was this in reference to a former commitment or agreement, or was it a brand new deal; and if it was a new deal, how many bushels did it involve?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it was very clearly stated in the announcement I made that the long term agreement provides for a minimum of 168 million bushels and a maximum of 280 million bushels. So this is within that agreement.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Then it is really under the old, existing agreement?

Mr. Pepin: Yes, sir.

GRAIN

REPORTED SALES NOT UNDER WHEAT BOARD REGULATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. On October 29 a question was taken as notice by the minister's parliamentary secretary, I believe. The question is this. What action, if any, is this government taking to investigate the persistent allegations that there is wholesale violation of Canadian Wheat Board regulations by feed mills in western Canada?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The answer was given later, Mr. Speaker, that the wheat board has been looking into this matter. As soon as I receive a report from the board, I will be glad to report to the house.

Mr. Schreyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Inasmuch as it is now two weeks since this matter was made the subject of investigation, can the minister say whether any conclusions have been reached?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I had a conversation with the chairman of the wheat board yesterday on this very subject. He demonstrated without any particular effort how complicated this matter is and that it involves questions of policy. In the old days the wheat board had the right to take over the whole wheat production. Now farmers are entitled to move wheat within the province. He told me at quite some length how complicated it was to control movement between provinces. He said they were doing their best to do so. The report is being produced now, and again as soon as I have it I will report to the house and try to devise a system whereby control can be improved.

AGRICULTURE

PAYMENT OF CASH ADVANCE ON FARM STORED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Have the regulations subsequent to the amendment of the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act now been approved by cabinet, as hoped for by the minister last Wednesday; and when will cash advances be available to farmers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): It was done last night, Mr. Speaker. The regulations are now to be signed by a number of ministers, and I am going to make sure that it is done; I am informed it has been! Consequently the wheat board will now be in a position to implement these regulations in the coming hours, or at least next week. Let us give them a chance to relax after making the wheat sales to China.

CRIMINAL CODE

PRESSURE TO PROCEED WITH AMENDING LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Are organizations exerting pressure on the government in order to promote the passing of the omnibus bill?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, some organizations are probably exerting pressure but this is done with the Minister of Justice rather than the Prime Minister.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATED FEDERAL EMPLOYEES—REQUEST FOR INCREASED PENSIONS

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO PATROL BOATS IN DISTRICT 7B

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. I ask the minister whether it is his intention to reduce the number of fishery patrol boats presently operating in district 7B.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question should be placed on the order paper. If there is an urgency that is not apparent to the Chair the hon. member can discuss the question at the time of adjournment.

REINSTATEMENT OF WINTER WORKS TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

Since it was mentioned a while ago that there are 300,000 unemployed in the country, 150,000 of whom are in the province of Quebec, does the government intend to re-establish winter works in Quebec?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO PROPOSED NATIONAL COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture when he will announce the composition of the national grains council, and when he expects it to become functional.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture hope to have all the letters from interested parties within a very few days. As soon as we have had a chance to look at the replies from interested groups in the industry I think we will be able to make an announcement about the formation of the council. I hope we will be able to make such an announcement very soon after that. I hope the council will be functional, again, very quickly after that point.

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): A supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture. Can you advise whether the agriculture ministers of the three prairie provinces have been consulted as to the formation of the grains council?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to remind the hon. member that questions should be directed to the Chair.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOUNTED POLICE PROSECUTIONS INVOLVING INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister acting for either the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General, whichever has jurisdiction relating to human rights and the R.C.M. Police. I ask whether the attention of the government has been drawn to a recent statement by Mr. Allan Bate, a Prince George lawyer, to the effect that in court cases involving native Indian people the R.C.M. Police take sides against the native people and thus put them in the position of not being able effectively to obtain justice in the courts in that area. I ask also whether an inquiry was made into this matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

NEWFOUNDLAND—DISCONTINUANCE OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister tell the house whether he has received any request for an appeal from or review of the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission permitting Canadian National Railways to discontinue its rail passenger service in Newfoundland?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows it is not sufficient at this time to merely ask whether representations have been made to or received by a minister.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In view of the strong representations made by the Newfoundland people with regard to the decision of the Canadian National Railways to abandon rail passenger service in that province, will the government reconsider the decision of the C.N.R. in this respect?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure which representations my hon. friend is referring to. There is a method of appeal which, to the best of my knowledge, has not been pursued. As I explained to the house some weeks ago, this is a problem which faces not just the people of Newfoundland but the people of Canada and not just the people of Canada but the people of other parts of the world where road and air transportation are displacing transportation of passengers by rail in many instances. In many cases there is just not sufficient traffic to justify the continuation of services.

Under the circumstances I am sure my hon. friend would agree that unless a formal appeal were launched the government would really be very reluctant to interfere in a decision which is based on providing the greatest economy to the Canadian people and the best value for the taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has now expired.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. The Minister of Transport has given us a lengthy lecture and has done an excellent job of making a political speech in the house in reply to a very simple question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for the floor on a question of privilege, so he must be prepared to submit a question of privilege that is genuine and in accordance with the rules of the house. The point he is making now is not a question of privilege in any possible way and I cannot allow him to continue.

I have to remind hon. members again that the question period has expired.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The house again in committee of supply, revised estimates of legislature for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote No. 1 will be found on page 286 of the blue book and the details on page 288.

LEGISLATURE

The Senate—

1. Allowance in lieu of residence to the Speaker of the Senate, $3,000.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Chairman, there is not much to be said about that except that we are trying to give shape to a wish we have often expressed to increase the efficiency of parliament and enable it to do more work with the best possible results.

As hon. members know, we are planning to reform the rules of the house and the committees entrusted with those studies will report at the beginning of December. But the item under consideration deals with the assistance we have deemed appropriate to give the leaders of the opposition parties in order to make easier their task which is demanding and has to do with examining the bills as well as the measures introduced by the government.

The opposition, as we know, does not always have enough time to examine closely the legislation or bills submitted for its consideration, and that item is meant to help it in that respect.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, if the Prime Minister will forgive me, may I rise on a friendly point of order. I realize that he is about to discuss the supplementary item which was tabled this morning.

However, item No. 1 which the Chair has called deals with the allowance in lieu of residence to the Speaker of the Senate. Since we are discussing matters related to the House of Commons I wonder whether it would not be advisable to let item No. 1 stand and call the item on which the Prime Minister is speaking?

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It has always been the custom in the committee to have a general discussion on item No. 1.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I realize that, Mr. Chairman, but a general discussion on vote No. 1 would allow hon. members to wander all over the place, and the next member to speak could go on to another subject. If we are going to have a discussion now on the question which the Prime Minister is raising, would it not be a good idea to call the particular item which would keep the discussion to that subject matter?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I gather it would meet the convenience of certain hon. members if we could deal with that subject now. Under the rules we could deal with it in general terms under item No. 1; but if the hon. member insists, we could stand item No. 1 and call the supplementary estimates at this point.

Mr. Stanfield: This could be done by agreement, Mr. Chairman, without in any way prejudicing the rules of the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Chairman, so long as I am not committed to voting money for the Senate.

[Translation]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Chairman, as I said, the intent of this measure is to enable leaders of the opposition parties to avail themselves of some technical facilities, to resort to the services of economists, sociologists, jurists, and to alleviate their difficult duty in criticizing the government's legislative measures. As everyone knows, these pieces of legislation are usually excellent, so that the task of criticizing them is even more difficult. It is time that we realize the necessity of taking the utmost advantage of the time available to us.

For many decades, we have been realizing that the business of the house is ever increasing. The number of session days has had to be increased with the years, but we have now reached the limit of this possibility. It is necessary to be more efficient in the use of these days, and it is obvious that, in our parliamentary system, the opposition has an important part to play and that it is in the national interest to make public funds available to them in order that they may discharge their duty with full knowledge of the facts.

[English]

For these reasons we have examined a number of different methods of assisting the leaders of the opposition parties. We examined, for example, a suggestion submitted by an hon. member of an opposition party that a sum of money be allocated to each caucus based on the number of members of that caucus. This is an interesting idea. It would, of course, be very helpful to the government party because our caucus comprises a great number of members. However, we felt that the first step in the expenditure of public funds was not to assist the caucus members but to assist the leaders. As hon. members know, research facilities are already provided to the backbenchers by the parliamentary library staff. These facilities have been used frequently by a certain number of members. I feel that if the time comes when more demand is put on these research staffs we may have to consider increasing their size, but for the time being the system is working well. Backbenchers in all parties may call upon the members of the parliamentary library staff for assistance in their research and even to do some writing for them.

The intent in this particular item is to help the leaders of the parties in view of the fact that the opposition parties have a distinct role to play under our parliamentary system. We have decided to do this by allotting a substantial amount of money to the Leader of the Opposition and a lesser amount to the leaders of the other parties which are recognized under the rules and regulations of the house, that is, those parties which have more than 12 members.

The intention is, of course, not that these funds be employed for political organization or narrow partisan purposes but that they be employed directly as an aid to parliamentary work. For this reason, an agreement has been reached between myself and the Leader of the Opposition, as well as the leaders of the other parties, whereby funds would be allocated to them. Under this item research personnel will be hired by the Speaker of the house or by the clerk on the recommendation of the leaders of these parties. It is intended that certain positions will be established. In this way there will be some minimum basis on which this house can discuss these estimates when they come up in succeeding years, and ensure that the funds are employed for this particular, agreed purpose.

I should go on to say that I have had very helpful co-operation from the Leader of the Opposition and from the leaders of the other parties. We have arrived at this plan without too much discussion. This step can be viewed as a first step in assisting the opposition parties and members of parliament generally to discharge their duties. This step, we felt, was the most urgent one and since it entails the expenditure of public funds we wanted to begin with this step before considering other methods.

I have one final word, Mr. Chairman, and that is to thank the Leader of the Opposition and the leaders of other parties for their co-operation in this matter. I should like to express the hope that the result will be, not more informed debate because the opposition debaters are always informed, but that the information will come to the fore sooner in the debate so that they will be in a position to perhaps shorten the length of time which is spent on one bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I should like to express my appreciation to the right hon. Prime Minister for what I think we all must regard happily as a very constructive measure taken by the Prime Minister and his government to assist the opposition parties in their role which is, from year to year, growing more and more complex. I express the hope that as the opposition becomes more informed it will not follow what is sometimes the tendency of those who become full of learning, that is, to speak at even greater length. I hope this will not be the result; indeed, I am sure it will not be. It is clear, I think, that the scope of government operations is becoming broader and broader from year to year as governments, one way and another, seem to become more and more involved in more and more of the affairs of the citizen and of the community. It is clear that if the opposition parties are to meet the government in this house on anything approaching equal terms so far as information is concerned, facilities must be provided in addition to those that prevail today. The government has at its disposal, of course, an excellent public service and can also consult those who are well informed outside the ranks of the public service.

The Prime Minister referred to the excellence of the legislation and therefore the need of the opposition perhaps becoming even more urgent. He will forgive me if I say to him that in view of the various positions of the government this session I have not so far felt the need of any additional assistance of this sort, but I am sure that time will come and the assistance therefore is timely. It is obviously impossible for members of the opposition parties to be well informed on all the matters that come before the house. I would say also that it would be impossible for our caucus, for example, to be well informed simply with the assistance of the staff that we will now be able to provide. Although the provision is generous, nevertheless the staff will be small and the caucus will be unable to make itself well informed on all matters on which the government is involved, such as estimates and the various other matters the government is likely to bring before the house.

This staff must serve the leader, the caucus and the members of the caucus in their work. While members of the caucus can get assistance from the parliamentary library on matters that concern them individually, the members and the caucus are also concerned with caucus positions on matters that come before the house. This staff, therefore, in this sense must serve the caucus and serve the members of the caucus.

I say this now so there will be no possibility of misunderstanding. The Prime Minister referred to this fund and the staff being used directly in the legislative work. He, I am sure, will be among the first to recognize that if I and my caucus are to be well informed in depth on various matters about which the government is concerned we will also have to utilize well informed people outside of the house and outside of this staff because this will be a relatively small staff to be informed in depth on all matters. There will of necessity, therefore, need to be some liaison between this staff and perhaps an advisory committee outside the confines of parliament so that the staff can draw upon the informed opinions of those outside the house. I trust that this would not be regarded as a type of partisan liaison beyond the scope of the arrangement described by the Prime Minister.

The task of such a group is obviously a complex one which obviously requires a competent structure of organization. The success of this staff will, of course, depend in particular upon the calibre of the head of the research team. As I have indicated, he will have to serve not only myself but also the caucus collectively and the caucus individually along the lines I have indicated. We will proceed as rapidly as we can but our aim, of course, will be to provide a staff high in quality, and this may take a little time.

I rise, Mr. Chairman, in particular to express my personal thanks and the thanks of this party for the constructive measures that the Prime Minister has taken in this regard.

• (12:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, Hansard will indicate that we are discussing an item having to do with the residence of the Speaker of the Senate, but as we are all now aware we are in fact discussing a supplementary item that was tabled this morning by the President of the Treasury Board which provides an extra sum of money for the general administration of the House of Commons, in particular that section of the administration that comes under the authority of the Clerk.

I regret very much that other commitments and responsibilities have made it impossible for the parliamentary leader of this group, the hon. member for York South, to be here on this occasion, and I know that he too will regret very much that he was not able to be here for this discussion. It puts me, Mr. Chairman, in the position of not only having to speak for him but of trying to say the things that he would want said at this time.

I think the first thing that I have to say on his behalf, Mr. Chairman, is that he welcomes the attention that the Prime Minister has given to his request that something be done in this area. Naturally he and all of us in this party welcome any first step that is being taken. However, I think I would have to say that the agreement that the Prime Minister said was arrived at between him and the parliamentary leader of this party was not, at least so far as the hon. member for York South was concerned of the happiest kind.

I believe that while the negotiations were being carried on he continued to urge upon the Prime Minister, the President of the Privy Council and others that there be certain modifications in the proposal that is now before us. Perhaps there will be an opportunity for the hon. member for York South to speak for himself on this particular aspect, but I felt that I should on his behalf enter this caveat. I see the Prime Minister is nodding his head. In other words, I am saying yes, there was an agreement, but the hon. member for York South agreed only because the Prime Minister would not go any farther.

At any rate, Mr. Chairman, I think that the house in general should take this opportunity to express its approval of the action of the government in calling upon parliament to devote a certain portion of public funds to this kind of purpose. After all, it does not make sense to elect 264 people to the job that is ours in parliament, to pay us $12,000 a year to do the job, and then to be skimpy when it comes to providing the kind of assistance and service that we need in order to do our job effectively. Maybe some of us have got along for a good many years without this kind of assistance, but the job is getting that much more complicated and we do think it could be done better if research and other kinds of assistance were made available not just to the leaders of the various parties but to members of the house generally.

The Prime Minister said that one of the opposition party leaders had suggested a different approach. It is no secret that that suggestion was made by the hon. member for York South. It was that this kind of assistance should be provided not just to party leaders but to all members of parliament as such. The way we operate in this house, Mr. Chairman, this means the members of the various parties in the House of Commons.

The Prime Minister will recall that when the hon. member for York South first made his proposal to the Prime Minister—indeed, Mr. Chairman, I was with the hon. member at the time—the suggestion was made that this kind of assistance should be made available to members of all parties, including those on the government side of the house. I recognize the validity of the Prime Minister's statement that there are a lot of members over there; in fact, there is no doubt that there are too many. But if this kind of assistance is not made available to them, it does leave the notion that somehow they have access to the public service, to government sources, that is not available to those on this side of the house. That is not really true. I find that the public service generally is just as responsive to my requests for information as it could possibly be to the request of anybody else. However, if I were a backbench Liberal I think I would be complaining bitterly about a proposal that provides extra assistance to members of opposition parties but no assistance as such to members on the government side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope that the "hear, hears" and the loud applause at this point, particularly from the backbenchers on the government side, is recorded in Hansard.

Mr. Trudeau: I am willing to say that that is a good idea, but it does cost more money.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then that is fine; the response is almost unanimous, Mr. Chairman.

We are now spending a lot of money on the running of the House of Commons, some $15 million. That does not include the $3 million to run the Senate of which I do not approve. But if we are spending that much money and electing presumably capable, efficient and skilled people to do the biggest piece of work that has to be done in this country, namely, the job of running the country itself, then I do not think it is unreasonable or irresponsible to spend whatever few more dollars are necessary to enable such people to keep up with the kind of tasks that have to be tackled here in parliament. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, while expressing to the government the formal thanks of the hon. member for York South and of this group for taking this step, may I say that if my deskmate were here he would be speaking pretty strongly about this matter, insisting that this is really only a gesture and that the government ought to be going a great deal farther.

Perhaps the Prime Minister's defence will be that this is a beginning, but I did not like the way in which he placed so much emphasis on the provision being of assistance just to the leaders of the other parties. The Leader of the Opposition stated the obvious, namely, that the assistants that he will employ will not be just for his use but for the group as a whole. I know that we in our party have the same intention. Our leader has no thought of just using whatever money is made available to him to increase the staff in the leader's office. He is determined that any money that is made available will be used to hire research people to assist the members of this party as a whole. So why not put it on that basis, Mr. Chairman, and provide this assistance for all our members, for all the Conservatives, for all the Creditistes and for all the Liberals?

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

The Prime Minister made reference to the research division of the Parliamentary Library and to the assistance that we are able to get there. I join with him and others in paying tribute to the assistance we have received from that division. However, Mr. Chairman, I point out that cabinet ministers do not rely just on impartial, objective people like librarians to brief them on the matters upon which they have to make decisions. That service is available to them, but they also have a whole host of executive assistants, special assistants, research people and advisers to work with them as a government, to think in their terms and to help ministers make the decisions that they must make on matters of policy.

I think that this also applies to the rest of us, Mr. Chairman. We are all entitled to the objective, impartial kind of research material that we can get from the library. But we are also entitled to have people in the research field working with us in our various groups, understanding our approach, looking for the kind of things that will help us solve problems, that will help us come to decisions in the light of the particular philosophies that the members of the various parties in this house have. That is not contrary to the Prime Minister's suggestion.

I think we all agree that this money must not be used for party purposes; it must not be used for the organizational work of the parties outside the house. I am sure he will agree with me 100 per cent that inside the house our parties and the cut and thrust of debate between the parties form the very essence of parliament. We need, therefore, that kind of research which will inform and strengthen us along the lines of the positions we in the various parties take.

I am pleading, although no doubt the hon. member for York South would be doing so in more biting language, for that change which we hope will come some time in the future. I shall have to settle for the Prime Minister's assurance that this is but the beginning, that once this kind of money shows up in the estimates it will be possible to enlarge the estimates and go farther in future years.

There is a particular angle to this matter that concerns me, concerns my leader and concerns most hon. members. We are concerned that the amount of money being provided is so small that unless something is done about the Joe staff, if I may put it that way, in our leader's office and unless something is done to help our leader to cope with his ordinary day to day work, this money may be used to cover just that situation. For a good many years my office has been opposite my party leader's office, and I have a pretty good idea of what goes on in that office. I have seen it operating under two or three different leaders. It seems that it is the nature of the leader's office, and no doubt the Prime Minister is discovering this, that a particularly heavy work load comes into it. The correspondence is unimaginably heavy. A great deal of mail comes to the leader of the party, and that it is impossible for one person and one secretary to handle it is incontrovertible.

What must our leader do, Mr. Chairman. He has to persuade good people, people with university degrees and with experience who could get jobs elsewhere at higher pay, to come and work for him in that office, either at minimal rates of pay that the party provides from the outside or at rates of pay that are below those provided for executive assistants. As a result our leader has quite a few helpers, it is true; some of them are volunteers and some of them are from the outside. But he needs these people just to do the day to day Joe work. There is a very real danger that this money, which I understand in a full year would be only $35,000, much less than that for this year, will be absorbed to cover our leader's Joe work and that we shall not obtain from it what is wanted, namely, research work to assist hon. members to be better informed. That danger exists in a very real way and will continue to exist until this other problem has been dealt with satisfactorily.

I shall spend no further time on this matter, since it is still being negotiated. The leader of our party was greatly concerned when the proposal came from the Prime Minister. He was led to believe that this money was to be used to pay the salaries of people who would be capable of doing active research work. It ought not to be used merely to pay for the day to day work in the leader's office. We are all to be covered by this small amount of money. Hon. members who sit in the second, third, fourth and fifth rows and who need research assistance of the kind the Prime Minister is talking about just will not obtain it. I therefore think that the Prime Minister's initial gesture might have been considerably expanded.

I think hon. members ought to be told how much money is being spent on each of the smaller parties, how much is being spent on the official opposition, how much is being spent in enlarging the Prime Minister's office staff and the staff that is looking after his Joe work, his research work and all the rest of it. If we have that information we may better judge how generous is this gesture toward the third and fourth parties in this house.

In addition to the ordinary work load hon. members have as such because of matters that come to their offices, the steady run of human problems, and in addition to the ordinary correspondence they must deal with, they are often asked to help in other ways. I suppose I have helped to write hundreds of graduate theses in the quarter century I have been here. Every week young people approach me with requests of that kind. I think this is a legitimate request for students across this country to make of their members of parliament. That is part of the job.

On top of all this work there is our work in committees. I agree with the proposal that we make more use of our committees. I think we must consider attaching some kind of research staff to the committees themselves. I do not say we must go to the extent they have in the United States. All those who have been down there know how lavish they are with money for research purposes. The point is that when we are asking for all these things we are not asking for public funds to be squandered. We are trying to make sure that we get better value for the money we already spend on the institution known as parliament and on having members of parliament here.

We are all terribly aware of the work load that goes with parliament. I will not be divulging caucus secrets when I say that some time ago, at one of our caucuses, we had an outsider in who pleaded for something to be done. The retort was made, "Why don't you get yourself elected to parliament?". One of our new members who felt overworked already immediately replied, "The job isn't what it's cracked up to be."

I believe a good many new hon. members are finding the work load heavy. But we are here because we like it. We like what we are able to do. Some of us like it so much that we hope to stay here forever—if we are allowed to. We have an important job to do for the people of Canada and it is by no means a mistake to ask for public funds to be used to support that work and see it is done well.

We shall certainly vote for item 20a, the item we are in effect now discussing. We hope that this is only a beginning toward the provision of proper and adequate assistance to members of parliament generally.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I want first of all to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for having fulfilled a promise made in the Speech from the Throne, to the effect that the Opposition parties would receive some help from the government in order to reach maximum efficiency.

The Prime Minister has just repeated that, to ensure maximum efficiency to the opposition parties and their leaders, supplementary estimates are presented today, which will help them considerably to fulfil their duties more actively and more efficiently than in the past.

I note in passing that this initiative of the government, probably conceived by the Prime Minister himself is due to the fact that, having for such a long time himself opposed any government in Canada, he has understood the importance of an active opposition. I knew him when he was active. In 1944—quite some time ago—he went around for the C.C.F. with Mrs. Thérèse Casgrain. He even came to Rouyn-Noranda and I went to hear him speak during the provincial elections of 1944.

The Prime Minister, therefore, knows what he is talking about when he speaks of the important role the opposition can play in a democratic parliament.

Mr. Chairman, in addition to the amounts the Prime Minister or the government suggests should be paid the leaders of the parties of the opposition to organize a research department, we must also consider the matter brought up by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to the effect that those amounts are not made available only to the leaders of the parties, although the leaders are formally mentioned.

The fact is that, in any political party, there is some form of discipline and I believe the leader is the one who represents the whole party. Just as the Prime Minister represents the whole Liberal party, the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) represents Conservative members as a group, and the leader in parliament of the New Democratic party represents the socialist members of this house, and I feel I represent the members of the Ralliement Créditiste group.

This means, Mr. Chairman, that the help we receive belongs of necessity to our respective deputations. In my case, if we increase the staff assigned to research or such work as is absolutely essential, that staff will be available to our whole party. I believe the same applies to the other parties.

Now, there is another point to which the government or the Prime Minister must give much attention, and that is office facilities. At the present time, the situation is absolutely unbearable. In my own case, for instance, four employees share a single office about the size of a handkerchief, which is hardly satisfactory. The whip of the Liberal party is looking at me and signalling that this is a serious problem. He is, in fact, fully aware of the situation in which I find myself. More space must be found for the opposition parties.

Some minister have five, six or seven offices in the centre block, even though they have huge offices in their respective department buildings. Two sets of offices are provided for the ministers and for their parliamentary secretaries, whereas the opposition parties are in a strait jacket. They find it absolutely impossible to get any co-operation from the government. The opposition parties must be given more office space.

Another point which I want to bring to the attention of the house is that the right hon. Prime Minister has mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and repeated in this house this very afternoon that the public must realise the important role of the opposition in parliament. There is rather a contrast between that and what was said before the election, for example. The public was then told: Vote for the government if you want to get anything. They are urged to vote for the party in power, but no one knows which party will be in power. We often hear that.

Today, I think this clearly demonstrates the position and the importance of an efficient opposition which will preserve our democratic principles. That means that a member of the opposition must receive the same treatment as a member of the party in power, if we really want justice to prevail in the administration of public affairs.

I think that the fine initiative of the Prime Minister confirms the importance of an efficient opposition, well informed and prepared to play its part as a critic of a responsible government. Mr. Chairman, this is an essential condition so that the public may be aware of the importance of the opposition to the government.

Here is another point on which I wish to draw the attention of the Prime Minister. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said a while ago, an amount of $35,000 is allotted to the small parties of the opposition and $125,000 to the main opposition party. As for ideas, that party is smaller than the others, but it has more members than ours, I admit it.

We are bound by those recommendations which we feel constitute a first step towards helping the small parties of the opposition. Needless to say, eventually that will not be sufficient, because like every other minister or the Prime Minister himself we have more work than we can do. What staff does the Prime Minister have? A staff of 28 people: writers who prepare the speeches for the ministers and dozens of researchers, in short a numerous personnel.

Let us not forget, Mr. Chairman that although the right hon. Prime Minister indicates that it is not so, I believe he needs that staff to fulfil his duties properly and to enable the government to discharge its responsibilities. I am not criticizing the size of the staff, but I do want to point out what our situation is compared to that of the government.

The amounts we accept are just a start. They will help us, there is no doubt about it, to better fulfil our duties. They will help not only all the members of the Ralliement Créditiste, but their leader as well.

Mr. Chairman, the opposition might also play an efficient role in another field. I have already called the Prime Minister's attention to that matter by writing to him personally. It deals with transport facilities for the leaders of the various parties. For instance, we are invited to go to western Canada to speak before university students about the role of a parliamentarian or any other matter of public interest, and not to play politics, although that can be done. The Prime Minister is not above doing it at times; I have the right to do it too just like the leaders of the other opposition parties.

I asked the Prime Minister that a pass valid on Air Canada flights be delivered to the four federal political leaders. So far the Prime Minister does not need a pass, because he has his private plane, that is the government plane. The Leader of the Opposition has a pass which enables him to travel on all Air Canada routes from the Atlantic to the Pacific, whereas the leader of the New Democratic party and the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste do not have such a pass. As far as I am concerned, I have a pass which allows me to go home to Rouyn once a week. All hon. members have one. I am not asking that a pass be delivered to all hon. members, but the fact remains that there are two political leaders of parties now represented in parliament who do not have that pass.

The management of Air Canada has not even found it appropriate to answer me when I requested one and I say that the Prime Minister did not answer me either. Yet, he has received a personal letter from me on that matter.

When we have to pay such transportation costs, it means spending a considerable amount of money which we certainly cannot always take out of our own pocket. Sometimes people invite us and send us an airplane pass, so that we have nothing to pay. It seems to me that if the leaders of the New Democratic party and the Ralliement Créditiste had a pass enabling them to travel from eastern to western Canada, when they are invited to perform official functions, when they are invited by social clubs, chambers of commerce, municipal authorities, or to attend regional conventions of various organizations, Air Canada or the Canadian government would not be poorer for that.

Mr. Chairman, I draw the Prime Minister's attention on that point, to see whether it might be possible to add to both the two small items the amounts requested by the representatives of the New Democratic party and of the Ralliement Créditiste for the leaders, so that they are provided the same facilities as the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition to travel across country.

Mr. Chairman, before concluding my remarks, I want to thank sincerely the Prime Minister for his initiative. I commend him for having fulfilled a promise made in the Speech from the Throne. I think that the supplementary estimates will assist the members in giving a better service to their constituents, while enabling them to discharge their parliamentary duties even better. Thus the Canadian people whom we represent here in the House of Commons will be better served.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I would like first to congratulate the right. hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for this initiative which, I think, constitutes a step forward in the modernization of our parliamentary system. In my opinion, it was advisable to recognize the greater work-load of the party leaders and the additional credits which will be voted will serve to increase their staff. It is a very wise move. However, I hope it will be also followed by another measure long overdue and most important which would improve the services enjoyed by the hon. members.

You will agree with me, Mr. Chairman, that the role of the State, in our political society, is becoming increasingly important. We can expect it to grow apace. The complexity of public administration saddles the hon. members with new and extremely heavy obligations.

The people want their M.P. to fulfil his obligations as a legislator in Ottawa, but they also want him to be present in his riding to provide for all local needs. This is now practically impossible because of the evolution of our parliamentary system.

In view of this, it is advisable to provide members on both the government and opposition sides with services to enable them to fulfil their new responsibilities as well as their duties in the house and in their riding.

I think that, in view of these new needs, we should establish without delay secretariats in the ridings to assist each member with his work on behalf of his constituents. It is true—as pointed out earlier—that there is a staff to serve members, particularly in the library; this staff helps members in the preparation of their work and provides them with guidance in their research.

However, as a result of the evolution of parliamentary procedure—we now have to work practically 11 months a year in Ottawa. A member cannot be active here 11 months a year and make a useful contribution to the proceedings of the House of Commons, while keeping informed of the events in his constituency, in order to answer all the requests of his constituents and professional or social organizations. All that increasingly requires that a member should conduct forums, inform the public of the various political trends and attend social functions, especially those which stimulate the political activity and thought of his electors.

Now, I believe that it is extremely important that we should obtain as soon as possible some help in our constituencies, at least to enable the member, to be represented in order to assure some permanent cohesion between the aspirations of the people or the electors of a constituency and the policies applied and passed in Ottawa.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should provide a supplementary allowance to cover the costs involved in hiring a secretary in the riding, as well as renting premises and paying for long-distance telephone calls, because you know that the representatives of rural districts are often compelled to make long-distance calls from one locality to another and this is very expensive indeed. I do not see why a member who has an office in his riding could not have a direct line linking him with the various government departments.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to deal with another matter. This has already been raised earlier in the day by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) who is in favour of granting a permanent pass on Air Canada aircrafts to the leaders of the parties. I agree with that. I think this should have been done a long time ago.

Still, I should like to put the following question: if, in the early days of confederation, it was considered advisable to give Canadian members a pass on the railroad, I wonder why, today, considering the evolution in transportation and modern techniques which allow more travel by planes than by railway, the members of parliament could not be given passes on Air Canada planes, just as members were given passes on the trains in the early days of confederation.

• (1:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Baldwin: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it might be possible to agree to pass this item and later relate what we have to say to the supplementary estimates. I shall have some comments to make at that stage. Without any discourtesy to the hon. member for Papineau, when we come to the statutory item relating to the House of Commons, and vote No. 10, I think members of the committee will have perfect latitude to relate their remarks to this supplementary estimate. In order to accommodate the leaders of the parties I think we might agree to pass this supplementary estimate now and agree to relate our remarks to the statutory item and item No. 10 in the legislature estimates.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Provided that no exception will be taken to a speech by any member that might relate to the remarks of the Prime Minister or any other party leader I would be agreeable to that course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I also agree that we now pass item 20a but not item 1.

The Deputy Chairman: Before calling item 15a and item 20a I should draw the attention of the committee to the fact that supplementary items 15a and 20a were tabled this morning and as I interpret standing order 61 these items should not be considered or adopted in committee at this sitting.

Standing order 61 reads as follows:

If any motion be made in the House for any public aid or charge upon the people, the consideration and debate thereof may not be presently entered upon, but shall be adjourned till such further day as the House thinks fit to appoint; and then it shall be referred to a committee of the whole House, before any resolution or vote of the House do pass thereupon.

However, I assume there is unanimous consent. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are passing items 15a and 20a, not item 1.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(The following items were agreed to:)

15a. To extend the purposes of Legislature Vote 15 of the Revised Estimates for 1968-69 to include Canada's fee for membership in the Association Internationale des Parlementaires de Langue Française, $1,000.

20a. General Administration—Estimates of the Clerk, $81,250.

The Deputy Chairman: It being one o'clock the committee stands adjourned until 2.30 this afternoon.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply. When the committee rose at one o'clock we were discussing vote No. 1.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether it might be appropriate if we stood votes Nos. 1, 5, 10 and 15 and went on with vote 20 so that we could deal with the general administration of the house and in particular the various subject matters to which hon. members were referring this morning. We could return to these votes when the committee had satisfied itself with regard to vote 20.

The Deputy Chairman: Is this agreed?

20. General administration, $9,192,100.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, when the house took recess at one o'clock, I was saying that it was imperative that members of parliament have access to modern means of transportation and communication.

Years ago, through a legislative measure, parliament granted railway passes to its members. In this age of speed, it would be proper, I feel, to give the members special passes on Canadian airlines. The frequent use of planes for travel is now recognized and accepted by everyone.

Indeed, all the members of this house can travel by plane once a week between their respective ridings and Ottawa. To my mind, it was essential that this principle be recognized. It is especially handy in the case of those members who come from the Maritimes and the western provinces.

However, it should now be recognized that the members who are called upon to vote ever increasing amounts each year for the administration and the legislation of their country, should be able to travel quickly across the country to better know it and, in particular, to study at close range the problems they are called upon to solve.

I recognize that granting permanent passes to all the members of this house on Canadian airlines may cause those companies certain difficulties, but surely some way could be found to allow all the members who so wish to move about rapidly from one end of the country to the other, at least two or three times a year.

Mr. Chairman, I see magnanimity in the attitude of the leaders of the parties who will receive additional amount to help them in their work; I find them magnanimous in the fact that they are willing to share these amounts and this additional help with the members of their parties. But to me, this is not a solution. The needs of the party leaders have been recognized, and assistance is being given to them. They are now provided with extra sums of money so as to fulfil their responsibilities more efficiently. I do not think we should expect them to share those funds with the members of their parties. We must find right now some means of assisting all the members. To this end, I suggest first that the research personnel in the library of parliament should be increased; secondly, every member should be allowed to establish a secretariat in his own constituency. This is, I think, one of the most urgent and pressing needs if the members must continue to play a useful and efficient part in their constituency.

Finally, I think it should be possible for the members to travel about in this country in a swift, efficient and modern way, without having to spend fantastic amounts of money.

Those recommendations should be accepted as quickly as possible so as to render the members' work more effective, in the interest of the Canadian people.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to refer to a question directed to the Speaker on October 31 last by the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise) with regard to the translation situation in the committees.

Mr. Speaker, with his great kindness, had accepted to consider the matter and he had said:

> I would ask him to wait a few days to give me the opportunity to study the situation a little more closely and then I may be in a position to make a statement in the house—on this subject.

We know the tremendous difficulties encountered with regard to the translation of the evidence of the committees of the house, and if we refer to the report of the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), dated March 31, 1967, we see that the workload of the Canadian government translators is unbelievable and that the number of words and pages translated has tremendously increased during the last few years. This does not only apply to translation but also to interpretation.

I should like to suggest that we might go back to a practice which existed in the early 40's assigning to the House of Commons translators who would exclusively look after the translation of the Debates of the House of Commons and the proceedings of the committees. I think that we are now asking too much from the translation staff, and, to that end, I should like to quote part of the report of the Secretary of State.

> Additional to the requirements of parliament, assistance was provided (by the interpretation services) to departments, crown corporations, royal commissions and similar bodies in Ottawa, elsewhere in Canada and abroad.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

This means that often, when there is an urgent need for documents and material which have been submitted to one of the committees, unfortunately there are no translators available to do the work and to deliver simultaneously to the members and the public the texts in French and in English. This is a situation which, in my opinion, should be corrected as quickly as possible and I suggest with great deference that the Chair consider the advisability of assigning a staff of translators exclusively concerned with the business of the House of Commons and the committees.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, in the quiet retreat of the House of Commons on a Friday afternoon there is an excellent opportunity to make some comments on item 20 which deals with the House of Commons itself and to make some reference to the supplementary estimates which were passed. When all over the world today we see signs of violence and the desire of people to change their way of life by sudden and bloody means rather than by the infinite processes which democracy has made available to us, I think it is a good thing to take a minute or two to reflect on what we are, what we do and what we should be able to do. I do this in the full knowledge of the fact that the committee on procedure will be reporting by order of the house on December 1 and I do not intend, except indirectly, to infringe on what I hope will be a very useful and meaningful debate at that time.

I direct my remarks more particularly to the backbenchers opposite. I have been trying to incite a revolt over there for some time without too great a measure of success so far. With regard to the role of the backbencher, hon. members opposite must have been filled with jealousy and some admiration by the very useful and spectacular performance by the six members from Newfoundland who sit on the "right" side of the house and who were able to mount a concerted, effective and useful attack against the very unfair removal of Newfoundland's most necessary passenger train service. It did not take a great deal of time and it was done usefully and objectively. The hon. members spoke with eloquence and in an articulate way brought forward to this house and through this house to the country a very serious and urgent problem. I think they are entitled to the commendation of the people of this country and members of this house for demonstrating that it is possible to do so. I am confident that hon. members opposite must be very frustrated by the inhibitions that prevent them from emulating the kind of presentation the house saw when the members from Newfoundland put forward their arguments last week.

There are very eminent authorities for this sort of action. I am going to try to be as objective as I can, but I should like to quote some authorities to show the unfortunate predisposition of members of the Liberal party to fail, even in opposition, to take the independent stand they should. I have some quotations here which I will read and possibly hon. members will recognize the source later. All of them come from one article. The first one reads as follows:

> There is not remaining in this party (Liberal) one single man for whom principles mean more than power.

The next one reads:

> One finds among the old guard the same brutal cynicism.

Another one reads:

> I am only concerned with the anti-democratic reflexes of spineless Liberal herd.

Those are not my words, Mr. Chairman. I would not dream of saying that. Farther on I read:

> —I would have to point out in strongest terms the autocracy of the Liberal structure and the cowardice of its members.
> I have never seen, in all my examination of politics, so degrading a spectacle as that of all these Liberals turning their coats in unison with their chief, when they saw a chance to take power.

Those are sad words, Mr. Chairman. And again:

> —where was there a single well-known Liberal to stand up for the constitution of the party, to raise his voice against dictation by the leader, to question his authority thus to commit the party?

Since the present Prime Minister, Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau, used these words in 1963 so effectively and truthfully, I wonder how many backbenchers there are sitting opposite me who would like to say the same thing but who, because of the description which has been given of them, do not dare do so.

Having thus established a foundation which I hope will be continued, I believe this issue becomes one with which we must all be concerned and upon which will be predicated not necessarily the survival of this house—I am not one of those who feel that this institution may be threatened—but the shape in which it will survive. Its opportunities to make a useful contribution, not only to preserve but to restructure and improve our society, depend on what we do with it and what use we make of the power and authority which it has.

Not long ago I read a very interesting book by Mr. Humphrey Berkeley, a former British member of parliament who belonged to the Tory party. He is no longer a member now. The book is called, "The Power Of The Prime Minister". In it he points out very succinctly the rising power of the prime minister and the addition to the structure of the prime minister's office. He points out the frightful consequences which might well occur as a result.

As a matter of fact, Mr. Berkeley was a very progressive member of parliament. It was he who sponsored and brought forward in the United Kingdom the legislation which was eventually passed dealing with acts of gross indecency. Whether or not one believes in his views, it is at least to his credit that he was able to do this as a private member. He was also very prominent in trying to help the government and parliament to secure reforms in connection with the abolition of capital punishment and changes and reforms in the divorce law.

In his book he points out how slowly, step by step and stage by stage over a period of years, power flowed from the House of Commons into the hands of the government and since then has come to rest almost exclusively upon the shoulders of the prime minister. Of course he makes certain proposals as to how this can be changed. I will not go into them, but here is a man with six years of practical experience in the House of Commons in the United Kingdom who challenged the effectiveness of the rota system in the question period in the English House of Commons. I think anyone who reads Mr. Berkeley's book will see precisely what this government and the Prime Minister are attempting to do and will then conclude that the opposition has indeed been wise and sensible in the attitude it has taken that this change cannot be made. While there may be room for some alteration in the question period, it cannot and must not be done in the way the Prime Minister is attempting to do it but must be done through the process of discussion and reaching a consensus.

If I had the time, Mr. Chairman, I could take the committee stage by stage, act by act, through the legislative process which we have undergone in this country. Even at this session the major bills which have been passed have all resulted in a further stripping away of power from this House of Commons and giving it to the government. The Canadian National financing bill contained nine clauses giving the Governor General in Council the power to do things which normally would only be the prerogative of this parliament. I recognize it is essential for the proper functioning of the democratic process to give certain powers from time to time to the government. We have seen this happen in bill after bill, session after session. I believe the major points on which the opposition took issue with the government in connection with the farm credit legislation which was passed this session had to do with those areas where power was given to the government to fix the interest rates which would be applied to farmers of this country in an arbitrary fashion. I believe an examination of all legislation passed would show this to be the case.

I have already indicated that to some extent this is necessary. However, to the extent that it is necessary, it is even more essential that we must retain within the four corners of this chamber the independent right to challenge the government when from time to time the government is wrong. The only way we can have that independent right is when backbenchers on the government side and other members have the intestinal fortitude it takes to challenge the government when the government is wrong. There is no doubt that this is going to happen very frequently in the next four years. We must retain within the four corners of this chamber the right to challenge the government, the right to compel the government to give an accounting. We are not here simply to say: Ready, aye ready, pass your legislation; we will restrict ourselves to a feeble protest. Far more than that must be the essential requirement to retain an effective and useful parliamentary system

There are many ways in which this tendency is shown. There is excessive secrecy. There is no doubt that this government has gone far beyond the action it needs to take in order to preserve certain minimum requirements of secrecy. Certainly no one would dare disagree with the right of the Prime Minister to restrict his cabinet ministers in their utterances so that they will not reveal what has taken place within the secrecy of the privy council chamber. However, the government has gone much beyond that. I say that because this fact is demonstrated in the house day after day when members on the opposition side attempt to secure from the government the facts which they must have if they are going to discharge their duties. These attempts are stone-walled. We get answers but they say nothing. We get statements but they have nothing of fact or consequence included in them. I believe this is well established.

I have here a very interesting article which appeared in this morning's Montreal Gazette written by Gordon Pape. The article is concerned with the problems and difficulties of government. While it is lengthy, the author has only had the space to touch upon a few of these. I should like to refer to the paragraph dealing with excessive secrecy in government:

> There was nothing terribly unusual about Mr. Trudeau's edict last summer that cabinet and caucus sessions should be kept secret. Almost every new party leader has, on taking office, made similar statements.
> What was unusual was the zeal with which official Ottawa reacted to the statements. Civil servants, many of whom tend to be timid with the press—it is difficult to understand that statement.

> —to begin with, have used the Prime Minister's warnings as an excuse to clam up. Some cabinet ministers have become wary with newsmen—

How could they?

> —even about matters having to do only with their own departments.
> The over-all effect has been to stifle the news flow out of Ottawa to some degree, and to lessen rather than increase public debate on issues up for government scrutiny.

This is the essential reason why there must be complete freedom in the necessary flow of information from the government. This flow of information is necessary in order that members of the opposition may exercise their prerogative of acting for the millions of people who sent them here to challenge the government from time to time and ask the government for the facts. Only in the broad light of publicity are the processes of democracy useful and effective.

This brings me to the last point I want to make. I know there are other members who are most anxious to make their own contribution to the debate on this item. I should like to refer to the extent to which the usefulness of this institution is, in a way, being impaired by the emergence of a new media of reporting. I have no great complaints with the press as a whole. If you manage to read enough newspapers or if you read the same newspaper long enough, you get a fairly balanced diet. It may well be that the people who do not look below the headlines may not find this to be the case. However, if the opinion makers read enough newspapers, I think one can obtain some balance and enough of the facts to know what is going on here and what are the issues.

In recent years a completely new element has been introduced through the media of radio and television reporting. I believe that this and other parliaments must soon come to some decision about how we are going to deal with it. Here we have a situation where members of this house—cabinet ministers, leading members of the opposition parties and backbenchers on both sides—have lavished loving care and objectivity in putting together a speech dealing with a current public issue. The speech is delivered in the house or a question may be asked and answered in the house. Then, outside the doors of this chamber members are met with microphones and cameras and are expected to compress within the limited time of 30 or 60 seconds a complete answer. The result may be a distortion of what has been said in the speech. I am not being critical of the people who ask for these statements. It is a fact of life that this media is here and is not going to go away. Hopefully, we are not going to go away either, so we have to bring these two facts together.

We have seen an illustration of this in a somewhat different fashion when the right hon. Prime Minister saw fit to discuss certain issues in a meeting with students at Kingston. In doing so I think he has created a great deal of confusion and a great many problems for some people in the country and for some of those who represent the country.

When we first come to Ottawa, Mr. Chairman, and go into the office of the Clerk to take the oath of office I think we must leave outside the door of his office some of our private life. When we go a step farther up the ladder and are called to Government House and there sworn to the privy council, we leave outside the front door of the Governor General's house a great deal more of our private life. If we become prime minister—and I use the word "we" very loosely, Mr. Chairman—I think it becomes very difficult indeed to retain much of our private life. I do not care how valid the reason or how good the intention, the person who has the honour to hold the first citizenship of this land and be prime minister must understand that he cannot divide himself into a personal self and a public self. When he appears on the public platform or before the television cameras he cannot say anything other than as prime minister of the country. When that fact is recognized, Mr. Chairman, I hope it will make somewhat easier the task of the prime minister's colleagues who sit on the same side of the house as he, as well as all of us in the house, who wish to see the affairs of this country properly and well conducted.

In any event, the time has now come for us to have a good hard look at the question of television and radio coverage of our proceedings. Are we going to let cameras in here? Like the camel and the Arab, the camel is just outside and beginning to get its nose through the door. Are we going to let it proceed in the hit and miss fashion that we have seen existing in the past?

I for one, Mr. Chairman, will be quite honest and say that I have had strong objections, and I still have, to this kind of coverage, but I am beginning to wonder whether those objections are valid any longer. If we are going to be able to portray to the people of this country and to the world a fair representation, in terms of balance, of what takes place here, then must we not consider approaching the question in a proper and a scientific way?

I do not think that we in this chamber alone can make the rules, though certainly we must have the right of veto. However, I do suggest—and I throw this out as a hint and hope that other hon. members will have something to contribute to it—that before too long a time has elapsed we should get together a group that would include members of this house, members of the other place, some of the chief representatives of the media and see whether or not it is possible to work out a way by which a fair and accurate representation of what takes place in this house from day to day can be presented to the people instead, as I say, of the hit and miss method we are following at the present time.

To me, Mr. Chairman, the securing of ways and means to bring this about represents the greatest difficulty. If the Lord would consent to come down and act as censor and edit the tape, then we might well be able to work out this problem. I was in the United Kingdom last February, and as most hon. members know the British parliament has been fooling with this same question. The House of Commons rejected it. The House of Lords did allow cameras into the chamber on an experimental basis for one debate. This was put on tape and there was a selective showing for those whose hearts were strong enough to stand it. In typical British fashion this debate of noble lords and ladies centred around Sunday sport, on whether or not they should play cricket on Sunday, hold horse races and so on. I must say the debate was not too exciting, but the screening showed two speakers from either side, two from the government and two from the Conservative side. I did not stay to see the showing any longer, but an attempt was made to represent fairly what did take place. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was there and he did indicate he hoped the film would be brought back so as to add support for his campaign to have the Senate abolished.

But seriously, Mr. Chairman, we must wait no longer in facing up to this problem and deciding how to deal with it. Bearing in mind the quite unfair and improper campaigns of vilification that have gone on against many democratic institutions all over the world, the time has now come for us to secure some way of ensuring that what goes on in this place is accurately and properly portrayed to the people of Canada. I say this, Mr. Chairman, because the time may well come when we want in the savings bank of good will the greatest possible fund of understanding and appreciation of what is essential to the survival of this country. Somehow the members in this chamber must secure a distillation of the united wisdom of all the people they represent so that when the occasion arises, as it will from time to time, this wisdom may be set against the government and the will of the people will prevail.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Chairman, I do not want to comment very much on what the hon. member for Peace River had to say except to say that in essence his speech was a forerunner of the one that will follow in the debate on the report of the procedure committee. This committee has been engaged in its occupation for a long time, most of that time without the presence of the hon. member for Peace River. On the whole it seems to me that it would be advisable and desirable to let the committee complete its deliberations without opening up a debate on the question of procedure. Therefore, if I do not comment on some of the points he raised at this time my silence does not indicate agreement in any sense with what he said, but rather that I think we should wait for the procedure committee to report and deal with the subject matter then.

I believe the member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) has studied the matter seriously and his suggestions, especially with regard to the translation of the Hansard and the committee reports prove it. I should like to advise the house that later today it will have the opportunity to adopt a motion authorizing an experience with regard to the committees of the house.

As the members know, we have simultaneous translation in the committees, and the officials of the House, have suggested that it might be possible to get a written translation of that interpretation with the original text, as we do in the case of new bills. Thus, we could get the committee reports within a few days of the sittings of the committees instead of a few weeks as is now the case.

I believe also that the house might be willing to pass unanimously this afternoon, a motion which would allow us to adopt that procedure on an experimental basis from now until the Christmas recess.

The hon. member for Papineau, also mentioned secretaries in the ridings and he told us that it is the practice now in Quebec to make these facilities available to the members of the provincial legislature and also to grant them travelling expenses everywhere in Canada as well as other benefits so as to help them better fulfil their duty.

Therefore, I should like to suggest that it might be possible, in the second half of this session, to appoint a committee consisting of hon. members representing all the parties in the house, to study an increase in the staff and an improvement in the working conditions of the hon. members, so that they may better perform their task which consists mainly in representing their voters, reviewing legislation and legislating in the best interests of the Canadian people.

I will also discuss this with my colleagues and the leaders of the other parties in the house to arrive perhaps at a formula which will allow us, in other instances, to consider the working conditions of the members with a view to improving them.

And just to reassure the back-benchers of our party, we admit that we have granted opportunities to the opposition. It is first of all an opportunity for the leaders of the other parties.

We are also fully aware of the problems faced by the members and we do intend to solve them.

• (3:10 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to follow the argument advanced by the President of the Privy Council. After listening to the hon. member for Peace River speak about parliament I thought I might refer to several matters. He pointed out that there had been a great change over a period of years in the power and authority of the Prime Minister, a weakening in the power of parliament itself, and particularly in the power of backbenchers.

Throughout the years one of my objectives has been to do everything I could to bring about a full and complete participation, within the limits of parliamentary time, for those hon. members who, elected for the first or second time to the House of Commons, remain backbenchers. I have found from experience that their contributions mean most in giving parliament new hope, new idealism and a new concept of the needs of their generation. Ever since the first world war the trend has certainly been away from the backbencher. The trend in Canada has been similar to that in the United Kingdom. The centralization of power in the Prime Minister, and indirectly but powerfully in the cabinet, has brought about a condition that is not healthy to the concept of the House of Commons being the house of the common people.

In setting forth his views the hon. gentleman referred to the radio and television facilities that are now immediately available in the foyer of the House of Commons. There must be a good reason for this to have happened. My analysis of the change that has been brought about is that more and more the press gives less and less space to the speeches made by hon. members in the House of Commons. I recognize there is every reason for that. High costs that are ever-rising make it impossible for the press in any event to give anything more than a mere summary of what each hon. member may contribute to the house in his speech. I may be repetitious in advancing these remarks, but I have advanced them before.

I should like to see the press of our country follow the example of the London Times which daily sets out what took place in the House of Commons and in the House of Lords the day before. A line or two is devoted to each hon. member who spoke and the purport of their views.

Nothing is more discouraging to those serving in parliament than, after having prepared their speeches, to have no one listen to them. Speeches are not listened to unless they are well prepared and show that the midnight oil has been burned. Often a young man or young woman works with dedication to prepare a speech and then finds that there is no mention of it in the press. Hell hath no fury like the failure to mention an hon. member's contribution in the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It would not require much space to make possible this suggestion. I should like to see it tried because I think it would raise the standard of debate in the house if newly elected members or backbenchers in making their contributions knew they would find a short summary of their remarks in the press. That is the first suggestion I make.

I think one reason for the tremendous expansion in the television and radio audience is that television and radio each day let the people of Canada know first hand what has happened. When an hon. member is interviewed outside the house he is able to epitomize and summarize in 30 seconds or a minute the embodiment of the argument he has endeavoured to advance. He thereby becomes known to his constituents, to his province, and to the country. Except for the instrumentality of the media there is no effective way for a new hon. member or backbencher to make his presence and his contribution in the house known.

The tremendous centralization of authority has been mentioned. Until 1914 the Prime Minister was the first among equals. Then began a constitutional change. The books on constitutional development that were written between 1875 and 1914 have no application to the parliaments of today. The prime ministers of an earlier period of history were the custodians of the rights of parliament against the crown. The prime minister of today, of this generation, has become more powerful relatively, under the British system of parliament we have adopted, than the President of the United States.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Supply—Legislature

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Nixon will become president in January. He will find in Congress, that is, in the Senate and the House of Representatives, the opposite party in a majority. Unless the members of Congress decide to make it possible for the presidential system to operate effectively, he will find himself unable to carry out whatever policies he has advocated unless they are generally acceptable. The Prime Minister is in a different position. He can exercise the overwhelming power which derives from his ability to recommend dissolution, a power which places him in the position not of being first among equals but of being first.

The present Prime Minister of Canada made a declaration that he wanted no more leaks from cabinet or from caucus. I cannot criticize that as far as cabinet is concerned. There was a time within the last two or three years when all that was necessary in order to be fully conversant with most of the controversial matters which arose in cabinet was to have half an hour to spare after the cabinet had met. That was wrong. That was dangerous to our system. When the Prime Minister enunciated the principle that there was to be no more of this, he not only enunciated a principle which was proper and fitting but one which was completely consonant with the constitutional responsibility of ministers. In the last few days, however, the fears of yesterday are being disregarded. Ministers are now going here and there making announcements. While this House of Commons is sitting, if an hon. member asks what is the view of the government with reference to statements which are being made, the answer is certainly not one which indicates any endeavour to give an answer.

We have seen an example within the last 48 hours. The Leader of the Opposition, together with other hon. members in all opposition parties, was pressing to find out where this government stands on the subject of NATO—what the Canadian attitude is to be, whether there is to be a change, whether it is intended for Canada to depart from its responsibilities to stand in confrontation against communism through NATO or whether we as Canadians are to adopt a new isolationism whereby, though remaining a member of this organization, we shall not carry a fair and responsible share of the load. We could not get an answer.

One has only to read Hansard in the last few weeks to realize that the period for questions is mainly given to questions, not to answers. We have reached a point at which a question asked is becoming a question unanswered, regardless of its simplicity or the need for an answer. It is true there are some ministers who will give an answer, and I follow the course of thanking them when they do so. There are others who are adopting an attitude of mind which is pretty close to being contemptuous toward those who ask questions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The President of the Treasury Board, with his experience of parliament and his kindly face, disagrees. When he has been here a little longer he will agree. I always like the affability with which he approaches these problems.

Yesterday we could not get an answer regarding NATO. There was talk, there was uncertainty, there were woolly pronouncements on the subject of NATO. Yet, while parliament asked these questions, 3,000 miles away a minister was giving an international organization information which parliament had the right to know but which parliament was denied. This will not make for an effective House of Commons.

There are, naturally, matters of a secret nature which cannot be revealed. But when the questions were asked yesterday and the day before, and the answers given had all the uncertainty of deception, one cannot expect parliament to enjoy the respect that it should command. We ought to have been given answers. Today, following the effusive frankness of the Minister of National Defence abroad, the Prime Minister gave answers, and by the time he was through I doubt that one Canadian had one certain idea of what this government intends to do with regard to the organization which has preserved our freedom since 1948. In the interests of preserving this institution I implore ministers to see to it that questions are answered.

There are two new ministers from the west, each without portfolio. These two ministers have in the course of the last six weeks recognized that parliament is entitled to information, and I commend them for the manner in which they have answered questions with regard to departmental matters for which they only recently accepted responsibility. This should be the course followed by all ministers.

We do not expect ministers to tell us everything. That would not be human. But after the loose nonsense which was spoken at Queen's and the still looser talk at Halifax about Stalingrad, the Nazis and the like, we are entitled to have answers which are appropriate to questions asked about the defence of Canada, even though, because of the limitations of the need for secrecy, full information cannot be given.

I am glad to see that in the last two or three weeks ministers have to a considerable extent removed the shackles of silence. They are showing less fear than they showed following the declaration of eternal silence for them. I only hope that ministers such as the minister of defence, when he returns to this house, will display the same freedom to speak in the house as he has shown abroad.

I listened to our house leader dealing with the subject of prime ministers and their power. It has been an amazing transition that has taken place. There are few who have ever analysed what is happening in our parliamentary system. With the passing years, the power centre has shifted increasingly to the prime minister. The reason is the acceleration of powers that have come about through the practice of successive prime ministers. The expression "prime minister" is not to be found in Canada's written constitution. The British North America Act makes no reference to it. No one was sworn in as prime minister from 1867 until 1920 at which time Right Hon. Arthur Meighen was sworn in as the first prime minister. Since then it is of interest to note that one or two of those who have been prime minister have not taken the oath as prime minister, because there is no position for which such oath can be taken.

Until 1896 there was no designation of the powers of a prime minister. In 1896 Sir Charles Tupper, in the short period he was in office, decided there should be a declaration as to the authority of the prime minister and an order in council was passed which, in general, has been followed by successive prime ministers from Tupper to Mackenzie King.

The last of these power declarations was by Right Hon. Mackenzie King. Mr. St. Laurent, when he followed as prime minister, did not add to or detract from the powers. When I followed him I made no declaration, and my information is that neither did Mr. Pearson, nor the present prime minister. Therefore the powers in general are set out in an order in council which Mr. King had passed in 1935 shortly after he took office.

If I might place it on record, sir, it answers many of the queries as to the powers of the prime minister. It says first:

> A meeting of a committee of the privy council is at the call of the prime minister and, in his absence, of that of the senior privy councillor, if the president of the council be absent.

The quorum is four, and the order in council sets out:

> No submission for approval to the Governor General can be made with a less number than the quorum.
> A minister cannot make recommendations to council affecting the discipline of another department.

The prerogative rights of the Prime Minister are the right of dissolution and convocation of parliament, the appointment of privy councillors, of cabinet ministers, of lieutenant governors, of provincial administrators, of the Speaker of the Senate, of the chief justices of all courts, of senators, of subcommittees of council, of treasury board, of the committee of internal economy of the House of Commons, of deputy heads of departments, of the librarians of parliament, of crown appointments in both houses of parliament, and of the Governor General's secretarial staff. I may be wrong in this but my recollection is that Mr. King had this further one added: recommendations in any department.

In other words, the power of the prime minister is an overriding one that knows no challenge. Prime ministers should not make statements off the record outside the house, or in answer to questions, that may give rise to answers that will be prejudicial to the nation, to the people, or lastly to the government. Normally speaking, the average period is some 15 years being a member before becoming prime minister, because the prime minister carries in his person the leadership of the nation. He is the example to the people of the nation, to the youth of the nation and, above all, he must uphold the rights of the institution in which he has the first position; and in saying that I am not forgetting that the Speaker is the First Commoner.

I suggest that we in this house should try out television and see whether it will work. The example that was quoted of what happened in the United Kingdom in the House of Lords, and of the day chosen to test out the efficacy of television, does not convince me in any way that it would not be helpful.

I can tell you, Mr. Chairman, if we had television in this house, not for all day, not for several hours, but with a committee limiting it to 20 minutes per day, we would have no more absenteeism in the house after the first showing of the television across Canada. I cannot think of anything that to a greater extent would bring about the fullest of attendance than just a daily general survey of the house by a television camera. It would do that which nothing else could possibly achieve.

I hope the government will do everything it can not to appear to push rules down to the house. The President of the Privy Council is an affable and distinguished looking man, but he has developed a complex which is a dangerous one—the idea that he can say to parliament what it is going to do. It was a frightful mistake when this serial presentation of ministers was provided, and it came about when a committee of parliament had been set up and was desirous of bringing about changes. Changes should never be brought about by the autocracy of any minister or by the action of any majority. Changes have got to represent the viewpoint of the house.

Second, in any changes you have in mind remember this: Do not destroy the mission of this house. Some talk of efficiency: "We want parliament to be efficient" has been the cry for 150 years. Parliament is not a joint stock company in which the prime minister is the president of the board of directors, the ministers are directors, and the rest of us are shareholders. Such a concept of parliament will bring about efficiency, as Hitler found and Mussolini found, but what will be lost will be that human element, that desire to co-operate together while differing in detail, to demonstrate that while having strong opinions members are united in one purpose, the pursuance of and the maintenance of freedom.

I hope the President of the Privy Council will not allow himself the luxury of his high position to endeavour to force parliament to do what the government would like. Let him show that fine spirit of co-operation he exhibits from time to time when he is desirous of getting something through but which he forgets thereafter. Let us co-operate together to make this institution, not greater than it has been in the past but the institution that we will defend, rather than join in criticizing at a time when there is such a contagious attitude in all the western world to criticize these institutions which have preserved our freedom for generations.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

[Translation]

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Chairman, having listened to the French speech delivered by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald), I summoned my courage to begin my remarks in French.

An hon. Member: Very good.

Mr. Deachman: The members of the House of Commons were recently given the opportunity of learning French. In 1967, the House of Commons set up a French immersion course at the Royal Military College in Saint-Jean.

This summer, through the co-operation of the Secretary of State, we had French lessons during three weeks under the direction of professors from the Public Service Language School.

Moreover, since last winter we pursued our studies with the help of professors from that school and again in 1968, we had an immersion course in Saint-Jean, this time for a two-week period.

As you can see, Mr. Chairman, with such a service it is possible for a westerner like me to speak French, perhaps not fluently but sufficiently well to share in a not too complicated discussion. In that way, we have helped the progress of the study of the French language in this house, amongst the members and in the public service.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Continue in French.

Some hon. Members: In French, in French.

Mr. Caouette: Everyone noticed the hon. member's ability to express himself well in French. When we hear him relate the various episodes he experienced during his French studies both in the public service and with the members, I wonder whether he did not start learning French well when we went on our trip to Russia a few years ago; at that time, he already expressed himself reasonably well in French.

[English]

Mr. Deachman: I wish to thank the hon. member for his compliment and for his remarks.

I should like to continue for a moment or two with regard to another subject in connection with the House of Commons and its services. This alludes to what we were discussing this morning on the question of research services. I was very gratified indeed to see that a sum of money has been provided for an increase in the research services for the office of the Leader of the Official Opposition and the offices of the leaders of other opposition parties in the house. I should like also to refer to the remarks made by the Prime Minister concerning the research services now available in the library of the House of Commons.

There are some things which might be noted about these services. First of all, as was pointed out very ably this morning by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the services do not include the backbench members on the government side. In fact and in reality they hardly include the back bench members on the other side of the house. These research services are pretty strictly confined to the offices of the leaders of the opposition parties and in fact once they are implemented will not have any real official status.

At this time, although I believe it is apparent to every member of the house, I should like to point out to members how difficult it is in standing committees of the House of Commons, when we examine the government, to have available to us competent assistants in the form of research experts who are capable of guiding us in an intelligent examination of the servants of crown agencies who appear before us. One of the best places to see this phenomenon is in the committee on transport and communications because this committee deals with a subject that is very technical indeed and one which certainly requires a good deal of expertise on the part of members before they can properly come to grips with what is a very complicated and technical subject. If as members of parliament we wished in that committee to examine intelligently let us say the officials of the C.N.R. or, as was the case this morning in respect of the members from Newfoundland, if we wished to examine the new commissioner of the Canadian Transport Commission on the subject of passenger service in Newfoundland, surely we should have available to us through the committee system of the house technical guidance which would enable us at an official level to penetrate the field of administration and examine these people on a competent basis.

Certainly this is the way examinations are carried out in a law court. It is the way the government itself functions through royal commissions and all kinds of other investigations when it wants to find out something and investigate the technicalities of it. This I believe must be a part of the services of the House of Commons if we as backbenchers are to make real progress. I think it must be recognized that within the framework of the House of Commons we are two kinds of people. First of all, we are members of parliament, but in addition to that there are the cabinet ministers who have an administrative function to perform and who have a body of experts who travel with them and assist them whenever they make statements. For our part as members, we have no expertise available to us when we examine the experts whom we must confront each time we have the officials of a department before us during a meeting of a standing committee of the House of Commons. So, when looking at the subject of expanding research, I appeal to the administration today to consider that all of us here in the House of Commons are badly in need of an increased capability built into the committee system which would enable us to perform effectively the work of the standing committees when we examine the estimates and other matters which come before the House of Commons.

I shall not pursue this much further, although I should like to bring out another highlight. When I first came to this house in 1963 the then minister of national defence had promised that he would have established within the House of Commons a committee on national defence. He carried out that promise, so we were the first members of a committee whose function it was generally to look into questions of national defence. We were for the first time faced with the problem of coming to understand the function of a department which was then spending a quarter of the taxes raised from the people of Canada for federal services, namely $1.5 billion. One can readily imagine how difficult it was for a novice in the House of Commons to have any comprehension of what $1.5 billion was, much less how that amount of money could be spent within the framework of a department such as the Department of National Defence which, through tradition, had been very secretive indeed about how its budget was handled and where the money went.

During my years on that committee I gradually came to know a little about what it meant to operate a department which spent $1.5 billion, and how that money was spent. I also came to have some critical ability to talk about the work of the department. But when I came to the study of railway matters in the transport committee, I found myself, much more at a loss to understand what was going on inside the offices of Canadian National Railways, Air Canada or other services under the Department of Transport. I understood less about what was going on in respect of these matters than I did about what was happening within the offices of the Department of National Defence.

This is an area which I do not believe we will be able to penetrate today unless we have at the committee level research facilities available to the members of committees concerned with these matters. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, my appeal in closing these remarks is for the continuation of what we have started today, namely research facilities available to members of parliament on a larger scale, and in so doing to put these departmental matters on a basis available to committees and at a level which committee members can penetrate. This will assist hon. members in following government policy and assessing what should be done in the best public interest.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to deal today with the subject on which we began discussion this morning and which the Prime Minister led off, namely the subject of increased assistance to members of parliament in the field of research. I do this, not in the almost apologetic way in which I felt the Prime Minister backed into this subject, but because in my opinion, and I think in the opinion of people who have studied the functioning of government and parliament in great detail, it is of the utmost importance that all members of parliament, those in government and opposition, including backbench members on the government side of the house, obtain the kind of assistance which will permit them to do the job required.

The government of Canada is every year dealing with more problems which face the Canadian people. We are spending this year over $10.5 billion. In the last dozen years we have more than doubled the expenditures of the federal government. I am not critical of this; I think we have done no more than we ought to have done. Indeed I think there are many things which we ought to have dealt with but have not yet considered. It does not surprise me that the staff available to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet has been increased at a fantastic rate. I am not critical of that.

I think we all recognize that the staff of this Prime Minister has doubled since the government took office. Speaking from memory—and I do not think I am far wrong in saying this—press reports are that there are now some 28 people, or there were a month ago and this is probably out of date now, working in the Prime Minister's office. This is double the number of people working in the office of Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, when he was prime minister.

The Prime Minister has decided—and I am not being critical—to open up what he has called regional desks in his office. The Globe and Mail of November 4 this year lists some of the people who have already been assigned to the task of handling regional desks. There is Mr. David Thompson, who is the regional officer for western Canada. Jean Hache is looking after the regional desk for the maritimes, and Mr. Levasseur is at the moment looking after the Quebec regional desk. He is looking at Ontario candidates for a replacement for that position. I think this is necessary.

As the right hon. member for Prince Albert said a short while ago, the office of the Prime Minister is increasingly important in the decision making of governments of this country. I think it is necessary and I support the increases which have been made. However, the Prime Minister's office is not the only one which has an increase in staff. What is true of the Prime Minister's office is true, on a smaller scale, of every minister. We now have more ministers than this country has ever had. We have ministers and associate ministers. We have ministers without portfolio. We have a whole host of parliamentary secretaries. Each of these has executive assistants, speech writers and public relations officers.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Parliamentary secretaries?

Mr. Orlikow: No, the ministers. Like my colleague the hon. member for Skeena, I have not quite been able to figure out, in the six years I have been here, what parliamentary secretaries do, if anything.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Orlikow: Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am not going to deal with them. But each of the ministers has the staff which I have mentioned.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The parliamentary secretaries have hope.

Mr. Orlikow: As the member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, parliamentary secretaries live in the hope that they will be something more at a future date.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): That is something you do not have.

Mr. Orlikow: Not only do ministers have the staffs I have mentioned, but they have the full time assistance—I am not being critical; it could not be any other way—of a very competent civil service which is there to help them develop programs, draft legislation and work out the details of the expenditures their departments will be making. This is the way parliamentary government must work, and I have no objection to that. I do object to the feeling which I have had since I came to this house—and I am sure hon. members who were here before me feel this even stronger than I do—that on the government benches there is an attitude that somehow this government and its party have an almost divine right to rule the country. I happen to believe in democracy. It is at least theoretically possible that at some time in the future some members on this side—I am not even going to say members of the party to which I belong—will be sitting on the other side of the house and forming a government. If this is so, and if the democratic system is to function effectively, surely the opposition must be able to develop alternative policies to those proposed by the government.

If that is so, surely the opposition must be able to look in detail and in depth at the policies the government proposes. Surely the opposition must be able to look at the programs which are now operating, and at the expenditures of each department which, as I mentioned earlier, amount in total to more than $10½ billion this year. If one is to do that, he must have the technical training, the skill, the knowledge and the knowhow to do it in detail. I submit that there are very few members of parliament, if any, who have either the technical knowledge—and certainly there are no members of parliament who have the time—or the knowhow to go into the kind of detailed study of all the facets of government operation, legislation and expenditures which is necessary to do the job, and still do their work as members of parliament. This is as true of the members of the opposition in 1968 as it was of the members of the opposition in the period from 1957 to 1963, who are now sitting on the government side of the house.

I can speak only from my own experience. Since I came here in 1962 we have inaugurated a whole series of programs in which I believe, in principle, and which I support in principle; and yet on the basis of what I have been able to see and on the basis of discussions I have been able to have with people whom I know to be experts in the field—not people who work for the government but people in universities, in the co-operative movement, in trade unions and in the business world—I am satisfied we are making some major mistakes, and we are wasting a good deal of money. I am not suggesting for a moment that there is deliberate sabotage and that the government is doing this knowingly. I am simply saying that on the basis of my experience I have some very important reservations, and I shall deal with them very briefly, just to illustrate what I have in mind.

We have a new Department of Manpower and Immigration. We are spending a very substantial amount of money on manpower training, but we need to spend more money on that than we have spent until now because in our increasingly technological age a person who wants to work and who does not have the skills required has virtually no chance of getting any kind of decent wage. Yet the fact is that if you discuss the problem of manpower training with the provincial departments of education you find a pretty general feeling that to a large extent our whole program is on the wrong foot and that we are not doing the job that is required. No doubt the provincial departments have their faults, as I well know, but they still have more knowledge about education, both for young people and for adults, than any other group in the country.

A week or so ago the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, in answer to questions, told members of the house that this year the department was spending substantially more on manpower training programs in Ontario and Quebec—these were the two provinces about which he was questioned—than it had spent last year. Yet I saw the most recent figures for the number of people who are enrolled in manpower training courses in the city of Toronto, courses financed by the federal government's program, and I saw too that in the last month or so we have simply come back in terms of numbers to the number of people who were being educated two years ago under manpower training programs in the city of Toronto, one of the two largest labour markets of the country. That was the time when this program was initiated, and when the former agreements with the provinces were wiped out. I say that in my opinion and in the opinion of the people to whom I have spoken, and who are much more expert and much less political than I am, there is something basically wrong with our manpower training programs.

I submit that it is virtually impossible for members of parliament, because of the pressure of time and the large number of subjects they have to deal with, to do the kind of detailed examination required. Let us look at the ARDA programs. There is not a member of parliament who would disagree with the basic principle enunciated in the ARDA legislation and programs. Certainly we need to do something very drastic to get rid of rural poverty. We know that a substantial majority of the people who are living in poverty in Canada are living in rural areas of this country, both in eastern and in western Canada, and the original idea of ARDA, that the government of Canada in co-operation with the provinces would begin a program of consolidating land holdings and making individual farms larger, so that the people who remain will be able to earn a living of a kind which one can expect in a rich country like Canada in 1968, is a good idea.

I am told by a man whom I consider to be the most knowledgeable expert in the field of agricultural economics in Canada that until recently we gave very little thought to our ARDA programs and to the problems, not of those people who will remain on large farms and who hopefully will be able to make a decent living, but to the problems of those people whose farms will be purchased and who hopefully will move away from the farms on which they have lived for generations.

Where are they to go? These are people with very little education. What will they do when they move into the cities and towns of Canada? Will they become simply more unemployed and unemployable people? I think these are very valid questions which need to be asked, and I would hope that at some point the whole ARDA program would be scrutinized in greatest detail. I suggest that to do this members of the opposition, and indeed members on all sides, need to have the kind of expert advice we have not had up to now.

In my opinion one of the saddest debacles, of what should have been a wonderful and exciting idea, which I have seen since I came here in 1962 is what has happened to the Company of Young Canadians. The idea is excellent; it was an exciting one, but if one looks at the projects they have initiated and have tried to accomplish since the company was first set up he sees that there has been disaster after disaster. Project after project was begun, continued for a few months and then abandoned.

Why was that? This is the kind of thing members of parliament, either here in the house or in committee, ought to be looking at in depth. But to do that you need a team of trained people, you need economists, sociologists and community development people which we in the opposition do not have. We cannot expect the government or the permanent officials of departments or of the board of directors of the Company of Young Canadians to supply us with that kind of information.

After all, and I do not say this in any critical way, they have a vested interest in defending and explaining the things which they have been trying to do. Let me give one last example, Mr. Chairman. I suppose the most exciting idea which has come along in the field of Indian affairs, not just since I came here in 1962 but in the last 25 years, is the new idea of community development, which hopefully would have turned the corner and given us a breakthrough in the 100 years of Indian poverty and paternalism on the part of the officials of the Indian affairs branch. The suggestion was to appoint young people, sociologists and economists, people skilled in working with groups, who would not be part of the bureaucracy which tells the Indians what they are to do if they are to get their welfare, a little bit of education, a road or a bridge, who would work with the Indians to help them verbalize or put in writing what the Indians themselves want. It was a wonderful idea, Mr. Chairman.

I had the opportunity of seeing the draft of the original proposal which went to the cabinet, and it excited me. I thought it was a great idea. What has happened to it? The idea of community development, to all intents and purposes, is dead. Why? I believe, and the people who started the project believe, that the permanent officials in the Indian affairs department did not want this development. As soon as these people started to do a job, as soon as the Indians started to make their complaints vocally, the permanent officials in one way or another cut the heart out of the community development program.

I have given these illustrations, and I am sure the members of parliament on both sides could give another dozen illustrations. I believe I am putting the case conservatively because I am convinced that if the members of parliament on both sides of the house are to do the job which they were sent here to do, to represent the people who elected them, to represent all the philosophies in which we believe, then in this day and age when government has such tremendous agendas before it we must have the facilities to do the things which we have not been able to do in the past. I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra was right when he talked about—

Mr. Woolliams: Did he make a speech?

Mr. Orlikow: He did; one of the few he makes. He talked about the importance of the research facilities being provided in the library of parliament. I think they are important but they are not really what members of parliament, certainly not what opposition members of parliament need. It is not just factual information which one needs. What the members of the Conservative party, the members of my party and the members of the Creditiste party need are experts who have the same general view about social and economic problems which these members have. These experts could help us deal with the proposals which the government is bringing forward; they could help us deal in detail with the expenditures of the various departments of government.

I began by saying that I supported the very feeble beginning the Prime Minister announced today. I suppose one slice of bread is better than no bread at all. I want so say that when you compare this proposal with the kind of research and technical assistance in all matters given to members of the United States Congress and Senate, you can see how woefully weak and feeble this proposal is. I know that there is a vast difference between the United States system and the Canadian system. There is a vast difference between the parliamentary system under which we operate, and the division between the executive and legislative branches of the government in the United States. But I want to say that in my opinion a great deal more needs to be done than the government proposes to do now.

I want to conclude by quoting just one paragraph from an article which appeared in the winter issue of the Queen's Quarterly for the year 1957. This article is entitled, "Toward a well-informed parliament" and it was written by Mr. Donald Eldon, who was at that time research director of the Progressive Conservative party. I will just read the first paragraph of the article because I think it is one to which the government ought to give some consideration:

> Are Canadian politicians well informed? Sound legislation will come out of parliament only if alternative viewpoints and prescriptions for government action are expressed clearly and accurately. The more complex government becomes, the greater is the need for clear talk in parliament. Yet today it is increasingly difficult for the legislator to master the many subjects upon which he must speak and pass judgment, unless he is adequately served by an expert research staff. In an era of complex government there is a danger that only the cabinet, which has direct access to the experts of the civil service, will be well informed. As a result there is grave danger in Canada that the government backbencher and the opposition collectively who do not, generally speaking, have access to as many competent sources of information as the ministers, will become ciphers.

Well Mr. Chairman, 11 years have passed since that article was written. The budget of the Canadian government has doubled since that time. Legislation, such as the Canada Pension Plan, the medicare plan, and the employee training plan, to mention but a few which affect the welfare of every Canadian citizen has been passed. However the basic problem which Mr. Eldon discussed in 1957 is still with us. In closing I want to say that while I welcome the beginning we are making today, I think it is a very small beginning. I feel we have a right to say to the people of Canada that government is big business now, that the people who serve in parliament if they are to do a job must have the tools to help them to look carefully and in detail at the proposals which come before parliament. We should be given the tools to do that job. I wish that the government would really believe that. If it did it would do a great deal more than it is proposing to do today.

Mr. Mongrain: I should like to begin, Mr. Chairman, by congratulating the President of the Privy Council and the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra upon having made part of their speech in French. I can say that their fluency and the grammatical correctness of their remarks deserves congratulation. Since I have mentioned these two names, I think congratulations should also be extended to the English members of this house who take every opportunity to say a few words in French. I think this gesture on their part is doing more to promote national unity and prevent separatism in my province than anything else, and I think it is worth while to underline this.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Vous parlez très bien l'anglais.

Mr. Mongrain: I extend my congratulations also to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I will remember that city all my life because I won an election once in Winnipeg.

Mr. Orlikow: For which party?

Mr. Mongrain: It was not a political affair but an honest affair.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, an hon. member who spoke earlier blamed the government for trying to display a kind of superiority complex, a kind of inclination to create an impression that it had a divine right to administer alone the estimates of this country, and he said that it might be an infringement upon the democratic system. This had already been mentioned by previous speakers.

However, we should remember that we all believe in the democratic system. We are convinced that, at a given time, through the democratic process, people choose a government and, under these circumstances, they gave it a majority which does not lead to confusion and does not allow any doubt. However, a government which has received the confidence of the people in our democratic system, still has to perform its duties, to assume its responsibilities, to make decisions and not let these endless proceedings be carried on sometimes indefinitely by people who have some interest in filibustering. There comes a time when the government must put its foot down, so that the people can say to it in the next elections that it has done well, or poorly. But the people will have accomplishments to weigh, analyse and study. However, if we continue, under the cover of democracy, to chit-chat indefinitely, we will accomplish nothing.

Instead of blaming the government, I feel we should congratulate it for having the courage to assume its responsibilities. Besides, the opposition has every opportunity to criticize; for instance, look at the question period where the opposition absolutely monopolizes the attention of the ministers who are there and that of the government, and the interviews broadcast on the radio, on television, and those published in the newspapers. We know the opposition benefits much more from them than the government, because when it blames the government it makes the headlines. I do not believe the opposition can complain about being muzzled and being unable to exercise its rights as the opposition. On the contrary, it exercises it with zeal.

Someone talked earlier—my remarks are a little disconnected because I am trying to hurry—about putting research facilities at the disposal of the leaders of the opposition parties.

I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to the rather extraordinary research possibilities which exist here in parliament. There is for instance—I am saying that for ordinary members—the parliamentary library. The national library does not have any specialized research staff, but it boasts an outstanding classification system. It includes among other things the catalogues of all the main libraries in Canada. Should a member of parliament, a senator or a minister need a work of reference not available in parliament, he can contact the national library and he will be told where to get it if it is not available at the national library. We might add to that the library of Toronto and other provincial librairies that have catalogues of all the books that are in the other libraries.

Moreover, Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a recommendation to the government. I think it would be important if the staff of our national library included a well-organized group of researchers, able to assist all Canadians who would like to devote themselves to scientific, literary or other studies and who could have at their disposal, after a few minutes' notice, this mine of information or at least get the information they need, instead of devoting months and years looking for it themselves, with inadequate means. This would be a remarkable service to render the Canadian community and it might be even more important than making a research service available to the leaders of the opposition.

But certain things amused me a while ago, Mr. Chairman, when I heard the party leaders or their spokesmen give their impressions about the announcement made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), to the effect that he would provide for each party supplementary allowances to enable them to secure the services of research workers.

I was glad to see that they first expressed their gratitude, which is good, but I listened more carefully to what the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste (Mr. Caouette) had to say. As I have said before, he interests me particularly. But this time, I agree with him. For instance, he said that the Ralliement Créditiste would receive only $35,000 while the official opposition would receive from $120,000 to $150,000—I do not know exactly—and I find that he is right. As a matter of fact, the sum of $120,000, should be granted to the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, but perhaps not for the reason he thinks. He said that the Prime Minister recognized the importance of the opposition. He even suggested that the importance of the Ralliement Créditiste was recognized when he said that certain things should be told before the elections, not after. In short, he would like the Liberal party to organize the publicity of the Ralliement Créditiste during election campaigns. I think that he will admit just the same that the Liberal party has consideration for him and I will support his motion under which he wishes to obtain $120,000, because he may need it more than the others. It is just as good a way as any other to render him that service and agree with him. In supporting this recommendation that he be granted $120,000 for research work, I would only make one reservation. He should not use that money for partisan work. But even then, Mr. Chairman, I think that the more the population will know about the lucubrations of the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the more they will be inclined to vote intelligently.

Now, I still intend to support the request of the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste.

[English]

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. member for Lotbinière on a question of privilege.

• (4:30 p.m.)

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege. It is very pleasant to hear the wild and woolly remarks of the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain), but I will not tolerate his insinuations about the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), to the effect that he would use the funds that will be given to him for political propaganda.

I would like to point out to him that we showed better manners. In fact, we congratulated the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) for having taken that step, and we did not suspect his motives. I would like the hon. member to withdraw his remarks and to say to the house that the hon. member for Témiscamingue will not use that money for political propaganda against the hon. member for Trois-Rivières, because, if we did, he would no longer be a member of parliament.

Mr. Mongrain: You will note, Mr. Chairman, that there is no pleasing them. When I support them, they protest; when I blame them, they protest again. We will never get along, of course, as long as they act like that. However, I mentioned one thing that I suspected. I suppose that what worries them is not really what I think or what others think, because if they were granted $120,000, they would not refuse that money. If I asked the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste that question, I am quite sure that he would agree. He would be very happy to have people at hand to do research for him. That is what I said, more or less. I fail to see therefore what remarks I should withdraw, unless I am asked to oppose that proposal, something I have not done.

Mr. Caouette: That would not upset anything.

Mr. Mongrain: On the contrary, it would put a lot of things right.

Mr. Caouette: It would not change anything because your opposition is not worth much.

Mr. Mongrain: Did I hear the hon. member say that his opposition is not worth much?

Mr. Caouette: Yours.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I go on with my remarks.

I also listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) who, I believe, is the right hand man of the official opposition, even though he sits on his leader's left. He said that the government bills seemed mainly designed to deprive the opposition of the power which should normally be given parliament.

It is about the same reaction we might have upon hearing the remark I mentioned earlier concerning what I said about the member for Winnppeg North (Mr. Orlikow). Nevertheless it must be recognized that we have a government elected with an unquestionable majority, a great majority, a government to which the nation has given a mandate. They draft their bills, introduce them in the house and give the opposition the opportunity to criticize them or move amendments. Many of these are proposed in parliamentary committees. I know that some opposition members who meet ministers in private make constructive suggestions which are accepted, but a decision must finally be taken and the government assumes its responsibilities, even though, afterwards, it must answer for them to the people.

The hon. member for Peace River added that he would like to keep his right of criticizing the government, of calling it to account. That is perfectly in order and I do not think that he is frustrated of anything. Indeed I think—and that goes for all the opposition—that he has more opportunities to criticize the government than we have ourselves.

We allow ourselves to criticize under certain circumstances and our friends sometimes regret that we do not do it publicly. We do it unobtrusively, because we are not bent on making the headlines; we are not looking for newspaper articles stating that one part of the Liberal caucus is deeply divided against the other. We are trying to solve the problems, but we have no objection when the opposition takes all possible means to criticize the legislation of the government, because we feel that it is a democratic attitude.

However, we should not be grudged what was termed a while ago excessive secrecy and discretion. It is quite obvious that the Liberal party does now wash its dirty linen in public, but does it at home. We should not be compelled to perform a self-examination here in the house, as is done in certain religious orders where public confession takes place. I do not think one can demand those things from us.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that he wished debates of the house were televised. I know several members in this house—I for one—who would not be too keen about the idea.

Of course, the member for Prince Albert would try to monopolize the 20 minute period, or perhaps the member for Temiscamingue would try and secure part of it. This would not settle the problem of backbenchers, even though the member for Prince Albert said that it could perhaps help, in discouraging absenteeism. Maybe we could compromise and televise certain debates of parliamentary committees. But as far as discussions of more important questions in this house is concerned, I object. But Mr. Chairman, this is not my main point.

My main purpose in rising now was to make a recommendation to the government and to the right hon. Prime Minister with all the energy I can possibly command.

I think that it was a very good thing to provide the opposition with research services. I agree on that with everyone. However, we should go further. The most urgent priority is to allow all members—those in opposition as well as those in the government—to hire someone to replace him in his riding, whether we call him a secretary or whatever name we want to give him. I think that this is a must for all kinds of reasons.

First, this secretariat could be used as an information centre for the riding. There are many government agencies but not everyone knows where to find them. Not everyone knows how to get in touch with us.

The office of the member is normally a sort of clearing house, an information centre for the distribution of information. However, the member is not there at least five days a week, and some do not even go home on week-ends.

It would be very important to have a representative in the riding in order to serve the public in every respect. This representative could also, sometimes, call the attention of the government on the deficiencies of some services, about which we hear sometimes several weeks or months later when the situation has deteriorated. The people who are on the spot would receive the complaints day after day and could bring them to the attention of their member. This might be used by the opposition as an argument, but it would at least provide some material for the members of the government.

In many cases, this secretary could settle a lot of problems which end up in the office of the members in Ottawa and which he does not have time to settle because, in a very short period of time, the secretary could get used to the job and know where to go so as to settle these cases. Therefore, he would relieve the member of what we might call routine or what my honourable friend called earlier Joe's work, the daily work which anybody can do with no need to refer it to the member.

Under certain circumstances, he could replace the member who is in Ottawa, at official functions, where the mayor, the aldermen, the school board presidents are invited. The secretary of the federal member could go and represent not only the member but also the government. This would relieve the member of parliament from a number of problems that would not end up on his desk, because they would be settled right then and there.

I need not explain, I think, the work of a member of parliament. As a matter of fact, he comes to his office in the morning and sees on his desk a pile of mail. He has to study bills and the briefs that are sent to him from all parts of this country, read his voluminous correspondence, sit on committees, examine carefully reports from previous procedures, run from one committee room to two or three others, eat a quick lunch at noon, attend as often as possible the sittings of the house. He must answer all mail and prepare the interventions he will make in the house and the speeches he will be called upon to deliver before social clubs, commerce chambers or other such organizations. It is materially and physically impossible for him to collect the documents he needs.

Then the riding secretary would unburden us from the administrative work, which would result in our being able to do a better job here with the means available to us. We would be able to study more thoroughly the legislation on which we are called upon to give our opinion, to prepare more carefully our contribution to parliamentary committees, as well as the speeches we have to deliver on occasion here and there. I imagine there are some members who are quite satisfied to have their speeches prepared by others, but I think the majority of the members would prefer to prepare themselves their own speeches and to write them down in their own words and in the way they would like their audience to understand them.

Mr. Chairman, this is the view of my observations. I should like to insist, with my friend the member for Papineau (Mr. Ouellet) and some of my colleagues of the opposition, and tell the right honourable Prime Minister and the government that the first priority, as far as services are concerned—now that the question of the research personnel for the leaders of the parties of the opposition has been settled—should be to give each members, in his riding, a secretary or assistant—call him what you will—because the amount of work to be done is accumulating at such a dizzy rate that we are swamped by responsibilities and events and we cannot give our electors the services to which they are entitled in view of what the Canadian budget costs them.

I support that recommendation wholeheartedly in the hope that it will be taken into consideration and that journalists will not see in it a deep split between the back-benchers and members of the cabinet.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, I like nothing better than a crowded house; I like an expectant audience! I will not follow the example of two hon. members opposite and inflict my fragile, fractured and fragmented French on the house, because I have too much respect for that fine language. I warn my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre that I will not swing in behind him in his crusade against the Senate. He said he wanted to be here forever. I too hope to be here for a long time. Perhaps when I am 74½ I shall join his crusade against that illustrious body, but not before then. I live hopefully in hope.

This is the kind of important debate that comes up from time to time in which we all ought to participate. Down through the years people have been concerned about parliamentary institutions. In the present day there are many reasons for thoughtful people to be more concerned than usual about this institution to which we belong.

We are all aware of the complexity and multiplicity of legislation today. In Canada, elections have come with a frequency which has done dreadful things to legislative programs, to order papers, to fiscal years and God knows what else. We are developing, too, an area of government in the field of dominion-provincial relations which is extremely difficult to comprehend because so much of what is decided behind closed doors rather than in the full light of a legislative body. There are times, also, when we are given to too much partisanship in our legislative bodies. I never could believe that the ties of party could be so strong that even on procedural matters there would be a party line. But at times this is a fact.

We are sensitive to the fact that in these days all the institutions of the establishment are under fire. It seems that any institution which exists is, in the minds of many people, automatically ready for discard. Change for the sake of change is often the order of the day.

I think we would be most insensitive in this parliament if we believed for a moment that just because it is old and ancient it is bound to survive and command the respect of the people it serves. It is important that we should strive not only to be effective but to appear effective—to appear efficient, to appear relevant, to appear "plugged-in" to the problems and the people about us. It is not unusual for politicians or, as we like to call ourselves, parliamentarians, to be criticized. We are used to that. We are a familiar stereotype. But when the parliamentary institution itself is denigrated and when it begins to lose respect, it becomes a matter for real and genuine concern. The institution must perform the functions for which it is established. The author of one of our great classics in political science was old Bagehot—bigot Bagehot, as we used to call him; but he was a very wise man, nevertheless. This is what he had to say:

> The House of Commons needs to be impressive, and impressive it is: but its use resides not in its appearance but in its reality. Its office is not to win power by awing mankind, but to use power in governing mankind.

This, surely, is what we are grappling with when we seek to examine our structures and our procedures. Many interesting things have been said today—many things with which I agree and some with which I disagree. I do not agree with the Prime Minister that the research staff is adequate. I think it is inadequate. May I explain that I think it is inadequate numerically; the people there are doing an excellent job, but there are not enough of them. Many of us who use the services of the research staff with great satisfaction would be glad to use them a great deal more if there were more personnel. I say that the time to expand this service is now.

It is often said that the only people who approve of television in the House of Commons are those who have the physiognomy of a Greek god. I wonder if I am betraying my class when I say I am coming increasingly to the conclusion that we should probably be moving in the right direction if instead of having television off to one side, as is happening now, and the nation being governed in part by television, television should come into the legislative institution itself. This may be hard on some of us who have long passed the age of beauty, but I think we would have to endure these circumstances. If the hon. gentleman questions that, I thank him heartily for his cheerful disclaimer.

There are in my view some obsolete and obsolescent practices which we must discard for the sake of efficiency. I have never yet made a speech on this subject without talking about voting machines. Imagine what must go on in the minds of the people in the galleries when they hear a vote called. The Speaker says "Bring in the members" and then they hear the bells ringing for as long as an hour and a half or more. They look at the order paper and note that the vote is scheduled for 9.45 or some such hour. Yet we go on with the present silly practice.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the hon. member not aware that we have made some improvement in voting procedure by prescribing that when a vote is set for a specific time the bells must not ring for more than 15 minutes?

Mr. Macquarrie: That is excellent, a move in the right direction. But I want further improvement to be made, having discovered that since I came here 11 years ago—and that is not a long time compared with the record of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—I have spent the equivalent of 30 sitting days waiting for bells to stop ringing, and though I do not think my time is the most precious in the world I still believe there are better ways of disposing of it.

That is why I would welcome this improvement. If the hon. gentleman could bring about the installation of electronic voting machines we shall have gone even further. We should not be afraid of change. It is necessary to change, though naturally we should not be afraid to retain things of value which have existed for some time.

One thing which concerns me more than anything I have mentioned so far is the growing tendency to by-pass parliament, and I am afraid that the present Prime Minister may be the chief practitioner in this dangerous course. It would be serious if the head of the executive arm should opt out of parliament on important occasions. The Prime Minister of Canada cannot really become a president, our system is not designed in that way. He derives his strength from the public, of course, but he functions only as he commands day in and day out the support of the House of Commons. While ten minute confrontations with students or with Haligonians, or with a few Liberals here and there are very interesting, and make good copy, it is not representative government; it is not direct democracy, either.

The people of Canada are represented in this chamber. Every part of the country is represented here. It is not necessary to have street confrontations to know what Newfoundlanders think of the railway situation. We heard their views eloquently expressed by six able members of this house the other day. It is not necessary to stand on the street corner of Halifax to discover what the people of Atlantic Canada think of the causeway. And no one needs to confront the students in Regina, either, in front of the statue of Louis Riél, or behind it, to know what the people of the west think of the wheat situation. Their representatives here have been telling us succinctly and powerfully.

This is the place where the people are represented. Scattered contacts, however dramatic and pleasing, are no substitute for the continuing relationship between the executive and legislative, which is the very cornerstone of our system. Some of us can remember when a man by the name of Walter Gordon, once a well known figure here, brought in some outside experts. There was a great deal of talk about those outside experts. This is again a matter of public interest inasmuch as the Prime Minister is drawing about him a cadre of experts—150 of them, I believe—who will keep him informed as to the points of view of Canadians everywhere. These are to be the spotters of public opinion.

I do not know what this will do. Naturally, we would like the Prime Minister to see as much as he can, to talk to as many people as he can, and to go to as many parties as he can. That is an excellent thing.

We like to hear of this sort of thing, but where is the voice of the member of parliament, especially the voice of his own caucus?

The hon. member for Peace River quoted the Montreal Gazette, and to show how ecumenical this party is I am going to quote the following from an editorial which appeared in the Toronto Globe and Mail:

> The student mob scene in Regina and the Halifax sidewalk debate on feeding Nazis at Stalingrad may have moved him to reponder Falstaff's advice on discretion and valour—
> Yet beyond this maladroitness of technique emerge doubts of principle. First, and perhaps most gravely for democratic statecraft, Mr. Trudeau's compulsion to converse with the people seems often to by-pass the people's designated spokesmen. A free electorate can readily bear the curbing of an ambitious bureaucracy, but can it tolerate the downgrading of the men it voted in to state its views?

This is a very important question which the Globe and Mail is asking.

> The Prime Minister's proposal to set up a network of some 150 hand-picked citizens to advise him on what the people want and think must be regarded as at least a slight to elected Liberal members. No one suspects Mr. Trudeau of wishing to establish a nation-wide ring of more or less secret agents. But one can question the need for such a P.M.'s council when the law and the people's free choice provide for official local spokesmen.

That is what we are here for.

> One can ask too whether such shadowy informants can truly reflect the views of the majority of citizens. One can wonder whether they will dare speak frankly to a man or a party from whom they might, however distantly or unconsciously, expect some favour—

Here I am in a very embarrassing area. I believe the suggestion is of patronage.

> —even the favour of being categorized as one of the 150 insiders.

The the Globe and Mail says:

> Finally, one must question still more deeply whether any such elitist scheme to channel opinions is basically democratic. From the leaks about the network's composition, it appears its structure will be priestly and corporatist—the fears and feelings of the masses will be conveyed on high by a hierarchy representing special groups. (As if there were not enough special groups—from the Canadian Labour Congress to the Canadian Manufacturers Association—anxious to advise the Prime Minister.)

Now, that is one aspect—

Mr. Walker: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Macquarrie: Surely.

Mr. Walker: Was he in the house when his leader spoke to the Prime Minister's suggestion of making funds available for research to opposition members? Was the hon. member here when his leader really served notice on the house that the funds, so far as the official opposition was concerned, might well be used for this type of outside assistance for their own party, the type the hon. member is now suggesting would not be proper for this side of the house?

Mr. Macquarrie: I think my good friend, and I say this in more than a parliamentary sense, misunderstands me. Of course we do not assume in the Conservative party that all wisdom lies within our caucus. Our leader would certainly be the kind of person who would be consulting with us; but we in the Conservative party are always ready and eager to consult with people outside it. We would even like to consult with people across the aisle. We are ecumenical in our search to broaden our understanding and knowledge. There is nothing narrow about us. My concern is that those of us who are here to be consulted in a primary sense are being by-passed. However, that will not happen in our party, and I hope it will not happen in the hon. member's party.

Mr. Baldwin: We often ask for knowledge but we don't often get it from the members over there.

Mr. Macquarrie: As my house leader points out, very often we try to find out things and you will not really tell us. However, Mr. Chairman, I do not have the time this afternoon to develop either on a philosophic or a pragmatic line this quite important matter.

I think there is a danger of this parliamentary institution being by-passed, being short circuited in this media day of image building, and this could be very serious. I think there are two aspects to what I am trying to suggest. I believe it is very dangerous for the executive to do this. Also it is very much incumbent upon this institution, upon this house, to put itself in such a state of relevancy and effectiveness that it will not be in danger of being scorned and having the public suggest that perhaps in fact it is not functioning as well as it is. I hope my fears are not well grounded, but as I look over what has happened in this country in the last few months there are times when I fear that in a year or two the Canadian people might wonder if majority governments in fact are all that beneficial.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I would have several remarks to make on these votes, especially as regards the organization and staff of the House of Commons, but since they would require a lengthy preparation, I should like to call it five o'clock right away. I will speak when this vote comes up again, as I would not like to split up my speech.

[English]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. It being five o'clock it is my duty to rise, report certain resolutions, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

ORDER RESPECTING TRANSLATION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if we might have permission to revert to motions in order to put to the house the motion which I suggested we might make with respect to an experimental practice concerning translations in committees?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Has the minister leave to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated during committee discussion on the legislation estimates I think there might be found to be agreement in the house for an order somewhat along the following lines:

That, until the end of the calendar year 1968, in lieu of a written translation of a report of proceedings in any standing or special committee of this house, a transcription of the oral interpretation, as revised, of proceedings in any such committee may be made and printed and, if made and printed, the same shall be deemed to be an official report of proceedings in that committee; and such transcription, as revised, may be used in relation to any proceeding in any such committee or in this house.

Perhaps if there is consent that might be made an order of the house now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it the wish of the house to give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It is so ordered. It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING QUALIFICATION OF VOTERS AND CANDIDATES

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-8, to amend the Canada Elections Act (qualifications of voters and candidates).

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C-8 is a revival of a bill which was introduced by me in the last parliament. It would provide that Canadian citizenship be a standard qualification for electors and candidates in Canadian federal elections. The motivation for this measure arises not only from a desire to achieve greater justice among those who have chosen Canada as their home, but also to try to do something to cope with the very serious problem that I believe exists with the large number of people resident in Canada and eligible for Canadian citizenship, but who have not applied to become Canadian citizens.

During the last parliament, through placing a question on the order paper, I found that the estimate of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics extracted from figures in the 1961 census of Canada indicated that there were some 453,441 people at that time who still held citizenship in the countries from which they came, although they had been resident in Canada for more than five years. I since have seen estimates which I believe to be more accurate. One of them was made recently before the standing committee on broadcasting. This estimate placed the figure at about one million people, and my own estimate would place the number at almost one million. It appears to me that while almost 35 per cent of aliens who are eligible for citizenship have not applied, the percentage of eligible British subject immigrants who have not applied is something like 70 per cent. My concern is that not only British subjects but citizens of all countries who have chosen Canada as their new home should be encouraged, through equal treatment in the law, to consider Canadian citizenship as being worth while and to acquire it as quickly as possible.

As I mentioned, this bill was first introduced by me more than two years ago. Since it does seem to have some bearing on citizenship I suppose there might be a suggestion that the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) might have had some hand in this idea, but of course it is very clear that that is not the case, it having been introduced more than two years ago. The bill deals not directly with matters of citizenship but with matters of electoral reform which come under the jurisdiction of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). I suggest that this proposal, and other proposals for reform of our electoral law, should be studied by a standing committee of this house as soon as possible. I believe the President of the Privy Council has indicated that such a study might take place at the beginning of the new year. I hope therefore that this bill might be referred to that committee for study of its provisions and the problem out of which it arises. I do not suggest that the proposal I make will solve the problem I have outlined. I do think however, that it would create a more equitable situation in a country which is made up of many different races and of immigrants from many different sources.

Naturally a proposal such as this raises some heated reaction, and I think predictably so. I might share with hon. members some of this reaction which has been both pro and con. One gentleman in Toronto wrote to me, saying in part:

> Your name sir is Stanbury, an old country Anglo-Saxon name, yet you have the gall to do this treasonable act toward the greatest tradition in the whole world's history by removing this just preference. I was born in the north of Ireland myself and if I was in good health at over 65 years of age I would sure invite you to a duel.

Another letter from the Toronto area addresses me as "the anti-Britisher" and says:

> What are you doing about the frogs? The next time I come face to face with your ochre face Stanbury, I will bury you, chicken.

Then this letter from Oakville says:

> Jew loving bastard:
> We killed many Germans in this last war, not one of them as vile as you.
> You are a disgrace to the name you bear. It will be removed from you and your family.

I will censor the next sentence because I think it is too rich even for this place. It ends up with the words "Death to traitors".

I received a letter, too, from something called "The New Right". It refers me to the Bible and says:

> As the British people are part of modern Israel, one would do well to read Isaiah, chapter 54, verse 17, and take warning.

Well, perhaps it is significant that I did receive another kind of letter from a Jewish person in Toronto who said:

> Bravo!
> If we are a truly sovereign nation we should not give preferential treatment to immigrants from any country (except possibly ex-Canadians).

Mr. Woolliams: Are you going to name these people?

Mr. Groos: It is alright; you can relax.

Mr. Stanbury: I will be glad to show these to my hon. friend.

Another person writes:

> —you are right. As a former British subject I voted before I was able to become a citizen but I always felt guilty for doing so. I hope it becomes illegal.

I refer to another letter which in part reads:

I myself am of Irish nationality with Canadian citizenship so I can speak from personal experience of the views of my English and Irish friends and their absolute rejection of Canadian citizenship as something they don't need. Up until now with the privileges afforded Anglo-Saxon immigrants they didn't, as they put it, need it to participate in the affairs of this country if they felt so inclined.

The fact that they find the country good enough to live in and enjoy the fruits of our high standard of living and yet will not hold up their heads to be counted as Canadians is one hypocrisy that gets me really mad. I do not know if this sense of national feeling is something my Irish heritage brings out in me but I really feel that passiveness in the face of the massive task of giving Canada a feeling of national identity will never get us anywhere.

Another letter from Sarnia says in part:

I wish to commend your action. The present situation in this country does not encourage a total commitment to Canada. The law as it now stands is discriminating against other immigrants while it provides no incentive to the Briton to make himself a true Canadian.

• (5:10 p.m.)

I live in a neighbourhood with a great variety of new Canadians, and I feel sure most of them appreciate the efforts you are making to make all immigrant peoples equal.

I am myself a British immigrant and I know many who fully support the action you are taking.

The only privilege that should be enjoyed by the British immigrant is the privilege of taking out Canadian citizenship. I'm afraid all too few of us do so.

Another letter says in part:

You are so right. No wonder some immigrants feel like second-rate citizens.

To be frank, I am sure most native Canadians were not even aware of this discrimination. I hope they are now.

It may be that the presentation of this bill has made some people more aware of the existence of Canadian citizenship and perhaps has moved them to make application for it. I have here another letter from a constituent who says:

I agree with your change.

He goes on to say:

I believe after two or three years in Canada you should be able to make up your mind to become a Canadian citizen. My family and I are U.K. subjects; we are four, and would like you to tell us how to get the forms to become Canadian citizens.

If my bill has had the effect of making people more aware of the existence of Canadian citizenship and the value of it, and has encouraged them to seek it out, I think the presentation of the bill will have been worthwhile. There are of course many people who feel that such a move might be a weakening of our ties with the commonwealth. They point out, as have some hon. members, that this has been traditionally a reciprocal arrangement. I looked into that situation and found that while this might at one time have been the case, at the present time approximately 16 commonwealth countries do not reciprocate in this regard and about seven do. I cannot venture any opinion on Rhodesia which now considers itself independent, but I suspect that immigrants would not be able to go to Rhodesia, vote and be elected to its legislative assembly, although under our law Premier Ian Smith of Rhodesia could come to this country, live here for a year, be elected to our parliament and entitled to vote in our elections. For that matter, I suppose Lord Thomson of Britain could also.

The arguments against this measure all seem to add up to the fact that people from British countries are necessarily more familiar with our language, assuming it is English, and our laws and customs; but I do not think this is any longer necessarily true. I do not think we can assume that every person coming from a country that is British, or was formerly British, will necessarily be more capable either in language, knowledge of customs or our democratic way of life than a person newly arrived from any other country.

I would like to feel that our laws deal equally with people who have come to Canada to make their home here, no matter from what country they have come. I believe there is more and more acceptance of this idea. When I introduced this bill for the first time, the Toronto Telegram frowned on it, but we seem to be making progress in this regard. In its issue of November 9 it approved the idea and said editorially:

It is to be hoped that no objection to this measure will be raised on the sentimental ground that it weakens the British connection. If there is one British connection which endures, and which is an inalienable Canadian heritage, it is respect for justice and fair play.

Just so no one will think that the Toronto Telegram and the Conservative press are alone in their support of this measure, I should say that the Toronto Star in an editorial of November 7 suggested as follows:

Preferential treatment of British immigrants owes its origins to a time when Canada was the respectful elder child in the British family of nations.

But, while we are still respectful, we have grown up. Our responsibilities are now to our family, and we believe the time has come to place preferential policies on the shelf along with other mementoes of our colonial past.

The Montreal Star has also commented approvingly on this measure. It said in an editorial of November 8:

There probably will be a flurry of protest over indications from Ottawa that people settling in Canada from the United Kingdom may not much longer be entitled to any special privileges. Our colonial heritage is important to some groups across the country, but pride in being a Canadian should be vital.

Its editorial ends by saying:

A country good enough to work in, to live in, year after year, should be worth being a part of.

As one of my correspondents pointed out, my heritage is mostly British. I am proud of it. But I am more proud of my country, Canada. I hope that all people who choose it as their home will be most proud of it, and I hope that by dealing with all people, from whatever country they come, on an equal basis under our laws we will encourage all to become Canadian citizens as quickly as possible and to cherish that right and privilege.

Mr. F. J. Bigg (Pembina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that this matter has come before the house because it at least opens up the whole question of the franchise in Canada. Lest we be carried away with this idea of treating everybody fairly in Canada—and I congratulate the hon. member who introduced the bill for his very commendable attitude—I think we should not forget one or two very salient facts in this regard. We do not treat our armed forces equally. If you look at the regulations regarding the voting of our armed forces, you will appreciate that it is not a secret ballot at all, because anybody who can count on his fingers can find out who voted how, and where, in respect of any of our Canadian armed forces.

This is something I could put my whole heart behind, namely making sure that those people who have given the most to become Canadian citizens should be afforded equal, if not preferential, treatment. While on this subject I would point out that I know that people who refuse to serve their country in time of war are treated equally with those who do. It is a strange anomaly that in a country where we value freedom so highly those unwilling to serve are entitled to take the highest positions in our land. Not only are they unwilling to serve but are actively engaged in sabotaging the efforts of those who believe in fighting for freedom. This should be looked into.

I do not think I am an Anglo-Saxon crackpot, either. Some of my people were natives of this country. It was the Conservative party that gave these people, senior citizens of Canada, the full franchise. This is the type of action we want. We want to broaden the franchise, not to restrict it. I am not at all sure that I believe the five year period of waiting before a person can become a full fledged Canadian citizen is reasonable, particularly if he has already been raised in the western tradition of freedom. I am not only speaking of the people from England, Scotland and Ireland but of people who have lived in the Caribbean all their lives, people with dark, yellow or black skins. The colour of the skin makes no difference, our Bill of Rights gives them all freedom here in Canada.

I should like to see the number of years of waiting before citizenship is granted reduced down to three years, or even to one year for those who are qualified. Our present immigration laws are restrictive. Canada has no right to deny millions of starving people the right to live. Why do we not open up our gates? Why do we not practice what we preach and broaden our immigration laws to encourage those who are willing to work and willing to defend freedom to come here and become a full-fledged citizen as soon as they are ready to expend their energy lives and resources alongside of us? I would like to see those who have fought in defence of the western world granted the right to Canadian citizenship. I would not hesitate to give anybody full citizenship in Canada who served Her Majesty in any corner of the world, particularly in time of war. Imagine denying a man who had been in the merchant marine in Australia the right to come to Canada and vote, or a man who had made seven or eight trips to England from Canada, carrying servicemen and ammunition in time of war.

I am against any restriction of the right to vote of people who, as I said, are qualified to be good Canadians. We should take a good look at the idea of restricting, for example, a well educated man, a professor from India or a doctor whom we would trust to operate on our children and be in charge of their health. Can we say to such a man: Oh no, you will first put in five years in Canada and will improve yourself in accordance with our view of western civilization. I do not think there will be many Russian spies voting, because we allow them to obtain full voting rights once they come here and start paying taxes. We deny a doctor making $20,000 or $30,000 a year and paying enormous taxes the right to vote, because he has not put in an arbitrary five year period in this country.

I fully agree with the hon. member who introduced this bill that we should take a good look at the voting rights of our armed forces, to make sure they receive the right to a secret ballot. They are the ones who paid the most and who intend to pay the most in their proper time for our freedom, for our right to have a country and our right to survive in this jungle in which we are living.

Let us not get carried away by the crocodile tears of people who say we should make immigrants wait before we grant them citizenship, or until we are ready to give those people who have already earned the right to full citizenship in Canada the kind of treatment they should get. Today the running down of anything Anglo-Saxon seems to be a kind of national pastime around here.

I say this is a red herring. It is not a question of whether or not you are Anglo-Saxon. The purpose of our reciprocal agreements with many nations of the commonwealth is to encourage commonwealth people to come here, and this is done for a very good reason. The very fact that these people are members of the commonwealth ensures that they are good risks and will adjust quickly to our Canadian way of life. Let us not have any more witch hunts here, and let us not seek cheap popularity by running down the Old Country because she does not happen to have the power she once had. I wonder how much more courage it would have taken to bring forward a bill such as this one a hundred years ago. It would not have been acceptable then and I do not think it is acceptable today, because it is restrictive and is in the nature of a witch hunt.

I would say most of the people who have come here from other countries are so glad to get here that they are not agitating for a vote, they are not here to tell us in Canada how to manage our position in the commonwealth. Most of them are so happy to be here that they have gone to work and are productive citizens who have taken their full place in the commonwealth. I should like to give them the full right to vote as soon as they show us they are no threat to this country, and thereby give them the right to say something about what is going to happen to the enormous taxes they are paying. The Americans broke away from England because they said that people who were taxed had the right to have some say about it. If you feel so deeply about these people who are being so unfairly treated and who have no say about the elected members of parliament, and so forth, let me ask why they are not exempted from taxation until they become Canadian citizens. We bring them over here to use their skills. There is a brain drain in reverse going on in this country.

We bring these people here because we do not want to educate our own professionals. Let us give more of our own Canadian boys and girls a chance to become dentists and doctors, and not take advantage of commonwealth countries which need every doctor, school teacher and university professor in their own country. We have opened up a new university for these people who come here and when they see the good life in Canada they may be tempted to break the contract under which they came. We train these people so they can be a blessing to our sister commonwealth countries.

I venture to say that some of the people who write these letters want something more than simply to become citizens of Canada immediately. They want to tell us the rules under which they should be Canadians. I say we should beat them to it, we should certainly give them an easier franchise and an easier entrance to full Canadian citizenship, if they qualify.

It would be ridiculous to say to a man who served in the armed forces of Australia alongside of us for six or seven years during the last war, who speaks either French or English, either of our official languages, who is used to our parliamentary system and is thoroughly conversant with all our mores and has paid a tremendous personal price in service and sacrifice, that we have a witch hunt going on right now. It would be ridiculous for us to say to him: You are British and you have proved yourself British so we are going to make you wait five years, meantime we will take away from you a privilege which we gave to those people who qualify, for perfectly good reasons.

It is not because we love Englishmen or because we have put a racial tag on someone. This sounds to me like racism and I have the right to talk about it. Some of my people were natives of this country, who have been here for two or three hundred years. So I know what we have to offer in this country and I know it is not negative. We are not denying others the right to Canadian citizenship which we have offered to people who have shown their loyalty to the crown, the commonwealth and our western principles and who have done so most often in very definite ways. We appreciate this, and we have given them an incentive to come here and give us some of their time and talents. I am getting a little bit tired of people who are trying to get on the bandwagon and who are picking on the poor old motherland because she is down. I see an element of that here, and it is not a very nice road to popularity.

Let us take the positive approach and offer full rights to those who come from our sister commonwealth nations. Let us not take the approach that if they do not play it our way we will not play it their way. We are the senior member of the commonwealth, we are the oldest child of the family. We should set an example, instead of being restrictive in dealing with voting rights in Canada. I do not know why we have a year of waiting, to tell you the truth.

I would be shocked if I went to any Commonwealth country and was told I had to wait for some time before I could vote. I have not done the homework the hon. member has done in relation to those countries which impose restriction on us, but I would be shocked if I went to Australia and, with my record, was told I could not vote for some time. I do not care how long we would have to live in Australia before we could vote; I think that is irrelevant. I do not believe that people from other parts of the world, perhaps from countries that have openly fought us or are going to fight us, should necessarily get equal treatment with people from countries that have proven to be friends and allies in the preservation of western democracy. Voting rights should be broadened by all means, but I do not believe I will stand in this house and vote for any restrictive measures on the rights of people from commonwealth countries who want to become Canadian citizens.

So far as citizenship itself is concerned, I venture to say a good many members of this house have not taken out citizenship papers. I agree that they should, but I am not sure that this is the proper way of forcing them to do so. Many of us were born here and have a certain distaste for the fact that we have to apply to obtain Canadian citizenship, especially in the light of the fact our ancestors have lived here for a hundred years. This little bit of red tape is annoying to some people, but it should not be so annoying that they do not apply for citizenship.

Citizenship is something we have taken for granted.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you have to have a certificate?

Mr. Bigg: You are not a Canadian citizen if you don't. This particular measure would bar you from voting if you do not have citizenship. I presume if you carried that to its logical conclusion, a person would have no right to sit in this house unless he had citizenship. I wonder how many seats would be vacated today if hon. members were asked for their citizenship papers.

Mr. Stanbury: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Bigg: Yes.

Mr. Stanbury: I feel the hon. member has misunderstood the law and perhaps the hon. member for Calgary North could consult with him. The hon. member for Calgary North has suggested that citizenship does not depend on applying for a card. All of us have citizenship if we qualify under the law without applying for any papers. All I have suggested is that people who do not have citizenship should apply for it, not for a card.

Mr. Bigg: Well, I think it is the thin edge of the wedge. I would go along with the hon. member if he suggested that all Canadians should seek Canadian citizenship if they desire it. However, I would not force it on anybody. Those who do not want to partake in the advantages of Canadian citizenship would please me if they never applied. I am certainly not anxious to have them vote if they are coming here from the commonwealth with no intention of becoming good citizens. I do not believe this is the case. I believe nine out of ten come here with the intention of earning a living and becoming fully qualified citizens.

I certainly do not believe the hon. member did so intentionally, but the letters he read contained overtones of racism. I certainly cannot go along with that. I see no necessity for bringing in the Palestine question, the coloured question or any other question. It is only a question of whether or not we are all Canadians and want to encourage as many people as possible to take part in public life and exercise their franchise. I felt this was the proper time to raise these other points about reform for our armed services personnel. Those who are in hospital should have every opportunity to vote. I know that in the five elections in which I have taken part I have been asked whenever I went to a hospital if the patients could exercise their franchise. We say we cannot do that because it is too difficult. Perhaps these patients are policemen who were hurt on duty, or members of the armed forces who are in hospital. We have put polls in some of the chronic hospitals and I feel this is a good reform. I think anyone who has the franchise in Canada should be given the right to use that franchise, even if we have to go to the trouble of hiring a few officials. Goodness knows, we spend money in many other ways which are not as important.

My Canadian citizenship is the source of my greatest pride. I do not like raising controversial issues like this. I think there is danger in this idea of telling our so-called new Canadians that they are being discriminated against, because I do not think they are. Perhaps we should say we have overlooked encouraging them, we have overlooked our duty to see that they become citizens. Perhaps we have been delinquent in not reducing this time limit. Certainly I should like to see any new Canadian who qualifies permitted to vote on an equal basis with those from the commonwealth. However, I would not take this backwards step of restricting the voting privileges of newly arrived Australians, New Zealanders, Caribbean people or Africans, regardless of their colour or creed. There are some Anglo-Saxon connotations to this idea. I honestly think it is a backward step, but I go along with the spirit in which I feel this suggestion was put forward. Let us broaden our franchise just as far as we possibly can without endangering security in Canada, by encouraging all those who want to be fully qualified citizens to take out their papers and be accepted into our family, with celerity.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like first to congratulate the hon. member for presenting Bill No. C-8, whereby, in order to take part in an election, to have one's name included in the list of electors or to run for office, one must be a Canadian citizen. This is I think a step towards the liberation in Canada from a certain type of colonialism that seemingly still persists in this country.

As it is now, the fact of being a British subject is sufficient for a person to be qualified to vote, or to run for office, which would not normally permit people from New Zealand, from Australia, from Jamaica or other countries in the British Commonwealth to come to Canada and be candidates in a general election.

Mr. Speaker, that constitutes, I believe, a lack of respect for or a violation of our Canadian sovereignty. Canada is a sovereign country; we are told that it is and we say it.

To insist that anyone who wants to vote or run as a candidate in an election be a Canadian citizen does not mean that we reject completely everything that is British, of course not. Such a measure would not prevent us, for instance, from remaining a member of the British commonwealth of nations. India and other countries are members of the British commonwealth of nations, yet they enjoy their sovereignty.

Mr. Speaker, that would enable us, however, to be ourselves in Canada, to take our decisions ourselves, to be first of all Canadians. I am not saying that one should be an English Canadian or a French Canadian, but I say that one should be a first class Canadian citizen to have the right to vote or to run as a candidate in an election.

A couple of years ago, I presented a bill to the same effect but covering a much greater scope. It meant to remove from all Canadian acts references to British citizenship, keeping only the Canadian citizenship, without, as I said, Canada withdrawing from the British commonwealth of nations.

Mr. Speaker, I think the Canadian citizenship constitutes the fundamental quality of a Canadian and we would betray Canada and its identity by maintaining such references to colonialism. We have been a colony, French at one time, English at another, but we are no longer a colony. I believe Canada is an adult and sovereign nation.

And in that capacity, I believe Canada should assert herself more, while staying among the nations which make up the British community.

I shall now refer to the explanatory notes of Bill C-8, and I quote:

The purpose of this Bill is to provide that only Canadian citizens shall in future be qualified as electors or as candidates at elections:

The bill tends to amend paragraph (a), subsection (1), of Section 14 of the Canada Elections Act which would now read:

(a) is of the full age of twenty-one years or will attain such age on or before polling day at such election;

I am wondering, Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member who has prepared this bill should not have by the same token, taken into account the young people of 18 years and over. In the province of Quebec, these young people have the right to vote in provincial elections, while they do not have such a right in the federal elections. Here, I refer to an act which provides that in an armed conflict, for example, all young people of 18 years or over shall be called upon to serve their country.

When the government so decides, these same young people who must serve their country in the armed forces cannot have their say in electing their representatives as they are not eligible to vote or run as candidates at election time.

The time has come, Mr. Speaker, for our 18-year olds to be granted a little more consideration. If they are old enough to join the Canadian forces, they should be entitled to vote and they should have the privilege to run as candidates in any federal constituency. It is the law in Quebec. I do not know what the situation is in the other provinces, but the eligible voting age is 18 in the province of Quebec.

Furthermore, the hon. member introducing Bill No. C-8 should have included therein a useful clause dealing with compulsory identification cards for Canadian voters as a prerequisite to their names being printed on the voters lists, in addition to being Canadian citizens. An identification card bearing a photograph—I would not object to have my picture appearing on an identification card—would be a deterrent against those manipulating elections with the help of impostors or "phoney" voters.

Compulsory identification cards bearing photographs would avoid the stealing of elections. Perhaps we would have valuable members in this house who have been defeated because of trickery and shady election manoeuvring, mostly in cities where people are not known. In some instances, Mr. Speaker, women of ill repute disguised themselves as nuns in order to record their votes in well organized and controlled polls. This is contrary to true democracy. The people are no longer deciding when election schemers can arrange a choice.

I think it is high time serious thought was given to a review of our election system, not only on the surface but in depth. As Canadians, let us still require that only Canadian citizens may have their names entered on the voters' lists and have the right to run as candidates.

In addition, let us lower the voting age to 18 and also make compulsory the identification card bearing the photograph of voter, for positive identification. Then we would no longer have to deplore the infortunate things that happened in the past and are still happening in many areas during general or partial elections.

This would eliminate a great deal of annoyances and also make things difficult for those who are inclined to use dishonest electioneering practices. In short, this would ensure the election to parliament of honest members through honest methods, both during and between election periods.

Mr. Speaker, those are the only remarks I wanted to make on Bill No. C-8.

I congratulate once again the hon. member for having introduced that bill providing that we should be Canadian citizens to have our names appear on an election list or to be a candidate at an election.

I regret however that an individual must have completed his twenty-first year instead of his eighteenth in order to vote or become a candidate.

The carrying of an identification card with a picture should be made compulsory to prevent the possibility of dishonesty, cheating or election gerrymandering. Thus, the Canada Elections Act would be more respectful of the Canadian citizens; the latter would more readily go to the polls to select their members and their government in order to establish in our country a true democracy based on social justice and the just society.

[English]

Mr. Murray McBride (Lanark and Renfrew): Mr. Speaker, I spoke just a few weeks ago in the private members hour on another bill to amend the Canada Elections Act. It seems to me that if a man's automobile needs minor repairs, it should be repaired or patched up. But if its poor condition has resulted from many points of weakness, then it either needs a thorough overhaul or else a new car altogether is required. In the same way, Mr. Speaker, if there are many points of weakness within the Canada Elections Act it seems to me we need either a thorough overhaul of the act or to write what might be called a new act altogether.

I am opposed to a piece by piece, or a bit by bit, or a patch-up approach to the revision of this act, and in that sence I am against this bill. As for the content of what Bill No. C-8 intends, I favour it in principle. It means, simply, Canada for Canadians; a Canada for Canadians, governed by Canadians; and I as well as other hon. members, I assume, support that. Yet there is an inequity within this bill, and I want to speak about that. Subsection (1)(a) says that only those who are 21 years old shall be allowed to vote.

As you are well aware, Mr. Speaker, we live in a day when our citizens who are in their senior teens have been exposed to mass media literally from birth. This is a time when progressive forms of education are encouraging even very young children to develop their ability to discriminate, to judge, to decide and, hopefully, to learn to live with the results of their decisions.

This is also an era of high mobility for youth. Even at a very early age our young people spend many hours far away from their families and their environs; frequently they are many miles away. In such circumstances personal decisions are made at a very early age; they are made at a much earlier age than was the case, I suggest, even one decade ago. To have our voting age remain at 21 years of age is no longer consistent with the social context in which we now live. It ought to be lowered at least to 18 years of age and had this bill contained that change I could have supported it.

As for the idea that Canadian citizens and only Canadian citizens should vote to bring in a government of Canada, with that I have no quarrel. It is necessary for us to become more Canadian. I suppose it follows logically that we ought to be less British, less French, less Portuguese and less what have you, and we should be just plain Canadians. With that aspect of the bill I am in accord.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I seem to have developed the habit of speaking on the Canada Elections Act. Only two weeks ago I spoke when another private member's bill to provide the franchise to university students came before the house. At that time I commended the mover of the resolution and said he was moving in the right direction. He is reform minded and undoubtedly is aware of the inequities in the Canada Elections Act. My only reservation at that time was that the hon. member was not going far enough, although he was heading in the right direction. I suggested that the entire act needed revision.

I favour anything that tends to broaden the franchise and to make more democratic our Canadian parliamentary system. I am not in favour of anything that tends to discriminate. I was not in favour of those parts of the act which tended to discriminate against university students. I cannot see much use in tinkering with a document which, in my opinion, is of nineteenth century vintage.

If the Canada Elections Act were brought before this house and debated by all hon. members, I am sure we would arrive at a law which would constitute a new elections act. That needs to be done. I have read about the French revolution and I am aware of the great turmoil which surrounded the voting privileges of the common people of France. It took a revolution to undo the inequities surrounding the Estates General of France of that period.

I do not propose that we have a national revolution in Canada, but I do say that it is time for the government to take a good look at the elections act and to iron out some of the inequities in that act.

I could spend half an hour talking about the voting age alone, but I will not do so. As the hon. member preceding me said, we live in an age of great social change. Young people are being taxed, sometimes when they are only 16 years old. As my colleague indicated, taxation without representation was responsible for our great revolution in North America, as those who have heard about the Boston tea party will recall. In England they have considered this matter of the voting age, and there is every indication that in that regard they are more reform minded than we are. Perhaps hon. members ought to review what has happened in the United Kingdom House of Commons in this regard.

Some hon. members have said that under our system workers who are employed away from their electoral districts on voting day must return to their districts to vote. Sometimes they must travel a considerable distance to do so and no provision in the act makes it necessary for them to be paid a return fare to their jobs. People at sea especially are effected by this part of the act. During the last general election some people in my riding were at sea on election day and therefore they could not vote. Many complained because of this. The returning officer in my district phoned to Ottawa, to St. John's to here and to there, but still those people went without their vote. Many of them were good supporters of both parties, yet they had no chance to vote.

Mr. Bell: Do not talk it out.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, though there are many other matters I might raise, I shall not do so. Instead, I shall sit down.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the undertaking I gave the house the other day about the desirability of putting these proposals before the committee on privileges and elections so that they may be considered, I move:

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "That" and substituting therefor the following:

"the said Bill be not now read a second time but that the subject-matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections".

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): The time being six o'clock the hour for consideration of private members business has now expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—COMMUNIQUÉ AND STATEMENT FOLLOWING MINISTERIAL MEETING

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, hon. members have undoubtedly noted that this year the regular semi-annual meeting of the NATO Council was brought forward as a ministerial meeting in order to determine what would be, for the alliance, the consequences of the situation created by the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Cadieux) represented Canada on that occasion. Since both are still away, I would like to table a copy of the communiqué issued at the close of the meeting held in Brussels from November 14 to 16.

I would like, with leave, to table that communiqué.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Has the Prime Minister leave to table this document?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baldwin: If it is not too lengthy, Mr. Speaker, could it be printed in Hansard?

Mr. Trudeau: I have no objection, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): As an appendix.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that the document in question be printed as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of document referred to above see appendix.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the ministers of the 15 countries participating in the meeting have unanimously condemned Soviet military intervention in the domestic affairs of another country. Moreover, it has been agreed that the resulting situation had brought in a factor of uncertainty as to Soviet future intentions with regard to the security of the west. Consequently, they have reaffirmed their determination to protect the members of the alliance against any military aggression, according to the treaty. They have also stated that any Soviet intervention directly or indirectly affecting the situation in Europe or in the Mediterranean would entail an international crisis with serious consequences. They cannot remain indifferent to any new development likely to jeopardize the security of members of the alliance.

• (2:40 p.m.)

[English]

The members participating in NATO's integrated defence program agreed that in the circumstances there was a need to reassess their defences, and indicated various measures they were taking to ensure that the security of NATO was being maintained at an adequate level. At the same time they reaffirmed NATO's determination to pursue the long term goal of détente in east-west relations and to exploit all opportunities to make progress in disarmament.

In their statements the Canadian ministers cautioned against the alliance overreacting to Soviet actions in Czechoslovakia which, it had been agreed, were not directed particularly against members of NATO. The Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that while it was natural in the present circumstances to stress the defensive character of the alliance, it was essential that NATO should seek, and should be seen to be seeking, all reasonable opportunities to resume the dialogue with the Soviet union and thus to promote in due course progress toward the peaceful settlement of the issues facing Europe.

The Minister of National Defence explained that Canada was proceeding with its review of defence policy. Meanwhile, he said, we are maintaining our professional forces in Europe and in Canada at their high level of training, equipment and operational readiness.

Statement Following Ministerial Meeting

Arising out of the decision to close one of the three air bases that we occupy in Germany—Zweibrücken—we had planned to reduce the aircraft of our air division by approximately 20 per cent. However, we felt that until there has been a better opportunity for the Canadian government to assess the aftermath of the Czech crisis, both in the light of this meeting and in the light of our own review of defence policy, it would be prudent to defer a final decision on our part whether the air division should be maintained at its present levels or reduced. This, of course, will not affect the decision to close Zweibrücken.

The Minister of National Defence underlined the progressive qualitative improvement of our forces in all three environments, regular and reserve, and asserted that Canada continues to believe in collective security.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, we have heard with some interest the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman. This adds one more to the very long list of varying statements that have been made in and out of the house, on this continent and on other continents. I think we will have to examine with some care the document the right hon. gentleman has tabled in light of what has been said by the Prime Minister in this house and his other more interesting observations made outside the house. We would also like to examine it in light of what is alleged to have been said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Minister of National Defence at the meetings in Europe.

I would simply add, Mr. Speaker, that as far as the people of Canada and the hon. members of this house are concerned the matter is in a state of very considerable confusion. I only hope and suggest that what will be done is that which has already been suggested, namely that on the return of the Secretary of State for External Affairs the house leaders will arrange for a day to be set aside so there can be a clear cut debate on this issue, in view of the varying statements that have been made and the facts that have come to light.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, we heard the Prime Minister's statement with a great deal of serious reservation. One of the most regrettable results of the utterly unjustified invasion of Czechoslovakia has been to give an incentive to cold war warriors, who are not without influence in NATO, to demand an even greater reliance than before on obsolete and dangerous military confrontations in Europe. There are some who seize avidly on the opportunity to put pressure on allies to multiply weapons that are already useless and, if used, would produce an unimaginable scale of destruction in Europe.

From the statement it appears that the government to some extent has yielded to this pressure. We are to retain in Europe the 20 per cent of the air division that was supposed to return to Canada. This division is part of a vulnerable, useless and obsolete type of defence and there is no reason, so far as we know, why it should be retained. We are not saying we do not need mobile defences, but this sort of defence would not be of help to Czechoslovakia or any other country.

We also have serious reservations about the extension of vague threats as to what might happen outside NATO if certain events occur in the world. These threats are either meant seriously, in which case they ought to be seriously contained in terms of real commitments, or they are not meant seriously and do not add one iota to the credibility of the commitments which have already been made in NATO.

We believe the Czechoslovak crisis and invasion came about through fear. We most earnestly hope that in the review the government is making in this field it will undertake a radical revision of the commitments we have made in and through NATO. We do not advocate withdrawal from NATO although we do advocate that the entire framework of NATO, based on tactical nuclear weapons, ought to be reconsidered.

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, we have also listened carefully to the statement made by the right hon. Prime Minister.

The whole world has regretted the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Russia. Canada has an obligation, to itself and to the free world, to participate in all programs aiming at defending freedom in the world and to fight against dictatorship and aggression. I think that Canada can play a very important role in such circumstances and that we must not shirk our obligations to preserve this freedom which everyone wants.

CAPE BRETON DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

TABLING OF REPORT

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of tabling the French and English versions of the report of the Cape Breton Development Corporation proposing a general program as prescribed by section 17 of the act establishing the corporation. This program has been considered and approved by the government.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to table this document?

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister does not propose to make a statement. Since no statement has been made there can be no discussion. My understanding is that there is simply a motion before the house to table a document.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I only rose on a point of order to ask the minister to give consideration to providing copies of the report to all members of the house. Because of its far reaching implications for the future economic well being of Cape Breton Island I thought that might be a good idea.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether we have sufficient copies for that to be done. If we do not have enough we shall try to supply copies to all those hon. members who are interested.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and on the question of the availability of the report to hon. members of the house, may I suggest that if hon. members look at today's Ottawa Journal they will see that the Canadian Press has carried the report and has beaten the minister to the punch.

• (2:50 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION

APPROVAL OF ADDITIONAL RECOMMENDATIONS OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, by leave of the house I should like to table an additional group of 21 recommendations made by the royal commission on government organization which have been approved by the cabinet, some in a modified form. The government has now approved 208 of the 294 Glassco recommendations. Twenty-six were rejected as having been overtaken by events or as impracticable. There remains a balance of 60 recommendations on which final decision has not been made, but all are being actively pursued.

At this time I would like to pay tribute to the late J. Grant Glassco who, as the house is aware, died late in September of this year. Mr. Glassco was one of Canada's great citizens. We are indebted to him for his many contributions to the development of this country. One of his greatest contributions was his chairmanship of the royal commission on government organization. He earned high approbation for his leadership of the large research team he assembled, and for his wisdom, experience and the enormous amounts of personal time and energy that he devoted to this tremendous undertaking. That such approbation was justly earned is evidenced by the fact that no other royal commission dealing with so many matters of such complexity has to my knowledge ever achieved an equivalent acceptance of its recommendations. Scholars of the future will surely declare the Glassco Commission one of the most significant milestones in the development of Canadian public administration. I am sure there is complete unanimity in this house when I say that his passing is deeply regretted.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS

CONCURRENCE IN FIRST REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville) moved that the first report of the special committee on statutory instruments presented to the house on Thursday, November 14, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

FILING OF REPORTS ON ELECTION EXPENSES

Question No. 118—Mr. Fortin:

Have any candidates who were defeated in the General Election of June 25, 1968, and subsequently appointed to positions with the Government of Canada not filed a report on their election expenses pursuant to the Canada Elections Act and, if so, who are these persons?

Questions

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): A total of 968 persons were candidates in the general election of June 25, 1968. The names of those candidates on whose behalf returns showing election expenses were not filed, according to the information supplied by the returning officers to the Chief Electoral Officer, are set forth in the return made on November 15, 1968, to the order of the house made on September 25, 1968. However, since a person who has been a candidate in an election and who subsequently takes employment as a public servant, etc. is not required to declare that he has been a candidate, there is no record from which an answer to this question can be drawn.

C.N.R. LESS THAN CARLOAD SHIPMENTS, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 248—Mr. Coates:

1. What was the total tonnage of less than carload lot shipment carried by the C.N.R. in the Atlantic Provinces, in either the fiscal year 1966-67 or the calendar year 1966, also 1967-68 or the calendar year 1967, and for the six month period from October 1, 1967 to March 31, 1968?

2. What was the total revenue from less than carload lot shipments in the Atlantic Provinces for the periods set out in part one?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1 and 2. As the railway system is not administered by provinces and as non-carload statistics are not kept by tonnage but by numbers of shipments, it is not possible to answer the question in the form asked.

C.N.R. WORK FORCE, MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 268—Mr. Thomas (Moncton):

1. What was the total work force of the Canadian National Railways at Moncton, New Brunswick (a) on September 1, 1963 (b) on September 1, 1967 (c) on September 1, 1968?

2. Are further reductions in the work force at Moncton contemplated by the Canadian National Railways and, if so, to what extent and on what date?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: 1. The number of employees paid at Moncton were: September 1, 1963, 3,992; September 1, 1967, 4,439; September 1, 1968, 4,118.

2. The size of the work force depends upon traffic requirements, seasonal and other factors. It is not possible to answer the question in the form asked. If adjustments have to be made in the work force then these are dealt with in accordance with the union agreements.

OFFICE FACILITIES, ENERGY, MINES AND RESOURCES MINISTER

Question No. 307—Mr. Aiken:

1. Have the departmental offices of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources been refurnished since the present Minister took office?

2. If so, what has been the total cost of furnishings and furniture installed and other changes made?

3. How much floor space is presently occupied by the Minister and his Executive, Special and Parliamentary Assistants; and how much was occupied by the previous Minister?

4. Who are the members of the Minister's departmental staff; what are their salaries; and which of these have transferred from another department since June, 1968?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Yes.

2. $15,635.20, which includes refurnishing, furniture and other changes made in offices formerly occupied by the minister and additional office space required.

3. Floor space accommodating minister, special assistants and parliamentary secretary, 1,466 square feet. Former minister occupied 1,206 square feet.

4. Lois Kennedy, ST-7 classification; $5,985-$6,576 salary range.

Arlene LeTouzel, ST-3 classification; $2,932-$4,384 salary range.

Adam Clark, CR-1 classification; $2,761-$3,367 salary range.

Christine Wiksten, ST-4 classification, casual; $4,343—minimum salary.

H. V. Black, CR-2 classification, casual; $3,761—minimum salary.

Miss Kennedy, Miss LeTouzel and Miss Wiksten transferred from Department of Agriculture; Mr. Clark and Mr. Black from Department of Secretary of State.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION, ADULT TRAINING PROGRAM

Question No. 351—Mr. Clermont:

1. For the fiscal year 1968-69, what is the federal government's share, per pupil, of the administrative costs of the adult training program including teachers, premises, lighting, books in (a) the academic course (i) full-time (ii) part-time (b) the agriculture course—full time (c) apprenticeship centre—bricklaying, carpentry, electricity, painting, plumbing, heating, sheet-metal work, welding—full time?

2. What is the average number of pupils, per class and the duration of these courses?

3. What is the amount of the weekly allowance granted to the pupils?

4. What percentage does the federal government contribute to the adult training program?

[Translation]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Immigration and Manpower): 1. Under the Adult Occupational Training Act, the federal government pays the full cost incurred by training authorities in providing training courses for adults. This includes salaries of teachers, rental and maintenance of premises (light, heat and water) and also books and other instructional material used in all full-time and part-time courses.

These costs cannot be given on a per trainee basis as the provinces have not as yet submitted their final claims.

2. For the period of April-September, 1968 the average number of trainees per class was 17 and the average duration of the courses was 94 days.

3. The rate of allowance paid to adult trainees ranges from $37 a week for an adult without dependants to $96 a week for an adult with at least three dependants, living away from home.

4. The federal government pays the full cost incurred under the Occupational Training for Adults Program.

TERMINATION OF C.P.R. PASSENGER SERVICE, VICTORIA-COURTENAY, B.C.

Question No. 370—Mr. Anderson:

Will the Department of Transport hold public hearings in Victoria and other Vancouver Island centers before coming to a decision on the Canadian Pacific Railway's request to terminate passenger services between Victoria and Courtenay, B.C.?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The Canadian Transport Commission advises as follows: The present position with respect to the passenger train between Victoria and Courtenay, British Columbia, is that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company gave notice of its intent to discontinue the service, whereupon the railway transport committee declared the train to be a passenger train service for the purposes of sections 314I and 314J of the Railway Act and directed that no discontinuance could take place without a formal application unless approved by the railway transport committee following receipt of an application.

In the event of a formal application being made to the railway transport committee of the Canadian Transport Commission by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to discontinue the passenger train between Victoria and Courtenay, a public hearing will be held by the committee. No decision has, as yet, been made as to the precise location of the public hearing. Such hearings are arranged to meet the convenience of as many of the interested parties as possible, all of whom will be duly notified in advance.

TENDERS FOR HOUSES AT AIRPORT, FORT NELSON, B.C.

Question No. 398—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

What is the name, address and amount bid by each person who tendered on nine houses (whether for individual houses or the lot) located at the airport at Fort Nelson, B.C.?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Insofar as the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation is concerned: It is the policy of the corporation not to divulge such information as requested until the expiration of 90 days from the date of sale. This safeguards the interest of the customers of the corporation who could otherwise be prejudiced in the marketing of purchased merchandise.

This sale was completed as recently as September 27, 1968, and in accordance with the above policy the information will be available on or after December 27, 1968.

LEGISLATION ON JOB DISCRIMINATION BECAUSE OF AGE

Question No. 467—Mr. McCleave:

Has the government considered legislation to prevent job discrimination on account of age and, if so, with what result or intention?

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): The subject is being studied and legislation is under active consideration.

COST OF NEW DESTROYERS

Question No. 477—Mr. Forrestall:

Since the reply to Question No. 1,075 made on February 21, 1968, has there been any change in the estimated cost for construction of the four new destroyers, including the equipment costs of these ships?

Questions

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): No.

LOSS OF CIRCULARS, TORONTO POST OFFICE

Question No. 502—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Were circulars mailed by the Womens Committee of the Toronto Art Gallery lost in passage through the Toronto Post Office and, if so (a) what was the number of lost circulars (b) what explanation for the loss was given to the organization sending the circulars?

2. Is the Post Office Department having difficulty in obtaining part-time employees because of inadequate facilities at Toronto?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): 1. No; they were apparently mislaid or misrouted from the date of mailing, September 27, to the week ending October 19, during which they were delivered. (a) 6,686. (b) When the first inquiry was made, a thorough check of the postal premises on Front Street was initiated. No trace of the circulars was found. The mailers were informed that the search had failed to produce anything and were invited to duplicate the mailing without any further postal charges. It is understood that a start had been made on a second mailing when word was received that some of the missing circulars had been delivered. It now appears that all were delivered by October 19.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFITS FOR CANADIANS IN U.S.

Question No. 521—Mr. Rodrigue:

1. What reasons are given by the representatives of the Bureau of Employment Security of Maine and of New Hampshire for preventing the conclusion of an agreement which would make Canadians working in American territory eligible for the benefits of Unemployment Insurance Act?

2. For the years 1965, 1966 and 1967, how many Canadian workers were employed in American territory in the States of Maine, New Hampshire, New York and Vermont?

3. What were the terms of agreements concluded with other American States over the issue of Unemployment Insurance benefits and when were these various agreements signed?

4. What proposals for reaching an agreement have been submitted by the representatives of the Canadian Government to the American representatives?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The Unemployment Insurance Commission advises: 1. Main authorities have been unwilling to conclude an agreement because of the cost to the Maine fund. Estimates compiled by the Maine authorities have indicated that the cost might run as high as 1.5 million dollars annually.

2. The information requested is not available.

3. Under the terms of the agreement, a person who has worked in a State with which we have an agreement can apply for U.S. benefit to the office of the Unemployment Insurance Commission serving the area in which he resides. Conversely, a person who has worked in Canada and who is residing in a State with which we have an agreement can claim against his Canadian entitlement through the office of the appropriate agency in that State. In either case, benefit is paid direct to the individual by the State or country in which he previously worked. The administration which accepts his claim merely acts as an agent for the liable State.

There are also provisions in the agreements to eliminate the duplication of coverage in a case of an individual who is employed in both the U.S. and Canada by the same employer. Under these provisions one State or country provides him with coverage on the basis of his total earnings for the year.

At present agreements are in force with all States except Maine, New Hampshire, Iowa and Alabama. The majority of the agreements were negotiated in the early 1940s, and virtually all present agreements were signed prior to 1950. There have been no new agreements concluded for several years.

4. Canadian officials are attempting to convince the Maine authorities that their estimate of the cost of their fund is too high. A survey designed to give an accurate estimate of the cost is currently underway.

2. If not, for what reason?

3. Has this problem been raised in collective bargaining and, if so, by whom and with what results?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): 1 and 2. The retroactive remuneration regulations authorized by order in council P.C. 1964-1417 of September 10, 1964 provide for retroactive remuneration to former employees who, for reasons beyond their control, leave the public service between the effective date of such increases and the date of their approval. The regulations, therefore, are applicable to former employes who have been laid off or have retired or to the estate of an employee who died but not to former employees who resigned or were dismissed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO AND NORAD—DECISIONS RESPECTING CANADIAN COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Can the right hon. gentleman tell us just when it was that the government came to a decision to defer its 20 per cent reduction in the size of the air division in Europe?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): In the course of the past weeks, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises from the statements made both inside and outside the house with regard to Canada's commitment to assign four anti-submarine destroyers to NATO. Will the Prime Minister advise the house whether the government intends to proceed with the production schedule and fulfil the delivery dates for the four ships, commencing in June 1971 and ending in September 1972?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I was saying on Friday, that this was a decision which was made quite some time ago. As a matter of fact the construction of these ships was announced by the Minister of National Defence on December 22, 1964, and a further announcement was made by Mr. Drury and Mr. Cadieux when the contracts were let on April 6, 1968. Therefore these are decisions which had been made in the past, and contracts having been let the position we took—and this is the position Mr. Cadieux took in Europe—was that these ships would be at the disposition of the NATO command, as were our other anti-submarine ships in the Atlantic area.

Of course this does not prejudge what we will decide to do as a result of our review. If we should decide that we do not want the ships to be allocated to NATO we are free to decide that, but Mr. Cadieux was repeating—

Mr. McGrath: Order.

Mr. Trudeau: Thank you very much—the Minister of National Defence was repeating a commitment which had been made by the Canadian government as early as 1964 regarding the construction of these ships.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister say whether, in view of the colossal build up in the navy of the U.S.S.R., Canada was approached to integrate the naval strength that she has with the naval forces of the European NATO members and, in particular, to join in strengthening NATO forces in the Mediterranean?

Mr. Trudeau: Concerning whether we were approached I would have to inquire and either give the answer or have the Minister of National Defence give the answer. But I have reason to doubt that we have been approached, because the present position is that all of Canada's anti-submarine forces which are based on the east coast are at present committed to the NATO command and are operative in the Atlantic area.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The question which I presume the Prime Minister wishes to have allocated to the Minister of National Defence is whether there is any question of these forces, the Canadian naval units, being placed in the Mediterranean.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether a statement which is reported to have been made by the Postmaster General to the effect that Canada's foreign aid ought to be equal to or exceed our defence expenditures was, as I hope it may have been, a statement of government policy.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the Postmaster General since he made that statement. I will ask him whether he actually made it. I do know that he intended to make some statement to the effect that it was very important to have external aid, but in respect of what the percentage would be in relation to Canada's over-all defence commitments I am not aware.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether this problem of increasing foreign aid and decreasing our defence expenditures generally, including NATO, is one of the matters now under active review.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, very definitely. In our review of external affairs and in our defence review we are looking very actively at the alternative ways of spending money usefully in our foreign relations, and this is one of them.

Mr. Lewis: May I ask the right hon. gentleman, arising out of the communiqué of the NATO foreign ministers' meeting, did our Canadian representatives make clear that any suggestion that NATO would involve itself in any action that may take place on the eastern side of the iron curtain would not meet with Canadian support?

Mr. Trudeau: The question is rather too vague for me to answer it. Any action on the other side of the iron curtain—well, it would really depend on what it was. If I.C.B.M.'s come up from that side and are aimed at us, well—

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, arising from the Prime Minister's statement in Kingston about the basis of the government's review of Canada's position in NATO, will the Prime Minister say whether the same plan will apply with regard to our continuation in NORAD? Is our continuation in NORAD subject to the general review of defence matters of which the Prime Minister speaks?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. The kind, quality and number of armaments which we will want to commit under NORAD are very much the subject of the external affairs and defence review.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, is the government continuing a reappraisal or reassessment of all existing plans and commitments for the defence of North America?

Mr. Trudeau: It is a general review. I think I can say we are examining all existing plans.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, the other day I asked the Prime Minister whether he would indicate who was carrying on the study of the terms of reference, and he was unwilling to do so. Would he inform the house what opportunity may exist for interested Canadians to participate in this government review of foreign and defence policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, at this stage I suppose they have available to them the normal channels of communication. There probably will be a later stage at which they will want to write to their members of parliament indicating to them what views they would like to see held in this house when we are discussing the review and policy which the government will put forward.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Does the Prime Minister indicate that there will be no formal way in which individuals or groups who have devoted a good deal of time to this matter and have gained a good deal of experience in respect of this important aspect of Canadian life will have an opportunity to make their representations?

Mr. Trudeau: Not in a formal way to the government at this stage.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): At any stage?

Mr. Trudeau: As I said, at a later stage of course they could, when they know what our proposals are. They could express their views on them then, but at this stage the government is engaged in the business of establishing policies in very, very many areas, and we do not consult the organized groups before making any policy in any area.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister agree to let us have a copy of his itinerary for the next few months so we could participate in such a review?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether there has been any formal negotiation with the United States with regard to a cut-back in our NORAD commitment, and what is the United States attitude in this regard.

Mr. Trudeau: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Woolliams: What was the United States attitude with regard to any formal negotiation concerning any cut-back in our commitment to NORAD?

Mr. Trudeau: At this stage we are trying to establish what the government policy will be in the years and decades to come. We are not consulting the United States on that. We want to advance our own decision-making processes ourselves before either coming to parliament, going to the United States or going to these advice groups which were mentioned in an earlier question.

Mr. Woolliams: Do I take it, then, from the Prime Minister's answer that in this area of review of our commitment to NORAD no discussion is taking place with the United States at this time with reference to the defence of America, and that it is a purely unilateral decision of the Canadian government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, under the NORAD agreement, as under the NATO agreements, certain mechanisms do exist for consultation. This is going on all the time, but certainly there is no specific consultation with the United States on the direction of our review at this time.

OLD AGE SECURITY

SUGGESTED PENSIONS TO YOUNGER WIVES OF PENSIONERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right honourable Prime Minister.

As Canadians now get their pension at 67 years of age, which does not necessarily authorize payment of a pension to the wife who may be, let us say, 55 years of age or some 15 years younger than her husband, has the right honourable Prime Minister or the government considered the possibility of authorizing payment of a pension to a younger wife whose husband is already getting his old age pension?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, questions relating to pensions generally come under the purview of the Minister of Finance, and I wonder if the hon. member would not want to put this question to him when he is in the house?

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

I could have put my question to the Minister of Finance, but the right honourable Prime Minister knows that the Minister of Finance cannot decide on his own and that it is the cabinet that decides. The right honourable Prime Minister should therefore be able to answer.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member has already put his question.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I did not get any reply.

[Later:]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The Prime Minister has just told me that I should put my question to the Minister of Finance, and I would like to advise him that the matter does not come under the Minister of Finance but rather the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture, but in their absence from the house I should like to direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. In the light of the clear-cut call by delegates presently attending the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool for a two price system for wheat, will the government give favourable consideration to this request or some other acceptable alternative.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, these ministers are to be in the house on Wednesday. I think the question might be asked of them then.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—PROVISION OF CARIBOU AIRCRAFT FOR RELIEF FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Caribou aircraft which were to be sent to Nigeria for the distribution of food supplies have now been dispatched to that country; or has there been a change of plans in this regard?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As of Friday, Mr. Speaker, the Caribou aircraft had not been dispatched to that country, at the request on the Red Cross itself, which felt that they could not usefully be put into service at this time.

Mr. Harkness: I have a supplementary question which is really part of my original one. Has a decision now been made by the Canadian government not to send these aircraft?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, we are still holding them ready for service. The house will remember that it was as the result of a discussion by my representative with General Gowon that we were told this would be the best alternative in view of the impossibility of using the Hercules. That is why we said we were prepared to commit them. As of now there is some question as to whether they are actually needed in that Nigerian area.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might ask the Prime Minister a question about the Canadian Hercules at Fernando Po. Is it still grounded, or has it been brought back from the Nigerian-Biafran area?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we still hope, though with less enthusiasm as a result of no answer from Colonel Ojukwu to the daylight flight proposal and Red Cross negotiations, that we will be permitted to make daylight landings of the Hercules. We still do not know of any reason why flights of Hercules in the daytime, in order to help serve the people of Biafra, would not be authorized by their own leaders.

Mr. Brewin: Would the Prime Minister say something about night flights? He replied in respect of daylight flights, but is the Hercules being used on night flights?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Trudeau: As of Friday, night flights to my knowledge have not been resumed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that, to the best of my knowledge, every night last week and last night as well planes have been operating at night into Nigeria, why have not arrangements been made in the interim to have perhaps not one but an additional one or two Hercules aircraft operate in order to step up efforts to meet the relief requirements that are growing steadily, particularly when these people are nearing the end of their local harvest?

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members know there have been some casualties as a result of night flights, and that we made a very reasonable proposal to make these flights in daytime when we would be able to bring in much more food with much less danger. We have the authority from the Nigerian government to do so. The Red Cross is interested in doing that, but we still do not have an answer from the Biafran leaders as to why they do not want us to fly in the daytime. We can only speculate that they have an interest in intermingling arms and relief flights in order that there may be confusion.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could indicate first whether at the moment there is any prohibition on the part of Nigeria to continue any flights that we commenced with our Hercules aircraft and, second, in what way we have attempted to contact the Biafran officials to ascertain whether there is a possibility of daytime operations.

Mr. Trudeau: In respect of the first part of the question, we do know the Nigerian government has said it would no longer give any assurance that the night flights would not be attacked, for the very simple reason that it is during the night that all the arms are getting in, and for the additional reason that they also authorized daylight flights. Having regard to the second part of the question, you had better ask it again, as I do not remember what it was.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In asking the question again, Mr. Speaker, may I indicate that the Prime Minister has suggested that arms are moving in both during the day and at night. In respect of what time on the clock could we get approval allowing these flights?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): In the second part of my question, Mr. Speaker, I asked specifically what contact has been made with Biafran representatives in order to make the necessary arrangements for daytime operations.

Mr. Trudeau: In answering the question I should indicate for the purposes of the record that I did not say arms flights were coming in during the day. Having regard to the second part of the question, I explained that we have made our proposals and the Nigerian government's proposal to the International Red Cross. It has undertaken to speak to Colonel Ojukwu in an effort to influence him to accept this position. I wish hon. members of this house and other people in this country who seem to have a lot of influence with Colonel Ojukwu would also speak to him and get an assurance from him.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ATTENDANCE AT CONFERENCE OF OBSERVERS FROM OPPOSITION PARTIES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether it is the intention of the government to make the meetings of the federal-provincial conference dealing with the constitution and finance, to be held next month, open to observers appointed by the provincial and federal opposition parties.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I cannot speak, of course, with respect to the provincial opposition parties, Mr. Speaker. The provinces are empowered to compose their delegations as they wish. As far as the federal government delegation is concerned, we had not planned to have any members of opposition parties as members of the delegation. Hon. members will recall that last year we reserved places at the conference for the various opposition parties in this house, and it was up to them to allocate these places to the members they desired. We plan to continue this procedure if we get the approval of the provincial governments.

Mr. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, has the Prime Minister given any consideration to the possibility of placing on the agenda of the forthcoming conference the formation of an eleventh province made up of northern Ontario and northern Quebec?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the officials who are charged with establishing the agenda had not been seized of this problem when they last met. I doubt whether it will be able to get on the agenda at this late stage. Perhaps it will in some other year.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Will he indicate whether arrangements have been made to include elected representatives from the Yukon and Northwest territories at the conference?

Mr. Trudeau: I believe I indicated some days ago that there was an intention to have representatives from the Yukon and Northwest Territories, either or both, as members of the federal delegation, but this delegation has not yet been established.

INQUIRY AS TO AGENDA FOR CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the agenda has now been settled for the conference with provincial premiers regarding the constitution in December? If so, would the Prime Minister be prepared to inform the house as to the agenda for the conference, since this is a matter of great public interest?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree that it is a matter of public interest, but the continuing committee of officials just finished discussing this subject some days ago. I have now a letter for my signature to go out to the provincial premiers suggesting an agenda to them. As soon as I have agreement on the agenda, and agreement that there is nothing confidential in it, I would be glad to let this house know what the agenda is.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROPOSED LIMITATION ON GRANTS FROM HEALTH FUND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked last Thursday, and the question asked by my friend the hon. member for Sincoe North, concerning the announced freeze on grants available under the Health Resources Fund Act. In view of the statement made in a report to the Medical Research Council last week as to the serious effect of this freeze, will the minister reconsider his position?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this was a firm decision taken by the federal government at the health ministers' conference, and no reconsideration is being given to it at this time. What is being given consideration, however, is the allocation of the moneys in the fund in order that there will not be too much harm so far as the projects of the provinces are concerned.

[Later:]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare a question arising from the statement by the government of Manitoba that the cutback from a five year to a two year period in the health research and building fund will render joint planning with the university and major hospitals almost impossible. Is it the intention of the government to engage in any further discussion with the provinces on the future of this federal program?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Those discussions are going on, and that intent was conveyed to the provincial health ministers at the conference.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

BRITISH COLUMBIA—MOUNTED POLICE PROSECUTIONS INVOLVING INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the hon. member for Skeena asked whether the attention of the government had been drawn to a recent statement by Mr. Allan Bate to the effect that in court cases involving native Indian people the R.C.M.P. take sides against these native people and put them in the position of not being able effectively to obtain justice in the courts. This question was taken as notice by my parliamentary secretary, and I should like to reply to it on behalf of the Solicitor General.

Senior members of the force have been in touch with Mr. Allan Bate in order to obtain some clarification. Mr. Bate states that he did not say the R.C.M.P. is against the native people. He also states unequivocally that he has the highest regard for the force and for members of the force whom he has encountered in his work over the years as counsel. He did say, however, that from his over-all experience no policeman should be put in the position of acting as investigator, accuser and often adviser to illiterate persons involved in offences, and this is more likely to occur in isolated areas policed by the force. In short, Mr. Bate is against the system and not the police, and has undertaken to explain his views fully in writing to the attorney general of British Columbia.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEXICO—ARREST AND DEPORTATION OF CANADIAN JOURNALISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has our embassy in Mexico City investigated and, if warranted, taken steps to protest to the government of Mexico against what appears to be the highly unorthodox arrest and deportation of two Canadian journalists?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): That question will be answered tomorrow, Mr. Speaker.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister also find out whether these two itinerants were in Mexico under direction from the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to bring back pictures of revolutionary movements and the like, as though we did not have enough revolutionaries coming to Canada?

[Later:]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I asked whether in the absence of the minister an inquiry would be made of the C.B.C., and I submit I am entitled to an answer to that question because today with the minister absent again it is hard to—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that perhaps the right hon. gentleman is entitled to ask his question, but he is not entitled to the supplementary comments.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary comments were just to help the government along. Would the minister make that inquiry so we may find out what these itinerants were doing down there?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Speaker, I will see that inquiries are made of the C.B.C., but I am sure the right hon. gentleman would sooner see pictures of revolutionaries than the revolutionaries themselves.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister makes the investigation I wonder if he would investigate whether this revolution in Mexico which they were trying to film was a fictitious one or a real one.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GREECE—DEATH SENTENCE IMPOSED ON STUDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Is the government aware that a student opponent of the Greek regime has very recently been condemned to death? If so is the Canadian government, as a fellow member of NATO, contemplating any action it might take in urging the Greek government to reconsider its decision in this matter?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to inquire into the matter.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—REPORT OF DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Could the minister say, having studied and tabled the plan of the Cape Breton Development Corporation, whether he endorses this particular plan?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I stated that it was approved by the government.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In light of the fact that the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development referred to the report as a government report, I would ask the Prime Minister whether he agrees that this report has been drawn up and formulated in accordance with Bill C-135.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will have to discuss this with the minister.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, since the minister is here and we never know ahead of time when he will be back, could he answer the question now?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I will discuss it with him right now.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

SUGGESTED REFERENCE OF LEGISLATION TO SUPREME COURT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, the question I wish to ask today was posed to the right hon. Prime Minister last Friday and I understand was referred to the Minister of Justice. So, if I may, I should like to pose this question to the Minister of Justice. Will he advise the house whether he will refer the official languages bill to the Supreme Court of Canada for a ruling as to its validity before proceeding further with it in the house, in view of the submissions made to the right hon. Prime Minister by Mr. Thorson, the former president of the Exchequer Court of Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: And former Liberal minister of the government of Canada.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I read very carefully, as have the law officers of the crown, the letter of Mr. Thorson, and the law officers of the crown advised me that Bill C-120, known as the official languages bill, in no way purports to amend the constitution of Canada or to affect or modify any legal right or obligation contained in the constitution relating to either the English or the French language, and that the enactment of this bill into law will in no wise affect or modify the permission conferred or the obligations imposed by section 133 of the British North America Act. In short, the constitution of Canada as regards the use of the English or French language will remain the same.

I can therefore say, in answer to the hon. member's question, that there is no present intention on the part of the federal government to refer the bill to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMPANY OF YOUNG CANADIANS

POSSESSION BY MEMBER OF CONFIDENTIAL CONSULTANT'S REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister cause the Solicitor General to determine the means by which an advance confidential copy of a consultant's report to the Company of Young Canadians came into the possession of the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour, and have the Solicitor General advise the house whether action will be taken of the kind threatened to be taken against the publishers of La Presse?

HUMAN RIGHTS

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING RACIAL DISCRIMINATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, having in mind the statement made over the week end by a labour department official to the effect that Canadians should back up the anti-discrimination law of the country by rooting out racial discrimination in clubs, business circles and fraternities. My question is, will the minister indicate active support of such a good declaration?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for a statement of opinion on the part of the minister, or a statement of policy. I do not think the question should be asked in this way.

FINANCE

REPORTED INTEREST RATES UNDER FARM LOAN LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this could be a question of privilege but perhaps I could put it as a question to the Prime Minister because it relates to two departments, the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Finance. Both these departments issued releases over the week end setting interest rates under the Farm Credit Corporation Act and the Farm Improvement Loans Act for loans on land at 7¾ per cent and for loans for other purposes at 7½ per cent. Is this not a typographical error? Surely no minister would set rates this high.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Could the minister say whether the increased unemployment in the Atlantic region is the result of the government's program curtailing government plans and government expenditures as was recently suggested by the Minister of Finance?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is argumentative.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR PROVISION FOR HOUSE DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he could indicate to the house when the safari into the southern hemisphere will terminate; and would he discuss with his colleague the President of the Privy Council when arrangements could be made through the usual channels for a debate on external affairs through reference of an appropriate item in the estimates, to deal with the question of the NATO arrangements?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Perhaps I might reply to that, Mr. Speaker. As hon. members know, as the result of a special order the house will be dealing with the report from the external affairs committee on the question of Nigeria and that part of it called Biafra on November 26. I would be pleased to consult with my hon. friends with regard to the possibility of getting the estimates of the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs fully dealt with in the standing committee on external affairs and national defence at an early date and using one of the other supply days to discuss this subject.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

VANCOUVER—REPORTED SALES OF SWEDISH ABORTION PILL

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the parliamentary secretary told me he would take the following question as notice:

In view of press reports that a Swedish-made abortion pill is now being sold in Vancouver, is the minister investigating this reported illegal traffic?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): That matter is being looked into, Mr. Speaker.

CRIMINAL CODE

SUGGESTED AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CORPORAL PUNISHMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the concern being expressed by members and other responsible people with regard to the lash and other forms of corporal punishment used in our prisons and penitentiaries, may I ask the minister whether the government is considering including in the omnibus bill an amendment to the Criminal Code to provide for changes in respect of corporal punishment.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, sir, not in the presently reviewed omnibus bill. I have stated that the bill will contain, in substance, only the matters that were before the house in Bill No. C-195.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister whether this matter is being considered by the government or by the Department of Justice under any other head?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): There is no active consideration being given by the government to this subject. It is a matter which I am prepared to look into, taking into account expert advice from all quarters.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): May I ask the minister, Mr. Speaker, when it is expected the omnibus bill will be introduced?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It has been redrafted, and I want to bring the changes in detail before my colleagues and have it submitted to the house as soon as I can.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I have a question arising out of an answer given earlier by the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that there is a widespread division of opinion regarding the legislation of abortion and homosexuality, will those two matters be separated from the omnibus bill when it is presented so that members may vote with particular reference to these matters? Will there be a free vote on these two questions which are above politics and have important social considerations?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I certainly appreciate the non-partisan nature of that question, Mr. Speaker. It is our present intention to submit this bill to the house as one bill. Of course, if the bill succeeds in obtaining second reading and goes into clause by clause study, there will be an opportunity at that time to debate every one of the individual items. It is my present view that the bill will be a government bill presented as one measure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is the government going to restrict the right of members to vote according to their conscience? Are the whips going to apply?

FORESTRY

REPORTED INQUIRY INTO MECHANIZATION OF INDUSTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Since the minister's department has just announced an inquiry into the mechanization of the forest industry, can the minister say whether this inquiry has any terms of reference with respect to the loggers and other workers in this industry so affected?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I know of no such inquiry, Mr. Speaker. Was the announcement from the Department of Forestry and Rural Development?

Mr. Lundrigan: Perhaps I misdirected my question, Mr. Speaker. The minister's department is having the notice sent out. Perhaps I should direct my question to the parliamentary secretary of the Minister of Fisheries, who has been making pronouncements in that regard.

[Later:]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, could I have an answer to the question I directed to the minister responsible for forestry?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the minister responsible for forestry will be here tomorrow, and I will refer the question to him.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

AUDITOR GENERAL

50. Salaries and expenses of office, $2,427,400.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have a few general comments to make. I do not know whether it is the intention of the minister to make a statement but possibly he may have something to say later. I might indicate to you, Mr. Chairman, and to the members of the committee that it is not our intention to unnecessarily delay consideration of this particular vote nor the vote which will follow because the public acccounts committee is now sitting and the Auditor General is appearing before that committee. There will be, therefore, substantial opportunities in the committee to deal with the Auditor General's position and his functions. However, there are a few comments I should make which may invite a reply from the minister.

Some time ago it was suggested in this house, and also in the public accounts committee, that it may well be suitable for the office of the Auditor General to be the subject of a special act of parliament. At the present time, as members well know, all the legislation that relates to the Auditor General is in the Financial Administration Act or in special acts of parliament which call upon the Auditor General to perform the task of auditing the accounts of the corporations which are involved. It was proposed in the public accounts committee, and my recollection is a draft act was submitted to the committee and was the subject of some discussion, that having in mind the independent nature of this officer appointed by the government but reporting to parliament, a special act might well be considered. This bill could be brought before the house at a suitable opportunity, and I should like to have some comments on that suggestion.

Again, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I think the house should have some better way than it now has of dealing with the recommendations of the Auditor General. At present they are put before the public accounts committee, subsequently made the subject of discussion in that committee and then dealt with further in the form of recommendations made in the report of the committee which then comes into the house but upon which no further action is taken. I think it is in the interests not only of the government and the house but of proper administrative efficiency that some means be devised whereby the recommendations of the committee be made the subject of debate in this house. I am not suggesting that there should be a long debate. I am not suggesting for a minute that the government must accept the recommendations of the committee.

It is well known, Mr. Chairman, that following the lead taken by the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he was prime minister the public accounts committee was given a new impetus, a new life. The chairman of that committee at the time was a member of the opposition party and had a very successful and distinguished career as chairman. Since that time this committee has had the opportunity to function in a non-partisan way more than any other committee of the house.

When this committee has considered in detail the recommendations and proposals made by the Auditor General, has considered his report and come to a determination, I think it is quite improper for no action to be taken on the committee's report. It has been my experience—and I am sure all other members who have served on the committee would agree with me—that to a very large extent the recommendations of this committee are almost always unanimous. In that way it is as non-partisan a committee as can be found. Its recommendations are objective and are directed toward securing a better and more efficient administration of government departments.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, it is surely only fair and proper that some means be found, within reasonable limits, to debate in this house the recommendations of the committee when it reports to the house. One need only examine the last report of the Auditor General to discover that a very large number of the recommendations of the public accounts committee have not been dealt with, have not been considered, and the government has not come to a point of view about them or indicated whether it is for or against them. This certainly does not result in expeditious and effective government operation. I therefore suggest that some consideration be given to this point.

I realize, Mr. Chairman, that I can be told by the minister—and he will be quite right to tell me—that this is a matter for the committee. Nevertheless, I think it has been understood in the past that the report made by the committee withers on the vine and nothing happens. In Australia, they have devised a far better and more efficient way to deal with this problem. The public accounts committee operates under an act of parliament. Its functions are set out by statute. Its appointment is arranged by statute. In the pursuit of its duties it publishes, at frequent intervals throughout the year, a document that sets out the recommendations of the committee side by side with what action, if any, has been taken by the government to implement them. This means that there is available to members of the public, to the government's officers and to members of the Australian House of Representatives at all times a clearcut and balanced interpretation of what the recommendations have been and what the government is doing about them.

I do not know whether this would be the answer to our problem, but I suggest that if there is to be any effective and meaningful role played by the Auditor General some better ways must be found to ensure that when a committee of the house, after serious and lengthy consideration, has made recommendations, those recommendations are the subject of debate in the house and, if necessary, of division in the house. After all, the government does not need to accept the recommendations. If it does not accept them the government should be prepared to come into the house and say why. If in the view of the opposition the matter is important enough to be the subject of a vote, then the house can decide by dividing on the issue.

The final point that I would make is this. On a number of occasions it has been suggested by the public accounts committee that the Auditor General should be joint auditor not only of government departments, crown corporations and other emanations in respect of which he is now authorized to conduct an audit but also joint auditor of all crown corporations. I draw to the attention of this committee a recent experience of this need in connection with one crown corporation, the Company of Young Canadians. I am not going into this question because it is now before a committee of the house, but I suggest through you, Mr. Chairman, to the members of this committee that if a joint audit had been done by the Auditor General and the private auditor, the recent experience might never have occurred.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but in circumstances where a change in the appointment of the private auditor is made, which does happen from time to time, I think the continuity that would be provided by the Auditor General appearing as joint auditor, with his experience and knowledge of the affairs of crown corporations, would be most invaluable. I should like to see the government give consideration to this recommendation. It is not a new one to me; it is a recommendation that has been made on a number of occasions in the public accounts committee.

These are the few suggestions that I make, Mr. Chairman. I do not know whether the minister would care to reply to them. I do know that other recommendations will be coming out of the public accounts committee. I assumed that the estimates of the Auditor General will be coming back to this house some time in the new year in a new form, and consequently as far as we are concerned we do not propose to pursue this matter. We say this without prejudice to our belief that there can be a better and more effective way found to deal with the functions of the Auditor General, but we are not prepared to hold up the estimates at this time. I do not want to inhibit the rights of other members, of course, but we feel that if this item and the other one can in due course carry we might well get into other legislative business later this day so as to try to help the government in its difficulties. However, these difficulties are of its own creation in that it has tried to get through the house the legislative diet that it has set for itself.

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to state that this year I was named to the public accounts committee and was really quite shocked to find that a number of the situations referred to by the hon. member for Peace River existed. First of all we had a report from the Auditor General indicating the status of the recommendations that have been made by the public accounts committee from time to time in the past. Some 55 recommendations had been made by the public accounts committee, on 20 of which no action had yet been taken.

There were 16 other recommendations where the executive had indicated disagreement. These matters had been considered and there was disagreement with respect to them. I would judge such decisions on their merits. In 13 instances it was indicated that slow progress was being made. In certain discussions there appears to have been sensitivity on the part of some government members on the committee to the use of the word "slow".

The Auditor General used the word "slow" advisedly. Two of the recommendations have been implemented and another two are soon to be implemented. In one case the action taken has not been satisfactory and in another case a recommendation was withdrawn by the public accounts committee.

It can be seen that originally there were 55 recommendations and one was withdrawn by the committee, leaving 54. Of that number only four at this time can be said to have had adequate consideration and treatment. I submit that this is not a desirable state of affairs. It is not adequate and the minister and the government ought to attend to it immediately, particularly since the Treasury Board now fulfils certain functions with reference to items coming under the purview of the public accounts committee.

In the past there have been recommendations with respect to having an Auditor General's act. I understand that an act has been drafted and is ready for submission. I think it can be proceeded with. Could the minister say what action the government is going to take on this matter? Is it intended to bring forward the bill, and how soon? It seems to me that in this area the work of the Auditor General could do much to improve the operations of government as such. He could ensure that the government does a good job and could demonstrate through this act that the government can do as good a job for our society as any other segment of our economy. There is no reason why government cannot be operated as efficiently and effectively as any other part of our society.

The matters raised by the Auditor General need to be studied, and if we had an opportunity more than once a year to study many of the matters which are raised the public would have a good deal more faith in government as such. Bringing in the act would, I think, be in the the best interests of Canada and in the best interests of the state of affairs we wish to achieve in this country.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, I wish briefly to reply to some remarks made by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat. The house leader for Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition said that the public accounts committee had not operated generally in a partisan way, nor had its reports been used in a partisan way. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat has used the report of the present committee in a partisan way. I say this because I was a member of that committee and was present when it brought down its report.

The hon. member tried to say that only four of the 55 recommendations have been subject to government action. I dispute that contention strongly. His interpretation of how the government has acted is partisan. The government has looked at many of the recommendations in the Auditor General's report and has decided it does not agree with those recommendations. That, I submit, is action.

With respect to those recommendations the Auditor General classified with the words "slow progress being made", may I point out that one of those items is with respect to the deficit on second class mail. Even though the government has introduced a bill in this house the Auditor General has still described the action taken as "slow progress being made". I submit that if committee members wish to refer to certain of these items they ought to point out merely that progress is being made. They ought to leave out the adjective "slow", especially when that adjective applies to second class postal rates. The bill has already been passed; yet the Auditor General says the government is making slow progress.

I submit that the point of view of the hon. member of the N.D.P. is completely wrong and his remarks are misleading. He is using the recommendations of the committee in a most partisan way, and I regret that.

May I ask the minister a question. The Auditor General at the first meeting of the public accounts committee said that certain members of his staff worked for the United Nations and its related agencies. He also said they received remuneration for this work. Can the minister say what this remuneration is? In the estimates certain revenue with respect to 1967-68 is indicated as applying to 1966-67. Does that revenue have reference to these international agencies or does it have some other significance? How much revenue is received by the Auditor General and his staff for work that is done for the United Nations and its related agencies?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, if no one else wishes to speak may I offer some brief comments on the points raised by hon. members who have spoken. The hon. member for Peace River, backed by the hon. member for Regina East, suggested it would be useful to introduce a special statute to delineate the powers, duties and responsibilities of the Auditor General. It was his understanding that a draft bill had been prepared and, if I understood his meaning correctly, submitted to the public accounts' committee. I do not recall that the public accounts committee—I stand to be corrected if I am wrong—has recommended such a statute or forwarded a draft of such a statute in any of its reports to the house.

Mr. Baldwin: That is right. It has not.

Mr. Drury: There is much to be said in favour of this approach, though I do not think there is any evidence that the Auditor General is suffering in the discharge of his responsibilities as a consequence of there not being a special statute. Since we have a most crowded calendar—the hon. member for Peace River has said, I believe, that we are suffering from indigestion in this regard—

Mr. Baldwin: Dyspepsia.

Mr. Drury: —I do not think this is the right time to bring forward further bills that we might have difficulty digesting, especially in view of the high priority and high degree of importance of some other business.

The hon. member for Peace River has alluded to the non-partisan nature of this particular committee. I do not think the committee is any more non-partisan, or any less partisan, than any other house committee. By this I do not suggest that it is partisan. I think other committees are as devoted to the general public welfare as the public accounts committee and as indisposed to engage in partisan politics. Merely because the chairman of the public accounts committee sits on the opposition side of the house is no reason to claim any particular virtue for that committee. I am not denying it has some virtue but I do not agree it is overriding.

The suggestion has been made that the Auditor General might be the joint, if not the sole, auditor of the accounts of all crown corporations. I think it has been said during previous discussion regarding the auditing requirements of crown corporations that the function of an auditor is not only to certify the accuracy of accounts and the adequacy of control measures but also to provide specialized managerial advice. I think the hon. gentleman will recognize this. Perhaps certain of the crown corporations, particularly those in specialized fields, constitute an area in which the Auditor General might have no special experience such as that available to some of our larger auditing firms which are engaged either in purely domestic work or in international work.

Mr. Baldwin: If I am right, the Auditor General is the auditor of the Polymer Corporation, which is very much an international commercial organization. If he is capable of auditing effectively the books of such a corporation, would he not be equally able to audit the books of almost any crown corporation?

Mr. Drury: I am not suggesting that the Auditor General is incapable of auditing such accounts. I am sure he has this capacity; indeed, it has been demonstrated on a number of occasions in both the national and international fields. The point I was trying to make was that it is a common practice to look to a firm of auditors for what it is, in effect, a consulting service with respect to managerial problems. There are a number of specialized crown corporations which would wish to follow this practice, and I do not think the Auditor General would lay claim to specialized skills in this field.

After all, his experience has been almost entirely in the realm of government administration or international agency administration.

The hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce asked whether the Auditor General received payment for the services rendered by him and his staff to international bodies such as the United Nations. I regret to say I do not have details but it is my understanding that the Auditor General recovers from the United Nations his out of pocket expenses in relation to this auditing function. If the hon. member wishes to know the specific dollar sum I should be glad to try to find out.

Mr. Burton: I was pleased to hear the response of the President of the Treasury Board to some of the points made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce. It seems to me it should be borne in mind that the Auditor General is above all a servant of the House of Commons and subsequently of the public accounts committee. When he makes reports on certain subjects, it seems to me these are a matter of concern to all members of the House of Commons regardless of party. If there is pressure for the implementation of some of the recommendations in these reports from all quarters of the house, surely this would be helpful to ministers such as the President of the Treasury Board in bringing about the implementation of some of these proposals. I would also suggest that when the Auditor General uses certain terms and descriptions he does so advisedly and in a considered manner. If we are to have confidence in his ability—and there is every reason to do so—we should take these words for the most part in the manner in which they have been placed before us.

The point has been made that the executive has rejected a certain number of recommendations. I have already dealt with this matter. These items will be considered in my mind in a different way from the other recommendations upon which no action has been taken or in connection with which only slow progress has been made.

Item agreed to.

Item L30 agreed to.

The Chairman: This concludes the estimates affecting the Auditor General. The committee will now take up the revised estimates of the Treasury Board for the year 1968-69, to be found at page 544 of the blue book, details on page 546.

TREASURY BOARD

1. Departmental administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $5,131,400.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make a brief statement on the role and functions of the Treasury Board as a prelude to having its estimates considered in this committee.

I feel that the board's purpose and responsibilities and its influence on policy and the allocation of government resources are not as fully understood as those of other government departments. And yet the Treasury Board has been a vital and essential part of our structure of government since confederation, and its role as a central control agency of financial matters and as a policy co-ordinator has steadily grown in important over the years.

The board is a committee of the Privy Council established by statute, having certain delegated executive powers and responsibilities as outlined in the amendments to the Financial Administration Act of 1966. The need for such a federal body to act as co-ordinator and overseer of the financial affairs of government departments was recognized immediately at the beginning of confederation. It was first created by order in council of July 2, 1867. Two years later, however, with the passing of the Department of Finance Act of 1869 it was made a statutory committee of the Privy Council.

An important stage in the evolution of Treasury Board functions came as a result of the findings of the Royal Commission on Government Organization or the Glassco commission, as it became known. At this point I would like to repeat the tribute I paid earlier today to the late J. Grant Glassco, who made such a significant contribution to improved public administration. The commission felt that the needs of effective management fell into two general categories: first, those associated with the administration of departmental operations, and, second, those involved in the central direction and coordinations of government activities as a whole.

With respect to the central direction and coordination of government activity, the commission pointed out that the policies and programs of each department and agency must be balanced against and harmonized with those of other departments and agencies and that they must justify themselves in terms of their contribution to the general interests of the Canadian people. Thus the authority of each department must be subject to the overriding needs of the government for the general interests of Canadians.

The conclusions and recommendations of the Glassco commission were embodied in the Government Organization Act of 1966. The Treasury Board was established as a separate department of government under its own minister, the President of the Treasury Board.

The Financial Administration Act was also amended and it is from this revised act that the board now derives its current powers and responsibilities. These include financial management, expenditures control and general administrative and personnel policy in the public service.

The effect of the amended act was to establish the Treasury Board even more clearly than before as the agency of government chiefly responsible for formulating central management policy including the financial management functions of short and long range expenditure forecasting, program analysis, estimates preparation, supervision and control of expenditures, leases, contracts, and financial commitments.

Also for the first time responsibility for providing leadership and stimulus to improve management performance in the government service was explicitly vested in the board. However, possibly the most important widening in the duties and responsibilities of the board was in the field of personnel management. In part, as a result of being designated as the principal agent of the government in collective bargaining the board had assigned to it, in addition to its previous duties relating to organization and establishment control, exclusive responsibility for classification, rates of pay and conditions of work, and for determining generally the policy governing personnel management in the public service.

At this point I would like to speak briefly on collective bargaining in the public service. This is a most important subject and I thought that hon. members would be interested in having a report on results to date.

In August, 1963, the government appointed the preparatory committee on collective bargaining in the public service. This committee was established to make preparations for the introduction of collective bargaining and arbitration in the public service, as well as to examine the need for reforms in the systems of classification and pay applying to public servants and prevailing rate employees. It was directed to consult with employee organizations and to make recommendations to the cabinet. The findings of this committee were presented to the government on July 2, 1965. The result of these efforts, the Public Service Staff Relations Act, received royal assent on February 23, 1967.

The legislation contains most of the conventional elements common to all labour relations statutes in Canada: the tripartite labour relations board, freedom of association, unfair labour practices, appropriate bargaining units, the principle of majority support, exclusive bargaining agents, and compulsory collective bargaining.

These are the more familiar elements. The act, however, contains a number of rather unique provisions which in a sense reflect the particular requirements of a national public service. One of the more unique features relates to dispute settlement. Unlike most labour relations statutes the Public Service Staff Relations Act provides two separate and distinct processes for the resolution of disputes arising out of the negotiation of collective agreements.

Disputed matters may be referred to binding arbitration by the Public Service Arbitration Tribunal established under the legislation, or they may be referred to an ad hoc conciliation board, constituted in the familiar fashion, for report and recommendations. The bargaining agent in effect has an option. The legislation, while conferring the right to strike in certain circumstances, contains provisions which are designed to protect the public against the disruption through strike action of those services which infringe directly on its safety and security.

The extension of collective bargaining rights to professionals departs from existing practice under most labour relations statutes. Another significant departure is the fact that supervisory employees under this legislation have also been granted bargaining rights. The provisions of the legislation in this regard reflect the fact that supervisory and professional employees in the public service have been members of employee organizations for many years and have traditionally been represented by such organization in discussions with the government relating to their terms and conditions of employment. Managers, of course, are excluded.

The legislation places certain restrictions on the subject matter of collective agreements. No collective agreement, for example, may include any provision that would require legislative action by parliament except for the purpose of appropriating moneys required for its implementation.

The rationale for these restrictions is that employees in the public service have long enjoyed certain benefits by parliamentary enactment, for example, pension benefits under the Public Service Superannuation Act and the principle of merit in appointment by virtue of successive civil service acts. By adopting these provisions parliament decided in effect that the rights to which employees were entitled in these areas should continue to be guaranteed by statute rather than by provisions of a collective agreement.

These limitations also apply in the case of arbitral awards rendered by the Public Service Arbitration Tribunal and reports and recommendations of the conciliation board. No arbitral award and no conciliation board report may therefore contain provisions requiring the enactment or amendment of legislation.

I believe that hon. members will be interested in hearing the results to date of operating under this legislation. Bargaining units have been determined and bargaining agents certified for the great majority of employees eligible for collective bargaining under the legislation. As of this date some 61 units have been determined; 22 in the operational category, nine in the technical category, 19 in the professional and scientific category, six in the administrative and foreign service category, and five in the administrative support category. These units embrace approximately 175,000 employees, or somewhat more than 80 per cent of the total number of employees eligible for bargaining under the system.

As of today the first 19 agreements entered into under the legislation have received formal ratification. These agreements cover supervisory and non-supervisory employees in the following occupational groups: correctional, fire fighters, general labour and trades, hospital services, lightkeepers and stationary plant operations. They also include agreements entered into with respect to printing trades employees, dockyard employees at Halifax and Esquimalt, letter carriers, mail clerks, postmasters and assistants in the Post Office Department, air traffic controllers, and veterinarians. The number of employees covered by collective agreements at the present time is approximately 75,000.

I would now like to spend a little time discussing our financial administration system and the role and functions of Treasury Board within it.

The basic fundamental principles of this system are that no tax shall be imposed and no money spent without the authority of parliament and that expenditures shall be made only for the purposes authorized by parliament. Along with parliament, cabinet is, however, also an integral part of the functional decision-making process in that it determines the general magnitude of expenditures when it establishes policy in the various fields of government activity. While in practice ministers exercise their collective responsibility for policy in cabinet, most of the detailed supervision and co-ordination of expenditures is delegated to the Treasury Board. It has the important function of rationalizing the requirements of all departments and fitting them into the budgetary picture as a whole.

The administrative procedure which makes this process operative takes the form of two major budgetary submissions by the various departments each year. In May departments prepare and submit to Treasury Board forecasts of activities and expenditures for the next five year period. The Treasury Board analyses these proposals with the objective of the exercise being to allocate available resources among competing requirements of all departments.

On the basis of its analysis the Treasury Board then proposes to the government specific financial targets for each department for the next fiscal year. After departmental targets have been approved by the government and communicated to each department, work begins on the other annual submission, the main estimates for the next fiscal year. These detailed estimates will, in many cases, differ from the material submitted at the time of the program review to the extent that expenditure cuts have been made in the original proposals and departments have to re-allocate resources among their proposed programs. Treasury Board also reviews and analyses this submission. When the board is satisfied with the estimates, they are submitted to the cabinet for consideration. Once approved by cabinet they are recommended to the Governor General and then laid before the House of Commons.

Today government is big business in every sense—in terms of employees, expenditures and the variety and complexity of its activities. It therefore demands from its central financial control and management agency more than administrative clearance of appropriations and expenditures and a routine scrutiny of management functions in the public service. Modern government requires from such an agency meaningful assessments of new and existing programs in terms of objectives and results and complete and understandable data on such programs so that the government is in the best possible position to make policy decisions.

The Treasury Board is, therefore, constantly striving to improve its performance as a central control agency through the introduction of modern management techniques. For example, the Treasury Board has developed and is now implementing a programming, planning, budgeting approach to resource allocation in the federal government. Program budgeting is concerned with the presentation of expenditure proposals in a way that will enable effective decisions to be made on the allocation of resources. The program budgeting system differs greatly from traditional forms of government budgeting in its concentration on the results and benefits as opposed to just a consideration of the resources required. In this regard, program budgeting should also assist hon. members in their scrutiny of government expenditure proposals. I hope to be given an opportunity at a later date to make a fuller statement on this important subject to the public accounts committee.

I hope I have been able to convey in these remarks the important role that Treasury Board plays in the machinery of government. It can be said that the Treasury Board acts as the employer, manager and innovator in an administrative sense for the government. These are not easy roles, and we are constantly striving to develop new ways to improve our performance and thereby increase the over-all effectiveness of government operations generally.

Mr. Chairman, I commend the estimates of the Treasury Board to the committee for its approval.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank the minister for his statement. I should like to ask a question or two and then perhaps he would not mind elaborating a bit on certain aspects of his statement. The minister indicated the initiation of a process of asking each department for a five year forecast and also for a preliminary indication of its estimates for the ensuing fiscal year. Could the minister elaborate a little in connection with the five year forecast which the Treasury Board receives? Would he give an indication of what use is made of this five year forecast at this stage of the proceedings by the Treasury Board? I have in mind the stage relating to the preparation of advice to the government as a whole with regard to a target for the ensuing fiscal year. First of all, without taking too much time, could the minister indicate whether the Treasury Board works on these five year forecasts on a continuing basis? Could he tell us to what extent the five year forecast is subjected to scrutiny or whether it is largely accepted at this stage exactly as given by the department? In other words, at this stage in the history of the government how sophisticated is this five year forecast? Is it a rough forecast made by the department or is it something that is subjected to a good deal of give and take by the officials of the Treasury Board and the department?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the term "forecast" may be misleading in that it implies a certainty about the program which might not be justified. It is rather a system for projection of departmental proposals or plans. The object in putting it on a five year basis is to see with rather more accuracy than would be possible with merely a one year projection where the program is likely to lead, the timing of the achievement of the objectives and the scale of resources required over a five year period. I think the hon. gentleman, who has had some experience in the provincial government field, will be well aware that it is relatively cheap in terms of resources to get a new program launched but that it is only in subsequent years that it really gets into full scale operation and then the demand for accomplishment of a particular program in terms of total resources perhaps becomes unduly burdensome. It is for this reason a five year projection is required of departmental proposals and plans. The objective in seeking these, as I say, is to provide the government with a rather more accurate or a rather more realistic idea of the totality of what it is doing over a longer than one year period.

Mr. Stanfield: Thank you. I think, however, if one were to ask a department for a five year projection of its plans and proposals the upper limit would be almost infinity because we all know departmental officials and ministers always have many good ideas in mind provided the government is willing or able to back them financially. I presume the five year forecast distinguishes between projections involving merely plans or desires of a particular department and a five year extension of its existing programs. Does the Treasury Board attempt to make, in conjunction with the department, realistic five year projections in respect of existing programs as distinct from new programs or extensions of existing programs which the department would like to have?

Mr. Drury: Yes, Mr. Chairman. In so far as and to the extent to which it is possible we do try to secure the most accurate projections of costs over a five year period of programs to which the government is committed. One should say that any new ideas brought forward are also required to be projected on a five year basis so that we may determine how these fit in with the total of the existing projections and existing commitments.

Mr. Stanfield: Perhaps this is something which should not be pursued at this time, but I am not quite clear concerning just how much responsibility the Treasury Board assumes with regard to checking out the five year forecasts made by the departments in respect of their accuracy so that the Treasury Board in turn can give the government some assurance that the five year forecasts are realistic even with regard to existing programs. Perhaps this is something which should be pursued in the standing committee rather than in the committee of the whole.

I should like to ask the minister another question. At what stage in any fiscal year does the Treasury Board request these preliminary estimates with regard to the ensuing year and the related five year forecasts? At what stage during the current fiscal year, for example, does the Treasury Board attempt to obtain approval from the government of a target toward which the estimates would be directed during their subsequent refinement?

Mr. Drury: In respect of the fiscal year beginning April 1, prospectively almost a year ahead, that is, in May, the departments are asked to produce a five year costed projection of their programs. These are checked by the Treasury Board and during the summer, following collation and examination of these programs, the government is invited to consider what will be the total figure of expenditures, having in mind some idea at that time of prospective revenue. They are asked to consider what might be the allocation of resources as between the various departments. Based on this decision taken in the summer, the departments are again invited to prepare detailed estimates covering these programs and these total amounts of money. The detailed submissions are then sent to the Treasury Board about this time of year, and prior to the end of the calendar year the government would recommend to the governor in council the detailed estimates which are published and deposited in this house in the printed form in January or February. Is that the timetable the hon. gentleman had in mind?

Mr. Stanfield: Yes. So when the Minister of Finance, for example, gave a forecast in his budget speech a couple of weeks ago in respect of the expenditures for the next fiscal year, the government would have already decided on or recommended the target from the Treasury Board, presumably presented by the Minister of Finance in his budget presentation? This would be the considered target adopted by the government as a policy, and the practice would be for the total of the subsequent estimates to be tailored to this target already adopted by the government?

Mr. Drury: That is true.

Mr. Stanfield: I should like to thank the minister through you, Mr. Chairman, for giving this further clarification. Let me say that I appreciate the general problems of co-ordinating government activities, financial controls and the workings of various departments in areas that sometimes overlap. The traditional structure of government departments makes this somewhat difficult. Having had a little experience in a much smaller operation I can well visualize the difficulties of achieving any adequate degree of co-ordination of departmental work in affairs of the bulk and size of the government of Canada, as they are today. It is my thought, therefore, that the work of the late Mr. Glassco must have been of great value to the government of Canada. I should like to associate myself with the minister in the tribute he paid to Mr. Glassco. Unfortunately I was unable to be in the house when he paid this tribute, but I should like to associate myself with his remarks and pay my own respects to the late Mr. Glassco for the work he did to assist the government in this very difficult field.

One of the problems, of course, is to obtain co-ordination without at the same time creating a bottleneck which has the effect of slowing down greatly the process of administration. I suspect that it must be a constant problem to prevent the Treasury Board from being just that bottleneck which would slow down the actual administration of government affairs.

I do not intend to say anything further this afternoon about the efficiency of the Treasury Board in the preparation of its estimates or its projections. The government perhaps would not be undeserving should the committee spend further time in this regard in view of the experience in the past year, and particularly in view of the overstatement made by the minister's predecessor regarding the sophistication of the Treasury Board in its projections. It was clear, at least at that time, there was still some room for improvement. We trust this is being accomplished.

Of course I am very unhappy, as are many Canadians, about the experience of the past year in respect of estimates. It would be difficult to speak too severely on this subject, but I have expressed my views and I will not take more time this afternoon except to express the hope that we will not suffer anything like the same sort of experience with the next set of estimates to come before the house.

The minister also said something about collective bargaining. This is a vast subject on which we could spend a great deal of time. There is a task force or a committee which it is hoped will report before the end of the year on an important aspect of these programs. Therefore I do not propose to make any remarks at this time about the subject or the very difficult nature of essential public services and related subjects. I will content myself with waiting until we receive the report of the task force in this regard.

Finally, as I take my seat I simply wish to assure the minister that we will be watching with great anxiety and concern the unfolding of financial history in the next few months and during the next year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the President of the Treasury Board in his opening statement gave us a quick review of the various matters that come under the administration of the Treasury Board. It is not our intention to discuss all the aspects of this work during this review today, but two or three of us do have things we want to say about certain aspects of the work of this department. My leader, the hon. member for York South, will have something to say about the collective bargaining process, red circling and a few things like that. My seatmate on the other side, the hon. member for Vancouver East, has some matters he wants to raise as well.

I suspect that if I gave the minister just one guess as to what I am going to talk about he would hit it right on the nose. But before I give him the chance to hit it on the nose may I raise a question about the task force which the Leader of the Opposition asked about just before he sat down. I noted that the President of the Treasury Board nodded his assent that the task force was reviewing these matters. I did not know there was any task force reviewing collective bargaining in the civil service.

Mr. Drury: May I say, to clear up the difficulty, that the task force to which the Leader of the Opposition referred is the one under Professor Woods, of McGill University which is looking into the whole area of labour-management relations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am glad to have had that cleared up. I thought the reference was to the Woods task force which is dealing with collective bargaining generally, more in the private sector than in the public sector though of course in both areas.

One subject to which the minister did refer was, of course, the subject of the pensions of civil servants. The minister knew that that was what I would speak about this afternoon. He mentioned it in his survey, and if one looks down the items that come under the Treasury Board one sees, of course, that more than half the money that is spent by the Treasury Board is spent by way of government contributions to various funds that provide pensions for civil servants when they retire. If the President of the Treasury Board is rather surprised that I take him on as well as the others I have taken on with respect to this matter, I can only say to him that the way in which this issue has dragged on so long that one has to go from one government to another and from one minister to another in various governments annoys me as well.

During the course of the last parliament I started hammering away at this matter by making my representation to the then minister of finance. Certain adjustments were made, and it turned out that this matter came under the Treasury Board. So I made my representations to the then president of the Treasury Board who is now the Minister of Finance. In those days the then president of the Treasury Board and the then prime minister used to tell me how keen they were to do something about the pensions of retired civil servants, but they told me that the bottleneck was the minister of finance. Now the former president of the Treasury Board has become the Minister of Finance, and when I make representations to him I find quite a different attitude from the one he displayed when he was president of the Treasury Board.

So far in this session my questions have been directed either to the Prime Minister or to the Minister of Finance and they have accepted them as though the responsibility lay in that area, but here we are on the estimates of the Treasury Board and, lo and behold, the subject lies here as well. Nevertheless I look across at the President of the Treasury Board and I find him to be a very genial and co-operative kind of person. He has a broad and almost as winning a smile as that of the Prime Minister himself. I hope that at last we have a minister who will take a real and genuine personal interest in this subject and see it through.

Frequently when I have risen to say a few words on the question of pensions to retired civil servants I have started off by saying that I have gone over this subject so often that I need not go over it again in any detail. Well, I am going to change my tune today. There are over 100 new members in this House of Commons and many of them may not be aware of the nature of the struggle that we have had over this issue. I still do not intend to go back over all the details of the last 20 years or more that I have been raising this as issue, but let me go back just a couple of years.

About two years ago when the whole question of the public service legislation having to do with collective bargaining, the integration of the various superannuation funds with the Canada Pension Plan and so on, was referred to a special joint committee consisting of members of the other place and of this house, I tried in that committee to get the question of the pensions of retired civil servants raised. I was soon told that that had not been referred to us and that we could deal with it in that committee only if we had a specific term of reference from the House of Commons itself. Therefore, back in the early part of 1966 I started pleading with the present Minister of Finance, who was then president of the Treasury Board, to ask the house to make that kind of reference to the special committee. His first response was to express his personal agreement but he said it would have to wait until we had disposed of the three other bills that we had before the committee. I settled for that.

Time went on. We got through those other bills and the present Minister of Finance kept his word. It took a little prodding to get him to do it, but he had the then government house leader bring in a motion to refer the question of the pensions of retired civil servants to that special joint committee on the public service of Canada. We became seized of this issue, therefore, in that special committee in the early part of 1967—I think in fact it was in the month of January—and we went at it thoroughly and exhaustively. We had before us many witnesses and many bodies representing retired civil servants. We also had representatives of the Department of Finance, the Treasury Board, the Department of Insurance, and various other sections and departments of the government. I think it is fair to say that we did a very thorough study of the whole question of whether parliament and the government should do something to increase the pensions of retired civil servants, and we agreed that increases had to be made.

May I back up for a moment and make the point that I do not think the government would have agreed to refer this matter to that special joint committee if it had not at that time intended to do something about it. Otherwise such action would have been a cruel hoax, and some of the people affected think that this is what it has turned out to be. But I think the government in good faith agreed to have this matter referred, knowing that if the committee came in with a positive recommendation the onus would be on the government to do something about it. That is precisely what happened. Our various committee sessions took place in the early part of 1967 until the month of May, and on May 8, 1967, we presented a report to parliament. It was presented to the other place and to this house, and that report was agreed to unanimously by members representing both houses of parliament and all parties in parliament.

I should also like to make the point that the present Solicitor General, who was then government house leader, co-operated by facilitating arrangements so that the committee could meet on the morning of May 8, 1967. That was an important gesture on his part. Parliament was going to prorogue that day and if that committee did not meet that morning to get its report finalized and presented to the house the committee would die with the prorogation of parliament and all our work would have gone down the drain. But the hon. member for Ottawa East, who was then chairman of the committee, and some of the rest of us prevailed on the then government house leader, the present Solicitor General, to afford us his co-operation, and he gave it. So we met on the morning of May 8, 1967, there having been a short recess just before that, and we finalized the report, had a unanimous vote on it and presented it to parliament that day.

The report is to be found in Votes and Proceedings for May 8, 1967, at pages 1778, 1779, and 1780. I should like to put on the record the key portions of this report which naturally are the committee's recommendations on the subject of doing something about the pensions of retired civil servants. I read the following from pages 1779 and 1780 of the Votes and Proceedings of that day:

> In the committee's view, the government should do what it reasonably can to protect and preserve, or failing that, to restore in some measure the original purchasing power of the contributory pensions which, under the Public Service Superannuation Act, and similar enactments, it has provided for its retired employees.
> With this consideration in mind, your committee recommends immediate action by the government,—

This was on the morning of May 8, 1967.

> —to update and extend the provisions of the Public Service Pension Adjustment Act (1959).

That, I may interpolate, was the one that was brought in during the days when the Conservatives were in power, the only occasion in history when there was some upward adjustment of the pensions of retired civil servants. Inadequate though it may have been, it set a precedent which I think should be followed. I continue reading:

This Act provided at the time of its passage limited and partial pension adjustments to meet a portion of the rise in post-war living costs. It covered only those beneficiaries who had retired prior to January 1, 1953: its benefits were available only to those below a pension ceiling of $3,000 ($1,500 for widows). Helpful though it was at the time of its passage, the Pension Adjustment Act of 1959 no longer meets the minimum justifiable requirement in the case of those former employees who retired prior to January 1, 1953; and it makes no provision whatever for employees who have retired since that date.

I interject again to point out that I am reading not from some speech that I made in the past of the hundreds that I have made on this issue but from the unanimous recommendation of a committee representing both houses of parliament and all parties that are here after very thorough discussion. I go on to read:

The Committee recommends that any plan to improve the position of these retired employees should conform to the following requirements:

(a) It should be capable of quick and early implementation in the form of legislation in the next session of this parliament;

I interject again to say that we passed that on the morning of May 8, 1967, knowing that that session of parliament was to prorogue that morning and that the next session of that parliament was to begin that afternoon. We requested that there be legislation in the session that was to begin that afternoon. I read further:

• (4:50 p.m.)

(b) Any adjustment in pensions should not be limited to a particular date of retirement and should be in addition to any other increase already granted under the Pension Adjustment Act of 1959;

(c) it should maintain the principle contained in the present legislation that benefits should be related to length of service;

(d) it should conform to the principle that any adjustment formula should take account also of the time which has elapsed since retirement;

(e) it should take into account the increase in living costs during that period of time; and

(f) it should increase the ceiling in the 1959 Pension Adjustment Act.

There is just one more paragraph which I should like to read as well:

The task of the committee was facilitated through the assistance rendered by the departmental representatives. In particular, your committee wishes to acknowledge the help received from Mr. H. D. Clark, director of pensions and social insurance division, Department of Finance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am absolutely certain that I am betraying no secret when I say that the hon. member for Ottawa East, who was chairman of that committee, believed just as completely as I believed that we were dealing with a government which was acting in good faith, and that that report, having been agreed to unanimously by all parties, would receive favourable consideration by the government in that session which began in the afternoon of May 8, 1967.

One of the things that has puzzled me in the years I have been around parliament, and I know the things one can do and the things one cannot do, is what to do with some of the things that are told to us personally by some of these people. Let me put it this way. The present Minister of Finance, who was then president of the treasury board, and the former prime minister Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson, both know what they told me in the months of May and June, 1967, about this legislation. They both know the dates they gave me as to when it would be brought into the house and passed. They both will remember how firm were their assurances. Of course, their problem was to get around the then minister of finance. Nevertheless, their statements to me were as firm as they could be; something was going to be done along the lines of this unanimous report.

May went by, June went by, and still nothing was done. It was not that the government of that day was not reminded of this situation. It was reminded by me as well as by other members, sometimes three or four times a week. We were told to wait, it will be done later. Then July 7 came along and there was a desire to adjourn for a summer recess. I took a rather strong stand. I took the view we should not leave this place until we had dealt with this matter, until this promised legislation had been brought down. I was made to look like a person who was defying the wishes of the members of parliament because I wanted to keep the house in session. I had to settle for a vote on an amendment in connection with this matter, which I lost. However, I was assured by ministers out in the hall and by backbenchers on the government side, that when we came back in the fall of 1967 we would deal with the matter. How many times do these people have to settle for this kind of promise that is never fulfilled?

We came back in the fall of 1967. The record will show that this subject was raised every week. It was not allowed to be forgotten. The replies we received were: It is under consideration, it is under active consideration, it is under serious consideration, or, there is nothing to add to what has been said before. These were the answers we received until December 7, 1967, when the present Minister of Finance, then president of the treasury board, gave a list of cuts the government was making. This measure was listed as one of the things that could not be done at that time. Despite that fact, I continued the fight.

A week later, on December 13, I tried to marshal all the facts again. The former member for Carleton, Hon. Richard Bell, who used to be a good deal of help on this issue, tried his best to get the government to say yes or no. I confess I never tried to do that because I did not want the no. I believe some day we will get the yes. Even when the government was taunted to say yes or no and be clear, the government still would not say no but rather that the matter was under consideration, we are thinking about it, we are studying it. This was the sort of answer we received. I do not know how many of the people who would be affected by this measure have died during the intervening time, but the number must be great.

The discussion of this subject goes on and on because the government has led us down the garden path. The government let us have a committee, let us make recommendations, gave us this promise, but still all we get is, no. The other day the hon. member for South Western Nova, who represents a constituency of particular interest to me because my ancestral home is in that constituency, tried in a very direct way to get the minister to suggest that there would be some good news before Christmas. The Minister of Finance gave the answer, no. I thought I head some shouts of "Shame" and "Scrooge" on that occasion, but they do not seem to appear on the pages of Hansard.

I submit that the way the government has played with the hopes of these citizens, these former employees, is a sorry story. How many are there? Not enough, of course, to influence an election; they are not concentrated enough to do that. If you add together the number of retired civil servants and their widows, the retired personnel of the R.C.M.P. and their widows and the retired members of the armed forces who would come under this kind of pension, you may get up to around 60,000 or 75,000 people. They are scattered all over the country, in fact scattered all over the world. The fact is that they are former employees of the government. I submit we have a responsibility to them to be a good employer.

I know the various arguments that are used, even though they are not trotted out in public, against dealing with this matter. I know the main fear is that if the government moves in this field a precedent will be set that will annoy private business in some areas. May I tell the President of the Treasury Board that private business is beginning to deal with the matter. In the years I have been arguing for the government to act, a number of private companies have approved pension plans in which there are escalator clauses so that pensions go up after people retire. We have accepted the principle, at least very slightly, in the Canada Pension Plan and in the Old Age Security Act. There we have a 2 per cent limit, and it does take quite a long while for it to amount to anything and it never catches up with the rise in the cost of living.

In addition to all these factors of right and justice that I think are on the side of these people about whom I am speaking, I should like to say to this minister and to this government that I think this is one of the most serious issues facing us in the whole pension field. It used to be that not many people were on pension and not many people lived for very long after retirement. Thanks to medical science, longevity has increased. Thanks to all these transplanted hearts and everything else, a lot more people continue to live on pension, and as time passes more will do so, for 15, 20, 25 or 30 years.

Imagine anybody in any other sector of the economy being asked to live on the same level of income for a period of 30 years, Mr. Chairman, or for even for half that period! We have to face the fact that our pension program, if people are going to survive and our pensions not be placed in serious jeopardy, must have adequate escalation provisions. I suggest that the place to begin is right here with these our own employees, our retired federal civil servants.

The retired federal civil servants find it awfully hard to understand why it is they cannot be given a pension increase out of the money that is in the fund. At least, they think it is in the fund because they see the figures, though we know it is part of the consolidated revenue fund of the government of Canada. It is not away in some bank account or trust account where it can be drawn out; it is just so many figures on the books. However, Mr. Chairman, they do see these figures. I ask questions that are put on the order paper about these figures, and they are sent down to me. I send them out and so these people do see them.

It has been ascertained, Mr. Chairman, that even the interest that the government adds to the figures every year represents a greater amount than is being paid out by way of pensions. Therefore the fund grows all the time. I know there are actuarial problems connected with this, but the ordinary retired pensioner looking at the fund, knowing that the base of it is the money he and his fellow pensioners have put into the fund, and seeing the fund grow every year, is wondering why something cannot be done for him.

Some bodies, notably the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada and others who have joined with them, have suggested that a look be taken at the rate of interest that the government pays on this money. The rate, Mr. Chairman, is 4 per cent. Where can the government get money today at 4 per cent? It pays 6.75 per cent on money that is invested in Canada Savings Bonds; yet these people are asked to settle for a rate of 4 per cent. The Professional Institute has suggested that maybe it would not be out of line to raise this figure to 5 per cent.

My hon. friend from Saskatoon-Biggar rose in his seat today to raise a point about what he thought was a typographical error when he discovered that interest on farm loans had been raised from a rate of 5 per cent to 7¾. Yet the government still pays only 4 per cent on this fund. A small calculation will show that if the 4 per cent were raised to 5 per cent, the additional 1 per cent interest on the fund would provide enough money to pay an extra $50 or $60 a month to every recipient of a pension under the various acts—the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act.

I am not, of course, suggesting that an increase be a flat across the board increase like that. I think that those in the lower brackets need it more than those in the higher brackets, though I was delighted that in our committee report of May 8, 1967 no line was drawn. The committee recognized the fact that there are today many people whose pensions are of an amount that sounded substantial when they retired five or ten years ago, but who discover that even for them costs have gone up, that living standards in the milieu in which they live have risen to the point where they are out of the swim because of what has happened to the purchasing power and value of their pensions.

I am suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that that is what the government should do. If that is not the way to do it then there are other ways. Nevertheless I plead that the government has no right to refuse to act on this question simply because it does not agree with the way that I suggest or with the way that some public service body suggests. What is really behind all of this is the good word and good faith of the government itself.

I know that if one reads through Hansard the scores, even hundreds, of times when this matter has been discussed one will not find anywhere a minister rising to his feet to tell the house, so that it is printed in Hansard, that "this action will be taken next month or this year". However, I submit the statements made mean that, and that the reference of this matter to the committee in 1967 was an act that implied that something would be done. In this regard I remind the Minister of Finance, as I reminded the former prime minister outside the house—he is not here at the moment—of his statements about this matter. I submit that the government is being unfair both to these people and to parliament in letting this issue stall any longer.

I have had occasion, Mr. Chairman, to refer to a suggestion made by the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada. I should also like to say how much I feel credit should be given to the Public Service Alliance of Canada for its interest in this matter. After all, that is an organization of employees who are now at work in the public service, and it could be pardoned if it concentrated all its efforts on improving the conditions of those who are presently at work. Nevertheless the Alliance is likewise concerned for those who have retired, and in this regard has made some excellent statements and presented some excellent briefs to the government. I pay my tribute to the work the Alliance has done on this matter.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, the Alliance gets the same treatment from the government that we get on the floor of this thouse. The answer is: "There is no money. We cannot afford it now. We cannot do it this year; we will put it off until next year." The same answer is given to the federal superannuates national association, which comes down to Ottawa and presents a brief. The matter is put off and off.

Unless we act on this issue as a matter of principle, Mr. Chairman, then some day it is going to come home to haunt us in a pension structure that will be placed in jeopardy because its value will not sustain people through their years of retirement. I want to see the principle extended to all pensions, but surely the place to start is with our own pensioners.

I also deplore as strongly as I can the way in which this question has been put off across the months and across the years. The very latest that action should have been taken on this matter was within a month or six weeks following the tabling of the report of May 8, 1967. The matter should have been acted on in the month of June, 1967, and I was told that it would be. Here we are in 1968. Since June, 1967, we have had a session or two of parliament. There has been an election and a change in government, but still nothing gets done.

I do not know whether there is any hope that the present Prime Minister will be as interested in this question as was the last prime minister. I do not really know what the present Minister of Finance thinks about the matter now, though I know what he thought about it in the last session of the previous parliament. As I say, I believe the President of the Treasury Board has human instincts and that he has a heart. I believe that he is interested in this matter and I hope he will see that someting is done about this issue without further delay.

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I fully agree with the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), that the retired public servants receive too small a pension, as recognized by the parliamentary committee which looked into the situation. To my mind, the government should have reached a decision last year, or even earlier, with regard to the public service.

The member for Winnipeg North Centre said that they do not live very long after retiring. Small wonder, with the small pensions they receive, they cannot live very long. That is why we agree with the member when he asks for an increase in those pensions.

We know, for instance, that the pensioners outside Canada who receive an old age pension or allowance, in China, in India, or in Europe, have a cost of living bonus in addition to their pension or allowance, although the cost of living is not as high in those countries as it is here; yet they receive the same pension as retired Canadians.

Taking into account the high cost of living here and the low pension, it is clear—the minister must realize this—that those people cannot survive. The minister and the government may say that this is a financial question, that they do not have the money required. It is always the same story, the same reason: there is no money.

Along the same line of thought, when we ask, for instance, a 7 per cent bonus for bilingual employees of the Canadian parliament, we are told that the decision is incumbent on the Speaker, the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and nothing is done.

Are the employees of the House of Commons considered as extraterritorial employees, external employees, employees of the administration of Canada? A bonus of 7 per cent is paid to bilingual public servants in various Canadian departments; but with regard to the House of Commons, they are no longer federal employees, it seems, because they do not get that 7 per cent bonus which is paid to bilingual civil servants under the law.

We have guides at the main entrance and on every floor of the main parliament buildings. We have secretaries, pages, a whole array of house employees to whom the 7 per cent bonus is denied. Why? Because, we are told, there is no money. As the Treasury Board is the one to decide whether or not additional amounts are to be paid to help various groups of society or employees—and with greater reason federal employees—I say that the Treasury Board is responsible for such a situation. For instance, useful works are refused or delayed, because there is no money while useless works are willingly carried out in many fields and they find the required money.

Parliament is asked to place restrictions on credit but have the Treasury Board and its president considered the fact that this year, the government will pay, in interests only, $1.5 billion on the national debt, namely an increase of about $200 or $300 million over last year. Yet, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) does not find anything abnormal about that. The Department of Public Works, post office employees, the Post Office Department and all government departments are asked to reduce their expenditures but they do nothing to affect the interest on the national debt. The debt is increasing at top speed year after year and the President of the Treasury Board does not object to the annual increase of interest on the national debt, which is imputable to a few financiers and not to the Canadian people.

Mr. Chairman, I said a while ago that useful works are rejected and insignificant ones approved in many cases.

We asked—and the Treasury Board is always the one that decides—that retaining walls be built along lake Témiscamingue in my region, in my riding. The projects are before the Treasury Board but it says that it has no money. The airport—not the air terminal but the airport—should be renovated but we are told that the funds are lacking. There is no money either for building post offices and again the Treasury Board makes the decisions.

I noticed also that in the field of public works more generosity is shown—according to the Treasury Board again—towards some other Canadian provinces than towards the province of Quebec. That is why complaints from our province are heard, not because public works are carried out in the other provinces, but because not enough are carried out in Quebec.

However, a department sometimes agrees to repairs being made or awards contracts; then delays occur and the Treasury Board refuses to pay according to the recommendation made by the department. I would like to give you an example at this stage.

Approximately two years ago, a contract for electricity and electronic facilities was awarded to a Mr. Paul Gingras, of Bourlamaque, in connection with repairs to the radar station which used to be located in Senneterre. When his tender was accepted, Mr. Gingras agreed to complete the work within 180 days, and also to resort to the services of a certain D. R. Beattie, 1260 Lakeshore Road, Port Credit, Ontario.

Mr. Beattie was supposed to supply the shielding in order to have the contract completed within 180 days. As it took Mr. Beattie exactly 7 months to supply the necessary material for completing the work at Senneterre, that was a source of embarrassment to Mr. Gingras who made representations to the Department of National Defence to have an adjustment made. He was granted $23,000 to compensate for the damage caused by Mr. Beattie.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gingras wrote to Mr. Beattie who did not bother to reply. The Department of National Defence finally granted Mr. Gingras $23,000. However, this recommendation by the department was rejected by Treasury Board. For this reason, my colleague for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault) wrote recently to the Minister of National Defence as follows:

> I wish to refer to the conflict that has existed for a year between Mr. Paul Gingras, a contractor of Bourlamaque, Quebec, and Mr. D. R. Beattie, of Port Credit, Ontario, also involving Defence Construction (1951) Ltd. concerning the above named project—
> Reference to this project is as follows: "BUIC III—Senneterre, Que.—File No. S-87-1".
> Who was responsible for drawing up plans for the shielding enclosure concerning this project as specified by D. R. Beattie Ltd?
> On what basis did this official establish that this project could be terminated within 180 days after submission of tenders?
> Also, I should like to obtain a copy of the correspondence exchanged between D. R. Beattie, 1260 Lakeshore Road, Port Credit, Ontario and the D.N.D. concerning this project.
> We would be happy to give you any additional information you might require.
> Therefore, I am counting on your full co-operation in order to settle this matter as soon as possible.

This matter was dropped on for over a year. Mr. Gingras spends money, comes to Ottawa, meets officials of the Treasury Board and the Department of National Defence, and the officials agree, but Treasury Board refuses. The minister should perhaps get to the bottom of the matter and see to it that Mr. Gingras is not penalized because a friend of the government was mentioned by name in the contract for some work to be undertaken in Senneterre. If Mr. Beattie is unable to fulfil his obligations, the government should refrain from recommending him to contractors who must perform works such as those at Senneterre.

Mr. Chairman, that is an example. We have some more, but in such a case, why does Treasury Board not consider objectively the recommendations of a responsible department such as the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Chairman, we would then be led to believe that there is some political partisanship, even if the minister maintains the contrary, within Treasury Board. We are somewhat sceptical, especially when we are told that Treasury Board acts in the best interests of the Canadian people. The function of the board is to control expenses, according to our fiscal system. When taxes have been collected, it decides if such or such a department may obtain or spend such or such an amount. It makes slight increases in a certain area and slight reductions elsewhere. We are fumbling with that system. Why? Because the government which is responsible for that situation wants to stick to it. In my opinion, the so-called sovereign government is a slavish government which refuses to take decisions without the authorization of the financial system. In addition, the execution of works is delayed. While 300,000 or 400,000 Canadians are unemployed and ready to work, the government chooses to pay them unemployment insurance benefits rather than give them work to create something in our country.

This is the procedure which has been chosen. Who is controlling that system? Some experts and economists. I do not know what kind of economists or experts advise the government but, in any case, we are subjected to a strange system which enables a few financiers to grow richer, while the majority of small taxpayers are getting poorer. That is exactly our situation at the present time.

Expenditures should be controlled instead of adjusting the financial system or our opportunities of developing the country. Attempts are being made to adjust the development of the country to the requirements of a financial system which is totally obsolete. In fact, this is the only thing they do not want to reform.

We hear every minister speaks about reform, in the field of education, farming, labour conditions, public service, reform in that field and in this field, however when it comes to the solution which would reform the financial system, it must be left alone. We must stop there because we do not even have the right to argue.

The Prime Minister of a sovereign country like Canada says: We have only the money that the people are willing to let us administer.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the easiest thing to do in Canada is to regulate credit and to put it at the disposal of the Treasury Board.

[Mr. Caouette.]

Making cement, bricks, lumber to create or build something, that is difficult, that takes a lot of hard work. Building a road, a bridge or a school, enlarging a hospital, that is difficult. But the matter of credit, that is easy. With pen and ink to write the figures according to the possibilities to build things in Canada, that is financial stability.

The Treasury Board is caught in a system which sees nothing else but the possibility of the government to levy and administer taxes, to distribute what they yield to the public and the various departments after paying the administration costs. This is exactly the situation with which we are confronted and the honourable ministers know the problem. The ministers and the President of the Treasury Board are perfectly aware of the situation. They know that our natural resources are still at the development stage, in fact some have never been tapped. Universities prepare technicians because we need technicians, engineers and so on. Once they have left university, these boys who could create something, work in assembly plants in Montreal. Engineers who graduated in May or June last year, earn $5,500 to $5,700 a year on car assembly lines in St. Therese de Blainville. Then we get upset, we get excited, and we ask ourselves: How is it that students protest and rebel against the present state of affairs? Sunday afternoon, I watched Father Pierre on television in Montreal. It was incredible to hear him giving the reasons why youngsters today are revolting against the order of things.

People talk about peace, just society, justice and stability. True, but what kind of peace? The peace of those who are considered as the establishment and whom are not to be disturbed, because they feel comfortable. It is in such a peace that we are working today.

Youngsters cannot see how they will be able to identify themselves within such a society when they get out of university. This is the opposite of what we used to see 20 years ago when a student leaving university could find a job immediately. Today, it is not the same thing. Public works are no longer undertaken for financial reasons; rather, the young are left in a state of anxiety about the next day, they cannot even merge into society. Then, they will be accused of being rebels or revolutionaries.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is time that we reassess our social, economic and monetary philosophy in Canada. If one examines a little all the problems for which the President of the Treasury Board is responsible, if one probes into them a little bit, one realizes that they are all financial problems. To the Department of National Health and Welfare, for instance, one asks today a pension of $125 a month for the elderly. The government cannot grant it because it has no money.

The President of the Treasury Board does not ask himself whether Canada can produce enough to pay the old people $125 monthly. One does not ask whether Canada can produce enough goods and services to help our young people in the just society that is talked about. Those things are not discussed, Mr. Chairman.

We are put in the strait jacket of a terrible financial system. We are not doing anything to get out of it; we knuckle down under the demands of this system. Then, we go to the people and say: We, the government—whether or not it is a majority government does not matter—decide, with the permission of another government that lies behind us, parliament.

Mr. Chairman, the Treasury Board is responsible for sums earmarked for one department rather than another, as I said earlier. Everything goes through the Treasury Board. It is the mechanism that enables the government to do something or to do nothing. Again, I say discussions are taking place with the provinces. There will be more next week or in two weeks, at the ministers of finance level, with respect to federal-provincial relations. The provincial representatives came here recently and the minister took part in the discussions.

The Treasury Board is very important. More money is required. The following week, the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) decides to make an official statement to the effect that from now on the provinces will have to take their own responsibilities and bear the odium of taxation to get and administer revenues in their territory.

But, the monetary aspect, the financial question itself—not the fiscal question—comes under the jurisdiction of Ottawa. The Right Hon. Prime Minister wants the provinces to take their responsibilities although the government of Canada is not even able, indeed not even prepared to shoulder its own. Therefore, the provincial premiers go back home saying: Ottawa is unco-operative, the hon. Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board say to us: Nothing can be done for the provinces.

However, nothing prevents them, for example, from increasing the 2 per cent income tax across the country. After taxing the people, the government says: We need this money in Ottawa; do not expect to get any of it. If you need money, levy your own taxes. That is not a solution. Mr. Chairman.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but the time allocated to him has now expired.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. Did I not begin my remarks at 5:10?

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, it is my mistake. The hon. member still has ten minutes.

Mr. Caouette: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

I said earlier that it was easier to create credit in proportion to the goods and services which the Canadian people want to provide by using their intelligence, their hands and their physical possibilities, but the hon. ministers have not yet understood.

In the provinces, in Quebec as in the others, the situation is not understood much better. As I said earlier, everyone goes home and is ready to come back two months later to discuss all over again the same problem of taxation. There are no arguments concerning the problem of the distribution of wealth among the Canadian people. No. The arguments concern the right of taxing the Canadian people. Quebec says: it is my right. Ottawa says: the matter does not come within your jurisdiction but ours. There are endless arguments about this. Meanwhile, neither the provincial governments nor the federal government are suggesting any solution but that of continuing to tax the people. We never tell anyone that whoever controls money and credit is the master of all our lives, the life of the government, the individuals, the families, society in general, and that without his permission, no one can even breathe.

This is the whole problem, Mr. Chairman. Even if we were to pass—as we are going to do anyway—the estimates of the Treasury Board, even if we were to listen to the right hon. Prime Minister or any other minister tell us how much the government is prepared to spend in order to help the Canadian people, not one of them wants to take the necessary means to do it. When we consider that our national output will reach this year $68 billion in goods and services and that the total income of the Canadian people, the salary of the minister included, will amount to $48 billion, we fail to see how there can be a gap of $20 billion in production which cannot be disposed of without the creation of a new purchasing power, because those amounts do not exist. If we talk about creating the difference, immediately we are called inflationists.

Mr. Chairman, we hear the right hon. Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board tell us that the only way to improve the situation in Canada is to increase productivity. We are told to increase our productivity by 6 percent, but we are warned against salary increases in excess of 6 percent, which would put us in a position to buy the excess of production.

However, a simple mathematical operation shows us that if we produce $70 billion in products and services, and if our production increases by 6 percent during the course of the year, the increase will be $4,200 million. If our national income reaches $50 billion and if we cannot increase it above our productivity, i.e. 6 percent, the increase has to be $3 billion. Then, let us allow salary increases of $3 billion, so that the population will buy the production increase of $4,200 million; there will still remain a gap of $1,200 million. The government does not understand that. There still are ministers who do not know that 2 and 2 make 4; they want it to make 5. From a mathematical point of view, they are way off.

Others cry out: Fine, but where are the $20 billion? In towns and cities, store shelves overflow with products to the extent where no one knows what to do with the goods. There is a lack of purchasing power, and instead of increasing it, the government levies taxes, claiming that by so doing it checks inflation.

Smarter solutions than that could be proposed by the inmates of the Montreal mental hospital. Increase or decrease inflation, avoid the dangers of inflation by reducing the purchasing power of its people. How bright that is. Everyone is being crowded to the brink of bankruptcy. Merchants and consumers see their purchasing power reduced and they are told: Put up with it because it checks inflation. All the while, the purchasing power should be increased as well as the national revenue. They cannot be increased merely by raising the salaries which contribute to higher prices. That is not true. The only way to increase the national revenue, considering the current level of prices, is to use the Bank of Canada to distribute to the Canadian people —to each and everyone of them—a national dividend based on the surplus production in Canada. That is the solution; there is no other.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Caouette: The national dividend is laughed at, but when an increase in the pensions is asked for, no one laughs; it is considered logical. Increase the pensions of the former public servants; with that we agree, no one fears inflation. But there would be danger of inflation if a dividend were distributed to the whole population.

Mr. Chairman, in closing my remarks, I would say this to the minister: if he has no solution to suggest, it is time for him to come with me on television, every week, to teach Social Credit to the people, so that we can be rid of an irresponsible government and appoint in its stead one capable of assuming its responsibilities.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I know that before six o'clock I can raise and expatiate on the matters that I want to draw to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board. I also know it is a damn sight more important for the President of the Treasury Board to be speaking to his friend across the aisle, but I would like to hold the floor without speaking and without losing any time until the President of the Treasury Board is prepared to listen to what a member on this side of the house wants to draw to his attention. I have now got his attention. I think, Mr. Chairman, it is very important that when members on this side of the house raise matters they should have the attention of the minister in charge.

Through you, Mr. Chairman, I want to draw what I consider a most serious matter to the attention of the minister. I know I do not have authority to speak on behalf of the some 160,000 employees of the federal government, but I do think I have the right to draw to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board some aspects of a matter concerning some 160,000 employees of whom 102,000 are in the armed forces. In the last year or two changes have been made in negotiation procedures and regulations and in respect of authority when dealing with management on matters affecting wages and conditions of employment of those within the civil service. However, in the legislation governing negotiations between the government and its employees there is a section which says that once a contract between the government and its employees is signed or an agreement is reached the government of Canada does not have to accede to it for 60 days but at the end of the 60 days must pay the increase and any retroactive payments.

It is a fact that in the last few weeks a number of contracts have been signed. I only know through reading the press how this affects the armed service personnel. However, if my analysis is correct, and I think it is, as a result of arrangements made in respect of armed service personnel and the other contractal agreements made by the government with its civil service employees there are now over 150,000 persons who are entitled to increases in wages. I would like to know from the President of the Treasury Board whether this provision in respect of the 60 days is to be put into effect before these increases are paid. If this is the case, then the 102,000 members of the armed forces and not less than 60,000 others in the civil service will not receive their retroactive pay until after January 1.

As I understand the legislation in respect of the social development tax, no exemption is to be made in respect of money received in 1969 that was earned in 1968. There was nothing in the speech of the Minister of Finance or in the legislation that would permit payments made in 1969 on moneys earned in 1968 to be exempt from that surcharge. I personally know of three agreements that have been signed by the government with its staff. I also know, although only by press reports, of an increase for the armed forces. I receive letters every day asking whether the government is going to hold to that 60 day provision before the money is paid and whether it will not be paid until after January 1 of next year. I know that many members of the House of Commons have received similar letters.

I raise this matter now in respect of the three contracts which I know have been signed and the increase which I know has been agreed to for the armed forces. I ask the minister whether this money will be paid before December 31 or whether it is to be held until after January 1 when the 2 per cent surcharge will be collectible from the personnel of the armed forces and civil servants on money they earned in 1968. A question on this matter was asked of the Minister of Finance last Friday, I believe. The minister would not give an answer. Will the President of the Treasury Board now get up on his feet and say what the situation is and what he will authorize? I ask him not to be a stinker and charge civil servants next year on money they earned this year.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the President of the Treasury Board will agree not to be a stinker. I am not asking him for any commitment which he may not be able to keep.

I should like to spend the few minutes until six o'clock raising two matters related to collective bargaining concerning which the Treasury Board has the responsibility of representing the employer in the public service. I wish to say first of all, as we said at the time when the relevant bills which later became law were before this chamber, that we are delighted that collective bargaining in the public service has finally been introduced. We are delighted with some of the progress which has been made in respect of the certification of bargaining units. I would say, however, that we were disappointed at the incredibly bad way in which the Treasury Board approached actual negotiations, of which the negotiations with the postal unions were perhaps the most striking example.

Having had some years of experience in negotiations I have not known anything more reprehensible on the part of an employer than the refusal for a period of months to make any monetary offer to the other side. When one sits down to negotiate in private industry, even if the demands of the union are considered outrageous by the employer, no objective employer refuses to make an offer on monetary matters for a period of months. If he did so, the employer would be called a stinker and a good many other applicable and relevant names.

This is exactly what happened in the case of the negotiations with the postal employees. My information is that this has happened during other negotiations although not over as protracted a period as in the case of the postal employees. The period has been long enough, however, that the public service organizations concerned are becoming terribly upset about the situation.

There is another item in this regard about which I should like to protest. Anyone who looks at this objectively ought to protest no matter on which side of the house he sits. During negotiations with one section of the public service—I forget exactly which one but I believe it had relation to seaway employees; this was during the election campaign—the President of the Treasury Board and the Prime Minister on separate occasions made public declarations that in their view the 6 per cent which was recommended by one of the conciliators or the conciliation board itself was a proper and fair settlement. What that means is that the head or the employer, being the Prime Minister, said to the board concerned in respect of negotiations that this was the limit beyond which it could not go. When the government is the employer and it does that in the course of negotiations it is really subverting the negotiation process. It is actually destroying any meaningful collective bargaining. What is the use of a public servants' organization asking for more if the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board lay down a declaration that it cannot be any more?

This kind of behaviour in respect of the postal service employees and in respect of the employees of the seaway authority, to which I have just referred, makes a mockery of the collective bargaining process and underlines what some of us said during the hearings of the joint committee. It was said, particularly by my friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and myself, that the government was not really prepared to accept the implications of genuine collective bargaining because the government was still going to act as it did before the collective bargaining was introduced, as an authority making unilateral decisions. That is what is meant when the head of the government declares that a certain level of wage increase is fair and adequate. That lays down the law and the people who are concerned in negotiations cannot go any farther.

It is my hope that during the remaining negotiations and any future negotiations this attitude on the part of the government will not show itself and that the negotiators at the negotiating table will not be subject to these open declarations. They will, no doubt, have instructions from the President of the Treasury Board and from the cabinet, which is perfectly legitimate. They are the employers. If Doug Love negotiates on behalf of the Treasury Board, the employer, he will naturally have instructions from those to whom he is responsible, as is the case in respect of any other negotiations, but a public declaration by the Prime Minister makes it impossible for any negotiations to take place. Let Mr. Love present the arguments as to why it is unjust, unfair, undesirable, improper, uneconomical, dangerous, or whatever else he wants to say, to go beyond a certain point. That is legitimate collective bargaining. He will have his instructions from the Treasury Board.

The President of the Treasury Board and the Prime Minister should not come out on the public platform and say the government will not go beyond such and such a point, because collective bargaining is not real unless the people on both sides of the table feel they have the opportunity to present their reasons and have a genuine exchange of ideas with some give and take. The collective bargaining process becomes impossible when you lay down the law away from the collective bargaining table. There is no need for this. I suggest it is merely an expression of authoritarianism that has no place in collective bargaining.

The other matter I want to raise, which is equally disturbing, if not more so, is that during the joint committee sessions on various bills relative to the status of public servants and the collective bargaining process it was pointed out—I remember doing so on several occasions—that when the law excludes from the collective bargaining area such fields as classification, promotion, demotion, job descriptions, job evaluations and all the rest, it takes away from the public service an immensely important area for collective bargaining. The fact that we were right has since been proven in a number of cases.

Some time before the collective bargaining process became law the Treasury Board engaged in a reclassification of the public service. This has been going on throughout the piece until today. A good many employees of the government have been reclassified and literally thousands have been red-circled. This means they have been told they now have a new classification lower than the classification which they formerly held at a salary rate higher than the salary rate of the new classification. Therefore they are frozen at their present salary rates and are not entitled to the increases which their organizations have now negotiated or are now negotiating. They will remain frozen until such time as the salary for the lower classification is increased to the salary they now receive in the higher classification.

I have had numerous letters, telegrams and personal conversations which indicated that literally thousands of civil servants have not received any of these increases and, in some cases, were even refused increases that went back to a date before they were reclassified. This is really reprehensible. I do not know whether hon. members and the President of the Treasury Board understand me. Perhaps I did not make myself clear. If reclassification or red-circling took place in October of 1968, let us say, this was made retroactive to October 1, 1967, so that the people concerned did not even get the increase applicable to their classification for the year.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock shall I rise, report certain resolutions and request leave to sit again later this day?

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

INCOME TAX

SUGGESTED DEDUCTION OF RESIDENTIAL TAXES AND RENTS

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parkdale) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental of accommodation of tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to introduce a motion designed to come to the relief of the overburdened Canadian taxpayer. The motion which you have read I would like to read again. It reads as follows:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental of accommodation of tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax.

I should like to say that I fully endorse the declaration of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the government of Canada should create a just society for all Canadians. This is the basic principle underlying my motion.

The purpose of my motion is to bring once again to the attention of the government, and especially to the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), the urgent need to ease the great burden of the Canadian taxpayer who is not only heavily taxed but in some cases is the victim of double taxation. It is my opinion, which I believe may be shared by all hon. members and by many fellow citizens, that both the home owners as well as tenants in rooming houses and apartments deserve fairer consideration by the Minister of Finance.

The present taxation system has been called in some quarters a flagrant case of double taxation in that the federal personal income tax is a tax on municipal taxes as well as on personal income. The United States recognizes the inequity of such a practice and therefore has introduced a law which permits home owners to deduct municipal taxes from income for federal income tax purposes. It even goes much farther. It allows payments on mortgages on homes of citizens also to be considered an exemption for income tax purposes.

During the past few years many representations have been made to the federal government, to the Carter Royal Commission on Taxation and very recently to the federal task force on housing and urban development headed by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), urging the government to adopt a similar practice. Repeatedly over the past several years, the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities has also appealed in its submissions to the federal and provincial governments recommending the deduction of municipal taxes from personal income tax and even the deduction of home mortgage interest payments.

In the manoeuvring to give Canadians a new tax system it is obvious that there is growing concern and dissatisfaction among the people of Canada at the fact that the problem of municipal taxation is not being given the attention it properly deserves. I believe it is imperative that the Minister of Finance along with his provincial counterparts give this serious matter deeper study and favourable consideration.

House and home stand at the centre of people's lives. Proper shelter means security. It also means independence and privacy. These are the things which we need in our daily life. I believe it is also time to insist that the social aspects of housing be among the determinants of economic policy in our country instead of always being its unfortunate victim. In the present condition of our economy the ownership of a private home is a heavy financial burden for the ordinary Canadian wage earner. After paying an average of $26,000 to $28,000 for a home in a city like Toronto and after paying all kinds of provincial and federal taxes, our citizens are additionally burdened with an ever-increasing municipal tax year after year.

I would also like to appeal to the Minister of Finance to take into account the burdens of the municipal authorities. They are an essential part of our system of government, and I believe it is only fair that they should be given a fairer deal. Canadian municipal authorities find themselves forced to expand their public utility activities. Expenditures on education, transportation, health services, and social welfare have steadily increased. This investment in human resources is a great burden both on the property owner and the people who live in apartment houses and have to pay very high rents. Many Canadian citizens are asking themselves to what extent they should, through municipal taxation, continue to finance education, health services, social welfare services, police and fire protection, and other kinds of services. These benefits which are provided by our municipal authorities are not only shared by local residents but also by government institutions. Therefore it is quite appropriate, I believe, that these expenditures should be financed partly, if not as much as possible, by both the federal and the provincial governments.

We have heard many times, and especially recently we have read in the newspapers, about the number of briefs that are being presented to the federal task force on housing and urban development to the effect that the housing shortage is not only acute in Canada but also a crisis. I believe that to meet this crisis the federal government, and especially the Minister of Finance, should give assistance to home owners and potential home owners. I realize that any effort to curb taxes, to protect the soundness of the dollar from inflation, is important. Inflation has eroded the security of many of our people who depend upon a fixed income. The heavy load placed upon most property taxpayers produces some very unhappy results. Older people with limited retirement incomes are left to exist on small pensions, and many of them are greatly harmed. They denied themselves in earlier years many things in order to pay off mortgaged homes. Now they find themselves faced with ever heavier municipal taxes year after year.

We have been told that older people would be better off in apartments, but many of them have no choice and no chance to move out of their own homes. They have to stay there. They have to cope with the problems of maintenance, and also, they face a rise in taxes whenever they make substantial improvements. Tenants in apartment houses also face increases in rents whenever municipal taxes rise. As municipal taxes go up, costs of maintenance soar and the tenants in apartment houses are forced to pay higher rents.

I realize that it is not an easy task to work out techniques that will give municipalities more revenues without raising property taxes. However, this is an objective which demands an effort by the responsible ministers of our federal government and especially by their senior advisers. I realize also that taxation should be on a basis that is equitable for all. I understand, too, the concern of the royal commission on taxation when it states that it is difficult to devise a system of credits for property taxes against personal income tax liabilities that would be equitable between those who own their homes and those who rent from others. In spite of the difficulty, we should do everything possible to solve this problem.

By adopting this motion hon. members will not only ease the tax burden but also stimulate the Canadian economy. I believe that all of us in this house desire to give the taxpayers of Canada a long overdue break. The load of the Canadian taxpayer has been made heavier by a succession of increased taxes at the federal, provincial and municipal levels. Finance ministers have even devised new names for all kinds of new taxes, the latest one being the 2 per cent social development tax. The steadily rising cost of living also adds to the burden of the wage earner and especially the family bread winner to provide decent accommodation and the other necessities of life.

The matter of taxation in Canada is an urgent issue. I know it is complicated as well as being a vital instrument in our society and form of government. The royal commission on taxation, under the chairmanship of Mr. Carter and other experts, has revealed these difficult tax problems. We have been promised a government statement on the report of the Carter royal commission on taxation but this has not been forthcoming as yet. I realize, as I have said, that it is not an easy problem. However, we must deal with the situation now because it is urgent.

When the federal government introduced income taxes it was felt that a basic deduction of $1,000 for a single person and $2,000 for a married wage earner represented the basic necessities of life. However, these exemptions are completely inadequate today. I am sure all hon. members will agree with me on that point. In presenting this motion to the house, I know that it is an attempt to amend the income tax but I feel this motion will recommend itself to all hon. members. By supporting this motion they will make it possible not only for the residents of owner occupied homes but also for people who live in apartment houses and boarding houses to claim an exemption for personal income tax. Therefore, in the same vein of thought I am sure hon. members will feel that justice is being done. I believe these people deserve this break.

The government will also recognize by this move a basic social need. Such an exemption would encourage home ownership which is the goal and dream of many Canadians. The dream is for a decent home in a sound environment. This is the best place for a man to raise his family. It is the duty of a democratic government, I believe, especially one which has declared its purpose to work for the establishment of a just society, to provide for its citizens decent housing at reasonable cost. As well as the moral, economic and policical implications of inadequate housing, congested living, slums and the burden of taxation, there are also many mental and physical health implications, as well as the harmful effects of air pollution in our industrialized urban centres. These problems must be dealt with too, and during the discussion of this motion I should like to add that I believe a special federal department of housing and environmental affairs should be created without further delay.

The exemption I propose in the motion would also stimulate our economy by encouraging the buying of more and better houses. This would also alleviate our rising unemployment problem. Above all, it would enable our citizens to lead better lives and would provide them with a greater chance for the fulfillment of their human potential. I appeal to all hon. members to support and pass this motion. Such action would ease the intolerable load of taxation that is burdening the taxpayers of Canada. The people in owner occupied homes as well as people living in apartment houses and boarding houses would benefit in many ways if all hon. members would accept this motion which I have proposed again in this session of parliament. Our opportunities in this house to reduce taxation are rare. We must not neglect the present opportunity.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I rise with some concern, Mr. Speaker, because I do believe that if it is possible for us to have a just society, then this just society must result from the directions of the government. However, with the greatest respect, I say that I do not believe in the phrase "a just society" because I believe it is an expression that has no meaning. I should like to place my emphasis, therefore, on what might be called the quality of life. I feel this is what we are concerned with, the quality of life of all Canadians; it is in this area that we should be genuinely concerned.

During his remarks the hon. member mentioned that owning one's own home is becoming an impossibility. Certainly this is something that we should investigate. I recall very vividly that in my maiden speech I said that owning one's own home was becoming an impossibility. In other words, the leadership that we had expected, and I think rightly expected, to come from this government has not been forthcoming. We find that we have a task force that is pussyfooting around the country. As a matter of fact, even in this just society the task force did not want to come to Hamilton. I had to indicate that Hamiltonians were interested in the task force and that it should come to Hamilton to look into the housing situation.

When I heard the hon. member's motion it sort of rang a bell. The motion reads in part:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give immediate consideration to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes—

I remember stumping the streets in 1965 at a time when this party had a program which indicated we were cognizant of the situation. We said at that time that if we formed the government we would allow an exemption of $500 from income taxes for this purpose. Therefore I have risen to support the hon. member who is concerned about rising taxes. In this just society we have just had the raising of taxes by a further 2 per cent, the so-called social development tax. I am sure I speak on behalf of almost everyone in this house when I say that hon. members would support this motion because it is important that we give some relief to the many people who are being strangled as a result of high taxes at all levels of government.

I realize that the hon. member has carried his motion much farther. Even though the Carter royal commission says there is a problem, the hon. member says we should not only give some consideration to the owner-occupier but should move into the area of rental accommodation. This should be considered too, and how just this is if we are going to move into a just society. At the same time we are talking about the quality of life and in many instances, because of peculiar circumstances, we see the effect of housing on this sort of thing but it is disregarded.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is no question that housing is one of the most important priorities we have to face. Briefs are being presented from all parts of the country to emphasize its urgency and I am sure hon. members are receiving letters from all across Canada, not only from their constituents, on the subject.

When I think of a house, Mr. Speaker, I think not only of a roof over my head but of what the house itself contains. The hon. member has already expressed more articulately than I what I am trying to say, but when I think of a house I think of the fact that the provision of accommodation means a reduction in juvenile delinquency. I think it improves marital relations. I also think of a general reduction in crime.

Most important of all, Mr. Speaker, I think of the ghetto type of living about which people in other countries have become quite concerned. Where grievances lie dormant for months or years we find they reach the stage of being beyond solution, so that the solution itself becomes a problem. This in turn leads to riots, the type of social disorder that we in Canada certainly do not want and cannot afford.

I commend the hon. member for bringing forward this resolution. I am a new member and I understood him to say that he was bringing it forward again; it is good that he does so because I am pleased to stand and support it. At one time it appeared that we were interested only in the low income earner who was in a terrible situation as far as housing was concerned. We now find, at least as far as I am concerned, that no matter what part of the country one lives in one has to make at least $9,000 or $10,000 before one can become a home owner. Therefore we have moved our consideration from the low income earner to the average income earner.

Most people thought that the government had given weighty consideration to our housing crisis. As I understand it, the former minister of labour initiated a symposium on housing. This symposium travelled around the country seeking information. But surely, Mr. Speaker, they knew what was going on. We are now awaiting with great expectations the present task force's return.

I too, Mr. Speaker, like my hon. friend, think that housing is a matter of great consequence. As a matter of fact, one of the briefs that was presented stated;

However, with the growth of the country, the present dire need for housing our citizens and the many diversified problems involved in meeting that challenge, it is the contention of our association that such a task requires the undivided attention of a minister of housing to lead and direct the federal effort in solving the many questions arising in housing and urban development.

The brief goes on to state:

We believe, too, that the job of co-ordinating those activities which influence housing matters being carried out by other government departments such as—

Listen to the list, Mr. Speaker.

—the Treasury Board, Department of Finance, Labour, Manpower and Immigration, Transport, Consumer Affairs, Veterans Affairs, requires the full time services of a housing minister as does the federal housing relationship with the various provincial and municipal governments.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, one can see that this is no easy task. The job does not call for the services of one minister who has one or two portfolios, approaching the question with the attitude: Let us face the problem because the people are screaming for housing.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to stand and support my hon. friend's motion. We in this party sincerely believe that housing should not be beyond the reach of the Canadian people. This is why we believe we should move in the area of assisting municipalities to reduce the cost of land and services. We should be where the action is so that people who have average incomes or below can afford a home. This is a great necessity. We should take cognizance of those with below average incomes because this is where the trouble may start, as I have tried to indicate earlier. We have to think of individual home ownership. I should like to think that this is everybody's dream in the long run, to own one's own home. Thank goodness I was able to buy one ten years ago because I could not buy one today. Perhaps there are many here who do not yet own a home and cannot afford one either.

We also have to be concerned about low rental housing, housing research, housing construction methods, the cost of municipal services, row housing, co-operatives and condominiums.

I do not think I should take up any more time of the house, Mr. Speaker, except to say this. I think the hon. member has projected something of great consequence this afternoon. It is to be hoped that all hon. members will look upon it as favourably as he did in order that the phrase about which we hear so much these days, "the just society", will at long last mean that yes, we are in fact living in a just society.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wish that I and other members of this group could support this motion because I have no doubt at all that the intent of the motion moved by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) is to help the overburdened taxpayer. We all know that in many cases the overburdened taxpayer is in very serious jeopardy now. However, as spokesman for my party on this measure, Mr. Speaker, I cannot possibly support the motion because it does violence to the major principle that should underlie all taxation, that is, the principle of taxation according to ability to pay. Indeed, it stands poor Mr. Carter right on his head. Although the Carter report has been cited this afternoon, the one principle that underlies the Carter report is that people should be taxed according to their income and ability to pay.

This proposal, Mr. Speaker, does not do that at all. According to this proposal the people who have the best houses and pay the most taxes get the biggest rebate. The people less able to pay and whose taxes proportionately eat up a much larger share of their income receive much less relief than the wealthy. That does not fit in with my concept of a just society.

I know that is not the intention of the hon. member for Parkdale, Mr. Speaker, but unfortunately that is the effect of his motion. This is why our party cannot support it. Our whole effort and energy have been directed toward the premise that it is not terribly important how much you pay in taxes; what is important is what you have left to live on after your taxes are paid. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, this motion would lighten the load of the taxpayer in proportion to the amount his income increases. This takes a bigger share of the local taxes away from him than from the lower income taxpayer, through the federal agency. We do not regard that a fair way of doing things.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) spoke of the importance of giving fair consideration to the taxpayer, and he emphasized that it should be fair. I do not consider this measure to be fair, and I think we ought to reject it and look for other ways of doing what is intended to be done. In other words, this measure of relief has no relation to the income of the person who is to be relieved of paying taxes.

Reference has been made to the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. I have in my hand one of the resolutions that was moved by that body this year, and I read from it as follows:

> —Resolved that, for the purposes of obtaining relief from the burden of the property tax, provincial assistance should be provided which would contain the following characteristics as basic principles:
> —both tenants and owners to benefit;
> —assistance directly related to the property tax;
> —the assistance to be of highest benefit to low-income persons.

If one only reads to the second item, "assistance directly related to the property tax," the hon. member for Parkdale can say, "You see, that is exactly what I am doing." But if one reads the third item, "the assistance to be of highest benefit to the low-income persons," he finds that the hon. member did not go far enough in dealing with this set of propositions.

In order to bring relief to those most needing it, the biggest benefits ought to be made available to low income people. Such would not be the case with the hon. member's notice of motion.

I now wish to talk about that part of the notice of motion which refers to the feasibility of allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes and rental of accommodation of tenants to be deductible from federal personal income tax. The meaning of that is not clear. I know what the hon. member for Parkdale intended, but lawyers have a habit of not reading minds. They look at cold print. The hon. member's motion does not indicate whether the benefit under the federal income tax is to go to the renter or the tenant. Who is to be forgiven? I know what the hon. member intended, but this measure I submit does not indicate what he intended. I think many lawyers might argue about the meaning of this measure and not arrive at a clear understanding, simply because of the way it is worded.

If we are to ask the federal government to help municipalities I think the best and most obvious way to do that is for us to get busy and act on the housing needs of the municipalities in a more co-operative way than has been the case to date. When I attended the federal housing conference in Toronto two or three weeks ago I heard over and over again that housing is no problem if one has money. Only if one has insufficient money will he have difficulty obtaining a home.

If the federal government is to assist in the housing needs of the municipalities it ought to follow the advice of members of more than one housing delegation, who said that we in this country require large scale and diversified building. I know that many people in the country would love to own their own home; while on the other hand there are many others who do not want to do so. We live in a mobile society and a quarter of our families move every year. People who move, and young people in particular, do not want to be burdened with owning a home. Rental accommodation is better suited to their needs. I have spent half my life in homes that I or my family owned and the other half in rented accommodation, and from my experience the type of work one does will influence the decision as to whether one wishes to own a home or rent one.

In this country we need both more owner-occupied homes and more rental homes. The need for rental accommodation is fully as great in Canada as the need for private homes. Like the hon. member for Parkdale, I know of many cases, tragic cases, where old people cannot leave their large, old homes because they cannot afford to obtain alternative accommodation. I do not think the best way to help these people is by forgiving them their municipal taxes. That would not help them obtain a new home. We must provide more suitable homes for senior citizens, no matter whether they are separate homes, terraces, or, as in the case of Vancouver, separate homes that are incorporated in an apartment block. All these types are needed.

Ottawa can help the municipalities in a practical way by aiding people in the matter of income. I suggest that our basic income tax exemptions ought to be raised. That would be a much fairer way to help our taxpayers, no matter whether they live in owner-occupied homes or rental accommodation. Raising exemption levels to, say, $2,000 for single persons and $4,000 for married couples would be of immeasurably greater assistance to our overburdened taxpayers than the forgiving of their municipal taxes. I submit that our taxpayers could be helped far more if Ottawa were to raise basic income tax exemptions than if they were forgiven their municipal taxes. That would be a fairer way of doing it.

We cannot consider the question of how to help our taxpayers from one angle only. Housing is a vital need in our nation. If our municipalities are to have a larger tax base, they must have more houses from which to raise taxes. More houses mean greater municipal revenues. We must not forget that.

No doubt other hon. members wish to speak on this measure. I have made the points I wanted to make. I do not want the hon. member to think that we have not considered our position carefully. We approve of his trying to help the overburdened taxpayer, but we say with regret that this form of help will not lead to the just society. On the contrary, it will widen the gap between those who have much and those who have little. Consequently we cannot support this motion.

Mr. Walter Deakon (High Park): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this notice of motion I wish to say briefly that I concur with the principle of the motion, subject to certain reservations. I concur with the views of the hon. members for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). It is my view that this motion ought to be considered along with a total review of our entire taxation system. Only that way can matters be made more equitable for all concerned.

It is a common saying that a man's home is his castle, and this applies equally to the home of an owner and to that of a tenant. It is regrettable that in our day and age to keep up this castle is more difficult than ever, mostly owing to the exorbitant tax rates presently being levied against real property. That directly effects the homeowner, and indirectly the tenants to whom tax increases are transmitted by means of higher rents.

These increases in realty taxes impose a great burden on all citizens, particularly on our senior citizens who are presently struggling on savings based on earnings of yesteryear. For these people, many of whom live in my riding of Toronto-High Park, the situation is difficult to cope with. To a large extent they must rely on small savings and assistance from their children to supplement the meagre old age security assistance they presently receive. Surely, after all they have done, they should be entitled to a better fate. Permission enabling them to deduct realty taxes from income would certainly be a step in the right direction. As to the comment of the previous speaker about elderly people who own large homes, I should like to point out that in many cases these homes have great sentimental value; their occupants are reluctant to leave them and I think they should be entitled to stay in these homes for which they worked and for which they helped to pay.

Permission to deduct realty taxes should also be given to those in the lower and middle income groups who are also overtaxed. If we consider this matter from a practical point of view, it becomes clear that this realty tax is actually a form of double taxation. Consider first, the residential home owner. The realty taxes he or she pays come from net income received, an income which is taxable federally. So, technically speaking, a home owner is paying tax upon tax.

A tenant finds himself in a somewhat similar position, since the rent he pays is in large measure dependant on the landlord's overhead, a major portion of which is constituted by realty taxes. Under our present income tax structure a landlord must declare the rents he receives as income, and this income is, in turn, taxable. But remember: the tenant who pays the rent is paying it out of his net income, which has to be declared for income tax purposes. In essence therefore he is paying tax on tax, as is the home owner. Because of such inequities it is becoming increasingly difficult for a citizen to acquire and, in due course, to own shelter for himself and his family—a basic necessity of life.

Permission to deduct property taxes from income would, I firmly believe, lead to an increase in home construction, encourage home ownership and allow municipalities to raise much needed revenue to meet their ever-growing obligations, as was mentioned by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz). In addition, an extra incentive would be given to home owners to improve and repair their premises and make them more beautiful for the benefit of the community. The step I propose would bring taxation more closely in line with ability to pay.

It is sometimes argued that to allow the deduction of residential taxes would normally be of greater benefit to the more affluent taxpayers than to others. In order to counteract this argument, which I consider to have merit, I would respectfully recommend a deduction ceiling of $750. This would eliminate any advantage which might otherwise be derived by more affluent taxpayers. It is my submission that over and above a certain basic amount necessary for a shelter in which to house a family, the added cost is strictly for frills and luxuries.

I further submit that notwithstanding arguments to the contrary there would not, in fact, be a revenue loss but in the long run a revenue gain, since the money saved by the taxpayer would be spent elsewhere to assist the economy, and because in many instances persons who have so far not made complete disclosure of rental revenue would be encouraged or obliged to do so.

In addition to supporting this motion I would recommend the deduction from income of interest payable on mortgage payments as they pertain to residential property. A landowner who rents his property is already entitled to such a benefit, and in view of the fact that the benefit is transmitted to the tenant, the residential home owner should, in equity, be allowed the same privilege.

I should like to give hon. members a simple illustration. Let us assume that A sells a house to B for $30,000. The buyer does not have sufficient funds in cash to pay for such a home, so he gives A $10,000 cash and a $20,000 mortgage. Subsequently, A has to buy a house to shelter his own family. He buys one from C at a price similar to that which he has been promised. Since he received only $10,000 from B, he cannot pay the whole amount at once, but places a down payment of $10,000 and in turn gives C a $20,000 mortgage.

According to our present taxation system, A has to declare the interest received on mortgage payments from B, but he is not entitled to deduct interest he is paying on the mortgage equivalent to the one he is paying with respect to the property he bought from C. This shows how inequitable the present system is, and I submit that this interest should be deductible.

Based on these considerations, it is my humble opinion that this house should give immediate consideration to—

(a) allowing residential taxes on owner-occupied homes to be deducted from federal income tax, up to a ceiling of $750

(b) allowing tenants to deduct the cost of rental accommodation for federal income tax purposes

(c) permitting deduction of mortgage interest from personal income tax.

I feel this would alleviate a portion of the heavy tax burden now imposed on taxpayers.

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take a few minutes to express some ideas.

I agree with this proposal although it is not complete, although in fact it barely touches upon a problem the depth of which is such that our whole fiscal system should simply be revised.

I wish to take this opportunity to denounce this realty tax which a retrograde tax, which should not exist in 1968 for the simple reason that today the realty tax is unfair. Allow me to give an illustration of the unfairness of this realty tax.

Take, for instance, Saint-Marc-des-Carrières: where an individual who earns $4,000 a year is being punished because he owns a house, because he put up a struggle, perhaps more than another who is renting and earns $8,000, twice the salary of the owner? With great difficulty he saved a bit of money and managed to build himself a house. After making sacrifices, at last he has his own home.

He will have to pay. He will be punished because he managed to build himself a house, to have a real home. But his neighbour, who is a tenant even though he earns twice his salary, will not have to pay a realty tax.

That tax is unfair. If need be, increase the income tax which is a fair tax, although of course we do not like to see it go up. If we compare realty tax with income tax, we realize of course that the latter is more justifiable than the realty tax which should disappear.

It seems that the motion of the member could help to solve the real problems of those who pay a realty tax. That is why it should be supported even though, as I said at the start, it is not complete.

I also agree with what was said by the member who spoke before me to the effect that certain provisions should be added as proposed last year in a similar motion by the member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin)—with regard to the Income Tax Act allowing private owners to deduct from their taxable income any amount spent in realty, municipal or school taxes as well as mortgage interest on the homes they live in.

Young people, in particular, should be encouraged to have their own homes, and this would be an excellent way of stimulating the economy throughout the country by encouraging home owners.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-De-Grâce): In this resolution the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Haidasz) proposes that residential taxes, and in certain cases rentals, be deductible from federal personal income tax. Since the second part of the resolution dealing with deduction of rentals is not at all clear to me, I shall merely deal with the first portion regarding deduction of residential taxes.

I see this proposal as having two purposes. One would be to relieve the heavy burden of taxes carried by those who own homes, and the second would be to serve as an incentive to home ownership and to the building of homes for Canadians. Although I agree that residential taxes are a heavy burden I do not think that this is the proper remedy. I certainly agree with the previous speaker, that municipal taxes, residential taxes, school and other land taxes are completely inequitable, unjust, and completely out of step with modern taxation reforms.

There are instances, such as those already illustrated in this debate where a person who has improved his land, who has tried to make his home a nicer place in which to live, is penalized by more taxes, whereas a person who allows his house to become run down, to become a slum, pays less tax. Worse than that, take the case of a man who tears down a lot of older homes, sometimes nice homes, and turns the land into a parking lot. He will have his taxes reduced while he waits for the local municipality to introduce a road program or construction program from which he can make a great capital gain by speculating in the land.

If a man clears land and leaves it vacant his municipal tax is lowered. But his neighbour, who improves his home, possibly by building an addition to it to house a larger family, or by building a garage, is penalized because he must pay higher taxes. I agree that residential taxes are extremely unjust, but I do not think the remedy lies in allowing them to be written off as deductions against federal income tax. This would bring about the inequities which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) mentioned.

I believe the real remedy lies in changing the taxation system. Many suggestions have been made. Some people think municipal services should be paid for through user charges. Others suggest a site value tax, based on the purpose for which land is to be used rather than on tax charges for additions or for new buildings.

Neither do I think the second purpose of the resolution, which is to serve as an incentive for new housing programs, is the proper solution. As the minister in charge of housing said the other day, if we have to apply further subsidies or raise taxes in Canada to alleviate the housing problem we will not really be solving that problem.

I submit that the only way we can really help potential homeowners is by bringing down the cost of homes. Mass production techniques and new technology have been applied to almost all consumer products on the market, but not to house building. Washing machines, refrigerators and automobiles are manufactured through mass production techniques, but until recently homes have been built by old and very costly methods. In this connection I refer to this article which appeared in the Montreal Star of September 24, concerning a new house building technique developed in California:

> A computer-directed machine that can build prefabricated walls at the rate of 20 feet a minute, automatically sizing, cutting and nailing the lumber, has been developed in Fresno, California, by three lumber company executives.
> The device at M. Kellner and Son Lumber Co. can construct the interior and exterior walls for an average-size two-bedroom house in about 20 minutes. Walls for 500 homes can be built in a week.

It goes on to point out that by using this method costs can be reduced to a great extent.

Other suggestions have been submitted to the task force on housing. I take issue with the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) who said that the task force is not doing a proper job. We must reserve judgment until it brings in its report, and until the government acts on that report. One of the briefs submitted to the task force when it visited Montreal also pointed out that great savings can be made in house building through the introduction of new technology and mass production techniques. If we really want to help the house building industry, if we want to help people in the lower and middle income brackets to have homes they can afford, we must do it through new technology and mass production.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The private members' hour has now expired.

In accordance with standing orders, I do now leave the chair till eight o'clock.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

TREASURY BOARD

1. Departmental Administration, including grants as detailed in the Estimates, $5,131,400.

The Chairman: House again in committee of supply, revised estimates of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, at six o'clock when the time was drawn to my attention, I was literally in the middle of a sentence.

I could not tell you the sentence but I do remember the subject matter. At the time I was dealing with the red circling of a good many employees in the public service, and I had reached the point where I was drawing the attention of the committee and of the President of the Treasury Board to the fact that not only is there the red circling but in many cases, and so far as I have been able to find out in literally thousands of cases, the red circling which was made, say in the fall of this year, was made retroactive to a year earlier.

I really cannot see any justification at all for that. Its effect has been to deprive employees of back pay to which they would otherwise have been entitled. We might take this example—a hypothetical example, but it describes the actual situation. The reclassification in a given situation was completed, let us saw, in October 1967, and was made retroactive to October 1, 1966. In the meantime a collective agreement was arrived at between the applicable organization and the government in which there was an increase of "x" percentage dated back to October 1, 1966. Because the red circling was also made retroactive to October 1, 1966 the employee who was red circled did not even get the increase applicable to the classification in which he worked and was employed for the preceding year.

I am astonished and outraged by that kind of behaviour. If I have misunderstood the situation or if I am misrepresenting it I assure the President of the Treasury board that that misrepresentation is not deliberate and he may correct me; but I do not think I am wrong. What possible explanation can there be for this; what right has an employer to say in October 1967 that, despite the fact that the employee worked in a certain class all through the 12 months from October 1966 to October 1967, he will not receive the increase that has been made applicable to that 12 month period and that he is frozen, not at the rate as of October 1, 1967 but at the rate as of October 1, 1966 and thereby loses the increase to which he is entitled.

For the life of me I really cannot understand what justification there can possibly be for that. If a poor fellow or woman is to be frozen, then let it be at the rate applicable at the date on which the red circling takes place, and not set back as in many cases a full year. From information I have been given, some post office employees and some customs employees have lost in some cases $200 or $300 and even more in back pay to which otherwise they would have been entitled. This is really indescribably bad labour relations, and it is possible only for an employer as strong as is the government. There is no need for such a scrooge-like attitude toward employees.

When the legislation was before the standing committee, then before this committee and this chamber I appreciated there was some reason for the insistence on the part of the government that classification and promotion cannot be made fully a part of collective bargaining. As I recall the reasoning, it was that the merit system on which it was hoped appointment to the public service and promotion within the public service would be based, made it necessary that there be objective rules laid down by the public service commission, and objective criteria applied in appointments through examination and in promotion through examination, and that therefore the merit system could not be allowed to come under attack or be eroded by the provisions in respect of security and the like that must be considered in ordinary collective agreements.

I speak from memory, but as I believe I said at the time, and say now, I can see some validity in the wish to retain the merit system and not let it become subject to the ordinary collective bargaining limitation; but that does not mean that the organization representing the employees should have no say whatever in classification and promotion procedures. This does not mean that it is impossible for the employer, in this case the government, to consult with the organization representing the public employees in order to give them an opportunity to make representations about the classification and reclassification, and to give them an opportunity to do this before the reclassification becomes a fait accompli, because once it is done, and it is necessary to go through the grievance procedure and appeal procedure before the public service commission, there is nothing very much that will be done then.

I am certain it is an uncivilized procedure—and I use that word deliberately because I think it is uncivilized—for a big employer to say that it has the power to make the classifications and reclassifications, and is going to do it, and that the employee must take it even retroactively for a year if the employer so decides. That is not civilized labour relations. In a civilized situation there is no reason why the organization concerned should not be consulted and informed before the reclassification and red circling becomes a fact, so that the organization would be in a position to put its case before the representatives of the Treasury Board. Had this been the case, perhaps the kind hard heart which faces me across the aisle might have agreed not to impose the retroactivity of the red circling. I have known him to be kind; I have also known him to be hard hearted. Perhaps if the organization had caught him in one of his kind moods he might have seen the injustice involved in the red circling of people retroactively for a whole year.

I say to the President of the Treasury Board that the reason the collective bargaining has worked so far is not because he and his associates have done what they should have done in respect of the public service collective bargaining process, because from my observation they have broken a good many basic rules of collective bargaining. I indicated they broke the rules in respect of making some offer to the people on the other side, as soon as negotiations began, so that movement could start early. In the case of the postal service employees, if my memory serves me right, it was some seven months before they made the first offer. This is almost an invitation to strike. When you keep people waiting for seven months before making them any offer at all, the bitterness that develops among the rank and file makes it impossible for anyone to keep them from striking. By that kind of collective bargaining you invite disputes of a serious kind.

The employer in this case, I suggest, also broke the basic rules of collective bargaining by laying down a ukase as to the amount the seaway employees would get. The Prime Minister stated that 6 per cent was fair, and the government would not give any more. He made the statement while negotiations were taking place. In my opinion the government also broke the basic rules of collective bargaining by imposing retroactive red circling without discussion or consultation with the organizations. Even with discussion and consultation it was wrong to do this.

The reason the collective bargaining process has worked as well as it has so far in the public service is not due to the proper behaviour on the part of the government, although a lot of it has been proper. In many cases the basic rules of collective bargaining were broken. It has worked as well as it has because public service organizations have not yet developed the militancy that unions usually develop, and because in the early stages of collective bargaining, even in private industry let alone in the public service, unions tend to be a little more timid and careful.

I warn the government that, as the unions become more certain of themselves and as they gain confidence in their capacity to face their employer across the bargaining table, instead of having to accept orders and ukases, if the government does not change its attitude toward some of these rules of collective bargaining it will invite a great deal more disruption than we have had in the past.

Strikes in services like government services usually take place as the result of serious circumstances, and they occur only when the employer also has made mistakes. In the government service we have responsible employees and responsible leaders. I am using careful words. I am not saying strikes occur when the employer alone has made mistakes; I am saying they occur when the employer and the other side have made mistakes. In this case there is no excuse for the employer making mistakes. The government and its huge civil service ought to be able to research the situation so as to avoid mistakes.

Let me repeat my warning. If things are not changed, then serious difficulties will occur in the future. They need not occur. Let me conclude my remarks by even now pleading with the President of the Treasury Board to reverse the decision with regard to the retroactive red circling of employees. There is no justification on any social or moral ground for a person who has worked in a certain class before being red circled not getting an increase applicable to his class for that year. Every employee who was deprived of retroactive pay to which he was entitled suffered a grave injustice. It is not too late for the President of the Treasury Board to persuade his colleagues in cabinet that this injustice should be rectified.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I should like to draw attention very briefly to that portion of the estimates which come under the Treasury Board and deal with the National Research Council of Canada. I was very much interested in the report handed out regarding the National Research Council of Canada and at this time—

Mr. Drury: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Chairman. I do not want to stop the hon. member but I should point out to him that the estimates of the National Research Council have been referred to a committee of the house. Consequently a discussion of them now during a consideration of the estimates of the Treasury Board would probably be out of order.

The Chairman: I am sorry I was not listening carefully to the hon. member when he commenced his remarks, but the point made by the President of the Treasury Board is correct. Votes 15, 20, 25 and 30 of the estimates of the Treasury Board are before the standing committee.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, I intended to deal in a general way with the report. I did not intend to take any specific item of administration as such. However, if that is your ruling, so be it.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, I have a few observations I should like to make. During our consideration of this item in the estimates. When we are in the committee of supply I sometimes have the feeling that dealing with these estimates is like an ancient tribal ritual greeting spring. It has no real meaning as an examination of the estimates. I only hope that the new structure or procedure of sending the estimates to committees will be more effective. While I recognize the usefulness of using the discussion of estimates as a means of presenting the sort of argument we have heard from members of the N.D.P.—and we have been doing the same thing—I hope that proper use of the committee system will result in a far more meaningful effort.

Let me make several observations in this regard. I should like to consider this whole matter of using the estimates as a gauge of national expenditure. The Leader of the Opposition during our early consideration of the estimates questioned the President of the Treasury Board about the five year projections of spending proposals. After listening carefully to the minister's answers, I think our estimates would have far more meaning and value if the form of the estimates was changed. This form is subject to change, and I recall from my experience as a member of the public accounts committee that a great many useful changes could be made. Surely one change that might well be made is the inclusion with these various estimates of the five year projection in respect of particular votes dealing with specific and committed programs, so that we would see year by year the extent to which these five year projections had been in fact adhered to.

I can give a typical example. We had some questions in the house the other day about an item involving the expenditure of $61 million for the construction of a complex of buildings for the C.B.C. in the Montreal area. I think this information was given in response to a return which had been asked for on written questions. I would like to suggest that there is nobody in this committee who is listening to me now who would be prepared to wager any sizeable amount of money that by the time this particular project is completed its cost will be limited to $61 million. I would be very much surprised if, having in mind the usual changes, it were not much closer to $100 million by the time it is finished.

This is the kind of thing that I think, if we are going to have any meaningful and intelligent examination of specific projects, members of this committee, acting as the people charged by the 20 million people of Canada to examine the spending habits of the government, to see that we are in fact getting good value for our money, and to ascertain what would be the proper priorities to assign to different spending programs, should have an opportunity to examine. This may possibly be somewhat more limited than what the government, the Treasury Board and the cabinet would do, but some effort should be make on our behalf, and information should be given to us so that we could look at these respective programs. Then, in four or five years, we would be able to come to decisions, to evaluate the various proposals, and possibly, when we come to deal with the supply of money to the government, we would be able to exercise a judgment which at the present time I am afraid can only be a stab in the dark.

There may be good and valid reasons why this should not be done. My recollection is that it was Secretary McNamara in the United States who introduced into the department of defence there a budget programming, and a more intelligent and searching look. We heard from the Minister of Finance that he too is now doing this scientifically and that he has computers for the purpose. Talking about tribal rituals, and having in mind what the Minister of Finance has succeeded in doing, I often think that when he came to estimate his budgetary proposals and his deficit he probably slaughtered a chicken and examined its entrails, and this is where he came up with the facts which he gave to this house last fall, and again recently.

I would suggest that this is an aspect of the estimates which might well be considered, so that year by year we would have an opportunity of comparing what in fact were the actual expenditures with the projections which had been made. This might well have been applied to the national centre for the performing arts here in Ottawa. Such information might have been given members of this house and, without judging the merits of this or any project, I do think a similar procedure would really make for a more searching and intelligent scrutiny of the bad spending habits of the government—they have a few good ones but most of them are bad—by the members of this house, an opportunity which at the present time they are denied.

I would also like to deal with the aggregate of the amounts we find in these estimates. I listened very carefully to the explanations of the minister that the Treasury Board, at the appropriate time, having heard from the various departments, takes appropriate steps as a result of which the blue book emerges. But, after all, the blue book should be taken as a virtual contract between the government and the people of Canada whom we represent. The details of any good contract are offered for acceptance and consideration. The government offers to do certain things, to provide certain services and certain public works, and the people of Canada, through parliament, agree to pay so much for it. That is the consideration. But what we find is that this contract is broken year after year. Every time supplementary estimates are brought into this house, there is in fact a breach of contract.

I am not suggesting any government, and certainly not this government, is able to anticipate with accuracy and precision that some contingencies may not arise in the future, but when we see the total aggregate of the supplementary estimates which have been brought in, for example over the last five years, I say that surely, when the Treasury Board has with great pains and meticulous care gone through the departmental proposals and come up with the figures in the blue book, we should be entitled to look at them as being a firm contract.

We find that over the last five years over $4 billion was brought in by way of supplementary estimates. In the fiscal year 1963-64 there were five sets of supplementary estimates, from A to E inclusive, totalling $730 million. In 1964-65 there were four sets of supplementary estimates aggregating $900 million. In 1965-66 there were five sets of supplementary estimates with a total of approximately $850 million. In 1966-67 there were seven sets of supplementary estimates aggregating $1,200 million. In 1967-68 there were three sets of supplementary estimates aggregating $460 million. As I said, the total is approximately $4,200 million.

This is a practice which has to be reviewed very carefully. What does really happen? Do the departments, being unable to bring in to Treasury Board the full amount of the expenditures they would really like to make, soften the blow by asking for a little less, or allow themselves to be taken down to a little less money, knowing all the time that before the fiscal year is over they are going to come back with requests, through the medium of supplementary estimates, to get the total figure for which they originally asked? If that is the case, then it is just a game which is being played.

There is no certainty about it, and I think that members of this house are entitled to better treatment than this. I point this out more in sorrow than in anger, in the belief that the practice is one which should, and I hope will, be reviewed. If the committee structure works properly, I think there will be adequate opportunity through this means to have a careful study made of these estimates as they are going through, and in fact through an examination of departmental officials committee members should be able to find out if the estimates as produced in the blue book are the total that they expect to receive for the fiscal year.

Then I want to add to that my dislike of another practice, which I think is equally invidious, of adding several hundred million dollars each year under the heading of loans, investments and advances. I am not going to go into the details of this matter, since I have done so before, but I am going to keep on coming back to it as long as I think the practice of the government is wrong.

Quite obviously many of these so-called loans, investments and advances are, in fact, expenditures. They are, in fact, expenditures of the crown and not loans or income producing investments. All one needs to do is to examine some of the items in question, and it becomes absolutely obvious there is not going to be any return to the consolidated revenue fund on moneys lent in this way, other than by subsequent expenditure items which are contained in future appropriations. This is the only way the loan is going to be repaid. I may be ignorant of the finer points of government financing, but surely there should be some distinction made between a valid loan made to a crown corporation where there is some hope of repayment, and the kind of expenditure we have seen. I dislike referring to the C.B.C. all the time, but we find a $25 million loan to the C.B.C. and another $35 million loan to the C.B.C. I can only hope that my prospects for eternal salvation are a lot better than the hopes of the C.B.C. for repaying these loans.

I make mention of these things, Mr. Chairman, because I think they are important, having in mind the problems faced by the ordinary taxpayer today in trying to make ends meet. We have a duty cast upon us to scrutinize as closely as we can the various expenditures. I am not satisfied that the government is putting before us the information we should have. I make this as my annual presentation. If the minister is where he is next year and I am where I am, then I will be coming back again to this subject. I am not an optimist like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I do not hope for a cure, except possibly if the people of Canada hear of this practice they may at some future date insist that the government conform with ordinary practices which are sound and sensible.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not wish to take the floor again at this time, Mr. Chairman, if there are others who wish to do so. However, I should like to hear from the President of the Treasury Board with regard to the matter about which I spoke for about half an hour this afternoon. He did me the honour of listening to my remarks, at least I thought he was listening, concerning the plight of the retired civil servants. I am grateful for the attention he gave me because so often when I make this appeal I have to make it to a parliamentary secretary, or to persons who do not have the authority of the President of the Treasury Board. The minister knows that the unanimous report of the special joint committee was presented to parliament on May 8, 1967. I am sure he must be familiar with it. Can he tell me the status of that report, so far as the government is concerned? Has it been considered? Has the cabinet considered legislation based on that report? When can we expect action on this very serious and very important issue?

Mr. Drury: If I may deal with the observatons roughly in the order in which they were made, Mr. Chairman, the first was from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who made a very eloquent and repeated plea for the correction of the unfortunate circumstances in which the superannuated civil servants find themselves. The hon. gentleman did indicate that he thought, while at one point the government had had the best intentions in the world, it had only succeeded in leading these unfortunate people up the garden path. I think those were his words. He said that by agreeing to constructive, progressive steps people had been led to believe that a favourable outcome was inevitable; that it had not been, and that this was disillusioning. I will not yield to the temptation to give a constructive, helpful answer now for fear of being guilty of the same thing.

I think the hon. member knows that in the current year we have, with some difficulty, endeavoured to restrain total government expenditures and have provided revised estimates within which we hope to be able to live. At a time during the current fiscal year of retrenchment, no provision has been made to meet the situation which the hon. gentleman has described. He will understand if, rather than raise false expectations about what might happen in the next fiscal year, I decline to go further. However, as a result of his interesting exposé, I will undertake to discuss this question with my colleagues.

The hon. member for Vancouver East raised the question of whether the government would avail itself of the 60 day delay provision in the legislation in respect of retroactive pay as a consequence of completed collective bargaining negotiations. The answer is no. As I assured another hon. member in the house the other day, we are making every effort, as fast as the administrative machinery can accomplish it, to put into the hands of recipients the cheques for retroactive pay. There will not be reliance on the so-called 60 day clause. We will do this as quickly as possible. I cannot promise more than that. The hon. gentleman would not want me to order the issuance of imaginary cheques or blank cheques. Calculations have to be made as to what is owing and to whom, and as rapidly as this can be done it is being done and the cheques are being issued.

Mr. Winch: Would that include the armed forces increases?

Mr. Drury: The armed forces, Mr. Chairman, are not subject to collective bargaining arrangements. The arrangements for pay in relation to the armed forces depend rather more on the Department of National Defence for calculation rather than on the Treasury Board.

The hon. member for York South, who I am sorry is not here, spoke at some length on the question of the poor or invidious practices of the Treasury Board in conducting collective bargaining negotiations. He referred particularly to two questions; one was the unreasonableness of the Prime Minister and the President of the Treasury Board in announcing, during the currency of negotiations with the seaway workers, a 6 per cent ceiling on increases. Unfortunately for the hon. gentleman's memory the President of the Treasury Board took no part in these negotiations, nor did he make any announcement. The Minister of Transport, under whose department the seaway comes, did at one point make an announcement but the Treasury Board did not. For this reason one might have argued that the remarks of the hon. member for York South were out of order. But even if they had been in order, I am a little surprised, Mr. Chairman, at his logic in defining the actions of one of the parties in the collective bargaining process in making a public statement as to its bargaining position as being unreasonable and illogical, without at the same time requiring the other party to observe a similar line of conduct. At no time did he suggest that it was in any way wrong or inappropriate for members of the other party to the negotiations to seek the support of the public for their point of view or for their representations, however reasonable or unreasonable they might be.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, it is not in the spirit of what the hon. member for York South described as the give and take of the collective bargaining process to endeavour to impose complete freedom of action in relation to public-private negotiations, or in moving from one arena to the other, on the one side without at least a comparable freedom on the other. The hon. member complains it is wrong and unjust for the employer to state his position publicly while the bargaining is going on, yet it seems to be quite reasonable and logical for the employee side to go to the public with its case. I suggest that in this particular instance there should at least be some element of reciprocity observed in the conduct of negotiations.

The hon. member also dealt with the refusal of the government to put on the table a wage offer in the case of the postal workers. I think the house will recollect that after some very considerable delay an offer of a pay increase was made. This was somewhat summarily rejected and the strike followed.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, that the negotiations had been going on for a very long while. During these negotiations there had been little evidence of the give and take that I suggest is of the essence of collective bargaining. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, it was the failure to make any kind of progress at all on some of the rather minor points that led Treasury Board to be dubious about the value of putting on the table at too early a stage a wage offer that undoubtedly, as subsequent events proved, would have been rejected.

I do not think that one can argue that there is a set timetable, a prescribed ritual, for the conduct of collective bargaining: it does depend on the relative willingness of the parties to engage in meaningful negotiations. If for one reason or another this willingness is absent, then perhaps going through a procedure or a series of procedures probably will not advance matters very much. However, Mr. Chairman, I did listen with great interest to his admonitions. If I may use that term. The hon. member has had a great deal of experience in this field, though perhaps on the one side. Certainly my own experience is very limited indeed, but I do profess myself willing to learn, or to try to learn.

The hon. member also made a point about red circling, and explained his complete inability to understand how it could come about that if a man were, on examination, found to have been entitled to an increase in pay for a year or so anterior to the date of such determination, the increase in pay is justified, whereas a simultaneous determination that the work the man was doing for the same period did not justify the rate of pay which he had been drawing and that the classification determination should not be made coterminous. I hope that the hon. member for York South will regard employment in the public service as the giving of a dollar's worth of value for a dollar of pay, rather than some notion that once you get on the payroll you are set for life; that regardless of performance, of the discharge of your responsibility, you are still entitled to continue to receive pay, and not only that, Mr. Chairman, but entitled to benefit from any increases that have probably been earned by others.

I find this a rather difficult philosophy to accept, Mr. Chairman. I think that most self-respecting public servants like to feel that they are working in a system where the reward or emolument is continuously commensurate with their performance. We have insisted on the merit system, which I think is an excellent one, rather than the system of seniority. We have engaged fairly continuously over the years in working toward the constant examination of classification and reclassification. During the past three years a rather more intense, massive and, if I may suggest this, rather more intelligent reclassification system has been in progress in which an endeavour has been made to introduce a coherent, continuous system throughout the public service so that everybody is treated fairly; so that we do not have instances where people, largely as a consequence of historical error, or habit, or perhaps persistence in initial mistakes, are being rewarded to an unfair degree compared with others discharging perhaps greater responsibilities and doing harder work who receive less pay.

Recognizing, Mr. Chairman, that this reclassification process would result in some people going up and some going down, the government, acting I think as a good employer, agreed that those who, by reason of reclassification, are found to be entitled to more pay receive this sum in the full amount immediately. On the other hand, those who upon re-examination of their duties and functions are found to be entitled to less pay are not required to suffer a decrease in pay but are merely put in a "hold" position and receive no increase in pay until such time as the emolument for the particular office they occupy reaches the level of salary that they are currently enjoying.

I should point out in respect to this red circling that there is a corollary known as green circling. Just as red is considered dangerous and unpleasant, so green is considered pleasant. Of the 82,000 odd positions which were evaluated or re-evaluated in the conversion, about 15,000 were red circled. That is quite a substantial number. As of September 15, 1968, the number of positions that were red circled had been reduced from 15,000 to 1,513. It may perhaps interest hon. members to know that although initially 15,000 persons were red circled, 18,000, coming under a similar general classification, were green circled. In total, more people were green circled, or reclassified upwards, than were red circled or reclassified downwards. This system has not led entirely to unhappiness.

I suggested that if as of October 1, the date mentioned by the hon. member for York South, it was determined that a man one year ago was entitled, in respect of his position, to an increase in emolyment it would not be unjust, since he is now doing the same work he did one year ago, to apply the reclassification to him in respect of his upward reassessment for that same period.

The hon. member for Peace River raised two questions, one of which strikes me as interesting. He said that the estimates in some fashion should be portrayed on a five year projection basis so as to enable hon. members to see more clearly the significance of individual items in the estimates. By dealing with items for the previous and current years only, that significance is not so obvious. I think the hon. member's suggestion, if adopted, would make for a much more lucid and descriptive portrayal of government programs. I am not sure what that would do to the blue book of estimates, which already is a massive tome. However I think this project is worthy of examination. Perhaps the most useful way of carrying this out would be in the public accounts committee. Later this evening I hope a proposal will be made that we revert to motions in order to introduce to the public accounts committee a new scheme for setting up estimates which will be vastly more informative, and certainly more descriptive than present arrangements. When the public accounts committee is looking at the program method of portraying estimates, it might also wish to look at the question of doing this on a five year rather than on a one year retroactive and one year prospective basis.

The hon. member for Peace River also said he was unhappy with the system of introducing large supplementary estimates. In his view this was some kind of breach of contract or breach of faith with the public or the house. He may be aware that up until a couple of years ago there was no serious endeavour to include in the estimates all possible and foreseeable items of expenditure during the year. The main estimates might in some cases have been more accurately described as preliminary estimates. In the past two years we have consciously tried to reduce in number and in quantum the size of supplementary estimates. Last year the number of sets of supplementary estimates was limited to three; this year one set of supplementaries has been introduced already, for special reasons, and it is my hope that there will be only one further set of supplementary estimates in the current fiscal year, and that that will be the so-called final sup. If that is done we shall be better able than was the case in previous years to look at entire programs in terms of the main estimates. I think this approach will go a long way to meeting the objections of the hon. member for Peace River.

He also raised the question of loans, investments and advances, indicating that in some instances sums of money represented as loans, investments or advances could more honestly have been portrayed as grants or authorizations to expend in the current year. To a large extent this involves a question of accounting techniques and offers the house the continuing possibility of keeping a finger or a trained eye on the particular amount that is put out by way of loan, investment or advance. Even though the amount is unlikely to be repaid in the foreseeable future, this does mean that the receiving organization, be it a department, agency of government or crown corporation, continues to be accountable until such time as the loan, investment or advance is repaid or discharged. It continues to be accountable for this particular item.

On the other hand, if the amount in question were characterized as a grant or authorization for expenditure, the accountability in respect of the amount presumably would cease during the currency of the fiscal year in question. This is something we might look at and see whether in some instances sums provided by way of loans, investments or advances might more usefully and accurately be classified as grants or authorizations to expend.

I think I have covered most points raised in respect of these estimates, though I might add one observation in respect of some remarks made by the hon. member for York South about red circling and reclassification. I am told that the effective date of reclassification in almost every instance has been discussed with the bargaining units during the negotiating process. To suggest that the action taken by the government has been unilateral—I think he used the term "ukase"—is inaccurate. The retroactivity of the reclassification has been discussed with the bargaining units in most instances during the process of negotiation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to return for a few moments to the question of the pensions of retired civil servants. I should like to thank the President of the Treasury Board for the remarks he made. I have no objection to the odd barb which seemed to be tucked in, because he did end his remarks on the subject by agreeing to discuss the matter again with his colleagues. If I understand that language, it means he will take it back to the cabinet. Well, that is what I want. I hope it will be soon. I hope it will be a sympathetic cabinet. I think I have one supporter just back over the minister's left shoulder.

Mr. Mackasey: Thank you, Stanley.

Mr. Drury: You have a lot of volunteers over here.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes. As a matter of fact there is the parliamentary secretary behind him who, if he were in the cabinet, would support my position and there is another down the way a few desks who is just knocking at the door, ready to say yes at any time and to act on this important issue. And there are some more around. They could be the hon. members from Hull, Grenville-Carleton, Ottawa-Carleton, Ottawa East, Ottawa West, Ottawa Centre and so on.

I am sorry if my suggestion that some of these retired civil servants felt they had been led down, or up, the garden path offended the minister. I can only say this is the way many of them feel. What these people would like, and what I should like, would be for the government to get back to the frame of mind that I honestly believe it was in from about January to June of 1967. I am glad to see the minister nodding his head. Whether that means he agrees with me that the government was in the proper mood then, or that it should get back into that mood, I am not sure. At any rate he has been very helpful. The fact is that, during those five or six months the government did agree to have this matter referred to the special committee. Representatives of all parties seemed to be free to discuss the matter, and officials from the departments were there, and when the report came back I think it was the disposition of the government to act on it forthwith, if it was a reasonable and responsible report. I believe it was both reasonable and responsible. I gave the terms of its recommendations earlier this afternoon, and I am sure they are familiar to the minister. I earnestly hope he will take this matter back to the cabinet, that he will remind the cabinet of the responsible terms of the 1967 recommendation, and that he will do his best to get favourable action on this issue without further delay.

When he was speaking a few minutes ago, the minister seemed to confirm that there was a change of government attitude—that in the earlier part of 1967 there was a favourable disposition to act on this matter, but that in the latter part of the year the government concluded that it was necessary to make certain cuts, that it was obliged to practise a certain amount of financial retrenchment. The minister intimated, if I understood him correctly, that the government had reduced its estimates and was trying to live within the confines of its revised estimates. I would remind him that the revised estimates are of course much larger than they were before they were revised. When these estimates are broken in so many respects, and when the figures are inflated in so many cases, I find it difficult to understand why these people should be called upon to be deprived of the pension increases to which they feel they are entitled, because of the so-called practice of economy. Every time the government announces that cuts are to be made and the budget balanced, the net result is the spending of more money. Yet these people who have a justifiable claim are told they have to wait.

If the minister is going to imply that increasing these pensions is somehow or other taxing the people of Canada, he will have to try to explain this to those pensioners who know there is about $3 billion in the fund, and that it is growing rapidly every year, because the interest alone represents more than is paid out in pensions, not to speak of the new contributions that is paid in.

I do not really profess to understand the mechanics, the financing, the economics of this, but I can follow the reasoning of people on the government side when they explain that this money has no existence except as figures in a book, and so on. But try to explain that to these people who worked for the government for 20, 30 or 35 years and who paid their money in—or, at least, they did not get it in their pay cheques. Try to explain to them that the money is not there, that it is just figures in a book and that they cannot get it, or a reasonable rate of interest on it, without there being a charge on the people of the country.

I know that all pensions are a charge on current production; I have proclaimed it many times. But the minister had better explain this to these people, and in ways that nobody else has yet been able to do satisfactorily. As they see it, the simple fact of the matter is that when they were working they were asked to take home, not 100 per cent of their pay but 93½ per cent or 95 per cent, whatever the rate was at the time. The balance went into some account, and interest was paid on it. In the meantime, other people got increases in the amounts they have to live on. Why could it not be done for these people? Indeed, if the government falls back on the argument that it is living within the confines of revised estimates, it does not wash as far as these people are concerned.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

However, I am grateful to the minister for saying he will take the matter back to cabinet. I am grateful for his not having disclaimed responsibility for the problem. I went through this in the last parliament: One minister passed the problem on to another. But the President of the Treasury Board does not mince matters; he has taken this under his responsibility. I hope he will take it back to the cabinet and remind his colleagues that in the early part of 1967 the government of the day was almost persuaded that this was a just cause and that something should be done about it. Let us get back into that reasonable frame of mind and do the right thing by these people who are former employees of the government and of the people of Canada.

There are one or two other things I should like to say. I am sorry that my hon. friend from York South is not here now. He was here earlier this evening, but he had to appear in a television interview. If we had television in here, instead of upstairs or outside, maybe this kind of thing would not happen. However he can speak for himself, and on the appropriate occasion I am sure he will deal with the points the minister raised, so I shall not attempt to cover that ground.

I should like to ask about a related subject. What is the status at the present time of the regulations regarding retroactive pay increases in the cases of employees who leave the public service in the meantime? As the President of the Treasury Board and his officials know, this relates to a grievance which those affected find hard to take. Let us put it in the simplest possible terms. Here is an employee who has worked for a number of years with the federal government. The time comes when for one reason or another he has to leave. Sometimes he goes to a better job, but it is not usually that. Usually it is for health reasons. After he leaves, a pay increase comes through and it is retroactive for months or for a year.

The employee looks at this and he sees there was a period of six, eight or nine months when he was working for the government doing a job which it is now recognized deserved a higher rate of pay for that six, eight or nine months. Yet, because he was not on strength on the day the retroactive pay increase was allowed, he is denied that increase for the period of retroactivity. I see the minister shaking his head. Perhaps he can straighten me out with his answer, but if his answer is not satisfactory I can send a few cases in point either to him or to his officials.

But before he answers that question, Mr. Chairman, may I ask him two other short questions. When we were dealing with the collective bargaining legislation in the committee a great deal of time was spent on the case of employees who are outside bargaining units. An undertaking was given that a committee would be set up, or an arrangement would be made under which employees outside bargaining units could have a relationship that would be as nearly as possible the equivalent of collective bargaining. Could the minister tell me whether anything has been done about that?

With respect to my final question, if the minister tells me to bring it up when we are on items having to do with legislation I will wait until he wears his other hat and brings the legislative items back to the committee. Another point we discussed in the parliamentary committee was the provision of collective bargaining for the employees on parliament hill, equivalent to that which obtains now in the public service. As a matter of fact, if I remember correctly our committee recommended that something along those lines should be done. Can the President of the Treasury Board tell me whether any progress has been made in this field? If I can get answers to these two or three questions I will not have any new ones to raise, although I may have some supplementaries depending on the replies of the minister.

Mr. Drury: In respect to the question of retroactive pay, the principle is that retroactive pay is paid to the man who has left the public service if the reasons for his leaving were involuntary. These might be health, retirement on account of age, and other reasons. I am not sure what all the reasons are, but if it is a voluntary separation at the choice of the individual, then he does not qualify for the retroactive payment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have a supplementary question right there. Supposing it is the health of an employee's wife that makes it necessary for him to leave a posting, let us say, in the far north. Would he qualify?

Mr. Drury: Well, Mr. Chairman, I suppose the term involuntary depends on where you sit. In so far as the employee is concerned whose wife's health is such as to make it impossible for him to continue in his particular job, then this is hardly voluntary on his part. I frankly do not know what the answer to that particular question is. I do know the principle is that in the case of voluntary withdrawal there is no entitlement to retroactive pay. Involuntary withdrawal does qualify the ex-employee for retroactive pay. The question the hon. member poses is a very interesting one. I do not know what the answer is but I shall make inquiries and let him know.

In relation to the second question raised by the hon. member concerning working conditions or terms of work for persons excluded from the bargaining units, I may say that the government has been very much preoccupied with the situation of these people and has established an advisory group on the executive composition of the civil service. As part of its terms of reference this advisory group was asked to make recommendations to the government on the principles that might be followed in determining the rates of pay and conditions of employment of public servants employed in a managerial or confidential capacity. As yet we have not received a report from this advisory group but we hope to do so reasonably shortly.

It is only when we get their report and we are able to see perhaps a little more pattern emerging from the process of collective bargaining that we will be in a better position to formulate principles to govern the terms and conditions of employment of persons excluded from the bargaining units.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Could the minister tell me who comprises this advisory group? I do not ask for the names of the persons, but rather their categories, whom they represent and so on?

Mr. Drury: I hope, Mr. Chairman, they represent talent rather than "whom." One is the head of a university. Another is the head of a large corporation. I shall just get my information on this and perhaps I can describe them, if the hon. gentleman does not want the names.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not mind getting the names. I just was not pressing for them if there was any reason why they should not be given.

Mr. Drury: They are Hon. J. V. Clyne, Vancouver; Dr. Deutsch, Kingston; Dr. Gaudry, Montreal; Allan Lambert, President of the Toronto-Dominion Bank, Toronto; Marcel Vincent, Montreal, Chairman of the Board of Bell Telephone Company.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): While I am reflecting on that, perhaps the minister could answer the last question I asked him. It had to do with the possibility of collective bargaining for employees who work on parliament hill. When might we expect an answer on this matter?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman suggested that perhaps this might be dealt with under another heading, and I think that would be more appropriate. It would surely be slightly impertinent for the Treasury Board to hazard views on how the house, and particularly the Speaker, should conduct their business.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, in 1949 when Canada joined Newfoundland there was some confusion as to the natural transition of people who worked with the Newfoundland civil service into the public service of Canada. Apparently there were quite a number of employees who worked with the then Newfoundland government and later under the Department of Transport at Gander who did not come under the public service jurisdiction, and consequently did not get credit for their previous employment. I know that for three years these people have been seeking recognition to be qualified as members of the public service, so that they may be given full credit for the years they worked in that particular aspect of aviation.

I could not say exactly how many are involved, but perhaps there are not more than 20. Some are ready for retirement, and some have already retired, but those who have retired are receiving pensions as much as $2,000 less than they would receive if they had qualified to be fully fledged civil servants from the time they began employment with the Department of Transport. Has Treasury Board received representations from these people? Will consideration be given to them? There are perhaps 20 families involved, and I have had a number of representations from them. It is my understanding that some negotiations have taken place with the government of Canada in order to give them some recognition.

Mr. Drury: I would be very surprised if representations either by or on behalf of these people had not been made. I am not aware of them, but I shall try to inform myself. I would, however, perhaps take issue mildly with the hon. gentleman when he talks about the government of Canada granting to these people their rights. It can be argued that a government of Canada pension under the superannuation act is earned by an individual on the basis of the contributions made by him and by the employer, and the size of his pension is determined by the size of the contributions and the period over which they have been made. People who make large contributions for a given period receive a larger superannuation than those who make a smaller contribution. Those who make a contribution over a long period would receive a larger superannuation allowance than those who make the same contribution over a shorter period.

In relation to the approximately 20 families mentioned by the hon. member, I would certainly hope that the pension they have received has been certainly no less than that which would have been received by someone making the same contribution while employed by the public service of Canada. However, to be quite frank I must say that I do not know the answer to this. I shall try to work it out.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have one further question. I agree that there has been a considerable amount of confusion concerning the status of the people to whom I am referring mainly because of the fact that at the time of the rather abrupt entrance of Newfoundland into confederation in 1949 the legal aspect of many of these problems was certainly not ironed out to the satisfaction of the people concerned. It is difficult to look with foresight at things which might materialize to one's advantage or disadvantage in respect of the people of Newfoundland. I would agree with the President of the Treasury Board that, legally speaking by the letter of the law, they are not getting gypped in any way by the government of Canada. However, because of the very difficult circumstances involved, I should like the opportunity to present the case for these people, so that perhaps some arrangements might be made whereby they could perhaps obtain on a pay back basis what is morally their right under the present arrangements. Would the President of the Treasury Board agree to receive a representation by me on behalf of the people?

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, I would be glad to read anything the hon. member sends me.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I was unable to be here when the President of the Treasury Board commented I understand with some lucidity on my remarks earlier. The President of the Treasury Board said my remarks were lucid as well as acid. Lucid acid is still acid. I am sorry I was not here. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, indicated why unfortunately I had to leave, and he has given me what I am sure in his usual careful way is a correct summary of some of the things the President of the Treasury Board said. I should like to take two or three minutes, if I may, to comment on that. No doubt the President of the Treasury Board will correct me if I have misunderstood his comments.

First, I was glad to have the minister confirm the fact that there were some thousands—I understand he said 15,000 odd—public service employees who were red circled. I was not questioning the fact that there is value in reclassifying jobs. I was questioning the fact that it was done without consultation with the organization, and as I said earlier I was particularly outraged by the fact that some people did not receive their retroactive pay because the red circling was made retroactive in some cases for a full year. I could see no reason for that. It is neither my suggestion nor that of anyone else who has any knowledge of this thing that the jobs must remain in precisely the same relationship to each other, despite changes in the work load and work content; but I believe it is better labour relations not to make changes which affect thousands of people without consultation with their spokesmen.

If that suggestion appears to the President of the Treasury Board to be one sided, then I should tell him the comments which I understand he made were certainly not two sided; they were certainly the management view that it is entirely within management's power and authority to reclassify and readjust without consultation and without other people knowing what is being done.

Mr. Drury: I should point out to the hon. gentleman that I did say that the effective dates of reclassification have been the subject of discussion during the course of negotiations. This has not been done without consultation or unilaterally or by ukase.

Mr. Lewis: I am glad to have that assurance. All I can say to the President of the Treasury Board is that those who spoke for the employees at the negotiating tables were not under that impression. They were under the impression they were being told what the date was. They were informed of the date on which the red circling would become effective retroactively. If that is what the President of the Treasury Board means by discussion and consultation, then he and I had better look up a dictionary. If they were told the red circling would take effect on a certain day, some of them may not have protested, but in many cases they did. The representatives of the employees should have been asked for their comments. That is what I mean by consultation. I do not mean that he should sit down and tell them what he has decided to do. That is not discussion either. So far as my information is concerned that is all that happened.

I should like to know by what philosophy or social or moral thesis an employer has a right to make red circling retroactive. If I have worked a year in a certain class and you take unto yourself the power to change my class today, I suggest that is enough; but by what right do you take it within your power to tell me that in the past twelve months, even though I worked with the knowledge that I was in a certain class—not merely the impression but the knowledge—putatively, as we lawyers would say, I must be considered to have been in a lower class one year ago? On what basis do you place that kind of an imposition on an employee affected by red circling, and what purpose does it serve except to create bitterness and resentment, which is entirely justified?

This was the major point I drew to the attention of the President of the Treasury Board. I am told that that point was not answered and I should like to know what the answer is. It is bad enough for one to be told that his work is not worth as much as he thought it was in relation to the job—and I do not deny your right to say that. But by what right can you push someone back a whole year in that new lower classification? That is the major point.

The second point in respect of which I understand he said I was being one sided, because all my experience was one sided—it was, and I make no apology—was that concerning the employer having the right to state his limits and the union having the right to state its demands. Surely the point is that in good labour relations in the government service one must forget that the government is a pretty important and pretty powerful agency.

• (9:30 p.m.)

In my experience in collective bargaining, and there are others in this chamber who have had experience, I cannot recall any case, in which I was involved, and I have been involved in thousands of them, when the president of a company went on television or on radio and said through that medium to his negotiators at the negotiating table and the public of Canada that he was not going to give more than "X" amount. He might do that after the negotiations have broken down, but I have not known the head of an ordinary private company, who has any sense about labour negotiations, doing that during negotiations. He sends his instructions to his negotiators.

When the employer of the public service, who is the governor and ultimately the public, does that in the course of negotiation—that is, gets on the public platform, along with the President of the Treasury Board—

Mr. Drury: I didn't.

Mr. Lewis: I beg your pardon; you did not?

Mr. Drury: It is terribly hard to compete with T.V. personalities today. I outlined all this.

Mr. Lewis: In any event, when the Prime Minister does that I suggest he is doing something which is not good for labour relations in the public service. If those are the instructions they should go to the government's negotiators at the negotiating table. When the Prime Minister makes such a statement to the people of Canada, who ultimately are the taxpayers out of whose money these salaries are paid, what does this do to those people and what does it do to postal and seaway employees vis-à-vis the people of Canada? I do not know whether this occurred at the same time, but the Prime Minister added something about squeezing a lemon, and that there is only so much juice in a lemon. He said he was not going to be a lemon, or something to that effect. What does this do to the negotiators on behalf of the government and the employees, vis-à-vis the public of Canada? If I were one of the employees affected I would make a devil of a lot of noise if the Prime Minister did that during negotiations which my representatives were attempting to carry out. There is no need for this. There is no need to create public opinion which impinges on postal and seaway employes, putting them under the gun in that way.

The government has negotiators at the negotiating table. It should send them its instructions, and they will pass them on to the negotiating committee of the workers concerned. Surely that is the way to carry on negotiations. No matter what the President of the Treasury Board may say, this is a ukase when it is stated by the Prime Minister with all the power and knowledge the government has in relation to everybody concerned in the bargaining process, particularly during an election campaign. The President of the Treasury Board or his colleagues cannot tell me that is legitimate bargaining, as the law puts it, in good faith. If that is so, then I should like to know what bad faith in bargaining is. I repeat the warning I gave earlier: If this is the road that is to be followed, there is going to be a great deal more trouble in the future than we have had in the past.

5. Contingencies—Subject to the approval of the Treasury Board, to supplement other votes for paylist and other requirements and to provide for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for including awards under the Public Servants Inventions Act, and authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylist requirements and repaid to this appropriation from other appropriations, $70,000,000.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two things to say about this contingency fund. It is only right that we should ask the President of the Treasury Board a few questions about this blank cheque for $70 million, representing an increase from $45 million, that he is asking us to give. We have a few fond memories about this contingency or slush fund which covers the waterfront and takes in almost everything. We recall one time when we were dealing with interim supply in this house, which was not granted as soon as the government thought it should have been. The government went to work on this fund and found enough money to pay the bills and take this club away from the opposition. We have not forgotten that. The minister should explain the purpose of this fund to the house.

As I suggest, this covers the waterfront. It says, for instance it can be used, subject to the approval of the Treasury Board, to supplement other votes for pay lists. In other words, if there is some increase in pay in different departments this fund will presumably take care of them. It is my thought that if a department estimates its expenditures for salaries and does not estimate them correctly, it should come back to the house and ask for a supplementary amount so that parliament will know the use to which the money is supposed to be put.

The item also suggests that this fund can be used for other requirements and to provide for miscellaneous, minor and unforeseen expenses. That is about as broad as it could be. Why do we not just say that it is to cover everything, instead of trying to dress it up with a whole lot of fancy words? This is as wide and as open as the sky. It refers to unforeseen expenses not otherwise provided for, including awards under the Public Servants Inventions Act. I am not too familiar with that act and I think the minister should tell us what it is all about. The item refers also to an authority to re-use any sums allotted for non-paylists. In other words, this includes anything that has nothing to do with salaries but has been allotted in the estimates, not used and repaid into this contingency fund. As I understand it this refers to all the departments of government, not just the Treasury Board. It refers to any estimates that had been passed in the house other than for salaries, which have not been used. They can be put back into this contingency fund and the Treasury Board has a blank cheque to use this for anything they decide. This is a very important vote and parliament should know what it is passing in respect of this $70 million.

Mr. Drury: Mr. Chairman, as the hon. gentleman has indicated, the principal amount to be granted in this vote is to cover expected, although undetermined salary increases as a consequence of bargaining negotiations now taking place. The hon. gentleman will realize that we are now in full swing of negotiations. All of these negotiations or agreements have resulted in over-all increases in wages and salaries. In order to avoid indicating in advance of the bargaining process what one might describe as the final offer, which in respect of the government service has not yet been done either publicly or privately, the amount is put into the contingency fund with the understanding that in the final supplementary estimates the amounts required to meet the salary increases arising out of collective bargaining agreements, which may have been concluded by then, will be made up in the final supplementary estimates. This accounts for the bulk of the amount.

As the hon. gentleman has indicated, there are a number of paylist items. I have examples of that kind of thing for the previous year. It is impossible to say what unforeseen contingencies will occur in a current fiscal year. Equally it is a little difficult to say what precisely, and of what value, will be the inventions made by people in the public service during the course of the fiscal year.

Mr. Hales: Would the minister mind running down that list and giving us, not the amounts of money but the headings under which those amounts were paid out?

Mr. Drury: Does the hon. member mean the non-pay list?

Mr. Hales: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Drury: The 1967-68 list runs to quite a few items. June 27, 1967, payments to eligible milk producers, $209; construction of road through Kapuskasing experimental farm, $10,000; payment to owners of crops destroyed by the Golden Nematode, $60,600; funds to the Canadian Dairy Commission for the payment of audit fees, $30,000. Those are some items in the Department of Agriculture. Then under the heading of chief electoral officer we have $2,500 for commissionaire services and travelling expenses. Under the relatively new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs we have expenses of the task force on Canada Corporations Act, $152,400; expenses of task force on securities, $46,500; federal government's share of committee on mutual funds and investments contracts, $142,525; expenses of consumer affairs branch, $175,000. These are the kind of items that are on this list.

Under the heading of Energy, Mines and Resources there is the item for expenses of Canadian steering committee of international association on water pollution, $5,000; expenses of Crow's Nest industries team to world series of safety competitions, $2,000. Under the heading of External Affairs there is the item, protection of diplomatic property in Canada, $75,000. The hon. gentlemen will recollect that some damage was caused to the premises of the diplomatic mission here, an occurrence which understandably cannot be foreseen before the year begins. Next we have purchase of Beaver aircraft for assistance to Middle East refugees, $139,000. Then, there is the study of external aid programs, $50,000; Italian earthquake relief, $100,000. Under the Department of Fisheries we have the item for fishing vessel construction subsidies, $300,000. It will be recollected that the rate at which fishermen availed themselves of this offer of a subsidy turned out to be higher than forecast.

Under the heading of the Canadian livestock feed board there is the item for general administration expenses, $30,000. Under the heading of Indian Affairs and Northern Development there is forest fire fighting in Yukon, $130,000, and grant to commissioner of Northwest Territories in establishing new government in Yellowknife, $175,000. Under the Department of Labour there is the item for allowances and expenses of conciliation boards and industrial inquiry commissions, $30,000. Under the heading of the Senate there is the item for the expenses of the Senate committee, $115,000, on two separate occasions. Under the House of Commons, December 14, 1967 there is the item for additional funds for publishing debates, $240,000. Under Manpower and Immigration there is the item of operating grants to the provinces under the former technical and vocational training agreements, $11 million.

I have a few more pages of these items but I think what I read gives an indication of the nature of these non-pay list items.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, it certainly gives us an idea of what goes on. I do not think one could call more than a third of these items emergency or contingency items. Many of them should be estimates under the department, such as for instance audit fees in the Department of Agriculture, chief electoral officer, purchase of Beaver aircraft, livestock feed board, new government at Yellowknife, and House of Commons debates. All these are more or less permanent items, could have been foreseen and should have been in the estimates for these various departments. I do not think we can call all of these contingencies. The minister did read out some that were contingencies, and I am sure hon. members would agree to that; but, goodness knows, this account is not being used for what it was set up for.

I hope the day will come when we will have a committee of this house, whether it is the public accounts committee or a part of the Treasury Board, where members of parliament will agree to these expenditures before they are approved. The way it is now, parliament leaves these decisions in the hands of Treasury Board, and who does Treasury Board consist of but the five ministers on the front benches? The opposition has nothing to say about it, and the money is spent and gone. This house needs a committee where members from all parties would sit down and deal with these contingencies. Believe me, a lot of these contingencies would be wiped out and there would be proper estimating if we had such a committee.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of the public accounts committee at the time of the pay scandal—that is the only word I can use for it—and it is then I believe that I invented the phrase "slush fund", because that is all this fund was at that time. It amounted to $45 million, and I was assured by the then president of the Treasury Board that this would never occur again, and that it was an accident. The government of that time found the money in the slush fund and thus frustrated parliament. Parliament thought that its members had the traditional right of denying Her Majesty supply, but what in fact happened was that the different departments got together and found $100,000 here and $100,000 there, and if my memory serves me correctly over $2 million was found by accident with which to pay the civil servants of Canada. In this way the opposition was not able to bring forcibly to the attention of the nation the scandalous way in which our finances were being managed. Now we are asked to vote some $70 million, which is very close to double the amount the government had a few years back when this trouble occurred.

Unless I miss my guess, with the $70 million the government will have a great deal more leeway than it had with the $45 million. By carelessly voting $45 million we frustrated ourselves in our right to criticize the government and all its departments. We discussed this very thoroughly in the public accounts committee and we decided to try to plug this hole. We even asked the officials of the departments for their advice on how this sort of thing could be stopped so that it could never occur again. Now I am astounded to see that our recommendation, which were very strong at that time, that no $45 million of unmarked money should be left lying around for such a contingency, has been completely disregarded and that we are asked for some $70 million to be paid into exactly the same kind of fund.

For fear that what I say may sound like nothing but criticism I have a suggestion to make, namely that none of this money be allowed to spill over to allow the government of the day to get out of the hole. If we are in fact putting money in which has already been spent, and this is only a general fund to cover up legitimate expenses in individual departments, such as fire fighting costs and costs for refitting of ships and a setting up of a new government for the Northwest Territories, that is fine and dandy; but we want to be assured here and now that this fund will not again be abused as it was before. Apparently the promises of Treasury Board are not enough, because I suspect that if we approve this $70 million without receiving some assurance from Treasury Board that this fund will not be abused, we will have a repetition of the trouble we had once before, but with nearly twice as much money with which to play around.

I wonder if the minister would assure me that he will do all he can to see that this particular abuse of our trust in the financial administration of this country will not be used as a club over the heads of the opposition, and indeed over parliament itself.

Mr. Drury: It is quite difficult to answer that, Mr. Chairman. I do not believe I can accept the statement that the government has abused the trust of parliament in the use of this particular fund. If I gave that assurance, it would be implied that the trust was used as a club with which to beat parliament on some previous occasion. If it is quite clear there has not been any such previous occasion, I am quite prepared to do all I can to see that this contingency fund is not employed as an abusive trust, nor will it be employed as a club with which to beat parliament.

Mr. Bigg: I think the answer is not too difficult to give. Suppose there are 20 departments that need some type of contingency fund, then I am quite willing to vote them a percentage of, say, 10 per cent of their yearly appropriation for this purpose. However, I am not prepared to see the fund spill over into other departments and used in a way to frustrate parliament when it comes to voting supply. This fund should not be used for paying civil servants or for other departmental purposes. If there is an over-appropriation, then that amount should go back into the consolidated revenue fund or perhaps used as a general contingency fund.

However, the contingency fund should not be used to get the government out of a bind. The government sometimes finds money which we did not know about, which we did not vote for a particular purpose, and they pull it out of a hat, like a magician at a sideshow. Then the government says to parliament, "Ha ha, we have the money; there is no point in continuing the supply debate. We have paid the civil servants"—or the mounted police, as the case may be. In this way the historical right of the opposition to question the government about spending money is frustrated. We are not able to discuss the estimates of every department in parliament. The time allotted to the supply debate runs out and we are probably able to discuss only five departments a year. Perhaps on the last supply vote of the year we are able to refer to certain things which we believe are abuses, and bring them forcibly to the attention of the government by means of a long debate. If this opportunity is going to be taken away by frustrating the opposition's right to grant supply, then I feel parliament is being frustrated. I think it is the duty of Treasury Board and the government as well to put this voluntary check on their own abuses. It is not a question of whether or not there are abuses. Naturally we trust the government to do its best, but they have made mistakes from time to time.

If our system of party government has any value at all, then it lies in the fact that the opposition is able to bring forward what they believe is an abuse. It is not yet treason in Canada to criticize the goverment; it is our duty.

The Chairman: Shall vote 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Item agreed to.

10. Government's share of surgical-medical insurance premiums and Government's contributions to pension plans and death benefit plans for employees engaged locally outside Canada who are excluded from the Public Service Superannuation Act, to the Unemployment Insurance Fund in respect of Government employees paid through the Central Pay Office and to the Hospital Insurance (Outside Canada) Plan, $14,994,000.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall we now proceed to the estimates of the Department of Labour?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Mackasey: I think the house leader indicated earlier in the evening that he would like to revert to motions. Perhaps in view of the lateness of the hour I could deal with my estimates on Thursday.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

THE ESTIMATES

TABLING OF SAMPLE OF NEW FORM— REFERENCE TO PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I wonder if I could have leave of the house to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement with regard to the new form of the estimates?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The house will recall that during the recent debate in committee of supply, the President of the Treasury Board mentioned that the government was developing a new form for the estimates designed to provide a proper basis for discussing the government's expenditure plans. I should like now to ask leave of the house to table copies in English and in French of a sample booklet to illustrate this suggested new form of the estimates. In order to show the proposed new form we have used the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the Department of Insurance and the Department of the Solicitor General.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister have leave to table the booklet?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Consultations have taken place which lead me to believe there might be unanimous agreement to a motion along the following lines, which I should like to move:

That a sample booklet illustrating the new form of the estimates be referred to the standing committee on public accounts for examination and report to the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): As my final selection this evening, Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just give the business of the house for the balance of the week. Tomorrow, as indicated by my colleague the Minister of Manpower and Immigration last Thursday, we will commence with the resumed debate on the Customs Tariff resolution. We hope, by leave of the house, to proceed to the advanced stages of the bill founded upon that resolution. On Wednesday, we will return to committee of supply and there consider the estimates of the Department of Justice. On Thursday, we would again be in committee of supply when we would have the opportunity of listening to the speech of my colleague, the Minister of Labour, followed by a consideration of the labour estimates. On Friday, we will again be in committee of supply when we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Transport.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

PUBLIC WORKS—MONTMAGNY, QUE.— REQUEST FOR DREDGING

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for having taken into consideration the question I asked some time ago with regard to a problem concerning my riding, and more particularly the people of Île-aux-Grues and the town of Montmagny.

Is is about a wharf, the Montmagny Wharf built a number of years ago, thanks to the contribution of both the government and a private enterprise. At that time, the wharf was meeting the needs of the population and was capable of promoting the economic development of the area.

Opposite the city of Montmagny there is an island inhabited by good citizens, 90 per cent of them farmers, especially potato growers and milk producers. The only useful means of communication between Île-aux-Grues and the city of Montmagny is by boat.

But for some years now, the situation has been worsening. The channel leading to the wharf at Montmagny, which is commonly called the dock channel, is so full of sand and mud that this fall, even at high tide, the ship that plies between Île-aux-Grues, the big island and the city of Montmagny had a hard time docking, often damaging its engine. In fact, the owner, Mr. Lavoie, is wondering if he will be able much longer to carry the produce, the mail and the people who have to keep in touch with the rest of the province and the country. In short, the people have the right to live on that island and they are also entitled to the services which are normal in 1968 with regard to communications, health, etc.

The government authorities in Ottawa have been aware of that problem for a number of years now because, during the week, a special meeting took place between the city council of Montmagny and the intermediate bodies. Of course, I was invited to take part in that study in order to submit the problem once again to Ottawa and to try to convince the authorities of the urgency of doing something.

Studies were made two, three or four years ago, and estimates were prepared by engineers. According to present day files, it seems that it would cost approximately half a million dollars to dredge the channel and give the ships access to the wharf, thus facilitating navigation and communications.

I feel that, even though it should not be extremely profitable or advantageous for the government, something should be done to help that area of the province of Quebec, if not to develop further at least to maintain itself economically.

Mr. Speaker, it is common knowledge that the lower St. Lawrence, from Montmagny down, has numerous economic difficulties. All the governments, co-operate in trying to maintain an interesting and decent standard of living, as well as agricultural and industrial organizations with a view to encouraging the people to stay in that beautiful part of our country. I insist on this and I shall continue to insist, because it is my duty. It is not an election commitment because, before the elections, a questionnaire had been submitted to me in order to know my ideas on the subject and I deliberately omitted to reply, in order not to give the impression that I promised to solve problems which I did not understand. I did not want to enter into any commitment, but today I am their spokesman in the house and since I understand their problems better, it is my duty to try to work with the government in order to find solutions which will be beneficial, valuable and lasting.

There is another aspect to the problem which must be remembered, and that is that a great many migratory birds come to l'Île-aux-Grues in the autumn. The hunting season attracts many tourists to the island and is an important source of revenue for the people. However, because navigation is difficult, there are fewer hunters each year, and therefore less profit to be made. In my opinion, taking into consideration all those problems concerning l'Île-aux-Grues and the town of Montmagny, it would be in the national interest to take the steps necessary to solve them as soon as possible, so that the people do not feel neglected. They should be given the same help as is given elsewhere. This is not always economically sound but it is necessary from the humanitarian point of vue.

It has been my good fortune recently to visit another country and I have seen to my amazement some places where—

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bellechase (Mr. Lambert) has raised a problem which is certainly very important for his riding. Therefore, I can assure him that in the absence of the minister and of his parilamentary secretary (Messrs. Laing and Langlois), I have taken note of his remarks which will be brought to the minister's attention as soon as possible, so that he may follow up the matter, if it is deemed advisable.

PUBLIC SERVICE—CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE REPORT RESPECTING PENSIONS OF SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 7, as reported in Hansard at page 2520, I asked the Minister of Finance or the government house leader if arrangements could be made so that there would be time for the house to consider and concur in the report of the special joint committee which was tabled in the house on May 8, 1967. That was the report of the special joint committee on the Public Service of Canada and it was the report that recommended increases in the pensions of retired civil servants.

The Minister of Finance indicated that, in his view, there were technical difficulties in concurring in the report of a committee made to a previous parliament. As a result of that I endeavoured to help the government by proposing the next day, on Friday, November 8, a motion to take that report into review during the present session. I presented that motion on Friday, November 8, as reported in Hansard at page 2567. There was not the necessary unanimous consent, so the motion was not allowed. In stating his objection the President of the Privy Council said that there would be opportunities during the current session to deal with that report.

When I posted this matter for one of these adjournment debates I did not realize it would come at the end of a day on which we have had a fair amount of discussion on the whole question of pensions of retired civil servants. Although we did not reach any conclusion that might be called satisfactory during our discussions today I was happy that the President of the Treasury Board agreed that the matter could and should be discussed again by the cabinet.

Perhaps I should leave it there instead of pressing my questions of November 7 and 8. Perhaps I should simply ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gray) if he will confirm the statement that the matter will be discussed in cabinet. I know he is not in the cabinet, but I also know he is close to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) and if he will just let the Minister of Finance know that this commitment has been made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) and express the hope that consideration will be given at an early date, that will be a measure of progress.

I should like the parliamentary secretary likewise to urge on the government the validity of the suggestion I made on November 7 and 8, namely that the report of the special joint committee be brought before parliament this session so that members of the House of Commons might express their opinions on it. I do not think a lengthy debate would be necessary and I believe a vote for it would be unanimous. My hope is that if we can take this step we can get back to the mood that I think the government was in between January and June of 1967 and get action on this matter at an early date.

I am glad to see the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance here to answer the question tonight. I hope he will give us the best answer he can, and that at least he will give us an assurance that he will endeavour to see that his minister takes part in the discussion of this matter in cabinet, and also that he will do his best to get an opportunity for the house to express its view, which I am sure will be unanimous, that the time has come to provide these increases in the pensions of our federal superannuates, without any further delay.

Mr. H. W. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): I will be pleased to draw the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) not only to the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken but more particularly to the remarks of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) during the debate on the estimates of his department, which has just concluded. What the President of the Treasury Board said during this discussion will, of course, be on record in Hansard and will speak for itself.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT—PROPOSED CENTRALIZATION OF ATLANTIC REGION PEOPLE

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Some time ago, on November 7 to be precise, I asked the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) to give us some indication whether the government was actively studying the sociological and economic circumstances surrounding the centralization of the people of the Atlantic region.

My question arose out of the statement of the minister in Halifax to the effect that we must look to regional interests but we must not confuse this with being parochial; regional development did not mean there would be more jobs in every county, a new plant at every crossroad or a new wharf in every harbour. The minister went on to indicate that the countryside is losing people and that many villages and small towns are declining in population. He went on further to infer that people would be expected to migrate. The whole inference of this was that the department had made plans for the centralization of the people of the Atlantic region.

A few days earlier, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) referred to the fact that some 8,000 people would be centralized under a resettlement plan in Newfoundland. That is, 15 per cent of the people of Newfoundland would be brought from small rural communities to urban communities within the next ten years. As a matter of fact on Friday, November 15, one of our local newspapers in a commentary indicated that centralization is probably the biggest single issue the province has had to grapple with at any time in modern history. It said it can mean the future progress and stability of the province or its economic and social ruin. That editorial was entitled, "Don't Play With People."

An eminent Canadian author has characterized the decentralization carried on by the federal and provincial governments as the concentration of people into concentration camps before they move to Toronto.

The reason I pose my question to the minister, and would like a statement from him concerning the government's philosophy on resettlement and centralization, is that in actual fact I think the government has no philosophy. Perhaps I should direct my question to the premier of Newfoundland.

This is an important matter of urbanization, centralization, relocation and resettlement, particularly of the people in Newfoundland and of people in the Atlantic region generally. I am not one bit against centralization. I am not against any changes designed by any government, municipal, federal or provincial, to improve the lot of people, provided those changes follow some kind of philosophy, some kind of plan, some kind of program, and provided the alternatives have been investigated. My contention is that 8,000 people have been moved, and 80,000 more people are to be moved in Newfoundland without this program being based on any philosophy, plan or policy. I could quote at length from a report investigating the urbanization or relocation of people in Newfoundland, a report commissioned by the federal government.

At page 15 of the report it is pointed out that it would seem the government adopts a policy of hands off, refusing to offer advice to those being moved lest it be held responsible for any unforeseen difficulties that might arise. It does not inquire into the reasons why people should move. The report goes into detail and indicates that people have been moved from slow growth centres to no growth centres. It indicates that housing has been a major problem for people with large families. It indicates that unemployment has resulted. It indicates that elderly people have been forced to relocate in areas where they are virtually faced with starvation.

The report contends that the government has been dealing with the benefits accruing to young people from the program, with no regard given to the problems faced by the adult segment of the population resulting from relocation. The government has a narrow concept of centralization. It intimates that the government has literally been playing checkers with people, expecting people to leave a sinking ship and jump into the raging Atlantic.

It is heartbreaking to study many of the problems faced by people who have been relocated in Newfoundland. As a result of relocation now we have the man without a home as compared to the man with a home, the man Edward Markham and Millais painted and wrote about.

I am asking the government for a statement of its philosophy. I am asking it to take a closer look at what it is doing with people, because centralization is not the sole solution for many of the problems of rural Atlantic Canada. I am asking the government to inform the people of the Atlantic region, in fact of all regions in Canada whether west or east, what its policies are in this matter.

We have had instances where people have been moved to a new location and found they could not afford to buy houses. People get $1,000 to move and $200 per child, and sometimes they are moved into areas where the cost of living for them has increased fivefold. When the government moves people I ask it to consider the humanist aspects involved and not just the economic aspects.

I think the minister in charge of rural development has a clear concept of what is involved. I am convinced of this from reading his statements in the maritimes. All I am asking is that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis), who now has responsibility for the program, and the minister in charge of regional development, get their heads together along, with provincial officials, and indicate to the people of Canada what their philosophy is. Right now there seems to be no philosophy, and what does appear is tragedy for a good number of people in many regions of Canada.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate knows the reason the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development is not here to answer the hon. member's question concerning the proposed centralization of the people of Newfoundland and the whole Atlantic region. The hon. member may be assured, however, that I shall bring this to the attention of the minister tomorrow. The minister may see fit to give him a written answer.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Pursuant to provisional standing order 39A the motion to adjourn the house is now deemed to be adopted. Accordingly this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2.30 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.22 p.m.

APPENDIX

NATO COMMUNIQUÉ FOLLOWING MINISTERIAL MEETING

1. The North Atlantic Council met in ministerial session in Brussels on 15th and 16th November. The meeting was attended by foreign, defence and finance ministers. The council had moved forward from mid-December its normal year-end meeting so that ministers might discuss at an earlier date the serious situation following the armed intervention in Czechoslovakia and the occupation of that country by forces of the Soviet union and of four of its Warsaw pact allies.

2. Ministers reaffirmed the inviolability of the principle, which has been invoked on numerous occasions by every country, including the USSR, that all nations are independent and that consequently any intervention by one state in the affairs of another is unlawful.

They noted that this principle has been deliberately violated by the Soviet leaders with the backing of four of their allies. World opinion has been profoundly shocked by this armed intervention carried out against the wishes of the government and people of Czechoslovakia. All the members of the alliance have denounced this use of force which jeopardises peace and international order and strikes at the principles of the United Nations charter. Like all other peoples, the people of Czechoslovakia must be free to shape their future without outside interference. Agreements concluded under the pressure of occupying forces can provide no justification for challenging this basic concept.

3. The contention of the Soviet leadership that there exists a right of intervention in the affairs of other states deemed to be within a so-called "Socialist commonwealth" runs counter to the basic principles of the United Nations charter, is dangerous to European security and has inevitably aroused grave anxieties. It gives rise to fears of a further use of force in other cases.

The use of force and the stationing in Czechoslovakia of Soviet forces not hitherto deployed there have aroused grave uncertainty about the situation and about the calculations and intentions of the USSR. This uncertainty demands great vigilance on the part of the allies.

4. Applied to Germany the policies which the USSR derives from its doctrine of a so-called "Socialist commonwealth" raise new obstacles to the rapprochement and ultimate unification of the two parts of Germany. Moreover, they would be contrary to the letter and spirit of the four power agreements relating to Germany as a whole.

In this situation, and bearing in mind the special responsibilities of the United States, the United Kingdom and France, the ministers reaffirm the determination of the alliance to persevere in its efforts to contribute to a peaceful solution of the Germany question based on the free decision of the German people and on the interests of European security. Their governments do not recognize the "GDR", and they reject all claims which would tend to perpetuate the division of Germany against the will of the German people.

Referring to their communiqué issued in Reykjavik on 25th June, 1968, the ministers confirm the support of their governments for the declared determination of the three powers to safeguard Berlin's security and to maintain freedom of access to the city. They recall the declaration of the North Atlantic Council of December 16, 1958 on Berlin and the responsibilities which each member state assumed with regard to the security and welfare of Berlin. They note with satisfaction the important measures taken by the Federal Republic of Germany in conformity with the status of Berlin for the purpose of maintaining the viability of the city. They associate themselves with the position of the three powers as regard the legitimate concern of the federal government for the welfare and viability of Berlin and as regards the resulting ties which exist between the two on the basis of the arrangements in force.

The ministers associate themselves with the call made upon the Soviet union by the three powers to respect the quadripartite agreements concerning Berlin and the decisions taken pursuant to these agreements by the United States, France and the United Kingdom.

5. The new uncertainties resulting from recent Soviet actions also extend to the Mediterranean basin. This situation requires that the allies continue by every available means their efforts to promote stability and a just and equitable peace, as well as mutual cooperation and understanding, in the area. The expansion of Soviet activity in the Mediterranean, including the increased presence of Soviet naval units, requires vigilance to safeguard allied security.

6. The members of the alliance urge the Soviet union, in the interests of world peace, to refrain from using force and interfering in the affairs of other states.

Determined to safeguard the freedom and independence of their countries, they could not remain indifferent to any development which endangers their security.

Clearly any Soviet intervention directly or indirectly affecting the situation in Europe or in the Mediterranean would create an international crisis with grave consequences.

7. So long as the Soviet leaders adhere to a policy of force, these new uncertainties will remain. The allies are convinced that their political solidarity remains indispensable to discourage aggression and other forms of oppression. Above all, they stand wholly determined to meet their common reponsibilities and, in accordance with the North Atlantic Treaty, to defend the members of the alliance against any armed attack.

8. The allies participating in NATO's integrated defence programme have, therefore, been obliged to reassess the state of their defences. They consider that the situation arising from recent events calls for a collective response. The quality, effectiveness, and deployment of NATO's forces will be improved in terms of both manpower and equipment in order to provide a better capability for defence as far forward as possible. The quality to reserve forces will also be improved and their ability to mobilise rapidly will be increased. Renewed attention will be directed to the provision of reinforcements for the flanks and the strengthening of local forces there. The conventional capability of NATO's tactical air forces will be increased. Certain additional national units will be committed to the major NATO commanders. Specific measures have been approved within these categories of action for improving the conventional capability of NATO's forces. Ministers agreed that the co-ordinated implementation of these measures and the provision of additional budgetary resources to the extent necessary to support them would form part of the NATO force plan for 1969-1973 which will be submitted in January 1969. They also acknowledged that the solidarity of the alliance can be strengthened by co-operation between members to alleviate burdens arising from balance of payments deficits resulting specifically from military expenditures for the collective defence.

9. A year ago ministers affirmed in the report on the future tasks of the alliance that, while maintaining adequate military strength and political solidarity to deter any aggressor, the alliance should work to promote a policy of détente. The Soviet intervention in Czechoslovakia has seriously set back hopes of settling the outstanding problems which still divide the European continent and Germany and of establishing peace and security in Europe, and threatens certain of the results already achieved in the field of détente. Indeed, in view of the action of the five members of the Warsaw pact, the scope and level of allied contacts with them have had to be reduced.

10. More specifically, prospects for mutual balanced force reductions have suffered a severe set back. Nevertheless, the allies in close consultation are continuing their studies and preparations for a time when the atmosphere for fruitful discussions is more favourable.

11. In any event, consistent with western values the political goal remains that of secure, peaceful and mutually beneficial relations between east and west. The allies are determined to pursue this goal, bearing in mind that the pursuit of détente must not be allowed to split the alliance. The search for peace requires progress, consistent with western security, in the vital fields of disarmament and arms control and continuing efforts to resolve the fundamental issues which divide east and west.

12. The North Atlantic Alliance will continue to stand as the indispensable guarantor of security and the essential foundation for the pursuit of European reconciliation. By its constitution the alliance is of indefinite duration. Recent events have further demonstrated that its continued existence is more than ever necessary. The foreign minister of France recalled that, for its part, unless events in the years to come were to bring about a radical change in east-west relations, the French government considers that the alliance must continue as long as it appears to be necessary.

13. The next ministerial meeting of the council will be held in Washington on 10th and 11th April, 1969.

14. The defence planning committee which met in ministerial session on 14th November will hold its next ministerial meeting in Brussels on 16th January, 1969.

Second report in French and in English of standing committee on fisheries and forestry—Mr. Crossman.

[Note: Text of above report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

CANADA LABOUR STANDARDS CODE

AMENDMENT RESTRICTING APPLICATION TO PHYSICAL MOVEMENT

Mr. Fernand E. Leblanc (Laurier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-130, an Act to amend the Canada Labour (Standards) Code (Application restricted to physical movement).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Leblanc (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, this bill follows a resolution passed in May 1968 by the Canadian Trucking Association and a similar resolution passed by the Quebec Trucking Association Incorporated.

The purpose of this bill is to provide that, when the owner of a motor vehicle transportation business operates both at the interprovincial and provincial levels, only the employees assigned to the operation of vehicles used for interprovincial transportation should be subject to application of this legislation.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NORAD—CONSIDERATION OF CANADIAN COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question arising out of his statement yesterday that in the reassessment of defence policy the government is considering the kind, quality and number of armaments that we will want to commit to NORAD. In light of this, will the Prime Minister say whether, as a result of the agreement signed last March, Canada considers itself committed to participate in NORAD until May 12, 1973?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, NORAD is a control device. It is not one to which any specific number of men, arms or materiel are committed. Each of the members of NORAD decides the input that it will place at NORAD's disposal. The agreement can exist essentially with very little arms from one side or the other. We are a member of NORAD. We have renewed that agreement. The number and kind of armaments put at the disposal of NORAD on the Canadian side is a decision for the Canadian government.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether Canada's continuation in or withdrawal from the NORAD agreement prior to 1973 is one of the matters under examination in the review of defence and foreign policy. My question is directed not to what arms might be provided but to whether we would stay in or withdraw from the agreement itself. Is this question under review?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, if we decided to withdraw our arms at the disposition of NORAD, technically we could stay in the agreement but it would be of very little avail.

Mr. Woolliams: It would be a breach of agreement.

Mr. Trudeau: That is why I am indicating that from our point of view the crucial matter is the amount of arms we want to put at the disposition of NORAD. If, as I said, it were practically nil, I suppose that under this hypothesis the agreement would become defunct.

Mr. Stanfield: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Then it would perhaps be correct to say that the continuation in or withdrawal from NORAD itself prior to 1973 is a matter that comes within the terms of the reassessment and review?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, indirectly, Mr. Speaker. Once again I am looking at the hypothesis that we would put no arms there. Then you could say the agreement is continued but there is nothing in it. Therefore the important aspect of the review is what we want to put in. We may decide to put in much more; we may decide that NORAD deserves a much larger commitment of Canadian arms, in which case I would not be prepared to say the agreement would no longer be in effect.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the NORAD agreement specifies that the agreement may be reviewed at any time at the request of either party, is the government giving consideration to asking the United States government to review jointly the NORAD agreement in the near future, or has the Canadian government already made such a proposal to the United States government?

Mr. Trudeau: No, we have not, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Stanfield: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister could advise the house whether the government of Canada is committed now to supplying any equipment, replacements or additions under the existing agreement, or whether in the view of the government any such equipment can be withdrawn at any time. Are there any commitments with regard to supplying equipment now under the NORAD agreement presently in effect?

Mr. Trudeau: As has just been indicated by the previous question, the matter of equipment can be decided from time to time. NORAD is a framework of joint control by the two governments and, as the Leader of the Opposition knows, this joint control exists over the arms that each side decides to put in under the NORAD agreement. It is this decision that we are reviewing now along with other decisions; what kind of a defence policy we need, whether in or out of NATO, in or out of NORAD, and so on.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the Prime Minister's statement that all aspects of NORAD and of Canadian-United States defence in general are being reviewed at the present time, would part of that review consist of the possibility or likelihood of the stationing of additional United States troops in Canada should we decide to reduce our arms commitment?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Trudeau: Of course it is a possibility, but I would not suggest it is a likelihood.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister deny or confirm reports that there is a growing divergence of interpretation between Canada and the United States as to whether the new NORAD agreement allows for the inclusion of an anti-ballistic missile system—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member cannot ask the Prime Minister or a minister to confirm or deny reports.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the right hon. gentleman could indicate whether the establishment of the light anti-ballistic missile system in the United States will come under the organizational command of NORAD.

Mr. Trudeau: I would have to check, Mr Speaker, but my recollection is that it would not.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I would like to ask the Prime Minister the following question. In view of the fantasy, the almost make-believe world that is being placed before us by the Prime Minister and woven by him from day to day, does he not think the Canadian people have the right to fuller information than the uncertainty that is being given to the people of Canada today, in particular today on the question of NORAD? Instead of all this confusion—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —does not the Prime Minister think the time has come to give them facts?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I think the Canadian people have the right to full information. The trouble is that we are in the process of reviewing our policy, and if we were to tell them of our policy before reviewing it, there would be little purpose in reviewing it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: We feel it is not beyond the tolerance of the Canadian people to understand that there is a need once in a while to review some of the basic policies which have been established by this government and by previous governments over the years, or over the generations, and I think it is not too much to ask the Canadian people during the period of this review to accept the assumption that the government may or may not change its mind.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I say this to the Prime Minister—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They laugh at the matter of defence on the Liberal side of the house, do they?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is a subject affecting the life and the future of Canadians. I ask the Prime Minister now whether he will give this house an opportunity at an early date to discuss this matter and make known the views of the Canadian people as represented by members here, so that at least parliament will not be a one man show determining the future of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does the review of defence and external policy upon which the government is engaged include a precise assessment of areas in the world where we might increase our external aid if we have money to spare after cutting back on defence expenditures? Can the Prime Minister say what emphasis is being placed on this aspect of the review?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat what I believe I indicated a few days ago to the leader of the New Democratic Party. The question of external aid or international development assistance is very much present in our minds, and we are looking at this aspect of our foreign policy not only with a view to increasing it if possible but also with a view to determining in which areas of the world we could usefully spend more for the people concerned.

Mr. Schreyer: I wonder whether I could rephrase the question I asked a few moments ago and ask the Prime Minister whether the government of Canada is finding any special difficulty in reconciling its interpretation of the NORAD agreement with that of the United States, in connection with the ability of the NORAD agreement to allow for antiballistic missile defence capability.

Mr. Trudeau: There have been no difficulties whatsoever, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Does the Prime Minister agree with the contention that Czechoslovakia upset all our plans in this regard?

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I would ask the Prime Minister when he intends to show to the house the results of Marshall McLuhan's instructions?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we have reached the point where we might go to another subject.

DRUGS

AVAILABILITY OF VACCINE TO COMBAT INFLUENZA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question which has been posed previously to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the serious hold-up in the United States in the manufacture of a vaccine against the newly found Hong Kong flu virus and the extreme urgency of production, would the minister indicate to the house what the situation is in Canada and when he expects the vaccine to be ready for distribution here?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe I gave the hon. member an answer previously, but I assume he was not satisfied with it. I will be pleased to look into the matter again and give him a further answer.

ONTARIO—REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I think I should address to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or perhaps to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Having in mind the announcement made today by the Ontario provincial minister of health that Ontario intends to reduce the price of drugs by at least 15 per cent in the next two months, would the minister consider similar action on the part of the federal government?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has already made his speech on second reading of a bill designed to deal with this over-all subject matter. That bill will proceed through its various stages and will certainly supplement any effort the provinces may make along the lines given in the story to which the hon. member refers.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON INTERNATIONAL SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the increasing tempo of monetary crises at the international level would the government undertake to have the Minister of Finance make a statement in connection with the present crisis the first time he is back in the house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I believe the Minister of Finance is due in the house tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, and he may well want to answer that question.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): That is not my question. I am asking whether the government is prepared to have the minister make a statement. It is a very simple question.

Mr. Trudeau: The very simple answer is that if such a statement is found useful by the Minister of Finance he will make it.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Without comment, Mr. Speaker, I ask a supplementary question. Has the Prime Minister received any reports with regard to the present crisis from Canada's representatives at the meeting held last week end to deal with this particular situation? Perhaps the Prime Minister might consider some of these monetary crises of rather grave import so far as Canada is concerned also.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer to the first is yes, and to the second, I do, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the course of displaying his mastery of the house perhaps the Prime Minister could indicate whether Canada has made any commitments with regard to credit swap arrangements to support the franc.

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, there have been no commitments. We are of course watching the international monetary situation very intently, but we have no means of predicting what might be done by any of the European governments concerned. We are watching the developments from day to day, but we have not been asked as yet for any specific commitment.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—USE BEING MADE OF HERCULES PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Is it true that the Hercules aircraft affected to the transportation of food and goods to the Biafrans are no longer in any condition to take off?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. On the contrary, the Hercules aircraft in Fernando Po was used this very day to transport refugees to Dahomey and our authorities allowed that aircraft to carry other refugees. I can even add that this aircraft might be used to carry drugs from somewhere in Europe to Nigeria.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

INQUIRY AS TO TELEVISION COVERAGE OF CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. Yesterday he was asked a few questions about the coming conference with the provincial premiers in Ottawa. I should like to know whether that conference will be open to television like the first conference in February, so that all Canadians can see the talent and diplomacy exercised by the Prime Minister which we see here every day.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I take it that the hon. member would not want this to become a one man show. This would displease the right hon. member for Prince Albert. I can say, however, that I have suggested to the provinces that if they are agreeable to this we would have this conference open to television.

CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN MINIMUM WAGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, on October 18 I addressed a question to the Prime Minister in which I asked him whether at the federal-provincial conference in December the question of raising minimum wages across this country could be considered, because of the importance of raising the living standards of the four million Canadians who live in poverty. Has the Prime Minister arranged to have this matter placed on the agenda of that conference to be considered at that time?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Arising from the discussions at the conference last February we are putting on the agenda of this conference the subject of regional disparity. This will permit us to correct some of the economic inequities which concern the hon. member so deeply.

Mr. Hees: Because the question of raising minimum wages is so fundamental and important I ask the Prime Minister whether this matter could be considered.

Mr. Trudeau: When put as specifically as that, I fail to see that it should be the subject for a constitutional conference. I know of nothing which would prevent the provinces raising their minimum rates, or that would prevent the federal government raising its minimum rates in areas under their respective jurisdictions. I fail to see how this is a matter for constitutional debate.

Mr. Hees: Does the Prime Minister not agree that if the Prime Minister and the government would set the example by raising the minimum rate, which has not been done for three years, this might—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member's final supplementary is argumentative.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul St. Pierre (Coast Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works in relation to the construction of a new highway bridge across the Fraser river, built by a Chilcotin rancher named Rudy Johnson. In spite of the fact that no public money of any sort was spent on this useful public work, does the minister plan to accept an invitation to the official opening ceremonies both as an honoured guest and as an interested observer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has conveyed his invitation.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he received a telegram this morning from the Liberal association of Burnaby-Seymour strongly protesting the fact that the Prime Minister obviously does not know who the Liberal member for Burnaby-Seymour is?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

An hon. Member: Who the hell is he?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Oh, let him answer.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I did not receive such a hypothetical telegram. If it is of interest, and for the record, I never suggested I did not know who the member was. I asked, sotto voce, where the hell the minister was.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: Oh, no, that's not—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question was in order in the first instance. I allowed the Prime Minister to answer only because the hon. member suggested I should do so.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: I know where the minister is—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest there should not be a supplementary question. If the hon. member has another, I will allow it.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Minister of Agriculture was expressing government policy when he stated to a meeting last night that many farmers were ignorant of the basic economic laws of business management.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CROWN ASSETS

REPORTED INTENTION TO SELL SABRE JET PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Defence Production. Would the minister advise the house how far negotiations have proceeded with regard to the sale of 26 Sabre jets to a United States arms dealer.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the 26 aircraft to which the hon. member refers have not as yet been declared surplus to the Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. There may be some confusion in that earlier a set of, I believe, some 22 airframes were offered for sale, and a separate set of 25 Orenda engines. This is the only equipment which has been declared surplus to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. No decision has been made with regard to the disposal of this equipment. If the F-86's are turned over to us we will decide as a matter of policy what will be done with them, but so far they have not been turned over to us.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Is the final decision on this being left until after the government has completed its review of defence policy?

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Would the minister assure the house that the purpose for which the private citizen and the principal for whom he is acting want to buy these planes will be made clear to the government before they are sold?

Mr. Jamieson: Yes; I can give that assurance very categorically.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question arises out of the answer given to the first question. Could the minister tell us why Crown Assets Disposal Corporation would dispose of 22 airframes and 25 separate engines when these put together would make up total aircraft?

Mr. Jamieson: This is not necessarily so, in view of the fact that the planes have also been stripped of all instruments, all firepower and that type of thing. However, I repeat what I said a moment ago, that no decision with regard to the disposal of even airframes or engines separately has as yet been made.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Hales: Mr. Speaker, would the minister then in future see that such news reports are authentic and that the country—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Defence Production to clarify an earlier matter. Did I understand the minister correctly to assert that the government would seriously consider the possibility of selling military aircraft in usable condition to a private purchaser, rather than selling them as disposable material, or scrap material?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether that is the same question that was asked before. I simply stated that there are at the moment no flyable aircraft being offered for sale or turned over to Crown Assets Disposal Corporation. The indication is that within the next few months some F-86 aircraft will be turned over to Crown Assets. When that happens, I undertook to make a policy decision, and I assured the hon. member that at that time, in making that decision we would be very sure that we were completely aware of the ultimate destination and use of such equipment provided, in fact, the decision was to sell it in flyable condition.

[Later:]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Secretary of State or the Acting Secretary of State if he will look into the newscast of the C.B.C., since it comes within his responsibility, and ascertain why they are permitted to make announcements in reference to government sales of surplus aircraft and start a protest movement throughout this country, with protest letters and wires coming to members of parliament objecting to a sale with regard to which the C.B.C. has said a private American has made the highest tender.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

INCREASE IN NEWSPAPER SUBSCRIPTIONS FOLLOWING POSTAL INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Postmaster General. Is the minister aware of the advertisement published today in the newspaper Le Soleil of Quebec City concerning the Kierans act, or Bill No. C-116, which reads as follows:

To our regret, we have to increase our subscription rates—mail delivery—from $15 to $30 yearly as from April 1, 1969.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should put his question now.

Mr. Caouette: Is the minister in a position to tell us what steps he intends to take to prevent such increases?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The right honourable member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, the minister was ready to answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CRITERIA CONSIDERED IN CLOSING OF OFFICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Postmaster General.

For a month or so, members have been receiving letters from the Postmaster General regarding his decision to close down post offices in the various ridings. In my constituency, three post offices have already been closed down.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask a question.

Mr. Asselin: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Here it is. On what basis does he apply such a policy?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the minister for a general statement, which the minister should do on motions.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can give a reply in a few words.

Two or three conditions are required to close down a post office. For instance, when a post office serves fewer than 30 families, when the income is less than $1,000 and when the administration costs of the office amount to $2,000 or $3,000, and when it is possible to introduce a rural route service, then the closing down of the post office is considered.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

Does the minister also take into account the fact that although a post office may not be profitable, it does help the people?

Mr. Kierans: As far as we are concerned, a rural route service helps the people better.

REQUEST FOR STAMP COMMEMORATING JEANNE-MANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Since the international convention of nurses will be held in Montreal, in June 1969, would the minister be willing to issue a postage stamp representing Jeanne Mance, the first Canadian nurse belonging to the laity?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION INCREASING PENSIONS AND ALLOWANCES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the number of veterans who today find themselves in a very difficult position by reason of the high cost of living, will the Minister of Veterans Affairs let the country know when the legislation in respect of increased pensions and war veterans allowances will be before the house, and in particular, when the necessary resolutions will be placed on the order paper?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dube (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows there was an increase in pensions of 15 per cent in 1968. This matter of increasing pensions is always under consideration, and any announcements to be made will be made in due course.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to ask about war veterans allowances. Is any consideration being given in this regard; and when the minister is answering perhaps he will also tell the house whether it is because of this reassessment of defence policies that no action is being taken for the veterans.

Mr. Dube: No, Mr. Speaker. Obviously there is no relationship at all between the two. The matter of allowances is always under consideration.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HALIFAX—REPORTED REDUCTION IN HOSPITAL SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Veterans Affairs relating to a statement he made in the house on Thursday last, in which he indicated there were no cutbacks in administration at Camp Hill. Having assured the house that no cutbacks have taken place, can the minister now assure the house that there is no intention of cutting back?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can. There were no cutbacks, and there will be none.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CARD SYSTEM FOR DRUG DISTRIBUTION TO INDIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is now in a position to say when his department will be substituting the card system for the list system for identifying Indian people who are entitled to free drugs, to which he referred last Wednesday.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker. We certainly hope to start dealing with this in the next month to six weeks. As I understand it the list system is only practiced in British Columbia.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Speaker, when this system is brought into effect can the minister assure the house that this will completely do away with the lists which are now on hand in various drugstores throughout British Columbia?

Mr. Munro: I certainly think so, and this will be a far better system.

Mr. Simpson: Would the minister consider withdrawing these lists and having them returned to the departments from which they were issued?

Mr. Munro: With the card system, that is what we have in mind.

[Mr. Dubé.]

CARE OF INDIANS IN TUBERCULOSIS AND MENTAL HOSPITALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare arising from the minister's undertaking to the federal-provincial national conference that the decision to turn over responsibility for Indians in tuberculosis and mental hospitals in the provinces would be reconsidered by a senior committee of deputy ministers. Will the minister say whether this review has been completed and, if so, with what result? If it has not, can the minister advise when he expects the review to be completed?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the principle of this reconsideration put forward, was to have further studies by such a committee. The committee is just getting under way now. As I indicated, it is a committee of officials and deputy ministers, and it will take some time before that review is completed.

REQUEST FOR WHITE PAPER ON SMOKING AND LUNG CANCER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in view of the very serious increase in cancer of the lung with its very high mortality and morbidity, and the established link with cigarette smoking, whether he will advise the house if a white paper will be tabled, and when the house may expect it.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer at this time to take this question as notice.

[Later:]

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, my question now becomes a supplementary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. As a result of the bulletins published by his department and various other publications, indicating the increasing incidence of lung cancer due to heavy smoking, I was wondering whether the minister was considering giving up reading.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

NEWFOUNDLAND—TENDERS FOR PURCHASE OF DRIED SALT COD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries having regard to the petition he received on behalf of Newfoundland fishermen of the northwest coast for the purchase of dried salt cod and the closing of tenders yesterday. Can the minister advise whether the price as requested in the petition will be met?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I do not know, Mr. Speaker, but I will make inquiries.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statements claimed to have been made by the Minister of Defence Production that merchants are acting in poor faith in respect of this plan, can the minister say whether the present arrangement of having merchants tender to the government for the purchase of the fishermen's fish is going to have the effect of tragically low prices being paid to the primary producers?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that the question as asked is not in order.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR DRAFT OF PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE CHANGES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the other day, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asked what had happened to the amendment projects to the Indian Act to which my predecessor had referred, as reported in Hansard on December 11, 1967.

The former minister was then considering some political matters concerning the Indian Act, following meetings held with Indian representatives. These questions were published later in a booklet entitled Choosing a path, which was forwarded to all the Indians. There is no provisional text of the new Indian Act at the present time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MEXICO—ARREST AND DEPORTATION OF CANADIAN JOURNALISTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs. Yesterday I asked him a question, which he promised to answer today, about the deportation of Canadian journalists from Mexico.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The question was whether the embassy in Mexico City was aware of the deportation of two Canadian citizens. The answer is yes; on November 15 the embassy became aware of the story of this detention and deportation. Representations were made to the government of Mexico by our ambassador, who was advised that the two Canadians in question had been detained and deported in their own car to the United States for an offence against the Mexican government regulations relating to the making of films for export purposes. The ambassador protested the lack of advice of this detention and the lack of accessibility by the consular service to the two Canadians, but the deportation had already been carried out.

NATIONAL PARKS

JASPER—CONFIDENTIAL TENDERS FOR LAND FOR TOURIST TRADE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development because time is of the essence. Has he received any complaints from the national parks, and in particular Jasper, in reference to a breach of confidential tenders with regard to land being let for the tourist trade in that area?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have not received any complaint in that connection, but I can assure the hon. member that I will inquire to determine if there is something unusual.

[English]

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the minister makes the investigation will he check to see whether there was any breach of confidentiality, in that tenders were opened prior to the date and shown to other people tendering?

COMMUNICATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MISSION TO FRANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister designate for communications. Will the minister advise whether he will be making an early statement in the house on the lofty question of telecommunications, and especially the results of the Canadian mission to France?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet met with the officers who were spending some time in Bonn last week at the European space conference. I do not anticipate immediately making a statement to the house, but I am certainly anxious to make one when the circumstances justify it.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

NEWFOUNDLAND—COMPLAINTS RESPECTING RESETTLEMENT PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries. Will the minister give urgent consideration to investigating complaints directed against the federal-provincial resettlement program in Newfoundland?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer is yes, Mr. Speaker.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CHURCHILL, MAN.—NEGOTIATIONS ON DEVELOPMENT OF TOWN SITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Can the minister say when he will be in a position to indicate to the cabinet proposals for the development of the town site of Churchill, as indicated by the Prime Minister on October 28?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I think the review in this regard is almost complete and that this will be referred to the cabinet for decision at a very early date.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

PENSIONS

CONSIDERATION OF UNIVERSAL PRINCIPLE OF ESCALATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of the gradual extension of the principle that pensions, having been put into effect, have to be escalated, and in view of the urgency of extending this matter and putting it on a universal basis, has the minister yet established in his department a committee or task force to study this whole question?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as indicated, I believe, earlier this session by the Prime Minister, the whole question of our various welfare programs is under review.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker; pardon me for being persistent. Is the particular question of escalating pensions that have been put into effect included in this review?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker, all matters pertaining to our welfare programs are part of the review.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Richard in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 20925-1, 21045-1, 22001-1 and the heading thereto, 22002-1 and the heading thereto, 22003-1 and the heading thereto, 26325-1, 40938-1, 42761-1 and the heading thereto, 42762-1 and the heading thereto, 44043-1, 44047-1, 47600-1, 56400-1, and 69315-1 and the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. House again in committee of ways and means on a certain proposed resolution to amend the Customs Tariff. The text is attached to Votes and Proceedings of Tuesday, October 22, 1968. Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, on Thursday, November 14, I was participating in this debate. At that time I said that when one considers the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade, commonly known as the Kennedy round, one thinks of the words fait accompli because it was put into force as of January 1. I also stated that when one reviews the Kennedy round—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I would ask the indulgence of some hon. members and request them to take this opportunity to go behind the curtains and carry on their conversations elsewhere, please.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gilbert: I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that when one considers the effect of the Kennedy round negotiations one finds no substantial reduction in effective protection resulting therefrom. In some cases there is higher protection than there was before. This has been the finding of the Economic Council of Canada which made a detailed study of the Kennedy round recommendations. They found that there was no reduction in effective protection as a result of these negotiations.

One of the recommendations the Economic Council of Canada made was that there should be an accelerated reduction of tariffs as one way of dealing with persistent price and cost increases in Canada. This recommendation was rejected by the Prime Minister in his statement on September 12, and has been rejected by the Minister of Finance in his recent budget. The approach of the Minister of Finance to the handling of the price and cost increases we are experiencing in Canada has been to create a slack economy, to create more unemployment. This is contrary to one of the methods recommended by the Economic Council of Canada.

I said on that evening that Canada must have a free trade policy in order to develop her economic and productive strength. The experience Canadians have had has been that restrictions have been imposed by the government which have hindered the development of a real free trade policy for Canada. One of the major restrictions in this regard has been our monetary policy. I stated that our policy with regard to a fixed exchange rate and our attitude and policy regarding foreign exchange reserves have created restrictions on the development of a free trade policy. I quoted extensively from statements made by the present Postmaster General to develop this point. Since many people believe that when we in the New Democratic party set forth a principle that principle is not regarded as having any validity by the people in government, I am going to quote again from what the present Postmaster General said back in 1967. I should like to refer to an article he wrote entitled, "The Nation Keepers", in which he referred to foreign guide lines to Canada's economic future. At page 214 the author develops the principle that Canada should have an aggressive trade policy and states:

> If Canada pursues an aggressive free trade policy it is obvious that our fixed exchange rate policy will not work. We will have to go through so many fundamental changes in industrial organization that only a freely moving rate will be able to adjust to the productive process and measure our success or failure in achieving our aims. As J. E. Meade has written, there is no choice for free traders. "Free trade and fixed exchange rates are incompatible in the modern world." This is particularly true for Canada which depends on trade, has a heavily protected manufacturing industry, and is much affected by the slightest changes in the economic policy of its neighbour. Free trade will bring a more efficient use of our resources and expand our possibilities of growth, but these changes cannot possibly work their way through the economy within the constraints of a fixed rate.

These statements were made by the present Postmaster General, and I have yet to hear a government spokesman, including the present Postmaster General, give any forward push to these very necessary principles with regard to the foreign exchange rate policy or foreign exchange reserves. We in the New Democratic party have advocated this principle for quite some time. When we have the Postmaster General enunciating the same principle, when we have the Financial Times of September 23 setting forth the necessity of solving this problem, when on November 14 we have the president of the Royal Bank, Mr. Earl McLaughlin, stating that the exchange rate policy and the foreign exchange reserves are imposing restrictions with regard to free trade, one would hope that the government would take immediate action to achieve the release of these restrictions and have a more definite free trade policy.

The second proposition I set forth last week was that we should examine the industrial structure of our Canadian economy. This, of course, necessitates an in-depth study of foreign ownership in Canada. It was for this reason the Watkins committee made a thorough study of foreign ownership and structure in the Canadian economy. The report to this committee states that in 1964 we had $27 billion of foreign investment, 86 per cent of which was United States investment; 12 per cent investment from the United Kingdom and 8 per cent from other countries. I understand that a projection of the $27 billion in 1964 reveals that the figure is now close to $35 billion. When one reads that in certain industries such as automobile parts and rubber United States investment is 97 per cent, that in chemical products there is 78 per cent control, that in electrical apparatus there is 77 per cent control, one can appreciate the impact of foreign investment in Canada.

It was for this reason the Watkins committee went into such a detailed study concerning the problems of extraterritoriality, branch operations in Canada and multi-national corporations, and an effort was made to determine just what penetration had been made in these particular areas. Mr. Watkins, who was the chairman of this committee on foreign ownership, in an article written for a magazine called Executive in August of 1968 set forth his views concerning foreign investment. At this stage one is not complaining about the general problem of foreign investment because we in Canada invite foreign investment. However, one has to look at the penetration that has been made and the consequences that may follow this domination of our Canadian industry. Mr. Watkins said:

> The amount of foreign investment, or foreign ownership, is not an issue in and of itself. There is no virtue in trying to minimize it for its own sake. I suspect that most people in this audience would readily agree with that proposition. If so, you ought also to agree that neither is there any virtue in trying to maximize the level of foreign ownership in Canada for its own sake. Unfortunately, some important groups in this country at least give the appearance of having fallen victim to the latter fallacy.

Then he sets forth just what the approach of Canada should be.

> What we should want is to maximize the net benefits from foreign investments, in order to have as large benefits as possible, by increasing benefits and decreasing costs. Basically, this means using public policy to increase the economic benefits and decrease the political costs from foreign ownership. It means using foreign investment in such a way as to get the largest possible increase in the standard of living for Canadians, and to get the smallest possible reduction in our sovereignty and our economic and political independence.

I am sure that Canadians would agree with the ultimate goal for which we are striving with regard to the part foreign ownership should play in the Canadian economy. This is why the Watkins report recommended tariff reductions so as to increase economic benefits from foreign investment. As Mr. Watkins says, Mr. Chairman:

• (3:30 p.m.)

> Tariff reduction is not a universal panacea to solve all our problems, as some of my colleagues in economics seem sometimes to imply, and it might well exacerbate some of these problems. The structure of Canadian industry is frequently one of too many and too small firms. There is a need for fewer and larger firms, or rationalization. Tariff reduction, by permitting import competition, provides a spur for rationalization and some protection for the consumer after rationalization, but it does not in itself provide the means for rationalization. There remains a need for capital, for leadership, for planning.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

This is why the Canadian economy must face the problem of extraterritoriality. The approach of the Watkins report to this problem is this:

> The actual problems of extraterritoriality arise for Canada from the intrusion of United States law via the medium of the American-controlled subsidiary resident in Canada with respect to trade with certain Community countries, with respect to compliance with the decrees of American courts in the matter of anti-trust policy, and with respect to American balance of payments policy.
> In each case, the report put forward recommendations that would create Canadian law and administrative agencies that would attempt to nullify and countervail the American intrusion. United States law and policy forbid, in effect, American firms and their subsidiaries to trade with nations designated as enemies—Mainland China, North Viet Nam, North Korea and Cuba. The report recommends that Canada create a government export trade agency to oversee such Canadian trade with these countries as is consistent with Canadian foreign policy, and, as a last resort, require American controlled firms to fill bona fide orders which would otherwise be lost to Canada.

One of the approaches taken to extraterritoriality is the setting up of an export trade agency to take care of the problem that has confronted Canadian subsidiaries of United States parents in regard to trading with the enemy legislation and so forth.

The approach to branch plant operation can be stated in this way:

> But the real issue in this regard may turn out to be whether American-controlled firms are able to enter into rationalization agreements promoted by the Canadian government. American anti-trust law may inhibit such activities on the grounds that they involve collusion between firms. In so far as rationalization programs appear to be essential if Canadian industrial efficiency is to be increased in a dramatic, but orderly way, it is important to have the Canadian interest clarified. Present rudimentary consulting arrangements between Canadian and American authorities amount to little more than the Canadian authorities being kept informed. The strengthening of these arrangements hinges on Canada articulating its interests so that they will be given greater weight by the United States. This will require a clear Canadian legal position which the American parents of Canadian subsidiaries can point to when they are asked to do things which violate American law but are desired by the Canadian government.

The balance of payments problem was set forth by Mr. Watkins in these words:

> The issue of the application of United States balance of payments policy to the subsidiaries of American corporations has been very much alive in recent months. While the United States has been applying voluntary controls for some time, it issued new mandatory controls on direct investment just as the report was being completed. Since the report was issued, Canada has been exempted. Given the disastrous consequences of these controls for the Canadian dollar, the exemptions can only be regarded as a welcome development.

The other more important matter, Mr. Chairman, is the problem of the rationalization of Canadian industry. I think it is agreed among Canadian manufacturers that they must broaden the base of exports. At the moment we have a 65 per cent dependency on exports to the United States. As one studies the problem one feels that Canada has opted out in favour of economic integration with the United States. I think this was the main contention between the hon. Walter Gordon, who stood for nationalism, and Mr. Winters and the present Secretary of State for External Affairs, who stood for continentalism. It appears at the moment that the continentalists have won out. One feels the gradual opting out by the government in favour of economic integration with the United States.

When one reads the speeches of the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce one feels that he simply takes as an accomplished fact that we should follow the course of economic integration. I find it quite strange that this minister, in view of the riding he represents and the province from which he comes, would accept this as almost a fait accompli.

We have also been given guide lines for the good Canadian, corporate citizen as set forth by the former minister of trade and commerce. It has been said that this approach is the Boy Scout approach to the tackling of the main problem of rationalization and the penetration of foreign investment in Canada.

The problem of rationalization, Mr. Chairman, is not an easy one. I can recall sitting as a member of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs and hearing the president of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce setting forth a particular problem. This gentleman is also president of Electrohome. He said that in Canada there are nine manufacturers of television sets, seven of which are U.S. owned, the remaining two being Canadian owned, Electrohome and Clairtone.

With regard to Clairtone, Mr. Chairman, one can appreciate the problems that that company faced in Canada. It was part of the program of the government of the province of Nova Scotia to help the company in their financing so that they could penetrate the northeastern sector of the United States. However, they have run into difficulty, and without the aid and assistance of the government of Nova Scotia they would experience real problems.

So far as Electrohome is concerned, when they attempted to penetrate the U.S. market they found a resistance by the dealers in the U.S. in the matter of servicing these Canadian produced Electrohome sets. One readily appreciates the problem of rationalization in this instance of seven U.S. owned companies and two Canadian owned companies in a rather large field of endeavour.

Turning to the automobile industry, Mr. Chairman, we in Canada are almost 100 per cent dependent on the U.S. owned automobile industry in Canada. A small country like Sweden, with less than eight million people, has been able to stake out for itself an automotive industry which has been very successful not only in Sweden but has expanded to England, France, Italy and Japan. Yet, as I say, Mr. Chairman, we in Canada are almost 100 per cent dependent on our United States friends.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Continue.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The hon. member for York North.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested to hear hon. members speaking in this debate and the variety of points they expressed.

Mr. Saltsman: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the hon. member would excuse me, I believe the hon. member for Broadview received the consent of the house to continue for a few moments to complete his speech.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. No such permission was requested and that is why the Chair did not ask for it. If the hon. member for York North is willing to allow the hon. member for Broadview to continue his speech, I will ask for the consent of the committee.

Mr. Gilbert: If I can have only three more minutes I will be able to complete my speech.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Would the hon. member for York North allow the hon. member for Broadview the time to complete his speech?

Mr. Danson: By all means, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the hon. member for York North and all members of the committee for permitting me to complete my speech.

I pointed out the problem we have with regard to the automobile industry. It could be said we have the same problem with regard to the chemical industry in Canada because between 70 and 80 per cent of that industry is foreign owned. If anything has come out of the Watkins report it has been the recommendation that we develop the Canada Development Corporation which would attempt to spur more activity with regard to Canada's participation in exports. It would provide the necessary capital and impetus to develop a strong Canadian economy which would not be totally dependent on foreign ownership.

There is also the problem of research. Research must be initiated by the government to give some of the industries in Canada the necessary know-how and help in order to compete with foreign companies.

I was hoping to speak on some of the problems that Canadian industries experience in Canada with non-tariff items. However, I will leave that to the next opportunity. I wish to express again my thanks for the extra time given to me.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to hon. members speaking in this debate and have noted a variety of viewpoints expressed. These have all indicated the hope of increased trade, or perhaps I should say a continuing increase in an already expanding trade pattern which is very gratifying indeed.

There are those who advocate virtually unbridled free trade and those who tend to overprotect. In my opinion the answer is one of balance. This word "balance" has become a favourite of mine in recent years, and perhaps that is why I am a Liberal. Some call us a party of the middle of the road, which may be just another way of expressing balance. We in this party run the whole gamut of viewpoints, bringing about the creative tensions that result in solutions which do in fact give balance to our policies.

[The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard).]

I might say that previously my favourite word was "dispassionate", but I do not think one can make progress, or even workable political decisions, completely devoid of passion. Here too we must seek a balance between overemotionalism and clinical objectivity. I might say that as I grow older I have an increasingly nostalgic attitude toward passion, or, as some say, "nostalgia just is not what it used to be".

I too look forward to the day when we can have true free trade. To rush into this blindly, however, would be the height of folly. It is necessary to exercise a healthy degree of economic nationalism to prepare ourselves for the increasing degree of free trade which we are currently experiencing and which we face in the future. Very much the same applies to our increasingly international society. Our internationalism must be tempered with a realistic degree of nationalism in order that we may contribute, compete, and even survive as a nation.

These are ideals to which we aspire, just as a just society is an ideal. Without such ideals we have either no purpose or a distorted purpose on which to base our present policies and actions.

I was very much impressed with the message of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance last Thursday night when he explained some facets of the results of the Kennedy round negotiations. When the machinery tariff legislation was being prepared I participated in representations by my industry to the Department of Industry and the Department of National Revenue. We were apprehensive about some aspects of this legislation and saw many possible loopholes. Since the Kennedy round reductions have been in force we have found that these apprehensions were unfounded. The proper administration of the legislation and, more important, the spirit of the legislation, have resulted in a far more favourable economic climate and the elimination of much which was distasteful in prior legislation.

My own company is engaged in the manufacture and distribution of machinery for the plastics industry, and I am aware of what have proved to be ill-founded concerns on behalf of our industry. Even so, I was pleasantly amazed to learn from the parliamentary secretary that there has not been a single complaint. This has very much affected my attitude toward the proposed anti-dumping legislation as a member of the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs which is studying it. We have tended to look at every conceivable abuse of the anti-dumping code that is possible, both by industry and by improper administration by government. In hearing the representations from industry groups I sense the same type of apprehension that existed prior to the implementation of the tariff legislation to which I previously referred.

I doubt that it is possible to draft legislation that is absolutely foolproof. If it is possible, I suspect that the result would be bad legislation, legislation so tight and so completely restrictive that it could prove negative in its implementation.

What we have in the proposed anti-dumping code is a distinct improvement over prior practices. It depends for its effectiveness on an alert business community and its intelligent discretionary interpretation and administration by the appropriate government officials. This has been demonstrated in the machinery tariffs, and I have no fear that it will be any less effective when the new anti-dumping code is implemented.

What we are dealing with is a new spirit in international trade negotiations, a spirit which gives greater opportunity while at the same time giving reasonable and necessary protection. It is true that we are somewhat vulnerable, but only if we sit back and let the legislation become more effective than our energy and our spirit of enterprise. It presents a challenge to Canadian industry to compete, but it also offers us the great opportunity to exploit export markets that were virtually denied to us previously. If we cannot survive in this new atmosphere it will only be because we do not deserve to, and if we cannot survive under this new set of conditions we will be annihilated under free trade.

The automotive trade agreement is another example of change which many feared but which is resulting in benefits to our economy that were otherwise unobtainable. This particular legislation is not without its difficulties or its dangers, and to these we must be alert. The net result to date, however, has been an unqualified gain commensurate with fairness to both countries involved. If it were not for its scale it could well be looked upon as prototype legislation, the pattern of which might be followed by other industries. It may prove to be the most desirable method of achieving free or close to free trade which we can devise and still retain our sovereignty.

The message I am trying to convey is that we, and by "we" I mean industry, labour and government, must be prepared not only to meet change but to seek it. We must look for greater opportunity, which will require greater inventiveness, imagination, skills and plain hard work. At the same time, we must exercise due and reasonable caution to make certain our legitimate self-interests are properly protected.

It is in this vein that I approach the report of the task force on the structure of Canadian Industry, familiarly known as the Watkins report. I have made only a cursory study of it and my observations are necessarily subjective, as the proprietor of a modest business largely confined to the plastics industry. My associations are overseas to a great extent, but also largely in the United States, and involve close associations with leaders of multi national companies, particularly in the chemical industry. It is with this orientation that I view the report.

I think, however, that the Watkins Report deserves serious study. My observations at this time are necessarily short and superficial. They are intended, however, to introduce and stimulate further discussion on a subject which has been much misunderstood. In Professor Watkins' own words:

> If all of our proposals were put into effect, Canada would still have one of the most liberal policies toward foreign direct investment in the world. Foreign corporations should still find Canada a profitable place to invest.

I think Professor Watkins is purposely understating in this context as we would still have more liberal policies than almost any developed nation in the world, nations to which foreign capital is flowing steadily.

In my opinion, the spirit and direction of the report are not at all incompatible with maintaining the necessary climate to continue to attract foreign capital and know-how. The exception is a possible distasteful reaction to the establishment of a state trading agency to deal with communist countries in certain, well defined situations. The intent, as specifically defined in the report, however, is not without merit. It deals with licensing arrangements, amongst other things, which are frequently the easy way of doing things but which have restricted Canadian companies to the domestic market. Some method of incentives to permit export could be devised. The waiving of the withholding tax on royalties could be considered. Perhaps the production of certain items under licence for export, or export to specific markets, would prove a practical compromise. The greater the export freedom, the greater the incentive. British Commonwealth and other markets could be negotiated. In cases where the product name or design are not the major consideration, where patents or technology are the prime benefits, marketing could be done under a different trade name and with distinctive styling and the entire world market opened up including, or even excluding, the licensor's domestic market.

The report also deals with joint ventures, which I believe require particular encouragement. In many cases a Canadian distributor develops the Canadian market which is then taken over by the foreign manufacturer, who then establishes his own manufacturing facility in Canada. Frequently, the Canadian distributor seeks another similar foreign manufacturer to represent and the cycle repeats itself ad infinitum.

Where the Canadian company is competent, the foreign company should be encouraged to establish a joint venture. My company has had specific experience in this area and is currently forcing negotiations to this end with a leading United States company. The American principals, in turn, are endeavouring to acquire complete control. This could result in (a) the loss of the market by my company, (b) its acquisition by the United States company, or (c) a disassociation of the companies, with the American company establishing its own facility, possibly with government aid, and my company endeavouring to start from the beginning, engineering a new product line and attempting to compete with the one we established in the first instance.

With adequate government encouragement, this situation could be avoided. At present a Canadian company is subject only to its own position in the Canadian market, as opposed to the already established position and far greater resources of the American company.

It is particularly interesting to note that when my company attempted to get federal government assistance some years ago to establish a Canadian facility it was completely frustrated. The Department of Industry did not have an appropriate agency. The closest to such an agency was PAIT, and while its objectives are admirable, its interpretation of its function was far too narrow to be of benefit. In one instance alone this could have established a three million dollar business, two-thirds of which would have been export and the remaining third replacing imports. This was a unique opportunity, and one which no longer exists as foreign companies have since seen and seized the opportunity in what would have been the export market. Without the export market the economics do not justify Canadian engineering for the domestic market. Thus, approximately a million dollars of imports continue and two million dollars in exports are lost.

Another area is assistance to firms in designated areas. Assistance to firms establishing or expanding in designated areas does not, I believe, differentiate between Canadian or foreign controlled companies. I think it would be beneficial to give Canadian companies some additional assistance. It may be well worth considering extending the benefits by a given percentage, maybe 50 per cent, or even 100 per cent, to companies controlled domestically. This should provide incentive for the establishment or expansion of small industries. Unfortunately, the smaller companies frequently do not have the personnel, resources, or the time to pursue the government sponsored programs.

This same problem also applies to Industrial Development Bank assistance. Skilled industrial development officers of the Department of Industry could well advise and expedite far more effectively than at present.

Then there is the matter of guide lines. Government guide lines for good corporate citizenship on the part of foreign companies in Canada are solely dependent on the good will of these companies for effective implementation. Generally they are for motherhood and against sin and are largely ignored, or only lip service is paid to them. I would urge something more effective, with emphasis on incentives rather than penalties.

It may well be worth considering appointing government liaison personnel to work closely with foreign controlled corporations in assisting them to co-operate with our guide lines policy. In the case of new companies entering Canada, they could well assist these companies in locating in this country, establishing domestic contacts and sources of supply, while being guided in the direction of good corporate behaviour.

In my own contact with senior officials of Canadian subsidiaries of foreign corporations, most of whom are Canadians, I have found them eager for more specific guide lines and requirements. Only in this way can they influence their patent companies in New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, or wherever they may be located. These people are practical businessmen and they abide by the laws. If we do not provide more than pious platitudes, they will naturally react in a platitudinous manner.

Research and development, another concern, at present receive assistance in well defined circumstances. There is, however, a need for a more open-ended and open-handed approach. I would suggest that smaller companies be given grants, or preferably tax abatement, for a more free-whelling approach to research and development.

Some time ago I suggested to the Department of Industry that benefits might well accrue to the company and economy if qualified engineering personnel could be hired to seek out areas for development. Such a program might initially involve the hiring of only one person who might well spend the first six months or a year reviewing existing products, scanning the markets, investigating customer requirements domestically and abroad for new equipment or products. A 50-50 cost-sharing program was suggested for a specific period and with a ceiling on expenditures, after which time progress would be reviewed. Following such a period, the arrangement could be continued, terminated, or moved to another agency such as PAIT, if there was sufficient promise. Reasonable care would have to be exercised to ensure the integrity and capability of applicants. The term "reasonable" is used advisedly. While the majority of efforts might well prove fruitless, a small percentage of successes could well pay off handsomely from a brainstorming approach throughout industry. We need a lot more daring.

It is interesting to note that there is an agency called PIDA. This is the Pharmaceutical Industry Development Agency. I just happened to learn about PIDA when studying the new drug legislation with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. From what I have seen of the PIDA plan, it could well serve as a pattern for the type of research encouragement that would give all facets of industry the type of incentive assistance needed for accelerated research and development. This could also ferret out development oriented small companies which could contribute mightily to our progress.

What about selling some of our assets to foreign companies? The sale of minority interests in Canadian corporations to foreign companies with facilities or expertise which may aid materially in their growth might be worthy of consideration.

An example, which for any number of reasons may not be desirable, is Polymer Corporation. Last summer a senior official of an American based international chemical company asked my opinion on the possibility of purchasing Polymer Corporation. I had just become a member of parliament at the time and I did not know it was not mine to sell. He indicated it was felt that currently Polymer has not maintained the growth and profit potential others felt achievable or in keeping with the chemical industry in general. Of course I felt there was no way that this crown jewel of crown corporations could be touched by foreign capital.

If, however, the foreign company could make a significant contribution to the growth of Polymer, perhaps a compromise approach should not be discounted. I therefore asked my friend—I was bargaining on your behalf, gentlemen—if his company would consider purchasing 49 per cent. They wanted 100 per cent. On being pressed he said they would consider 50 per cent. On being asked if they would consider 49 per cent as the only possibility, he answered affirmatively.

The point in this exchange was to determine how much Canada can get when we are in a position of strength, be it Polymer Corporation, mineral deposits, or any other assets which are attractive to foreign interests. I suspect that we could do appreciably better than we have in the past, particularly on new development, with the Canada Development Corporation providing the domestic capital where it was not previously available.

The converse may also have merit. Canadian investment in non-resident foreign companies, particularly to acquire technology, markets and management, may well be worth consideration. Within a week of the previous exchange on Polymer Corporation last summer I was visiting a privately owned U.S. corporation in Indiana, with which my company is associated and which is a world leader in its field. The purpose of the visit was to determine the reason for certain inefficiencies which were developing. Following exploration it became apparent that some of the frequent failings of several generations of family management were responsible.

It is quite likely that this company could be acquired and part of its production transferred to Canada. It is engaged in the production of machinery of which Canada is a major importer. The potential of the company is sufficient to maintain the efficient operation of the American facilities without considering export from the United States. Similar Canadian facilities such as Canadian Vickers, Canadian Machinery Company, Dominion Engineering, Sherbrooke Machineries, John Bertram and Sons, and many others, frequently operate below capacity or on a boom or bust basis.

The Canadian and export production, even some of the United States requirements of the Indiana company, could be manufactured in Canada in what are currently marginal operations. Excellent second echelon management and engineering skills already exist in the American company, though these may well be dissipated if the existing family management continues its rather demoralizing course.

The point I am trying to make is that Canadian industry might well join the growing family of international corporations. A company like Polymer, already international but with a relatively restricted product range, may well develop better by association and the sale of minority holdings to a foreign company. It is possible that by a sale for stock it could acquire a controlling interest in the foreign company. This might be a good reason to sell 100 per cent. By selling 100 per cent of a company like Polymer to a much larger American company this might give us the leverage to control. We should not discount these things completely. Failing this, however, the proceeds from a cash sale of minority stock could enable the crown or the Canada Development Corporation to acquire a foreign company that would be profitable and also facilitate the establishment of heretofore unavailable major Canadian operations.

Subsequent to the establishment of the Canada Development Corporation it may be wise to include in our guidelines or legislation—I prefer legislation—a proviso that in the event of sale of a controlling or significant interest in Canadian companies the Canada Development Corporation be given the right of first refusal. This should go beyond the present intent of discouraging further Canadian companies being sold to foreign interests, but to apply particularly to assets already foreign owned, the recent Brinco-Rio-Tinto-Bethlehem deal being an example where it may have been prudent to have Canadians, through the Canada Development Corporation, in control of the Churchill Falls development. In any event it would have been somewhat gratifying to have at the least Canadians participate in a decision affecting a major natural resource and public utility.

[Mr. Danson.]

All of this, Mr. Chairman, must include a study of our educational goals. Education in the various skills requisite to an industrial economy cannot be overlooked in any program or legislation for Canadians to assume a more effective role in their own future. The superior management skills of the United States are sadly lacking in this country. Top calibre graduate schools in management, as well as engineering, law, economics and other fields, are essential if we are to keep pace in a far more complex and highly technological society and economy. The federal government could set the pace by determining which of our universities are best suited to establish schools of international stature in specific disciplines and providing the necessary funds. Highest priority should be given to schools of business management.

As I said previously, these are in the nature of random comments from perhaps a narrow viewpoint. My hope is that they may help get the Watkins report off the shelves in government, academic and corporate offices and into the arena of political discussion, which is where we are now and where my hon. friend from Broadview was when he spoke.

We must avoid being overprotective in our approach. Industry does not require coddling; in fact it suffers from it. It does, in our particular Canadian economic milieu, need the proper climate and encouragement which only government can, and should, provide. As a Canadian businessman, however, I welcome the challenge of the opportunities and competition of a free and open market as long as it is on more or less equal terms.

In my short experience here we have spent a great deal of time, quite properly, discussing the problems of agriculture and fishing. Those from urban areas fully understand that all parts of this country and all aspects of its economy are interdependent. I am sure that those from non-urban areas are equally aware of this and will be equally interested. These exchanges in this house are invaluable in making us aware of one another's problems and sensitive to them. It is only in this house where one can gain this vital perspective, or I prefer to say balance.

Before concluding may I express a word of caution. We must be well aware that the problems about which I have spoken are not the fault of foreign investors. They are problems for which we can only blame ourselves. It is therefore critical to our friendships, international relations and our economy that we do not misconstrue evidence of enlightened self-interest manifested by talk of reasonable economic nationalism. When we speak about foreign investment we are almost always thinking about American investment and American economic, as well as potential political, domination. It would be a tragic error to carry this even close to the point of anti-Americanism for we have no better friends anywhere and our present high standards of living would not have been possible without them.

In my rather extensive relationships with American businessmen I have found them warm, fair and energetic friends who exercise their own reasonable degree of self-interest, combined with a unique generosity that we should nurture and cherish. They are a more vocally patriotic people than we are, but when one explains to them our own love of country, our own social and economic aspirations, they almost always respond with understanding. If we set down reasonable, clearcut rules rather than vague guide lines I am confident that they will continue to participate with us to our mutual benefit.

Quite restrictive rules on foreign investment in countries with far less in common certainly have not deterred the irrepressible and admirable American businessmen. There is no reason to believe that our own really quite modest and positive actions would lessen their desire to profit with us rather than unduly exploit us, because we designed our laws to encourage this or, more accurately, failed to design laws to prevent it. The danger is not from initiative abroad. The danger is from lack of initiative right here.

[Translation]

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, I want to take advantage of the study of the budgetary resolutions concerning the customs tariff to make new representations to the government to get it to grant the necessary protection to two very important industries for the province of Quebec in general and the city of Saint-Hyacinthe in particular, namely the textile and the footwear industries. Those two industries are now facing very serious difficulties and unless the necessary steps are taken, they will both be forced to reduce their staff considerably, a move that will affect the economy of the cities concerned.

Mr. Chairman, the difficulties which the textile industry is now experiencing did not arise suddenly. In fact, I have here some newspaper clippings which indicate the difficult situation in which the textile industry finds itself.

For instance, on December 16, 1966, the Montreal Star published an article entitled "Cotton Mills Upset by Blended Imports" which mentioned the concern felt by Canadian industrialists about imports.

On April 5, 1967, one could read in the Montreal Matin an article entitled "Dominion Textile shuts down the Merchants plant in Montreal". There again it was a plant without enough orders which had first to reduce its staff and then close down.

On April 3, 1967, the newspaper La Voix de l'Est pointed out that the Thor Mills company was faced with a drop in production. The management had to lay off temporarily a number of employees, which caused some concern not only among the workers but also among the municipal authorities.

On May 15, 1968, La Parole of Drummondville, stated the following:

> Templon Spinning Mills is facing serious difficulties because of imports.

Mr. Webster, vice-president of the company, warned employees accordingly.

According to the March 16, 1968 issue of La Voix de l'Est, lay-offs at Esmond Mills, of Granby, resulted from a lack of orders.

We know also, and I dealt with that recently, that Goodyear Company had to lay off 170 employees. Yamaska Shirt Limited, of Saint-Hyacinthe, had to reduce its staff by half, and Victoria Shirt, of Arthabaska, had to close down.

In the Globe and Mail this morning, I read a report to the effect that some Canadian companies had lost as much as 35 per cent of the Canadian market because of imports.

Such a problem, Mr. Chairman, is enough to disturb us and I think the government should take the necessary steps to reassure manufacturers as well as people working in the plants.

Apparel Manufacturers Council of Canada is supposed to meet the cabinet this week and make representations. This manufacturers association would like to set up a quota system restricting the total amount of clothing imports into Canada. We know that at the beginning of last October, representatives of the textile industry, as well as representatives of three trade unions of the province of Quebec, met the cabinet to make known their views and requests that restrictions be imposed on imports of textiles coming from countries where the income is a great deal lower than that of Canadian workers. It is most important that the government should deal with this matter immediately, instead of waiting until it is too late.

According to the Apparel Manufacturers Council of Canada, in certain sectors of the industry, the Canadian market has diminished from 95 per cent to 60 per cent since 1957. These facts, Mr. Chairman, cannot be mentioned without saying or implying that a number of Canadian workers have lost their jobs.

Last year, for example, the Canadian textile industry had about 95,000 employees and produced 1 billion dollars' worth of goods. If there is nothing to protect in this industry, I wonder with what industry the government should concern itself. The most worrying competition is that of the low income countries. We are forced to compete with countries which pay their workers 30 or 35 cents an hour, whereas Canadian workers are paid well over $2 an hour.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, for our industries to continue to operate, it is necessary that imports be appraised almost at the same level as the corresponding Canadian products. Otherwise, the textile industry—maybe also the shoe industry—is doomed to disappear, sooner or later.

In 1967, for example, always according to the association I mentioned above, there were 74 fewer clothing manufacturers than in 1966. Within twelve months only, Mr. Chairman, 74 closed down. In my opinion, that is a reason for the government to act. If it wants to establish a just society, it must see to it, first of all, that Canadian workers are treated fairly.

Of course, the question is not to stop trading with foreign countries. We are all in favour, provided that it is not always at the expense of the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Chairman, I should now like to make a few remarks concerning the shoe industry.

The shoe industry is also faced with very unfavourable conditions because of imports from underdeveloped countries. I have here a brief presented to the federal cabinet on November 16, 1967. In this booklet, we see for instance that the leaders of the industry are concerned about the fate of their industry, sooner or later, if their recommendations to the government are not implemented soon.

In this brief, I read the following:

In 1965, 1966, and earlier this year, the Shoe Manufacturers Association submitted to the Canadian committee on tariff and trade a series of briefs dealing with the Kennedy Round then in progress. In the hope that the document and representations contained in these briefs can prove useful to those who, in the future, will study the problems of the shoe industry, we are including copies for reference purposes.

We are deeply interested in the work of your committee for, in the past, the Department of National Revenue did very little as a result of our reiterated protests against the low and ill-founded customs appraisal on shoes, which are increasingly exported to Canada from Czechoslovakia and other communist countries in Central Europe.

The existence of a situation that is clearly detrimental to a specific segment of the Canadian shoe industry is the very basis of our claims and problems, as yet unsolved, which we have time and time again been submitted to the federal authorities with regard to the dumping of Czechoslovakian shoes; consequently, the Shoe Manufacturers Association considers that it is urgent and imperative to pass legislation conforming with the GATT anti-dumping code and the legitimate aspirations of the shoe industry in Canada.

What dangers do the officials of the shoe industry foresee? I continue my quotation:

The dangers threatening the shoe industry are above all, as follow:

(1) Japan, Hong Kong, Pakistan, India, Formosa, countries where the wage level is very low, and where the law of supply and demand frees a huge quantity of shoes for overseas dumping;

(2) Czechoslovakia, Poland, China and other communist countries where industries are owned by state controlled agencies that can sell goods elsewhere, at any price, the production cost of which no one knows;

(3) European countries with low wage scales, such as Spain and Italy.

And the officials remind us that:

The Minister of Finance stated that the government "intends to see to it that in Canada the anti-dumping duties are promptly and efficiently applied".

Mr. Chairman, when one knows that, since 1963, 29 shoe factories were forced to close down and that, among those, 13 were located in the province of Quebec, it is easy to understand why I should want to point out to the government this important matter of the progressive loss of industries which, at one time, were closely related to the economic structure of our cities, particularly in Quebec.

• (4:20 p.m.)

And the last part of the brief reads as follows:

We firmly believe that a full definition of the domestic policy of the federal government is essential to issue directives:

(1) To those whose responsibility it is to formulate new legislation;

(2) To those who are appointed to see to it that the legislation to be amended is administered quickly and effectively;

(3) To those who could appear before the new board to ask for its help.

Could we be allowed to say with the greatest conviction that at the same time the code is put into force, it will be most urgent to make important changes in the organization and operation of several government agencies which administer the code and the Customs Act, as otherwise footwear manufacturers will have to face dumping and discrimination on a larger scale.

The words "quickly" and "effectively" used by Mr. Sharp should be printed in large type and posted in all offices occupied by senior officials who administer the code.

Mr. Chairman, in view of what that brief says, it is easy to see that the business leaders in the footwear and textile industries are worried and asking to be protected, not in such a way as to eliminate competition but to continue in business, because they are convinced that they contribute to the development and the growth of our country.

Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed, before ending my remarks, to read a few extracts from a speech made by Mr. F. S. McCarthy, vice-president of Du Pont of Canada Limited, at the round table on the industry's opinion about Canada-U.S. free trade, at the annual congress of the Canadian Textile Institute held in Quebec City on June 14, 1968. I quote:

As a Canadian and businessman, I feel that the growth and development of the Canadian economy —if not the Canadian identity itself—are seriously jeopardized. That danger is imputable to the ever-spreading belief that free trade—or at least a much freer trade—would indisputably be advantageous to Canada.

A little further, he said:

I maintain that the amendments to tariffs and anti-dumping policies by the Kennedy Round agreements will have a very unfavourable incidence on the Canadian industry of synthetic fibres. Any other measure for the total abolition of tariffs and anti-dumping policies would gradually emphasize such an incidence to the point of stagnation and eventual disappearance of the industry in Canada.

Those are very serious warnings which should not be dealt with without due consideration.

Further, Mr. McCarthy said:

However, as free trade will have the effect of eliminating as it were the reasons for the existence of Canadian manufacturers of synthetic fibres, there would be no reason for enlarging existing plants. Any increase in the demand on the domestic market would rather be met by a slight increase of production in United States plants or by a marginal enlargement of established plants. Likewise, existing Canadian plants would not be modernized for producing new improved products which will surely appear on the market. This means that, in an industry such as that of synthetic fibres, where products and manufacturing processes change with a startling rapidity, established plants would not be long in becoming obsolete.

Similarly, as free trade eliminates the possibility of manufacturing new products in Canada, there will be no more justification for assigning expenditures to research in our country.

That is indeed a very dark picture, but there is even worse. In view of the strong American hold on our industry, the logical attitude in the face of an essentially North American market would tend towards centralizing the decisions within the American parent company; this means that the Canadian industry would become a mere subsidiary within the overall organization. Indeed, production costs in Canada could be reduced by transferring numerous administrative functions to the parent company. However, that would mean a loss for Canada of administrative, management, technical and research positions.

Mr. Chairman, I trust the parliamentary secretary to the minister (Mr. Gray) will take into account the warnings of a competent businessman and see to it that our industry is not constantly struggling against increasing difficulties which result in Canadians being thrown out of their jobs while they deserve to be protected and to earn an honourable living.

[English]

Mr. Burton: Mr. Chairman, when the Kennedy round of negotiations was first undertaken there were great hopes and expectations as to what might be achieved. Now that the negotiations have been concluded we can take a look at the results. I think it will be generally agreed that there have been modest though significant achievements in some areas of world trade. However, in spite of the progress that has been made I think we should take care not to overestimate the impact of the changes that have resulted from this round of negotiations. This point was made by Mr. David Slater in an article in "The Canadian Banker" of autumn, 1967, when he concluded:

One should thus be sceptical of the allegations that tariff levels on industrial products will be at very low levels after the Kennedy round agreements are in force.

These gains could be wiped out very quickly if there are any significant changes in world attitudes toward trade and trade problems. I think this fact does demonstrate the need for continuing efforts to free world trade from both the tariff and the non-tariff barriers which still impede the free movement of goods. Some of the concerns with respect to trade and the changes that are being introduced in the house at this time have already been discussed by some of my colleagues, and I do not intend to go over the same ground again. However, I would like to take two areas of concern and discuss them this afternoon. The first area is with respect to some of the concerns regarding the agricultural industry. Agriculture, of course, is very vitally concerned and interested in the Kennedy round agreements.

First of all, one development of the negotiations was the conclusion of the international grains arrangement. I think it was generally agreed that this was a distinct achievement in the field of world trade. However, in spite of this achievement and the gains made, it is now apparent and clear that there are some very serious problems with respect to world trade in grain. These problems have developed in spite of the achievements accomplished through the conclusion of the international grains arrangement. The details of some of these problems I will leave for discussion on another occasion.

I think we should also take note of the general pattern of tariff changes which has resulted from the Kennedy round, particularly with respect to the impact upon industrial products and agricultural products. Mr. David Slater, in the same article to which I referred a few moments ago, also commented on this aspect of the negotiations. Mr. Slater stated, as found on page 6 of "The Canadian Banker" of autumn, 1967:

> The Kennedy round negotiated a multi-national cut in tariffs on industrial products. Aside from a new international cereals agreement and small cuts on a limited range of agricultural tariffs, little agricultural trade or protectionism was revised. A great disappointment is the failure to reduce significantly the high levels of agricultural protectionism now in the world. We shall deal almost exclusively—

Then he proceeds to deal with some of the aspects of the industrial tariff changes. Later in the same article Mr. Slater notes:

> —the maze of agricultural protectionism and barriers to agricultural trade, which has been accentuated since the early 1920's, remains virtually unchanged by the Kennedy round.

In noting the tariff reductions that have been made in the field of agricultural products, we note that the United States has made some concessions. Some of them have been significant concessions. However, Canada has also made concessions in some agricultural products. Some of the changes as they affect Canada and the United States were summed up in "Foreign Trade" of July 1, 1967, when it was stated:

> Canada and the United States are providing free entry both ways for apples, turnips, maple sugar, maple syrup, certain berries, many grass and forage seeds, hay and straw. Duty reductions of 50 per cent, in parallel with the United States, are made on fresh pork and fresh carrots. In addition, out of season rates are reduced or removed on certain fresh fruits and vegetables, including brussels sprouts, corn on the cob, parsley, radishes, green onions, apricots, sour cherries and plums.

There is a distinct impression and a suspicion in some areas of the agricultural industry that Canada did not come off quite as well as it might have in its negotiations with respect to agricultural products. I have made inquiries of farm organizations in some circles to find whether a full analysis has been made anywhere of the impact of the Kennedy round negotiations on the agricultural industry. While such an analysis may exist, my own search did not turn up an adequate analysis of this matter.

There is great concern with respect to this problem because of the general state of the agricultural industry at the present time and because of concern for the impact of these changes on particular aspects of the Canadian agricultural industry or particular sectors of that industry. The fact is that the agricultural industry is concerned because we see examples of tariff changes which are being applied for on some products of importance to farm people. Most recently there has been an application for an increase in the tariff on twine, which would certainly add to farm costs. As has been noted by the National Farmers' Union, any price increase resulting from the imposition of a tariff on imported binder and baler twine would be borne solely by farmers who possess no means of passing on cost increases.

In some of the hearings in the finance, trade and economic affairs committee, which were referred to by a previous speaker, evidence was taken with respect to the proposed anti-dumping code. One area of concern with respect to the anti-dumping code was its impact on a number of agricultural products which are produced in Canada but which have to face competition from end of season surplus exports from the United States in particular. It was noted by some of the experts who were called before the committee that in fact the anti-dumping code would not help to deal with some of those deeply rooted problems within the area of the specific problem being dealt with in the anti-dumping code. I think this illustrates some of the problems with which we have to wrestle and be concerned about.

I would urge that the government give full study to the impact on the agricultural industry of the various changes and that it keep a continuing watch on and give continuing consideration to the situation facing the agricultural industry, among others. After all, Mr. Chairman, Canadian agriculture does have a vital stake in free trade in the world. This was pointed out in a report on the Conference on International Trade and Canadian Agriculture which was held in Banff in January, 1966. Dr. W. J. Anderson noted in summing up the papers that were given at that conference:

> What should be Canada's attitude towards freedom of international trade in agricultural products? The answer given by the participants, expressed in the final statement, was that freer and expanding trade in these products would be in the best interests of Canadian agriculture and of the country as a whole; they further recommended that the achievement of freer trade, including agricultural products, should be a major objective of governmental policy.

One area of concern, as I was trying to point out a minute ago, is the suspicion and concern that possibly Canada gave more than it received with respect to tariff changes involving agricultural products. The Conference on International Trade and Canadian Agriculture also considered this matter quite extensively, as I have noted. Dr. Anderson, in the article to which I have just referred, went on to discuss further Canada's role with respect to agriculture and world trade. The following question was faced by the conference, according to Dr. Anderson:

> What could Canada do to implement the role of freer trade in the world at large?

He noted a number of discussions that had taken place, as follows:

• (4:40 p.m.)

> The participants concluded that there was an important place for multilateral discussions with the objective of reaching comprehensive agreements on major commodities. These arrangements would be made between importers and exporters covering all aspects of trade, including conditions of access and levels of prices. If it should not be possible to follow a multilateral approach to commodity agreements, then the conference recommended that the next best would be to obtain organized access to the markets of individual importing countries by special arrangements between suppliers and importers; the conference noted that there was already an example of the application of that technique contained in import arrangements used by the United Kingdom.

We should note as well, Mr. Chairman, that Canada is the fourth largest exporter of agricultural products in the world. Canada, in considering its possible role with regard to the agricultural industry, has to note its position in relation to other countries in the world. This point was also discussed at the conference in Banff in January, 1966. Dr. Anderson, in summing up some of the papers presented to the conference, noted some of the points we need to keep in mind. He said:

> A significant point brought out by MacEachern was that Canada maintains an over-all comparative advantage to the rest of the world in agricultural production. There is a relatively stable advantage in a number of products which include wheat, barley, flaxseed, rapeseed, milk production, grade dairy cattle, some cheeses, tobacco, turnips and some fruit. Then there is a competitive advantage relative to the United States which varies by seasons and regions, and includes feeder and slaughter cattle, hogs, eggs, apples and potatoes.
> The competitive advantage which Canada enjoys relative to the rest of the world has been reduced over the past decade or so; this change has been masked by the magnitude of the wheat exports in recent years. MacEachern listed many factors that had contributed to rising costs of production including the high level of industrial activity which served to increase farm wages 4 to 6 per cent per year. The price of purchased inputs has increased at about 3 per cent per year and certain inputs, for example, fertilizer, are more costly in Canada than in most countries. The gain in productivity of about 3 per cent per year has offset some of these costs but not enough to improve the net income of agriculture.
> MacFarlane noted that restraints on trade account for much of the pattern of structural changes in importing countries. These restrains tend to distort the comparative advantage of most farm products. He suggested that Canada may have lagged in the adoption of farm business organization and practices consistent with rapid improvement in efficiency. He said that there is need for improvement in the internal organization and operation of Canadian farms and in product and factor markets. He deemed it particularly important that the relationship of the agriculture of the United States to Canadian agriculture be critically examined in view of its importance as our largest market and strongest competitor.

This, I think, does demonstrate the need for particular concern when the government has tariff changes under consideration. I do not raise the problems affecting the agricultural industry in any way to the exclusion of the problems that will be faced by some other industries as well.

There is a second major point I should like to discuss, and that is the need to achieve some shift in Canada's trading pattern. I think it is recognized and does not need any elaboration that trade with the United States plays a very large role in Canada's total trading pattern, and that some persistent problems have arisen and have continued as a result of this trading pattern.

In discussing this topic, of course, I think we do need to use some common sense economics, if I can put it in that way. I believe it is only natural that Canada should have a great deal of trade with the United States. After all, it is our closest neighbour; it is a country with a high degree of technical and industrial organization. It is only natural, therefore, that a great deal of trade can be carried on by Canada with the United States to our best advantage. However, I think that the point has been made, and can be made quite validly, that it would be to Canada's advantage if we could shift some of our trade to some other parts of the world, countries which would like to trade more with us in order that they could obtain the currency with which they would be able to buy some of the products we export to our advantage and to the advantage of the importing countries as well.

I should like to suggest that one area in which we need to attempt to achieve some shift in terms of our imports is with respect to our trade in light consumer goods. Most of our light consumer goods we now obtain from the United States. I suggest that many of these goods could be obtained from countries other than the United States to our advantage. These goods obtained from other countries would be cheaper or as cheap as goods coming from our present source.

This course would not result in the loss of any jobs for the people of Canada. It would give other countries the purchasing power that would be necessary to purchase some of our exports. It would produce a better balance of trade between Canada and the United States as well as between Canada and some other countries with which we trade. This does not happen at the present time. There is no real impetus to achieve such a shift in trade. I would suggest that this is because there is at the present time a high degree of United States ownership of much Canadian industry and of significant segments of our retail and wholesale distribution systems. This situation develops as a result of the verwithin some of the multi-national corporatical internal lines that have bee ndeveloped tions which now have such an influence on our own economy and on the economies of other countries in the world. I suggest, therefore, that the Canadian government needs to take very strong steps, and needs to take them urgently, to redirect our trade and to achieve a better balance of trade. I stress the fact that the field of light consumer goods is one in which we could take a first step to achieve a better balance of our trade pattern in the world.

Mr. Rodrigue: Mr. Chairman, I was pleased to listen to the statistics mentioned by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard). There is really an alarming situation in the textile industry and in the shoe industry.

Let us look only at the changes that have taken place in the Canadian imports of synthetic fibres. Canadian exports of synthetic fibres and other synthetic products have gone up from 191 million square yards in 1966 to 196 million, but they have not reached the record figure of 197 million square yards of 1965. A large increase in the volume of clothing imports explains the great change that has happened last year on the market by comparison with the previous year. The imports of synthetic textiles—fabrics, various products and clothing—reached in 1967, 123 million square yards, as compared with 113 million in 1966. On the other hand, imports of clothing amounted to 33.5 million square yards in 1967, compared with 21 million square yards in 1966, which gives an increase of 57 per cent.

Due to the increase of Canadian imports and shipments, the total apparent market of synthetic textiles made in Canada rose from 292 million square yards in 1966 to 306.2 million square yards in 1967. Since imports grew more than exports, the part of the total market taken by the domestic industry declined from 61.3 per cent to 59.8 per cent. This, in part, explains the capital expenditures of the last few years. For the year 1967, the amount of capital expenditures is estimated at $51 million, compared with $54 million in 1966, and $88 million in 1965. Moreover, in the year 1968, capital expenditures are expected to be close to $40 million.

This means that there is no longer any confidence in the textile industry. Due to the new free trade agreements among several countries, our position will be even worse, because our population is ten times less than that of our largest competitor, the United States. Even though tremendous efforts have been made in the field of investments during the last ten years and everything possible has been done to reduce administrative costs, to improve our production methods and to decrease our prices, we must meet the very substantial competition from our neighbour to the south that is capable of producing twenty times as much as we can. Although some of their industries do not control their production methods as efficiently as we do, they are still capable of flooding our markets with their surplus products. Furthermore, profits realized by the textile industry do not encourage more investments. For some years, profits have decreased to such an extent that even new investments deriving from those profits have become almost impossible. The situation is really alarming.

Moreover, the majority of the textile industries are located in the province of Quebec and, within a few years, we shall have to deplore the loss of many jobs, which will significantly increase the number of the unemployed in the province of Quebec.

I should like to tell the hon. minister that several textile industries in Quebec are faced with another problem which, in my opinion, is rather significant. It will be necessary to study manufacturing and production costs because of the fact that most of the raw materials have to be imported from outside Canada or from neighbouring provinces, which contributes to increase tremendously the transportation costs. Then, these people have to export their products to large cities, such as Montreal, Toronto, etc. and this contributes to a tremendous increase in transportation costs.

It might be advisable and important to review the transportation problem as far as the textile industry is concerned because, in my opinion, this problem is already relevant in several cities which will be affected in the future due to the competition from foreign industries.

The shoe industry is struggling with exactly the same problem because it has barely 40 per cent of the domestic market, which means that roughly 60 per cent of the shoe industry market is in the hands of foreign industries. The hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) mentioned certain countries in Asia; to those, France, Italy and many other European countries should be added, since they have become the main exporters of shoes to Canada. It might even be advisable to conduct a little investigation here, in parliament. We might find that many of us are wearing shoes made in foreign countries.

We certainly cannot categorically oppose the Kennedy Round agreements because we must accept foreign trade and even further consolidate our own position in foreign markets.

On the other hand, we must recognize—I accept the fact as it is presented to us—that foreign goods must be bought if we want our country to sell abroad.

Those are roughly the considerations I wanted to add to the remarks made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe.

[English]

Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I have just a few comments to make on this legislation. First of all I should like to comment on the remarks that were made by the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe which were reinforced by the hon. member for Beauce. I feel a measure of sympathy for the textile and shoe industries which are facing problems today. As one who has lived in Canada for 40-odd years and has had to put up with a similar number of winters, I cannot help wondering, especially during recent winters, why the Canadian clothing industry has not produced clothing that is more adequate for our winter conditions. I do not care whether more adequate protection is given to us in the form of underclothing or overcoats, but our present products do tend to be inadequate for current Canadian winters.

I suggest that if the clothing industry had specialized in this type of clothing it might not only have a goodly percentage of the Canadian market but would also be exporting clothing. In northern Canada the most adequate type of winter wear is one suit of caribou skin turned inside and another suit of caribou skin turned outside. I suggest that people living in the north deserve something better than this. Our winter clothing is bulky, awkward to handle and unattractive in appearance. It is high time the Canadian clothing industry took a really serious look at dressing Canadians in more adequate fashion for our winter weather.

I do not intend to discuss the tariff legislation to the degree the hon. member for Broadview and the hon. member for York-North did. However, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for York-North on his mental initiative in trying to solve some of the problems of Canadian ownership, trade with the United States and so on. Since he is a backbencher and not a cabinet minister I presume he has been speaking for himself and not indicating government policy. Nevertheless I congratulate him for looking for solutions.

I should like to put in a word of warning here, Mr. Chairman. It seems that those fine fellows the Americans always seem to come out best in a trading deal. I have a great deal of respect for the trading policy of the down east Yankee, but I suggest that in improving our associations with the Americans so far as trade is concerned we should take a great deal of care that we do not come off second best, as I suggest has frequently been the case in the past.

The continuing expansion of the Canadian economy demands that we continue to seek an ever larger market for our products both at home and abroad. We should resolve not only to increase sales but to seek a wider base for trading by diversifying our products and by trading with more countries.

I should like to pause for a moment and suggest that in trading with the new nations of the world we establish a base market which might continue for some time to come. Once having secured a foothold in a foreign country or in a country that likes our products, that country may continue to buy from us for several reasons. First, they like our products. Second, a series of service outlets has been set up to service the products. Trade names become almost part of the industry. Take, for example, aspirin. This is now almost synonymous with a headache tablet. Frigidaire is almost synonymous with refrigerators.

If we can establish such a market in some of these new developing countries, we may be able to trade with them for a long time to come.

I would even suggest that we might consider giving a little credit and further encouragement to exporters. When one considers what some other countries are doing one realizes immediately that if we wish to continue trading on the international market we had better be prepared to do something about it. We must remember that the United States has raised its export promotion budget by $200 million, is presently planning a substantial increase in the guarantees and credits provided by import and export banks, and that the United States administration is also introducing a new export subsidy program. This is what another country is doing, but what are we doing in an effort to expand our trade? In view of the increasing competition from foreign countries I believe it behooves us as Canadians to display some initiative in establishing some of the products that we have for sale and selling them to other countries. As we do so, perhaps a longer production line will bring about a lower unit cost to Canadian consumers.

I would suggest also—and perhaps this is a negative comment—that we should consider the fact that we may be shut out of some markets. I noticed a comment in today's Globe and Mail, which was also made on television last night, that the Canadian government is actually fearful of what Richard Nixon, the new United States president, is going to do so far as trade is concerned. We all realize that the European common market was set up to benefit Europeans. At the time I thought it was a good thing, but when we actually see them discriminating against us in protecting each other I suggest that it is not always as beneficial as it might be.

One wonders, when one sees some foreign countries establishing for political reasons such things as hedges with regard to flour, for example, whether they would not be wiser to buy flour from us. It behooves us to try to broaden our trade in every possible way with as many countries as we can and increase our sales abroad of items that we produce in Canada. In effect we are not so exposed to any currency block and we have a wider base than many other countries. Canadian politicians tremble when there is an election in the United States. I believe we should try to avoid such reactions and by doing so widen our trade with all countries in the world.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I wish to add a few comments to the discussion by the member for Saint-Hyacinthe (Mr. Ricard) and by my colleague for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) concerning the shoe and textile industries in Canada.

It is well for the government to make statements concerning the abolition of customs tariffs in order to encourage exports of our products, etc.

However, it must be realized that Canada having only 20 million people, our production per capita is approximately one fifth that of the Americans and this means that production costs are higher than elsewhere. As a result, countries buying our products must be granted subsidies.

In shoe industry, for instance, there are extensive Japanese shoe exports to Canada, in addition to our trade with France and Asian countries. The situation is the same with regard to textiles, because of our trade with Japan and the United States and due to some American control on our industry.

As I was saying, production costs are somewhat too high in the United States for economic reasons resulting from higher salaries. Some firms have chosen, like the United States to establish plants in Japan where salaries are definitely lower than in the United States. Consequently, it is cheaper for Americans to have certain products manufactured for themselves in Japan and to dump the goods in other countries. Canada is also subject to this dumping policy, as are other countries importing American products.

Of course, Mr. Chairman, we are looking for markets. This is the reason why ministers are now visiting South America with a view to finding markets for textiles, shoes, lumber and clothing, produced in Canada. Our ministers are travelling all over the world and naturally we have to grant subsidies or price reductions to those countries so that they can buy our products. However, let us not forget that those reductions are paid off eventually by the Canadian producer.

In short, we are becoming mere producers, who are not making any profits on the sale of our products. Even though it is necessary to find markets, we are not considering seriously the only possible market, which is the Canadian market. There are people who need those products right here in Canada. Indeed, there are in Canada at the present time some children for whom it is almost impossible to buy shoes so to enable them to attend school, and nobody is even considering the possibility of making grants for them. We are making some to the Chinese to purchase Canadian wheat; others are made to the United States to enable them to purchase our products; but the government forgets to make grants or pay a compensated discount to our Canadian consumers.

If the government would consider that, Mr. Chairman, we would arrive at an acceptable solution which would enable us to sell our products. Indeed, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) recently made a quite interesting statement. I wonder whether it is because he is a Créditiste at heart, but on November 18—that is quite recently—during a speech delivered to the Institute of Agronomists of Central Ontario at the Seaway Towers Hotel in Toronto, he said the following:

> May I say first, Mr. Chairman, that the agricultural problem in Canada has nothing to do with how to produce because we know that.

Can one imagine such a statement on the part of the Minister of Agriculture or the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who tell us that our problem in Canada consists in increasing our productivity.

The Minister of Agriculture even said in Toronto that we know how to produce. We know that, but that is not the problem.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The minister stated:

> We know how to produce and in large quantities, enough for ourselves and for millions of other people throughout the world.

It is the Minister of Agriculture in the Liberal government who makes this statement.

> And this is just the beginning. Just give them an incentive and the Canadian farmers could not only double but, I would bet, triple their production within a few years.

The Minister of Agriculture in the Canadian government says that we could triple our production; therefore, the problem is not one of production.

> It seems to me that the obstacles to the increase of food production throughout the world are not of a technical nature. The difficulties relate to distribution, marketing, politics and planning.

Those are the words of the minister.

Mr. Chairman, this distribution problem has been with us for the past 25 years and what we are considering now is not a production problem but one of distribution of wealth in Canada. We forget to distribute it in Canada and we seek means to distribute it outside Canada. We are looking for markets throughout the world but we forget the domestic market, the Canadian market. There are 400,000 unemployed in our country who ask for the purchasing power required to purchase this production. This is indeed a market. Let us stop paying subsidies abroad, or let us continue to pay them if we have surpluses, but let us give first the compensation discount to the Canadian people, the Canadian consumers, those who dedicate themselves and their work to the development of the Canadian production. Canada is not developed by the monkeys in the palm trees of Florida but by Canadian human beings, from all the provinces. We do not know how to dispose of our excess production. Everybody complains that there are too many goods, too many clothes. Plants are closing down because there are too many goods. In order to allow these plants and industries to resume production, emissaries are sent to all countries of the world, Africa, Asia, Europe, the United States, South America, Portugal, Spain and France, to find markets. What a situation! What a sight we are! We are laughed at because we cannot solve our domestic problems, while our first market is in our own country. That is where we should have a compensated discount for the Canadian people. However, there is no compensated discount at present for mothers of families, needy mothers in Montreal, Toronto or Vancouver, or large families. Prices, however, are increasing. Instead of giving a compensated discount to the Canadian workers, their income tax is raised, and then we are told that this is necessary to fight inflation.

We go to foreign countries to which we are ready to sell at a discount and grant any compensated discount in order to get rid of Canadian-made goods. Then we say that we are getting richer, that we are enriching the country, the Canadian people. All that is exported from Canada, we say, makes us richer. And if we import something into the country, then we say it is a trade deficit. That business of ours is really clever. Good accountants are at the service of the country, Mr. Chairman, and they know what the score is. As we say, they know their business.

Mr. Chairman, I think the time has come when the government has to consider the problem that faces us in Canada.

We agree that we must trade with other countries. But we have industries which manufacture products that can be exported easily. However, the government tells us that it cannot help them. I am referring to the gold mines.

Our entire production of gold is bought in advance by the United States. However, when we ask the government for subsidies to help our existing gold mines and to develop new ones, the government says: No, we would rather have them closed. They are kept in operation for social purposes only, in order to support families in the areas of Malartic, Val-d'Or, Rouyn-Noranda and Normétal and to allow them to die a slow death because, one says gold costs $43 an ounce while we sell it $35 to the United States.

Mr. Chairman, the government has to grant more subsidies and compensation for all the products exported by Canada to the United States or elsewhere than for the gold we export to the United States.

We are sure that all the gold we produce will be sold to the United States but we are not sure that all the wheat, textiles and food we produce will be.

The government says: We cannot do it; we would prefer to close the mines because we have to pay a subsidy of $8 per ounce for the production of gold. Such is the logic of the government. Dozens of new mines could be put in operation in our regions because all the production is bought. That would enable us to cancel our balance of payments deficit with the United States but the government says: No, subsidies have to be granted and we must not act too quickly.

However, in every other field of Canadian production, the government is ready to grant subsidies of up to 50 per cent. I would like to know at what price we sell our wheat to communist China, to Czechoslovakia or to Russia. No minister dares to rise and tell us what price we receive for the wheat sold to those countries.

The only thing we are told is: We have sold that many million bushels. But when we ask about the price, we are always given the same answer, that it is not in the public interest to reveal the settlements granted to those countries.

Production is the only thing that is in the public interest. To dispose of our produce, the government will give them, if need be, to other countries, but it is not in the public interest to know. That is a bright solution.

Mr. Chairman, we are discussing the Kennedy Round, call it what you will, call it the Gray Round, or any other round, it is not the solution to the problem. A while ago, I said that we must import from other countries. That is true. We want to export to balance our purchases, to have a favourable balance of payments with other countries. We therefore do not want to buy more from oher countries than we sell to them. Only, I maintain again that the best market is the Canadian market. But, for the Canadian market to be satisfactory, Canadians must have purchasing power.

If the compensations, a compensated discount, or the subsidies—and I repeat this because some ministers have a hard time understanding it, although my friend for Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Pilon) understands this very well, but there are some who do not—are every bit as important to Canadians as they are to foreign countries.

A while ago I said Canada had 400,000 unemployed. Those are the official figures, but there are others who are not registered. Some of them are not on the lists, but there are thousands who cannot find work and to whom $36 a week are given. What do you want a family-head to buy with $36 a week? Some people have not paid their rent for 5 or 6 months, have run up bills at the corner store for 5 months, 6 months or even a year. They are literally dispossessed because they do not have any purchasing power. Instead of giving them allowances, some compensation or a compensated discount on the goods they need, they have to pay new taxes. I mean direct taxes on income, the taxes which are reflected in increased prices. Some would claim that they are checking inflation while in fact they practice inflation through taxation to the detriment of our Canadian workers.

The unemployed in Montreal, Winnipeg, Vancouver or in Rouyn-Noranda are not asking for charity from the government. They do not like to draw unemployment insurance benefits only for the fun of it. These people ask for the right, the permission to earn their living honestly and honourably. They are not asking for anything else, but to produce more, and everyone knows that we could increase our production two, four or five times in a few years, if our economic system were organized in such a way as to satisfy the needs of our people: Produce to serve, produce to feed somebody, to feed our Canadians. Our production should first of all serve Canadians, and then, we could offer our surplus to other nations. Imports, yes, but exports also.

However, Mr. Chairman, we must begin by ensuring economic stability in our own country. Let us begin by stabilizing our own affairs. Let us give Canadian citizens purchasing power proportional to our production. Compensated discounts and the Kennedy Round will then no longer exist in order to satisfy a few financial interests, but will be used in the best interests of the Canadian people, by establishing a logical and objective economic system which will put the actual wealth of our country at the service of the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I wish to say something about the effect of the Kennedy round negotiations on the grain growers of western Canada. Traditionally we in that part of the country have been in favour of free trade, or one might say freer trade. I suspect the reason has been that living in the middle of a continent we have to move our products either east or west to Canadian markets and to world markets. In passing I may say that Canadian markets are very important to us. The people of Quebec, Ontario and the maritimes purchase our grains to feed their livestock and poultry. We cannot disregard the needs of people living in those trading areas because they, like us, are citizens of Canada.

As an individual I question the benefits that the Kennedy round negotiations brought to prairie farmers. If there are benefits they have yet to appear. Prior to those negotiations we had the international wheat agreement, which was working well. It included not only the so-called western nations but also the U.S.S.R., the most powerful nation behind the iron curtain.

In 1959 I sat in on the renegotiation of the I.W.A. Russia sat as an observer, and in 1962 it became a signatory to that agreement. But as a result of the Kennedy round negotiations among western nations, held under the GATT, we closed out participation by the U.S.S.R. in the international wheat agreement. As a result the U.S.S.R., one of the world's most important wheat and grain producers, is no longer bound by the terms, prices and trading arrangements made under the international grains arrangement, as the new agreement is called.

I watched with interest as the Kennedy round negotiations proceeded. They were slow and painful. Almost at the final point it seemed we would not reach any agreement on trade in grains. It was my impression that we moved from the international wheat agreement into the GATT negotiations largely at the insistence of the United States so that it would have access to European markets for its feed grains, a commodity as important to the United States as wheat is to Canada. But no sooner was that new agreement negotiated than the United States cut the price of its wheat exports and Canada encountered one of the toughest sales periods in a good many years. At the time the new grains arrangement was announced by the government of the day I noted it was stated that Canada had gained access to $1½ billion worth of trade into the United States, but from our experience since then I doubt that our grain growers have gained very much.

Recently I examined press clippings covering the period from 1967 into 1968 when the Kennedy round negotiations were in progress, when they were completed, and when we moved into the present crop year. Looking at them it was as though a dear friend was in hospital and was getting worse every day until you thought you would get the news that he had expired. Some of them are headed, "No Basis For Final Bargaining," "Wheat Talks in Geneva May Hurt Farm Earnings," "Wheat Slump Hits The Prairies," "Far East Wheat Sales A Must," "Take a Chance Wheat Agreement Is U.S. Plan"—I thought that was a lovely one—"Wheat Exports Down By Half," "Wheat Situation Getting Serious Grain Board Chief Says," "Continued Lack Of Wheat Sales Worries the Growers," "Canada Losing Ground In the World Wheat Market," and so on. These tell a story.

Since becoming a member of this house I have told the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that prairie farmers deserve a statement from him telling them where the agreement, reached as a result of the Kennedy round negotiations, is taking them. Some day we may have some reason for optimism. Some day we hope to have news that the patient is not going to die but may live a little while longer.

In various parts of Canada agriculture is in serious circumstances. I doubt very much that all the answers can be provided by simply tinkering with trade barriers because there are forces at work which disregard trade barriers. When a sugar company in the province of Ontario closes down its plant and the farmers have no place to take their sugar beets we have an example of a decision made in an area of agriculture which has nothing to do with tariffs or government policy unless such a policy exists somewhere behind the scenes, and I would not accuse any government of being behind the scenes in a deal like that. In some areas such as this decisions are made which cannot be affected by a simple, ordinary tariff approach.

We have free trade in respect of farm machinery with perhaps some exceptions, but anyone who is close to the scene knows that the prices of farm machinery have doubled and trebled over the last several years. Then we have the astounding situation of seven Ontario farmers going over to England and proposing to bring back seven tractors on which they will save $20,000. This is unbelievable. So the problems facing farmers will not be affected very much by tinkering with tariffs. I believe we must look farther than a simple manipulation of tariffs if we are to deal with the situations which face us.

[Mr. Gleave.]

On the editorial page of the Financial Post of May 23, 1968 there is an editorial headed "The French Wheat Gimmick." The French made a sale to China and for every bushel delivered at $1.18 a subsidy of $1.69 has been paid. The article states:

> Where did the money come from to pay that subsidy? It came from E.E.C's—
> The European economic community.
> —devastatingly protectionist mechanism, the variable levy on agricultural imports. This makes sure that the domestic European producer will never be undersold by anyone outside E.E.C.

Was this the result of the Kennedy round negotiations? Was this the kind of access we gained in the western European market? Was there a gain for the farmers of Canada as a result of these negotiations? If there was, somebody should tell this house so. The article goes on to say:

> Under the new international grains agreement, negotiated as part of the Kennedy round package and due to come into force July 1, the quality of wheat handled in the current French sale would have a minimum delivered price of around U.S. $1.60 per bu. The 42c. difference between $1.18 and $1.60 would be enough to keep large numbers of producers in the grain markets.

So we made the deal. Similar or even more severe protection exists in the United States. Then last night the Minister of Agriculture decided to tell the farmers the facts of life. While speaking to a group of agronomists, some of them, I suppose, employed by government and some by private industry, the minister, according to the Globe and Mail report, accused the farmers of basing their case on half learned lessons in economics, of ignoring social and economic realities and of trying to stand in the way of change. Today I asked the Prime Minister if this was the opinion of his government. I did not receive an answer. Does the government really believe this is the type of farmer we have in Canada?

The article continues:

For instance, what could or should a government do for a farmer who finds himself in financial straits because he paid more for a farm than it was worth, or bought more machinery than he could afford?

The minister charged that farmers who protested to Ottawa that they were losing money on corn production did only half the calculation. Is it the role of the Minister of Agriculture to describe the farmers of Canada in this fashion? The Globe and Mail is read very widely in eastern Canada. I think it is a very excellent newspaper. It is read by a great number of city people. Does the Minister of Agriculture wish to leave the impression with the city people that this is the kind of farmer we have operating our farms? If this were true it would be bad enough. Since it is not true it is worse. I do not intend to put everything in this article on the record. However, it says that the farmers have overfinanced themselves and have painted themselves back into a corner.

I would like to quote from the following report which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Thursday June 13, 1968, concerning a farmer who farms on the Regina plains. He is farming an economic unit in that area. He owes nothing on his land. His land is debt free. He has not gone out and bought a lot of high priced land for which he could not pay. His machinery investment is moderate. His repair bills are heavy. In 1960 he spent $1,139 on repairs and overhauls. We know that the farmer who does not go out and buy new machinery pays the money out in repairs. Any farmer knows this. He knows there are two ways to do it. This farmer had $8,300 in cash receipts on the delivery of 6,800 bushels at his country elevator. He had $3,700 as the final payment received in the income tax calendar year of 1967 on deliveries in the 1965-66 crop year and he had $515 in patronage dividends. Although he produced 9,200 bushels of wheat in 1967 he was able to convert only 6,800 bushels into cash because of tight delivery quotas. His problem was not high-priced land or high-priced machinery; it was low delivery quotas. He could not move his product.

I suggest that this man is probably typical of many farmers who are farming in western Canada and also in Ontario. Let us face the facts. If we have some hundreds of thousands of farmers, and we have, they will not all be experts. Does anyone insist that the total labour force in an industry such as Imperial Oil should all be experts? Does anyone insist on an assurance that all the people in business are top businessmen? After all, we are human beings. Some of us are short, some of us are tall and some of us are better equipped than others. Not only business management on the part of the farmer is a factor in this situation but also the circumstances which affect him not only in Canada but in world trade, including the health of world trade. Also involved is the cost of money which, incidentally, went up to 7¾ per cent and 7½ per cent the day before yesterday so far as farmers borrowing from the government are concerned. These things all have an effect. The cost of the things the farmer must buy on the industrial front is also a factor, and these costs are affected by our trade patterns and by the powerful industrial combines which exist in this country.

Do we have free trade in the petroleum industry, particularly in relation to the products the farmer uses? We have an oil policy in Canada which operates so that certain Canadian oil-producing areas will serve certain parts of Canada and other areas will serve other parts of Canada. If you purchase petroleum products for use on the farm in western Canada you pay a uniform price. I suspect this is the same in the east; the prices will be uniform there also. In other words, to use an economic term, the price is an administered one. These are the situations with which farmers must live.

A recent bulletin issued by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool states that a sufficient number of cattle are now being sold by farmers directly to packing plants to support the forecast that in the immediate future we will reach a point where there will be no longer a sufficient number going to the public yards to establish prices. Will we then have a free market, competition or free trade? I hope these things will be of concern to the Minister of Agriculture.

During the election we heard a lot of talk about national marketing boards, but I have not heard much about them since I arrived here. Let me suggest to the government that it had better be concerned about the situation facing the agricultural industry in western and eastern Canada. I assume an unhappy situation exists in eastern Canada if the delegation of farmers who took the trouble to drive two or three hundred miles on tractors to parliament hill is any indication. I have spent most of my life on a tractor and the last thing I would do would be to drive one 200 miles on a highway. They are not built to travel on highways.

We must recognize this situation in developing our trade and financial policies. We have been very fortunate in Canada in that we have had lots of cheap land and a highly skilled labour force in the agricultural field. We have also had self-employed farmers who have used the technology available to them to the point that they are now actually beginning to get into trouble because of overproduction. Let me say again that we must adopt trade and financial policies which will allow these farmers to stay in business in order to continue to provide Canadians with cheap food, and they have been getting cheap food. Several weeks ago in a debate in this chamber I said that Canadians have been getting cheap food and are well fed, and I cited statistics in support of my statement. Let us direct our policies so that this situation continues.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I should like to thank the hon. members who have spoken during this debate for their contributions. I can assure them that their very interesting comments have been carefully noted.

Let me remind the committee of what the government put forward as its aims when entering the Kennedy round of tariff negotiations. I shall paraphrase the remarks of a previous minister of trade and commerce who was the minister of finance at the time he made a statement to the finance committee of the house when it was studying these resolutions in the spring of the year. There were certain broad considerations which were followed in formulating the tariff offers the government made in the Kennedy round. First of all, the government wanted to make certain that there was a reasonable over-all balance, in practical trading terms, between the tariff concessions we got and those we granted. Therefore every effort was made to obtain every worth-while tariff reduction offered by other countries but, of course, we gave no more than we got.

Second, we took account of how our tariff concessions and the export benefits we obtained could contribute to the balanced growth of the Canadian economy. We wanted particularly to help our secondary industries to break out of the confines of our small national market. This we could do by getting reductions in other countries' tariffs and by cutting the costs of producing in Canada for those new and expanding markets. That is why our tariff cuts on raw materials, semi-finished goods and on production machinery are an important part of the Kennedy round settlement for Canada.

[Mr. Gleave.]

Third, we sought and obtained a more reasonable degree of balance and reciprocity for each major sector of our economy and for each region.

Fourth, we wanted to ensure that through the Kennedy round Canadian consumers would benefit from greater international competition.

The tariff reductions consented to by Canada covered about $2.5 billion in imports, of which about $2 billion came from the United States. At the time the then minister of finance spoke, on the other hand, the export benefits obtained by Canada from its agreements with major trading partners covered, including wheat, over $3 billion of export trade. That was the current situation at the time the then minister of finance reported to the committee.

I should like to point out to the committee of ways and means that it is significant that in such markets as the United States and the European common market the average level of tariffs on manufactured goods will be below 10 per cent when the results of the Kennedy round are implemented. Because of the across the board tariff cuts made by our major trading partners, export opportunities will open up for the first time for a very wide range of Canadian manufactured goods. Let me suggest, however, that it is not only our manufacturing industry that will be in a position to gain. The scope of the negotiations was such that nearly all commodities, including the products of fisheries, agriculture, mining and the extractive industries, will be in a position to benefit from the lower tariff barriers facing our goods in the export markets.

An hon. Member: Would you permit a question?

Mr. Gray: Perhaps I could accept questions after I have completed my remarks.

The first round of cuts under the tariff changes has been in effect on a provisional basis since January 1, 1968. This has provided almost a year of experience and observation with respect to the operations of our economy and, more particularly, of Canada's international trade in conjunction with the tariff changes in question. I think we have had a chance to see what has actually been happening to our country's trade since these tariff changes came into effect on a provisional basis on January 1 of this year. It is not just a matter of forecast or estimate; we have some definite results to look at.

I think it can be said that the results are certainly very encouraging. Last year the government set a 1968 export sales target of $12.3 billion. In a speech given by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to the Canadian Export Association on October 21, he pointed out that the Canadian export performance to date has been more than consistent with this goal. In the first nine months of 1968 our merchandise exports reached $9.9 billion, up $1.6 billion or 18.4 per cent from the same period last year. Meanwhile our imports have risen at a slower rate, by $811 million or about 10 per cent. In consequence I think we should be pleased to note that Canada is well on its way to achieving a $1 billion merchandise trade surplus this year. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce pointed out that this will be the largest favourable trade balance recorded in the post-war period. Therefore our over-all balance on current transactions, though still in a deficit position, will be much improved.

From a commodity standpoint, we can note that about two-fifths of this year's export gain consists of automative products. However, the gain is not limited, obviously, to increases in exports of automotive products. In fact, other products have also contributed importantly. These export products include copper, iron and steel, lumber and woodpulp, nickel and aluminium, petroleum and natural gas, and aircraft. I think these figures I have put on the record confirm my earlier remark that the results so far for Canada's trade since the Kennedy round changes were given effect to on a provisional basis have been most encouraging.

When the hon. member for Perth spoke on behalf of the official opposition he raised some question about the impact of these tariff changes on our trade with the United States. I think it is important to observe that on the basis of the most recent trade statistics released by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the initial trends following the introduction of the first tariff reductions last January for Canada and the United States can be considered to be quite favourable from a Canadian point of view.

Although both our exports and imports are increasing, the increase in exports is much greater than the increase in imports. Indeed, in the first nine months of 1968 our exports to the United States were actually greater than our imports from that country. The hon. member for Perth commented on what he considered was the need for greater progress in dealing with non-tariff barriers. It would seem to me that certainly there was some progress in this very important area affecting international trade. One achievement was the negotiation of the agreement setting up an international anti-dumping code. As this committee of ways and means knows, the draft bill in the form of a white paper to implement Canada's commitment under this code in a legislative way is currently under detailed study in the finance committee of this house. I suggest that members of the house might want to reserve their more detailed comments on the proposed legislation until the committee hearings have been completed and it has been returned to the house by the finance committee.

I would also like to point out that a special committee of the GATT is working on a program of study of the remaining non-tariff barriers to determine their exact extent and nature. I believe its intention is to formulate a program for working toward their elimination. The Minister of Finance yesterday in a speech in New York pointed out that further progress in the elimination of non-tariff barriers is one of the major tasks before the trading nations of the world, a task that still has to be accomplished in large degree although, as I have said, with the agreement setting up an international anti-dumping code and the program of work of the GATT committee, I think some progress in this area has in fact come out of the negotiations for the Kennedy round.

If I may, Mr. Chairman, I should like to comment briefly on some of the points raised by hon. members who participated in this debate. The hon. member for Waterloo noted what he considered to be potential dangers in the general freeing of trade and cited as an example what he said was happening in the farm machinery industry. Yet if I understood correctly what the hon. member for Broadview was saying, he felt we were acting too cautiously and perhaps had not gone far enough in cutting tariffs. This might help to prove that the government in its negotiations has in fact achieved a proper balance in the interests of Canadian industry and workers.

The hon. member for Waterloo suggested, if I understood him correctly, that Canada will not automatically benefit through freeing of trade. I point out to the committee that the government has in fact put into effect measures to help Canadian industry and workers to take advantage of opportunities created by the Kennedy round tariff negotiations. It has set up the new, special adjustment assistance program as well as the machinery program which will be formally implemented by the passage of the legislation before us. In addition, the increased efforts of the trade and commerce department are all aimed at ensuring maximum benefits for Canadian industry and workers from the opportunities provided by the Kennedy round.

As I have already pointed out to the committee, the average level of tariffs of our trading partners when the Kennedy round changes are implemented will be below 10 per cent on manufactured goods. Therefore the degree of concern expressed by the hon. member for Waterloo about the lack of opportunities for our manufactured goods in foreign markets should be lessened by the opportunities created by this general lowering of tariffs which previously stood in the way of our manufactured goods.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it six o'clock?

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)—Administration of Justice—compensation for innocent victims of criminal acts; the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—union dispute respecting reporting of Ottawa conference.

It being six o'clock p.m., the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, public bills.

• (6:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE BILLS

ATLANTIC PEAT MOSS CO. LTD.

The house in committee on Bill No. C-103, respecting Atlantic Peat Moss Co. Ltd.—Mr. Breau—Mr. Béchard in the chair.

[Mr. Gray.]

On clause 1—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like—

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. Without prejudicing in any way Bill C-103, I should like to point out that a study of the said bill was made in committee on Tuesday, October 22, 1968 and that only the English version of the committee report was published, so that the French-speaking members can hardly understand what this is all about.

My question of privilege was merely intended to point out this fact.

The Deputy Chairman: The hon. member's remarks have been noted and I am told that the French version will be distributed right now.

[English]

Mr. Peters: With regard to the question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, may I say I do not believe the hon. member was referring to the bill but to the report of the meeting of the standing committee which was held on October 22. This report is not available in the French language. It is my understanding that we should not proceed with the bill until the evidence is available.

[Translation]

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We regret that we are unable to provide the French version of the proceedings of the committee on Bill No. C-103. We are told it is not available at the present time.

Under such circumstances, progress must be reported and we will have to deal with another private bill. It is nevertheless understood that this bill will not lose its place on the order paper.

[English]

Is it agreed that the committee rise and report progress and that this bill will not lose its place on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I think that the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) wishes to say a few words before you report progress.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: The committee has decided to rise and report progress. However, if it is agreed we will listen to the hon. member for Gloucester.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, if it can be of any help to the hon. member, I could sum up the evidence of the company's spokesman. I am sorry that the matter is put off because the evidence is not lengthy. I could sum it up and then answer all the questions of the hon. members because I have here a statement which has been submitted to me by the company. It may be of use.

The Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree?

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I fully understand the meaning of the remarks of the previous speaker with regard to the brief he has received. I make it a matter of principle because I have no intention of promoting dissent or preventing the co-operation of this house. Everyone will agree on that. For the information of all members and so that a serious and thorough study of the matter may be made—I must say that I do not wish to kill this bill but rather to make a positive contribution to it—I think that it would be in order to get the French version of the committee report. It must be emphasized that it is the report of a parliamentary committee.

Moreover, the hon. member refers to a brief which would have been submitted by the corporation. In my opinion, such a move would be extremely welcome by the French-speaking members. In fact, we would like to get the French version of this report. I think that the hon. member who spoke before me will agree that our study thus could only be improved.

[English]

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that this bill will retain its place on the order paper and that the committee shall rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Progress reported.

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the house would agree unanimously to revert to the business which which was under consideration at six o'clock, namely, the Customs Tariff resolution?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): It is agreed?

Mr. Peters: I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in view of the trouble we are having it might be advisable to call it seven o'clock. The reason I make the suggestion is that a number of members, even the government representative who is presenting the measure on behalf of the government, are absent.

Mr. Gray: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am in my regular seat. I was in a ministerial seat earlier during the consideration of the resolution but I should like the record to show that I resumed my accustomed place in the house and I am ready to proceed with the bill.

Mr. Peters: I should like the record to show that too. I had expected to see the hon. member in a different seat. However, I am sure that the members of all parties were expecting private members' hour to continue and that they would not be involved. Some members have left the chamber, so I would ask the house leader whether he would consider calling it seven o'clock?

Mr. Bell: I believe the latter part of the hon. member's suggestion, Mr. Speaker, is a good one. Many members have departed from the chamber in the expectation that private members' hour would continue. Even though I do notice some government members ready to proceed, we would prefer that it be called seven o'clock and that there be no prejudice to private members' hour. This should not count as a regular private members' day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it agreed that we will resume in committee and suspend the sitting?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

WAYS AND MEANS

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

1. That Schedule A to the Customs Tariff be amended by striking out tariff items 20925-1, 21045-1, 22001-1 and the heading thereto, 22002-1 and the heading thereto, 22003-1 and the heading thereto, 26325-1, 40938-1, 42761-1 and the heading thereto, 42762-1 and the heading thereto, 44043-1, 44047-1, 47600-1, 56400-1, and 69315-1 and the enumeration of goods and the rates of duty set opposite each of those items, and by inserting therein the following items, enumerations of goods and rates of duty:

The Deputy Chairman: It being seven o'clock, the sitting is suspended.

At seven o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, when the house adjourned for the supper hour I was attempting to respond to some of the very interesting comments that hon. members had made during the consideration of this resolution in this committee of ways and means. I believe I was saying that I thought the lowering of the tariffs of our trading partners with respect to manufactured goods would be opening new opportunities for Canada's secondary industry.

The hon. member for Waterloo made some reference to the auto pact, and I believe expressed the view that progress had not been as rapid as should have been the case. I think I should point out that there have been thousands of new jobs, and new and expanded plants created as a result of this pact. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, when he spoke to the Canadian Exporters Association a few weeks ago, said that notable progress under the automotive products agreement has been realized, but that these gains must be maintained and indeed expanded. He went on to say that two way trade has increased from $760 million in 1964 to $3.3 billion in 1967, and that this figure will be even higher by the end of this year. In the 1968 model year more than a million vehicles were manufactured in Canada, compared with only 700,000 in 1964. Canadian exports of vehicles and parts increased from a value of $123 million to more than $2 billion in the same period. Employment in the automotive industry has reflected its general expansion with the creation of some 17,000 new jobs.

The hon. member for Waterloo questioned whether recent labour contracts had resulted in meaningful wage parity. Certainly the unions representing the workers in the auto industry believe they have met with success in recent negotiations in moving toward wage parity, though it is my understanding that these moves are linked to productivity.

In any event, Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the figures demonstrate the increased employment and new and expanded plants that have resulted from the automotive pact. Speaking personally, along with this improvement it seems to me that companies in the industry could do somewhat more than they are doing at the present time by way of giving advance notice to workers, and also to government, of technological change, so as to make it easier for workers and government departments that are attempting to assist them to adjust to the impact of that change, and to lay-offs, which in most cases are only temporary while various plant expansions are being carried out.

Perhaps I can discuss this matter at greater length on another occasion, perhaps during the estimates of the Department of Labour or Department of Manpower and Immigration. Still, it does seem to me that the government has in fact created a number of programs to assist not only industries but the workers involved to take advantage of the expanded opportunities presented by the Kennedy round tariff changes.

I have already referred to the adjustment assistance program, Mr. Chairman. We should also note new and expanded programs of the manpower department with respect to retraining and, if necessary, mobility, as well as job placement and counselling.

I believe the hon. member for Broadview spoke about views expressed in the recent Economic Council report in connection with the level of tariff cuts that the Canadian government is proposing to this parliament, to put into effect its commitments under the Kennedy round negotiations. My understanding of what the Economic Council actually said, Mr. Chairman, is that it did not seem to have definitely and firmly recommended that Canadian tariffs be reduced beyond the levels agreed to under the Kennedy round. What the council said in its fifth annual review, as reported at page 197, was that unilateral tariff reductions—and I am now quoting the report—

—perhaps in the form of an accelerated reduction of Canada's Kennedy round tariff reductions, might well be appropriate if the recent high and persistent general price and cost increases were to continue in Canada.

In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, such a statement is not exactly the same as a firm and definite recommendation. The hon. member for Broadview, in commenting on this point, seemed to equate effective protection with the degree to which Canadian producers can keep prices high without foreign competition. In fact, the nominal, as opposed to the effective, rate of duty on an industry's end product places a ceiling on the price that the industry can charge for the product and I gather, still not charge more than the laid down cost of the imported product. Effective protection merely measures the extent to which the industry can increase its value added per unit of output because of the tariff structure—in other words, the extent to which it can be less efficient in processing than its foreign competitors. I am informed that Canadian levels of effective protection, at least before the Kennedy round, were not too far out of line with those of other countries such as the United States and the United Kingdom.

The hon. member for Broadview also expressed some concern at what has been said in the United States about what might be termed moves toward increased protection. We should note that the Minister of Finance, in his speech in New York yesterday, seemed in effect to caution the United States on the effect that moves toward increased protection in that country, would have on its trading relations with its neighbours and trading partners, including Canada.

The hon. member for York North made some very interesting comments and was able to base them upon his own personal experience as a manufacturer, as someone who was meeting competition in Canada from abroad and also competing with others in countries with which we trade. Certainly it is very good to hear from him as someone in the machinery industry, and to learn that he agrees that the machinery program has been working relatively smoothly.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, the hon. members for Saint-Hyacinthe, for Beauce and for Témiscamingue (Messrs. Ricard, Rodrigue, and Caouette) have dealt with the problems of the textile and shoe industries. I can assure them that the government is well aware of the problems and difficulties of those industries.

I also wish to assure them that the tariff reductions applicable to those industries are very low. For instance, for the textile industry, in general the Canadian tariff has been reduced by only 2.5 per cent and, in several cases by only .5 per cent. I must add that tariff reductions, for the shoe industry, are also very moderate. In addition, those reductions have been extended, in most cases, for a maximum period.

I believe those members also spoke of another matter, dumping, and as I have said, the bill that is based on the international anti-dumping agreement has been referred to the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs which is in the process of studying all the evidence of the industries affected by this bill.

We will have the opportunity of continuing our discussion on this bill when it is sent back to the house by the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs.

[English]

Now, Mr. Chairman, a number of hon. members also made comments with respect to the agricultural sector. I am informed that the agricultural package, while it can be described as being of somewhat modest size, is actually reasonably balanced between the United States and Canada. I understand that in terms of our trade with the United States we gave and received concessions on agricultural products to a trade value of about $95 million per annum each way.

With respect to the question of our sales of wheat, the minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce discussed this question in some detail when he spoke to the meeting of the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool just a few days ago on November 4. I think it useful to recall that at that time he said that the government is well aware of the long, hard struggle that went into developing a system of orderly marketing under the wheat board for western Canada. This concept of orderly marketing is still valid and will continue to serve as a base for our wheat marketing policies. The principle was carried into the international sphere where it served as a basis for the international wheat agreements and now for the international grains arrangement. The other major exporters have all expressed their determination to observe the terms of the arrangement with respect to minimum prices and to achieve the objectives of the arrangement.

Finally, on this point I can say that on October 10, 1968 the International Wheat Council issued a press release in which it stated that the members of the prices review committee of the International Wheat Council representing the major exporting and importing interests declared their satisfaction with the way in which the convention had worked during this period and with the fact that the international grains agreement is an effective force in the international trade of wheat.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, let me say that the Canadian government favoured the holding of the Kennedy round tariff negotiations and participated actively in it. It worked to get the best possible results for Canada, and the government is now recommending to parliament that legislation be passed to implement these results. The original Kennedy round agreement called for legislative implementation by July 1, 1968 by the countries signing it. As we know, the government negotiated an extension to January 1, 1969, a date which is not too far away. I would therefore commend to this committee of ways and means the passage of this resolution. I believe it would certainly help to show that Canada's attitude, along the lines of what the Minister of Finance said in New York yesterday, is not favourable to what seems to be a greater interest in protectionism on the part of some of our trading partners, and it will confirm Canada's intention to compete vigorously in international markets in a way that would help the expansion of Canada's industries. On balance, therefore, I suggest to this committee that this legislation is and will be beneficial for Canada, and I invite the house to support the passage of the resolution.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Chairman, I wished to ask the parliamentary secretary a question earlier on but he preferred to leave it to the end. I do not know if I understood his meaning correctly. As I understand him, there would be a general reduction of tariffs on Canadian commodities going into the European common market over the period of time as a result of the Kennedy round. Might I ask him what the schedule will be for the reduction of tariffs on wheat and feed grains going into the common market? In other words, what access do we have to this market in western Europe?

Mr. Gray: I would be very happy to attempt to give the hon. member a detailed answer to his question. However I suggest that since, at a later stage in this debate, we will hopefully be in committee of the whole house we can again have an informal discussion on these matters. I hope therefore that the hon. member will permit me to reserve the answer to his question until that time, when we will be able to go into it in the detail he wants.

Mr. Gleave: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman, with regard to the Japanese market. My understanding is that as a result of the Kennedy round the United States was conceded a reduction in the tariff on soybeans going into the Japanese market, and the tariff on Canadian rapeseed going into the Japanese market remained as it was. Can the minister tell me if this was so, and what was the concession made to the United States on soybeans?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I do not have available before me information about concessions won by our trading partners, but I can certainly get that information. I cannot comment directly with respect to the duty on rapeseed moving into Japan. If my recollection serves me correctly, we did win certain expanded export opportunities with respect to rapeseed. Again I would ask the hon. member's indulgence to permit me to give him a more detailed answer not only with respect to the Canadian commodity in question but with respect to the concessions won by the United States in which he is interested, and allow me to present this answer in a more detailed fashion when we are in committee of the whole house on the bill itself.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary a question. He gave some figures showing the growth in exports for the first nine months of the year. I wonder if he can give us any figures on the growth in exports to countries other than the United States.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Gray: I must apologize to the Leader of the Opposition. I have the total figures but I am not sure whether I have figures for all our major trading partners here. If the hon. gentleman would allow me a minute, perhaps I could get them.

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to take up the time of the committee. The parliamentary secretary can give us this information at some other time.

SUPPLY

The house in Committee of Supply, Mr. Richard in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

1. General administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $31,015,000.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): The revised estimates of the Department of Public Works for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, will be found at page 392 and the following page of the blue book, with details beginning at page 394.

Mr. MacLean: I propose at this time to take up only a few minutes of the time of the committee on the first item because I can speak later on this subject as it is covered by item 40. However, I feel I am perfectly in order in referring to it now.

Some time ago the government of Prince Edward Island formed a delegation to come to Ottawa to speak to the federal cabinet and particularly to the Prime Minister to impress on the government the need for the construction of a permanent link between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. I believe the delegation demonstrated conclusively that in the long run the building of a permanent link would be in the national interest and the most economic course to follow, bearing in mind the projected cost over the years ahead of maintaining the present service. Just as important, perhaps, they impressed on the federal government the need for making a decision at the earliest feasible date. It is of course understandable that the government of Prince Edward Island will be placed at a disadvantage in its planning for the future if it does not know what decision the federal government will reach with regard to this proposed transportation link.

This is a subject which is of tremendous importance to the inhabitants of Prince Edward Island. People in other parts of Canada may not fully appreciate how vital it is; in some areas it may be considered that the estimated expenditure is extremely high in relation to the population concerned, and so on. I should like to point out that this is a project which would be of benefit not only to Prince Edward Islanders, although it would be of great economic value to that province, but to all Canadians who travel to Prince Edward Island, especially during the tourist season. As a matter of fact the great congestion which occurs during the summer months is occasioned chiefly by visitors from other parts who wish to make this trip.

I suggested that the estimated cost might seem extremely high in relation to the population concerned. However, we should bear in mind that the cost of government generally is high. The federal government is now spending yearly about half as much as this causeway will cost for this number of people in every part of Canada, so what Prince Edward Island is asking is that over a period of years the federal government designate for the building of a causeway about twice the annual expenditure that it expends on this number of people in all parts of Canada.

Ever since confederation, transportation has been a subject of such importance that islanders generally consider this project to be a matter of top priority as far as federal expenditure is concerned. This view is not limited to those who live on the island. Perhaps I might read into the record a telegram which was recently sent to the government by the Maritimes Transportation Commission. It is dated November 7, 1968, and reads as follows:

> Maritimes Transportation Commission directors meeting in Moncton yesterday expressed concern over possible indefinite postponement of or outright cancellation of the construction of a permanent link between Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. This commission reiterates its position that permanent link is imperative to reduce costs of transport and to overcome increasing delays hindering the movement of products and people between the island province and the mainland. Over its more than forty year history this commission has been constantly aware of difficulties of traversing the Northumberland strait—difficulties which have frustrated and, without a permanent link, will continue to frustrate the economic development of the province. Even with increased ferry service in recent years and with planned improvements at terminals which this commission welcomes, no solution short of a permanent link will solve the delays and costs incurred by tourists, businessmen and trade and commerce travelling to and from Prince Edward Island. The Maritimes Transportation Commission endorses the principles of the brief presented by the government of Prince Edward Island to you and your colleagues recently relative to the construction of a permanent link and we urge your government to take immediate and effective action to bring about within a reasonably prompt period the completion of the Northumberland crossing project in which 12 million dollars have already been invested.
> J. M. Crosby, Chairman,
> Maritimes Transportation Commission

I think most Prince Edward Islanders agree completely with the sentiments expressed in this telegram.

• (8:30 p.m.)

In passing I want to say that the fine new ferry which has been provided, the John

Hamilton Gray, is welcomed and appreciated by Prince Edward Islanders. I know it is not the direct responsibility of the minister, but no doubt the Department of Public Works is involved in some way. Prince Edward Islanders would not want to appear to be ungrateful for what is being done, but they feel that continued expenditure along this line will not solve the problem in the long run, and they are most concerned that the government will make an early and favourable decision in this matter.

I do not want to press the minister for a reply at the present time. If he tells the committee that he is not in a position to make a definitive answer at this time, that will be understood, but I do say we have already passed the time when the Prime Minister expressed the hope that a statement would be made in the matter, finalizing the position of the federal government. We hope and urge that such a decision will be arrived at within a short period of time. All Prince Edward Islanders, I think all people from the Atlantic provinces, and I would hope many, many people from the rest of Canada will look forward to a favourable decision by the government on this very important project.

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Chairman, with brevity, but with the utmost sincerity, I would like to support the arguments which have been marshalled by my colleague, the hon. member for Malpeque. If I do not speak at length, it is not that I am not deeply concerned about this project. Indeed, it is because I have been so deeply concerned, like my colleague, that I have been discussing it for a good many years in this parliament and elsewhere.

I, too, am hopeful that the minister, who is I believe a minister who has some understanding of national problems, will see the compelling urgency of this project being put forward.

We all know that in our part of Canada the economic situation vis-à-vis the rest of Canada is not very hopeful, and the only way to make it more hopeful is of course to make a rational assault upon those things which put us at an economic disadvantage. As all the experts and certainly all the public men for many years have realized, one of the great disadvantages which our part of Canada has undergone and borne, as this country was created in its peculiar nature, is the problem of transportation; and the four provinces, the maritime provinces, are the ones which have the greatest and most acute economic pains from their transportation difficulties.

[Mr. MacLean.]

We have watched and studied with a good deal of concern statistics, studies from the Economic Council of Canada and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics about the widening prosperity gap. It is terribly important that our produce, our fine agricultural produce, and our excellent products of the sea should get to their markets as quickly as possible. It is extremely important that our most expandable and expansive industry, namely tourism, be furthered in every possible way. There are now about a million people coming to Prince Edward Island every year. It is a direct loss of revenue when any people find that delays in the ferry transportation cause them to turn away to some other province, very nice but not quite so nice, like New Brunswick or Nova Scotia.

I think, apart from all the arguments which have been marshalled before this government, and by our premier—and I support everything he and his cabinet said—as my colleague suggested, and indeed underscored, it is sound economy to build this permanent link and build it as quickly as possible. I know of no bridge, highway or turnpike which has upon it a reasonable toll, in an area where there is much traffic, that is not self-amortizing, usually in a time shorter than those who created the structure predicted.

The cost of maintaining the ferries is increasing. It is escalating year after year. The more traffic and people, the greater is the total cost and the greater the per unit cost. Therefore the soundest economic solution, a permanent crossing, is what is needed at the present time. I agree with my colleague when he says we are delighted with the new boat, but we do note it has been announced that two of the existing ferries will be withdrawn from service. So we get one and we lose two.

We can project that there will be a heavy increase in traffic, so I would say to the minister that this is not only something that Prince Edward Island wants—of course it does,—but it would be one forward step which to a degree would cope with the economic disparity which our part of Canada suffers. We know, Mr. Chairman, that no country can be truly prosperous if any region thereof is lagging behind the national average in those economic facts of life which make for the good society and for the just society, so with all the urgency I could command I recommend to the minister a quick move on this measure.

It is not for me tonight to talk about recriminations or refer to promises that were given and have not been fulfilled. We are not interested in making political capital. We are not interested in castigating people who made promises. We are interested in helping our region, and this is the responsibility of the federal government, and only the federal government, in the field of interprovincial transportation and communications. I would appeal to the minister to use his great power of persuasion to see that the government moves quickly in a project which he can, I am sure if he sees it inaugurated, look back upon with great pride as being one of the contributors to the economic well being of a great and important part of our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Chairman, I would like tonight at the beginning of my remarks on the estimates of the Department of Public Works to say a few things of local interest. I do not intend to deal at length with provincial or national matters; I would like instead to keep to local works, which is a matter of interest to most hon. members, I think.

The only way for the citizens of the riding of Abitibi that I represent to have access to the sea is through James Bay in the north. I would like to point out to the minister that an access road from La Sarre to Rupert House, near James Bay, is now under construction. We hope that road will soon be open to traffic and that the Department of Public Works and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development will cooperate with us to build the harbour facilities needed in that region.

This evening, I would like to restrict myself to the best organized part, I would say, of the riding, and remind the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Laing) that in some parishes works have already been carried out as, for example, the construction of launching ramps for pleasure boats; I wish particularly to draw his attention on the way some of these works have been carried out. Up to now, the purpose was to make some facilities available to tourists, and promote trade and certain industries. Unfortunately, I noticed myself—and others noticed it also—that these works were not carried out satisfactorily, so that after hardly a few months, the facilities are breaking up because engineers did not take into consideration the nature of the soil where wharfs and launching ramps were to be built.

I would like particularly to draw to the attention of the minister the wharf which was built just 2 years ago on lake Turgeon; that wharf is almost useless because the road leading to it is in such poor condition. It would have been easy enough to build a breakwater to prevent the water from damaging the road to the ramp.

I think that the minister should ask his officials to visit the area, especially lake Turgeon, the wharf on lake Macamic, the wharf used by the people of La Sarre on the river of the same name and several other places. I feel that the minister should ask the inspectors of his department to examine the works to ensure that they are repaired and maintained in good order so that they may be used by the people.

I should like also to call the attention of the minister to another point which concerns my riding more directly, that is the little town of Duparquet. I should like to ask the minister officially—I know that he has received requests to that effect from the Fish and Game Association of Duparquet—to order the dredging of rivers flowing from Duparquet lake, and the installation of buoys on this lake so as to avoid the rather frequent accidents which occur there. I know that, in 1950, such buoys were installed, but it seems to me that since then, this service to the people was not maintained.

Many tourists, in ever increasing numbers, spend the summer season in that area to go fishing or, in the fall, to go hunting. Many tourists even come from the United States to spend a part of the summer in the area, in order to enjoy the beauties of nature. Therefore, the Department of Public Works should carry out certain improvements in order to facilitate access to the natural beauties to be found there.

Moreover, the minister is perhaps aware that the Quebec government passed very recently a resolution approving an expenditure of about $20 million for the development of the whole north-western part of the province of Quebec, which is to include a tourist centre in the Duparquet area.

I think the Minister of Public Works should co-operate with the Quebec government in the developments which it is ready to undertake, in order to turn this area, which is no longer a mining area, into a tourist centre. The town of Duparquet was once a mining town, as we know, but the underground resources were exhausted and it has practically become a ghost town. A small population has remained thanks to the tourist trade attracted by the beautiful lake and the lovely surrounding countryside.

Mr. Chairman, that is all I will say tonight, hoping that the minister will be able to ask and convince the Treasury Board to give him the funds required for the development he wants to undertake in that area.

I have here a letter I have just received, telling me that a launching ramp will be built at Lake Hébécourt, if it is financially possible.

I hope that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury) will be able to give the Minister of Transport the funds required for the development of that region of the province of Quebec.

As I said at the beginning, we have no access either to the sea or to the great St. Lawrence river and we don't have great harbours or the great facilities of those other regions. However, our area abounds in beautiful lakes and great tourist attractions. All that is needed is to develop and improve them.

Therefore, I hope that the minister will make a study of the whole region, in order to bring about all the necessary improvements.

[English]

Mr. Winch: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say that over the years I have had many interesting conversations with the one who has the honour at the present time of holding the post of Minister of Public Works. From those conversations over the years I rather gained the impression that the minister prides himself on being one who looks ahead and believes in planning. If my analysis of the minister is correct, that is, that he believes in looking ahead and planning, then I wonder whether he would take this house into his confidence and give us an exposition and explanation of how he is looking ahead, and the type of planning he has in mind as Minister of Public Works. I think this would be most interesting because if the planning is well conceived this will be something new for a Liberal minister of public works.

Because there has been a lack of looking ahead and a lack of planning in the past, the people of Canada have been greatly inconvenienced and millions of dollars of the taxpayers' money have been poured down the drain because of inefficiency. It would not be fair if we were to ask the minister to give us his views on looking ahead and planning, and just leave it at that as a generality. He should be a little more specific. I am sure he can anticipate that I intend to ask him about his thinking and planning as Minister of Public Works in British Columbia, and in particular in the area of the lower mainland and the city of Vancouver which he and I have the honour to represent.

A few short years ago the thinking was that we must have a new airport terminal in Vancouver. There certainly was a need. Now we have it. But there was no thinking and planning concerning how one would get there or get out. There is just one two-lane low level bridge. Now, when the airport is open and the problem of transportation is before us, there is talk of another low level bridge so that people will be able to get to Lulu island, and then in about three years from now the completion of a main bridge.

We should like to know what stage planning and designing has reached in respect of this main bridge, and when it is hoped the department will be able to call for tenders, begin construction and complete the project. We should also like to know what the situation is at this time in respect of this low level bridge which is supposed to parallel the existing one. The minister knows there is an imperative need to speed up this project because that confounded bridge we have has the habit of refusing to close, once it is opened up. It provides access to Lulu island, and it is a lulu of a bridge. Only two nights ago it was opened up again and now it won't close. One should realize that there are over 5,000 employees at the airport on Sea island, and there are thousands of passengers leaving and departing. These people do not want to stay on Sea island, they want to get to Lulu island, Vancouver and elsewhere. What is the planning and thinking now to speed up this immediate project?

It is our understanding that the previous government agreed to build a new First Narrows bridge. This certainly is a necessary project, which we understand is to cost over $100 million. We should like to know what the planning is and what agreement the government has with the city of Vancouver and the province of British Columbia as to the financing and planning of this project. This is a major project which will affect the entire lower mainland, particularly the north and south shores of Burrard inlet. We must know what the situation is in order to make plans for freeways, throughways, the changing of streets, approaches and expropriations. Let us know what the present position is in respect of designing and planning. Surely some indication can be given to the city of Vancouver as to when this is to be constructed, whether it will be a bridge, a tunnel or a combination of the two. The city should also have an indication of where the project is to be built. This is the sort of thing that should be planned. We are interested to know what the government has in mind and what the minister has planned.

We should also like to know what the minister's plans are respecting the promise of the previous minister of $200 million to $300 million expenditure, in co-operation with private enterprise, to extend the waterfront from the end of Granville street east. This has been talked about for many years, and it has been our hope that this was not only in the planning stage but that construction would commence immediately. We should like to know at least what is being done in designing, and when this project is to be commenced. The previous minister of public works indicated that it was his hope the first phase of the bridge would be started in 1971, the second phase in 1973 and the third in 1975. We should like to hear something about this. If the department is going to begin the first phase in 1971, which is not too long away, let us know now what the plans are.

It is my understanding that in order to carry out this project the old federal building, among others, will have to be torn down. If this is true we should like to know why thousands of dollars have been included in the estimates to cover alterations and improvements to this old federal building. This is what has been taking place for a long time. On other occasions before a decision had been made as to which department was to occupy this building, electricians have moved in, put in new outlets and made various other changes. The department has eventually moved in, has decided the changes were not what they wanted, and within a week or two the changes have been torn out. I am not kidding; within one week these changes have been torn out. This sort of thing takes place all the time.

A few weeks ago during the budget debate I heard that the minister was going to visit the building in Hull occupied by the Queen's Printer, of which his department occupies a floor and half. The department immediately put painters to work at nights and on Saturdays for a week or two. Do you know what happened? I hope the minister does not have to pay for this. He did not go over at all, but sent his deputy. The deputy I had timed, and he was there exactly 17 minutes. About two or three weeks work at nights and on Saturdays was done to paint this area, in anticipation of the minister's visit. Surely that is not planning or looking ahead, but rather a waste of the taxpayers' money, or a misuse of money which could be used to greater advantage.

We should like the minister to tell us about future plans not only in respect of buildings, bridges, roads and tunnels but also as to harbour development. I am not referring to the Roberts Bank project. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway spoke about that matter when these estimates were before us a few days ago. I know she would not want me to speak on this occasion and delay the committee because she is very anxious to receive answers to the questions she put to the minister at that time.

At this time I should like to ask about planning of the inner harbour at Vancouver, from the Lion's Gate bridge down to the city of Port Moody. This is part and parcel of the harbour, and there is a vast area of potential development there. I realize the minister might say the harbour development does not come under his jurisdiction, but under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport. I realize that, but I also know—

Mr. Mongrain: Would the hon. member allow a question?

Mr. Winch: Perhaps I may be allowed to complete my remarks in this regard. Then the hon. member can ask as many questions as he likes.

I know that the harbour commission comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Transport, but as a member for an area of Vancouver, who has been in the house for some considerable time, I also know that the harbour commission can do the planning, but when it comes to the actual work, such as dredging, it is up to the Department of Public Works to undertake that work. That department must decide how much it requires to assist in harbour development in Vancouver.

Just before this session commenced I had the opportunity of spending a considerable amount of time with the chairman of the harbour commission in Vancouver. I should like to thank him for his explanation as to what was going on, and for the information he supplied. It is my understanding that the harbour commission has completed certain plans in harbour development down as far as Port Moody. This commission is aware of the absolute maximum amount of dredging that can be done, and is aware of the tonnage of the largest ship that could possibly make use of the harbour, in view of the clearance under the Lion's Gate bridge. They know exactly the width of the harbour from the Lion's Gate bridge to Port Moody. The commission knows exactly what can be done and how it should be done. It is also aware of what the owners of private piers, wharves and facilities are prepared to do, if larger ships can make use of the harbour. The commission knows how much these people are prepared to spend on this project. We know that there would be tremendous savings, and that this project should be developed now. It is not such a stupendous project, but it would be of great benefit to the people, and would assist in the efficiency of this inner harbour.

This matter was referred by the harbour commissioners of Vancouver to the Department of Public Works who do the dredging and provide in the estimates for this work, as hon. members will see if they look at the estimates. It is my understanding that the department is not going to do the dredging as one job, but is planning and thinking—or it was a few months ago—of doing it in three different stages. The first stage is to lower the harbour bed five feet in some areas, at a future time to take it down another seven feet, and the third stage is to take it down to what is the ultimate in the dredging of the inner harbour. To my mind this is just plain nonsense. It is not looking ahead; it is not planning; it is not efficiency; it is not the best use of public funds.

I know there is not a confounded cent in this year's estimates for the dredging of the inner harbour, but if my information is correct in about February of next year there will be in the estimates the sum of $1.5 million for this dredging, and this will be for doing one-third of the job. How can the government expect the private owners of the facility to be able to do their planning and long range thinking in this respect? One has to do long range planning and thinking when dealing with world shipping, because contracts are set for long periods of time. These people cannot do their thinking, planning or provide for the allocation of money with which to carry out additional dredging because of what I think is a blindness on the part of the Department of Public Works.

I have been trying to give the committee a few of the features of Vancouver with regard to which looking ahead and planning is necessary. I am certain that what I have had to say about Vancouver and the lower mainland of British Columbia applies to almost every constituency of Canada in which there is a need for looking ahead and planning. Therefore, while I hope I may receive a specific answer with regard to the specific planning which interests me as a representative from British Columbia, I also hope we will receive an explanation from the minister of the over-all planning visualized by him and his department. I sincerely hope I will not be proven wrong when I close, as I opened my remarks, by saying it is my understanding that it is the pride and joy of the minister that he looks ahead and plans. Please, sir, do not let us down.

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, is my hon. friend willing to answer my question now?

Mr. Winch: Let me hear the question first.

Mr. Mongrain: We have been very much interested with all the questions he has posed to the Minister of Public Works. Here is my question: Does my hon. friend think we can expect that the other Mr. Winch will soon be in a position to give the government an answer to those questions.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. member for South Western Nova.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be lengthy in my remarks tonight because when these estimates were presented to the house earlier I talked at length on the problem just enumerated by the hon. member for Vancouver East, namely the lack of planning in the past with regard to deep water harbours. I wish to deal with the problem of deep water harbours in southwestern Nova Scotia.

I would simply like to know—and the minister knows what I am talking about because he was here the last time I discussed this matter—what are the department's plans for the development of deep water harbours in southwestern Nova Scotia. The government has provided subsidies for building larger and better boats, but there are no facilities for these boats. The wharves are crowded. There is on the east coast a great future for the fisheries, but the fishermen need these facilities. In my speech, which is recorded at page 2400 of Hansard, I mentioned Parkers Cove, the combination harbour and a permanent crossing for Tiverton. I mentioned the Wedgeport area, West Head and many other places. I would simply ask the minister to tell us what his plans are for the development of such deep water harbours.

Mr. Simpson: Mr. Chairman, in dealing with the estimates of the Department of Public Works I would begin by saying that there are in the constituency of Churchill a number of projects which come within the jurisdiction of this department. However, there is one area which is at the present time waiting anxiously for a decision for the department. I refer of course to the town of Churchill. The people who live in Churchill are waiting to see what will happen with regard to their desire for redevelopment of the townsite.

It is interesting to know that for a number of years, I would say possibly since 1959, the federal Department of Public Works has been more or less designated as being in charge of the future developmentof the Churchill peninsula. The people living there are extremely anxious to learn the proposals the minister's department is going to offer to cabinet in relation to this development.

As the minister knows, Churchill is made up mainly of federal government employees, National Harbours Board employees, Department of Public Works employees and Canadian National Railways employees. Therefore it has been felt by previous governments, and I hope by this government, that at least 75 per cent of the obligation for the development of the townsite of Churchill falls upon the federal government. Many people who have followed with interest the problems of the people of Churchill often wonder why these people who are living within a community inside a province feel that the federal government has an obligation on their behalf to provide services which are normally provided by a municipality, town or city. However, Churchill happens to be in a vastly different category because were it not for mainly federal government establishments there would be no community whatsoever, apart from possibly a few native people. It is admitted, of course, that there are at Churchill a number of provincial government employees.

However, if one were to take a census I am sure he would find that something over 75 per cent of the people in Churchill are there as a result of federal government establishments. Before I make a plea to the minister with regard to the plans of the federal government for the development of Churchill, I should like to say that the people feel there are certain things they are desirous of having. I refer to such things as new land areas available, private ownership of housing and a full business development. They are interested also in consideration being given to the site of Fort Churchill being brought within the boundaries of the town for taxation purposes. I believe the minister and his officials should give serious consideration to a gradual withdrawal from some consumer services, thus permitting a gradual takeover by private enterprise. I believe the Murray B. Jones report recommended this procedure and suggested the new business tax revenues would augment the residential property taxes revenue.

There was a period of time when National Defence was strongly entrenched at Fort Churchill. A number of commercial services built up as a result, and at that time possibly they were necessary. However I would say that with the phasing out of the military establishment at Fort Churchill and the replacement of the personnel by public works employees, it now seems as though a careful look should be taken at the possibility of gradual withdrawal of some of the services which are available to the people, so that private enterprise could take over. Some of the areas which I suggest could be taken over by private enterprise would be structural contracting, probably transport services, vehicle maintenance, plumbing and electrical contracting, painting and possibly laundering and cleaning services. These could very easily be carried out by private enterprise. The people of Churchill have felt this way for some time, and I am sure there are a number of people there who would be willing to invest money in these various businesses.

The ironical part about the situation is that it seems many of the federal employees who have been transplanted into Churchill have gradually taken over the operation of some of these services. I must say that I have not seen evidence of a takeover by federal employees in all the fields I have mentioned, but in many cases federal employees have taken over some of these services. If they are being provided with facilities to operate these services at nominal sums on government property, you can understand the consternation this creates amongst people who would like to operate these services in the townsite of Churchill.

I plead with the minister for an early decision by his department on some of the recommendations of the Murray B. Jones report. This report was developed partly as a result of the efforts of the federal government under C.M.H.C., through the co-operation of the province of Manitoba. However, I believe the people of Churchill contributed some 12.5 per cent of the cost of making the report.

There have been many reports over the years concerning the possible development of the townsite of Churchill. For some reason or other, these reports have never resulted in any development whatever. Some eight years ago, at a time when the Department of National Defence had an establishment in Churchill, a plan was presented by the federal government for the development of a new townsite some five miles removed from the present one. Unfortunately, but possibly for justifiable reasons, this plan was not accepted by the people of Churchill. Shortly after that, the military base was phased out, and for the last five years relatively no encouragement has been given to the people of Churchill to expect that there would be a development of their townsite. I know all the reports have suggested quite substantial outlays of money in relation to the development of this townsite. However, I believe I can speak on behalf of the people and tell the minister that, while consideration may be given to a plan to develop the town, if some means could be found to provide the people with sewer and water systems within the present townsite I am quite sure they would be willing to wait a little longer, until a complete development plan could be agreed upon by the federal and provincial governments.

I am certainly not casting any criticism the minister's way when I say this, but I know from discussions with him that he feels one of the things Churchill should do is become incorporated. Many people have this idea. The people of Churchill themselves have considered the possibility on many occasions, but for reasons of their own they have decided not to become incorporated. I only hope that the minister, in looking over the possibilities and the recommendations of the Murray B. Jones report, will not come to the conclusion that nothing can be done for the town of Churchill unless it becomes incorporated. I can assure him that if he does this, all he will be doing will be handing the ball back to the people of Churchill. He will be saying: Until you become incorporated, we have no further responsibility.

I would ask the minister to take particular note of the words of the Prime Minister on October 28 when, in my opinion, he accepted responsibility for the federal government. The Prime Minister stated, as reported at page 2090 of Hansard:

> After having met the premier of Manitoba, there was an exchange of correspondence. I wrote to him indicating that certain proposals that had been made by him were under review by us—
> I do want to make it clear that the ball is now in our court and that the cabinet will be receiving from the Minister of Public Works very soon according to my information proposals about measures that can be taken with regard to the city of Churchill.

He advanced Churchill to the status of a city in quick order. I am sure the people of Churchill would be very pleased to remain a community, provided they can get the services for which they are not only asking but which I feel they are justified in having.

• (9:20 p.m.)

The Prime Minister went on to say:

> I hope nothing in my previous answer left the impression that we were waiting for the government of Manitoba to act. I want to make it clear we hope to come forth with some proposal very soon.

I am very interested in the words of the Prime Minister when he said that "the ball is now in our court", indicating that this question is possibly far removed from the political football that the people of Churchill have tabbed it for many years. I only hope that the Minister of Public Works and his staff will realize the importance of bringing down proposals as quickly as possible. I think I can say that my understanding of the position of the province of Manitoba is that they are quite willing and prepared to meet their share of the obligation in developing this town as quickly as possible.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a few brief remarks at this stage of the debate on item No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Public Works and call to the attention of the house a particular matter. I would like most of all to draw it to the minister's attention, even if I have to come back later in the debate to other special matters.

Mr. Chairman, as the member of parliament for Lotbinière, at the very beginning of the session I got in touch with the various departments to get information of particular interest to the population of the riding of Lotbinière, about statistics, salaries, in short everything.

At the same time, around the middle of September, I asked the research branch of parliament to make a study that could be classified under this heading: Works carried out by the federal government in the electoral riding of Lotbinière. I therefore asked the research branch of the parliamentary library to make a list of all the works already carried out or to be carried out in the riding of Lotbinière, as well as the nature and the cost of the said works.

The research branch did a wonderful job, Mr. Chairman. The researchers took the trouble of getting in touch with all departments. They took the liberty of disturbing some officials in their sleep—because some of them were asleep—and finally around the middle of November I received from the research branch of the library the following letter about public works. I would like to quote that letter signed by Mr. Laundy, director of the research branch that did such excellent work:

Dear Sir,

Please find enclosed the study on "Federal Government Works in the electoral riding of Lotbinière".

It is now obvious, Mr. Chairman, that it concerned works. And therefore, the departments most concerned in this matter is obviously that of Public Works.

In the second paragraph of his letter, Mr. Laundy says this:

We regret not to have been able to send you this work earlier. Our research were complicated due to the fact that the federal riding of Lotbinière does not coincide with the provincial riding.

This is quite understandable, and I do not blame the department for that. But in the third paragraph, Mr. Chairman, things get more complicated, and that is the reason of my intervention.

On the other hand, the Department of Public Works that had promised to send us certain information did not do so until several weeks later.

I would say several months later, since I requested that study in the middle of September, and it came only in November, and is still far from being complete.

I go on with my quotation:

Finally, we received the document which appears in appendix "C"— of the document they sent me—

—and which does not permit us to assess accurately the expenses made by the federal government in the riding of Lotbinière.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to point out that the research service, though it has experts on hand, has not yet found what works were carried out by the federal government in the riding of Lotbinière. If the Department of Public Works itself, with its employees, its experts, its figures, its projects, its classification, cannot say what works it has carried out in the riding of Lotbinière, I wonder how one can expect the hon. member to inform adequately the people he represents on the works carried out by a government or a given department. It is an absolutely paradoxical and unacceptable situation.

I continue to quote:

We have tried to reconcile the information given in that document with the figures quoted in the house on October 23, 1968—

I had to ask dozens of verbal or written questions, to help the research section to arrive at specific conclusions, since the department was unco-operative. This is why my answers, which in fact were questionable had to be used. Nobody wants to answer, Mr. Chairman.

I continue to quote the director of the research section:

As a result of the difficulties which we met, we applied again—

This means that the researchers had previously contacted more than once the Department of Public Works.

—we applied again to the Department of Public Works which was unable to tell us how those figures could be reconciled.

Mr. Chairman, who ever heard of such an administration? It is fantastic and unbelievable!

We can fight and struggle and resort to all kind of devious means to obtain the relevant figures, but the officials assert: "We know nothing about those figures, we never heard of them, but we do know that certain projects have been completed". They are then asked, on the basis of the answers given to the questions put on the order paper and those provided by the research section, if they can give further information. The experts of the research section try to reconcile the answers.

Since the whole thing was as clear as ditchwater, they contacted the people who were supposed to know and the end result was a complete imbroglio.

Therefore, it appears that even the officials of the Department of Public Works cannot get together on the figures with which they supply the members.

Mr. Chairman, this is unheard of, this is fantastic. I continue:

> However, we were promised—continues the director of the Research Department—

> —we were promised—and I add—on several occasions—

> —written supplementary explanations upon our request. Therefore, we are taking all necessary steps to obtain this supplementary information, which we will forward to you as soon as we get it.

The purpose of the work which I had requested from the Research Department was to find out in detail, since it was not mentioned in the revised estimates, what projects had been carried out by that department in the electoral riding of Lotbinière. I wanted to know in order to fully inform my constituents of the help given by the federal government to those dynamic people who are so much in need of it.

We therefore come to the following conclusion: the research section of the Parliament Library which does a tremendous job, and is made up of people of goodwill, of extreme competence, was unable to do a complete job. The researchers excuse themselves; the fault is not theirs but, doubtless, according to some employees of the research section, that of the department or of some of the employees of the Public Works Department.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to specify that I am not blaming the situation on the minister himself; I know he has other things to attend to, but I should like to ask him, expressly, to order an inquiry in his department as soon as possible in order to find out why his officials refuse, knowingly, to give replies to hon. members.

I think that no matter what party any member belongs to, he has the right to know what the government is planning to do or is doing in his riding and for this reason the Minister of Public Works should have an inquiry made in his department so that in future his department will give the same close co-operation as the other departments give to the research service set up to inform all members.

Mr. Chairman, I think that it is essential before we consider statistics and shuffle through many projects which are in many cases very desirable—and as I said earlier in my speech, I do not want to deal with particular points—to bring up this point so that the minister will see to it that some changes are brought to this factual situation which is completely unacceptable.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to draw the attention of the minister to the great needs of the riding of Lotbinière, and particularly to those of the region of Bois-Francs, in order that a federal buildnig might be constructed in the very dynamic municipality of Victoriaville. The need is urgent. At the present time, the offices of the Manpower Centre are perched, so to speak, on the third floor of the Victoriaville post office which—although I do not mean to compete with the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette), who said the other day that a post office in his riding looked like a hen house—looks like a hundred year old hen house.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to bother the minister about this. I know he takes it seriously. As a matter of fact, whenever I have raised the question with him, he has considered it carefully. I wish to tell him we are getting impatient, especially the people in the riding of Lotbinière and in the area of Bois-Francs, and we are awaiting a favourable answer from him because we would like to know exactly where things stand concerning the construction of a public building in Victoriaville.

Then, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask again the minister to order a complete inquiry among officials of his department, so that in future those officials will no longer refuse to supply information which is not absolutely confidential, and to which members are entitled, regardless of their party affiliation, in order to do a better job and to inform their constituents.

I shall therefore hope to receive soon in my office the answer of the minister to the request I have presented to him, and I hope that the officials in the gallery are listening attentively and that they will refresh the minister's memory. I think that all hon. members will recognize that we have a right to be informed and that this right must prevail over the interests of civil servants.

[English]

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Chairman, I rise merely to say a few words by way of support for the arguments advanced by several hon. members opposite respecting the necessity of the Northumberland causeway to Prince Edward Island. While these hon. members have presented the case for the causeway very well, it might be useful if support from both sides of the house were indicated for this very important project.

I think we all realize that Prince Edward Island is one of the poorest areas of the country, in terms of its possibilities for industrial development. It may be that at some stage in the future oil will be discovered. Companies have searched there before for this valuable product. It may be that great industrial complexes will be built up, but this does not seem within the realm of reasonable expectation. What would seem to be more likely is that advantage could be taken of those resources that are naturally already there, and these resources are principally in the areas of farming, fishing and the tourist industry.

I would like to take the tourist industry as an example of the development problem the Island faces. All those of us who have waited in the long line at either Cape Tormentine or Borden know of the wait of five, six, or seven hours which may occur before ferry space is available to take one across. There is no doubt that this is not only a factor which makes the life of the tourist going to or from Prince Edward Island more difficult, but it is also one which inhibits the tourist trade both by reputation and by experience. On almost any summer day one can sit there in a car and see a number of other cars leaving the line because the people are no longer willing to wait. It has been estimated in a survey conducted by the Stanford Institute that the tourist capacity of P.E.I. could easily be some 3.6 million tourists, and yet at the present time facilities are able to take over only some 400,000 tourists a year. If we were going to have enough ferries to carry the maximum number of tourists across, instead of the four ferries which we have had during recent years in active service, we would have to build 32 ferries at a cost of some $14 million per ferry. According to my calculations this amounts to more than the highest estimate of the cost of the causeway. I present this merely as an example of the potential for development if this valuable transportation link were built.

This is not merely a matter of importance to those people who happen to be citizens of Prince Edward Island, or even to those who happen to want to visit there to spend part of their summer on the beautiful beaches of that fair isle. It seems to me it is important to all the people of Canada to aid in the development of this province, rather than continuing in the tradition of handouts. It is important to aid in the development of those resources which are naturally there, which are those that can most adequately be built upon by aid from the federal government.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I would not want anything I have to say to be misconstrued as being critical of the minister, either personally or in the carrying out of his duties to date. I want to say also however that it is difficult to be too critical of the policies of the Department of Public Works as they have been carried out in the past two or three years.

I begin my remarks by saying that, like my colleague from Vancouver East, I want to make some reference to the notion of planning in the minds of those responsible for this department. It is pretty difficult to understand what possible notion of planning this department can have when it succeeds in bringing before us estimates calling for over $40 million in the construction of buildings here in the capital city area alone, at the very time when costs have risen to an all time high—the cost of money, the cost of land and other factors. We look at the estimates and we see an appropriation of over $41 million for the construction of office space and buildings in the capital region, and an appropriation requested of something like $16 million for rental which, I take it, is for rental of space in buildings. Last year the former member for Carleton, Mr. Bell, and I filed questions on the order paper having 10 or 12 parts to them, in an effort to get information from the department as to what their building or office space rental policy was.

We sought to ascertain how much they were paying per square foot, whether the department had agreed to lease space before construction began, and so on. More than five months elapsed and eventually the house was dissolved; the answers to these questions were never provided by the department. I am glad to see that an hon. member of the Conservative party has re-filed a lengthy question on the subject of departmental building practices. I hope the minister will take the time necessary to check into what the department has been doing in connection with rental policy. I am informed on fairly good authority that there has been a slip-shod and neglectful approach to the renting of space—that whole floors of newly constructed, privately owned buildings have been leased by the department at high rents, and then allowed to go unused for months. I am told that after being vacant for several months—and this is space for which $5.85 a square foot is being paid—staff would be brought into this accommodation, but not in sufficient numbers to make complete use of it—a space intended for 35 or 40 people would be used by only 10 or 12.

On October 1 of this year an article appeared in one of the Ottawa papers about departmental policy with respect to building construction. According to this article the Department of Public Works had somehow changed its thinking, and has decided to pay more regard to suitability for function than to the notion of prestige in connection with office buildings. If this is so, it is a welcome development and I should like to think that the new Minister of Public Works has something to do with this change in outlook. We are offered, as an example, a set of figures relating to the Department of National Health and Welfare Building at Tunney's Pasture. Judy's tower, it was called. This was to have cost $10 million for 18 floors 220 feet high. Since then, apparently, even though construction costs have risen, it has been possible for the department to estimate that it can be built to 23 floors, 30 feet higher overall, for $3 million less.

If this is the result of applying the policy of suitability for use, rather than prestige, I pray that the department will stick to its guns and follow this new policy. If it can get more space for less money, if it can build for $16 a square foot instead of $23 let us have more of it. But I know that the department must be under pressure from other departments of government to slip in a few extras so as to provide a building with a prestige image. Maybe a time will come when the government can afford prestige buildings. But that time is certainly not now, when we seem to be encountering all kinds of economic and financial difficulties, when the government is under pressure from the provinces and from many other quarters to embark upon increased expenditure. Here is one area in which money can be saved. So far it has not been considered. The health and welfare building at Tunney's Pasture is one example. The National Arts Centre is another. The example now being set by some ministers of the crown also leaves a great deal to be desired.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

At a time when the government cannot find enough money to raise the pensions of superannuated civil servants there is something obscene about pouring $46 million into a National Arts Centre, and about providing office space for cabinet ministers which one does not measure by the square foot but by the acre, complete with luxurious carpeting, expensive wood panelling, coloured telephones and all that kind of nonsense. Who needs it, except perhaps ministers with a more than usually developed egotistical sense? I know this does not apply to the Minister of Public Works, and I hope he will see to it that the Department of Public Works is able to resist pressures for prestige office space and prestige office buildings.

It is my understanding that the Department of External Affairs is to have a new building soon. This is a senior department and I would be very surprised if it did not attempt to use seniority and muscle to get a prestige building. The argument will be that such a building is necessary in order to give an impressive image to visitors from foreign countries. I suggest this is a poor argument. If Canada wishes to impress people from other countries it could best do so by providing more in the way of foreign aid. We are a young country with a great future, and we should be prepared to do more to help less fortunate nations. There should be no need to resort to such artificial things as prestige, connected somehow with office buildings and their appointments.

There is something basically unfair about spending more than $40 million on office space here in the capital at a time when it is difficult to find money for very necessary public works in other regions of this country. The hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville referred to the need to build a causeway for Prince Edward Island. The hon. member for Vancouver East complained of the extreme difficulty of access to the airport at Vancouver. Many other examples could be given. In my own riding there is a crummy old bridge which can only be used under restriction because the department cannot find a couple of hundred thousand dollars to get it fixed. The industry of the area, which depends on trucking, has been placed at a disadvantage for two years because trucks have to be re-routed for 15 or 20 miles, and this will continue as long as this crummy old bridge stays unrepaired.

I do not know how many studies have been made. The department has tested it on a number of occasions. Its first finding was correct. The eastern approach to the bridge was weak and unable to support heavy loads hitting the ramp at high speeds and so the weight restriction was imposed. But one would hope that after the passage of a year there would be some definite indication that at least there would be a timetable for repair of this bridge. However, there has been nothing of the sort. My latest information, provided by the minister himself, is that the federal government is not going to negotiate with the province of Manitoba to see about cost sharing this bridge over the St. Andrews lock and dam. This is a federal structure and has been so since about 1910. But although this would cost only a few hundred thousands of dollars, or thereabouts, to the federal government in cost sharing with the province, I point out that up to this point in time the federal government is pouring money by the millions into projects which, instead of being built and conceived in terms of function and use, have all too often been thought of in terms of prestige and glamour, and of satisfying the ego of some of those who occupy the buildings in question.

I wish to tell the minister that no one expects him to come before the standing committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts to tell the committee how it was that the initial estimate of $18 million for the construction of the arts centre in Ottawa somehow escalated upward to $46 million or $47 million in the end. He was not the Minister of Public Works at the time the difficulties were experienced. But I wish to tell the minister that his immediate predecessor in office, who was invited by the committee to appear before it in order to give an outline of the sequence of events that led up to this drastic increase in the cost of construction, does not want to come before the committee. He is invoking some rule of parliamentary precedent, but I think that some of these days we should ask the house for unanimous consent to allow the former minister of public works to appear before that committee in order to give us the facts.

It is not fair to expect the deputy minister of public works to answer all of the questions inasmuch as in the end the matter comes down to certain policy decisions taken in the department. How in fairness can the minister, or rather his predecessor, expect the deputy minister to be in a position to answer questions in that respect? This was the experience in the committee.

The basic question is that the costs escalated from $18 million to $46 million. On four or five separate occasions it was necessary to go before Treasury Board to get approval for upward cost revisions. Who made these decisions? Who recommended to Treasury Board that all this be approved? We cannot get the final answer because the minister who was up to his neck in that whole matter will not say, and he will not come before the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a quick reference to one other item. It has to do with the matter of river bank stabilization. To my surprise I found that the federal government shares the cost, and sometimes pays 100 per cent of the cost of river bank stabilization, even if the work involved be undertaken to protect privately owned property against river bank erosion or slippage.

I am not quarreling with the principle of whether or not the federal government should pay out money to protect the banks of rivers running along the front of property that is privately owned. I am not quarreling with that for the moment; but I do wish to say that for the past five years I have been unable to get any clear indication of the criteria that go into the decision making by the department as to what particular application for federal cost sharing for river bank stabilization will be approved or not.

Quite often one or another province, one or another municipality within a province, jointly or separately will make application to the Department of Public Works for cost sharing to shore up and stabilize river banks involving private property and sometimes municipal property. From my experience to date the federal government has not shown any easy inclination or quick intention to get involved in that kind of expenditure. Yet according to a return furnished in reply to an order of this house just a few days ago I found that in fact the federal government had disbursed sums in the amount of several hundreds of thousands of dollars to help pay for, and in some cases totally pay for the cost of such river bank stabilization work.

I know that the minister, when he was minister of Indian affairs and northern development, was in the habit of answering some of the questions asked and criticisms made during discussion of estimates, by letter. I hope in this case he will give some indication as to the standards or criteria which lie behind the decision taken by the Department of Public Works as to whether or not a particular application for river bank stabilization cost sharing will be accepted.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, in many ways this is a rather mundane subject to raise during consideration of the estimates, but when one looks at the estimates and sees how the Department of Public Works over the past few years has spent money with abandon in many instances, one need not apologize for trying to find out why it is so hard to get a few thousand dollars, or a few hundreds of thousands of dollars to do some needed public work in some other region of the country removed from the national capital. I hope the present minister will be more responsive to the requests made of the Department of Public Works by provinces in the east and in the west, and show a little less solicitude for prestige building here in Ottawa.

The Deputy Chairman: It being ten o'clock it is my duty to rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Chairman, if I might rise on a point of privilege, since it is obvious that our time has run out and that these estimates may not be before the committee again for some time, perhaps I could have the indulgence, and the minister could have the indulgence of the committee for just a moment to tell me when the government may be in a position to make an announcement regarding the causeway to Prince Edward Island?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed to the adjournment motion perhaps in response to the hon. member for Malpeque I could indicate that, subject to discussions with his colleagues and other hon. members opposite, it would be our intention to call the estimates of the Department of Public Works again a week from tomorrow, that is, a week Wednesday, so that we will have an opportunity to have further discussions on these estimates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And perhaps some answers?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): And, with patience, perhaps we could. In the meantime, as announced last night, we will deal tomorrow with the Department of Justice, on Thursday with the Department of Labour, and on Friday with the Department of Transport.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE—COMPENSATION FOR INNOCENT VICTIMS OF CRIMINAL ACTS

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, on November 4 I directed the following question to the Minister of Justice:

> In view of the rejection by the law enforcement board of Ontario of a claim for compensation by the dependant mother and survivors of Larry Botrie, the Toronto cab driver who was killed by a criminal recently, is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation during this session to compensate innocent victims of criminal acts?

The minister replied:

> Mr. Speaker, for the moment I think the definitive word on that subject was pronounced by my colleague, the Solicitor General before the committee on justice and legal affairs.

When the same question was referred to the Solicitor General he indicated that it was not the intention of the government to bring forward legislation at this session.

I should like for a few minutes to refer to the particular case of Larry Botrie. This was a young Lebanese man who came to Toronto eight years ago and worked with his brother as a taxi driver. In the month of April this year he picked up three young passengers aged 23, 15 and 14. They told him that they wanted to go out of town, when in fact they planned to tie him to a tree on a lonely road and steal his money and his car. On Yonge Street, north of highway 401, Botrie became suspicious of his passengers and asked to be paid in advance. When they refused he turned into a Shell gas station, telling his passengers he was going to call the police. In the front seat the 15 year old pulled a bread knife from under his jacket, held it against Botrie's chest and told him to drive on. At the same time the 15 year old yelled to the 23 year old passenger in the back to get the gun which was hidden in the rear seat.

Botrie pulled the knife from the hand of the 15 year old, jumped out of the car and shouted to the gas attendant "Get the police".

Boyd, the passenger in the back seat, pulled the trigger of the gun and Botrie fell to the ground. When he was on the ground and began to crawl he was shot twice and killed. Shortly a police sergeant arrived and faced the same gun of Boyd that had killed Botrie. The sergeant took out his gun and shot and killed Boyd.

When Larry Botrie came to Canada he worked as a cab driver and sent some $35 a month to his widowed mother in Lebanon. It cost $4,000 to ship his body home. In early November this year a provincial agency, the Law Enforcement Compensation Board, heard a claim for compensation for Larry Botrie's dependant mother, and his survivors who paid the funeral expenses. The board rejected the claim on the narrow ground that the act says compensation will be paid for any person killed or injured in or resulting from assistance given a policeman in making an arrest or in keeping the peace. In other words, it is necessary that assistance be given the police while a policeman is on the scene; he must be there. On that narrow ground the board rejected the claim.

You will note that the legislation is not in respect of compensation for innocent victims of a crime. This is the reason I asked whether the government intends to bring forward immediate legislation to compensate the victims of criminal acts. It is no answer to say that this is a provincial matter because it falls within the area of law enforcement and therefore is not a federal responsibility. I should like to remind the house that the R.C.M.P. has a contract of law enforcement in all provinces of Canada, with the exception of Ontario and Quebec. There is no reason that there should not be included in that contractual obligation a provision by which there would be compensation for victims of criminal acts of violence.

At the last session the hon. member for York-Humber brought forward a private members motion recommending that a compensation board be set up to help innocent victims. The principle of the motion was accepted by the government and the matter was referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs, before which experts appeared and gave evidence with regard to other acts in other jurisdictions. I could rightly say that there was general agreement with regard to the principle. What has happened? The federal government has taken no action. In the meantime two provinces of Canada, Saskatchewan and Ontario, have brought forward legislation.

The Ontario act is far too narrow and really does not solve the problem in respect of compensating the innocent victims of criminal acts. The Saskatchewan act is a much better one, which brings together the wisdom and the experience gained from the existence of acts in other jurisdictions.

What is going to happen? If we leave this to the provinces we are going to have a hodgepodge of different acts across the country, with differences concerning jurisdiction, the type of acts giving compensation, and differences with regard to the amount of compensation. The result will be that Canadians by and large will not be treated fairly in respect of this serious problem.

What we need is a federal act embracing the best legislation, based on the experience of other jurisdictions, notably England, New Zealand, California and New York, all of which have had working experience with this type of problem. We owe it to the memory of Larry Botrie and all other citizens—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I know how concerned the hon. member is about the progress of the well-being of our citizens. That concern, however, is shared by all hon. members.

The desire to improve our laws must be accompanied, more specially in the case of the party in power, by a concern for preparing laws which are constitutional. As a matter of fact, the hon. member understood that difficulty when he himself said that such legislation comes primarily under provincial jurisdiction. Although the R.C.M.P. may, by contract, be active in certain provinces, this does not in any way alter this principle.

Now, to my mind, there should, first of all, be an agreement between the provinces and the federal government in order that an act in keeping with the constitution might be passed.

At any rate, the Minister of Justice knows the Saskatchewan laws, as he does that which is known in Ontario as the "Good Samaritan Law"; the same applies to the studies made by Osgoode Hall, and the report of Mr. Feeney of Ottawa. All those works are now being studied. Let us hope that some day we will be able to pass a law which applies to all Canadians.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—UNION DISPUTE RESPECTING REPORTING OF OTTAWA CONFERENCE

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my appearance on the late show arises from a situation which developed as a result of the dominion-provincial conference held in two areas in Ottawa a number of days ago. The C.B.C. had assigned one Ron Laplante from the province of Quebec to come to Ottawa and record a part of the proceedings, but because of a jurisdictional dispute between two unions his copy was treated as hot copy, and he could not make his reports.

This situation has many ramifications, a good number of which distressed me. I do not believe in seven minutes I could deal with all the distressing points, and I certainly do not think I could resolve the jurisdictional dispute between the labour groups, because I am not aware of all the facts. The situation which took place then I am sure could take place again and again. Because I do have good information that the situation as it existed then has not been resolved, I thought it would be worth while to present this matter to the house during the squawk show this evening.

I was a member of the committee of the House of Commons which dealt with Bill C-186 during the last session of parliament. I know how I and other members of the committee agonized over the problems of seeing that working people were represented by the labour union that they felt best could serve their interests. I know that we also had many discussions in that committee about the dangers, if national bargaining units were broken down into regional bargaining units, and where this would lead us. Even without the benefit of Bill C-186 perhaps we now have our answer in what happened with regard to our national broadcasting system as it attempted to report on this dominion-provincial conference in Ottawa. Therefore I feel that in the public interest this matter should be raised here.

There is of course the issue of freedom of the press and the public's right to know, and our rights as people in a nation not to be hurt or hindered in our knowledge by regional battles. I do not know whether Mr. Laplante, for example, was brought in to present a particular point of view, the Quebec government's point of view, let us say. He must have been there at the request or order of management for some particular purpose which would have helped each one of us understand a little more about that conference.

If this sort of incident were repeated, one could foresee that planes would be grounded in Montreal on their way from good old Halifax to good old Ottawa because the stewardess on the Montreal to Ottawa run carries lemonade as efficiently but wears a different union label, say, than the pilot on the plane. That sort of situation of course would be ridiculous, but I suggest hardly more ridiculous than what I know of the incident I have mentioned.

I do not think we can build a nation when there is a possibility that squabbles between groups, who one might think would have the same interest but are really competing with each other, would result in the action that was taken in this particular case. I know from newsmen—and I used to be a newsman—that the battle for the union in Montreal was a very hard fought one. I know there are probably some scars left by it that will be around for a long, long time. But the fact is I very seriously question that the sort of thing that happened in the Laplante incident should have happened, and I would like some assurance in this respect. I suppose the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Stanbury) will answer, but I really think it is more a matter within the purview of the labour department. On behalf of the Canadian people we would like some assurance that this sort of thing is not apt to happen again.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for bringing this serious problem to the attention of the house. He will recall that last September the Canada Labour Relations Board certified the Confederation of National Trade Unions as the bargaining agent of C.B.C. newsroom employees in Montreal and Quebec City, who were formerly represented by the Canadian Wire Service Guild, the union representing other C.B.C. newsroom employees.

I am informed by the C.B.C. that a Montreal based reporter was assigned to cover the federal-provincial conference for C.B.C. radio news as a Quebec specialist. The reporter was a C.N.T.U. member, and the C.W.S.G. maintained that coverage of news outside of Montreal and Quebec City falls within their jurisdiction. Consequently, the C.W.S.G. refused to allow the reports by the C.B.C. Montreal reporter to be aired, despite efforts by the C.B.C. to have them broadcast.

Now, the C.B.C. advises that it attempted to arrange a meeting between the corporation and the two unions, but this attempt was unsuccessful. The C.B.C. has assured me it is continuing its efforts to resolve this jurisdictional problem, but failing this the matter may have to be referred back to the Canada Labour Relations Board for a ruling. In the meantime, Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that all the facilities of the Secretary of State, and I am sure of the Minister of Labour, are entirely at the disposition of the parties to this dispute.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.18 p.m.

CANADA DAY

PROVISION FOR NAME AND OBSERVANCE OF NATIONAL HOLIDAY

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe) asks for leave to introduce Bill No. C-132 entitled: An Act respecting Canada Day.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Marceau: Mr. Speaker, I never did get a chance to mention your appointment to the high office you hold and I take this first opportunity to congratulate you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marceau: Every legislation passed by the House of Commons must meet a need or recognize a state of affairs which the federal parliament feels is in the best interest of the Canadian people.

[English]

The bill I respectfully submit to the kind attention of the hon. members of this house meets at the same time these two requirements.

[Translation]

For most Canadians who have reached political maturity, Dominion Day recalls the past; Canada Day, on the contrary, represents the present and the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marceau: The idea is not new, but it is like a ripe fruit and must be picked before it is too late.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Marceau: It will take me thirty seconds only.

Mr. Speaker: In calling the hon. member for Lapointe to order, I am tempted to say that the more things change the more they are the same.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Marceau: Exactly, Mr. Speaker, I would like things to really change, for once.

In order that the first Monday of July may become the day of the living and not of the dead, I move that the act respecting Dominion Day be repealed and replaced by an act respecting Canada Day.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

USE OF AUDITOR GENERAL BY GOVERNMENT BODIES

Question No. 75—Mr. Fortin:

1. Does the government intend to appoint the Auditor General of Canada as auditor or co-auditor for Air Canada, the Bank of Canada, the Industrial Development Bank, the C.N.R., C.M.H.C. and the Canadian Wheat Board and, if not, for what reason?

2. What is the advantage of appointing private auditors?

3. Does the government intend to permit the Auditor General of Canada to recruit his own accountants?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. No. It is the belief of the government that the present arrangements are satisfactory and economical.

2. By the very fact of incorporation, these crown corporations are intended to have a large measure of responsibility for the performance of their statutory functions and to be able to function more or less as other companies do, and in several instances to compete with them. Because they are commercially oriented and are intended to operate at arm's length from and without the day-to-day governmental and parliamentary surveillance that is the case with government departments, it would seem proper that these crown corporations should, as a matter of policy, be audited by public accounting firms that would treat and serve any other commercial corporation. Such a policy will best ensure that the arm's length relationship and the operational independence and freedom of these corporations conferred on them by parliament are adequately safeguarded, and that the corporations have the use of the same kind of commercial accounting advice from their auditors that privately owned companies have.

3. Such officers and employees as are necessary to enable the Auditor General to perform his duties are appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Public Service Employment Act.

PROPERTY EXCHANGE, CRAIG STREET, MONTREAL

Question No. 79—Mr. Fortin:

1. Have transactions been completed relative to the exchange of property on Craig Street in Montreal?

2. Has the Government of the Province of Quebec withdrawn its notice of expropriation relative to this property?

3. Has the advisory committee established by Treasury Board relative to such properties (Craig Street, Longueuil) submitted its report and, if so, what are its conclusions?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Defence and the offices of the Prime Minister and the Privy Council as follows: 1. No. The city of Montreal was unable to complete the exchange of lands negotiated with the Department of National Defence because the province of Quebec expropriated the city's interest in the Craig street armoury site before documentation was completed.

2. No.

3. Yes. The report is in the form of a confidential memorandum prepared by officials in the public service for the use of the Treasury Board. It is not considered in the public interest to publish reports of this type.

REPORT ON BAY OF FUNDY TIDES

Question No. 169—Mr. Coates:

1. On what date does the government expect to have the final report from the Federal-Provincial Committee that is carrying out a feasibility study into the harnessing of the Bay of Fundy Tides from a power point of view?

2. Will an interim study be made available to the government in this matter and, if so, will this study be made available to Members of the House of Commons?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. The report of the Atlantic tidal power programming board is expected to be available in July, 1969.

2. A progress report of the tidal power study was made available to the participating governments in February, 1968 and a press release outlining the progress achieved was issued at that time. No general distribution of this report is proposed because of the incomplete nature of most of the information then available.

REQUESTS FOR CANADIAN AIRCRAFT FOR BIAFRA RELIEF FLIGHTS

Question No. 319—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. What international aid organizations within Canada (such as Oxfam of Canada) have sought to procure Canadian government aircraft for the purpose of air-lifting food supplies to Biafran war victims?

2. What was the response to such requests?

3. What criteria were stipulated as essential pre conditions to a transfer of Canadian aircraft for such purposes?

4. Does the Government of Canada have any knowledge of aircraft of other countries being used in the air-lift of food supplies to Biafra?

5. What is the total value of food supplies from Canada known to have reached Biafra?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The Canadian Red Cross, on behalf of the International Committee of the Red Cross, sought Hercules aircraft from the Canadian government to fly from Fernando Po into the rebel-held area in Nigeria. UNICEF has inquired whether Canada would be in a position to supply large helicopters to be operated between the offshore islands and the mainland. More recently, Norchurchaid, a Scandinavian church group operating from Sao Thome, requested the government to make two Hercules aircraft available to them for their own use.

2. An aircraft placed at the disposal of the Canadian Red Cross for the airlift between Fernando Po and the rebel held area became operational on October 26. The government indicated it was unable to accede to the requests made by UNICEF and Norchurchaid.

3. The major criterion was that the agreement of the Nigerian government be obtained for use of Canadian aircraft in Nigerian airspace.

4. Reports indicate that the national Red Cross societies of Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Finland and the Netherlands have each made a single aircraft available to the ICRC for the airlift from Fernando Po into the rebel held area of Nigeria.

5. So far about $900,000 out of the food aid allocation of $1,000,000 has been shipped, arriving at Fernando Po November 7 and at Lagos November 9. Three sevenths of this amount is consigned by the Red Cross to the Biafran side.

C.B.C. ADVERTISEMENT "TELEVISION IS"

Question No. 320—Mr. Peddle:

1. What was the cost to the CBC of full page advertisements captioned "Television Is" and several smaller advertisements with the same theme, appearing in the Ottawa Journal and the Ottawa Citizen dated September 28, 1968?

2. Have similar advertisements appeared in other Canadian newspapers and, if not (a) will they appear (b) in what newspapers, and (c) at what cost?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. There was no direct cost to the C.B.C. for the "Television Is" advertisement in the Ottawa Journal and the Ottawa Citizen (September 23 to 28 inclusive) since the newspaper space was made available on a contra-account basis whereby the newspapers received comparable dollar value in broadcast advertising in return for newspaper space.

2. Yes, similar advertisements have appeared in several newspapers in Alberta, Manitoba, Ontario and Newfoundland.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL POLLUTION CONTROL COUNCIL

Question No. 374—Mr. Anderson:

Have any replies been received from the provinces to the 1967 invitation of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources to establish a Federal-Provincial Pollution Control Council and, if so, what is the nature of the responses?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The offer to establish a national advisory committee on water pollution was presented to the provinces in 1967. Six provinces have commented on this proposal and their general reaction was favourable. This matter was considered further at a meeting of the Canadian council of resource ministers in October, 1968 and more discussions are planned over the next few months.

C.B.C. HEADQUARTERS BUILDING, MONTREAL

Question No. 448—Mr. Valade:

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No, a search of departmental and Canadian Broadcasting Corporation records has revealed no evidence of any such communication or authorization.

2. Have any projects been agreed upon and, if so (a) what and where are they (b) what is the estimated cost of each project?

Hon. J. J. Greene (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): 1. Yes, proposals were made collectively to all of the provinces on May 5, 1967 and individually to each province on December 21, 1967, and additionally to British Columbia on September 24, 1968.

2. No. (a) Preliminary discussions are in hand with British Columbia. (b) This information is not available at the present time.

Question No. 465—Mr. McCleave:

1. Did any member of the Ministry indicate that the Atlantic Development Board would receive applications from the non-designated areas of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick for aid similar to that given by ADA and, if so, whom and when?

2. Were any applications received by the Board for ADA-type benefits?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council offices and the Department of Forestry and Rural Development as follows: 1. Yes—the Prime Minister in Halifax, Nova Scotia, on May 30, 1968.

2. Yes.

RED CROSS REQUEST FOR AID FOR NIGERIA

Question No. 488—Mr. Haidasz:

Has the Government of Canada received a request from the International Red Cross to provide relief for the victims of the civil war in Nigeria and, if so (a) what was the nature of any such request (b) when was such request made (c) what was the response?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. Yes.

1 (a), (b) and (c). On May 28, 1968 an appeal was made by the International Committee of the Red Cross to the government of Canada through the Canadian Red Cross Society. The immediate response was a cash grant of $60,000 provided to the ICRC for relief work in areas of Nigeria where the need was greatest.

At a meeting July 12 with the Secretary of State for External Affairs, representatives of Canadian voluntary organizations, including the Canadian Red Cross, invited a Canadian government contribution to Nigerian relief and drew attention to the ICRC's need for transport aircraft. The Secretary of State for External Affairs indicated that the Canadian government would be prepared to consider a request from the Canadian Red Cross Society for an aircraft if the agreement of the parties concerned (the Nigerian government, the ICRC and the rebel authorities) could be obtained, and satisfactory arrangements made for its use. The Canadian government also, shortly thereafter, allocated $500,000 in food aid for distribution by the ICRC in the areas of greatest need in Nigeria.

In August, the ICRC developed a program involving agreed daylight flights into rebel held (Biafran) territory. The government learned that the ICRC would, through the Canadian Red Cross Society, ask for Canadian Hercules aircraft to participate. As agreement was not reached with both sides in the conflict, the daylight airlift was not possible and the Canadian government was not able to accede to this request.

On September 17, another allocation of $500,000 was made for food to be distributed in the needy areas in Nigeria. On September 26, following a meeting between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the national commissioner of the Canadian Red Cross Society, an offer of a Canadian armed forces Hercules aircraft was made to the ICRC for use in territory under the control of the Nigerian government. The aircraft in question arrived in Lagos on October 14 and was put at the disposal of the ICRC.

Following discussions between the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Commissioner for External Affairs of Nigeria, on October 8, in New York, agreement was reached by which the Nigerian government would allow Canadian armed forces aircraft to operate in Nigeria, including rebel held territory, for the purpose of transporting relief supplies on behalf of the ICRC. A Canadian armed forces Hercules scheduled for use between the island of Fernando Po (Equatorial Guinea) and rebel held territory received clearances from Equatorial Guinea on October 26 and was put at the disposal of the ICRC on arrival there on October 26.

OFFERS OF RELIEF BY CANADA FOR NIGERIA

Question No. 489—Mr. Haidasz:

1. What are the details of the arrangement between the International Red Cross and the Government of Nigeria with regard to relief offered by the Government of Canada, including the operation of Canadian aircraft?

2. Were any assurances given to the Government of Canada that relief will reach the people in Biafra-held territory?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The food aid provided by the Canadian government for those affected by the Nigerian civil war is consigned to the Red Cross. No special arrangements have been necessary, as it is customary to consign relief to the Red Cross in these circumstances.

Use of Canadian armed forces aircraft by the Red Cross for the transport of relief supplies to all parts of Nigeria, including rebel held territory, is governed by an understanding among the Red Cross, the Nigerian government and the Canadian government whereby Canadian aircraft may operate in Red Cross relief operations. The Canadian government contributes aircraft and crews to the aircraft, which is under the operational direction of the Red Cross.

2. All Canadian government relief assistance to Nigeria is consigned to the Red Cross for distribution to areas in which they consider the need is greatest, including the rebel held territory. At the request of the Red Cross a proportion of the Canadian government's food assistance has been shipped to Fernando Po for airlifting into the rebel held areas by aircraft under Red Cross auspices and for distribution in these areas by the Red Cross.

MICROWAVE RADIATION LEVELS

Question No. 500—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What is the source of the radiation guide numbers or levels being enforced by D.O.T. as part of its responsibility for the licensing of microwave relay towers?

2. For how long have these radiation guide numbers been accepted as the standard for safety by D.O.T.?

3. Has D.O.T., as part of its responsibility for licensing, done any systematic study of how the threshold of danger from microwave radiation changes with humidity, air temperature, the frequency of irradiation, the cumulative effect of exposure over long periods of time?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): In so far as telecommunication is concerned.

1. The power level of the microwave radiation is controlled by the appropriate standard radio system plans (these are regulatory documents issued under the authority of the Postmaster General). These levels are determined by the following criteria: (a) The minimum antenna directivity pattern; gain versus angle; (b) The maximum transmitter power permitted.

2. The first standard radio system plan was released in 1963 and at present most microwave bands are now covered by one of these documents. These documents are not safety standards, but are established for the purpose of controlling radio interference.

3. No.

AERIAL PHOTOGRAPHY AT MICROWAVE RELAY TOWERS

Question No. 501—Mr. Schreyer:

1. Has the federal Department of Agriculture or any other federal department or agency ordered infra-red process aerial photography to be made of areas that are in near proximity to microwave relay towers and, if so, at what locations was such photography done?

2. Is any federal department or agency now in possession of such photographs and what interpretation has been made to date of such photographs?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Yes. The area between the Gunton and Stony Mountain microwave towers was photographed from the air in the near infrared spectrum of from about 700 to 900 millimicrons.

2. Yes. Tonal differences observed in these photographs reflect variation in crop growth and conditions in accordance with water table patterns, time of planting, crop differences and variety differences. There is not a linear pattern or other organized pattern which would show a zone of immaturity or of more rapid growth, or a physical change in general, in line with the microwave towers. Further, the forest and woodlot areas do not show a pattern of change through the area.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The incident which reportedly occurred at Toronto international airport on August 22, 1968 was investigated but factual evidence has not been found to substantiate the claim that the aircraft had in fact descended below the normal descent path.

(b) The application was received on August 10, 1966. (c) An economic and engineering study has been undertaken by the Department with respect to improving the existing runway, together with constructing a 1,500 foot extension.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. SKI FACILITIES, CAPE BRETON HIGHLANDS PARK

Question No. 597—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys):

1. On what date was the initial decision made to provide skiing facilities at the Cape Breton Highlands National Park, what was the basis for the decision, who carried out the enquiry into the possibility of providing such facilities and what was the location selected in the Park for the establishment of these facilities and on what date was the decision reached?

2. (a) How does the present decision to provide ski facilities at the Cape Breton Highlands National Park vary from the former decision for the providing of these facilities and why have changes been made in the initial proposal (b) what changes were made?

3. What would have been the estimated cost of providing ski facilities at the Cape Breton Highlands National Park with the initial proposal and what is the estimated financial involvement of the federal government with the present program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. Since 1958, there has been constant pressure from the Sydney Board of Trade, the Cape Breton Ski Club, numerous private individuals, and members of parliament, to have this department undertake ski development in Cape Breton Highlands national park. Investigations by departmental officials in 1961 and in 1966 indicated that the best potential location within the park for a ski development was South Mountain. Their surveys merely confirmed the technical suitability of the area for skiing and were not comprehensive studies of development feasibility. The decision to invite development proposals was made in June 1968, and was based on the report of a private consulting firm which examined the feasibility of a ski area in the park last year. The location selected for the establishment of these facilities, recommended by departmental officials and the consulting firm, was the northern face of South Mountain.

2. (a) Originally it was planned to provide only basic facilities such as an access road, parking area, a rope tow and a warming hut. However as a result of the consultants' report on the development potential of the area, the demand for skiing facilities, and economic feasibility, it was apparent that a more comprehensive development could be considered. (b) In general, the changes concern the extent of development. The present call for tenders provides for more extensive development of the site in two stages. The first phase of development will include a day lodge with cafeteria facilities and a ski shop, a 2,200 foot T-Bar lift, a 5-run trail and slope system, and parking for 125 cars. Additional ski runs and facilities will be provided at a later date as the demand and profit warrant.

3. The earlier work on planning ski facilities at Cape Breton Highlands national park was concerned with selecting a possible site with very modest facilities. This plan was not developed to the point of costing. With the present program, the estimated financial involvement of the federal government is $13,000 for an access road and parking facilities. The balance of the costs of development will be borne by the successful tenderer for the ski facilities.

[Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys).]

J. W. Pickersgill, and was referred back to the Board of Broadcast Governors on September 6, 1967 as part of an overall review of television channel allocation in southern Ontario. Subsequently the Canadian Radio and Television Commission in its announcement dated October 3, 1968 stated among other things as follows: "Channel 3 to continue to be used in its present location in order to maintain local service in the Barrie area".

Question No. 651—Mr. Matte:

Has a decision regarding the request by the C.F.U. and Quebec authorities for compensation of $10.00 per acre of jute harvested during 1967 been made and, if not, on what date will such announcement be made?

STUDY OF "CANADA NORTH DEVELOPMENT CORRIDOR"

Question No. 654—Mr. Forrestall:

1. Has the Department of Transport undertaken any study of, or study as a result of, a proposal entitled "Canada North Development Corridor" prepared by H. G. Acres Research and Planning Ltd.?

2. If so, what is the nature of such studies, and what conclusions, if any, have been reached?

AIRPORT CONSTRUCTION, EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

Question No. 668—Mr. Beaudoin:

Has the Department of Transport considered studying or begun to study the possibility of building the new international airport in the huge natural basin which lies between Drummondville and St. Hyacinthe in the Eastern Townships?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The location of the new airport is subject to many complex and interrelated criteria. A large region, including the Drummondville-St. Hyacinthe area was carefully examined on the basis of these criteria. More than 20 possible sites were identified and five or six were judged to be most favourable.

This analysis is now the subject of discussion with the province of Quebec.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 670—Mr. Clermont:

What was the total amount of unemployment insurance contributions collected in each province in 1967?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The Unemployment Insurance Commission advises: Statistics of unemployment insurance contributions paid in each province are not kept. The reason for this is, that in most cases, large companies pay their contributions from a central point. In many cases, contributions paid by these companies cover most if not all provinces. It is therefore impossible to determine which contributions are payable on behalf of residents of each province.

However, during the fiscal year 1967-68, the total contributions paid by employer-employee amounted to $347,457,716. In addition, the government paid into the Fund, $69,491,543. The Commission collected $187,798 in penalties and $15,894,160 in interest on investments for a total revenue of $433,031,218.

2. Have any of the required lands already been acquired and how many acres are involved?

3. Are any agreements pending with regard to the acquiring of additional acreage and how many acres are involved?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1. There has been no decision as yet on acquisition of additional land for expansion of Toronto international airport.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Yes. Three, namely Angels Cove, Cuslett and North Boat Harbour.

MINE DUMP FIRE, SPRINGHILL, N.S.

Question No. 711—Mr. Coates:

1. Have officials of the federal government carried out an investigation into the pollution problems associated with the mine dump fire at Springhill, Nova Scotia?

2. If such an investigation has been carried out what were the results and are there dangers inherent in the pollution to the residents of the area?

3. If no such investigation has been carried out into this pollution problem does the government intend to carry out such an investigation to determine the health hazard associated with this pollution problem?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes.

2. The investigation was conducted in August, 1968. There was no evidence of a health hazard in the vicinity of the dump. However, as smoke dispersion is usually favourable during the summer, further testing will be conducted in late autumn or winter. Discussions with officials of the province of Nova Scotia concerning the organizational aspects of this investigation are in progress.

3. See answer in 2 above.

INDIAN RESERVE COMMUNITY PASTURES, SASKATCHEWAN

Question No. 750—Mr. Burton:

With respect to the community pasture projects now under development on the Muskowekwan and Gordon Indian Reserves, who will be responsible for the management and operation of the pastures once they are completed?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): The prairie farm rehabilitation administration of the Department of Forestry and Rural Development.

CONSTRUCTION OF RETAINING WALLS, ST. LAWRENCE RIVER

Question No. 767—Mr. Matte:

Does the federal government pay all or part of the costs involved in the construction of retaining walls required because of dredging or navigation on the St. Lawrence River and, if so, (a) in what proportion (b) under what circumstances?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): The Federal Government under current practice may pay up to 100 per cent of the cost of remedial or protection works in cases where more than one-half of the erosion is considered to be due to navigation or the presence of Federal Government structures and where the value of the land to be protected is more than double the cost of providing protection. Where erosion is due mostly to natural causes, a lesser responsibility may be accepted but only in proportion to the extent that it is caused by navigation.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM, TORONTO

Question No. 527—Mr. Robinson:

1. What amount was expended under the Winter Works Program for the City of Toronto and for each of the Boroughs of Metropolitan Toronto each year since the program was instituted?

2. What projects were carried out by these municipalities and how much was paid under the Winter Works program for each project?

3. What projects, if any, have been curtailed as a result of the cancellation of the Winter Works Program?

Return tabled.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask again when I can expect an answer to question No. 4, which has been on the order paper since September 12, a period of more than two months? If the delay is in the hope that the pensions referred to might be increased before an answer is given, I would not mind waiting a little longer. There must be some reason for the delay. What is the reason?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege with regard to question No. 43.

Questions

The Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) is not in the house but I wish to point out that this question is only a repetition of two questions already asked; the only thing is that more recent information is requested.

I feel that an answer could have been given at least six weeks ago.

[English]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to refer to a starred question because of the habit of this government not to give an answer within two or three days. I refer to question No. 761 with regard to protests from the mayor and other citizens of Rock Island, Quebec, protesting the construction of a new post office on the ground that it is not needed and would constitute an unnecessary expenditure. In these days of financial crisis it is quite wonderful for people in any part of this country not to be asking for things, and I would think an answer to this question would serve as an inspiration to some who may desire extra expenditures.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): The right hon. gentleman's question was placed on the order paper on November 14 and I was not aware of it. However, I believe I can answer it if he will withdraw it as a starred question. The situation in Rock Island results simply from a difference of opinion between two groups. One group prefers a modern, up to date post office which can furnish the postmen and the sorters with modern facilities and services in their work. It is the duty of the Post Office to provide facilities of this kind for its employees.

On the other hand there is a group who quite naturally feel that the age of the building itself is an asset, that it carries with it certain relations with the past, with the traditions of the area; but of course they are not the ones who are working in it, and I think the Post Office Department is going to go ahead with its decision to provide up to date, modern facilities for all those who work for us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that still does not answer the question as to what will be the expected cost of this building and the purchase of property in order to make a new post office possible. Is it not a fact, as asked in the question, that the mayor on behalf of the area says it is an unnecessary expenditure and should not be proceeded with?

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There should not be a debate at this time. If the minister wants to give the information requested he should answer the question, but there should be no debate.

Mr. Kierans: Mayors, Mr. Speaker, have elections to win too.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Kierans: So far as the last part of the question is concerned, it should not be addressed to me but to my colleague the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that being so can the question remain on the order paper so the other hon. gentleman can give the answer?

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken I believe the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance was anxious to answer my question.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I just want to inform the hon. member that this is a question requiring quite a bit of detailed information. It is true that some of this was put forward in answer to previous questions of a similar nature by the hon. member, but there is additional information involved which requires quite a bit of work to put it in the form necessary to give a complete answer. I will try to check into this and see that it is hurried along as much as possible.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notices of motions Nos. 33 and 34 are agreeable to the government.

Would Your Honour be good enough to call notices of motions Nos. 29 and 32?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that notice of motion No. 4 be allowed to stand.

[English]

DISCONTINUANCE OF RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE, NEWFOUNDLAND

Motion No. 29—Mr. Peddle:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before the House a copy of the application of C.N.R. to the Canadian Transport Commission to discontinue rail passenger service in Newfoundland and a copy of the statement of costs and revenues during "Prescribed Accounting Years" which accompanied this application.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there is no objection whatever to producing a copy of the application of the C.N.R. to discontinue the Newfoundland rail service. However, under the law as it presently reads, the cost figures which the hon. member has also asked to have produced "shall not be published or revealed in such a manner as to be available for the use of any other person, unless in the opinion of the commission such publication is necessary in the public interest." The commission has not made any decision that the publication is necessary in the public interest.

I am informed, however, that the material which the hon. member has asked for was supplied to him inadvertently as the result of a telephone request which he made to an official of the commission.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hellyer: Since he now has the information, and it is already in that sense made public, and since the hon. member is himself in a position to reveal it if he wishes, there is obviously no point in the government taking the position of refusing to produce it. Consequently I propose to table it voluntarily and would ask the hon. member if he would, in the circumstances, agree to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Ambrose Hubert Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, it has served its usefulness for me and the minister can have it back.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Dropped.

FEDERAL ADVISORY BODIES

Motion No. 32—Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre):

That an Order of the House do issue for a return listing all advisory committees, advisory councils or advisory bodies appointed by the federal government under the provisions of any statute, and showing also (a) the number of times each such committee, council or body is required to meet each year, and (b) the number of times each such committee, council or body has met in each of the last three years for which records are available.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members will notice this motion is wanting in precision. It would appear to require the production of this particular information for all such advisory bodies right back to the beginning of federal government in Canada. The motion would be acceptable to the government if it would be understood that it refers only to advisory committees, advisory Councils and advisory bodies currently in operation.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is quite satisfactory; that is what I meant.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Why didn't you say so?

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the minister is it the pleasure of the house that motion No. 32 be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FRED AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND QUEBEC GOVERNMENTS

Motion No. 33—Mr. Coates:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the FRED Agreement between the Government of the Province of Quebec and the federal government.

Motion agreed to.

FRED AGREEMENT BETWEEN FEDERAL AND NEW BRUNSWICK GOVERNMENTS

Motion No. 34—Mr. Coates:

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the FRED Agreement between the Government of the Province of New Brunswick and the federal government?

Motion agreed to.

FINANCE

ATTENDANCE AT BONN MEETING OF MINISTER AND BANK GOVERNOR

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister relating to finance. In view of its importance I assume he is fully familiar with the situation involved. Is there anything he would like to tell the house in connection with the flying visit to Bonn by the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, and with regard to whether this relates to the current exchange crisis? If so, would he indicate whether Canada is taking any particular initiative with regard to this crisis or whether the minister and the governor of the bank were simply responding to an invitation to go to Bonn.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The position is that the minister did respond to an invitation, as the Leader of the Opposition puts it. He flew over to Bonn with the governor of the Bank of Canada and some other officials. The meetings are going on. There is no particular position which Canada has been instructed to take at those meetings.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Can the right hon. gentleman indicate whether the minister has been asked for or will be tendering advice to the government of West Germany with regard to balancing its budget?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I believe you did not hear that question and therefore did not rule it out of order. I would say that in that sense we are not intervening in the affairs of West Germany. It is a problem that that government will decide itself. Perhaps this is just as irrelevant as the question, but I should like to say that the Canadian dollar is in a very strong position.

HOUSING

REPORT OF TASK FORCE AND SUBSEQUENT LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport in his capacity as minister in charge of housing, since the task force operations are about concluded, when he expects to present the report and subsequent legislation to the house.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I am still hopeful that the report will be ready about mid January. We have one more week of hearings outside Ottawa and then two weeks of hearings, both public and private, in Ottawa following which we intend to write the report with the anticipation that it should be ready about mid January. Concurrently I hope to present to the government some recommendations which could be dealt with in the new year with the hope that legislation would be ready for consideration by the house some time in the new year, which would permit any impact it might have to be felt on next year's construction program.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Lewis: In the meantime would the minister inform the house whether his suspension of the financing of studies having to do with urban redevelopment is permanent or temporary and, if temporary, for how long. Could he also inform the house whether this means that some studies which were actually in progress have been cut off.

Mr. Hellyer: It does not affect the studies which are in progress. It was merely a suspension for a few weeks of the commencement of new studies. To answer my hon. friend's question concerning how long this freeze, as it has been called, will be in effect I can only suggest I would hope the government would be in a position to look at the information and reach a decision very early in the new year, well in advance of the requirements relating to any program for next year's building construction.

I think the reasons for this are apparent, but perhaps I might just briefly recapitulate them. In our studies we have found that the traditional method used in urban renewal, of taking a large area, razing the whole area and rebuilding the whole thing, while it may be appropriate in certain circumstances where the land use is to be changed, in other circumstances may not be the least bit appropriate. In some cases we have been razing perfectly habitable houses and other houses—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think the minister should make a general statement at this time.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's last answer will he tell the house why it was necessary to suspend the financing of these studies instead of merely redirecting the purpose?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, unless some new guide lines were given to the people doing the studies I suspect they might come up with the same kind of solutions which the task force feels may not be adequate, and which we also feel could perhaps be considerably improved upon. It is therefore felt that we should determine the guide lines before any studies can continue.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, in view of the current newspaper advertising campaign by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, does the minister intend to make more moneys available to the corporation for these purposes before the task force reports?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will realize that just a few weeks ago we did make additional moneys available in order to increase the number of houses started this year before the freeze-up. I think this was a very important move on the part of the government, because every additional house that is built takes pressure off the market and helps to alleviate the pressure of increasing loans and so on. In so far as next year's program is concerned, this is now being screened by the government and will be announced as soon as a decision has been taken.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, I was asking the minister about more money being made available between now and mid-January when this task force will report.

Mr. Hellyer: We have sufficient money for all the things currently required, Mr. Speaker, so I do not think the need for additional funds will represent a problem between now and January.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

POSSIBLE FURTHER ACTION AS TO STATUS OF LABRADOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Does he not think that the time has come to make an official statement on the present litigation concerning Labrador ownership? Is the 1927 decision of the judicial committee of the privy council concerning Labrador ownership now under consideration, or is it considered as final?

Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell us—

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question is very urgent.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member asks whether the government intends to make a statement on this matter and I think the question is relevant.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware that the then minister of justice clarified the situation in respect of Labrador when he appeared before the mines committee several years ago, so there is no problem whatsoever.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—LEGISLATION TO MEET UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Since the government has decided to abandon the winter works program, which has considerably increased unemployment in Canada, especially in Quebec, could the hon. minister tell the house whether the government intends to introduce a bill, as soon as possible, to correct this alarming situation?

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to introduce legislation of this kind at this point. We have expanded our training funds in Quebec and elsewhere, and we believe this will make a better contribution to the problem of unemployment than was made last winter by the winter works program.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the minister. Since the retraining program, even if it was expanded, does not affect certain classes of older people who could take advantage of winter works, could the minister tell us whether he intends to introduce a measure enabling those older persons, let us say from 55 to 65 years of age, to receive some income this winter?

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, where it is to the advantage of the person and the economy that training or retraining take place, it is provided.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not agree that the rate of unemployment in the province of Quebec is reaching unacceptable proportions and perhaps requires supplementary measures in addition to those he has proposed?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is certainly argumentative.

TRADE

INCREASE IN U.S. DUTY ON CUT FLOWERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Danforth (Kent-Essex): Mr. Speaker, I should like, if I may, to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the minister's statement in Toronto regarding recent government action to stabilize corn prices, that an application for duty cannot be a unilateral action and thus compensation was granted to the United States, can the minister now state what compensation was granted to Canada when the United States tariff on Canadian cut flowers entering that country was almost doubled recently?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking about action taken by the government some time ago, and I think that kind of question should be on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INQUIRY AS TO REGULATION OF CIGARETTE ADVERTISING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I wanted to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare, having in mind the excellent and serious statement issued by the minister earlier today warning cigarette smokers of Canada of the health hazards involved. My question is, would the minister consider early action to try to encourage, either by voluntary action by the industry or by legislation, curtailment of the promotion of cigarette smoking through advertising in Canada?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, questions of this nature have been under consideration by the department and the government for some time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the minister paid attention to them?

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I have asked this question before and the minister has taken it under consideration. Would he put this whole question of cigarettes and cigarette smoking before a committee of this house so a thorough survey and study can be made of the entire question?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, I have noted the hon. member's representations. The matter is still under consideration.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

DEPARTMENTAL POLICY RESPECTING SENTENCES IN MARIJUANA CASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice. I would like to ask the minister whether there has been any change in the policy of the government, as stated by the previous minister on February 16, 1968, that counsel in the department would in drug prosecutions thenceforth ordinarily suggest jail terms for those without criminal records convicted of possession of marijuana.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): No, sir.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Arising from the minister's Calgary speech in which he said, "Nor does it seem to me that giving criminal records to several thousand"—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has to put the question directly as much as possible.

Mr. Ritchie: Will the minister say whether, in so far as the responsibility of his department is concerned, the policy of the Department of Justice in regard to sentencing represents the approach taken by the Department of National Health and Welfare?

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES RESPECTING TRADE, TARIFFS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. I wonder whether at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference it is intended to discuss with the provinces the establishment of permanent bodies to consult with the provincial governments on matters of trade, tariffs, customs and monetary policies, as was long advocated by the Prime Minister prior to his attaining ministerial rank.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at this conference it is not proposed that we discuss these matters. As has long been practised by the government, however, there are constant meetings at all levels of government—both official and ministerial—to deal with various aspects of policy which concern the whole of Canada.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Agriculture and arises from the statement made two days ago, when he said that many farmers were following half baked economic theories. I would like to ask the minister whether he had in mind certain theories with regard to money and banking which he held until 1968.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret that I have to deprive the minister of the opportunity to reply.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR—IMPENDING LAY-OFFS AT FORD COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In the light of the lay-offs which are scheduled to begin at the Ford Motor Company of Canada in Windsor on Friday, what action is the minister prepared to take to alleviate the serious unemployment which will result?

An hon. Member: See Paul Martin.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, there will be a lay-off at the Ford Motor Company beginning on Friday and continuing until the number reaches 1,000 later in the year. The manpower services are available in Windsor at the present time and we are interviewing the workers to determine in what way we can be of best service to them. We are in touch with the company as well. It would have been very useful in this case, as in others, if the government had been given some early notice about the intentions of the Ford Motor Company, so that plans could have been made to make the necessary adjustments.

Mr. Lewis: Amend the law.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Send for Paul Martin.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question either to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or the Minister of Labour. Can they assure the house that the processing of unemployment insurance and transitional benefit claims will be carried out as quickly as possible for the first group to be laid off this Friday?

[Later:]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of his comments about the desirability of the Ford Motor Company giving advance notice before it lays off employees, which it is about to do, is the government giving any consideration to introducing a bill which would make it mandatory for companies to give such advance notice both to the employees and to the government?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, about a year ago a similar unexpected lay-off took place in Sydney and my predecessor, the then minister of manpower and immigration, asked himself whether it might not be necessary to oblige companies by law to provide advance notice. I think this situation raises the same question. It brings to mind the recommendation on this point that has been made by the Economic Council of Canada.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does it not bring to mind the recommendation specifically made by Mr. Justice Freedman two years ago about such legislation being needed?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, it brings to mind that excellent report which was on a much broader basis than this particular question.

Mr. Fairweather: But the formula was suggested.

SHIPBUILDING

REQUEST FOR RESTORATION OF SUBSIDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address my question to the Minister of Fisheries. In light of the lay-offs in the shipbuilding industry in the Atlantic provinces, is it the intention of the minister to make a public statement soon about the decision reached following discussions with provincial fisheries ministers regarding the amount of funds that will be made available to the provinces for shipbuilding subsidies?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, plans for assistance to the fishery through construction of fishing vessels is under consideration; but I might point out to the hon. member that employment in shipyards is a matter for another minister.

GRAIN

PROVISION OF BOX CARS TO INCREASE DELIVERIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. George Muir (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, but due to his absence and the absence of the Minister without Portfolio who acts for the wheat board perhaps the Minister of Agriculture could give me the answer. In view of the very critical situation on the prairies due to the large amount of tough and damp grain that is now piled on the ground, is the minister now in a position to report on the availability of box cars to take delivery of the 3 bushel quota announced by the wheat board on October 31 for such grain?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not have a report as of this morning, but my information is that the terminal elevators at Calgary and Edmonton are now operating on a 24 hour day, seven day week basis. However, the hon. member will realize that even though there has been a 3 bushel quota announced, this does not automatically provide the space in which to put those three bushels but is to give a priority to get this out of condition grain into the pipe line, if you like, ahead of grain that will keep longer.

Mr. Muir (Lisgar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would use his good offices to get some box cars out to the prairies in order to move this grain to the elevator space that is available.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has replied to this question. The reply was that he has had excellent co-operation from the railways in having a fair and equal distribution of box cars through the area where this tough and damp grain is located.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question to the minister. Would he or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce make a full statement to this house within a matter of days as to the results of their negotiations and discussions with the railways on the supply and allocation of box cars for grain movement?

Mr. Olson: I will convey that representation to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker.

SHIPPING

EXPERIMENTS WITH NEW ICEBREAKING EQUIPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, which I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. With reference to the first Alexbow experiment on Arctic ice conditions and the report that no tonnage requirements were demanded for that experiment, can the minister tell the house why some 2,000 pounds of freight are demanded when a similar type of experiment is carried out, as planned, into Churchill?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I think I will have to take that question as notice, Mr. Speaker. I would not want to give an off the cuff answer.

WATER RESOURCES

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION TO COMBAT POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. In view of the alarming statement by Dr. Gustav Prevost, a well known Quebec biologist, that all means of fighting water pollution have failed and that swift federal action must be taken at once to avert disaster, would the minister advise the house what steps the government is now taking?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think a question of such a wide scope should be answered by way of a statement on motions, or preferably might be put on the order paper.

Mr. Rynard: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the question could be answered tomorrow on motions.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—CANADIAN COMMITMENT OF SHIPS FOR MEDITERRANEAN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister was asked a question regarding promises or undertakings by the Canadian delegation to the NATO council with particular reference to the demands of the Mediterranean area consequent to the expansion by the U.S.S.R. of its naval strength there. I wish to ask him specifically this question. Did Canada promise to contribute four helicopter equipped destroyers and two support ships for use in the Mediterranean?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not specifically, Mr. Speaker. When the ships are built, and if our naval policy remains the same, the ships will come under the Atlantic command of NATO.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Are these six ships, the four helicopter equipped destroyers and the two support ships, still unbuilt? Does the Prime Minister say that?

Mr. Trudeau: I am referring to the four destroyers which were mentioned by the Minister of National Defence in Brussels, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The question is not whether they were mentioned in Brussels; I want to find out whether these things have been mentioned in Ottawa. I ask the Prime Minister specifically whether these four helicopter equipped destroyers and two support ships are yet unbuilt, and whether the representatives of Canada undertook to supply them.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to identify the ships which the right hon. member is referring to. If he is talking about the ones which were mentioned in Brussels, they are now being built on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We cannot get any information on the promises made there.

CONSEQUENCES OF REMOVAL OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS FROM CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister, in connection with the reassessment of the defence policy, whether the government has had a study prepared and presented concerning the consequences of the removal of nuclear weapons from Canadian soil.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AID

REQUEST FOR INCREASED ASSISTANCE FOR FRENCH SPEAKING COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister if he is willing to give me his attention.

In view of the fact that, under the terms of the assistance program to underdeveloped countries $6 million have been made available to French speaking countries and $125 million to Commonwealth countries, does the government intend to improve its assistance policy to French speaking countries?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the representative of the government to submit a general opinion or to make a statement of general policy, and this should be done on motions.

Mr. Dumont: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—PENSION AGE OF DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. I should like to ask him what statute provides the Cape Breton Development Corporation with the authority to pension off employees at the age of 60?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking for the interpretation of a statute or for a legal opinion, and that type of question is out of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, my question did not ask for the interpretation of any statute. I ask again, is there a statute providing the Cape Breton Development Corporation with the authority to pension off its employees at the age of 60?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is precisely that type of question which the rules do not permit to be asked.

Mr. Trudeau: Why don't you hire a lawyer?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a further point of order which is brought on by the interjection of the Prime Minister who suggested I hire a lawyer. I would think that in the interests of a just society the Prime Minister himself might volunteer his help to the Cape Breton miners.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We are running short of time, so I suggest we go on to another question.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON POSSIBLE ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the fact that he met recently with the provincial fisheries ministers, and bearing in mind the critical situation prevailing in the fishing industry in eastern Canada, would he not give consideration to making a statement on motions as soon as possible?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I will consider it, Mr. Speaker.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REPLACEMENT OF SMALL OFFICES BY RURAL DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. If any small post offices close, will the postal department institute a rural delivery to take its place?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is hypothetical.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ABSENCE FROM HOUSE OF MINES AND RESOURCES MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister any information on the whereabouts of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his failure to be here in his place today, in view of the fact that he was seen in the house last night looking tanned, healthy and well after his trip to South America?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

An hon. Member: The Prime Minister forgot who it is.

Another hon. Member: Who the hell is he?

Mr. Trudeau: I know who the hell he is, Mr. Speaker, and this is not funny because he is in hospital in Montreal.

Mr. Bell: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sorry to hear that, but may I also ask the Prime Minister if he would take it easy with the Solicitor General when he gets back, because his attendance has really been very good on days when he should not have been here.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

APPLICATION FOR ABANDONMENT OF RAIL SERVICE IN P.E.I.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): My question is for the Minister of Transport. I should like to ask the minister whether the Canadian Transportation Commission has received an application from the Canadian National Railways for the abandonment of the rail service in Prince Edward Island.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to direct the question to the Canadian Transportation Commission, but it would seem to be the kind of question which might be answered just as quickly if it were placed on the order paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

MANITOBA—INQUIRY AS TO SECOND PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development responsible for the national parks policy. Could the minister give some indication when the federal government will come to a decision as to the establishment of a second national park in Manitoba?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the question might be placed on the order paper.

YUKON QUARTZ MINING ACT

REQUEST FOR INTRODUCTION OF AMENDING BILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and ask him whether the bill to amend the Yukon Quartz Mining Act has yet been printed. If so, when is it the government's intention to table it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the bill is being considered by the cabinet, and it should be tabled as soon as the study is completed. However, it is a very voluminous bill and its complete study by the cabinet will require some time yet. While I am on my feet—

[English]

I should like to inform the leader of the New Democratic party that perhaps he should read the papers sometimes. I have been Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development for the past five months now.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GREECE—DEATH SENTENCE IMPOSED ON STUDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, the rules do not permit me to comment on what the minister just said, though I should like to.

May I ask the Prime Minister the following question. On Monday my colleague the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby asked the right hon. gentleman a question regarding an opponent of the present Greek military regime who had been condemned to death. He inquired whether the government was contemplating any démarche to the government of Greece on the subject, and the Prime Minister said he would have to inquire into the matter. I wonder whether he has any information today.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did inquire, but I have not found any information that in my opinion would justify intervening in this matter.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

1. Administration, including grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or such dependents as may be approved by Treasury Board of judges who die while in office, and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the government of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $5,892,200.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply, revised estimates of the Department of Justice, fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote No. 1 will be found at page 254 of the blue book, the details thereof being listed at page 255.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Chairman, I am not going to make a very long opening statement since there was a thorough discussion of a number of matters affecting the department when the amendment to the Judges Act was before the house. I anticipate that when the criminal law omnibus bill returns to the house there will be ample scope to review the criminal law.

Since the main estimates of the Department of Justice for 1967-68 were considered in some detail by the standing committee on justice and legal affairs, with the consequence that no extensive statement was made before the house, I think it would be in order for me to make a short general statement concerning this year's estimates of the department.

Hon. members will know that the Government Organization Act of 1966, which was proclaimed on October 1 of that year, transferred to other ministers various branches of the public service that previously fell under the superintendence of the Department of Justice. The result of these changes was that the Department of Justice now has the same responsibilities that it had under the original statute following confederation in 1868, and those duties now remain virtually unaltered.

As matters presently stand, Mr. Chairman, responsibility for the institution and conduct of prosecutions within the federal field of jurisdiction remains with the Attorney General of Canada. This is true even though the supervision of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police now rests with my colleague, the Solicitor General.

Notwithstanding this, Mr. Chairman, prosecutions resulting from police investigations within the federal jurisdiction continue to be the responsibility of the Attorney General of Canada, and are conducted by him through his officials and agents. This situation applies as well to prosecutions under the Combines Investigation Act. While ministerial functions relating to that act are now transferred to the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission reports directly to parliament through that minister, the decision to prosecute and the conduct of a prosecution in any particular combine, merger, monopoly, restraint of trade or price fixing case continues to be the responsibility of the Attorney General.

So, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada continues to be responsible for providing legal services to the government generally, as set out in the Department of Justice Act. In fact, the Attorney General is lawyer for every department of the government service. His functions are advisory. He is charged with conducting litigation on behalf of the people of Canada. He is charged with advising on the drafting of legislation for every government department, and so on.

This year's estimates show an increase in staff amounting to 72 additional positions and a proportionate increase in the amount provided for salaries. I would not want the committee to think that this increased number of 72 positions represents an equivalent increase in the over-all establishment of the government. It has been made clear that it is the intention of the government to provide an integrated legal service along the lines generally recommended in the Glassco report. That is to say, the Department of Justice will now be responsible in a general way for the legal functions that are carried on in every department of government, and to that end we are in the process of integrating the legal services of the government.

This policy, Mr. Chairman, is reflected in the fact that 27 of these new positions represent transfers from other departments—one from Industry, one from Finance, 14 from Defence Production and 11 from National Revenue, customs and excise. This in turn results in an equivalent reduction in the estimates of the other departments involved.

The balance of these positions, apart from some nine in the minister's office, which were not included in previous estimates as a result of former Treasury Board policy but now are included, result from support of the positions that have been transferred—nine secretarial positions have been established for this purpose—and increase in the strength of the department not only in Ottawa but in the regional offices that we plan to set up in major regions of the country.

[Translation]

Honourable members know full well that we have established in Montreal an almost independent office to deal with the department's business in the metropolis of Quebec and Canada. There is also another regional office in Toronto and one in Vancouver. We intend to set up other regional offices, perhaps one in Winnipeg and the other in Halifax. This is the indication of some decentralization in the management of the department's business with a view to ensuring quicker action and a more accessible justice for the citizens of these areas.

[English]

Each of these offices has a professional staff of roughly a dozen lawyers, and these offices have been found to work out very well in practice. It is the intention of the government, as I say, to continue to extend the regional office idea so as to facilitate the work of the department. These local offices can handle claims and prosecutions and provide on the spot legal advice for the various federal government departments that have offices in such cities or districts.

Apart from the work of the department as I have described it, Mr. Chairman, the Department of Justice concerns itself with the subject of law reform. In the very near future I will be reintroducing a bill that will make extensive revisions in the Criminal Code, and I will also be introducing a completely revised and new Expropriation Act. We intend to set up a new research branch in the Department of Justice that will be charged with the reform of the law and the revision of statutes.

I mentioned when I spoke to the students at Osgoode Hall that we were going to set up within the next two years a national law reform commission charged with reviewing the entire area of federal statutes and the criminal law. I hope too that we will have a permanent statute revision next year. The purpose of the research branch of the department will be to co-ordinate and to liaise with the national law reform commission, with institutes of criminology across the country, with law faculties and, of course, the profession in general.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question at this point. Would he relate what he is now saying to the matter of the new edition of the Revised Statutes of Canada? Can he tell us what is the status of that work?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I would be glad to do that, Mr. Chairman.

We are in the process of introducing new types of typesetting and text, and we are introducing the use of the computer in the revision of statutes. The amount set aside in last year's estimates was not expended. We will again set aside $1 million to set up a permanent revision commission. We are negotiating with Queen's University and the University of Montreal to have on a permanent basis, and not a decennial or periodic basis, a permanent revision and consolidation of all types of statutes.

I hope with the use of the computer, the new tapes and the application of the new science called jurimetrics to establish a system in the French and English languages whereby legislators, lawyers and the public generally will be able to go to the regional offices of the department and receive almost instantaneously an up to date version of any consolidated statute on the statute books of Canada. I hope that with the use of computers we can narrow the time gap between the revised statutes and the continuing statutes to about four months.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, further to the question put by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I should like to put the question to the hon. Minister of Justice.

As the statutes are officially revised every ten or 15 years, can the minister tell us approximately when they will next be revised and published because, at the present time, when we want to refer to, for instance, chapter 116, all we find is sections which have been amended. Consequently, can the minister give us the approximate date of that revision?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, before we finish dealing with these estimates, I shall obtain confirmation on an approximate date. I agree with the hon. member that it is most awkward for the citizen, and especially in the case of an expert, to look up something in the statutes. He has to read them all year by year, since 1952. As this is not practical we are trying to get them revised, and I shall try to get the approximate date on which this is supposed to be done.

[English]

There is under consideration in the department a complete revision of the Canada Shipping Act and the Admiralty Act. In conjunction with the Department of Transport we hope to bring in a new maritime code. This is a long term project to be developed continuously in the next five or ten years. After that we will have a rationalized code in Canada for maritime matters.

On other occasions I hope to bring forward revisions to the Exchequer Court Act which will probably provide for some means of relieving some of the pressure that is put on the Supreme Court of Canada. Proceedings must now be by way of a petition for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. The revisions will be in the form of an appellate division of this court and a reform in the administrative law. We shall consider the process of judicial review of administrative tribunals.

These are examples of what we believe to be relatively major undertakings to be undertaken by the Department of Justice in the area of law reform. It is the view of this government that even greater efforts in this area ought to be made, and I therefore intend to bring forward legislation in the months to come that will be directed to this end. I look forward with interest to what hon. members of the committee have to say and I shall do my best to answer their questions.

Mr. McQuaid: Mr. Chairman, we thank the minister for his introductory statement. He has attempted to explain why his departmental estimates are considerably higher than they were last year. I suggest that there are still unanswered questions, and the committee would like to hear answers to those questions.

The minister explained that it would be the policy of the department to establish 72 additional positions within the department. I notice that the estimates this year provide for a vote of $185,000 for professional and special services, while the amount for that item last year was only $50,000. In 1966-67 the amount applicable here was only $10,000. If the minister is to establish 72 additional positions in the department, why does he need the vote of $185,000 to provide for professional and special services? Surely some of those 72 additional men who are to be put on the department's payroll could take care of a good many of the professional services the department is to be expected to supply.

I notice in vote 1 an item of $1,088,000 for the publication of departmental reports and other material. In 1967-68, that is last year, that vote amounted to only $40,000. I think the committee is entitled to know why the amount has jumped from $40,000 to $1,088,000. Another item had to do with travelling expenses. I presume that has reference to travelling expenses for the officials of the department, since judges' travelling expenses are provided for under another item. This year travelling expenses are up by $19,000. Accommodation provided by the Department of Public Works is increased by a figure of $447,000.

The fact is that the estimates of the Department of Justice this year are $4,778,500 higher than they were last year. I suggest that in these days of so-called austerity, of cutbacks by governments, when provinces are told they are practically on their own from now on, it is strange to find that in the Department of Justice, which is a comparatively small department of government, spending estimates for this year are $5 million above those of last year. Before the estimates pass I think the minister must give us a detailed explanation of how this increase has come about.

We hear the minister say that he intends to proceed with proposed amendments to the Criminal Code. This is a very, very important piece of legislation and one which at some time or other could touch virtually every citizen of this country. The amendments were introduced last year under bill C-195. That was an omnibus bill which purported to be an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act and the Customs Tariff. That is legislation of a very wide scope. The Prime Minister said that the law has no place in the bedrooms of the nation; but these proposals are so wide in scope that if they do not make their appearance in the bedrooms of the nation they will affect almost every other phase of our living.

We have not as yet seen this new bill. If it contains everything that was contained in the previous bill C-195, which was submitted last year, it will contain much that is good. The bill contains at the moment some things with which all of us might not be able to agree. We therefore hoped we would not be placed in a position where we would have to vote against the entire bill, including those parts which we considered to be good, simply because there were other parts with which we could not agree. The former minister of justice, the present Prime Minister, indicated last session that the house would be required to vote upon this omnibus bill in its entirety—that it would not be broken up. Since then there has of course, been a change in the administration. The present minister gave us some hope when he intimated that he would like to see the bill divided so that it could be voted on in sections. He expressed himself to that extent. But apparently the great white father who sits in the seat of the prime minister decreed otherwise, and the poor Minister of Justice was faced with the choice of either falling into line or picking up his marbles and going home.

I do not think that even Adolf Hitler ruled with a firmer hand than does the present Prime Minister, nor do I believe there has ever been a more docile group of ministers than those who hold office now. If the medical profession ever gets around to doing spine transplants there will be an open field over there, because these men are spineless. Why cannot the Minister of Justice be an exception to this general rule? I am sure he is convinced in his own mind that this bill should be broken down and voted upon in separate parts. He knows very well that this is the proper way in which to proceed. He knows very well that this is the manner in which the majority of members would like to see it dealt with. I suggest he be not afraid any more of the great white father. The Prime Minister is not going to fire him; he is too good a minister. The Prime Minister will not let him go. If the bill the minister introduces in any way resembles Bill C-195 it could very conveniently be dealt with in separate parts. It is designed in such a way as to be very conveniently broken down. Were this done we would not be obliged to vote against the whole bill simply because there were some clauses or divisions in it with which we could not agree.

For example, there are members of this house whose moral convictions would not allow them to approve those parts of the bill which propose the relaxation of the law relating to homosexuality. I suggest that anyone who feels this way should have the privilege of voting against this part of the bill, and still not be obliged to vote at the same time against those provisions which he feels are good. There are some—and I include myself in this classification—who cannot believe that abortion even in the early stages of pregnancy does not constitute the taking of a life. For this reason, those who think this way should be allowed to vote against this provision without voting against the bill as a whole. We shall expect a statement from the minister with regard to this matter. I hope he will follow the dictates of his own conscience, and divide the measure, perhaps at the same time allowing a free vote on it.

There are many matters with which the minister failed to deal in his opening statement. I fully expected that he would give the house an explanation of the embarrassing position in which this government now finds itself in connection with the case of Mr. Hal Banks. Make no mistake about it, Hal Banks is a fugitive from justice, nothing less. This man was sentenced in 1964 by a Montreal court to five years imprisonment for conspiracy in the beating of another waterfront union member. He appealed this conviction, and by reason of the money which was at his disposal he was able to secure release on bail in an amount of $25,000. He skipped his bail and went to New York. He was later located in the United States and in 1967 the department of the attorney general requested that he be arrested and brought back to Canada to face a charge, not of conspiracy, but of perjury in connection with the evidence he gave before the Norris commission on Great Lakes violence in 1963.

It is most important to note in this connection that extradition was sought, not on a charge of conspiracy to commit assault, for which he had been convicted and sentenced in 1964, but on a charge of perjury. A conspiracy to commit assault is not an extraditable offence, but perjury, I seriously suggest, is such an offence. As hon. members know, there is an extradition treaty between Canada and the United States covering perjury, but not assault.

Ontario therefore asked that Banks be extradited on the charge of perjury. The Ontario application was heard by a man by the name of Abruzzo, a commissioner in New York where, by the way, Banks has been held in custody. He was arrested in New York and placed in gaol there. After hearing all the relevant evidence, commissioner Abruzzo concluded that Banks should be extradited and returned to Ontario for trial on the perjury charge. Mr. Banks then took the somewhat extraordinary course of waiving his right to appeal this decision to a higher court. Rather than avail himself of this procedure he appealed directly to the secretary of state for the United States, Mr. Dean Rusk.

I have my own opinion, as do many others, as to just why the appeal was made to Mr. Rusk rather than to the court of appeal. In any case, Mr. Rusk saw fit to over-rule the decision of the commissioner. He gave reasons. He did admit that perjury was an extraditable offence but he said that the alleged lie concerned a crime which was not extraditable. This line of reasoning is pretty difficult to follow. Perjury is perjury, no matter in what circumstances it is committed. Perjury, I suggest, must be accepted in its ordinary dictionary meaning, as giving false testimony under oath.

The nature of the case in which the perjury was committed is absolutely irrelevant. The only relevant question is: Was perjury committed? Under the Canadian extradition treaty perjury is an extraditable offence, and I completely fail to see how the United States secretary of state could decide otherwise. However, Mr. Chairman, the important point now is that the decision of Mr. Rusk was an executive decision; it was not a judicial decision. There could have been a judicial decision had Mr. Banks availed himself of the right to appeal to the supreme court, but he did not do that. He appealed to a member of the executive who handed down, not a judicial decision but only an executive decision; and since it was an executive decision I suggest that it can be changed by a new administration. This is precisely what Senator Fannin of New Mexico suggests could happen if the proper representations are made to the new administration.

It is very important in this case to distinguish between a judicial and an executive decision, and I repeat that Mr. Rusk's decision was completely an executive decision. I suggest that the Minister of Justice completely misrepresents the case—not deliberately, but the case was misrepresented when he said on November 14 of this year, as recorded in Hansard at page 2721:

> Mr. Speaker, I have just stated the opinion of the law officers of the crown, for the Attorney General of Canada, that the case could not be successfully reopened. As a principle of law I suggest to the hon. member, who is learned in the law, that a mere change in executive in the United States is not sufficient reason to place a man in double jeopardy before the courts. There has been a trial, and it has been concluded.

I agree, Mr. Chairman, that there was a trial before commissioner Abruzzo and he decided that Mr. Banks should be extradited. That should have been the end of the matter, unless Mr. Banks wanted to exercise his right to appeal to a higher court. But remember it was not a court which over-ruled Mr. Abruzzo: It was an executive official, Dean Rusk, who assumed unto himself the functions of a court of appeal.

The Minister of Justice stated further, as recorded at page 2721 of Hansard:

> The case for Mr. Banks' extradition has been before the United States courts and the proceedings have been exhausted.

Further on he said:

> —the extradition proceedings having been taken unsuccessfully before the United States courts those extradition proceedings are spent, and that the case could not be successfully reopened before the courts.

That, Mr. Chairman, is not the case. The extradition proceedings were not taken unsuccessfully before the United States court. They were taken successfully before commissioner Abruzzo and he decided that extradition should be granted in this case. The decision of the commissioner was that this alleged criminal should be extradited and returned to Ontario to stand his trial. It was the decision of Dean Rusk that he should not be extradited, and again I say this was purely an executive decision and can be reversed by a new executive.

I am afraid that the whole spectrum of American politics looms high over this executive decision by Mr. Rusk. Even our former secretary of state for external affairs, Hon. Paul Martin, challenged Mr. Rusk's position when, on March 27 of this year, he was reported to have said that the ground on which Mr. Rusk refused to return Banks to Canada—

> —does not exist under the terms of the extradition convention between Canada and the United States.

In other words he argued that Mr. Rusk probably did not have the authority—certainly did not have the judicial authority—to over-rule the decision of the commissioner.

This man Hal Banks is a fugitive from justice. He must be returned to this country, if there is any way of getting him back here, to stand trial. He skipped his bail. He is free today because in the first place he was rich enough to put up $25,000 bail. The sum of $25,000 did not mean anything to Hal Banks. Then he left Canada and, in essence, defied the courts to bring him back. I hope in all sincerity that Hal Banks has not got a friend in court so far as the government is concerned. I hope the minister will do his very best and co-operate with the senator from New Mexico to have this man returned to Canada.

If there is any possible chance, and I think there is, that the executive decision of Dean Rusk can now be over-ruled by the new executive, then I suggest nothing should be done to hinder that being accomplished. This is a very important matter. I repeat that this man is a fugitive from justice and the government—no government—should do anything at all to help him. Had he been a poor man he would probably still be languishing in jail. He is free now only because he was able to put up $25,000.

That, Mr. Chairman, leads me to the next matter on which I would like to comment briefly. As a practising lawyer and as a former attorney general, this is a matter which has always given me quite a bit of concern. I refer to the matter of detention after arrest, and of course the question of bail. I feel that this is presently receiving the attention of the department.

My experience in the field of criminal law, both as a prosecuting attorney and as a defence counsel, has led me to believe that in many cases the police unnecessarily arrest a person, take him into custody and lodge him in jail when the circumstances of the case do not warrant such drastic action. This has resulted in a great deal of unnecessary hardship and very considerable personal inconvenience and embarrassment, when a summons in the first instance would have been all that was necessary to make sure that a man appeared for his trial.

I am not suggesting, Mr. Chairman, that arrests are not in some cases necessary. An arrest is quite often necessary not only for the protection of society but also for the protection of the person arrested. But there are occasions when persons who are very well known, who are large property owners, and where there would be absolutely no question about turning up the next day for trial, have been placed under arrest. Such a person, I maintain, should not be arrested in the first instance but should merely be summoned. I am afraid that very often an arrest is made, with the result that the person concerned is punished by the very arrest itself. This is punishment in itself, even before he is tried and convicted. He is punished once he is placed in custody, and this of course is contrary to the whole spirit of our laws.

I am of the opinion that possibly the Criminal Code leaves a police officer with very little discretion. If a policeman decides to detain a person he is almost obliged to arrest him and place him in jail. I suggest that this matter should be studied by the law officers of the crown with a view to suggesting certain amendments to the Criminal Code, if necessary, which would allow policemen to use discretion in certain cases. I am not suggesting that all persons should be immediately released. I am suggesting, however, that the arresting officer should be empowered to exercise some discretion in matters of this kind. Very often, as I say, the arrest causes not only inconvenience and humiliation but also is done at some considerable cost to the public. Every time a man is arrested there naturally is some expense involved.

I have looked into this in a rather cursory manner and it would seem to me that if we could amend section 435 of the code to make the officer's right to arrest without a warrant dependant not only upon his having reasonable and probable grounds for believing that an offence has been committed, but also upon its being reasonable for him to arrest rather than to summon, this would leave him some discretion if he should feel in his own mind that the reasonable thing to do is to release the man immediately and issue a summons. I believe if we were to amend section 435 of the code we could probably accomplish this purpose.

A number of other changes could be introduced into the code. Unless these changes are made we will find that the summons procedure will not be used extensively and that the police will continue to arrest almost indiscriminately. This is actually what happens. A study of a sampling of 6,000 cases was made a few years ago and it was revealed at that time that 90 per cent of those charged with Criminal Code offences were arrested, while less than 10 per cent were summonsed. It was also revealed in this study—and this is an alarming situation—that approximately 85 per cent of those arrested were kept in police custody until their first court appearance. In many instances this involved a substantial period of time.

In one division in the city of Toronto, for example, over 80 per cent of those who were booked between seven o'clock in the morning and midnight were kept in police custody for more than 10 hours before their court appearance, and then they were required to raise bail. This would seem to me, in many cases, to be an injustice, because of the 80 per cent of these men or women who were booked I think I would be safe in assuming a very large percentage were responsible citizens who could have been released immediately and would have appeared in court the next day on a summons. In these cases it would not have been necessary for them to have been kept in custody for a period of up to 10 hours and be faced with the inconvenience of attempting to find someone who would put up their bail.

This leads me to my next point, the question of bail. Here I suggest that a change in the law is very definitely needed and long overdue. The provisions for the ordering of bail prior to trial, in all offences whether indictable or summary conviction, are found in section 451 of the Criminal Code. They are identical to the provisions relating to preliminary inquiries. Section 451 of the Criminal Code provides:

> A justice acting under this Part may (a) order that an accused, at any time before he has been committed for trial, be admitted to bail
> (i) upon the accused entering into a recognizance in form 28 before him or any other justice, with sufficient sureties in such amount as he or that justice directs,
> (ii) upon the accused entering into a recognizance in form 28 before him or any other justice and depositing an amount that he or that justice directs, or
> (iii) upon the accused entering into his own recognizance in form 28 before him or any other justice in such amount as he or that justice directs without any deposit;

It is clear, therefore, that the ordering of bail is a judicial act. It must be done by a judge, a magistrate or a justice. The amount of bail and whether or not it is to be granted at all is decided by the justice. I am not levelling any criticism at the men who make the decisions, but I believe it is pretty generally recognized, particularly in the smaller jurisdictions, that some of the justices who make these decisions are not trained in the law. I know this does not apply in the major centres. We would probably not find this situation in Montreal, Toronto, Vancouver or Calgary. However, in some of the smaller areas there are justices who, although they do their best, are not trained in the law and for that reason perhaps cannot properly appreciate the situations with which they are faced, and therefore perhaps are not in a position to exercise properly the discretion vested in them. I agree that the law requires that before exercising this discretion the justice should obtain as much information as he can regarding the nature of the alleged offence, the character and background of the accused, the likelihood of his appearance for trial and such other relevant factors as will assist him in exercising his discretion. But the important thing to remember is that under our present system there is no absolute right to bail.

The Chairman: Order, please. I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired, unless it is the wish of the committee that he be allowed to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McQuaid: Thank you. There is a basic principle of law which recognizes that a person should retain his freedom until he is convicted of the offence for which he has been charged. Because this is a basic principle it certainly is as applicable to the poor as it is to the rich, and it should be. It should be just as applicable to the man who does not have a cent as it was to Hal Banks, who was able to put up $25,000 in the form of bail. As was the case in respect of Hal Banks, the ability to raise a large amount of money places an accused person in a more advantageous position than an accused person who cannot raise the money and therefore must remain in jail. I suggest this is contrary to the basic principle of British justice, and I believe something should be done by way of amendment to the code to correct that unfortunate situation.

I understand the Department of Justice has the matter in hand. When the omnibus bill is brough in I hope there will be something in it to take care of both these situations, the detention of people immediately after being arrested and the broadening of the law with regard to bail, so that people will not be required after arrest to be penalized merely because they cannot find the cash necessary for bail or perhaps because they are friendless, alone in a strange place and do not have someone to go on their recognizance. These are a few things which we would hope the Minister of Justice would take into consideration when he is drafting his omnibus bill.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for his remarks. I shall restrain myself until later, except in respect of one point, in order to set the record completely clear with regard to the Hal Banks situation.

I must say to the hon. member that I respectfully differ with his interpretation of the law. When I learned of the reports of the statement by the United States senator from New Mexico I immediately contacted the legal officers of the crown and asked them what recourse the government had to reclaim Mr. Hal Banks within our jurisdiction. The law officers of the crown consulted United States counsel in New York City, in fact, the same counsel who had advised the attorney general of Ontario in the earlier extradition proceedings.

It is the view of the United States counsel, supported by the view of the law officers of the crown, that the extradition proceedings are at an end, and that the incoming United States administration cannot reverse the decision taken by Mr. Rusk and order Mr. Banks re-arrested and retained for extradition to Canada. The hon. member for Cardigan suggested that the action of the secretary of state, Dean Rusk, in refusing to sign the extradition order after Commissioner Abruzzo had committed Banks for extradition, was an executive act, not a judicial act, and therefore the judicial process had not been interrupted.

It is the view of the law officers of the crown, supported by United States counsel, that the executive act of the secretary of state, Dean Rusk, was part of the judicial process as contained in the extradition act and the extradition treaty itself. In this respect there is really no difference between the law of the United States and our own. Under our own Extradition Act, before a person who has been committed by a judge or by an extradition commissioner for surrender can be extradited, the minister, in our case the Attorney General of Canada, must so order in writing. The situation is the same in the United States. After committal for extradition or surrender, the person so committed can be extradited from the United States, but the secretary of state must so order in writing.

If in a particular case the Attorney General of Canada, or the secretary of state, being the equivalent officer under the act in the United States, should refuse to make an order for extradition we do not believe it possible—by "we" I mean the law officers of the crown, supported by the advice of United States counsel—that it can be seriously argued that the secretary of state or his successor, can later change his mind and order the person re-arrested for extradition to a foreign country.

In other words, once the discretion of the secretary of state or the Attorney General of Canada has been exercised either in favour of signing the extradition order or against it, then the proceedings have been exhausted and cannot be re-opened. I think to argue the contrary would mean that any person so concerned would continue in peril indefinitely, depending on changes in the administration or in policy.

I have to re-affirm, with the greatest respect to my colleague in the law, that an executive act or administrative discretion once exercised by the secretary of state of the United States, under the extradition act or the extradition treaty, cannot later be re-exercised either by that same secretary of state or by a successor. Mr. Banks once having been brought into jeopardy under proper judicial process cannot be brought into jeopardy again.

Mr. Baldwin: I read the press stories in this regard and it seems to me that the senator based his opinion on the results of some inquiries or legal opinions he obtained. This is a very serious point. I am not suggesting that the minister or his legal advisors are wrong. I have great respect for both, although I have occasionally had reason to differ with their judgment. On occasion judges have found that I was right and they were wrong.

It is well known that an information and complaint may be laid against a person who is suspected of having committed a criminal offence. A preliminary inquiry is then held; but before the time comes for a charge to be preferred in another court we often find that a stay of proceedings is entered. That stay of proceedings is an executive act. The attorney general of a province in exercising his discretion refuses to proceed with the charge in the Supreme Court or the county court, as the case may be. The entering of that stay of prosecution, the nolle prosequi, does not prevent a charge from being proceeded with against the person at a later date.

That is on all fours with this situation. I put that as a comparable case to the minister and suggest it would be of some interest to members of this committee if the minister made inquiries as to the basis of the senator's statement. It may well be that senators in the United States have access to higher priced legal talent than the department of the attorney general over there.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I do not know whether the United States senator for New Mexico sought legal advice, but I suggest to the hon. member for Peace River that while the attorney general might have discretion as to whether to prosecute or not if his law officers advised him there was a case, it would be highly unusual for an attorney general to act if his law officers told him there was no case.

Mr. Baldwin: He would never lay a charge in that event.

Mr. Gilbert: Mr. Chairman, I should like to preface my remarks by congratulating the minister on his appointment. I was rather disappointed, however, by his opening statement in respect of this important department. In speaking briefly on the Banks case, which has just been discussed, the minister stated that Mr. Banks would be placed in double jeopardy if there were to be a rehearing of this case. Double jeopardy is an old principle in respect of accused persons, but it seems to me that if Mr. Banks were retried and sent back to Canada, not only would he be in double jeopardy but the Liberal government would be in double jeopardy, because some of the members of this government sponsored Mr. Banks when he came to Canada in the first place, and some of them received contributions from the S.I.U. for their political campaigns. Therefore, there really would be double jeopardy if Mr. Banks did come back to Canada. If he does come back to Canada I hope the hon. member for York South will in future get some of those S.I.U. contributions.

I said I was disappointed in the minister's opening statement. I thought we had a minister who had a flair for reform, and one who would stand up and set forth some of the great changes he has talked about outside the house, some of which have been reported in Maclean's magazine. The minister made a rather complete presentation of the work of his department, and then made an apology for employing 72 more individuals. He has actually reached the position now that he is only a part time minister. This was the result of the reorganization measure of November, 1966. Prior to that the office of the Minister of Justice was very important. After the reorganization, the department was castrated of any real jurisdiction. Its main jurisdiction now is in respect of constitutional matters.

The Prime Minister has taken unto himself the problems associated with the constitution. He set up a task force and decided not to refer constitutional matters to any standing committee. He has kept unto himself and his officials some very important aspects of constitutional law. One might have thought that the imaginative and bright Minister of Justice would persuade the present Prime Minister to refer this matter of the constitution to a standing committee in order that we could call experts and hear what they have to say about the delegation and redistribution of powers.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Apparently he has not been able to persuade the Prime Minister in this very important area. This is why I say he is really operating on a part time basis. He still has control of the Criminal Code. Although some parts of the Criminal Code appear to be divided with regard to jurisdiction, I am very saddened that the Minister of Justice has not taken any initiative with regard to setting up a fund from which to compensate innocent victims of criminal violence. This matter was raised by the former member for York-Humber and the principle was accepted by the government. It was referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs, and after a very thorough investigation I thought we had adopted the principle with regard to compensation.

There has been wide experience in this field and some of the provinces have initiated action. The lame excuse of the government is that law enforcement falls within provincial jurisdiction, and therefore the minister sidesteps the question and fails to appreciate that the federal government has contracts with eight of the ten provinces in Canada with regard to providing police services. Those services are provided on a controversial basis. The two provinces not covered are Ontario and Quebec; all other provinces are covered by contract with regard to police services. There would be nothing wrong in including in the contract sufficient money to pay compensation to innocent victims of criminal violence.

We have heard a great deal about persons who have suffered as the result of criminal violence and have received no compensation. In this respect the unimaginative minister takes no action whatsoever. He does not rise and say that the government is going to take positive action in this field, and I am greatly disappointed because of this.

An hon. Member: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gilbert: When I have finished I will be glad to receive questions. Another area in which we are greatly disappointed is that of the expungement of criminal records. In the last session the solicitor general, in response to a question of mine during the discussion of the estimates of the previous year, said he had laid before the cabinet a memorandum with regard to the expungement of criminal records, and the bail system. This gave encouragement to the members who had served on the standing committee on justice and legal affairs, because in respect of a bill sponsored by a Liberal member from Welland the committee studied this matter in depth, expert witnesses were called and a report was made to the house with regard to the expungement of criminal records. The same thing applied to bail. Here we had the undertaking of the former solicitor general that the matter was in memorandum form before the cabinet for decision. We had encouragement in this respect.

What happened? An election was called. We now have a new cabinet and no initiative has been taken by the Minister of Justice or the Solicitor General with regard to action in these very important fields. This is something with regard to which the part time Minister of Justice could take a real stride forward in introducing legislation in the house.

I am now going to give the minister more suggestions with regard to things he could do, and thereby make himself a name in Canadian history, as one who never stood in the background but was always in the forefront of reform. There is the question of the Expropriation Act. You will notice, Mr. Chairman, that in this session the hon. member for Peel South introduced a motion with regard to the setting up of a new Expropriation Act. The motion was adopted, and accepted by the government in principle.

The minister has said—this is in the throne speech, and statements made by the minister—that he intends to bring forth legislation with regard to a new Expropriation Act. Perhaps you do not know this, Mr. Chairman, but it is very significant that back in 1962 this government also brought forth an act respecting the expropriation of land. This matter was started in 1962, but here we are in 1968 and no measure has been placed before the house. Surely the Minister of Justice, a very bright, intelligent and active minister, could bring forth this measure in a matter of days and have it referred to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs.

The hon. member for Peel South is very interested in this act, because if the airport in Toronto is extended there will be a great deal of land expropriation. If this measure is not introduced by the time the expropriation takes place, the hon. member is in real jeopardy with regard to being re-elected next time, because he knows how old the other act is. Since 1889 there have not been any amendments to the Expropriation Act. The hon. member knows that the important item with regard to compensation is giving notice to landowners in respect of expropriation. These are the two main areas in the Expropriation Act, and they were pretty fully covered in the 1962 act. There is no reason why the Minister of Justice cannot at this time bring forth a new act and have it referred to the standing committee.

The next question I wish to discuss is that of marijuana, Mr. Chairman. If ever an issue has been debated recently it is the issue of marijuana. We find there is divided jurisdiction between the Minister of National Health and Welfare and possibly the Solicitor General, or it may be the Minister of Justice, if he is in charge of the drug and narcotics control act. We have had evidence from the deputy commissioner of the R.C.M.P. of an alarming increase in marijuana convictions. It should be fully appreciated that 80 per cent of this increase applies to young men and young women between the ages of 16 and 25. This was the statement of the deputy commissioner.

One has to appreciate what a conviction means to a young person. It means he has difficulty with regard to obtaining employment, with regard to travel and bonding. Yet here we sit, with the Minister of Justice taking no action with regard to a proper amendment to the act. No action is taken by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, and we have a statement by the Solicitor General that no action will be taken during this session. This is a field into which the Minister of Justice should step, and correct the situation, because it has a serious effect on our young people.

The next item with which I wish to deal is that of corporal punishment. Every time I pick up the Criminal Code and read section 641 I realize that this section must have been drafted back in medieval times, in the 16th century. I will read section 641 which falls under the heading of "whipping":

> Where a person is liable to be sentenced to be whipped, the court may sentence him to be whipped on one, two or three occasions within the limits of the prison in which he is confined.

Is it not time that our Minister of Justice took some steps with regard to corporal punishment? The John Howard Society says that the approach to criminal law today should be that of rehabilitation and reform rather than that of revenge. This is the approach that is dear to the hearts not only of the members of the John Howard Society but also the hearts of social workers throughout the country. Reform in this matter of corporal punishment is an area in which we would have no difficulty in getting the full support of the house. The days have long passed when we resorted to these cruel and barbaric methods.

The other item which I am sure falls under the minister's jurisdiction is that of the uniformity of sentencing. There has been a wide disparity in sentencing throughout the country, and if there were some guide lines within the Criminal Code to ensure some measure of uniformity, justice would be applied equally throughout the country. I will ask the Minister of Justice to take immediate action with regard to sentencing, which I am sure falls within his area of jurisdiction, and to bring this legislation up to date. It needs it.

Another matter which I should like to mention is the review of the Criminal Code. I thought the minister would say that since this is an electronic age it is necessary to have legislation with regard to electronic devices for bugging, that he would make a statement on it and refer it to a standing committee, or else give us a promise of legislation. However, not a word was mentioned.

The other matter which I should like to mention regards the insanity rules in the Criminal Code. It has been a long time since any change has been made in the M'Naghten rules on insanity and surely, in view of the progress in the field of psychology and psychiatry, it is time we made some changes in those rules.

Another matter regards the appeal procedure in summary convictions. Many people have found those provisions very difficult to comply with and often cases are thrown out on very technical grounds. It is important that the poor and the innocent are not convicted unfairly.

Another matter is that of vagrancy. This has been a charge under the Criminal Code used by the police as a holding charge, with regard to some other offence which the police may want to apply. I believe the minister should take a forward look at this matter of vagrancy and change this section so as to stop the police from using it as a holding charge.

The minister mentioned rather cursorily that he was setting up a permanent law reform committee. It is high time that this was done, because the last revision of the statutes of Canada was made back in 1952, and from 1952 to the present time we have had annual statutes. Now we are about 16 years behind the times, and one would hope we could make a revision at this stage. With the use of computers we could be in very close touch with the changes that are taking place today. This is one area where we could call together all the experts in the field of the law and have them direct their minds to the reform of our laws. As the minister knows, this has been done with success in Ontario. Again we at the federal level fall behind. We seem always to be acting too little and too late. If the minister is going to make his job into a full time job, this is one area in which he could really excel.

The last matter regards the Exchequer Court of Canada. I thought he was going to say he would abolish that court. The two main items dealt with by the Exchequer Court are taxation and expropriation appeals. He did mention that it may be a forum for administrative tribunal appeals. This makes me shudder, because it is in opposition to the present administrative law, with the exception that under the administrative law there is the right of appeal in the case of a denial of natural justice. I can imagine some of the boards that have been set up being delayed by administrative procedure, according to which not only does one appear before the board but both parties have the right to appeal to the Exchequer Court.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Chairman, may I rise on a point of order? I should like to say to the hon. member that I was speaking more in terms of a judicial review by the court, rather than appeal, and that would bring in what the hon. member said about natural justice, and so on.

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I have always maintained that we would be very proud to have the minister here with us in our part of the house because I have always thought he was a forward looking minister. I am sure that after he hears my speech and starts implementing some of the ideas he will say "I am one of you". We will be happy to have him any time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have a vacancy right here.

[Mr. Gilbert.]

Mr. Gilbert: As I said, it has been said with regard to the Exchequer Court that it is a very expensive way to get justice, and that it involves great delays. I believe that court could be abolished, and the matters with which it presently deals could be dealt with either in the Supreme Court or the county court of a province. When it comes to minor taxation appeals, there is no reason why a county court judge, for a small amount of money, could not deal with them, and there is no reason why the supreme court in any province could not deal with them. The more serious problem regards expropriation matters. Although the Exchequer Court travels across the country from time to time, it is very expensive to appear before that court on expropriation matters. Again there is no reason why these matters could not be referred either to a county court or to the supreme court of a particular province.

I should like to say at this point that the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice played a very active role in the standing committee on justice and legal affairs. When I look at him and at the minister I feel encouraged that they will take these words as words of advice—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Yes, real pearls.

Mr. Gilbert: —and that they will implement them immediately.

[Translation]

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a few brief remarks with regard to item No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Justice, even if I have to come back later to the other items so as to make a thorough and precise study of their subject matter.

The purpose of my remarks is to raise four or five specific points dealing rather with the general policy of the department. Therefore, I shall start immediately with the first point so as not to delay the discussion.

I will point out, Mr. Chairman, that the Department of Justice which cannot pride itself on being one which very much promotes and encourages the introduction, progress or expansion of bilingualism within the civil service.

I should like to call the attention of the hon. minister on the Exchequer Court, for instance, whose rules of practice are printed in English only. I have already put to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question in which I indicated that, as far as students are concerned—just to mention one instance and to repeat the expression used a minute ago by the minister—it was inconvenient. In fact, if the students want to get an official reference on the rules of practice of the Exchequer Court, most of them must refer to the English version, since there is no official French translation.

It should be mentioned in passing that the same applies to the B.N.A. Act; our country is bilingual but only the English translation is official.

The second point on which I should like to call the hon. minister's attention is this: For the last 100 years, all the judgments passed by the Supreme Court of Canada have been brought down in English and whenever one is passed in French, it is not official. If a lawyer refers to a judgment or the jurisprudence of the Supreme Court and wants to have an official reference—I do say "official"—he has to refer to the English version, since these judgments are not passed in French.

During the last session, the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) had moved a bill on this subject which did not come up for consideration. Let us hope that the question will be dealt with this year and that the hon. minister will take this definite point into consideration.

I was happy a moment ago to hear from the Minister of Justice himself (Mr. Turner) that the statute revision commission will be able to give us, through the minister, the approximate date of publication of the Revised Statutes of Canada, since the last revision dates back to 1952. It has therefore been 16 years since the statutes were last revised.

I pointed out a while ago that chapter 116—to take only one example—of the revised statutes of 1952 contains an act about the Auditor General of Canada.

Well, Mr. Chairman, if I want to refer to chapter 116 to find out about the present legislation, I see that following all the amendments made to the 1952 act—that is for more than 16 years—it is no longer valid, having been replaced by a good number of measures. As the minister said earlier, that is very inconvenient.

I would like to tell the minister that we would greatly appreciate knowing the date, even approximate, when the statutes will be revised and printed. If he could give an exact date, we would be very happy.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It would be in October 1969.

Mr. Fortin: I thank the minister, Mr. Chairman.

We now know the date; that is a good point.

As I said, I would like the minister to take into consideration the first points I mentioned concerning the Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court, so that if our country is to have a bilingual look, this becomes a fact and not only words.

If the act on the official languages is to become a living reality, the Exchequer Court, the Supreme Court of Canada and other federal organizations must set an example.

Mr. Chairman, during his brief statement when these estimates were first put before the house, the honourable Minister of Justice spoke of administrative courts indicating that this whole matter would be revised.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Before closing my brief remarks, I should like to draw the attention of the minister to those famous administrative courts, so that he might take note of the following recommendations.

We feel that a special committee on administrative courts should be set up, as soon as possible since, to my mind, that whole matter has been dragging far too long, in order that various acts creating organizations exercising judicial or quasi-judicial functions might be studied. The said committee could give advice to the members and Canadian citizens on the passing of a specific legislation on the administrative courts which the minister could then put before the house in the near future.

In addition, we would like this committee to consider certain matters thoroughly. For example, I would like this committee—which, as suggested by the minister, would be established in the near future—to study the structure of judicial or quasi-judicial organizations. At the present time, we do not know the nature of that structure, it is rather topsy-turvy, to use a common expression, since one cannot make head or tail of it. I see that the minister is smiling and I know that he agrees with me.

I think that is is essential to review the organization of those administrative tribunals, in order to get acquainted with those judicial and quasi-judicial organizations, and to consider as well the status of the members and support personnel of those organizations.

Moreover, certain members do not know what they are doing in this respect; they do not understand the role they are to play. They admit themselves that their personal jurisdiction sometimes overlaps with that of their neighbours or colleagues. There is total confusion. Therefore, that is the first point which should be studied by the committee.

Secondly, and I think the hon. minister will again agree with me, this special committee on administrative courts should examine their territorial jurisdiction and the sanctions of rules of competence. That does not need much explanation.

Third, I should like this committee to study the procedure to be followed in appearing before these administrative courts, so that the rights of every citizen, every person under the jurisdiction of the courts, may be properly protected and a more uniform procedure established. I think that is a fundamental point, Mr. Chairman. The rights of every individual under the jurisdiction of the court must be clearly protected, so that justice may not be a question of money, prestige, resources, the reputation of a businessman or whatever, but really a human question. Everyone should be on the same footing before the law, which is supreme.

I would also like the committee to study thoroughly the advisability of establishing a court of appeal from the decisions of lower courts dealing with administrative matters. The representations I am now making to the minister are valid, and the minister will be able to consider them in due time, since they could be a part of the study made by the special committee.

Finally, I would like this committee on administrative courts to examine thoroughly the advisability of appointing an ombudsman or using some other method to ensure that the rights of every individual under the jurisdiction of the courts are fully protected against encroaching administration.

Mr. Chairman, I think we have set up a program of work for the special committee which could be appointed to study the structure of the administrative courts. These five specific points present a whole program of activities, and hon. members would be very glad with the opportunity of studying the matters in depth, in order to ensure an equitable treatment for every individual coming under the jurisdiction of the courts and to see to it that the justice dispensed is not unjust.

Mr. Chairman, I have the English translation of the remarks I have just addressed to the minister about those administrative courts. I have even put that matter in a notice of motion which he will find in the order paper. I will therefore give him immediately an English copy of what I have just said about setting up a special committee, so that if he is getting ready to reply immediately or to make a few definite comments on those points, he might do so in the language in which he is most fluent.

I should like to be able some day, Mr. Chairman, to deliver a speech in English. A while ago, I had decided to do so in the case of my very short speech, but I would rather attend for some time the government language school before making my first attemps in that language, as I cannot "skate" as easily in English as in French.

One must realize that this word may have different meanings. To "skate" like the member for Témiscamingue and to "skate" like the member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) are two very different things, Mr. Chairman.

I should like to say to the minister that I appreciate his work in the Department of Justice and I am not necessarily of the opinion of the member who spoke before me and who said that the minister is a mini-minister or a part-time minister.

I think he is doing an excellent job, but he should deal with some fundamental matters. One would be, of course, the setting up of a special committee on administrative courts. I am most anxious to hear his comments.

• (4:50 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the minister upon the energetic and capable leadership he has given this house and country in the field of criminal reform.

The hon. member for Broadview spoke about compensation for victims of crime. If the minister were to heed the hon. member's exhortations, however, I feel a great burden would be put on him to legislate with respect to something that falls clearly within provincial jurisdiction. The minister would be wasting his already scarce time on something over which he has no jurisdiction.

Today I wish to make two points. The first is a suggestion that the summary conviction appeal procedure be streamlined or made simpler and easier for those who fall prey to the technical barriers which confound the path of one who appeals. I suggest that subsection 3 of section 722 of the Criminal Code, which deals with appeals from summary conviction courts to county judges, be amended to read:

> The appeal court may at any time up to the date of the hearing of the appeal, waive any defects or omissions in the appeal process when the court considers it in the best interests of justice so to do.

I think that such a provision would remove some of the technical barriers people encounter through failure to have an affidavit sworn, to find a magistrate, who may be away on his summer holidays, or to raise sufficient costs. This would also cover many other matters urgently requiring attention.

I have had 18 years experience in practise of the criminal law, both in defence and, latterly, as a crown prosecutor. I have had a chance to view the matter and I have seen many difficulties of the nature I have described. I shall refer to only one case, that of Regina v. Amyot, 1968 Ontario reports, volume 2, at page 626. There an Ontario county judge found he had no jurisdiction to hear an appeal because the listing of the appeal was not properly posted at a certain place in the court house. If the appeal had been listed inside the court office it could have been heard; but since some clerk placed the list outside the court room, the appeal could not be heard. That does not strike me as being the course of true justice and I am sure the minister will be interested in assisting in this field of reform.

My second point deals with prelimary hearings. I urge the minister to consider the saving of money and the convenience of witnesses which might result from our adopting the British use of depositions. For instance, if a witness is to be called merely to give a formal statement such as, "Yes, I picked up a document at 5 a.m. on November 12," that statement could be reduced to a simple deposition or affidavit, and filed. Of course defence counsel would still have the privilege of calling that witness. I submit that in many thousand of cases in this country much money could be saved and many people convenienced by adopting such a system.

Mr. Ritchie: Mr. Chairman, I have only one comment to make, or only one question to direct to the Minister of Justice. He must realize, as we all realize, that there is a controversy about the widespread use of marijuana. Marijuana itself does not seem to be a particularly dangerous drug. The greatest danger lies in the fact that a user may move on to more dangerous substances. There is however remarkably little medical literature about its effects.

In February, 1968, and again in March, 1968, the then Minister of Justice when replying to questions said that the policy of the government was to adopt what might be called the hard line. Since then there has been much comment and controversy. Suggestions have been made that this approach is hard and harsh. Speaking in Regina to the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association, the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that narcotics legislation might be amended or modified by introducing a marijuana control bill.

The question of narcotics has long exercised our officials. I think it is well known that the intent of the Narcotic Control Act is to control the widespread use of drugs. I think it is conceded that we ought to be more concerned with distributors of these harmful substances than with users. In other words, there ought to be changes in the act which would remove the profit that pushers may make by selling drugs. Perhaps the law ought to provide more severe penalties for those who push drugs. There has also been a suggestion that under the new legislation it may not be necessary to lay a formal charge of possession against those who possess drugs. In any event, if the narcotics legislation were changed I suggest it might be a good idea not to punish the users of marijuana as severely as the pushers who traffic in the drug for profit.

Progress reported.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I have the honour to inform the house that a message has been received from the Senate informing this house that the Senate have passed Bill S-15, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code, to which the concurrence of this house is desired.

The time being five o'clock p.m. the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motion and public bills.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT TO MODIFY COMPOSITION OF COMMISSIONS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should give consideration to amending the provisions of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act so as to modify the composition of the various commissions with a view to obtaining more logical and equitable redistribution of constituency boundaries and to provide that any and all reports and recommendations of the said commissions shall be accompanied by full and detailed reasons for any proposed changes, all of which changes and the reasons therefore shall be debatable in this house.

[Translation]

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to comment on proposals that have been submitted during recent years, particularly in the course of the first revision by a commission established for reviewing the electoral boundaries, as required by law. I believe that every one of us, in the light of his own experience, will be able to determine the results that have been achieved.

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

The purpose of my motion is to persuade the government to introduce amendments to the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, in particular to sections 6, 13, 18 and 20—and there may be some other sections related to these. You were good enough, Mr. Speaker, to read out the terms of the resolution so I shall not repeat it. The main purpose is to consider the composition of these commissions, their method of performance, the principles upon which they proceeded, the nature of their reports and the manner in which these reports were handled in the house.

I bring up this subject with some diffidence. I wish it to be clearly understood by hon. members that I make no reflection whatsoever on the ridings which they represent. Those who have been elected to this house for the first time will, naturally, have no experience of the long and difficult debates on this subject which took place in 1964 and 1965. Most of them will not have gone over the public hearings, the subsequent debate on the reports, and the representations made when those reports were adopted by the house.

Regardless of the experience which may have been reflected in various places, I would say that the last redistribution, the first under the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act, left much to be desired. In some provinces it could be termed a disaster. I believe every canon of good sense was traversed. One of my former collagues said he thought that in many areas there had been gerrymandering by lack of knowledge and perhaps by some incompetence. I would agree with him. People in the Province of Alberta, in particular, are singularly bitter about the results; we thought they were among the poorest. I am telling the commissioners nothing new when I say this; I have told them so before. In other places they were adequate, but no more.

There was supposedly a professed independence among the commissioners. But as a result of some of the decisions in these connections no other conclusion can be drawn but that some of the divisions had been motivated by political considerations of the type they were not supposed to have. Frankly, there was some gerrymandering in certain districts and some hiving off, and no one will explain them to me in any other way because I could go into those particular districts and show that there is no rhyme or reason about the decisions—no reason of demography, no reason of social contact, that the people go to the same market town, that the children come from the same school district, that they are on the same side of a major river, or anything of that sort. There was a hiving off.

I suggest that in the main the act unfortunately lays too great emphasis on the so-called equality of numbers, with a tolerance of 25 per cent up and down. Those of us who were here will recall there was a great deal of debate about the extent of that tolerance before we finally settled on 25 per cent. Members of two commissions have told me: Thank goodness parliament showed a minimum of good sense in going so far. In their provinces it would have been impossible to operate on any legal tolerance less than that figure. After all, 25 per cent was not mandatory; the commissions could work within a tolerance of 5 per cent up and down if peculiar circumstances dictated it.

Section 13 did provide for looking to demography, to special geographical features, to elements of growth in suburban communities, difficult boundaries and so on. In the main, these were ignored. Take my own riding, so that I do not point a finger at anyone else. I was left with a strip of land two miles deep and ten miles long which straddled the northern edge of the whole city of Edmonton.

I do not object to the people there. I had this territory before, though much more. But this two miles is now an area of development on the north of Edmonton from Edmonton centre. My neighbours between the centre of the city and Edmonton east, to the east of the centre, are inhibited in growth; they have no new area of development.

The northern strip is being developed at a great rate at the present time, particularly next to Edmonton east. My colleague from Edmonton East (Mr. Skoreyko) lives there; he bought and built there because he knew this area was supposed to be included in his constituency. But it was not. The net result is that people who are on the far northeast part of the city are attached to the people living in the far western part of the city though there is no contact whatsoever beyond the fact that they live in the city of Edmonton.

I can tell you the reason why. There was in between a military base and they wanted to leave it in my constituency; they felt that 300 or 400 Liberal votes coming from that base would perhaps work to somebody else's advantage. There is no other reason for leaving that two mile strip.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): However, it did not work out that way. Never did that traverse the minds of the commissioners? Well, knowing the commissioners as I do, I shall leave it at that.

The complicated constituency boundaries resulted in confusion for civilian voters. May I say, also, that I was able to examine the lists of all servicemen west of the Great Lakes, and I know from the scrutineers connected with the service vote that hundreds and hundreds of ballots were spoiled because of the complicated boundaries which resulted from the commissioners' decisions in many instances. I am thinking particularly of the Province of Alberta—leave it to others who wish to talk about their own experience.

Ridings made no sense geographically, leading to very difficult election campaigns. Often, no interior roads existed. We have one constituency that stretches along the eastern slope of the mountains, running some 450 miles, I would say, from the United States boundary, and 36 miles south of the city of Grand Prairie. There is not a road running directly through that constituency. The people in it have no community of interest. My colleague from Athabasca has to get around his constituency in an aircraft because there are no direct roads, unless he goes through four or five other constituencies.

It seems to me that a constituency should be so designed that its member shall be able to have reasonably quick access to his constituents and they to him. There should be a form of unit. Instead of that we get these conglomerations designed strictly on the basis of so-called population squares that head off to nowhere. I told the chairman of our commission in Alberta that as punishment the commission should have to travel the boundaries of all the constituencies it designed.

I believe that section 13 has to be amended in order to get the emphasis removed from being placed purely on numbers, and to give effect to demographic reasons. During the past election, and I think this is a question of political science, we were asking for the involvement of the people with government. Yet the last redistribution of constituencies has made it practically impossible for many constituents to have contact with their members, or members with their constituents, or even contact among the constituents themselves.

Then there is the question of the commission reports. I always feel that he who desires to make a change has the onus of proof upon him and must advance the reasons for the change. We did not see anything like that in the last redistribution. We were simply given a report and a map with legal descriptions, on the basis that they had been handed down from on high. I found the attitude of some of the commissioners to be as though they had been commissioned by God and were handing down an edict. Their attitude was that anyone who dared to criticize their decision just did not know what he was talking about, and any appearance made at a commission's public hearings was a nuisance to the commission.

I found that the commissions had gone to work on the basis of paper furnished to them by the staff of the boundaries commissioner who had been working on a sort of jigsaw puzzle fitting the pieces together. I believe that hon. members and the public generally are interested in putting viable political units together. In a growing city riding no one can say, "We can put this section in there because we think we have more Liberal",—or Tory, or Social Credit or N.D.P.—"votes in it." This is nonsense. There is no pattern of voting in newly developing areas. It cannot be forecast.

Certainly there has to be some equality of numbers or relationship of numbers, but I am sure hon. members will agree it is a better principle to establish a political unit upon reasons of demography, geography, community of interest and other factors.

As provided in the act, a commission's reports and reasons should come before the house if there is objection to the redistribution in the required volume. The reports and reasons then become available for examination. As a result of the last redistribution my colleague from Calgary North and other hon. members, including myself, sought to obtain the records and memoranda on which redistribution commissions operate, in order to see what on earth led to this blessed mess; but this was denied on a fine legal point. Then the motion was transferred for debate and got lost in the complexities of the legislative machinery.

I feel, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members will want to examine this question. I have proposed this motion at this time for serious consideration. I have not spoken about the composition of the commissions, although I think my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre may wish to talk about that. I think difficulty in this connection could be avoided if as originally proposed and provided in the act, and as we thought we were getting, a representative would be recommended by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and one by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to sit on a commission. This would eliminate any, shall we say, political jiggery-pokery.

Mr. Deachman: That is a good word.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Or shenanigans—whatever word you want to use. I am sure that the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) can come up with somewhat more colourful ones but he knows fully what I mean. If that were done there would be a stand-off respecting the question of political influence. There would certainly be a greater understanding of political principles and of a political unit than was demonstrated by most of the commissions during the last redistribution.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say we want to have something better in the composition of commissions. We want to have something better in the way of the principles upon which a redistribution shall take place, and we want to have the reports of commissions so that we can see just why certain constituencies were put together, thus placing the onus for changes upon the commissions. They have to justify the changes. They may want to make a change by saying, "In this district the population has changed." That is perfectly valid. This is a reason; but there are other reasons that must be included.

To talk to one of these commissions and try to justify your own opinions is almost like beating a pillow, and a very soft pillow at that. I do not think I have seen anything work so arbitrarily and poorly as the last electoral redistributions. Therefore I urge hon. members to consider my motion, and I trust in its ultimate adoption.

• (5:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Certainly, if I am granted the time to answer.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member who has just spoken if, according to his proposal, the commission's report could be discussed in the house? Furthermore, could the house amend the commission's reports or merely submit recommendations?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): No, Mr. Speaker. This matter was thoroughly discussed during the debate. Members could not have the report amended, because we could have done so ourselves at the very beginning. If members were permitted to amend the report, I think the commission's independence would be destroyed. We want to know why changes were made so that we can make representations, but if we are not told, how can we express our ideas or oppose those which motivated the report?

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, the notice of motion which is now before us seeks to amend the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act and therefore, hopefully, to establish at some future time more logical and equitable redistribution of constituency boundaries. To this end it asks that all changes and the reasons therefor be debatable in this house before being put into effect. Certainly every member of this chamber believes that constituency boundaries should make some kind of reasonable sense, and that no constituency should be more burdensome or difficult to represent than any other. What we would like and what is possible, however, never converge, but like parallel lines run merrily together into infinity. Logical and equitable constituencies are hardly possible in a nation like ours, which in itself is neither particularly logical nor equitable. It has been said that some countries have too much history but that Canada has too much geography. Well, that may be so, but despite seemingly insurmountable geographical obstacles our ancestors who came from here, there and everywhere forged an unlikely nation in the northern part of this continent. Canada may not accurately be called a logical political, geographic or historical entity, yet it survives and even thrives.

If our nation cannot be described as a logical outcome of historical forces, neither can it be described today as a shining example of equality. We continue to be troubled by glaring inequalities of economic well-being and opportunity which exist from region to region, and within our major cities as well. Thus, it may be said that we have the kind and size of constituencies which we deserve, living in a nation such as ours, constituencies which are as illogical and inequitable as this nation itself. Certainly, when it comes to the question of size, as the member for Thunder Bay I have something to complain about. This riding is much too vast for any one man to represent adequately, even if he were a reasonable facsimile of Paul Bunyan, which I am not. A region which includes 155,000 square miles is a huge area to cover adequately, even during the term of a single parliament. Yet in all this expansive acreage there are only 55,000 people, of whom approximately 26,000 are eligible to vote. If I subscribe to the democratic principle of one man one vote, which I do as nearly as it is possible to hold to that principle, it is neither reasonable nor logical for me to expect my constituency to shrink in size unless—and this is something for which we in northern Ontario press all the time—through a vigorous program of regional development we can attract thousands of people into northwestern Ontario to enjoy with us the good life there, and help us develop our almost limitless natural resources.

The mere alteration of constituency boundaries really is no certain guarantee of greater equity for either members or the constituents whom they represent. To this end it does seem reasonable to make a small suggestion to the commissioners of internal economy. I am sure my hon. friends from Kenora-Rainy River, Algoma East, Cochrane, and many others, would agree with me when I suggest that those who represent extremely large rural ridings should be given some extra financial consideration to assist them in meeting the extremely heavy expenses which are incurred in representing such constituencies. The people of my riding are a great distance from most departments of government. Therefore they rely very heavily upon their member, whom they expect to see regularly and often. I am prepared to agree that in the constituency of Thunder Bay there are certain illogical aspects which we would like to see changed. For example the southwest corner of the riding includes people who live near the outskirts of Fort Frances, a town which lies within the constituency of Kenora-Rainy River. Naturally these people look to Fort Frances as their centre for commerce and recreation. It follows therefore that logically they should reside in the same federal constituency as the townsfolk. Again, my hon. friend from Kenora-Rainy River has included in his riding the town of Sioux Lookout, which is linked in its educational system under the new reorganization of school districts in Ontario with the town of Dryden, the largest community in Thunder Bay.

In order to reach Sioux Lookout the member from Kenora-Rainy River must follow a fairly long route through Thunder Bay. Since we wear the same political colours there is no problem, but there is great inconvenience for the member, and the charge of illogical redistribution is probably justified. Further, a constituency like Thunder Bay is faced with the problems of communication which fight against the existence of a community of interest or common concern, and it is not logical that people in one constituency should be so isolated from each other that they are unaware of what people in other parts of the constituency are doing, or of what problems there may be in another part of the constituency. There is no single radio or television outlet which serves the whole area. No one newspaper is read by the majority of the constituents. Some look to Winnipeg, others to the lakehead, and still others to Toronto as their chief urban centre.

As I have indicated, we in northwestern Ontario certainly are not at a loss to offer full and detailed reasons for a more logical and equitable redistribution of some of our constituency boundaries. There is, however, one very troublesome aspect to this notice of motion which prevents me lending support to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr.

Lambert). The troublesome clause contains the suggestion that in the future full and detailed reasons for any proposed increase shall be debatable in this house. I can imagine a very long debate in which each member would want to have the opportunity to explain why the particular reasons given for the changes in his constituency are neither right nor justified.

It seems to me, however, that this house has more pressing, urgent and serious matters to consider. There is not enough time at our disposal for us to become bogged down in trivialities, to major in minors. We should in fact count ourselves fortunate that we are spared the laborious effort of having to consider the justification for the boundary lines of 264 constituencies. What member is there who would not argue long and strong that some particular city block, some village or town or some small region does not properly or logically fit into his constituency? The motivations for such reasoning would be many and varied, but among them would be a feeling of hostility for that city block, village, town or small area which happened to be mainly of a political persuasion different from that of the member. How pleasant it would be to attempt to jettison those troublesome voters who live in darkness and have not yet seen the light of our political wisdom.

No, Mr. Speaker this house has no time for such pettiness. The Canadian people expect us to get on with the job of governing. Even now, the proceedings of this house are all too tedious and tardy. Time is propelling us rapidly and irresistibly into the 21st century, yet our nation is still burdened with worn-out laws, and in so many ways we are still basically an underdeveloped nation.

I conclude by saying, let us leave the problems of constituency boundaries to non-political commissions; let us put up with the few illogical or inequitable aspects which trouble us; let us not waste the precious time of this assembly, but rather, let us push on with the job of building Canada into a just and modern nation which is governed in a way that is relevant to the needs of the present and the future.

Mr. Deakon: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Penner: Certainly.

Mr. Deakon: I was wondering whether the hon. member could inform this house how many of the 264 federal constituencies have boundaries equivalent to the provincial counterparts?

Mr. Penner: I am not able to answer that question, except in relation to my own riding. In that area there are three provincial constituencies which touch upon or are included within the federal boundary of the Thunder Bay riding. I cannot answer in respect of the whole of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has a grievance. In fact, I well recall the expressed feelings of most of the Alberta members of the last parliament about the redistribution map in respect of that province. I think I would only be facing reality if I admitted there was a general feeling on the part of those members that they all had grievances.

The hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) has just reflected the fact that there are other members in the house who likewise have grievances in respect of certain aspects of the boundaries of their constituencies. I must say, however, that I do not agree with the solution to the problem proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West. We sit near each other and we have to be good friends whether we want to be or not, but I do not like the retrogressive step proposed in this resolution.

It is my feeling that one of the most progressive steps of a political nature parliament ever took was the step we took when we ended 100 years of political, partisan gerrymandering that went on every time we had distribution.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): They only do it a different way now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was a member of two or three parliamentary committees that engaged in redistribution, so I know something of what that experience is, and I certainly do not want to go through it again. It is a proper procedure that the boundaries of our constituencies should be determined by some body other than the members who run for and seek to represent those ridings, and I hope it will stay that way.

There are one or two things the hon. member for Edmonton West said with which I may have some sympathy, but I must dissociate myself from some of his remarks. He has indicated that he said to the commissioners in the province of Alberta what he thought of their work. I have to leave to him and the Alberta members what their experience may have been with their commissioners. Perhaps I am one of the fortunate ones. I come from a province where we had redistribution by an independent commission on a provincial basis before this was brought in federally. Not only did we have this take place provincially ahead of the federal scheme, but the same people who were assigned to do the provincial job were called upon to do the federal job. The only change was to add the representation commissioner, Mr. Castonguay. So we had experienced people do the job in Manitoba.

I do not suggest there are not some complaints that members from Manitoba could make, and I do not think any map could be drawn that would be perfect to anyone. But I am prepared to say that the Manitoba division as a result of the last redistribution seems to be about as good as it could be, and as fair as possible to all concerned. I have heard rumblings of discontent in one or two other parts of Canada, but surely that is a small price to pay for getting it established that the boundaries of our constituencies are determined by someone other than the members who are affected, who after all have a conflict of interest.

The hon. member for Edmonton West talked about the way in which these commissioners brought in their reports, as though they were edicts from on high. I suppose that could be said about any commission or body which has been given a delegated authority. Whenever they make their reports they seem to be edicts. But let me point out that these commissions have only the authority given to them by a parliamentary statute. Let me also point out that in the statute we provided that the commissioners had to publish their first or preliminary reports and then hold hearings at which the public might appear and make representations. The fact is that this was done, in all ten provinces.

The hon. member for Edmonton West called for involvement. This is a new word that is used a lot, whether we practise the idea or not. I suggest with regard to redistribution, it is at these meetings where the involvement should take place. It should be the people affected who have the right to appear before the commissions which propose boundaries and suggest any alterations that should be made. Hon. members I am sure will remember that this practice was carried out. In fact it actually was taking place during the time of the federal election in 1965, which was called a little bit soon for the restribution that was then pending.

I attended the hearings that were held in the city of Winnipeg. I took no part and made no contribution, but I attended, showed my interest and listened to the representations made by others. As a matter of fact, I showed my belief in the independence of the commission to that extent. Although I was a candidate in that election I felt this problem was one that belonged to the people themselves, and this is the way it should stay. I am not suggesting that this is the last step toward perfection, or that there are not some changes that could be made, but I think anything which detracts from the principle that an independent body should do the job and anything that would add to the participation of members of parliament in this affair would be a mistake.

Frankly, that is what I dislike most of all about the proposal of my friend the hon. member for Edmonton West, namely his suggestion that the extent to which this matter is debated back on the floor of the house should be increased. He made it very clear, and I give him full marks for this, that he would not give the house the right to order the commissioners to make any changes, but he does ask for more debate on this matter on the floor of the house than we have under the statute as it now reads. The statute now provides that when the commissioners have made their second drawing of the maps, those maps are delivered to Your Honour and we have them before us, and by statute time has to be set aside during which members can make their observations. We cannot make any motions; we cannot make any recommendations: we just make our observations and copies of Hansard are sent to the appropriate commissioners.

But if when those second maps were forwarded to Your Honour to be presented to the house there was added to them the reasons in detail for all the changes that had been made, and if the statute were amended to provide for members not just to give their observations but to debate, or in other words to argue on each individual change, each individual reason, I submit that we would be moving back in the direction of the practice of the first 100 years of confederation, namely partisan activity, with respect to a matter that I submit, with all seriousness, is none of our business. We are elected to represent the people, but surely we do not decide what areas are to comprise our constituencies. That is for people other than us to deal with. I think the arrangement that was arrived at in the debates of a few years ago was a pretty good one.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am not arguing that this practice is sacred and cannot be improved in some respects. I am not arguing against my hon. friend's feeling that he has a very real grievance. I suggest that the place to express that grievance is, of course, at the next redistribution, to make sure that he gets to the public hearings of the commission in his province and makes his point there as clearly as he has made it here.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): We made these points there, too.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member says that he made them there, too. All I can say is that the hon. member apparently was not as favoured in Alberta as we were in Manitoba. We had men who were experienced in the matter. The hon. member for Edmonton West suggests that there were political considerations. I would have to dissociate myself completely from that suggestion, at least as far as my province is concerned. The men who filled these posts could have their political pasts identified, and most public people in this country are such that this can be done. Certainly none of the Manitoba commissioners came from our part of the political spectrum. But I think they did a fair, reasonable, responsible and non-partisan job.

I am sure that in future redistributions some of these bugs will be ironed out and some of the problems such as that mentioned by the hon. member for Thunder Bay (Mr. Penner) will be dealt with. I sympathize with him, too. I did a little campaigning against him in his constituency, but I do not think I ever got within 500 miles of the hon. member because the constituency was so huge. These things can be ironed out. But surely the basic principle upon which we have finally agreed after many years is a good one. I believe we should stick with it and should not bring back into the arena or the cockpit of parliamentary debate this matter which belongs to the people of the country, and not just to the members who happen to be here.

Mr. Bigg: Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising to ask a question?

Mr. Bigg: No, Mr. Speaker; I would like to participate in the debate.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Champlain.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, at first glance, it would seem that the motion of the member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) is well founded. However, considering the argument of the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I feel some reservations should be made.

I should therefore like to express, at least, the reactions of the people in my riding with regard to the new electoral map. In my riding of Champlain, there is some astonishment. Indeed, some people did not even realize, before June 25, that they were voting in the Champlain riding only. Obviously—it was to be expected—people cannot adapt to a new situation within a few months.

However, I believe most sincerely that the limits of the Champlain riding were not set up in a scientific and logical way. In fact, I wonder why the recommendations made by the municipalities and the people concerned were not taken into consideration, as in the case of the municipality of Portneuf which made representations to the commission—I think that this cost approximately $2,000 to $3,000—and evidently it did not win its case, so that today, it is annoying for the town of Portneuf to be in the constituency of Champlain. I think it will take many years before people get used to writing "Portneuf, county of Champlain".

Surely this is a striking case. We can see that there is a lack of logic in that, since the twenty municipalities of the county of Portneuf, unsatisfied with the new boundaries, went over to the county of Champlain. I wonder if the people living in those constituencies should not have something to say about it. They thought that some politicking was involved and they decided to have their revenge saying: "Instead of one Créditiste member, we will have two." This is why they voted for the Crédistites in the constituency of Portneuf as well as in that of Champlain.

I wanted to make those few comments to point out that those commissions should take a little more into account the views of the people. The constituency of Champlain extending from Portneuf to Cap-de-la-Madeleine to the south and north as far as Parent—that is some 250 miles from the river—is far from homogeneous.

• (5:50 p.m.)

The southern part, densely populated, is almost exclusively agricultural, while the northern part has almost no ties with agriculture.

So, this factor should be taken into consideration since homogeneity, to my mind, should be taken into account. The limits should be set up according to demographic criteria and it seems to me they were not respected in this case seeing the Portneuf riding was split in two, giving it a population of 100,000 while that in the neighbouring riding is only 70,000.

Objectively, one wonders whether there may have been some error or other. I therefore agree with the member for Edmonton West in saying that the way the electoral boundaries were readjusted should certainly be looked into.

Let the house discuss that. Of course it must be hard for a member not to look after his own interest. I know that it is very difficult, but we are reasonable enough to set aside narrow political considerations and express ourselves as objectively as possible.

Mr. Gilles Marceau (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to trouble hon. members a second time today, but it seems that, once the ice is broken, one forms a taste for this sort of thing.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for providing us with the opportunity of discussing this notice of motion.

I see that the members of the opposition—as I have always thought, incidentally—often have excellent ideas, and that the party in power is not the only one to make intelligent and interesting suggestions.

I do not have the experience of the hon. member for Edmonton West, who was a member of the committees which studied this matter. However, in the last election campaign, I realized the importance of the boundaries of a riding and I saw that, in the particular case I am concerned with, they are sometimes illogical.

I had the opportunity to visit mostly the rural areas of my riding and to learn from my electors that they would have preferred to be in another riding. I do not know if it was because they were not for me but in any case, after listening to their arguments, I came to the conclusion that they were right.

Mr. Speaker, I noted that when the boundaries of the ridings are set, no account is taken of regional interests, of the tastes and normal likes of the electors who prefer, for instance, to be in one area rather than in another.

That is why in my riding I have to go to Laperrière, 25 or 30 miles away, at the edge of my riding, when Saint-Ambroise, five miles away, is in the next electoral riding.

Mr. Speaker, here is a solution that may be acceptable. I mentioned it earlier. Federal ridings should coincide with provincial counties.

In my area, there are five provincial counties included in the limits of four federal ridings. This creates great confusion. When we know that provincial and federal election acts are different, this adds to the confusion, and there comes a time when people ask themselves when and where they should vote. They are uncertain.

Mr. Speaker, I was very much impressed by the oratory of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) about whom I had heard for a long time and whose constructive ideas I have had the opportunity to appreciate since my coming to this house. I was very much impressed by what he said about the independence of the commission. I believe this is a factor that has to be maintained at any price. But that does not mean that decisions should be taken without consulting with the voters and the people concerned in order to know if they are interested and if they have any reasons to be listed in such a riding rather than another.

Mr. Speaker, I think that in my riding, they have used arbitrary limits such as a river. The commission has failed to find out if the people really wanted to be in such a riding instead of another and if, by normal attraction, for geographical reasons or through habit, they were going to my riding, for example, to Jonquière, rather than Chicoutimi or Alma.

Mr. Speaker, surely there are no easy or perfect solutions. In my opinion, if the commission had obtained further information from the constituents, I think a more equitable decision would have been reached.

As far as I am concerned, I disagree with the hon. member for Edmonton West when he says there are political undertones in establishing electoral boundaries. I must say that such was not the case for my constituency One part only was annexed to a neighbouring constituency, whereas part of the neighbouring constituency was annexed to mine without the slightest political motives of discrimination.

Not taking into account my own interest, I must say that many voters have sincerely admitted they were not happy. For strictly practical and business reasons, they would prefer to belong to the other constituency which generally follows the provincial boundaries.

I think that, in the light of my own limited experience, if the boundaries of the federal constituencies were established through an agreement with the provincial governments, this would solve part of the problem.

If an agreement between the parties were reached that would show fewer differences between the federal and provincial legislation, many obstacles would be eliminated.

On concluding my remarks, I wish to say that I completely agree that the commission must be free from interference. However, this sometimes does not preclude the members from voicing their opinions and it is up to the commission to reach conclusions regardless of any political considerations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

STATEMENT AS TO WHEREABOUTS OF SOLICITOR GENERAL

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the whereabouts of the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) has been the subject of some comment both on and off the printed record in this house in the last couple of days. I am happy to assure hon. members that the minister's absence has in no way reduced the effectiveness of his department. Indeed, with the assistance of the agencies for which the Solicitor General is responsible I am pleased to report that I have tracked him down, and I find that a day or two ago in Houston, Texas, he delivered a major speech to the North American Judges Association.

Because of the very great interest of the members of this house in what the Solicitor General is doing I could read the speech he made on the basis of the time taken to deliver it, which was 45 minutes. Alternatively, the speech could be found in the minister's office.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I thought members on this side of the house had made it perfectly clear that the whereabouts of the Solicitor General were not of concern to us, indeed that he was about the only minister about whom we did not wonder where he was most of the time. I do not know what has provoked this explanation by the Prime Minister of the absence of the minister, whose absence does not require any explanation to the house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was the Prime Minister who did not know where he was.

Mr. Stanfield: It is a little surprising, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister would feel it necessary to track down the minister. In view of the Solicitor General's discourse in Texas I am wondering whether it is possible that he has gone down there to express the concern of the government of Canada at the civil riots and the possibility of civil disorder in the United States.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to take the time of the house to add anything more on this matter, but it seems to me that what the Prime Minister has done is most remarkable. And the language he used, if I may point this out to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the members of the house, was not of the most respectful to a member of his cabinet. If the Prime Minister was merely cracking a joke, then I think I could join him, though I do not quite see the humour; but if he was doing something else to the Solicitor General, then it does not seem to me very charitable.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Just a word, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the right hon. Prime Minister has just stated that the absence of the Solicitor General will in no way affect the administration or reduce the effectiveness of the services rendered by this department to the house and the country, I simply want to ask him why a solicitor general was appointed, when it is proved by the right hon. Prime Minister himself that there is no need for one?

TRADE

TABLING OF LETTER FROM JAPANESE AMBASSADOR TO CANADA WITH REGARD TO QUOTAS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the house, I should like to table a copy of the letter dated November 18 from the Japanese Ambassador, informing the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) of the restraints being applied by the Japanese Government on exports of certain products to Canada during 1968. These restraints are being applied by the Japanese government following consultations between representatives of the Japanese and Canadian governments.

If the house approves, I propose that the Ambassador's letter be printed as an appendix to today's Votes and Proceedings.

• (2:40 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is this agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: In past years, Japan's restraint levels have been increased by a modest amount to permit orderly expansion of Japan's exports to Canada. Early this year, in consulting with the Canadian producers concerned, as we do each year, the government was informed that Canadian textile markets were seriously depressed. Investigations established that many sectors of the Canadian textile and garment industries are indeed experiencing difficult times. I am glad to be able to say that the Japanese government, recognizing these difficulties, has agreed to increases for 1968 that are, generally speaking, smaller than has been the case in recent years.

I should add that there have also been discussions with the Japanese authorities regarding the level of their exports to Canada of polyester/cotton fabrics. As honourable members will see, these fabrics are not included in the list of products subject to specific levels of restraint. However, I have been advised that the Japanese government intends to keep a close watch on the level of exports of these goods to Canada. We are keeping this particular matter under constant review.

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT— NARCOTIC CONTROL ACT— CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING CONTRACEPTIVE DEVICES, RESTRICTED DRUGS, ETC.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (for the Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved the first reading of Bill No. S-15 (from the Senate), to amend the Food and Drugs Act and the Narcotic Control Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Criminal Code.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS RESPECTING FUTURE APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I would like to direct to the Secretary of State but in view of its importance I wish to direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister. Is it now the policy of the Public Service Commission that a knowledge of both official languages will be a requirement for appointment to executive and administrative categories in the public service by the year 1970, and by the year 1975 in respect of promotions within the service?

I ask this question in view of the Prime Minister's own earlier remarks regarding a willingness to learn the second official language as the case may be, as contrasted to an actual facility in that language.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to inquire from the Public Service Commission concerning the matter raised by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question related to this question and arising from questions asked in the house on October 23 and on a subsequent date by myself and the hon. member for Peace River. Could the Prime Minister tell the house what decision he has reached with regard to a request from the Professional Institute of the Public Service of Canada for a meeting with the Prime Minister to discuss Bill No. C-120?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I have not yet had a report on this. I shall find out what the status is.

UNITED NATIONS

CANADIAN VOTE ON RESOLUTION RESPECTING RED CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister how the Canadian delegation, on instructions from his government, voted on the Italian resolution to send the question of the admission of China to the United Nations to a study committee.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As I understand the question it is as to how we voted. We abstained on that question. We felt that the establishment of a committee was a tactic which would result in delay in action on the matter. Because we want to be in a position on this question, as on others, and to be able to act freely if as a result of our review that is what we decide to do, we preferred to abstain rather than submit the whole question to a committee as suggested by the Italian resolution. That resolution would, perhaps, have the effect of delaying our own possible actions.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the Prime Minister's frequent reiteration of his hope that he may be able to establish diplomatic relations with Peking, and that mainland China might be admitted to the United Nations, is our abstention on this resolution this year not something which may be misunderstood in view of the fact that last year we supported a similar resolution?

Mr. Trudeau: Precisely because we supported this resolution for the past two years we have abstained this year to mark an orientation of this government away from a path which might be interpreted as a path of delay in the United Nations, and in order to clear ourselves for any action we might wish to take.

Mr. Lewis: Would the Prime Minister inform the house whether in doing so the Canadian representatives made clear to the United Nations Canada's intention and hope that mainland China would be admitted to the United Nations under proper conditions?

Mr. Trudeau: This was made clear two years ago by Hon. Paul Martin in his speech to the United Nations. It was repeated again this year by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

QUEBEC—PROPOSED CHANGE IN NAME OF LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, everyone learned yesterday that the Quebec government is about to change the name of the legislature to that of National Assembly of the province of Quebec. According to the Prime Minister, is there any constitutional objection to this new name and could he tell us his reaction to this report?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): As to my reaction, Mr. Speaker—and that may spare me the trouble of answering the first part of the question, which is a legal question—I think that the province of Quebec considers doing what it has a right to do under the constitution, that is amend its own provincial constitution, with the exception of the office of lieutenant governor.

As far as the name is concerned, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is cause for alarm. The province of Ontario has also changed the name of its legislature by calling it the parliament of Ontario. The name of the members of the Ontario provincial legislature have also been changed, I believe, and they are now members of the provincial parliament. Therefore, those matters do not worry me very much; what concerns me though is what this change means.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Since two provinces seem already to be contemplating changes in their legislature or their legislative council, does the federal government intend to make changes in the Senate?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, considerable changes are now under way in that place, under the distinguished leadership of the former Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin), but as far as definite proposals are concerned, I think that will have to wait until the next federal-provincial conference, when that matter can be discussed.

Mr. Gérard Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. In view of the name of National Assembly, does the Prime Minister not feel that such a step is the consecration of what many Canadians think, that there is only one nation in Canada, namely the Canadian nation?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I know that the Prime Minister is not very much concerned by the term "Assemblée nationale", but from the international point of view, from now on should the federal members from Quebec not be called "international members?"

[English]

FINANCE

STUDY OF CONTROL OF FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement by the secretary of the Treasury Board to the Canadian Tax Foundation this week that "the federal government has tended to neglect studies of whether money spent on its programs is being used as effectively as possible, or whether even the programs are needed—", will the Prime Minister indicate whether the government intends to take steps to correct this situation so it may better control its already very large expenditures?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I note that the quotation referred to the past; that the government had in the past neglected—. I presume the gentleman was referring to what might have happened from five to ten years ago; but as to what is happening now, these examinations are under way as I have already said in the house.

Mr. Hees: Is the right hon. Prime Minister not aware that in his statement the secretary of the Treasury Board was using the present tense in describing the situation that exists today?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR CANADA

WINNIPEG—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT REQUESTING OVERHAUL BASE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Martial Asselin (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

It was reported this morning that the Minister of Transport and some of his officials have met with the president of the Q.F.L., Mr. Louis Laberge. I would like to ask him whether he has some comments to make and what were the subjects discussed with the labour leader?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I was not in attendance at any such meeting, Mr. Speaker. I will have to take note of the question and find out who, if any, of my officials met with the gentleman. I was busily occupied elsewhere. I am not sure if there was such a meeting. If there was I missed something.

[Translation]

Mr. Asselin: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, concerning the Air Canada base at Winnipeg and Montreal.

A parliamentary committee made up of Liberal members from Quebec and Manitoba issued a press release saying they had—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask his question.

Mr. Asselin: —arrived at an honourable compromise. I should like to ask the minister if he can tell us today which honourable compromise his department has to offer Manitoba and Quebec members with respect to the Air Canada base?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question I should like to direct to the Minister of Transport. When may the house expect a reply to starred question No. 616, which has been on the order paper since October 30? I ask this question because the answer to most parts of the starred question is a simple yes or no. The minister's estimates are before the transport committee, and we must have a reply to the question in order to intelligently ask questions in the committee.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I hope soon, Mr. Speaker. The estimates of the Department of Transport will be considered tomorrow by the committee of the whole house, and I would be glad at that time to discuss this question with my hon. friend if he would like to do so.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—PROTESTS AGAINST EXPANSION OF FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question regarding the matter I previously brought to his attention, in connection with the 160,000 residents of the borough of Etobicoke, the town of Mississagua, and Chinguacousy. There has been a declaration by the Department of Transport that interference with residential development should be avoided. Therefore I ask the minister, has it been brought to his attention that if this expansion of the airport is proceeded with there are dozens of schools in that area which will require soundproofing at a cost of more than $200,000? In the borough of Etobicoke it has cost the board of education $624,600 to soundproof three schools to meet present levels of noise.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question should be for the purpose of seeking information, rather than giving information to the minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Sometimes, Mr. Speaker, you have to tell these ministers. However, this minister is not one of those. Would the minister say now that there is some hope for these people, under the circumstances I have pointed out, and others, of the government proceeding with a second airport, as has been the course followed in Montreal?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I indicated on a previous occasion that at the time the announcement was made last summer the major expansion of the Toronto international airport to the west would be conditional upon the proper land use zoning by the municipalities involved, and with the co-operation of the provincial government to the extent that it was required. Since that time a number of meetings have taken place at the technical level to determine the answer to this question. They are still continuing. I understand that there are one or two more still to be held. The information which is being produced there by interested parties is being accumulated to be made available to me. I hope to be in a position to take a look at it very shortly, and to determine at that time whether the basis upon which this proposition was first made is realizable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, would the minister also say that in addition to technical considerations, the human element, the rights of human beings in that area, will be fully considered and that their representations will be considered?

Mr. Hellyer: Very much so, Mr. Speaker. I would like to take this opportunity to say that these have been very forcefully brought to my attention over a period of weeks by the Toronto Liberal members of parliament—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: —before my right hon. friend really involved himself in this question. I can assure him that in addition to the aspects related directly to transportation and economics, the very legitimate—

Mr. Nielsen: Political?

Mr. Hellyer: No—the very legitimate concerns of the people of that district in so far as their quality of life is concerned will be very much taken into account.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Does the minister not know that the reason I brought it before the house was that these members, whatever representations they may have made, made them silently?

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Transport. When he is trying to arrive at a decision on this very serious and important question of the Malton airport, would he give serious consideration to the possibilities of the Wellington-Waterloo airport?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to do so if my hon. friend could give me an assurance that as that growing metropolitan area continues to expand, there would be no objections to the noise resulting from airport expansion in that place.

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO CONSTRUCTION IN EASTERN TOWNSHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer again to international airport and direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Would the hon. minister tell us whether agreements were entered into between the Quebec government and the Ottawa government in this respect and, if so, are the negotiations completed?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Not yet, Mr. Speaker, but I hope they will be soon.

Mr. Fortin: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) made a statement early this week indicating the negotiation of those agreements was completed—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask a question.

Mr. Fortin: Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the hon. minister whether he is aware of the statement made by the hon. member for Trois-Rivières indicating that—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, as asked, is out of order.

WINNIPEG—REPORTED LACK OF HANGAR SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of very urgent requirements this winter for aircraft hangar space at the Winnipeg international airport by a number of local and regional aircraft operators, will the minister make a thorough examination into the possibility of providing hangar space for these operators in the armed forces hangars which apparently are not being used to their full capacity by the armed forces?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making representations to the minister rather than asking a question. I assume the representations have been noted.

Mr. Simpson: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I asked the minister to look into the possibility of providing hangar space for these operators.

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO FRANCE IN MONETARY CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the right hon. Prime Minister and ask him whether the government of France has made representations to the Canadian government for assistance in the defence of the franc; and if so, what has been the reply of the Canadian government?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such representations that might have been made to my government by the government of France. As to our reply, I can only say that this is a hypothetical question.

Mr. Saltsman: On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I was wondering whether the government is prepared to take initiative in view of the serious difficulties in which the French government finds itself. Is it prepared to take a charitable initiative and offer its assistance to the French government?

Mr. Trudeau: Does the hon. member mean something like proclaiming "Vive le franc libre"?

Mr. Knowles (Winipeg North Centre): Touché.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Saltsman: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Aside from the Prime Minister taking that kind of initiative, which might or might not be welcomed in France, I was wondering whether the Prime Minister can inform the house when the Minister of Finance will be returning, and whether the minister will be prepared to make a full statement on his representations in Europe.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the minister had expected to come back here after a day, but he is staying on because the discussions are continuing. I can only add that in matters such as these the position of the European currencies is of concern to all of us. I indicated yesterday that there is no reason for worry about the Canadian dollar—it is in a better position than it has been in a long while—but we do not take the position that what happens to European currencies is of no concern to us. We approach this matter very seriously, and we do not want to make any gesture or any statement which might prejudge the outcome of these very delicate problems.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, would the right hon. Prime Minister not agree that for the government of Canada to make any such statement as "Vive le franc libre" would be an unwarranted intrusion in the affairs of France?

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the right hon. Prime Minister would consider relieving the pressure on the French franc by accepting the undertakings in the cultural field that France has made to New Brunswick, Manitoba and some other places?

WATER RESOURCES

ST. MARY'S RIVER—ACTION RESPECTING POLLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): My question is for the Minister of Transport. In view of the report of the International Joint Commission on pollution in the St. Mary's river, does the minister plan to take any action against the shipowners who are polluting this river by dumping waste into it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member might not consider the possibility of discussing that question at the time of adjournment.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION RESPECTING OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): My question is for the Prime Minister. On November 4 I asked a question concerning offshore mineral rights, and in his reply the Prime Minister referred to the fact that the anniversary date of the decision of the Supreme Court was very near. That has passed, it having been November 7. He also said:

> —I hope that on or around that anniversary certain proposals will have been made to the provinces.

I wonder if any such proposals have yet been made, and if not, when we might expect a statement.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am planning to be in a position to make such a statement after next weeks' cabinet meeting. This is my expectation, and I hope I will be able to adhere to my plan.

AGRICULTURE

REPRESENTATION ON STEERING COMMITTEE FOR FORTHCOMING CONGRESS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Could the minister indicate whether consideration is being given to the appointment of a representative from either the federation of agriculture or the national farmers' union to the steering committee that is now planning the agricultural congress to be held in Ottawa early next spring?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question should be placed on the order paper. If, however, it is considered sufficiently urgent to be debated now it can be brought up at the time of adjournment.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO RETURN OF DEFENCE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I should like to ask the Prime Minister when the Minister of National Defence will have completed the duties he is carrying out at the present time, and when we may expect to see him back in his place in the house.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): He is supposed to be in the house next Monday and the days following.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF PRESIDENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. About two weeks ago the right hon. gentleman told the house that he would make an announcement concerning the presidency of Air Canada within two weeks at the most. That time has now about expired and I was wondering if the right hon. Prime Minister could make the announcement now.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to announce that I hope the announcement will be made Tuesday by the board of Air Canada which, under the statute, is empowered to make the announcement. I am looking forward to that announcement with great expectation.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister whether the board of Air Canada is making the appointment, or whether the government of Canada is making it.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking me for an interpretation of the statute, and as such, I suggest, the question is not in order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF FREEDMAN REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the undertaking that was given by his predecessor, that the Department of Labour would act upon the recommendations of the Freedman report, can the minister tell us what his department has done along these lines with respect to the impending lay-offs at Windsor?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The estimates of the labour department will be before the house at the end of the question period, but I might reassure the hon. gentleman that any doubts I had on the philosophy of the Freedman commission report were dissipated by the action of the Ford Company, and I will strongly recommend to my colleagues some legal action along the lines of the Freedman report.

INDUSTRY

CAPE BRETON—PENSION AGE OF DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development arising from the intention of the federal crown corporation known as Devco—and I would like to make this clear as the minister does not seem to understand it—to impose compulsory retirement at the age of 60 in the Cape Breton coal industry. Is it the policy of the government in this case to follow collective bargaining in that industry as it relates to retirement and pension programs?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): I understand that negotiations with the unions are still continuing on this subject.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the minister had the report available on his desk for quite some time before it was tabled, did he not study it, and does he not see the ambiguity in the report with regard to the actions taken by Devco?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Well, Mr. Speaker, it seems very clear to me.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have a further supplementary question. In view of the very considerable experience the minister has had in the labour field, does he not recognize a violation of a general agreement when he sees one?

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

MILK—PROPOSED PRICE INCREASE IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In view of yesterday's announcement of a rise in the price of milk to Ontario consumers, will the minister consider ways and means of protecting the further erosion of the nutritional levels of low income consumers?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration.

Could he tell us what has happened to the ship that he arranged to be brought and anchored in the river during the election campaign, in front of the Lauzon shipyards, to have major repairs done to it and thus to give work to hundreds of families at Lauzon?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should place his question on the order paper.

Mr. Rondeau: Has it been discarded or saved for the next election?

[English]

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Now that the Prime Minister has made a thorough investigation as to—excuse my language—where in the hell the member for Burnaby-Seymour is, and where in the hell the minister is, can he now answer my question?

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Does the government expect in the near future to make an announcement regarding the employment of Mr. James Tucker, in view of the fact that all other defeated Liberal members of the last parliament have been given cushy jobs?

DRUGS

HEROIN—REPORTED STATEMENT AS TO DISTRIBUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): I have a question for the Minister of Justice. In view of the alarming statement by an R.C.M.P. spokesman that the hippy world has become an important distribution centre for heroin, a dangerous and rapidly habit forming drug, would the minister inform the house if this matter is now being given his consideration?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes indeed, sir.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FLOATING EXCHANGE RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I wish to address my question to the Prime Minister. In view of recent developments in world monetary affairs and the strength of the Canadian dollar as referred to by the Prime Minister, will the government now give consideration to a floating exchange rate, or a modified form of a floating exchange rate?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Heavens no, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Then will the Prime Minister give me the assurance that in future when he boasts of the strength of the Canadian dollar he will be sure to touch wood?

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question with regard to the monetary crisis in Europe.

Can the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether, as we heard yesterday, Japan has decided to supply or guarantee a billion dollars to France to support the franc?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I did not hear that.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED APPOINTMENTS OF FRENCH CANADIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Yesterday, in Hull, Mr. Yves Labonté, commissioner of the Public Service Commission of Canada, called for a massive ingress of French-speaking people in the public service. I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he shares this opinion and, if so, whether this will be possible in the near future?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question, as put, is out of order.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): My question is for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. In view of the great interest in Prince Edward Island, I wonder whether the minister could tell us how soon we might expect this comprehensive development plan of the government of Canada to be signed?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO ALTERNATIVE FOR P.F.R.A. PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): My question is also for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. Is the government phasing out the P.F.R.A. program and, if so, what alternative scheme is planned to fill the growing demand for regional development?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): We are not phasing out the program, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

WHEAT—ABILITY TO MEET EXPORT COMMITMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): I have a question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. On November 7 last, in reply to a question by the Leader of the Opposition, he promised to inquire into the fulfilling of export commitments by the Canadian Wheat Board. Can he now state whether these commitments are being filled on schedule, and can he further say whether the Canadian Wheat Board is presently negotiating with the Soviet union about taking up its option under the long term sales agreement with that country?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I will not reply to the latter part of the question, Mr. Speaker, on the grounds previously stated by myself and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The commitments of the wheat board and deliveries of wheat are being fulfilled. The movement of grain from elevators to the terminals is up very significantly over last year, to the extent of 47 per cent in the period from October 1 to November 7.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I have a supplementary question for the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan. In view of his very optimistic statement as to the shipments of wheat to terminals, can he explain why it is that the 3 bushel quota still applies generally? At the same time will he inform us whether, if I may use a police expression, he has tracked down the number of Canadian freight cars in the United States that might be brought back to Canada?

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): I am sure the quota is being opened in as orderly a fashion as possible, with damp grain being given special consideration. The figures I quoted concerning increased loadings of box cars for grain at 47 per cent compares, in the same period, to an increase in the loadings of cars toward the United States to the extent of 23.2 per cent. The railroads therefore seem to be increasing their loadings in all directions at the same time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: May I ask the minister a supplementary question, still using the police term of "tracking down". Has the wheat board tracked down the number of freight cars in the United States that might be made available in Canada if pressure were applied to United States railroads?

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): I have some difficulty in answering. The wheat board considers the railroads are co-operating fully with them with regard to the movement of grain.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question on the subject of co-operation. I ask whether there has been any endeavour to find out the number of box cars in the United States which should be back in Canada but are kept there by United States railroads because it is cheaper to pay the fee on them than endeavour to secure other cars. Does the minister not have an answer to that?

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): I have a supplementary question. Is the Minister without Portfolio aware that a great deal of difficulty exists in western Canada because the elevators are plugged with damp grain, and there are not sufficient cars available to move it?

HARBOURS

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETION OF DECENTRALIZATION STUDY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the minister had time over the week end to study the report on National Harbours Board decentralization, as he indicated he would; and could he table that report so it could be referred to the transport committee?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I have a confession to make, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I have been waiting for it for a long time.

Mr. Hellyer: I did not manage to get all the way through it on the week end, but I still feel it should be referred to the transport committee. I hope to be able to confirm that to my hon. friend very soon.

TRADE

EXPO 70—GUARANTEE OF PAYMENT OF CANADIAN PERFORMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Georges Valade (Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, I wanted to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but, in his absence, I shall put it to the right hon. Prime Minister, in view of its importance. I should like first to advise the Prime Minister of the assignment in bankruptcy made by Mr. Samuel Gesser, the impressario now responsible for—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot give information and he should ask a question.

Mr. Valade: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister what steps he intends to take so that the costs of performances and exhibitions which will take place at the Canadian pavilion in Osaka at Expo '70 will be guaranteed by the government, in view of the fact that Mr. Samuel Gesser has been declared bankrupt and that the said Samuel Gesser has now been placed in charge, by the Canadian government, of the recreational activities of the Canadian pavilion in Osaka?

Mr. Speaker: This question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Valade: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the urgency of the matter and the fact that Mr. Gesser, business director who was declared bankrupt yesterday, is responsible for the recreational activities at the Canadian pavilion in Osaka, could the minister give us the assurance that measures will be taken so as to ensure that the artists will be paid?

FREIGHT RATES

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR DELAY IN PROPOSED INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Transport. I understood he would be here for the question period, though I do not see him now. I will direct it to his parliamentary assistant. Since it now appears that the standing committee on transport and communications will not resume its hearings in the Atlantic provinces before spring, will the minister, the acting minister or the parliamentary assistant please undertake to guarantee that the freeze on freight rates will be continued until a complete study of the problem has been made?

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to take that question as notice.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While the Minister without Portfolio is checking the answer to the previous question with the Minister of Transport, will he also see whether the minister has any confession to make about the Digby-Saint John Ferry, since an announcement on that is long overdue?

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED INTENTION TO ESTABLISH OUTSIDE ADVISORY GROUPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On November 8 last I asked him a question concerning the establishment of regional desks and a body of 150 extra-parliamentary advisers. The Prime Minister said that he would inquire into the matter. Has he done so, and can he give the house his answer?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have inquired into it. What was it the hon. member wanted to know?

Mr. Broadbent: An answer to my original question, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, since the Prime Minister obviously has a bad memory when it comes to looking into matters, may I help him by reading the original question he failed to answer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I must point out to hon. members that the question period has expired. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby should raise his point tomorrow. I shall make sure he is recognized tomorrow early in the question period.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF TWO PRICE SYSTEM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, on Monday last I directed a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce or to the Minister of Agriculture. At that time the Prime Minister advised me that those ministers would be in the house on the following Wednesday. May I now direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In the light of the clear-cut call by delegates who attended the annual meeting of the Saskatchewan wheat pool for a two price system for wheat, will the government give favourable consideration to this request or some other acceptable alternative?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a question that has been discussed on the Canadian grain scene for a number of years and the government has given some consideration to it, and is continuing to give consideration to it.

Mr. Southam: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the serious market situation that now faces Canada with regard to short sales, does the minister not consider that it will be more appropriate than ever for the government now to give serious consideration to this matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the government house leader. In view of the congestion that is being felt in the operation of our standing committees and in view of the great amount of work there is for them to do in the next little while, would the government house leader consider asking parliament to take one or two days off in the middle of next week so the committees may have those full days to meet and proceed with their work?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to consider the suggestion, but the hon. member and opposition house leaders might consider whether they are prepared to give up two of the present session's supply days for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must bring to the attention of hon. members that the question period has expired, but perhaps there might be consent for the hon. member for Peace River to ask a question.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the government house leader what our business will be for next week, so we may have an opportunity to peer as far ahead into the future as possible.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Today, as the house knows, we shall be in committee of supply to deal with the estimates of the Department of Labour. Tomorrow we shall deal with the estimates of the Department of Transport. On Monday we shall call the estimates of the National Capital Commission. On Tuesday, on one of our supply days pursuant to the special order made by this house on November 6, we shall deal with the report of the committee on external affairs and national defence having to do with the question of Nigeria. On Wednesday we shall return to the estimates of the Department of Public Works. It will be my intention to call the committee of supply again for Thursday and Friday of next week, the subject matter before the committee to be discussed with hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a possibility that we may deal with some of the estimates which have already been considered in committee, or perhaps we shall consider the suggestion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please. House again in committee of supply on the revised estimates of the Department of Labour for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote No. 1 will be found at page 264 of the blue book, and the details thereof at page 266.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

1. General Administration, including grants as detailed in the estimates, $1,962,100.

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, this is the first occasion I have had to present the estimates of any department to this house. I welcome the opportunity not only of explaining what my department is doing but also of course, of listening to the observations and views of hon. members from other parties in the house as well as from my own party.

I point out at the beginning of my remarks that the estimates of the Unemployment Insurance Commission were referred to the standing committee and have been dealt with by that appropriate committee and accepted.

Earlier in the session, during the throne speech debate, I had an opportunity to express my philosophy and views on the collective bargaining system that prevails in Canada. I detailed the record of successes of that system in the areas under federal jurisdiction and pointed out that of the 100-odd cases that had been referred to the Department of Labour where strikes could possibly have ensued, there were strikes in only six cases, only two of those being of major consequence.

I would be misleading the house if I suggested that changes are not needed in the legislation concerning industrial relations. It is no longer sufficient to react to situations. Rather, we must anticipate them. We must initiate and encourage a much greater degree of communication between labour and management. My department must make sure that labour and management appreciate that they are not natural enemies but, rather, natural partners. In the final analysis the private enterprise system which provides dividends for company shareholders also provides the jobs for our ever-growing labour force as well as the standard of living to which many of us have become accustomed.

There is much activity these days in the department, Mr. Chairman. In anticipation of the Woods Task Force report officials of the department are reviewing existing legislation, preparing new laws and evaluating new concepts in order that we may take advantage of this report and the enlightened approach I hope it will have to the labour problem of today.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that my department must lead; it must encourage labour and management to co-operate more fully. It is my belief that the time has come for the establishment of a new mediation service, a mediation branch composed of experts, experts supported by a proper team of researchers with a detailed knowledge of the industries coming within the federal sphere. I believe that this type of expertise will be of invaluable service to management and labour. These experts could introduce a degree of continued communication between management and labour that should reduce the areas of friction and supply the assistance needed to make collective bargaining more meaningful.

Until the Woods task force report is tabled, Mr. Chairman, hon. members can understand my reluctance to discuss at this time the many changes in detail that I believe are necessary if my department is to assume its full role in the just society of tomorrow.

I have had an opportunity while reviewing my department to acquaint myself with many of the problems facing Canada and Canadians today, problems that in some direct or indirect way concern or should concern the Department of Labour. I am concerned, for instance, about work stoppages and disputes that are prolonged far beyond the point where anyone stands to gain. I am concerned about the lack of communication within the trade union movement itself, as evidenced by the increasing number of cases where the general union membership has failed to ratify agreements entered into by its own leadership.

I am concerned that quite often this failure to ratify agreements is the direct result of the negotiating team presenting exorbitant and extravagant demands. The same union leaders then wonder why the rank and file reject the negotiated settlement after they have irresponsibly built up the anticipation of their membership.

I am not suggesting that exaggerated demands are the only reason for the rejection of negotiated settlements, but they certainly are a contributing factor. I think that in the main responsible union leaders will agree with me that they must communicate more effectively, more reasonably with their membership and impress upon them the fact that wage increases cannot consistently outstrip productivity without eventually bringing about a reduction in the standard of living. I am not at all surprised when the public expresses indignation on learning through the news media that a union is demanding a 15 or 20 per cent wage increase per year.

I am also concerned about the welfare of that third segment of Canadian society—not management, not the unions, but the unorganized worker and the senior citizen, people on fixed incomes, the blind, the crippled, the disabled, people who are not represented at the bargaining table. I often wonder when management divide up the profit between dividends and increased salaries whether they should not stop to think if some of these exorbitant or large profits should not reflect lower prices, whether there should not be a greater social awareness of the responsibility of organized labour as well as of management to the unorganized segment to which I have already alluded.

Ability to pay must not be the only criterion for settlement at the bargaining table. There is a growing social responsibility resting on both Canadian management and unions, and I suggest to them that they begin to demonstrate a greater consciousness of this responsibility.

I would like to speak very briefly on the work of conciliation boards. Over the years conciliation boards have served the public of Canada well in settling, or making recommendations which assist in the settlement of, labour disputes. They continue to serve and have done very effective work as recently as the current fiscal year. However, I am disturbed at a growing practice that seems to prevail, namely that when a conciliation board has failed to settle a dispute it then submits a report containing no recommendations, in effect returning the issue to the protagonists with no guide lines or suggestions whatsoever, and which quite often reflects a minimum of effort by the board to resolve the dispute.

I am not unaware that this action is often requested by the parties, but regardless of arguments which may be advanced in favour of this tactic, it seems to me it reflects an abdication of responsibility on the part of the chairmen of such boards and the representatives of management and labour.

On the whole, Mr. Chairman, I am proud of the contribution made by conciliation boards, but I can foresee the day when the appointment of a board in labour disputes may become the exception rather than the rule. This will mean an expanded role for our conciliation officers and should impress upon the parties the necessity of reaching an accommodation at the conciliation officer stage.

Members might forgive me if I devote some time at this stage of my remarks to the question of automation, of technological change, and of the growing and pressing need for increased productivity in Canada.

There was a time, of course, when increased productivity was a simple matter: one supplied his help with a larger shovel or a bigger wheelbarrow. But today increased productivity is synonymous with technological change, with automation, with sophisticated methods of production. Because of our great reliance on exports to maintain our standard of living and to absorb our ever-growing labour force, we must accept and indeed seek out these advanced methods of production if we are to compete with such countries as West Germany, Japan, Sweden and the United States.

We talk about a just society. A just society, to this Liberal at any rate, means a society where medicare is a right and not a privilege, a society where decent housing is not a luxury but a necessity, a society with a decent standard of living for those less fortunate among us. I refuse to accept the concept that a country like Canada, with its tremendous assets, raw materials, highly skilled labour force and free enterprise system, cannot afford these things. To be unable to provide these things to our citizens can only be described as a failure of the system we endorse in this country. I suggest the free enterprise system is on trial in Canada and must measure up to the challenge of supplying these rights. The solution is not in the elimination of medicare or other social measures that have made Canada synonymous with an enlightened attitude toward its people, but in rallying our energies, our imagination and our confidence so that the programs can be paid for and carried forward by the fruits of increased productivity.

We must constantly remind ourselves that in many of the nations that we compete with the degree of co-operation that is now needed in Canada, but is lacking at the moment between labour and management, and the amount of planning that is needed not only between labour and management but with government as well, are already a way of life. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, in Japan it is almost a religious cult.

Canadian workers when trained and provided with equal opportunities, equal equipment, equally efficient management and equal markets can meet the production of any industrial worker in the world. But if increased productivity depends on our willingness to accept technological change—and I believe it does—then we must be prepared to face squarely the disruptive forces that technological change creates. Management, of course, accepts quite readily technological change, and why not? In most cases it means survival in an ever-increasingly competitive world. In many other instances it means a greater margin of profit.

But the acceptance of technological change is still resisted and indeed feared by certain segments of our labour force. Upon reflection, Mr. Chairman, why not? Balanced against the realization that these changes are necessary is the realization by labour that all too often the disruptive forces of technological change are borne solely by the labour class. Why is it always the individual Canadian worker who must bear exclusively the terribly personal and disruptive effects that quite naturally stem from technological change? Surely this cannot be accepted as inevitable, as just, in this year of 1968. Canadian society and its government cannot be so passive, so unconcerned as to accept as part of the game this human disruption.

The Canada-United States auto pact is a perfect example of how management fails to understand its moral obligations to its workers. When close to 500 workers were notified last week—I think that fortunately the figures are now 388—that they were to be laid off by the Ford Motor Company in Windsor, they were given precisely one week's notice, one week to adjust mentally to the impact of lay-off, one week to seek out help and advice from the Unemployment Insurance Commission and from the manpower centres, to find out if they qualified for additional benefits or, in too many cases, if they qualified for any type of benefit. I believe that management cannot expect the respect of labour and the full co-operation that is needed unless it begins to assume the moral obligation that technological change and increased productivity involve. I think the time has come for the Minister of Labour to convince his colleagues that legislation defining and emphasizing management's responsibility to its employees in the area of technological change is long overdue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, the philosophy of Judge Freedman and others like Judge Laskin is clear and precise. There are ways and means of introducing negotiation on technical change without usurping management's right to manage. I am committed to such legislation and am waiting to see what the Woods task force may offer as a method of solution in this very senstitive but highly important area.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I may be allowed to turn to another area that comes under the Department of Labour and which is of growing concern to all Canadians. That is the problem of prejudice and discrimination in the working force of Canada. To me this is an intolerable situation, and we cannot excuse it on any grounds whatsoever. As long as it exists it means that we have Canadians who, in effect, have a special set of working conditions imposed upon them regardless of the laws we pass to equalize rewards and opportunities. A review of existing legislation in my department indicates to me that some substantial amendments are required, and this will be done after careful analysis of the recommendations of the royal commission on the status of women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: There are people in this country who have been discriminated against for so long that they have begun to discriminate against themselves, to limit their own aspirations because they cannot conceive that the better opportunities, the better way of life, could be for them also. This is a loss to Canada, a loss to our labour force which we can ill afford.

With the intent of fighting prejudice through positive action we have recently set up a branch in the department that intends to enforce as vigorously as possible the Canada Fair Employment Practices Act and to amend it so as to make it more effective. In the meantime officers of this branch have been touring Canada educating employers to the fact that the Department of Labour will not tolerate prejudice based on colour, religion or national origin. To make this campaign effective will require the full support of the unions of this country, as well as the full support of my cabinet colleagues and, I am sure, of all my colleagues in the house.

Above all, Mr. Chairman, I think it is time that the federal government and the crown corporations be model employers, examples for others throughout the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: Now, Mr. Chairman, not being aware as precisely as I should of my role in this discussion of estimates I would conclude by reminding the committee once again that I will not be deterred from my determination to make the Department of Labour a reflection of the new spirit of co-operation and communication that is so badly needed in this country. I will not hesitate to arm it with the legislation it requires to make it an effective instrument, not of labour, not of management, but of the people of Canada, people who are entitled to maximum effort on the part of labour, of government and of management to seek the solutions to increased productivity, to industrial peace and to a just society.

Although most of my remarks today have concerned the department's role in industrial relations and fair employment practices, it will be obvious to hon. members, when we consider the details of the votes, that the department has many and diverse responsibilities and programs. These include the Canada Labour (Standards) Code, the Canada Labour (Safety) Code, the program of the women's bureau, the labour-management consultation program, the annuities branch, and an expanding program of economics and research, just to mention only a few. All of these elements will be caught up in the revitalization and re-positioning of the department to play its optimum role in today's society. To do what I believe must be done will require changes in the structure of the Department of Labour, both in Ottawa and in the various regions, to improve internal communications and flexibility of operations so that it can respond better to public needs and priorities.

Above all, I want to bring the Department of Labour and its services as close as possible to the community it serves. I want to make it more sensitive to the needs of that community. And I want it to become more actively involved as a true partner of management, labour and the public interest.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that there is no room in the statute books of Canada for compulsory arbitration. I think we can achieve the type of industrial peace needed to make this country prosperous by co-operation among the government, labour and management. This is the dedication which I have and with which I shall approach my role as Minister of Labour.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I did not have the slightest intention of taking part in this discussion except that it seemed to me—and I hope the minister will accept this as not being offensive—that he has lectured everybody else and so he might not mind a slight lecture from me directed toward himself and his colleagues. If I understood him correctly he was rather critical of unions, at least of some trade unions, for asking too much in the way of wage increases. I think this is in part due to the inflation psychology in this country and the fear of the working men of what they will be faced with in connection with rising costs of living. I suggest it would be more helpful if members of the government, including this minister, would spend less time lecturing the public in this connection and do a little more themselves to bring inflation under control.

For example, since I have been in this house we have had optimistic statements of activity from ministers of the government, beginning last fall. Last winter, in the depth of the crisis in which the government found itself, the then prime minister gave some assurance on new measures that were being taken, but no action has followed. Since then we have been promised a white paper with regard to an anti-inflationary program and we are still waiting for it. In all seriousness I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that a lecture from the Minister of Labour is a pretty poor substitute for a constructive program from the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the Leader of the Opposition not think it was a good idea for the minister to lecture his own colleagues as to the improvements that ought to be made on that side of the house?

Mr. Stanfield: I do not think he spent enough time lecturing his own colleagues. I think he spent too much time lecturing the public and I am suggesting to him, and through him to his colleagues, that a little more by way of example on their part might be more productive than some of this lecturing that is going on.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I remind the Leader of the Opposition that since we are dealing with estimates I might spend a little time lecturing him before we are through.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Crouse: A very arrogant Minister of Labour.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: Well, Mr. Chairman, my hon. friends down here have so very little to applaud that I do not object to their reacting to that kind of bravado on behalf of the Minister of Labour. I am always delighted to receive any good wishes or anything else he may care to pass my way. However, I believe in all sincerity it is high time the government carried out some of its assurances concerning anti-inflationary programs rather than lecturing members of the public for reacting in the light of their own fears respecting continued inflation.

The minister spoke about the need to anticipate developments and the need for improved methods of achieving industrial peace. We will look forward to hearing about these, presumably following the Woods report and further reflection on the part of the minister. I for one will await them with very keen interest because again I say that we hear these things but see very little action.

The minister spoke of the importance of increased productivity. He stated that in a country like ours we ought to be able to finance enlightened social measures and that we must place the necessary emphasis on productivity in order to achieve these necessary measures. I agree with this unquestionably but I suggest to him, sir, through you, that when one talks about productivity one must not only lecture management and labour but must remember that it is also a question to a considerable degree of having an enlightened government policy. A continued increase in productivity, for example, requires an adequate standard of government services in the field of education throughout our various provinces. I suggest to him that the very hard line he and his colleagues have adopted with regard to the provinces and the effect that this line, if maintained, will have on the services related to productivity which the provincial governments must provide in this country, will have a very unfortunate effect in respect of increasing productivity in Canada.

I suggest it is not merely free enterprise which is on trial in this regard; it is also the government of this country which is on trial. In order to achieve the necessary standard of government services throughout the country a degree of co-operation is required rather than a hard line which amounts almost to dictation from the federal government. It is necessary for the two levels of government to achieve some understanding in connection with priorities rather than have one level of government simply resort to lectures.

The minister spoke about discrimination. I certainly share his concern and disapproval of any discrimination which exists. Unfortunately it does exist in this country. He referred particularly to discrimination based on race, religion, creed or something of that sort. People in one part of the country may feel there is discrimination because they happen to live in a certain part of the country. I am sure the minister also has this in mind. I should like to suggest that discrimination cannot be eliminated simply by the passage of legislation to ban discrimination. If in this country we are to achieve the elimination of discrimination, which as I see it really amounts to achieving something like equality of opportunity, much more than anti-discriminatory legislation is required. I suggest we must have a very well oriented program working toward something like achievement of equality of opportunity involving education, the overcoming of traditional handicaps and the overcoming of discrimination, if you like, which results from poor housing. All these things have been mentioned by a good many Canadians.

I point out that discrimination of this kind certainly will not be overcome simply by any legislation the minister may have in mind. Again it is essential, if we are too make any real progress in respect of overcoming discrimination in this country, that the government be prepared to work out an effective system of co-operation with the provinces so that the government can work together with the provinces to overcome discrimination.

Before I sit down I should like to say that if the government continues to pursue the hard line it is taking, what we will see will not be the elimination of discrimination but rather a vast increase in discrimination in this country.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I welcome the minister to his new portfolio and wish him well in his work. He gives every indication of being a man who is dedicated to the well-being particularly of the labouring people in this country and also, as he says, all Canadians. I only hope that the legislation he supports, both in the house and more particularly in cabinet, will lead to the realization of the principles in which he says—and I believe he does—he believes.

Earlier this afternoon he gave some indication that, from the point of view of those of us in this party at least, he is clearly moving in the right direction. I refer of course to his attitude in respect of the Freedman report. Having said that, I should like to take this opportunity to raise briefly two matters of policy orientation to which I should like the minister to give very careful consideration.

First I should like to say a few words about unemployment. I hope the Minister of Labour will concern himself with what is almost certain to be in store for us during the coming winter. If past and present trends continue we will experience one of the worst winters in recent years. It was not many years ago that economists considered a 3 per cent unemployment level as the absolute maximum for any advanced industrial society that wished to maintain any kind of civilized existence. At no time in the past three years, however, have we had a national unemployment level as low as 3 per cent. In the Atlantic provinces the lowest quarterly level was 5.8 per cent. That was in the spring of 1966. Again, considering the national average, if we begin with the first quarter of 1966 and look at the succeeding quarterly levels of unemployment we see a continuous increase, with not one quarterly decline, from 3.3 per cent in the winter of 1966 to 5.1 per cent for the third quarter of this year.

These figures are bad enough, but they are even more alarming when they are broken down into regions. For example, unemployment in the Atlantic provinces during this same period increased from 6.7 per cent to 8 per cent and in Quebec from 4.7 per cent to 6.5 per cent. Again we get a more precise picture of the deplorable level of unemployment for an advanced industrial society by looking at the peak winter months. In the Atlantic provinces in January, 1967, 9.9 per cent of the labour force was without work. In January, 1968, the figure was 10.9. Now, given the increase of unemployment this year over last, it would not be unreasonable to forecast that unemployment in the Atlantic provinces will reach a level of 12 per cent or 13 per cent this coming January.

I could go on producing these alarming figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics but I think my point has been made. We in Canada are experiencing an alarming level of unemployment and the government, far from introducing programs aimed at alleviating the situation, is actually aggravating it. First, we received the announcement that the winter works program was to be abolished. Then we had the Minister of Finances' conservative chamber of commerce budget, the main effect of which will be to reduce even farther the level of employment. Not content with cutting back on government spending, the Minister of Finance imposed a new regressive tax. By reducing both government and private purchasing power the minister did just about all he could to maximize unemployment levels during the coming winter. I mention unemployment during the discussion of the labour department's estimates because it should be a major responsibility of the Minister of Labour and, of course, the minister of manpower to get their cabinet colleagues to do something about the alarming situation.

While I am on this matter, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the minister if he would produce for the house his department's unemployment forecast for the coming winter. I should like him to present figures for each of the provinces and for each of our major cities.

I should like to take this opportunity to say something about what is probably the central issue of an industrial society, namely, the relationship between capital and labour, between the few who own our industries and the many who work for them.

I think I may be saying something with which the minister will find himself in substantial agreement. It is clear that in Canada today it is as true as it ever was that when the worker faces his boss, whether in the form of owner or manager, he does not do so as an equal. The emergence and development of trade unions in Canada in the past decades have substantially improved the position of the worker. Provided he is a member of a union, he no longer can be fired at the whim of his employer; nor are his wages and supplementary benefits at the low level they would otherwise be. Notwithstanding these tangible and important benefits, Canada's unionized workers, not to mention the majority who are not union members, are not and cannot be in a position of equality with their employers. If they were, each would have the same say in production decisions, in policies involving the allocation of capital, and in discussions concerning the nature and price of the product.

No serious student of industrial relations would claim that labour and management are on equal ground in these areas. Indeed, most people accept almost as a self-evident truth that they should not be equal in respect to these matters. Decisions about production, the allocation of capital, and the nature and price of the product, according to the prevailing ideology quite properly belong to the owners or their appointees, the managers. The men who own the shares, it is argued, not only have the final say about what goes on in the factory but, as well, it is proper that they do so. Unfortunately most people in Canada think this way.

So long as this situation and attitude prevail, Mr. Chairman, it is a mockery of reality to assert as many do that management and labour are partners in industry. Those who use the phrase imply that there is a state of equality between the two. Such a phrase is part of that political vocabulary whose purpose is not to elucidate reality but to obscure it. It is used by those who seek to persuade us that the basic structure of the existing economic order in Canada is a just one. We must not be taken in, Mr. Chairman. The central structure and its entailed power relations of our economic system are unequal; they are unjust.

In one sense the history of the trade union movement in Canada can be seen as an attempt by our workers to break down the barriers to equality. They have sought to make inroads on the so-called rights of management. They have sought to have more control over their own day to day lives. The most recent example of this struggle for equality is the attempt to have some say in the introduction of new technology and work practices in industry.

At present in Canada our workers are entirely dependent upon the whim of their employers. During the course of a signed contract management can introduce a new machine or an alternative practice whose effects might be devastating for the workers. Workers can do nothing about them from a legal point of view.

Why is this? The reason, Mr. Chairman, is that the main thrust of Canadian labour law makes it so. Most arbitrators in labour disputes have based their rulings on the residual rights theory of industrial relations. What this theory means is that an employer retains the rightful power to do whatever he wishes with his business enterprise except with regard to those rights he has specifically yielded to a union in a written contract. It also means that the trade unionist can do only what is precisely stipulated in the contract. Unless a union can indicate that the relevant contract forbids some activity, whether it be a re-arrangement of time schedules or the introduction of automated equipment, management can do what it wills. Unless the contract specifically permits the worker to do something, he can do nothing.

Obviously even the most ably led union is not clairvoyant. It is impossible to tell in advance what new production technique management might introduce during the duration of the contract. Not having this knowledge, no union can make the required specific contract demands in advance.

Furthermore, unlike the situation in other industrial nations, for example, in the United States and the United Kingdom, in Canada unions do not have the right to strike during the period covered by the contract. If during this period they object to some new practice, they must resort to arbitration. Most arbitrators, as I indicated—there are exceptions—rely on the residual rights theory. Consequently, as one labour expert, Mr. Ed Finn, observed recently, "99 times out of a hundred" the union loses in disputes in this area.

For many years now the unilateral power bestowed on the owners of industry by the residual rights principle has meant thousands of Canadian workers have been badly treated. They have lost seniority rights, their jobs, and on occasion even their community. Their lives, in short, have been profoundly and adversely affected by this principle. It is a remarkable fact that Canadian workers are feeling its impact and are beginning to demand a share in the decision-making process. All Canadians, whether in unions or not, should note and be proud of this fact. What workers are beginning to say is, we should as human beings have more control over our destiny and over day to day issues that affect our lives. Can anyone deny the moral legitimacy of that claim?

Three years ago Mr. Justice Freedman presented a report on labour relations to the government of the day. As many of us know, his report arose out of an investigation into a wildcat strike by thousands of Canadian National Railways employees. The workers had been objecting to unilateral action by the management of Canadian National Railways. As we all know, and as successive Liberal ministers of labour have known for three years, Mr. Justice Freedman made some crucial and, I think, beneficial recommendations. Among these were, first, that the residual rights theory in arbitration matters be discarded; second, that management be obliged to negotiate all major work changes with the unions; and third, that unions be given the right to strike during the period of time covered by a contract.

It is a sad fact that the government which brought the Freedman report into being chose to ignore it, as have subsequent governments. It is even sadder that three successive ministers of labour have, at least hitherto, done nothing about it. The present Minister of Labour, in a speech delivered on October 8 in Toronto, expressed agreement with Mr. Justice Freedman, as he did earlier today. In that speech of last month he said it is "clear that big business today has a moral responsibility, before introducing technological changes, to make sure these changes cause the minimum of disruption, that they are revealed soon enough to make certain that employees have the time and opportunity to adjust to these changes." The Minister of Labour went on to say that he hoped "this moral obligation becomes more and more apparent to management."

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, where was the moral obligation of the Ford Motor Company which informed hundreds of workers just a few days ago that within a week they would no longer have a job? Is this any way to treat a working man? It does not matter at what level of society he is or what occupation he follows; this is no way to treat a human being. This is immoral behaviour, not moral responsibility. Are we in Canada to wait for the moral regeneration of the directors of the Ford Motor Company? We might just as well wait for the second coming, Mr. Chairman. The Minister of Labour and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration are apparently genuinely quite angry with the Ford Motor Company with regard to this matter. I hope their anger is sufficient to lead to government action.

If we had always taken the advice of our past and present ministers of labour we would never have passed a good deal of the social and labour legislation in this country. If moral exhortation worked we would never have needed trade unions in the first place; we would not now require minimum wage laws. The list could be extended almost without limit with regard to labour and social welfare measures. We simply cannot rely upon the good will of people to do what ought to be done.

The present Minister of Labour has been wrong to rely in the past upon the voluntary co-operation of industry. The fact that a few employers have agreed to negotiate work change clauses in their contracts with unions in no way counters the need for mandatory law in this area. It will take far too long for all our unionized workers to receive the right that justice requires if we wait for the will of all employers to be tested. If we do this, we will be waiting for a very long time.

I am near the conclusion of my remarks, Mr. Chairman. Perhaps the most significant recommendation of the Freedman report is that workers be given the right to strike during the period of a contract. This right is long overdue. As I said, it now exists in most other industrial countries. It is important if the other right recommended in the Freedman report, the right to negotiate work changes during the contract, is to have any meaning. Unless workers have the right to strike during the course of the contract they will make almost no headway in negotiating work changes during the contract period. Therefore this is, if you like, the key recommendation; workers must have the right to strike during the period of a contract.

The decisive issue for Canadian labouring men and women in the years ahead is whether or not they are to cease being among the manipulated instruments in the productive process. They must not become the victims of technological change. Rather, we need laws that will allow them to continue their struggle for control of their own fate. The immediate implementation of the Freedman report would be a step in this direction.

[Translation]

Mr. Dionne: Mr. Chairman, a great many matters come to mind in the course of this debate on the estimates of the Department of Labour, such as the working conditions of those lucky enough to hold a job during the present unemployment crisis, a proper balance between equitable salaries and the rising cost of living, the search for methods to allow the greatest possible number of workers to find suitable jobs, the necessity of keeping up with the evolution of modern techniques in the production of necessary goods with the least physical effort, and the role of the trade union movement in present-day society. Much could be said on many subjects which are all related to labour.

Unless one completely lacks a sense of observation, one must recognize that everything that has been done in the world has been done by labour, organized or not. The unfortunate thing today is that this whole army of workers is too often faced with problems of crisis, strikes, unemployment, automation or taxes, to mention only a few.

We seem to have forgotten that work is not the be-all and end-all of life, but rather a means of ensuring for the worker a decent standard of living and a normal stability thanks to the equitable division of responsibilities among everybody.

The direction of an important department such as the Department of Labour involves great responsibilities and requires the cooperation of impartial and competent advisers. I sincerely wish the present minister the health and clear-sightedness necessary to find the most appropriate solutions at the proper time.

We are too easily content with a good word here and there when work is being discussed, which leaves the impression that we accept it as a necessary evil of the human condition. Yet, work often contributes to shaping, and often, to saving man. Work gives him, with dignity, the freedom which ennobles him.

The working man usually pursues various goals. First of all, he wants to earn a living for himself and his family. He wishes to be independent, self-sufficient. He feels less of a man when he depends on others in a way that is not legitimate. Because man is reasonable, he derives a certain satisfaction from doing something for himself. The worker is proud to be someone, to accomplish something and to help others. He wants to have a place in the world. He is proud of being useful. Through his moral interest and brotherly help, he contributes to the expansion of civilization.

It is normal for a worker to aspire to belonging to a labour group that cares about his needs and favours the progress of society as a whole, working efficiently towards its various goals.

At the present time, the worker is struggling with a difficult situation. There are three possible solutions. The first is the capitalistic solution: benefits for the few, toil and sweat for the others. The second is the collectivist solution: benefits for the State, toil and sweat for all men. The third is the Christian solution: benefits for all, toiling by all. Sharing, that is what we need.

Business, formerly moral, has now been replaced by business morals. Indeed, a solution to labour problems and economic life as a whole is sought in the advice given to everyone: make as much money as possible, maximize profit at the lowest possible cost, to allow limitless competition.

This is what happens: The merchant sells at the highest possible price, while purchasing at the lowest, and he often earns three or four times more than the one who labours to produce.

Management tries to purchase raw materials at the lowest possible cost, and to pay the lowest possible salaries while trying to sell goods for the best possible price.

The worker often tries to work as little as possible and at times—which is unfortunate—as little as possible while trying to get the highest salary possible. This cannot go on. The class struggle is an egotistic struggle, and an autocratic, over-powerful state could not solve our problems. What is needed is an economic order inspired by social justice, having the same regard for business prosperity and fair wages, while taking the legitimate interests of the consumer and the seller into consideration.

In our modern world, virtually no one can produce alone all the goods needed for one's keep. Labour is partitioned to a degree, and increasingly specialized, which contributes to an abundant over-all production.

Would we be stupid enough, with all the modern means available to us, to proclaim ourselves unable to distribute our own production? Experience has shown that we have very good reasons to advocate the means which we know: the Social Credit. Though obviously not a panacea, it certainly is a step in the right way. If our politicians know of other means, let them apply them without delay because a great percentage of our people are tired of this succession of strikes, of battles between unions, of an inoperative labour legislation.

It is easy to see that our legislative system lacks flexibility in the field of labour management relations. Those long delays with regard to negotiations and the renewal of collective agreements show without any doubt that the system is unhealthy and when many conflicts arise too many physicians who seem unable to agree on a cure gather around the sick bed.

I recall that Dr. Marius Barnard, the brother of the famous South African surgeon Christian Barnard, who had successfully completed a heart transplant operation, put it very aptly and briefly in those words: A new heart to change a heartless world.

We often find that we only react fleetingly to the many cases of misery resulting from job insecurity, insufficient income, the fear of tomorrow which is often the root of many disorders. We seem unable to abolish misery through a more equitable distribution of responsibility.

As I said at the beginning of my remarks, I will deal, if I have time to do so, with the problem of unemployment, the terms of the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act, the centralization of offices and other matters concerning the workers.

I would like to mention now the disastrous results of the ever increasing number of strikes which have become more popular than the miniskirt. Today some workers—even students, the workers of tomorrow—seem under the impression that to be hip they must stage their own little strike. They should stop however and think about the end result, even if they are hip. The helm must be kept steady, should a storm come up.

A few strikes here and there are nothing unusual. But when the industry or the services are paralysed so long and so often, something has gone seriously wrong.

This leads me to quote from an article which is worth thinking over. It was written by Father Yvan Morin and published in a newspaper of our area, Le Saint-Laurent, in February 1967, under the title "Have we all gone mad or are we totally immature?" It reads partly as follows:

> Even today, strikes seem a necessary and legal means, but the fact that we have to resort frequently to that ultimate means is indicative of the climate of immaturity in which we live.
> It is necessary and legal for policemen to carry a gun, but the day when they will use it casually will be a dark day indeed; either we will have become a nation of gangsters, or policemen will be irresponsible.
>
> The proliferation of strikes reveals either a craving for economic dictatorship within the industrial world or unreasonable demands on the part of union members. We must realize that we all have rights and obligations, that we are all each other servants.

Supply—Labour

One of the major malaises today, stems from the fact that little store is set by government authority. Is it then not worthy of respect? Do we no longer understand the meaning of authority? Anyhow, the government cannot boast of the part it has played in labour disputes—

Looking more closely at the situation, we find that there are various kinds of strikes which we may divide into four categories.

First, there are strikes that could be called "backlog" strikes, because of strained relations between employers and workers, and also because of the practice of always of waiting until the strike is called before taking a decision.

The second type of strikes are the prestige strikes; as a matter of fact, some people derive great satisfaction in proclaiming they have won a battle even at the expense of the workers.

The third class comprises political strikes; unfortunately some sectarians seem to gloat over long drawn-out strikes, quite obviously to embarrass political parties which have not always taken their suggestions to seriously.

• (4:30 p.m.)

In the fourth place, the necessary strikes, those that are spontaneously approved by the majority of workers, after all honest means of persuasion have been used up. If we had to put up with strikes of that type only, things would look much brighter.

The important thing is to locate the numerous causes of misunderstanding and to steer labour legislation towards the protection of the rights of the weak, of the small people, of the poor, of all those who need that protection most. Let us note, by the way, that complicated laws often breed confusion.

It is to the advantage of workers that present and future labour leaders should know about their rights and duties so as to preserve those rights and fulfill their duties.

The education of workers must be directed by union leaders conscious of their responsibilities, in a realistic spirit of understanding, working like partners for the development of the country. Their efforts must not be limited to those of simple pressure groups interested in their own material profits, to the prejudice of national, provincial or municipal interests.

It is normal for union leaders to fight in order that their members might receive a fair economic retribution; they must also keep in mind the interests and the needs of the whole country and use their authority with a vision of the future and for a social purpose.

[Mr. Dionne.]

Any responsible observer will admit that unions have sprung from a need which is still making itself felt. Having been a union member for several years, as well as the president of local 2817 of the Quebec Brotherhood of carpenters, woodworkers, lumbermen and sawmill employees for 10 years—from 1952 to 1962—I make no bones about saying that to my mind a strike is not the natural and easy way to smooth out difficulties in relations between management and labour. Only through a complete lack of imagination could one think that a series of mistakes can be cancelled by a new set of planned errors. The parties concerned should listen to reason and act like adults. In a democratic country, every citizen can state his views and can even hope that they will be respected; however, he should show sufficient understanding for the ideas of others.

People are struggling to obtain salary increases to catch up with the missing dollars without worrying too much where they come from, who controls them and how their value is determined. What is the use of earning $3 or more an hour if a dollar is only worth 35 cents?

This is a problem of the distribution of wealth, purchasing power, work and leisure time. Some order must be brought about in this inefficient financial system.

Let us imagine here a problem of distribution among children. There are two apples to be shared among ten children: the strongest one will win the fight and get the apples. In the case of two apples to be divided among ten children having some money, the highest bidder will win, provided he is under police protection. However, when there are fifteen apples and ten children, every child will have one and everybody will be satisfied.

This sums up the present crisis. We are acting like children.

The purchasing power must be re-established on the basis of demand and the value of wealth, while taking into account that energy consuming work is gradually replaced by machines. The worker craves for money in order to earn his living and that of his dependants. He should be treated fairly so that he does not have to walk around carrying slogan-bearing signs.

The present application of our labour legislation is lacking in flexibility and appears powerless to intervene in the increasing number of disastrous strikes affecting the country's economy. Therefore, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, recommend that additional powers be included in the labour legislation to implement the establishment of an impartial and "genuine labour tribunal" made up of representatives of labour, management and government.

This tribunal, made up of experts in the field of labour management relations, would have to have the proper powers and information to be able to:

(1) Avoid interunion conflicts, by establishing a specific and clear procedure in order to determine, through secret ballot, under the supervision of two members from the tribunal, the right to representation of the workers by a union in good faith;

(2) Determine a period of negotiations not exceeding 90 days, and establish severe penalties for those who do not observe the rules;

(3) Make a proper assessment of the business or service returns, taking into account risks, monetary reserves required for the upkeep of the business, tax deductions and procedures resulting from taxation rules;

(4) Determine, when needed, a job classification that would take into account the responsibilities of each class of workers, a salary range commensurate with the business or service potentialities and measured according to the cost of living index;

(5) Require that all strike votes be taken by secret ballot, under the supervision of two members of the labour tribunal, and that the strike be deemed legal only if it has been accepted by 50 per cent plus 1 of the business' employees, and only after all other means of conciliation have been exhausted.

(6) Guide negotiations in the field of public services in such a way as to determine salary adjustments on an hourly rate basis for all those whose salary is under $5,000 a year.

I have met so many railway employees, especially temporary gangs, who were greatly annoyed with the government's decision to have them return to work under practically unchanged conditions, while in their case particularly, they are low wage-earners who get an increase on a percentage basis, which does not suit them. And yet, it seems to me that it was so easy to understand the situation. I see the hon. minister is nodding. I trust that, in a similar situation, he will find the appropriate words to say at the right moment to try and improve this situation.

As to the co-operation between workers and employers, the government must inform people on the best methods existing to maintain harmonious relationship. A great deal of practical work is already being done in this field and I strongly support the efforts of the department in this direction.

In many industries, it should also be possible to encourage through appropriate legislation employers who feel inclined to promote participation of employees to the company's benefits, by allowing them to become co-owners or associates, which would create a climate of encouragement.

Before concluding my remarks, I would like to point out a very important matter of concern to a great number of workers of my area who work in the United States. Unfortunately, no agreement has been reached as yet with four American states, especially those which are adjacent to our area, New Hampshire and more particularly, Maine. The hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) should take into account the representations we have been making for a very long time.

I remember that, a few years ago, a member of the opposition even staked his seat in order to accelerate the settlement of this problem. I therefore think that it would be only fair that the thousands of Canadian workers who are employed in the United States—and who, in a way, by doing so alleviate the problem of unemployment at home—should benefit from an adequate formula. Such a formula must exist, and I think that if we really try, we shall find it. We shall then be able to give those people the opportunity of getting unemployment insurance benefits when they come back to Canada, once the lumbering operations are over.

• (4:40 p.m.)

There is also, nowadays, the famous problem of centralization of the offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. In our area, in particular, pressures are exerted in that direction so as to avoid as much as possible this kind of centralization. This should bring abbout the results which we are expecting, because we would have the advantage, as we have had in the past, to meet understanding people. In fact, the enforcement of unemployment insurance regulations which change rather often, is a source of problems. I understand the difficulties faced by the civil servants and I know many of them who are very nice and who try to do their jobs as conscientiously as possible. However, the fact remains that in the light of the regulations arising from the existing legislation, methods are changed every year to the point where the workers cannot keep abreast of all those changes. Therefore, having submitted a claim in proper form, they find it very difficult to get their benefits.

I am aware of this problem. In fact, hundreds of workers come to see me every year, especially during the unemployment season, asking me to help them find a solution. I think that it would be very important to look at this field most carefully.

Therefore, I rely on the co-operation of the minister to find the necessary solutions.

Mr. Thomas (Maisonneuve): Mr. Chairman, the discussions on the estimates of each department give every Canadian the opportunity to get more interested in the economic affairs of Canada, and to allow more particularly the members to express their opinions on some subjects. As a member, I take a great interest in the expansion of the Canadian economy, and as a representative of the Montreal area and the working class, I am more particularly concerned with the growth of the Montreal harbour.

Indeed, Montreal has the greatest harbour in Canada. Therefore, it is possible to appreciate the importance of its commercial activities. The importance of Montreal harbour is related, in the first place, to its geographic position. This port plays a key role in the international trade of Canada and in the distribution of its imports, while it is a stopover for shipment of our products to foreign countries and for the distribution of our imports.

I take an active interest in Montreal harbour as an essential factor in the vitality of our economy, as an incentive for Montreal trade and as an employer of many residents of my riding. For these three reasons, I think it is essential that Montreal harbour, in its efforts to expand its activities, should arouse the interest of all members and be able to rely on their support.

However, conditions in Montreal harbour are not satisfactory. Indeed, it has been noted for some time that the harbour does not operate at full capacities. We can discuss the various factors that have led to such a situation, but I think there is one that is recognized by all, and that is labour relations which impair the efficiency of the harbour. This has, in fact, led to the work stoppage of 1966. The government then took a practical step to deal with these problems and instituted to this end the Picard commission of inquiry. The report of the commission contains many recommendations dealing with labour relations. It put the blame for this situation on the two parties involved.

It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to recall well-known facts, but I would merely point out the significant contribution of the government towards a meaningful solution.

Following the Picard report, the employers agreed to set up a guarantee fund to provide for a minimum of 35 paid hours per week to 2,157 employees.

I would like, Mr. Chairman, to emphasize the necessity of this work guarantee for the Montreal dockers. Under the old system, the employees depended on the goodwill of management, and there was no guarantee to the worker under any rational system for hiring and distribution of work. I know the workers in my riding and my area, and I know how they react. I know how important a factor security is in work motivation. Full productivity cannot be asked of the worker if he does not know what tomorrow will be like.

More recently still, Maxwell Cohen was commissioned to present a report on labour problems. This report contains a number of steps to be taken by employers, with a view to facilitating the adaptation of workers affected by automation.

A few weeks ago the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) gave the Union a cheque for $63,000 to provide for implementation of the recommendations of this report.

These various factors reflect the government's concern with respect to the labour disputes problem. I would like to point out here the very valuable contribution of our Minister of Labour.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to deal briefly with a last important point concerning the explanation of the present situation. Just like any business concern, the Montreal harbour must necessarily keep progressing, and I think that to survive any business must develop its potential to the utmost. However, I think that in a just society, progress must be shared among all citizens. And one of the most significant applications of progress is the introduction of new techniques in industry, and Montreal harbour is no exception to the rule.

I wish to point out the importance and the size of the problem created by the introduction of containers. This new transportation system makes possible increased efficiency in spite of reduced manpower.

I am quite aware that a number of dockers who are eager to retain their jobs do not welcome this prospect. We are facing here two somewhat conflicting situations.

On the one hand, employers will have to improve their equipment in order to meet competition, and, as I said, I fully agree with this view. I furthermore suggest that if Canada is anxious to stay abreast of international competition, her industries will have, willy nilly, to bring about new operating methods so as to reduce costs and meet successfully the competition from abroad.

On the other hand, I disagree with the idea of doing so at the expense of labour. Where this particular case is concerned, introducing containers will be a commanding factor, in my opinion, towards improved returns to the Montreal harbour. Indeed, important harbours are increasingly using this method for the shipment of commodities, as it costs much less than the traditional system.

But dockers must not suffer from the introduction of this new equipment. It is becoming universally recognized that when changes affect the workers, employers have a moral obligation toward their employees.

Technological progress must not take place without human progress. In the Montreal harbour, mechanization must not impede the dockers' progress, or labour-management relations.

I also think that a true dialogue is one of the essential conditions for the well-being of the workers, especially when such a change is involved. Such a dialogue must be initiated by the employer, since he is responsible for the change. He must be prepared to discuss the outcome of his action with his employees, through their union.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that it is impossible to hold responsible only one of the parties involved. I believe that the introduction of containers in Montreal harbour must come about through a common effort, as a sign of both technological and human progress.

On the other hand, employees must admit that progress is irreversible, and that any action to stop it brings unpleasant results for everyone.

At first glance, it seems absolutely incomprehensible that employees should want to brake progress. But it is enough to discuss with them and to put oneself in their place to understand that the workers often have no other choice. The majority of them have, just like us, family responsibilities. When they lose their job, they know that they lose their source of income which enables to provide for their needs and that they will have to overcome almost insuperable difficulties to return to the labour market.

Under those circumstances, how can an employee be asked to understand the necessity of progress? The only solution open to him is to hang on to his work which guarantees him a regular income. On the other hand, the employers must understand that phenomenon. The fate of human beings cannot be determined with statistical curves.

The only way to change the attitudes of employers and employees is to improve communications between them. Thus, we can achieve a situation where employees will understand the economic significance of change, and the employers will understand that the human factor must be taken into account in reaching economic decisions. Taking into account the present situation at the Montreal harbour, I am sure that communications need to be improved. As for me, I cannot admit that improvement in the Montreal harbour may mean loss of employment for some people living in my constituency or district.

I also intend to do the utmost to see that the interests of my fellow-citizens are brought to the attention of the house, and I believe that those named to represent the Canadian people should make it a point of honour to try and set things right.

Also I know that our minister of labour is fully conscious of the various factors at stake in the Montreal harbour; he has proved it on several occasions. In fact, the hon. minister never hesitated to fulfill his duty as Minister of Labour in all the disputes and conflicts which occurred since he accepted this position. Furthermore, events have shown that he had the right approach and that he is very popular with both the workers and the employers. On behalf of the workers, I wish to thank him for his devotion and for his efforts with regard to the settlement of labour disputes, he was far-sighted and fair-minded throughout.

In closing, I will say that my feelings for the hon. Minister of Labour are understandable because we both come from the labour class. We both started at the bottom and, today, we have the honour and privilege to sit in the Canadian parliament keeping in mind the motto of Quebec, our native province: "Je me souviens."

May Divine Providence give us health, lucidity and courage to carry on the task which we have undertaken so as not to deceive the hope and confidence placed in us. May it allow us also to see and participate to the fulfillment of our destiny.

[English]

Mr. MacEwan: Mr. Chairman, I should like to congratulate the minister on his appointment as Minister of Labour. Having regard to the report in the Labour Gazette for September and my own connections with labour, although I cannot aspire to the same heights as the minister and the hon. member for Maisonneuve I should like to go back to the time when I was attending college and worked in the coal mines in my area as well as with a pick and shovel for what I might call an upper Canada construction company. Since I have been elected to this house and in experiences in my own area I have certainly had many connections with labour, and I come from an area that employs a large amount of labour.

Although the minister is up to most challenges, what bothers me at this time is that the Department of Labour has been fragmented. Much of the guts has been taken out of it and given to other departments, including the department of manpower. Many of the functions that have been given to the Department of Manpower and Immigration I would prefer to see under the control of the present Minister of Labour, but since that is not the case we have to face the facts. This fragmentation has an unfortunate effect so far as labour is concerned. The various functions and duties relating to labour are now distributed between two departments. The powers and functions of the Department of Labour are divided and the department is dangerously weakened.

Many of the relevant functions relating to labour, such as the vital function of maintaining mobility and the upgrading of skills in this age of technology, have been moved to the department of manpower. I hope the Department of Labour has not been downgraded by the government, although this seems to be the case. It has been suggested that the minister is the closest thing to a minister without portfolio, but we hope this is not the case. In the days and weeks ahead we will be watching him to see exactly what he intends to do.

Our duty at this time is to consider these estimates in the light of general considerations applying to labour. Thus it is not a matter of considering only the dollars and cents expenditures of the department but of relating its expenditures to labour as a whole in order to ascertain what role the department is playing in the labour field. And again we are forced to the conclusion that its role has become a minor one. From examination of the blue book I note that the department's functions are limited to collective bargaining and conciliation procedures in industries under federal control, and to research and labour standards. These are important functions, but in the area of a national labour department they are far from all-embracing.

When the original estimates were brought down last session, housing was a part of this department. It is now under the Minister of Transport. There was considerable curiosity about this move when it was first announced. Many people wondered what housing had to do with transport. This has now been explained, since the Minister of Transport has not stopped moving since he took over. But the shortage of housing is still very much part of the labour scene. For instance, housing is related to inflation and to unemployment. As I say, it is very much part of the labour scene considering the effect that housing and its cost have upon the standard of living of Canadian workers. That is why, in the general context of economic conditions as they relate to the situation of labour, we must look at the cost of living, the level of unemployment, the phasing out of training programs and the lack of housing. These are factors that strike at the very roots of labour freedom and mobility.

Dealing with unemployment, the submission of the Canadian Labour Congress to the cabinet last February stated:

> Representing as we do, working people across this country, we cannot stress too strongly the gravity with which we view the current economic situation. Once again, it looks as though the burden of poor economic management will be borne by Canadian workers in the form of increasing joblessness.

One may not agree entirely with the C.L.C. at all times but one is forced to agree that present events have borne out its prediction of last February because there is increasing joblessness, as pointed out by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, brought about by government mismanagement, and the burden is being borne by Canadian workers.

Unemployment is a vital factor in labour conditions and labour mobility in this nation. Of course, in respect to an area such as mine, the Atlantic area, and other parts of the country, regional disparity must be mentioned. That is why we must consider the whole field in which labour operates, and one must use this opportunity to ascertain to what extent the government's policies have been effectively applied in the context of unemployment, the cost of living, housing and so on.

Where does one seek out labour policy in this government? Is it in the department of manpower? Is it in the Department of Labour or where is it? Policy is non-existent. Some might mention the Canada Labour Code. This is really a compendium of existing legislation which adds not one whit to the well-being of the working man. What will improve the well-being of the working man is a reduction in the persistently high level of unemployment which has remained at a seasonally adjusted rate of over 5 per cent, the provision of housing which labour can afford, a reduction in the pyramiding cost of living, removal of the iniquitous sales tax, and the restoration of a program of upgrading and training skilled workers. These are the things we must have in order to maintain the position of labour in a world of automated change. The government does not seem to be conscious of this.

I would like to go along with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in asking the minister to give a forecast, before this debate concludes, of what the unemployment figures will be this winter, using a computer or anything else. I am thinking especially of areas like Quebec and the Atlantic region. While unemployment in October was over 5 per cent at seasonally adjusted rates, unemployment in the Atlantic provinces was once again the highest in Canada, 5.2 per cent at actual rates not seasonally adjusted. This means that in spite of the government's pious promises and prophecies regional disparity, far from being overcome, is becoming more of a problem each day that the government remains in office.

I suggest that the government has completely neglected the challenge of technological change which is the major challenge facing labour in Canada. I heard what the minister said about the Freedman report, and I concur in that. I think it is a move in the right direction and we will watch it closely. This is just one matter which must be dealt with in order to help the labour force. In ordinary terms the situation can be put this way: We must get with it. Under this government we are not doing enough to help the labour force.

I do not intend to deal with the question of housing in any detail except in the context, as I have said, of labour policy. Last February the government received a memorandum from the Canadian Labour Congress but it paid as much attention to it as it has paid to the various reports of the Economic Council of Canada. In that memorandum the C.L.C. said:

> We believe that all Canadians have a right to decent housing and that governments have an obligation to ensure that it is provided.

What has this government done in respect of housing? We shall have to wait for the Minister of Transport to get his feet back on the ground. The government should have been moving on the question of housing from the time it took office. It should have given a just housing policy to the country.

Canadians cannot afford to have houses at present rates. They cannot afford to buy homes taxed to the tune of about 12 per cent. Surely the government knows that this 12 per cent is pyramided through the whole cost of construction and comes out at the end closer to 20 per cent. The desperate need of Canadians for housing cannot become a matter of profit for lending institutions.

Again I suggest that Canadians must be provided with decent housing. The labour force must be provided with adequate housing. Among other things the government must do much more to provide low rental housing on a much larger scale. Surely the provision of decent housing is part of any consistent labour policy. If the government had any interest in Canadians who work for a living it would have moved long before now.

This afternoon my leader dealt with the matter of inflation. He showed how it cuts down the spending power of the dollar and makes labour unions and workers go after more wages because they require more money. I suggest to the minister that this is one of the most serious challenges of our time, a challenge the government has failed miserably to meet.

Inflation makes the poor poorer. As I said before, it emphasizes regional disparities because the less advanced regions feel the weight of inflation in the same way that the more advanced regions do, and sometimes more seriously because there is no corresponding increase in purchasing power and the disparity increases. In the five years that the government has been in power—

An hon. Member: Six.

Mr. Olson: Since June 25, 1968.

Supply—Labour

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. MacEwan: A Liberal government has been in power for the last five years since 1963. Many Canadians know this too well, especially those in the Atlantic provinces. The Minister of Agriculture is one of these just society ministers. He has put off the agricultural conference until next March. I believe he should have moved justly before now for the farmers of ths country. I shall go into this later when we have the agricultural estimates before us. In the five years since this government has been in power, whether the minister is aware of it or not labour has borne the brunt of the most serious inflation in peacetime history. Food prices alone, for example, during the period have risen by 25 per cent and housing costs have risen an equal amount. I could go further into this subject, but I should like to deal with the matter of conciliation.

I know that in his remarks the minister suggested there should be better mediation practices in this country, and so on. I have a suggestion for him which is based on the postal strike and other strikes which have taken place within the last few months. We also had a long drawn-out grain handlers strike in the course of which the Minister of Agriculture ran around blaming the companies and the Minister of Labour did not move until later. In his statement in the house, I believe in the throne speech debate, he stated why he acted as he did. He may have been correct, although I am not admitting it. However, the six weeks lost because of this disastrous performance have not been regained.

In respect of the postal strike the government allowed the Montpetit report to sit gathering dust for a few years. When the postal workers struck again the members of the government let it go on. My suggestion is that the government should set up a fully autonomous professionally trained conciliation and negotiation commission removed completely from the Treasury Board. That body should go to work a long time before a strike is imminent and not in the last days prior thereto. I believe that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, when speaking on a private member's bill introduced by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, suggested that the present rights of the public service of Canada are now on trial. However, if something like this were done I think many potential strikes probably would not occur although under the legislation the employees are justifiably given this right.

[Mr. Olson.]

I could go into what are essential services but I shall not do so at this time. The minister spoke of the Woods task force. We will be waiting to see what this task force brings forward. I was interested to read an item which appeared in the Canadian Chamber of Commerce Newsletter for the month of November. It states:

> H. D. Woods, M.A., LL.D., Dean, Faculty of Arts and Sciences, McGill University, heads the minister's task force on labour relations. At the annual meeting he confined his remarks largely to the issues before the task force because "we are not yet in a position to present publicly any recommendations since our primary responsibility is to the government."
> He pointed out that what is at stake is not whether strikes are to be permitted or not, but whether the whole system of the private decision-making for individuals, unions and employers is to be preserved and strengthened by policy and administrative reforms or to be emasculated by creeping public intervention which will involve more decisions by public bodies.

I shall not comment on this; I merely cite it for the record. Perhaps we will take note of it later. I have already spoken of the Freedman report. I believe it is a move in the right direction. I suggest there are many moves which should be made by the department and the minister in order to provide better labour legislation in this country.

Then there is the matter of the winter works program which was mentioned by a previous speaker. I do not believe this program should have been eliminated. What surprised me at the time it was dropped was the fact that when the principle was adopted the members of the Canadian Construction Association and others were not advised. The action taken by the government apparently was unilateral. I believe the winter works program was an excellent one. There was a suggestion by the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, I believe, that the vocational and adult training programs had taken the place of the winter works program. I doubt this very much. However, I do not downgrade adult or vocational training because I believe these are excellent programs. I know that in my own area these programs have been a Godsend in respect of training not only the younger but also the older people. I believe that the winter works program should be resumed.

I think my time is about up so I shall hurry along. The other day in the house the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, as reported on page 2784 of Hansard, asked the Prime Minister about the rate of unemployment and what steps the government intended to take to combat unemployment in this country. The Prime Minister said:

> Mr. Speaker, we had quite lengthy statements on this matter during the budget debate, and we will have a chance to make others on the estimates next week. As you prophesy, I could make a lengthy answer to this question to indicate that this increase in labour force unemployment is due to many factors—

And so on. He said finally:

> Actually, Mr. Speaker, I have a lengthy answer here.

Before this debate is over I hope the Prime Minister will enter it to give us this lengthy answer concerning the most pressing problem in this country, that of unemployment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do you think he will?

Mr. MacEwan: I doubt it. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will have an opportunity later to back me up and perhaps we will be able to get the Prime Minister into the chamber. Members of this party will have other matters to raise. In the meantime I reiterate that I hope the Prime Minister will tell us what he and his government intend to do to combat unemployment in this country.

Mr. Gibson: Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the Minister of Labour for his masterful, scholarly and practical speech in which he has expressed the labour policy in clear, bold and humanitarian terms. Certainly labour and management today are struggling not only with problems between themselves as immediate parties but also with problems caused by the impact of the age of automation.

Representing as I do the great labour riding of Hamilton-Wentworth, which is largely urban and in which many thousands of our Canadian labour force reside, I am proud to participate in this debate. I am proud because the minister has correctly assessed the importance of automation as a vitally serious problem which requires immediate and continuous action.

I for one will never support the view that labour itself should bear the brunt of technological change. This is a false concept. We must take the initiative in this House of Commons in grappling with these serious problems which have been referred to by the experienced hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He has also on a number of occasions expressed worry and concern about those on fixed pension incomes who have been caught in the inflation squeeze, that dastardly enemy of the Canadian nation.

Surely we cannot stand by and watch capable industrial workers being cast aside as a result of new industrial methods. Industrial workers are not machines; they are an integral part of the company and they must not be cast aside. We must urge management to co-operate more fully, and at greater depth, in planning, as part of their responsibility in respect of integrating the roles of those who are no longer immediately employed in the industrial climate of the day. We cannot deal with unemployment problems simply by carrying out studies, by indifference or by instituting capital cost projects. We cannot take the attitude that cost is a factor which can be considered without dealing with labour and automation. Perhaps the answer is that the government and management must both provide re-employment and retraining for the victims of technological change.

I speak as one who was fortunate enough after the last war to have had the benefit of the Liberal government's retraining program for veterans. This was one of the most magnificent pieces of legislation which ever appeared on the statute books. It is true that this took place after an enormous war and was immense in scope, but it is also true that thousands of young Canadians were integrated in the mainstream of Canadian life by reason of the forward-looking and visionary attitude of the then minister of labour which resulted in this practical legislation. That minister had to deal with a more drawn out and more complex labour structure.

The present Minister of Labour is a hard-working capable man. The legislative background on which he is building was formulated by the late Prime Minister Mackenzie King and carried forward by other ministers such as the late hon. member for Welland, Humphrey Mitchell. That policy was continued by him and by other men of his stature. These men were reinforced by—

Mr. Hees: Give us the names of some of the others who impressed you so much.

Mr. Gibson: What has been accomplished was not accomplished solely through the work of ministers of labour.

Mr. Hees: Jot down these names ahead of time. That's a good tip.

Mr. Gibson: Thank you, sir. These men have done their jobs and have gone down in history. This parliament has capable men on both sides of the house. Many of them have far more experience than I. It is my feeling that all members of this house wish to grapple with these problems. We should not turn the other cheek and simply say, let these people eat cake. That is not the attitude of this parliament or the Canadian people.

Another problem of national interest became evident this summer. It resulted from a breakdown in negotiations. When there are strikes the consumer should be regarded as an integral element of negotiations and discussions. Perhaps we have reached the stage when the department of consumer affairs should be represented at least as an observer of what is going on during labour-management discussions. This may be to far-reaching and may strain things too much, but I believe it is a good idea which should be expressed.

National strikes cause tremendous crisis in our economy. They rock the boat to the greatest extent, just like the immediate results of a tempest. The medium of television provides us with a great communications system, and it seems to me there is great merit in having a representative of the consumer affairs department present at the deliberations of labour and management. Such a representative could point out to the labour and management representatives the effect of the positions they were taking on the economy. These men should go to management and point out the effect on our economy of their demands. They might also go to the labour negotiators and indicate the results of their demands for a certain increase in wages. They could show these people how the cost of living would be increased if they continue to hold out for their demands.

I do not hesitate in saying that it seems to me that in the past too much emphasis has been made on labour and how much a man is being paid. We should also consider management and price increases. If we have not the duty, at least we have the moral responsibility to make public the effects of enormous increases in prices. This is true also of the labour aspect of this matter. At this stage I do not advocate a prices review board, but I think we should keep this in mind. We should not shrug our shoulders and say it is completely impossible. This matter should be discussed in this chamber. We should turn our attention to the possibility of an economic prices review board as under the British system. I should like to ask the minister to comment on this.

[Mr. Gibson.]

We should not leave this ship without sails because when the sails go down the ship wallows around in the sea with no certain course. We must consider our economy. For many years the inflationary effect of high wages and high prices has confined the consumer in a straitjacket. We must protect the consumer. The people who elect members of parliament are consumers. Labourers and management staff are consumers.

Before concluding I must not refrain from expressing the view that many problems in labour-management relations are caused by a lack of a humanitarian approach in dealing with employees. This is not a narrow, partisan view. Many companies are progressive and interested in their employees' welfare. On the other hand, many employers are heartless and consider their employees as parts of the plant or fixed machinery. They consider their employees as a number of bodies to be sent here or there. They feel that the company is nothing more than a profit-making machine. These employers should realize their responsibilities in respect of the rights of employees. A great deal of good would result if more presidents of corporations would occasionally drop in at the homes of their workers. Perhaps many of them do. The humanitarian aspect of labour relations has not been fully exploited by management. This government has taken the initiative in this respect. Management should be encouraged to do more and go farther with this approach.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I was very interested and pleased to hear the minister say in his speech that as far as he is concerned the just society is one in which a decent standard of living is a right and not a privilege. I am sure we all agree with that. However, I believe we should examine the record of this government since it took office to see what it is doing to bring about that kind of society. We heard during the election campaign a great deal of talk by the Prime Minister about the just society, and all Canadians are interested to see just what the government has in mind regarding its concept of the just society. We want to find out what the government is doing to bring about the kind of just society in which the Minister of Labour says he believes, and in which I am sure we all believe.

I would like to speak for a few minutes about the question of poverty in this country and the minimum wages paid by industries that come under federal or provincial jurisdiction. In August the Economic Council of Canada produced one of its numerous reports. In that report there was a chapter of 37 pages devoted to the subject of poverty in Canada. The economic council tells us that there are in this country no less than 4,200,000 people living in conditions of poverty. We are told also that most of these people are not unemployed and living on welfare but are working for minimal wages. We are told there are no particular areas in which poverty is concentrated, that it is spread all across the country and a great deal of it is found in large cities which are normally considered to be affluent societies.

In its chapter on poverty the Economic Council of Canada says that in the view of its members poverty in this country is no less than a national disgrace. When asked whether he agreed with this assessment, the Prime Minister said he did agree that poverty as it exists today in Canada is a national disgrace. I think every one of us would agree that in the just society we would like to see there is no place for poverty. We who would like to see this kind of just society develop agree that we must leave no step untaken, no stone unturned, to eradicate poverty as much as possible in our country. With this in mind, on September 13 I asked the Prime Minister the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Since the Prime Minister has stated that he agrees with the finding of the Economic Council of Canada that poverty in Canada is a national disgrace, and since the commission has reported that a great deal of this poverty occurs because people who are working are not receiving sufficient wages to enable them to bring up their families in decency and reasonable comfort, do the Prime Minister and the government intend in the very near future to increase the minimum wage as it applies to industries under federal jurisdiction, particularly as this would be an incentive or an example to the provincial governments?

The Prime Minister replied that the government did not intend to take that kind of action. Therefore I went a little farther and asked the Prime Minister what he intended to do to reduce or eradicate poverty in the just society that he intended to develop in this country. His answer was:

> Our attack seeks to ensure that inflation will be curtailed in Canada. We believe this will be the best attack on the problem.

Let us consider what the government has done since the Prime Minister made that statement with regard to curtailing inflation. At the time he spoke, the figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show us that inflation in Canada had increased by 3.6 per cent over the previous 12 months. One month later we are told that inflation in Canada had increased by 3.8 per cent over the previous 12 months. Today we are told that inflation in Canada has increased by 4.2 per cent over the previous 12 months. So we can see that the people of this country, especially those living below the poverty level, are considerably worse off today than they were when the Prime minister gave me that answer in the house two months ago.

This gives hon. members an idea of just what this government is doing to control, remove or eradicate poverty, which we all agree we cannot allow to exist in a society we would call just. The Prime Minister told me on September 13 that the program the government considered to be the best way of dealing with poverty in this country was to curtail inflation. Is inflation being curtailed by this government? It is certainly not. It has increased in two monthly stages in the two months that have passed since the Prime Minister made that statement and outlined the government's policy in this respect. Therefore we can see that not only is the government doing nothing to control or reduce poverty in this country but since the Prime Minister gave me that answer it has become considerably worse and every indication is that it will continue to get worse month by month.

On November 13 I drew this matter to the attention of the Prime Minister. I pointed out that he had told me that the government's program for reducing poverty was to curtail inflation, and that it simply was not working. I asked the Prime Minister whether the government, in view of this fact, had any new plans for dealing with poverty in this country, which the Prime Minister had agreed is no less than a national disgrace. Once again the Prime Minister gave one of his slick answers. He said that of course the answer was in the budget and if we would examine the budget we would see what the government was doing to control inflation. If we examine the budget we see that it contains an increase in taxes over the next year of no less than $845 million. Every member of this house knows that an increase in taxes increases the cost of living because the goods we buy are made more expensive in that the taxes are added to the price of those goods, and the taxes that we pay out of our pockets increase the cost of living. That is inflation.

So we can see that next year inflation will continue, probably even more rapidly than it is increasing at the present time. Yet this Prime Minister, who made great speeches on the hustings about the just society which this country was going to have under a Liberal government, has proved that he has no intention of eradicating poverty or of curtailing or controlling inflation, which he said is the government's approach to eradicating poverty.

So we see that this government refuses to do three things that are necessary to control poverty. The first one is to set an example to the provinces, under whose jurisdiction most industries operate. If this government would increase minimum wages in industries under its jurisdiction, it would set an example to all provincial premiers. The government has refused to do that even though I pointed out to the Prime Minister that the last time minimum wages for industries that come under federal jurisdiction were raised was three years ago and the cost of living has increased by no less than 12 per cent since then. Yet the Prime Minister refuses to raise minimum wages and thus to set an example to the provincial governments across this country.

Second, the government has been requested on a number of occasions by myself and others to call together the provincial premiers, having set an example by raising minimum wages for industries under its jurisdiction, to point out the need for them to raise minimum wages for industries under their jurisdiction so that people who are living in poverty because they are working for inadequate minimum wages, in some cases as low as 80 cents an hour, can improve their standard of living. Yet the federal government refuses to do that. I have asked the Prime Minister, when he has all the premiers here to discuss financial and constitutional matters, to ask them to stay perhaps an extra half day to discuss what can be done to eradicate something which he admits is no less than a national disgrace. But he says he will not do it. They will be too busy talking about constitutional matters, all of which are very important but are not as important as taking steps to eradicate poverty among one-fifth of our population. This is the most important problem that can be dealt with today, but the Prime Minister refuses to do it.

The third thing he refuses to do is to curtail inflation. I asked a question today. I produced a quotation from a speech which the secretary of the Treasury Board made to the Canadian Tax Foundation this week in which he said that this government neglects to examine the need for the programs it is pursuing. I asked the Prime Minister whether, in order to curtail inflation and the tremendous expenditure that is going on in this country, the government would not stop what the secretary of the Treasury Board says is being done. The Prime Minister simply laughed the whole thing off and said that the question dealt with something that had probably happened ten years ago. That is how seriously he took it in spite of the fact, may I point out, that the secretary of the Treasury Board had used the present tense, and if hon. members will read his speech they will see that. He was talking about what is going on now, not five or ten years ago. He told us what the government is doing and what it is not doing, but the Prime Minister is not interested; he could not care less. The Prime Minister talked glibly on the hustings about a just society because he wanted to win votes and to get a Liberal government elected. Now it turns out that what he was talking about was a sham, a farce and a hoax, that he simply talked about something that he had no intention of producing, namely, a just society.

Mr. Olson: Has the hon. member noticed what has happened to the Gallup poll since the election?

Mr. Hees: I am telling you about the kind of thing that is going to defeat the government four years from now. You just wait to find out. I take it that all the Liberal members in the house now are proud of the just society—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Thank you for the applause. As I said, they are proud of the just society which contains a built in poverty about which the Prime Minister intends to do nothing, as we know because he has said so.

Mr. Mongrain: How does the hon. member know?

Mr. Hees: Because he has told the house so and because he has refused to do the various things we have asked him to do, to raise minimum wages and to curtail inflation. Inflation and poverty are increasing day by day before our very eyes, but you people do not care. You are in for four years. What do you care whether people starve? What do you care about people who live in poverty? What does the Prime Minister care about the fact that people are living in conditions which the Economic Council of Canada appointed by this government describes as a national disgrace? You are proud of that. I hope that the people of Canada will learn from your attitude toward a just society which contains built in poverty that you are not going to do anything to eradicate, to cut back or to reduce poverty.

Mr. Olson: That is the hon. member's opinion, and he is usually wrong.

Mr. Hees: Let the minister rise in his place when I sit down and tell me what the government is doing to eradicate poverty. I would also like to hear the Minister of Labour tell us what the government intends to do, but let him do so when I finish speaking. I will be very interested to hear the minister. In the meantime we have been given a further proof that the Prime Minister simply used the slogan "just society" to attract votes in an election. Once he got in he could not care less. He does not know anything about poverty; he has never experienced it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: His constituents are the kind of people who do not know anything about poverty. The Prime Minister's answers in the house have shown very clearly that he is not interested in the slightest degree in doing anything to eradicate something which he has agreed is no less than a national disgrace.

[Translation]

• (5:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Chairman, at the beginning of my remarks, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) for the courage he showed on at least two occasions in this house, that is recently when he took part in the debate on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne and today when he made his statement about his department's estimates.

I want to congratulate him bceause I feel that the position he took with regard to management and labour unions is open, frank, strong and new. I think that too often in the past the politicians and particularly the members of the cabinet have been afraid to state defintie policies.

Before going on to something else, I would like to take this opportunity to thank and congratulate the members of his staff and the officials of his department for the help they give us so graciously and so quickly when we go to them with a problem. I refer in particular to the opportunity I had recently of visiting the various branches of the Department of Labour, and I think that that was very instructive. In fact, it enabled me to see the facilities available to members in the various departments and especially in the field of labour.

Mr. Chairman, before making personal remarks, I would like to refer now to the remarks made earlier this afternoon by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). I was somewhat surprised to hear him criticize the Minister of Labour's intervention this afternoon. He used the word "lecturing" in a way difficult to interpret, but he seemed to insinuate that the minister was preachifying. I do not think that is the case. In his statement, the hon. minister merely stated facts and positions.

At this point, I should like to deal with the labour-management committee which should exist in every enterprise.

I, myself, worked in industry from the age of 18. I was able to see the advantages of maintaining harmony in an enterprise through those labour-management committees.

I think Alcan can be mentioned as an example, because it has had only one very short strike in 1941, and another which lasted four months, unfortunately, in 1957. Considering the fact that this company has been established in Canada since 1901 and, in Saguenay since 1925, it can be said that two strikes over a 40-year span, is no abuse, on the part of the workers as well as the union. It also proves that the company understands the nature of its responsibilities. At the very start, it set up a system of consultation within its plants, so that the grievances of the workers could be studied as soon as they were expresed. In fact that, to my mind, is the best way of preventing grievances, which are left pending, from assuming gigantic proportions which cause strikes when the time comes to negotiate collective agreements.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that the employees of the Department of Labour and its Minister should intensify, even more if possible, their work with regard to publicity and contacts with the companies, so that labour-management committees might be adopted in all industries. By the way, I should specify that their creation should be required, not "suggested" but "required", in the various government sectors, because if we want to set a good example for private industry, we, in the government, should at least set up those organizations in the various sectors, in the various departments.

If my information is correct, Mr. Chairman, that is not the situation unfortunately. We are far behind with regard to management-labour relations in government departments.

The present system of arbitration has also been mentioned. It is, up to a certain point, the cause of the various conflicts and strikes which we are witnessing. Clearly, the present arbitration system will have to be modified. The minister has taken a categorical stand, saying that the workers cannot be compelled to accept this system, since it would be quite discriminatory to force workers to accept measures which they are not ready to accept.

As for me, I do not think it is a good formula. Indeed, if we compel workers to accept the decision of an arbitration committee, I doubt that, during the course of such a collective agreement, two or three years, there might be a climate favourable to harmony in the company. The worker who will have to go back to work and accept conditions he is not willing to accept, will certainly be a bad and inefficient worker. I think it is preferable to settle the situation and not to establish compulsory arbitration.

I think that among intelligent men, it should be possible to find a system other than the compulsory arbitration. I know that the Woods commission is studying at the present time the various amendments to the statutes and I think that the minister is waiting, like all of us, the publication of this report, so that the statutes may be amended by the house.

In his statement, the minister specifically mentioned that, while waiting for that report, his department has already undertaken the drafting and preparation of new bills or amendments to acts now in force.

This is certainly some preparatory work which it was necessary to do. Once this legislation is drafted—at this stage I appeal to the leader of the government and to all the colleagues of the Minister of Labour—let the minister introduce it to the house as soon as possible because, in my opinion, the labour sector should certainly have a priority. Most of us have been elected by the workers and I think that we should not forget it.

I notice that, at this time when we consider the estimates of the Department of Labour, the attendance is not as large as one could have wished it to be, and I am a little shocked. I thought that the members would have taken part in greater numbers in the debate concerning the estimates of the Department of Labour, because it gives them an opportunity to express to the members of the government valid opinions and especially to make known the viewpoints of the various groups which they represent in this house and in particular the workers group.

The Chairman: It being six o'clock, it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again later this day.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—time allotted to political parties in Quebec; the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Pensions—consideration of universal principle of escalation; the hon. member for Algoma (Mr. Foster)—Water Resources—St. Mary's river—action respecting pollution.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, private bills, notices of motions for papers, public bills.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): If I can have your indulgence for a moment, Mr. Speaker, we have had a discussion with the parliamentary secretary to the President of the Privy Council and I think there might be agreement that an order of the house be made that the house take recess for supper upon the conclusion of the consideration of item No. 1 relating to Atlantic Peat Moss Company Limited, if that happens before seven o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (6:00 p.m.)

PRIVATE BILLS

ATLANTIC PEAT MOSS CO. LTD.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 19, consideration in committee of Bill No.

C-103, respecting Atlantic Peat Moss Co. Ltd.—Mr. Breau—Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

On clause 1—

The Chairman: When the committee rose on Tuesday, November 19, clause 1 was under consideration. Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the committee since I do not intend to oppose passage of this bill. I say that not because we agree with the arguments of those sponsoring the bill but because, if this measure is passed, certain numbers of people will gain employment.

Anyone with legal training must have wondered why, after a three year period in which notices were sent from the companies' branch to this concern asking it to file returns as was mandatory under the letters patent, this procedure of coming before the house is being followed. Returns were not submitted as requested. That was a breach of the privileges of the original charter. Now the company comes to the house and asks the house to ignore everything that the companies' branch has done.

It is passing strange that a company which has ignored all the notices that have been sent to it should now try to come before this house and obtain permission to do something. Why is it that more lawyers in this house are not curious about this type of operation? On previous occasions we have suggested that the type of procedure envisaged here ought to be carried out in some other forum, possibly before a committee that would deal with private bills and not in the house. We are very much opposed to the idea of private bills being brought before the house in order to do something that could have been done previously in some other way.

As I understand it, the companies' branch is very insistent that companies that are granted letters patent shall adhere, during their lifetimes to the terms of their charters. I am told by a lawyer that this company must have received a great many letters from the federal companies' branch. In fact, the communications probably ought to be measured in feet rather than in individual letters. There would be a great deal of correspondence. Perhaps one or two letters a day might be sent. In any event the companies' branch would have been most insistent that this company adhere to the terms of its letters patent. Therefore the arguments used before the committee by the parliamentary agent simply are not good enough.

It is not enough for the company to say that it was unaware of its obligations because it was concentrating to a large extent on sales. It has duties to perform according to its charter and it must have been aware of the notices that were sent to it. Surely no one could fail to notice all the communications that would be sent to the company's New Brunswick offices.

I suggest that hon. members who wish to do their duty ought to pay close attention to this type of bill which has the effect of undermining the protection to the general public that is provided by legislation. Agencies of government are set up to protect the general public and businesses. This bill tries to circumvent legislation that has been passed.

This company for a period of years was on very shaky financial foundations. It was almost operated by trustees or a firm of advisers that handled administrative problems. The firm of advisers did not have the courtesy of bringing the companies' branch into its confidence and discussing the matter with the branch.

On June 17 and 22 a notification appeared in the Canada Gazette that this company would cease to exist and that the date of the cessation of the charter would be published. We are now to eliminate that move by this bill. Many directives by the companies' branch must have been sent to this company. When a company says in the Canada Gazette that it will cease to exist and then comes before the house with this sort of private bill, surely it is engaging in a novel type of endeavour. Surely hon. members who are interested in the financial community and in the legal aspects of federal charters ought to be much concerned about this matter.

Here all the machinery that has been set up by the government has been unable to convince this firm over a period of years to toe the line. Not only did the company itself ignore the department but apparently the trustees or the people it had hired in Montreal to do its administrative work also ignored the department.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Chairman, I raise a point of order.

I wish to point out that we do not have a quorum in the house at present.

Mr. Forest: We have a quorum.

Some hon. Members: Yes, yes.

Mr. Dumont: We did not have it a while ago; there were only 17 of us.

[English]

The Chairman: At the moment we have in excess of 20 hon. members in the committee.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, since we almost did not have a quorum it illustrates my point, that hon. members just are not as interested in this as they ought to be. Surely hon. members ought to ascertain for themselves whether any action we are now taking or about to take that will have the effect of side stepping previous legislation poses a danger. After all, members of the financial community are governed by federal legislation and federal charters.

I call to mind the number of bankruptcies of certain companies that are closely allied to agencies and to which we have granted a federal charter. Unless we provide machinery to demand certain reports and financial statements in keeping with the companies branch directives at an early stage of a company's financial difficulties, then we may well find ourselves exactly in the same position we were in in the case of Prudential. We all remember the recent bankruptcy of Commonwealth Trust. If it had not been for the fact that the insurance branch of the federal government stepped into the picture, and a period of three years had been permitted to elapse, then perhaps some 20 or 30 companies would have gone bankrupt and no money at all would have been netted. I am sure many shareholders across the country will be appreciative of the safeguards provided by provincial and federal legislation and are able to feel much more secure than would otherwise be the case.

In the committee reports, Mr. Chairman, I was disturbed at certain things I read. For example, one member of parliament continually intervened and finally moved a motion the effect of which was to ask the committee not to bother hearing the parliamentary agent explain the difficulties surrounding this company and why no protection had been afforded under the federal charter. The hon. member went on to ask for an assurance in writing from the parliamentary agent. I think this hon. member was derelict in his duty since he did not even listen to the parliamentary agent's explanation of the situation and why we should override legislation designed to prevent this sort of thing happening. While I am sympathetic to this company, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill will agree that we should only override such considerations in exceptional circumstances.

I am reminded of an argument that was used when we used to discuss divorce, namely, that divorce should not be allowed except in the particular case we were discussing. Each case from the province of Quebec was treated as an exception. We are, in effect, treating this case as an exception and saying that the rules should not apply.

I suggest that the assurance that was given to the committee is not worth the paper it is written on. It serves no purpose whatsoever because the parliamentary agent is not responsible to parliament. I am sure that in most cases the parliamentary agent does not even know what his relationship is with parliament. In fact, I suspect some of them have not even paid to the Clerk their $25 parliamentary fee. Therefore I think his word in this case carries very little weight, and his word to the company carries absolutely none.

We must remember that the parliamentary agent gets his information from the company only. I am sure he did not investigate the wishes of the company shareholders. Therefore they are not protected against the action that we are proposing to take, and in most cases I do not think we can provide them with such protection. We are taking away whatever protection the shareholders have by paying no attention to the fact that for three years the companies' branch was trying to get an assurance from the company that it was operating in the best interests of its shareholders.

Many hon. members will say that this is not relevant to the question now before the committee. I realize the hon. member himself is vitally interested in this matter because the situation occurred in his own area. I am also prepared to take his word that it would be a hell of a good thing to give these employees a long period of employment. But we must keep in mind that he is making an exception here in a legal sense in that we are overriding machinery that we have provided to prevent this sort of thing occurring. I hope this does not become a precedent.

An hon. Member: Not in your time.

Mr. Peters: There are some members of this house who will not learn much about the parliamentary system even after four years. It may be that what I say will not be given much consideration, but to those who want to go for supper I say that I shall be here for a period yet.

If it were within my power to do so I would certainly not permit the passage of this type of legislation, and I am sure there are other members of the house who feel the same as I do. I think we are engaging in a dangerous practice in passing this legislation. I do not think we should override legislation that is set up to establish letters of patent, federal charters and so on. We should make sure that the shareholders of companies and others concerned are given protection in cases where such machinery is abused.

The procedure for so doing is fairly simple. All they need do is make a report to the companies' branch. The branch could then ascertain the facts and decide whether the shareholders should be protected. While we are sympathetic to the cause being espoused here, I suggest we are not at all in sympathy with the method being used, which might be considered a doubtful precedent for bailing out of trouble other companies that get into similar difficulty.

• (6:20 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Mr. Chairman, since we received explanations in French on that bill, we see our way about a bit more clearly, and I agree with the opinion expressed by the member who spoke before me: it may be dangerous sometimes to rush through bills of this type.

I find it somewhat surprising that members of the government party did not forward any explanations, at least to enlighten us. Considering the salaries of parliamentarians and ministers, we must be informed, because according to the explanations given us, it would seem at first sight that the whole idea was to get rid of someone. It is the first thing that comes to mind; this company was seemingly going to be dissolved or it was, once again, a case of camouflaging some manouvres which were not in the best interests of Canada.

So as the previous speaker said earlier, we will allow this bill to be passed, knowing that because of the promise given to the committee, we shall see, at some future time, a treasurer's report and will thus be reassured that we did not pass it with undue haste.

I sincerely believe that members of the opposition are able to prove their outstanding usefulness, and if, later on, in Canada or even in the United States shareholders of this company feel that their interests are endangered, it would be quite natural for them—as the government party does not appear to give further information, to come and see members of the opposition who could then tell the house what may happen when we pay a bill about which we are left in the dark.

Anyhow, we shall support this bill, as an exception to a rule. However, as the hon. member who spoke earlier mentioned, we should not make a habit of this sort of thing.

Mr. Breau: I would like to say just a few words, Mr. Chairman. I agree with the hon. member when he requires members of the ruling party who wish to introduce a bill to provide the house with every bit of information desired. The hon. member will however agree with me that the bill has been under the consideration of the Committee on miscellaneous private bills and standing orders and that there has been no pressure whatsoever to rush the proceedings or to conceal anything. I have always, together with the witnesses, answered every question. On the motion on second reading, I was here to answer any question that might be put and the hon. member will surely admit there has never been any constraint or any attempt at holding back the truth.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this clause reads:

> Within the two months following the adoption of the present act, all returns prescribed by the said Canada Corporations Act, shall have to be filed and received for and in the name of the said company, notwithstanding any stipulation of the said act, or notice to the contrary.

How do we enforce this? What machinery is available to do so if these terms are not fulfilled? I suggest that we leave out clauses 2 and 3 because we do not have any machinery to enforce them, although there may be some justification for clause 3 because it is reinstating the charter under letters patent.

[English]

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I have to disagree with the hon. member. Clause 2 is inserted to make sure that the returns that were not filed for three years shall be filed within two months. If the company does not file them within two months then the bill is void and the company has lost its charter, and the notices that have been served to the company have automatically been in effect. If the company does not file these returns then it had better not come to see me to pilot another bill. I think it is important that the returns which were not filed for three years be filed within two months.

Mr. Peters: I am sure that was the intention. If so we should amend the clause to say that if its terms are not adhered to within two months then the bill becomes null and void. Unless we write this into the legislation we have no agency to act on our behalf to see that the terms of the clause are fulfilled. We should write in a penalty making the bill null and void if the said conditions are not lived up to because otherwise we do not have anything to enforce them.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, if I understood the sponsor of the bill correctly he said that if the returns are not filed within two months of the bill becoming law then the effect will be that the act will become null and void. If I am correct then, with great respect, I submit that he is entirely wrong. Once parliament passes a law, that is the law.

Clause 1, which we have just considered, says that the various notices that have been given and Gazetted and published pursuant to the Canada Corporations Act shall be deemed never to have had effect for Atlantic Peat Moss Ltd. That is what this bill is doing. It is saying that those particular notices are wiped out and shall be deemed never to have existed.

Clause 3, which we have not reached, talks about the rights, obligations and liabilities incurred since the issuance of the company's letters patent and says that the company shall continue in operation as if it had never been dissolved. There is no requirement here which says that if the company does not meet the requirements set out in clause 2 then the effect of the bill shall be null and void, as advocated by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I am sure the sponsor of the bill would agree that the committee could write a penalty type amendment saying that if this requirement is not lived up to then the act shall cease to have force and effect.

In this case parliament is being asked to make an extremely extraordinary decision. We are being asked to say in effect that something did not exist when it in fact existed. We are being asked to use the eraser, to wipe the slate clean, to say that the parliament of Canada says that all the things that happened did not happen.

All the members who have participated in this debate have thought of this action in terms of being a precedent and of a subsequent parliament harkening back to it and saying: parliament did that and therefore it is all right to do it again. It seems to me that we should write in some penalty provision. I am sure this could be done. I believe there should be something which would indicate that if there was failure to meet the commitment to the parliament of Canada to file certain returns within two months of the adoption of the act, the force of the act should disappear. If the hon. member would agree to that, perhaps we could spend a moment writing an amendment around it.

Mr. Breau: The hon. gentleman is right when he states that once parliament has passed an act all clauses of the act are also passed. I do not see the necessity to have a penalty. This is merely to protect parliament and engage the committee to file the annual returns of the corporation. Unless they do this the notices will have an effect on the charter of the company. Although I am not a lawyer, this would seem to me to be clear.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, we are in agreement on at least one aspect of this; that is, once parliament passes an act it is the law of the land. If that law is silent on a particular point and is silent on the point of a penalty, then how can something cease to exist? The act will still have full force and effect. Perhaps I might read clause 2 in its entirety where it says:

> Within two months following the adoption of the present act, all returns prescribed by the said Canada Corporations Act, shall have to be filed and received for and in the name of the said Company, notwithstanding any stipulation of the said act, or notice to the contrary.

The difficult part is where it says, "the said act". I assume this has reference to the Canada Corporations Act since it mentions stipulations of it. The wording is, "any stipulation of the said act, or notice to the contrary".

Although we are not dealing with clause 3, perhaps I might allude to it since I believe it relates to the whole matter we are discussing. It says:

> Nothing in the present act shall be construed as depriving or discharging the directors, and shareholders and the company of any right, obligation or liability incurred since issuance of its letters patent and the said company shall continue in operation as if it had never been dissolved.

If clause 3 were to say, "and shall continue in operation as if it had never been dissolved", followed by words such as, "if the returns required to be filed by clause 2 are not required, then the act would cease to have force and effect", what the hon. gentleman says would be correct.

I should like to move—

—that clause 2 be renumbered clause 2 (a) and that a new clause 2 (b) be inserted as follows:

"Failure to comply with the requirements of section 2 (a) will make all sections of this act null and void."

That is what the hon. gentleman has agreed should exist. If it is not spelled out I do not believe it could be interpreted in that way. I put forward the above amendment seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming. I do not think there is any disagreement among the hon. gentleman, the hon. member for Timiskaming, myself, and anybody else, about what parliament should do. It is a matter of ensuring that what we want to do is properly formed in the words of the act and the bill itself. It may be that one could quibble about a sentence or a word or two in the amendment. Perhaps the drafsmanship is not as precise as it would be were it done by one who spends his time drafting legislation. However the facts are there, and if accepted I believe the amendment would probably clear up what the hon. gentleman sponsoring the bill, and others in this house, want to see done.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, were I not convinced that our two colleagues of the New Democratic party are intelligent, I would say they did not understand anything. However, since they are clever, I have come to the conclusion that they want to make some kind of filibuster. There is an old saying: There are none so deaf as those who will not hear.

The clause we are studying is clear, Mr. Chairman, and it seems our friends are muddling up clause 2 and clause 3, which are entirely different.

Clause 2 says:

Within the two months following the adoption of the present act, all returns prescribed by the said Canada Corporation Act, shall have to be filed and received for and in the name of the said Company, notwithstanding any stipulation of the said act, or notice to the contrary.

It is not necessary to be very competent to know that the companies not abiding by the provisions of the Canada Corporations Act—and I am sorry I do not have the clause before me—immediately lose their operation rights. This point is sure.

However, let us imagine that a director of the company wants to resort to this gimmick to have it evade its responsibilities towards its customers or the government or any others. Clause 3 states that under the Canada Corporations Act, even if the said company has not fulfilled all its obligations according to its charter or finds its operations crippled, its responsibilities remain the same.

It seems to me that this is crystal clear, Mr. Chairman, and those who do not understand must deliberately refuse to do so. The amendment suggested is therefore superfluous and unnecessary, since there are already in the Canada Corporations Act provisions for such cases.

Mr. Dumont: Could the member for Trois-Rivières inform us why he would oppose such an amendment if it is to shed more light on the situation?

Mr. Mongrain: Certainly, Mr. Chairman. I am against it because it is absolutely unnecessary. Why repeat something that has already been said in such an important and basic act as the Canada Corporations Act?

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Chairman, I did not raise this by way of a point of order because it is not really that valuable a contribution the hon. member for Three Rivers has just made.

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

[English]

I remember that my hon. friend once said that if I said "British Columbia" in this house he would say "Trois Rivières". I have always said "British Columbia" since then, so I have honoured my part of the agreement.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I think if the hon. gentleman will recall the discussion we had about the use of the designation "Columbia-Britannique" he will remember that I suggested to him—and this was when he sat on this side of the house and was only an honorary member of the Liberal party, not a full-fledged member—that if he and his colleagues from the province of Quebec would quit referring to my province as "Columbia-Britannique" I would gladly refer to his constituency by the name he gives it. That has not happened. In any event, we had some discussion subsequent to that. I am not knowledgeable in terms of detailed understanding of linguistics, languages or grammar, but I have discussed this matter with the people who are knowledgeable, and I have been told what the situation is. It has been suggested that in referring to a riding you must use a proper noun, and the name of a constituency falls within that category. The name being a proper noun, it is correct to refer to the constituency in the French language as Trois-Rivières, as the hon. member does, or in the English language as Three Rivers, and each is correct.

Mr. Guay (St. Boniface): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. This has nothing to do with the bill.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): The hon. member for Three Rivers, ou Trois-Rivières, raised a point of order. Surely hon. members on the other side must know what is going on.

The Chairman: Order, please. It might be in the interests of the committee as a whole if we returned to the amendment, the clause as amended, the clause as it is, or at any rate some part of this bill.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I take it, Mr. Chairman, that there is no point of order as raised by the hon. member for Three Rivers, and I can proceed to deal with the subject under discussion. The hon. member for Three Rivers, ou Trois-Rivières, whichever you like, said that the amendment before us, as I understood the translation, was part of a systematic obstruction on our part. I presume he meant on my part, as the mover of the amendment, and on the part of the hon. member for Timiskaming, the seconder, and incidentally the drafter of the amendment.

In dealing with this accusation of systematic obstruction, let me point out that before we embarked upon the consideration of this bill, when Mr. Speaker was still in the chair, after a discussion with the parliamentary assistant to the President of the Privy Council, who anticipated the early passage of this bill, I suggested to the house that it make an order to the effect that upon the conclusion of this bill the house should recess for supper. Parliament only makes such an order when there is an expectation that an item under consideration will be concluded before the expiration of the private members hour. I took that step on that basis. The accusation of the hon. member regarding systematic obstruction is an indication to me of his lack of appreciation of the facts of parliamentary life.

[Mr. Howard (Skeena).]

The question as to whether this bill will have some validity arose subsequent to a conversation in respect of clause 2. The answer we obtained from the sponsor of the bill, and I forget the name of his constituency, was that if the company did not file its reports within the required time the bill would be null and void. Perhaps I misunderstood him. Will the hon. member clarify this?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Chairman, what I intended to say was that if clause two of the bill was not complied with by the company it was automatic that the bill would be null and void.

Clause 1 says that the notices given on June 2 and June 17, 1967, and June 22, 1968 in the Canada Gazette by virtue of section 125(12) of the Canada Corporations Act shall be deemed never to have had effect as for the Atlantic Peat Moss Company, "subject to the following sections." This means it is subject to clauses two and three of the bill. As far as I am concerned the amendment is repetitious and that is why I cannot see the necessity for it.

The hon. member for Skeena suggests that if we pass clause 1 it will become law, but it will be the law subject to the other sections. I am not a lawyer, but this is very clear to me. If the company does not fulfil its obligations so far as clause 2 is concerned this bill will be no good and will have no validity.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I am not a lawyer but I think that what will happen as a result of the gazetted notices on the 2nd and 17th of June, 1967 and the 22nd of June, 1968 under the Canada Corporations Act, or a failure to live up to the obligations, is that at some period subsequent to the publication the charter will be revoked. We are not by the amendment wiping out the company, we are simply wiping out the notice required.

I am not in a position to say who drafted this bill, but I suppose it was drafted by a lawyer with little experience in parliamentary procedure. The bill goes on to say in clause 2 that the company must do certain things within a certain period of time. Clause 3 contains an entirely different obligation. What we are suggesting is that if these obligations are not met we reverse the situation and reinstate the obligations in respect of notice. We are suggesting that in that event this obligation should apply. If the amendment moved by the hon. member for Skeena is accepted, and the obligations are not met, this bill will be deemed not to have been passed.

There is nothing in the bill which suggests that the notices required to be published on June 17, 1967 and June 22, 1968 are now in effect. Apparently they have been published and we cannot reverse that. If the company has met the requirements of the Canada Corporations Act it has met these obligations. All we are suggesting is that we waive this notice. In clause 3 we go further and say that we should forget about the whole thing and that it did not happen. We suggest that the personal liability on the part of the directors of the company should apply.

I am prepared to allow this bill to stand in order that the hon. member might consult the legal personnel, but I am of the opinion that we are not asking for anything other than protection, so that if the company again fails to live up to the obligation in respect of notice, appropriate steps can be taken. The company has failed to live up to these obligations for a period of three years. Perhaps the hon. member would like to move another amendment changing the period from two months to perhaps four or five months. We say that if they do not live up to it, this bill does not apply; the requirements of the old charter with regard to notice of termination will apply and there will automatically be a cancellation of the company.

I am not wedded to the idea of two months. I did not write this provision in the bill; the hon. member or his lawyers wrote it in. I have no objection to that provision being changed, but I suggest we have to include some protection in the bill otherwise a long period of time could go by and we would find we had already wiped out the notice, and the only thing the companies branch could do would be to start all over again, unless we do something to wipe out the terms of our amendment.

It sounds to me rather like the situation where a marriage has taken place, a separation is sought and then we wipe out the separation by applying for an annulment. I suggest that if we write in this provision we will eliminate the annulment and get back to the separation again. It seems very simple to me and I do not know why there should be any objection to writing into the bill this very small amount of protection so that the house does not do something that it will regret in the future.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I do not see the necessity for the amendment because it is quite clear, as far as I am concerned, in clause 1 that if the company does not file its return within two months it cannot use the provisions of this bill. But I agree with the hon. member that there is nothing wrong with the amendment, so I am ready to support it.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Howard, Skeena) agreed to.

Clause as amended agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): On division.

Mr. Breau moved the third reading of the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. Pursuant to special order made this day, the house will now recess until 8 p.m.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Chairman, before the six o'clock adjournment, I was talking about the arbitration method now used with regard to collective bargaining.

If the situation is so tense today in the field of collective bargaining it is because monopolies have appeared in our industry and that has led to the creation of the labour movement which in turn tends to monopolize things. In fact, the labour unions are becoming more and more powerful and they bring together a very large number of workers in order to countervail the power of private enterprise.

Therefore, I do not think that we should be shocked at the fact that our trade unions merged, that the various groups united, to be in a position to offset the opposing power.

Mr. Chairman, if we want our economy and especially labour relations to operate more smoothly, more progressively, we must amend the present arbitration legislation to make it more functional and likely to bring about solutions to problems facing the various groups, during the negotiations for collective agreements.

Mr. Chairman, one fact remains in all that: the rising prices and salaries. With the inflation spiral, in the end we are worse off than we were at the start.

After checking with a good number of workers and citizens in my riding, I am wondering whether setting up a control board of prices and salaries might not be indicated.

A while ago, a member for Hamilton-Wentworth (Mr. Gibson) mentioned this possibility. I would go even a bit further: I ask that consideration be given to the advisability of setting up a board to control prices and salaries, on a temporary basis, so that we might return to a realistic and reasonable equilibrium in this aspect of our national life. I believe it would be wise to have such a board which could, with other competent people, arbitrate, if you will, prices and salaries in order to adjust the various sectors.

At the present time, you have well-organized groups of workers, strong industries, and they can demand and obtain decent living conditions. Still, between those two groups, you have this mass of Canadian citizens who are crushed, so to speak, between the two powerful blocks facing each other. I feel that we need some control system of prices and salaries, even if it were only on a temporary basis, in order to go back to a reasonable balance.

I wonder whether, starting from this new balance, it might not be advisable to apply same correction to lower prices and salaries so that we might compete on world markets. For instance, there are countries like Japan where the standard of living and salaries are generally fairly low, that manage to compete with the countries in our hemisphere precisely because their prices are lower. I feel this possibility should be looked into.

[Mr. Lessard (Lac-Saint-Jean).]

At the present time, the point which surely concerns the hon. Minister of Labour, is the famous question of unemployment. I wonder whether it might not be well to declare war on unemployment. Let the country be put on a war footing. If Canada were attacked by any opponent from the outside, all its energies, industries and citizens would be mobilized instantly to fight for the country. But the fact that we are tolerating this group of unemployed constitutes, up to a point, an enemy, since our unfortunate brothers take away part of the country's production without directly contributing thereto.

This segment of the population—and I refer here to the recently published report of the Canada Economic Council—represents a rather significant percentage of our people, almost a third, who do not have the same standard of living as their fellow-citizens.

Mr. Chairman, I think all the energies and efforts available in Canada should be mobilized to fight the scourge of unemployment. I believe that Canada cannot afford the luxury of having so many unproductive citizens, so many people who forcibly have a minimum consumption, but who are consumers just the same, while not contributing to the production. I contend that we cannot afford that kind of luxury, particularly when we consider all that remains to be done in this country. It is illogical to hold up that energy, that potential instead of using it to complete what has already been started and also to start new projects.

Furthermore, after reviewing the needs of other countries, we could use our imagination to produce more in a number of other areas and then give part of our production to other nations whose citizens suffer and die by the thousands in some cases.

• (8:10 p.m.)

Mr. Chairman, in concluding my remarks, I should like to refer to another matter, automation. I mentioned automation in my remarks on the budget. I think it has also been mentioned by the hon. Minister of Labour in his speech. I may therefore rightly raise the subject again.

Automation, mechanization and modern technology must be taken into account. I ask the hon. minister to let us know as soon as possible what legislation he intends to present and in what fields it will be applied. On page 2 of the text of his speech, it is said that that legislation is being prepared. I am anxious—and I think the majority of the members of this house are equally anxious—to see what measures the government, and in particular the Minister of Labour, intend to take so as to correct the situation which affects workers in the whole of Canada.

I want to draw the attention of the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) to a typical example. In the ending of Lac-Saint-Jean, a municipality of 2,000 inhabitants will be affected soon by the closing down of its only plant. The Saint-Raymond Paper, a pulp and paper plant, announced two days ago that it was closing down at the beginning of March. As a result, 200 families will find themselves destitute and we will have to support them through taxes, by giving them social welfare and unemployment insurance benefits. Is that a desirable situation?

Mr. Chairman, that plant had been established 46 years ago and, during the first years, it yielded profits. However, the management forgot to invest money for the development of the factory and today it cannot even survive, because they did not mechanize or modernize their equipment. Today, they are compelled to shut down on account of competition. We have there an example which specifically proves that businesses have no choice; they must develop and modernize their production line.

It is a known fact that workers are laid off due to automation, but we have the proof today that this company must shut down, because it was not improved. It is not 10 or 12 workers who are laid off, as a result of technical progress, but actually 200 family heads. They are laid off, because during the years preceding the shutting down of the plant, no improvement was done to enable it to compete against other plants.

Mr. Chairman, the municipality of Desbiens in the Lac-Saint-Jean area is doomed to become a ghost town, because that is the only plant there. I have submitted the problem to the Minister of Labour, to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) and to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. I hope—which I urge them to do—that they will combine their efforts to consider what could be done in co-operation with the provincial government to enable that Desbiens plant to continue its operations.

According to the company's spokesmen, some temporary solution could be applied apparently while waiting for a permanent one, and if the governments stepped in before the plant closed down, I think it would be possible to keep 200 workers on the job, in the hope that, in the meantime, some permanent solution could be found, so that this plant would not only remain in operation but also flourish in order to create more jobs in the Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean area.

[English]

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, lest it go unnoticed, I should like to draw to the attention of hon. members the colourful flowers being worn by hon. members to my right. I hope this is an indication of their flowery outlook on the situation and perhaps an optimism for the future of our Canadian society.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lundrigan: This is the first time I have ever received applause from people of that particular political stripe. In all seriousness, before my time runs out I think I should compliment the minister upon his very fine statement this afternoon. We are hoping that statements of the kind that have been made by hon. members this afternoon will be translated into reality in the Canadian nation of today and tomorrow, because I think the portfolio for which the minister has responsibility is going to become more important, not less important, as may be the case in some other areas of the estimates before us.

I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to make a few general remarks. I have been connected with the labour market, contrary to what many members might think, in connection with everything from railroad building to fishing, trapping for the department of mines and resources, and almost every aspect of the labour market. In fact I have had a lot of practical experience in trying to survive in this society of ours, especially in a particular region of Canada.

With Christmas coming on and the winter months setting in across Canada, I wonder how we can take pride in our Canadian nation. I should like to refer to the people in many parts of Canada today, for example in Quebec, northern Ontario and in northern Canada generally, parts of British Columbia and the whole Atlantic region. These people cannot even think in terms of providing food for the winter, let alone the provision of gifts from Santa Claus for their children. They cannot even think of providing adequate shelter, clothing or the necessities of life, not to mention the important necessity of education so that eventually these children can look to the future with a little bit of hope of getting out of the despair in which they presently find themselves.

How can we talk about the affluent society in this Canadian nation, when we realize that in many regions of Canada there is no affluency, but rather a pseudo type of affluency resulting from the fact that people can more easily borrow money than they could a few years ago, and consequently have more debt than they ever had before. If the Minister of Justice were here, I should like to ask him what constitutes a crime in Canada. Of course the Chairman might rule me out of order on that question, because it would be construed as being off the topic of debate. I contend that there is a great crime in the Canadian nation today, and that crime is being committed by most of the big businesses and the various other agencies that have control of the labour market.

The consequences of this crime are low wages, a low standard of living, the high cost of living and unemployment. People in various parts of Canada are being classified as having committed a crime just because they were born in a particular part of Canada. Somebody in Canada, in many cases this government and as I have indicated businesses of various types, construction companies of various types, have elected to classify as a crime the fact that people live in a particular part of Canada. In my opinion this is a fairly serious situation. We have heard quite a bit of conversation about one Canada. This concept originated when I was a much younger man than I am right now, and dates back ten or 12 years. I believe there has been some effort made to turn the concept into a reality.

We heard quite a bit of comment about one Canada during the recent election. Many people in various parts of Canada were given the hope that Canada would become great. I contend that as long as we have the amount of regional disparity that we have in Canada today, we are going to have not two or three Canadas, but 15 or 20 Canadas. Unless this government is prepared to tackle the problem of regional disparity, not only in the Atlantic regions but many other regions of Canada, we are going to have a multiplicity of Canadas. This is the one great fear I have as a young Canadian. In order to fight regional disparity, there has to be provision for stimulating the economy. These stimulants are employment and a just wage structure.

[Mr. Lundrigan.]

In the few months I have been in Ottawa a great deal of my correspondence has had to do with the low wages that Canadians in this country are paid. That applies not only to the people of my region but to those all across the country. I hope the minister will take note of my remarks and do something to correct this state of affairs. Many of our workmen across Canada are not receiving the minimum wage to which they are justly entitled, by law. Whether people work in industry, construction, for federal or provincial governments indirectly—that is, in projects coming under the jurisdiction of those governments—or in private enterprise, many of them are not receiving a fair and just wage. In other words, our wage earners are not receiving the wage that is theirs legally.

Hon. members have talked a great deal about the minimum wage that is paid to workers across Canada. Failure to pay that minimum wage shakes one's faith in our society. The winter months are approaching and some people in Canada are faced literally with semi-starvation, and all the ills of an environment which would be disgraceful even in poorer parts of the world, let alone in Canada. There are loopholes and clauses in government contracts as a result of which companies take advantage of their workers and pay them less than that to which they are entitled, by law. This makes one wonder about the sort of society we live in.

I will not expand on my remarks. I have already made representations to the minister with regard to specific areas in which Canadian workers are being gypped of their legal right to wages. I hope the minister will use his good offices to bring about an investigation that will rectify some of these things. That this state of affairs exists in Canada is a crime, and I use that word intentionally. Many in Canada do not earn an income which will even remotely give them a decent standard of living.

The hon. member who led off in this debate said that in the Atlantic region over 5 per cent of the people are unemployed. In some parts of Canada such as Newfoundland 20 per cent of the people are unemployed. I have talked to hon. members from Quebec who have indicated to me the serious situation existing in their province at this time.

An hon. Member: We are listening to you over here.

Mr. Lundrigan: It is fine for the hon. Liberal member to say he is listening, but it is time someone said what is to be done. Perhaps the hon. member who just interjected might like to stand up and tell us about the problems in his province. Perhaps hon. members from different parts of Canada might like to follow the courage of their convictions and tell us of the problems existing in the parts of the country they represent. For instance, there are grave problems in northern British Columbia as well as in Ontario.

I am proud to stand here as a member of the opposition and talk of problems that affect all Canadians. I am bringing these problems to the government's attention, and I suggest hon. members on the other side of the chamber might do the same. Since other hon. members may wish to make their contribution to the debate and bring the attention of the government to the problems in their respective province, I shall say no more.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, so many speakers this afternoon and this evening have made remarks that were pro-labour and pro-union, and so many speakers have dealt with problems that concern members of trade unions, that I feel I should start my remarks by saying, "Brother Chairman, sisters and brothers". When I look about me, though, I realize I am not in a union hall.

Brother Chairman, I should be less than frank if I did not begin by saying something about the speech this afternoon by Comrade Mackasey. In fact I was quite impressed by the answer the Minister of Labour gave to my question on orders of the day concerning action on the Freedman report. Likewise I was impressed by the fine speech he made when introducing these estimates this afternoon.

The Leader of the Opposition took issue with the Minister of Labour—

Mr. Mackasey: As usual.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The Leader of the Opposition said he thought the minister was lecturing us, lecturing the house and lecturing the public. There was a certain amount of lecturing in the speech but I forgive him for that, for it seems to me that included in his remarks there was a clear indication that he was lecturing his fellow members of the cabinet. If I understood him correctly he was saying to those cabinet colleagues who were here that, so far as he was concerned, the Department of Labour has to move ahead. It must have the permission of the cabinet to bring in legislation to implement the Freedman report, to do something about the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, to do something to step up the enforcement of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code and the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. It must do something about discrimination. You know, all told it was a good speech. It was the kind of speech I can imagine the minister making in cabinet and I think he deserves full marks for making it here, out in the open, on the floor of the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought he was serving notice that he wants his department to be a department of and for labour. He wants the work of his department to result in labour's having a rightful place in this country. In some portions of his speech he dealt in generalities, but in other portions he was specific, and I congratulate him for that and I confess that I congratulate any Liberal, especially any Liberal cabinet minister, with reluctance for every instinct in me tells me it is the wrong thing to do.

Mr. MacEwan: You had better beware.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My experience in this house is to beware when a Liberal, especially a cabinet minister, makes a promise and tells us something will be done. I do not mean that the promise will never be implemented, but it takes an awfully long time. Some of my colleagues would like me to mention the year 1919; the Liberals do not want me to do that, because some of them were not born then. Nevertheless, Mr. Chairman—brother chairman—and I see we are changing brothers in the chair—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —despite my instincts that tell me it is wrong, and that I am making a mistake and will regret it, I will say that in light of what the Minister of Labour said this afternoon, I am prepared to give him a chance. I am prepared to give him a reasonable period of time—I will not tell him how long it is—to deliver and come through with some of the things concerning which he spoke so vigorously this afternoon. I have already credited him with having been specific in two or three cases, so let me add to the list of specifics on which the minister must act if he is to carry through with the position that he staked out in his remarks this afternoon.

It all began today, Mr. Chairman, with his answer to my question about the Freedman report and his report and his further reference to it in his opening remarks on these estimates. As we all know, the philosophy of the Freedman report is especially important to Canadian labour. My colleague the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has already spelled out the details.

In the main the Freedman report says that workers have just as much stake in their jobs as management has; that workers have rights with respect to their jobs which are not to be sold down the river by management. I was delighted to hear the Minister of Labour say this afternoon that certain recent experiences have persuaded him that it is not good enough just to do what the previous minister of labour did, which was to tell us that the department would take action on the matter. The minister stated clearly that legal legislative steps have to be taken.

A former minister of labour, whose name somebody over there could not remember, used to say that he always said things in a kindly way, so I am going to turn these kindly references to this Minister of Labour into straightforward congratulations if within a reasonable time he has before the house legislation amending the Freedman report.

That would be fine, Mr. Chairman, but the minister cannot stop there. There is also the whole question of amending the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. I know that if I remind this minister that his predecessor but one—his penultimate predecessor, the present Minister of Manpower and Immigration—promised on a certain occasion a few years ago that that act would be amended the next year, I need not point out that in fact it was not amended.

The minister will probably tell me that in the meantime the Woods commission has been established and that we are of course waiting for the report of that commission before action is taken on this question. However, Mr. Chairman, the indications are that that report will be received soon, and surely the department itself is thinking about the things the commission is studying. Therefore I suggest that there are improvements affecting the whole process of collective bargaining that need to be made in the legislation.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

I trust that the Minister of Labour, who is a man who tries to see all sides of the issue, will be aware of what some of us think were the pitfalls that were put before us last year in what was then Bill No. C-186, and that he will see to it that any amendments he proposes to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act will not have as their possible result the fragmentation of the collective bargaining process in this country.

I am prepared to leave discussion of that legislation at that point, Mr. Chairman, recognizing that we have to receive first of all the Woods report. But let us not have the Woods report lying around for as long as the report on unemployment insurance has been lying around, or have it lie around for as long as we have had the Liberal platform of 1919.

However, Mr. Chairman, let me move on; as I say I am being very helpful to the Minister of Labour. I liked his speech this afternoon and I think I should reciprocate. I am therefore suggesting things that he could do to show that he really meant it when he said that he wanted to make his department one that will serve the working people of this country.

I think it is time he took a good hard look at the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. Time moves fast in this day and age, so let him not tell us that it has been on the books for only a few years, that we must live with it for 10 or 20 years before we change it. I suggest that he take a look in particular at the minimum wage provided in the legislation. Other people have talked about the minimum wage this afternoon but nobody ventured a figure. Even the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings, who wants the minimum wage raised, did not say to what figure it should be raised.

If the Minister of Labour would like to have it, Mr. Chairman, there is a bill of mine in the list of private members public bills that suggests that the minimum figure should be not less than $1.75 an hour. At present it is $1.25 an hour. I am not terribly proud of the figure of $1.75 an hour, but I think it is at least a minimum below which people should not be asked to work under any condition. Even if a person receives the minimum wage of $1.75 an hour, working a 40-hour week for 50 weeks a year, he will still earn only $3,400 a year, which is about at today's poverty line. So where does that leave the present $1.25 minimum wage, particularly in the case of those who do not get work all year round? Therefore, Mr. Chairman, that is one matter on which his own stance this afternoon calls for action.

I would ask him to take a look at the holiday provisions in the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The code still provides for only two weeks holiday a year, after one year employment with the same employer. I urge that in this day and age this period should be lengthened. Again, Mr. Chairman, I point out that I have a modest bill on the order paper that suggests that after three years employment the annual holiday should at least be three weeks a year.

The minister might also look at the question of statutory holidays. When the bill was brought in some years ago it contained provision for seven statutory holidays. We were able to get that bill amended on the floor of the house in committee of the whole so that it provides for eight statutory holidays. I see no reason why there should not be at least nine holidays. I suggest there is really nothing wrong with the principle that there be at least one statutory holiday per month in this country, particularly since it is a cold country and a few days off in the middle of the winter season might be a good idea. Therefore I urge the minister to take a look at that suggestion. However, if I am going too far in suggesting one day a month, 12 days a year, we should at least raise the figure of eight to nine.

The provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code relating to the 40-hour work week also might be improved. However, in all realism I suppose I would have to admit that the first job is to get the 40-hour week really lived up to.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, I would call upon the Minister of Labour to include in the stance that he has taken a clear indication that he is not going to be led down the garden path by some of his backbenchers. As the minister knows, there are a couple of private members bills on the order paper in the name of Liberal members, one of which seeks to reduce the position of labour so far as collective bargaining in the civil service is concerned. The other would deny the 40-hour work week to certain workers who fall within the federal labour code. So that while the minister is making these forward steps I suggest that he watch he is not knifed in the back by some of the brothers over on that side of the house.

Then I would urge the Minister of Labour to see to it that his department get cracking on the Canada Labour (Safety) Code. He will remember how in a certain session a year or two ago we were pressed by a former minister of labour—the last one—to get this legislation through. We were debating it in committee and taking time to go into its details. The minister of labour pleaded with us to get the legislation through because the government wanted to get things moving. I do not know whether the regulations under the act are in effect even yet. I see the minister shake his head. He should also shake his head in shame, if he had been the minister for very long, but he does not have to do that because he was not. However, he is the minister now. I will give him a little time to deliver the goods, Mr. Chairman, but this is an area where the goods must be delivered.

I think the minister has to go beyond some of the things that have been regarded as his particular area—for example, the matters I have named such as the Freedman report, the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act and the two labour codes. He must also be concerned about things such as poverty—yes, pensions—yes, and the concept of the guaranteed annual income. I was glad to hear the Minister of Labour say this afternoon that he felt it was his responsibility to be concerned about the people who are not able to keep up with inflation. Inflation is a word that gets tossed around a lot in this house and in public debate throughout the country. It is said time and time again that governments must somehow stop inflation, and if the government of the day does not, the opposition of the day condemns it out of hand. Then when the two get reversed the same thing happens in reverse.

I quite agree that steps have to be taken to control the rate of inflation. Steps have to be taken in that area, but let us face the fact that if history, especially the history of the past couple of hundred years, is any guide, we are not going to keep prices where they are. Prices and wages in the year 2000 are not going to be what they are today. Price increases and wage increases are going to take place. The role of government, the role of society in this is to see to it that certain people who cannot defend themselves are not hurt because this happens.

Those who have collective bargaining, and those who get the benefit of wage increases because other people do their collective bargaining for them, are able to keep up to some extent with the cost of living and the increased standards of living. But those on fixed incomes, pensioners in particular, do not have any opportunity to do this, and this is where society and where the government has to step in.

The present occupant of the Chair is fully aware of my concern for one particular group of pensioners. But there are other kinds, other groups of pensioners, particularly people on industrial pensions, who face this problem, and I say it has to become the concern of the Minister of Labour that somehow we get built into our pension schemes arrangements for pensions to escalate so that no group in our society is hurt by inflation. I call upon the minister to take on this idea, along with the others about which he must concern himself.

I have made passing reference to the guaranteed annual income concept, which I think has to come. I think some day it will take the place of minimum wage legislation and unemployment insurance. I plead with the Minister of Labour not to confuse the concept of a guaranteed annual income with the guaranteed income supplement that is in effect so far as old age security is concerned. I am sure he knows the vast difference between these two concepts. I am sure he agrees with me that, taking into account the speed with which things are moving, the explosions all around, 20 years from now if all we have achieved is guaranteed supplementary income, then the poverty of retired people is going to be staggering.

The work pattern is going to shift tremendously. Automation is going to produce drastic changes. Instead of our going blind into all this uncertainty and confusion we should plan for it, and should start now to make arrangements for a guaranteed annual income. Some ministers may say that this concerns some other department such as Finance, or Health and Welfare. It is probably a major concern of the whole government, but this is the minister who is responsible for the well being of the working people of this country, and this is the place where the planning should start.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is one other branch of the work of this department about which I should like to say a word. It involves the question of unemployment insurance. This afternoon the minister pointed out that we dealt with these estimates in the standing committee to which they were referred. But they have been referred back to the committee of supply and we have them before us now, and so I want to urge upon the minister the urgency of the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which have been promised ever since the Gill committee made its report. I am not suggesting they should just be the recommendations made by that committee: There are many improvements and changes that must be made to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

This is the minister who said this afternoon that he is going to make something out of the Department of Labour. This is the minister who so impressed all of us that we feel we are in a union hall tonight. I say it is time for him to see to it that a job is done in amending that act. In the meantime, even before it gets amended, I urge the minister to take a personal interest on the other side of a question which has been given a great deal of publicity, and that is the desire of the Unemployment Insurance Commission to cut down on cases of fraud against the commission and against the fund.

Let it be perfectly clear, Mr. Chairman, I do not want to condone fraud in any way. I do not want to throw any cold water on any efforts to cut down fraudulant practices, but I do suggest that the way the commission is going about this is going to create an impression among a lot of people that there is a lot of chiselling going on, that downright thievery is taking place, with the result that anybody on unemployment insurance may be suspect.

I say quite frankly that I do not like this pamphlet put out in both languages by the Unemployment Insurance Commission titled "Are you really available for work?". Among other things it gives five examples of people who broke the law. They are all anonymous. One is a waitress, another a railway conductor, and the third a stenographer, the fourth a seasonal clerical worker and the last a sales clerk. No doubt they are samples from the files of the commission, but when you put out this kind of literature you create the suspicion that there is a wholesale amount of this type of thing going on.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission admits that the fraud that takes place amounts to only 2 per cent of the total. An editorial in the Toronto Daily Star of November 16 pointed out that the retail industry would count itself lucky if its annual loss through shoplifting was a mere 2 per cent. But there is the other side of the coin. The reason I raise this is because in my experience many people feel they are defrauded of their right to unemployment insurance because of the extra zeal of some of the department's officials who call people in, after they have been put on benefit, and get them to make the kind of statements which result in their being cut off.

We went into this question in some detail when dealing with the estimates in the standing committee, and so I do not intend to pursue it further at this time. But I do want to point out that in the minister's absence, when he was over at Geneva at I.L.O. meetings, the Prime Minister answered a question of mine on orders of the day in a manner that I found eminently satisfactory, and I hope the Minister of Labour, if he does not already know about it, will see to it the Prime Minister's statement is carried out.

On Wednesday, November 13, as recorded at page 2685 of Hansard I asked:

> In view of the announcement that has been made of increased efforts to check abuses with respect to the unemployment insurance fund, will similar efforts be made to protect the rights of those who qualify for unemployment insurance to have their benefits continue without overzealous officials applying the availability clause too severely?

This was the reply of the Prime Minister:

> Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is now attending I.L.O. meetings in Geneva. I am happy to give to this house the assurance that is demanded by the hon. member.

I did not think I was demanding it. I thought I was just asking for it, but I suppose that is one of our bilingual problems. At any rate there is a clearcut assurance by the Prime Minister that what I was requesting would be undertaken.

I hope the Minister of Labour will see to it that steps are taken to make sure the impression is not created that those on unemployment insurance are a bunch of frauds when, after all, the amount of the fraud is only 2 per cent of the total and when there are people—I don't know the percentage, it may be considerably higher than that—who are denied benefits to which they feel they are entitled.

The unemployment insurance fund is there to assist people who are unemployed because there is no employment for them. I hope the fund will be administered with an effort to make sure that it is not abused, but also with an effort to make sure that people get the benefits to which they are entitled.

Now, with respect to the whole question of unemployment, unemployment insurance and so on, I of course come back to the point that the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby made in the opening part of his remarks this afternoon, that the chief concern of the department and of the Minister of Labour should not be picking up the pieces when people are unemployed, but should be the initiating of policies that will produce employment.

That is all our people want—not unemployment insurance, not being forced to work for minimum wages, but an opportunity to work at productive jobs that will provide levels of wages which will enable all of them to take some part in the just society. I have noticed that for the most part the references to the just society are now made from this side of the house. Liberals do not use the phrase very often; it embarrasses them. But the Minister of Labour did this this afternoon and he deserves credit for his courage in doing so. He made it clear that he believes workers and their families have a right to share in this just society.

Now, Mr. Chairman—I mean "brother Chairman"—I say again that I was delighted with the position the minister took this afternoon. If he thinks I am being friendly and congratulatory toward him now, fine; I am. But if he does not deliver he knows what will happen.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Winnipeg North—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —Centre.

Mr. Mackasey: I always get confused about ridings. The hon. member has made me a little inarticulate for a moment. If he finds it strange to say anything complimentary about a Liberal cabinet member, I think my record in the house would show I find it equally difficult to find anything nice to say about the many socialist reactionaries in the New Democratic party at whom I have looked with so much affection for the past five years. I believe however, we do share one thing in common; that is, a deep concern for people, Canadians in all walks of life, entitled to a just society. We differ only with regard to the method by which we would achieve this just society. I often think that their philosophy is better suited to the nineteenth century and, although it is Utopian in concept, as an ideal it is not practical. I believe those of us on this side of the house will attain the just society and at the same time retain the better features of the private enterprise system which has been a character of Canada and Canadians.

I believe I do appreciate the concern expressed this evening by the hon. member from Winnipeg, who has a bill on the order paper for every situation. He suggested that I refer to the private members hour and private members bills for guidance. I will admit there are bills in his name in respect of perhaps every subject under the sun, but they are always progressive in the field of social welfare. They are designed to improve the plight of senior citizens and the position of the fixed incomes of civil servants with lower than standard salaries and lower than standard pensions, pensions which were set on an actuarial system which is long out of date. I have no quarrel with his concept.

I believe most people in this house know that if I am unable as Minister of Labour to implement some of these reforms—not necessarily along the lines the hon. member thinks are appropriate—and unless I am able to find support for this type of reform inside the Liberal cabinet, I would find it necessary to resign from the cabinet and demote myself to the back benches, where I would be free to express my opinions. However, I have confidence in the Liberal government. It has placed on the statute books of Canada every meaningful piece of pro-labour legislation that Canadians deserve and appreciate.

I have very little reservation about my ability to sell my concept to the cabinet, particularly when among the members of the cabinet are such very wonderful Canadians as my colleague who will be charged with the responsibility of eliminating regional disparity in a country as vast as Canada. I would commend to all members of the house the speech the hon. gentleman made in Montreal last night, which was published in great detail in La Presse, because I think it is very thought provoking and very tangible evidence of the fact that we do intend to attack poverty in this country on a meaningful basis.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would hardly expect me to comment on all the pieces of legislation he mentioned. He did mention the Industrial Disputes and Investigation Act. I have prepared no less than 80 some potential amendments to that act, but I am very conscious of the fact that the task force may come forward with better solutions.

The hon. member also mentioned Bill No. C-186. I would hope, when and if this type of legislation is brought forward, that he and other members of the house would approach it objectively and not as a matter of Quebec against Canada, the French against the English, or Jean Marchand against somebody else. This is not the type of attitude that makes the committee system in this house more desirable. I am not directing these remarks to the hon. gentleman, because he did not do this. I am referring to some of the people who did appear before that committee representing the labour movement in this country. They did mention to me, in secret however, that even if the bill was imperfect in their opinion and if freedom of association was not as important as national bargaining units, at least they agreed they might have attacked the bill for its weakness in structure and not resorted to an emotional attack on the government in order to defeat the bill.

Many people have been complimentary in their remarks this afternoon. This has a sobering effect on me and makes me more responsible just when I was preparing to rear back and remind the members of the New Democratic party of the failures in Saskatchewan and so on. I should like to comment on some of the issues which have been brought forward and say that I appreciated the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite from Central Nova, who is the official labour critic of the Conservative party. In the years I have been in this house I have found that he is very strong in debate, and I have no illusions about whether or not he will make it difficult for me on the right or wrong occasion, as the case may be, depending where you sit.

I did appreciate his endorsation this afternoon of the philosophy contained in the Freedman report. I suspect this is the first time a Conservative member of parliament has ever endorsed the philosophy of the Freedman report. I think this is a sign of progress on their part. I should like to attribute that progress to the hon. gentleman, the very genial labour critic from Central Nova. When I take this concept to the cabinet and bring it back to the House of Commons in bill form, in view of the fact that the New Democratic party supports the idea and the official labour critic of the Conservative party is wedded to the philosophy in the Freedman report, the bill should have speedy passage.

The hon. member also mentioned the postal strike, although this more appropriately comes under Treasury Board rather than the Department of Labour. He made the point that much of the cause of labour strikes is not directly applicable to dollars and cents but rather to daily differences between management and labour, differences that grow out of all proportion, so that when the two parties meet at the bargaining table there is real animosity, which is unnecessary and which prevents management and labour looking after the small details, which are small in their eyes but important in the eyes of the individual worker with a lunch pail. So I compliment the hon. member for bringing this to our attention. I cannot but agree that the problems which led to the postal strike were due to a type of working conditions the federal government should not be proud of and that it should have taken steps to eliminate that condition much sooner.

I was glad the right hon. Leader of the Opposition was here when the hon. member from Newfoundland—I believe he represents Gander-Twillingate—spoke, because in the very short period of time this young man has been in the house he has proved to be one of the more eloquent members. I appreciate the very fair way in which that hon. member mentioned in a passing manner some of the labour problems he had brought to the attention of the Minister of Labour. It would have been very easy for the hon. member to get up tonight and embarrass the minister or perhaps the government in respect of some of the problems he has discovered in relation to minimum wages and prevailing rates. He has brought these problems to my attention in private, and I have taken the trouble, as he knows, to send a special assistant to that beautiful province. This man is quite familiar with that province and he will be reporting back to me on the week end in respect of those specific cases brought to my attention. I hope if there is any evidence of intentional or unintentional injustices or abuses that we in the Department of Labour will, if necessary, be given the authority to step into other departments to see that the labour legislation of this country is respected not only by private enterprise but by government agencies as well.

[Translation]

I should like also to thank the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) for his interesting remarks on the activities of my department.

I appreciate the comments which were inspired to him by his activities in the labour movement. His practical experience as a member and as a worker in our Canadian society give weight to his remarks. I can assure him that they will be considered and that his suggestions with regard to unemployment insurance for instance will be studied, even though consideration of the estimates of the commission has already been completed.

[English]

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, who represents one of the really great industrial centres of this country, also impressed me, and I learned much from his contribution, particularly when he spoke quite eloquently and factually about the problems of residual rights and how this is handled in other countries such as the United States, Sweden and England. This really is the basis of the philosophy of Freedman, as the hon. member and I both realize. The hon. member also mentioned the unemployment figures and asked whether I could bring him this evening a projection of unemployment for the winter in Canada. I am sorry to say that I cannot, because this particular responsibility falls under the jurisdiction of the department of manpower in conjunction with the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. I understand the implication of his request and his remarks. Any rate of unemployment is undesirable in a country which should be as prosperous as ours.

I think the departments of manpower, labour and what I have referred to, perhaps prematurely, as regional disparity, should work closer together to attack this problem of unemployment on a permanent basis. There has been reference to the winter works program, but we must realize that this program, desirable as it might have been ten years ago, has done little in a permanent way to re-educate and retrain people who are chronically out of work during the long winter months, which exist in many parts of this country. I think we must realize that the money we spend on retraining these people is a much better investment than simply handing them a shovel during a snowstorm, or asking them to turn over roads and ditches for sewers in the dead of winter under the pretext that this is a suitable winter program.

If we are going to fight poverty and unemployment we have to end this type of program, and spend the money in areas where, in the long run, it will be more meaningful and beneficial to Canadians. Many members have touched on the need for education. Experts from the economic council have told me that a recent study they have undertaken on the mobility of the Canadian work force indicates, that it is much more mobile than we anticipated or realized, and this includes workers from the province of Quebec. There is a direct relationship between education and mobility, and the educated and trained worker is quite prepared to move from certain areas of the country to other areas where jobs are more plentiful.

If we are to reach the type of utopia which I think is within the grasp of countries such as ours we must tie in the whole problem of unemployment and poverty with the problems of education. Some time ago we realized that no one is too old to be retrained or educated. This is one of the areas of priority in the fight against poverty in this country.

Having said these things, and I feel rather deeply about them, I realize that while I may be speaking in a rather non-partisan manner, this is a problem that cannot be tackled by one, two, three or four ministers. This is a problem which must be tackled by all levels of government and all Canadians who have a social conscience. The sooner we reach this concept in Canada the sooner we will reach that standard of living which Sweden enjoys and which Japan is rapidly reaching, where co-operation and concern for each other is almost a religion. I think these ambitions and desires are not beyond the scope of this government or this House of Commons.

I was impressed as well by the sincerity of the hon. member for Hamilton-Wentworth who represents one of the more affluent sections of Hamilton. If he were politically partisan I am sure he would say nothing that was pro-labour. He talked about a wages and prices board. Perhaps I should correct that by referring to and talking about an income and price board. When we talk about wages we are again talking exclusively about the worker. When we refer to control we should think in terms of controlling "income", because that is the proper terminology. Income includes the income of doctors who increase their charge by 20 per cent or 25 per cent when called out in the dead of night for instance. It is "income" that properly describes the income of the lawyers, many of whom are in this house, that can stand scrutiny.

All of us who come here to the political table, and all those union members who have power and strength have a responsibility to our fellow Canadians. That is a responsibility not only of the government but also of management and labour.

I had some nice choice remarks to make about the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, but because of the pleasant atmosphere of the evening debate I do not intend to lecture that right hon. gentleman in the same tone in which he found it necessary to lecture the hon. member for Verdun. I am starting to develop a real affection for that hon. gentleman, and this frightens me. This is not part of my character. Since my dad came from Halifax, and since I found out that the hon. gentleman has ties in that city, I decided there must be some good in the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition. Some days it is harder to realize this than on other days. In any event, when he suggested I was lecturing the house—

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Chairman, I should like to request the minister to stop referring to me as "right hon.", because this might go to my head.

Mr. Mackasey: From force of habit, I occasionally get confused between the real Leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman. I keep falling into that trap.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): I knew it would come out.

Mr. MacEwan: We see your true colours as a result of that kind of remark, and I hope Hansard got it.

Mr. Mackasey: There was one contribution made this afternoon to which I have not referred as yet, and that is the contribution made by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings. This "product of poverty" suggested that the Prime Minister of this country could not deal with poverty and could not be connected with a just society because of his wealth and background. I am wondering if this is not the case of the pot calling the kettle black.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I was not referring to that at all. I said he had not come in contact with it, referring of course to his calling as a lawyer and a university professor. I said also he would not come in contact with it because of the fact that his constituency is very well-to-do and is probably one of the most affluent constituencies in this country.

Mr. Mackasey: I apologize, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman has on the surface pointed out some very valid reasons why the Prime Minister of this country would not be familiar with the problems of the poor and the underprivileged, including the working class. This indicates to me, of course, that the hon. gentleman is not familiar with the history of the present Prime Minister. He is not aware of the fight that this same Prime Minister had, as a lawyer, in company with Frank Scott who is a great Canadian, to break the padlock law of Duplessis ten or 15 years ago. He is not aware of the fight this same Prime Minister waged side by side with his colleague who is presently charged with the cultural affairs of this nation. This is obviously one of the problems of the hon. member. In this Prime Minister we have a Canadian who is concerned about a just society, the poor, the rights of Canadians and justice. This is the man who is the present Prime Minister of this country.

Anybody who is responsible and is familiar with the writings of the present Prime Minister in Cité Libre, when he championed the causes of the poor and the underprivileged—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That was before he became a Liberal.

Mr. Hees: That was when he was an N.D.P.'er, and a card-carrying one at that.

Mr. Mackasey: I am not too interested in the political philosophy the Prime Minister had before. I am just reminding the hon. gentleman that the record of the Prime Minister in this particular area of concern for fellow Canadians who have not had the opportunities of his education, who have not shared in the affluence of his background, who have not come from the same milieu in French Canada, should be inspiring; and I refer to all members of the opposition as well as all members of the Liberal party.

Mr. Hees: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I was not trying to be unfair to the Prime Minister; I was trying to be very fair and to make an excuse for his complete lack of concern in this regard. I was trying to ascertain whether the Prime Minister intended to do anything to alleviate the situation in which those living in poverty find themselves.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, there is not much use trying to convert the hon. gentleman. However, I would point out a few things to him. He mentioned that on September 13 he asked the Prime Minister whether he would raise the minimum wage, and said that the Prime Minister said no. I wonder whether he would like to look at page 16 of Hansard for September 13 and tell me whether that is the interpretation he still gets out of it. The hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings said:

> Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

He made a very valid case for increasing the minimum wage. The Prime Minister said in reply:

> I will have to ask the Minister of Labour whether he has that under consideration.

Then as Minister of Labour I said, with due modesty:

> Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is always conscious of the needs of the working man in this country, and will give consideration to the suggestion of the hon. member.
> Mr. Hees: Does the Prime Minister in the very near future intend to call a conference with the provincial premiers to discuss this very vital problem?

That is when the Prime Minister said no. It was not that he was not interested in raising minimum wages, but he did not think he had to call a dominion-provincial conference to raise the minimum wages of federal government employees.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege, in my question I asked whether he would not raise minimum wages in respect of employees who came under federal jurisdiction, as an example to the premiers, and call them together to discuss this matter. I asked whether with this example before them the Prime Minister could not urge the premiers to raise minimum wages of employees under provincial jurisdiction. That is the question I asked the Prime Minister.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member suggested that we raise the minimum wage as an example to the provinces.

Mr. Hees: That is right.

Mr. Mackasey: He pointed out, quite accurately, that the last time we raised minimum wages on the federal scene was three years ago. The great province of Ontario, with all its affluence and industrialization, took precisely three years to bring its rates up to ours.

Mr. Hees: The rates in the province of Ontario are now higher than those paid under federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Mackasey: They will be exactly one nickel higher—

Mr. Hees: That is higher.

Mr. Mackasey: —when the rate is strictly applied.

Mr. Hees: Then the minister should not say they are lower, when he knows they are higher. I ask him to stick to the facts and be honest.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I think that in order to carry on this debate in the proper manner the Minister of Labour should continue his speech, and any interruptions in the future should be by way of questions of privilege and not by way of corrections of what the minister has said.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order, please. Is the hon. member rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. I will be very glad to sit quietly if I am not accused of saying things that I did not say and if meanings which I did not mean are not put on what I said.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. Every hon. member of this house knows that when he feels he has been misrepresented he can rise on a question of privilege. Any hon. member can in committee, after the minister has spoken, rise and speak.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, for the sake of the harmony which has been present throughout the day and this evening—

Mr. Hees: Why don't you tell us what you are going to do to eradicate poverty?

Mr. Mackasey: The hon. gentleman, as usual, rises to dish it out, but when you hand it back he loses his cool.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: I have not lost my cool at all. I just get a little annoyed at direct misrepresentations—and that is a polite way of saying it.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): Order. I would request the Minister of Labour to proceed with his remarks. I do not want to intervene in this debate and make my own remarks, but I think some of the minister's remarks are inviting this kind of comment.

Mr. Hees: Right. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, before the minister leaves the question of minimum wages will he indicate whether the government will support the increase in the minimum wage at this session of parliament?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I made it quite clear in my answer in September that the increase in the minimum wage is now under consideration.

Mr. Hees: Nonsense. That is a stock answer, and you know it means nothing.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should know all about stock answers because they were usually prepared for him when he was a minister.

Mr. Hees: I have been listening to them every day for five years, and I should know.

Mr. Mackasey: In fact, his speeches were prepared by the ghost writer, who is almost unique in Canadian history. Hon. members will understand this if they have read Pat Nicholson's latest book. But on a serious vein, Mr. Chairman, the problem of unemployment is certainly something one should be very concerned about. It is around the 5 per cent mark. It is, in the opinion of the minister and hon. members opposite, a very serious threat and challenge to Canadians.

The fact is of course that I have confidence in this country, because a study of the records and history of Canada shows that this is not the first time we have had unemployment at this rate, and we have managed to solve it. For instance, back in 1958 it was 7 per cent; in 1959 it was 6 per cent; in 1960, when the hon. gentleman was working hard—and I say this seriously—in our export field, it was 7 per cent. When we took over government it was 7.1 per cent. We have managed to bring this 7.1 per cent down to 3.6 per cent. This was done in 1966.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, would the minister entertain a question? I wonder whether he is trying to establish the fact that unemployment has been equally high under Conservative and Liberal governments.

Mr. Mackasey: I think that would be a fair appraisal, Mr. Chairman, except I can also show that, unlike the Conservatives, we know how to cope with it, because we have reduced it.

Mr. MacEwan: Winter is not over yet.

Mr. Mackasey: This is the cry of the new rich.

An hon. Member: Sock it to him.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Mr. Mackasey: According to the latest figures on the labour force, unemployment has increased by 34,000. However on the other hand there is some consolation in the fact that we are able to employ 270,000 more people who are coming into the labour force.

Mr. Lundrigan: May I ask the minister a question? A few minutes ago an hon. member asked for some statistics on unemployment and I think the minister indicated he could not give them because this was not under his jurisdiction and he did not have the figures. Perhaps in his commentary he could indicate what particular statistics were being sought at the time.

Mr. Mackasey: I would be glad to remind the hon. gentleman of precisely what I said. Perhaps he did not hear the question, which was put quite properly. I was asked whether I could give a prediction concerning the rate of unemployment this coming winter in the major cities of Canada. I said I could not because this was not the role of the Department of Labour, and the question would have to be asked when we come to the estimates of the Department of Manpower and Immigration.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Chairman, the question was—

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I should like to finish what I was saying. The hon. member is in bad company.

Mr. Hees: If you can't stand the heat, you had better get out of the kitchen.

Mr. Mackasey: I was going to say that the figures I am reading are factual. I got them out of the parliamentary library, and I am sure the hon. gentleman could easily do the same. As to the figures concerning unemployment in the coming winter, I cannot produce them, and this is an honest answer.

I appreciate the quiet, the attention and respect with which my remarks have been treated by the opposition. Obviously people can see that my big problem is to act with the dignity which a minister is supposed to act in a debate, and at the same time I find myself periodically reverting to the role I had before I was elevated to the cabinet. This is a house of debate and I should hope that in the repartee and exchange I have hurt nobody's feelings—certainly mine were not hurt. I just happen to think that in the last election the people of Canada indicated more confidence in this great young man, the Prime Minister, who is going to lead this country toward a just society than in hon. gentlemen opposite. I think his record is excellent. I am sure his concern for the people of Canada, for the working class and for the underprivileged, his direct connection in the past with unions, their causes and their plight, and his willingness to fight for them in court as well as with the strength of his pen, indicates that we have a Prime Minister who is really concerned about and sincerely interested in establishing a just society. I believe that with the complete co-operation of the opposition, that just society will be arrived at much sooner than most people think.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, thank you for all the applause.

The Chairman: Order, please. The chair-intends to recognize the hon. member for Témiscamingue, unless the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings has a brief question.

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Chairman. The reason I want to ask a question is that when I was speaking the Minister of Labour assured me, as I understood it, that he would be ready to advise the house as to what steps the government is taking to eliminate poverty from this country, so far as it can.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I think we should hear from someone else who has something constructive to add.

Mr. Hees: Than I take it that the minister has nothing to say—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: —and nothing to explain as to what this government is doing.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Hees: He has nothing to offer.

Mr. Lundrigan: I have a brief question, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: The Chair has recognized the hon. member for Témiscamingue.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, after hearing the hon. members who took part in the debate on the estimates of the Department of Labour, everyone will agree that the regional disparities mentioned in most speeches are strangely alike throughout Canada.

If you listen to an hon. member from the Maritimes, you will hear about economic difficulties with regard to coal mines, the development of natural resources, etc. The same situation prevails in northern Quebec.

I heard a little earlier the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean (Mr. Lessard) talk about Desbiens where something could be done. The problem was submitted to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene), to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) and to the cabinet, but it has not been solved yet. Incidentally, I think that the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, who was previously sitting on this side of the house as a Créditiste member, realizes that occupying a seat on the government side does not improve the standard of living of his electors, nor that of Quebecers or Canadians as a whole.

Therefore, he should have remained with us to pursue a more efficient fight.

Mr. Chairman, the situation is the same in other areas. In my own area, people complain that mines have to close down. In the Quebec area, they complain about the shipyards of Lauzon; in the eastern townships, they complain about problems facing the shoe industry and the precarious situation of the textile industry. There are economic difficulties everywhere.

Regional disparities resemble each other very much from an economic point of view.

I limited myself to Quebec, but the situation is the same in Ontario. We also hear the members from the west complain about a lack of industries, and especially those from Manitoba who complain that the overhaul base of Air Canada will be transferred to Montreal. Mr. Chairman, that stirs up a storm in the house. The members from Manitoba complain because hundreds of employees will have to move to another province if they want to continue working.

We have the same thing in the western provinces. In British Columbia people complain about that situation. In the fishing industry, for instance, in business, in the lumber industry, one runs into economic difficulties called regional disparities.

Mr. Chairman, all those regional disparities are related to a single problem: the Canadian economic problem. That is why, following the June 25 election, the future Minister of Regional Development stated categorically on television that, at all cost, the government would have to make a comprehensive study of what economic reforms should be made in Canada. This is the case not only in our region, but all over Canada.

It should be borne in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the minister was speaking about winter works being replaced by retraining courses with a view to giving more education to our people, our unemployed and our younger people, which will enable them to acquire knowledge that will eventually assist them in finding employment. But the fact remains that, after studies lasting up to three years, depending on the retraining courses, they are not in a better position to find jobs.

The unemployed who are over 50 are not eligible to go to those schools as they are considered too old. What measures can be taken to assist these people?

• (9:30 p.m.)

At this very moment, Mr. Chairman, there are over 80,000 unemployed in Montreal alone which is equivalent to practically one quarter of the unemployed in Canada. To these people will be suggested that they register for retraining during the winter. In fact, the present system consists in having the uneducated unemployed become educated unemployed. When people have finished their 10th, 11th and even 12th grade, they are told: "We do not have any work".

In the meantime, the Minister of Labour is at grips with management on the one hand and workers on the other hand. In addition to that situation which affects the labour world everywhere in Canada, and more particularly in Quebec, the minister has to face arguments of all kinds, right and left. We hear about strikes, the postmen's strike, the longshoremen's strike, the teachers' strike, the students' strike. Why do these strikes exist?

When somebody finally proves to me that in Canada a strike has solved a labour problem, then I will believe in the efficiency of the strike. But all the strikes which I have witnessed in Canada were settled by some agreement, which formed the basis of the next strike on expiry of the collective agreement. It has always been the same thing.

I see the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development who was, I think president of the C.N.T.U. nineteen years ago, during that famous strike called the Asbestos "grève de la matraque". Twenty years later, are the workers treated any better? Let us go to Asbestos and see, let us talk to the workers in Asbestos. Blood was running in the streets. Did it change the system? This is why I find it indecent for some workers to rouse other workers against management, when these leaders should act as peace-makers between labour and management. They should be goodwill ambassadors, not distributors of boxing gloves or fomenters of hate. The workers need the employers just as the employers need the workers.

I heard earlier the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggest his famous solution. He always asks for the same thing: a minimum wage of $1.75 an hour and seven days of leave with pay. He would prefer eight or nine days of leave with pay; he would not object to one day a month which would mean 12 days of paid holidays and shorter working week. They feel sure that this is the answer. There are people working in small restaurants, for instance, who earn $30 or $35 a week. Try to pay them $1.75 an hour, and the boss or the little restaurant owner will end up bankrupt. We know that some industries cannot pay that kind of wage, because as soon as the wages would go up, it would trigger an increase in the cost of living. In fact, salaries go into the cost price of goods and services. This is what people do not understand. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is completely at sea. If we increase salaries, up go the prices; but reduce the working hours and then increase productivity, nobody can make head or tails of that.

A Chinese might understand the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but no Canadian would.

On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, when I was listening to the hon. member's speech I was reminded of the late Clement Attlee and of his speeches of 20 years ago, as well as of the speeches of the Right Honourable Harold Wilson, Prime Minister of England, when both gentlemen sat on the opposition benches. But, when they came into power, they did exactly the opposite of what they had been preaching.

To realize that, let us take the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to England tomorrow morning, to show him at close range the magnificent achievements of State socialism, in England, in every field. Financially, Mr. Chairman, England has gone to the dogs. Why? Because of a mad system similar to our own. The Liberals agree with me. They know that our system is wacky. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the Minister of Labour know it.

An hon. Member: A gang of madmen.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, and some people go a little further, they say we are ruled by the most outstanding of those madmen. What are we to do?

Mr. Chairman, the day after the election I was listening to the comments of two union leaders, Mr. Marcel Pépin, president of the C.N.T.U. and Mr. Louis Laberge, president of the F.T.Q. They stated that all those who had voted against the New Democratic Party were idiots. What did Mr. Louis Laberge ask before the elections? He asked the workers of Quebec to vote for the New Democratic Party but they did not listen to him, because they did not take him seriously. We saw Mr. Marcel Pépin, on television on election night; we often see him there. He looks like a regular guardian angel; he is a mealy-mouthed type, and is as quiet as they come. He reminds me of a monkey that would have escaped from the Granby zoo, or something like that. And what is his program? Stir up the workers against the employers, nothing else. A distributor of boxing gloves.

Mr. Chairman, in every socialist country throughout the world, when the government fell into the hands of union leaders trouble began. I know that from experience. I have been in Russia, in Czechoslovakia and in other socialist countries. Go to England and you will see the same thing. Those at the helm are former union leaders who used to say that power should belong to the workers. Theoretically it does belong to them now, but all they get is a kick in the pants, because they are not the real rulers.

Recently, in Czechoslovakia, students had led the country on the road to socialism. Now, the people are trying to get rid of it but they cannot since the U.S.S.R. who is practically next door, keeps them under her thumb and they can neither budge, move forward, nor shake themselves free. Such are, Mr. Chairman, the advantages of socialism.

On the day when people like Messrs. Marcel Pépin and Louis Laberge have any political power, we will witness here the same things that are happening now in England.

There is no need to go that far. In our own country, Canada, did not the New Democratic party, successor to the C.C.F. party, hold office in Saskatchewan during 17 years? With what results? It is the only province from which the people migrated to the other provinces. They went to work in Alberta and British Columbia to pay Saskatchewan's socialist taxes. In fact, there was no work to be had in that province.

And that is not the worst, Mr. Chairman. The provinces of Manitoba and Alberta spent millions of dollars to prevent rats from Saskatchewan from eating up their crops. These are not tales, but facts. I do not lie; it is the gospel truth.

This being so, would we let men like Mr. Pépin and Mr. Laberge guide us and direct us towards that type of system?

Mr. Chairman, I am not against unions, far from it. I am entirely in favour of trade unions but only those where workers control their own business and are not told what to do, as if they were children. That is exactly what is happening now.

When Mr. Laberge asked Quebeckers to vote for the New Democratic party, did they comply? Let us not be funny! They would rather vote for my hon. friend, the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development.

In the city of Montreal, that party spared no effort. They were quite sure they would take about ten ridings. But they did not win a single one. So much the better! However, they have the comfort of knowing that the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) once belonged to their group. The hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development at one time was flirting with them. The hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) had connections with them for many years. Therefore, the members of the New Democratic party feel a little bit at ease with the present government or, at least, with the leaders of the present government.

All this, Mr. Chairman, to say that we must make some improvement. I am all for respecting labour unions. But let us first of all respect the workers. That workers should unite to study together those problems they have in common, I agree with that. I am also in favour of discussions between management and labour. But whenever a labour leader raises an almost unsurmountable barrier between the workers and the management, he is then abusing his authority. He is not upholding and serving the best interests of the Canadian workers, because employers as well as workers are human beings.

It is possible for these people to discuss. I am myself an employer. There was a strike in my establishment. What did it settle? Nothing, like I said at the beginning of my remarks.

I have yet to see a strike that will settle labour problems. In Quebec, some strikes have been going on for a long time. What will they achieve? Employees of the Quebec Liquor Control Board have been on strike for five months. What does it amount to? For the first few weeks, it is great. You are ready for anything. At the end of five months, Mr. Chairman, if the employee does not realize the situation, go and see his wife and children; they realize it. And yet when these workers go back to work, they will find no great improvement in their working conditions. However, they will have gone into debt for perhaps five or ten years and will have to go to finance companies and ask for credit at the corner store and everywhere in order to manage and make ends meet; but they will not be able to.

Mr. Chairman, problems are not solved by strikes. When my colleague the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Dionne) spoke of labour matters this afternoon, he knew what he was talking about, because he is a former union president. He did not organize strikes, but he was the leader of a group of hard workers and, at the same time, he met with management in order to act as liaison between the two groups and bring about an understanding. I think in this respect he could give a few very useful lessons to union leaders today. Even my hon. friend the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development should have known the hon. member for Kamouraska twenty years ago; he would never have had anything to do with the Asbestos strike.

Mr. Chairman, I do not say that all present union leaders are wrong. However, most of them, the ones we constantly see on television, are always against everything. I sometimes wonder what prevents them, since we live in a free country, from setting up industries, a steel mill, for example, from becoming employers and treating their employees according to the views they now express or as they say workers should be treated. What is preventing them from setting up companies and becoming employers? But that is not what they are looking for.

Instead of trying to create something, they try to demolish, to destroy what others have built. They tell the employers what to do; they always talk on behalf of 125,000, 132,000 or 134,000 members and they are sure of them because on television at least they have real power. Then there are politicians who are afraid. Mr. Chairman, you would not believe it. They are afraid to lose votes, they are afraid to lose elections. That is why today there are so many abuses in the field of labour and management relations; it is because politicians do not have the courage to assume their responsibilities. The politicians were afraid when they should have stood firm, when they should have stated the facts, when they should have been frank with the population, the workers, the lumbermen, the people as a whole. If they had done all that, there would be fewer strikes today.

In the field of labour in Quebec, people blame the students because they stage sit ins, they argue, they occupy buildings. It must be noted, Mr. Chairman—I call the Prime Minister's attention to that—that their own professors showed them the way two or three years ago when they attacked the school board, held demonstrations against the provincial government or against the administration of this college or that university. You set a bad example and then you blame the students for following it.

The parents who deplore such things are in the same situation. The Liquor Control Board employees are on strike, and there was a strike of postal employees! During the latter strike, there were threats against the Prime Minister, the government, and then the Canadian public to deprive them of the postal service as long as they felt like it. The strike has been settled, but who pays for it? The workers who went on strike gained something. But today, it is the public in general that is paying for the increased postage stamp prices, for the transportation cost of the mail. It is paying a rather a heavy price for the postal employees as well as the famous strike of the Montreal dockers.

This does not mean, Mr. Chairman, that longshoremen, postal employees and so on do not deserve a better income—I do not say an increased salary but an increased income. As long as we continue to increase income merely through salary increases which are part of the cost of goods, we shall always face the same problems. We shall be running in a circle, struggling in a strait jacket. And what are the Créditistes suggesting? They suggest to increase the income, but in such a way that the increase will not be a part of the cost of goods. And how can we achieve this?

Let us not study my statistics but those of the federal government which indicate that this year the national production of the Canadian labour force amounted to $67 billion. The total income of the members, the salary of my friend, the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, my salary, the profits of all the business people in Canada, and all the other incomes put together, will amount to $48 billion. The government then warns us by saying: Productivity will increase by about 5 or 6 per cent per year and therefore the salaries must not be increased by more than 5 or 6 per cent.

Let us say, for example, that our production will amount to $70 billion next year. With a yearly increase of 6 per cent, that would mean a production of $74,200 million. It is an increase of $4,200 million of new production, and there is no need of increasing our income by more than 6 per cent a year. Let us say, for example, that our revenues amount to $50 billion; with a 6 per cent increase, that means $3 billion. How can we, Mr. Chairman, purchase $4,200 million of new production with $3 billion of new income? That is the problem. So we say that the difference between the two can be used to increase the income of all Canadian citizens, without that coming into the prices. We are right, and the minister knows it.

According to the facts, there is now a difference of $20 billion with regard to the economic operations of 1967-68 alone. For $20 billion of production, there is no corresponding purchasing power, and $48 billion is purchased with the national revenue. This $20 billion production is not sold because we do not have the revenue to purchase it. What does that mean? Mr. Chairman, the Bank of Canada could create, in figures, about $1,000 per capita if the government of Canada gave the order to do so and to distribute the money to every Canadian citizen, without creating inflation, without this being included in the costs of goods, without increasing the cost of services. Then, we would achieve an economic balance which would give citizens a purchasing power enabling them to purchase products which exist.

We do not know what to do with our products, and the unemployed in Montreal need them. Why can they not buy them? For lack of purchasing power. The minister knows that. The number of our unemployed will increase because of automation. What is the government's solution in the face of automation? No solution. So, unemployment takes over. But what do we advocate?

In so far as machines, automation, science, progress and knowledge are being used to speed up production and to replace man at work, let us establish a system thanks to which Canadian men, women and children will have an income that will allow them to buy the products of automation, and of machines. This is not inflation. This is balance, common sense and logic.

The 86,000 unemployed of Montreal who earned maybe $100, $125, $130 a week, while to-day they get only $30, $33 or $36 as unemployment benefits, are out of work. Why? Because there is a superabundance of products and the factories no longer need their workers. When there is overproduction, factories close down. If it is true that the unemployed is laid off because of overproduction, why is he not given precisely the salary he used to earn when he was at work? Indeed, let us pay him his salary until he finds a job. Products are there, and he only needs purchasing power.

The government does not consider that possibility. It thinks in terms of retraining of manpower and we are back again in the same system, going round and round, without ever finding a way out. It has been suggested that there is one, because the minister was speaking a while ago of the just society. It is all very well to speak of a just society! But in the meanwhile, there are 28,000 families in Montreal on welfare and 86,000 people who draw unemployment insurance. What does it represent? It represents a population of 150,000 to 200,000 persons. Now, if 300,000 or 400,000 persons out of a population of 2 million in the City of Montreal do not have a sufficient purchasing power to buy the necessary products for their subsistence, Mr. Chairman, where are we going with the government of the just society?

That is why we have all these clashes, and they are going to become much more frequent. In fact, we are building a tower of Babel. The only difference with the real Tower of Babel, is that when the people at that time realized that there was confusion, that they could not communicate with or understand one another, they gave up; but we are too stupid, and we go on with the work. It is the only difference.

Mr. Chairman, the problem can be solved. The root of the evil is not in the minister's heart, nor in the heart of the government; Finance is the villain. Let us first put Finance at the service of Canadians. It is up to the government to take it upon itself.

[English]

Mr. Sulatycky: May I thank you, Mr. Chairman, and the members of the committee for allowing me one minute in which to make my maiden speech in this house. We have heard speeches from members of the opposition dealing with unemployment, the elimination of poverty and regional development, but in some manner they seem to place responsibility for these immense problems on the Minister of Labour. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not appreciate the relationship that these problems have to the minister's department. However, I wish to advise the committee of some important problems that do have direct relationship to the minister, and which may properly be recognized as such by some of the members who have done much of the complaining here today.

Hon. members, as I say, have talked about unemployment, regional disparity and the elimination of poverty. In my constituency, Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of industrial development. Several areas are exporting coal to Japanese markets, markets that we hope to exploit in the near future. However it disturbs me to see that in these areas there is an insufficient supply of labour.

At the same time, Mr. Chairman, I listen to members in this house saying that in other parts of the country people are unemployed. Last week the manager of one of the coal mines in my constituency visited me in Ottawa and told me that he could ship twice as much coal to Japan as he is now shipping if only he had enough labour to bring up the coal from under the ground. This man, Mr. Chairman, is prepared to provide the cost of moving workers from where they presently reside to his area in western Alberta. He is prepared to retrain them to equip them with the skills necessary to engage in the occupation of mining this coal. He is also prepared to provide assistance in the matter of obtaining housing for these workers. Yet as I say, Mr. Chairman, hon. members from other parts of Canada tell us that there is insufficient work in their constituencies.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, particularly on the occasion of his maiden speech, but it is ten o'clock and it is my duty to rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we pass this item. I do not think anybody else wants to speak. The Conservative party is agreeable to this course.

The Chairman: If we have unanimous consent we can agree to the first item and any subsequent items.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think there are others who would hope these estimates might be back some time.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional satnding order 39A deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—QUEBEC—COVERAGE GIVEN TO POLITICAL PARTIES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I shall have to be quick about it because I have only seven minutes to deal with a fairly important matter. On November 7, I put a question to the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier), asking him to explain to us why the C.B.C. had allotted only an hour and 37 minutes to the Ralliement créditiste at the time of its last convention at Sherbrooke, while allotting that same weekend, eight hours and 46 minutes to the Parti québécois.

Later, several similar questions were put to the minister in this house.

It should be noted that the minister attempted twice to shirk his responsibility and to tell the house who is responsible for the C.B.C.

The same thing happened when, on November 7, the member for Lotbinière (Mr. Fortin), put a question to him asking when he intended to set a policy with regard to the allotment of the time on C.B.C. The hon. Secretary of State then told us, in this house, that the C.B.C. was not answerable to the Secretary of State but instead to Parliament. The following day, on November 8, the hon. member for Lotbinière, further to his first question, asked the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is responsible for the C.B.C., whether it is Parliament or the Secretary of State?

The Prime Minister replied, as seen on page 2572:

Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Secretary of State.

Now, it is obvious that the C.B.C. seems to be answerable neither to Parliament nor to the Secretary of State. It seems to act as it sees fit. Indeed, on many occasions—I have proof of this—it has been prodigal with the Liberal party. Besides I have figures here on the allotment of time slots to prove my statement.

The C.B.C. has no definite policy with regard to the allotment of time slots to the various political parties. That is why we will again return to the charge, as long as the hon. Minister, who to my mind is responsible for the C.B.C. has not defined a policy in this regard.

Besides, the matter has already been cleared up by the committee, in the 1966 report concerning the White Paper on broadcasting, where the objectives of radio and television are defined. One of those objectives is to the effect that we wish to express our conviction, and another to the effect that priority of the public sector must be observed; that is one of the supreme and permanent objectives of the new act. We should develop, and not diminish, the effectiveness of the corporation, the main instrument by which our national conscience can be extended and maintained and national unity thereby strengthened.

But in the report on broadcasting, the C.B.C. is asked to promote national unity or, at least, to respect it. That is where the corporation has sinned, has erred, has taken a wrong direction, in that it allowed an hour and thirty seven minutes for the broadcasting of the program of the Ralliement Créditiste, and eight hours and forty six minutes for the broadcasting of a program opposed to national unity.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has not complied with the parliamentary committee report to this end. And the crown corporation has not been brought back to order by the responsible minister.

In the same report, it is pointed out on several occasions, that parliament has never given any guidelines to the C.B.C. with respect to the policy it should follow. But, on the other hand, when I consider the generosity with which the C.B.C. has treated the Liberal party during its convention here in Ottawa, I am amazed. I have in hand a document published by the CTV network—"The English-speaking network of the C.B.C."—about the Liberal convention held on April 4 and 5. Reference is made to the candidates to the leadership who had their publicity paid for out of public funds or moneys. The publication of that document seemed to have been costly; the president, Mr. Charles Templeton, has even his picture on page 3, where he states:

[English]

The Liberal leadership convention should be Canada's most exciting and dramatic event of the year.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the crown corporation has exceeded its right, privileges and duty by publishing at its own expense, with our moneys, the propaganda of a political party.

Along the same line of thought, I have in hand a C.B.C. publication which mentions the number of hours devoted to the convention of the Liberal party from March 31 to April 6 last. The C.B.C., according to its own statistics, has awarded to the Liberal party about eighty hours on the French and English networks.

Now, we are complaining about this state of affairs because we think that such a number of hours awarded to the Liberal party during its last convention—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to allow me two more minutes—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

[English]

I am afraid the hon. member's time has expired.

• (10:10 p.m.)

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): I have been informed that the management of the C.B.C. regards the subject matter of the hon. members question as being of a most serious nature deserving of considerable comment and discussion. It is therefore the intention of the C.B.C. management to discuss fully with hon. members the complex question of programming at the forthcoming appearance before the committee on broadcasting, films and assistance to the arts. The C.B.C. realizes the importance attached to this matter and it is their belief that a committee hearing is the most appropriate place for a full and fair airing of this most important matter.

PENSIONS—CONSIDERATION OF UNIVERSAL PRINCIPLE OF ESCALATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) cannot be here this evening, but I am sure that whichever parliamentary secretary responds to my question will convey my message to him.

On Tuesday, November 19, as recorded in Hansard at page 2912, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he had yet set up in his department a committee or task force to study the whole question of a general application of the principle of escalating pensions that have been put into effect. The minister's reply was in these words:

> Mr. Speaker, as indicated, I believe, earlier this session by the Prime Minister, the whole question of our various welfare programs is under review.

I went on to ask whether the specific question of escalating pensions was included in that review and the minister's reply was:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker, all matters pertaining to our welfare programs are part of the review.

I suppose I should be content with that generally affirmative reply, namely that this matter in which I am deeply interested is being reviewed, but I confess to something less than complete satisfaction with that answer. As I understand it, the review the government is giving to all federal welfare programs is of the kind that considers what programs can be passed on to the provinces and what programs can be dispensed with at this time. I have seen nothing in the references to the review of welfare programs that implies any willingness to extend benefits or provisions. In fact, the classical statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was that we have had enough of this free stuff.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am not satisfied that this very serious matter should be considered as covered because there is a general review of welfare programs. The specific problem I am concerned about, and hon. members must be aware of this, is that with the speed of rising prices and costs, with the growth of affluence that is taking place, there is the danger that people on pensions will become third or fourth class citizens or that they will become people who have no chance to protect themselves against inflation or against the failure of their fixed incomes to enable them to meet the cost of living or to keep up with the rising standard of living.

I hope I have made that case clear with regard to retired civil servants, and I have tried to make it clear with regard to retired C.N.R. employees and various other workers, but it applies to everyone. It applies to people on old age security pensions and people on industrial pensions. These things are relatively recent in our way of life, considering the long haul, and I suggest that unless we look to the future and build into our program adequate provisions for escalation, our pension programs could fall apart.

Another thing that concerns me, bearing in mind that good is frequently the enemy of best, is that a pattern is being established. In a sense it is a good pattern, or I should say that in a sense it is a good principle. I refer to the 2 per cent increase in old age security pensions that is possible, and the same increase that is possible under the Canada Pension Plan. Two or three days ago the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) tabled the Devco report and, lo and behold, we find in there a certain pension arrangement being made for the miners of Cape Breton with a special provision being made for escalating the pensions by not more than 2 per cent per year.

I am in the position of having to welcome, and welcome wholeheartedly, this extension of the principle that pensions already in pay have to be escalated; but I am afraid that if this pattern of 2 per cent escalation, and a fixed 2 per cent, gets much wider, a good principle will be destroyed because of that kind of limitation. We can reach the situation where people's pensions will generally be increased by 2 per cent per year and they will be told that therefore they cannot expect anything more. But 2 per cent does not begin to keep up with the rising cost of living and it does not enable the sector of our society which is retired to keep up with the rising standard of living.

Therefore I am pleading for a study of the whole, broad question. I will fight it on its individual fronts, retired civil servants on pension, old age security pensioners and all the rest, but I plead that somewhere in the government—and I suggest that it be in the Department of National Health and Welfare, or perhaps the Department of Finance if the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance is going to reply—there should be established a special task force or committee to work on this problem. I suggest that it is not good enough just to have it lost somewhere in the general study of welfare programs.

The standard letter being sent out from the Prime Minister's office to people who write in regarding retired civil service pensions, and I have seen it several times, reads in this way:

> The position of persons on pensions and other fixed incomes who have seen their real income diminish with the general increase in costs and prices is a matter of great concern to the government. The government, of course, cannot limit its consideration of this question to the situation of retired public servants, but must be concerned with the broader question of the problems of all pensioners and others living on limited fixed incomes.

I am not satisfied with this letter as an answer to these people, but I underline and endorse wholeheartedly the statement that comes out of the Prime Minister's office that the government must be concerned with the broader question of the problems of pensioners and others living on limited, fixed incomes. Therefore I think the least one should settle for at this stage is a committee or task force that will devote its attention to this problem alone.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to answer this very important question on behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) because of his unavoidable absence. Certainly the matter of improvements in pensions to meet changing circumstances is one which is important to all of us.

I am glad that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) confirmed that a Liberal government established, at the federal level at least, the principle of the automatic escalation of pensions under certain circumstances.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But only by 2 per cent.

Mr. Gray: It seems to me that, contrary to what has been suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, the minister's answer which is to be found in Hansard for November 19, at least in the way I read it, in no way indicated that the review in question is narrowly limited to the areas of concern which the hon. member mentioned. Let us look at what was said. The Minister of National Health and Welfare answered as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, as indicated, I believe, earlier this session by the Prime Minister, the whole question of our various welfare programs is under review.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the following supplementary question:

> Is the particular question of escalating pensions that have been put into effect included in this review?

The minister replied:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker, all matters pertaining to our welfare programs are part of the review.

Mr. Speaker, every measure of social welfare we have today at the federal level was created by Liberal governments, and I am confident that this government will be equally conscious of its responsibilities to the people of Canada.

WATER RESOURCES—ST. MARY'S RIVER—ACTION RESPECTING POLLUTION

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to appear on the late show this evening, with the other hon. gentlemen who are in the chamber at this time. My inquiry put to the Minister of Transport during the question period today was as follows:

> In view of the report of the International Joint Commission on pollution of the St. Mary's river, does the Minister of Transport plan to take any action against the shipowners who are polluting this river by dumping waste into it?

This report which was released last week, on November 12, is a very comprehensive document which outlines the problems of pollution not only in St. Mary's river but in the St. Clair river and in the Detroit river as well. I am especially concerned with the problem of the St. Mary's river because it runs through part of my riding of Algoma. In Algoma one of our main industries is tourism, and places like St. Joseph island and Pine island which are in the flow of the St. Mary's river suffer when the waters become polluted. As a matter of fact, tourism in this area is rapidly accelerating because of an expanding urban population in Sault Ste. Marie which moves out to the rural areas every summer. However, this trend may not continue, as the pollution of the river becomes more intense. No one would want to spend a large amount of money in the purchase of a lot in this beautiful area, and go to the expense of building a summer home on it, only to find sewage, garbage and oil from lake freighters and ocean-going ships washing up on the beach.

This report of the International Joint Commission indicates that the city of Sault Ste. Marie does have an adequate sewage treatment facility and that the industries which have been putting industrial waste into the river are taking steps to correct the pollution which has been caused by them in the past. It seems to me that the Ontario water resources commission is taking positive action by building a new sewage treatment plant in Sault Ste. Marie and by encouraging the offending industries to instal anti-pollution equipment in their plants.

Now it is up to the federal government to control the ships which are dumping garbage into this river. The main problem seems to occur when there is heavy traffic and the boats have to anchor in the channel, or when there is a low hanging fog over the St. Mary's river valley and ships have to anchor overnight. It is during this period of time that the bilges are pumped and sewage as well as other refuse is dumped into the river. I believe the federal government, through its inspectors in the Department of Transport, should carry on a careful surveillance of these vessels during these periods of time.

The Navigable Waters Protection Act is the statute which controls this matter. Section 20 of chapter 193, the pertinent section, reads as follows:

> No person shall throw or deposit, or cause or permit to be thrown or deposited any stone, gravel, earth, cinders, ashes or other material or rubbish liable to sink to the bottom in any navigable non-tidal waters of Canada where there are not at all times at least eight fathoms of water.

It seems to me that this act gives the department the authority to stop offending ships from dumping garbage into this river. I would like to see the minister, armed with this authority, take positive steps to stop this dumping of waste into the St. Mary's river by Great Lakes freighters and by ocean going ships.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) is aware of the problem outlined by the hon. member for Algoma, and I know that I speak for the minister when I say that he is greatly concerned about this matter. In the Navigable Waters Protection Act, chapter 193, sections 19 and 20, it is stated that pollution caused in the manner described by the hon. member is an offence. Enforcement of this section of the act is at the present time the responsibility of the Department of Fisheries.

It is the intention of the Minister of Transport to introduce into the house at an early date amendments to the Canada Shipping Act to correct this situation. These amendments to the act will be enforced by Department of Transport inspectors.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.28 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 22, 1968

The house met at 11 a.m.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

PROVISION FOR CHANGE IN NAME OF RIDING OF WELLINGTON-GREY

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-133, respecting the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the name of the riding I represent from Wellington-Grey to Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Howe: —in order to give the necessary recognition to those parts of four great counties in southwestern Ontario that I have the honour to represent. I agree, Mr. Speaker, that in some areas a four word name may cause a little more confusion than a one or two word name.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO AND NORAD—CONSIDERATION OF COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS AS TO POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question relating to the desire of the members of the standing committee on external affairs and national defence to hold discussions in some depth with the ministers concerned regarding future defence and foreign policy. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will assure the house that before any definite decisions are taken regarding a change in defence policy, specifically with regard to NATO and NORAD, the committee will have an opportunity to consider and to make recommendations on the course of policy.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand there will be a meeting of the committee on December 3 when these questions can be discussed. I would further hope that at some time in parliament, on a supply day or otherwise, we will have an occasion to discuss the whole question of external affairs and defence policies.

As I indicated several times, the government has asked for this review because we want Canada to have the best policy for the times. We do not feel we can find it by any magic process. We can do it only by consultation. I would hope there would be consultation not only of experts but of those particular experts called members of parliament in debate. I still have no idea concerning the timing of this report or at what date it will come forward to the government. Therefore I cannot make any specific commitment as to when that will be debated.

I do want to assure members of this house, however, that we will not reach any policy through a device which has bypassed parliament or indeed public opinion. We do want to arrive at a policy which will represent a good policy for Canada and which will have been discussed at all levels of public opinion.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Why not set aside a day for that in parliament?

Mr. Stanfield: In view of the apparent failure so far to arrange a time convenient to the Minister of National Defence to appear before the committee, could the Prime Minister arrange the earliest possible appearance before the committee of both his colleagues, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, because I understand the members of the committee are particularly anxious to question these ministers on the subject of the Brussels meeting.

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat that December 3 has been set aside and the meeting of the standing committee on external affairs and national defence has been set up. I am quite sure the ministers, if invited, will be delighted to answer questions on any of these subjects.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, may I first say I appreciate the Prime Ministers co-operation with regard to the committee and his colleagues appearing before it to tell the committee what the situation is at present concerning the commitments which have been made at the Brussels meeting. But with regard to the examination in depth of external affairs and defence policy, will the Prime Minister assure the house that every facility will be given so that evidence before this committee can be taken into account and taken advantage of by the government in arriving at a policy in these very important matters which will have such a bearing on the future of our country?

Mr. Trudeau: Indeed I can give that assurance. Such evidence before that committee will be considered as very important by the government. I might say once again that I do not imagine that on December 3 the ministers will be in a position to speculate very much on our future policy. They can report on what happened at Brussels, but on future policy every member of this house and every citizen of this country is authorized to speculate on the general kind of questions we are asking ourselves.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Speculation should be halted. There is too much speculation and not enough fact.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am told there is too much speculation. We happen to believe that thinking is a good thing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I appreciate that observation, but thinking out loud on external affairs is something no Prime Minister should engage in.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): In view of the Prime Minister's willingness to have his colleagues appear before the parliamentary committee on external affairs and national defence, and in view of the likely divergence of views, would he himself be prepared to appear before this committee?

[Translation]

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

Could the Prime Minister tell us if the government intends, once the review has been made, to prepare a White Paper to be placed at the disposal of the committee, which would allow not only for constructive work but would also really help to improve our policy in general?

Mr. Trudeau: That is an excellent suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and I will certainly take it into consideration.

As for my appearing before such a committee, as the hon. member has just asked—

[English]

I must ask how hon. members could expect me to go before that committee and not think aloud, as I am told by the right hon. gentleman I should not do?

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, consistent with the search for facts in this important matter of arriving at defence policy, will the government do everything it can to indicate to the Canadian people and the world at large, at the earliest possible time, which of the public stances which the government exhibits from time to time truly represents the Canadian policy, and whether all the assurances, whatever they may be, which are made from time to time to our allies are in fact worth face value?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this question, and I want to explain to the house that it is because of constant questioning on the hypothetical results of the review which is under way that I am forced to make all these statements and think out loud. If hon. members will stop asking me about the eventual results of the review which is still under way, then they will have no speculations.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to my right hon. friend that we would be quite happy if we were sure he was thinking before he spoke out loud.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest we now go on to another subject.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REPORTED INTENTION TO ESTABLISH OUTSIDE ADVISORY GROUPS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which he may or may not have anticipated today. I am always pleased when the Prime Minister or any member on the other side of the house is thinking, whether it is out loud or not. I should like to ask him whether he has given consideration to the question I referred to yesterday. His memory seemed not to have done him a good turn, in that he indicated he had forgotten the details of the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has had the floor for a while but has not asked his question as yet.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, my question, as reported at page 2574 of Hansard for November 8, was:

> In view of the potentially serious effect in our system of parliamentary government of the right hon. gentleman's decision to establish a series of regional offices and a body of 150 extraparliamentary advisers, would the Prime Minister at an early date make a statement on motions as to the duties and responsibilities of these new groups?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel I should make a statement on motions, but I could by way of a short explanation indicate that these regional desk officers are in no way intended to compete with members of parliament. They are merely to provide an additional source of information to me as to what might be happening in various parts of the country. These persons in the regional desks have no legislative role and therefore they are perhaps more free to move around the country and to have access to people at times when members of parliament are held here in Ottawa. These desk officers will also be processing information from members of parliament to give to me. Therefore there is no intention to compete but merely to supplement members of parliament. There could be, of course, no competition anyhow because members of parliament are so far ahead in the political game.

As to the other part of the question, these people who have volunteered to take part in the process of constant evaluation of the performance of the government represent persons who have offered to let my office know of their assessment of the reaction in various parts of the country to things happening in Ottawa. Here again, of course, there can be no competition with members of parliament.

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If I understood the Prime Minister correctly, he said at one point that the regional desks would be used to follow up information coming from, among others, members of parliament. Does this suggest that members of parliament, whether on the government side of the house or on this side, will have less access to the Prime Minister? I am thinking particularly of members on the opposite side of the house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether the people who are to evaluate the government's performance—people outside parliament, I gather—are to be paid for their functions, or is this a purely voluntary effort?

Mr. Trudeau: It is a voluntary effort, Mr. Speaker. I could say that as far as the desks are concerned, members of parliament who want to see me, and do not have time to wait for the appointment I could give them, would be invited to see regional desk officers.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the information that is going to be provided to the Prime Minister will be public. Will other members of parliament have it available to them?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I should have thought that the Conservative party would be able to find a few volunteers of its own.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in the same connection. Did the Prime Minister receive permission through the usual, proper channels to locate his aides and other ministerial aides in the diplomatic gallery, taking notes all week?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is brought on by the reference to the Conservatives seeking volunteers. I ask the Prime Minister whether he is aware of the paid advertisements in the local papers last week in which the hon. member for Ontario, a member of the Liberal party, was seeking volunteers.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ATTENDANCE AT CONFERENCE OF OBSERVERS FROM OPPOSITION PARTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the importance of the coming federal-provincial conference, has the right hon. Prime Minister or the government reached a decision on allowing the representatives of the parties of the opposition to attend the conference as observers?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I had the opportunity of mentioning last week that we intended to allot a certain number of seats to the parties of the opposition who could delegate observers to the conference. Obviously, this is what I suggested to the provinces, and I have every reason to believe that this sort of arrangement would be agreeable to everyone.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON COSTS AND PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. When may we expect the government to present the white paper on costs and prices about which the Prime Minister was asked questions in the house on October 18? The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the debate in this house on November 8, said it would be forthcoming shortly. I wonder whether the Prime Minister can advise when it will be available.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having told me he would ask this question. I looked up the speech by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and found it to be a remarkably good speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: He did say that the white paper would be available later this year. It is still our expectation that it will be available before the end of this year.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister advise how much later?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, there are about five weeks left.

[Mr. Caouette.]

PUBLIC SERVICE

REPORTED RECRUITING OF FRENCH CITIZENS FOR CANADIAN PUBLIC SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would the Prime Minister tell the house about the recruiting campaign going on in France under the leadership of Mr. Jules Nadon, an official of the federal Public Service Commission and former member of Treasury Board, to bring French citizens into the Canadian public service? What is the reason for this action? Are there not sufficient people in Canada to fill the positions? And is it a fact, as reported, that the reason for this is that the government wants to learn the French government's administrative techniques and experience?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This matter may be of importance but I doubt whether it is the type of question which should qualify for the question period. I think it ought to be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We must wait for weeks for answers there. It may be embarrassing.

HOUSING

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL LOANS TO COMBAT UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

Since the winter works program has been discontinued, would the hon. minister, in order to fight unemployment, allow additional loans above the 6,000 already granted to contractors for the building of houses next winter?

Mr. Speaker: I think the question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Laprise: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT RESPECTING INDIAN HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Could he or the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development make a statement about the liberalization of government policy with respect to the deplorable situation that now exists in relation to native Indian housing?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I missed the first part of the question. If it is related to housing and has to do with the department of Indian affairs, I will ask the two minister who are concerned with housing and with Indian affairs about the matter. I shall consult them.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is scheduled this week end to attend the annual convention of the native brotherhood of British Columbia being held in Victoria, there is an element of urgency in this, and I thought it might be appropriate for such a statement to be made. I wonder if there might be arrangements for such a statement to be made in conjunction with the speech the minister is to make there.

GRAIN

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF SPECIAL QUOTA ON DURUM WHEAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, may I direct my question to the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt. Since the special quota for Durum wheat is to expire in a few days, and since many farmers in western Canada have not yet had an opportunity to deliver their Durum wheat because of a shortage of box cars, is consideration being given to extending the special quota so that all farmers will be treated equitably?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the special quota on Durum will be discontinued effective November 29. The Canadian Wheat Board has given notice of its intention to discontinue the quota on the agreed date. The board believes that, generally, equitable treatment has been given, and because of the very large deliveries which have taken place this year, 15 million bushels as against 10 million bushels for a similar period last year, it will not be possible to extend the quota. Of course Durum may be delivered on the regular quota after that date.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since by now he has probably studied the report of the royal commission on security, could he advise us when that part of the report it is considered prudent for the public to know about may be made available to the house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, officials are now in the process of preparing that part of the report which could be tabled in the house. It has not yet been completed.

COMMUNICATIONS

REPORTED AGREEMENT AMONG FRANCE, GERMANY AND QUEBEC ON SPACE SATELLITE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister arises out of yesterday's report that France, Germany and the province of Quebec are to enter into a tripartite arrangement to establish an international communications space satellite. Is this arrangement to be covered by the government of Canada's diplomatic aegis, or will it be carried out some other way?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, may I answer that question. There is no basis to such a report.

Mr. Schreyer: I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. I should like the Postmaster General to indicate whether it is not a fact that the province of Quebec is building a ground receiving station for reception from the proposed space communication satellite.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that the question suggests its own answer, is argumentative, and cannot be asked in this way.

[Later:]

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General who seems more modest than his colleagues about the distribution of his speeches. Would he be good enough to make available to members of this house the address he gave on the communications department, of which he has been ordained the head.

Mr. Kierans: Yes, I would be pleased to do that.

TRANSPORT

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAUSEWAY—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF INTENTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): I have a question for the Prime Minister. A few weeks ago the Prime Minister met with the government of Prince Edward Island with regard to the construction of the Northumberland strait crossing. I believe at that time he assured the premier a definite answer would be available around the middle of this month. Since an answer is not available as yet, by the 22nd, can the Prime Minister indicate the reason for the delay on this important project?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): It is a very difficult decision to make, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I wonder if the Prime Minister can give the house any definite indication as to when we may receive a definite answer on this project?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes. We will have overcome the difficult very soon.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): How soon?

FINANCE

CANADIAN ASSISTANCE TO FRANCE IN MONETARY CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Finance if he is able to tell the house whether Canada has been requested to make any commitment relating to the support of the franc, "libre" or otherwise, and if so what that commitment is. I understand this is the day when the Minister of Finance should be in the house. Since he is not here, I assume it is proper to ask the Acting Minister of Finance today.

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, since the discussions are still continuing it would be inappropriate for me to give a definitive answer now.

An hon. Member: You don't know.

[Mr. Macquarrie.]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question. In view of the report that a $2 billion fund in non-franc currency is being set up, can the minister tell the house whether Canada has agreed to contribute to this fund?

Mr. Drury: I think the answer is the same.

AIRPORTS

WINNIPEG—REPORTED LACK OF HANGAR SPACE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence, but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. Is the minister aware of the lack of hangar space at Winnipeg international airport for private and regional operators, and will the minister look into the possibility of providing some space at the armed forces hangars for these people this winter?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have an impression that this is a repetition of a question asked yesterday by the hon. member. The suggestion at that time was that perhaps it might be discussed at the time of adjournment.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF PUBLIC ADVISORY BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Last Friday the Minister of Transport undertook to reply to a question of mine with regard to the rising toll of traffic accidents across Canada, and to indicate what the situation was with regard to the establishment of the long awaited public safety board. I wonder if the minister could reply today.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As my hon. friend is aware, the provincial ministers directly concerned with traffic safety met in Regina a few days ago. At that time they agreed they would like to join with the federal government in a program which would involve co-ordination and co-operation between the provincial and federal governments. It was suggested also that a conference be held which would include participation by federal and provincial ministers, and this is planned for early next year. There will be a number of items on the agenda of that conference, and I intend to ask that one of those items be the establishment of the advisory board. I understand there is no objection to this, so we should be able to proceed with it almost immediately after that conference early in the new year.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I have a supplementary question. I wonder whether the Minister of Transport could tell the house if at that conference a discussion will take place on changes in the methods of assisting municipalities in connection with railway grade crossings.

Mr. Hellyer: I would not like to speculate on all the items that might be on the agenda. However, this one relates to a highly important aspect of highway safety, so I would expect the answer would be in the affirmative.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF COMMISSION RESEARCH MATERIAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): I have a question for the Prime Minister. I understood the government was investigating the possibility of publishing the research papers prepared for the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. Would the Prime Minister find out if these documents are available, since possibly they would assist us in a consideration of the official languages bill?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I will inquire. I know the commission did intend to publish certain of their research papers, and of course the decision as to which to publish, and when, is in their hands.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): May I ask a supplementary question. Some weeks ago the Prime Minister and I had a discussion in the house about the next volume of the report of this commission which was just about to be published. Since there is still no sign of that volume, I wonder how soon all the report is going to be available, since much of it has already appeared in the public press.

Mr. Trudeau: The answer is that it is the commission that will decide when to publish. My understanding again is that when this pirated version appeared, the report itself was not quite complete and it would be some time before it was published.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell us whether the government inquiry regarding the premature publication of the third volume of the Gagnon-Dunton commission report has been made, and what are the results?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question is not the premature publication of the third volume of the report; rather, if I am not mistaken, it is about research made in a particular field for the publication of that report. I will wait until I receive a report on that investigation from the Solicitor General who, as hon. members know, is not in Ottawa this week.

[English]

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the Prime Minister intends to give us a daily report on the whereabouts of the Solicitor General.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question with regard to the publication of the report of the B and B commission. I wonder whether the Prime Minister will assure hon. members of this house that that publication will be made available prior to the federal-provincial conference in December.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give that assurance. I do not control the commission. However, they will have been made aware of the representations of the hon. member.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question which I ask because of some confusion that has been created as a result of the exchanges. Is the Prime Minister suggesting that the report in respect to which the Renaud research was published in La Presse will be the next volume, or is it not true that the next volume will deal with education and that the other report is the third volume that is due quite a number of months hence?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, that is also my understanding. I was just trying to reformulate the question which was about the third volume, and I was indicating to the hon.

member that he was probably referring to the research piece, not to the volume itself.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

A few days ago the Prime Minister stated that he would hold an investigation to find out where the leaks occurred with regard to the publications of the commission on bilingualism and biculturalism.

[English]

HOUSING

REPORTED CONSIDERATION OF INCREASE IN MORTGAGE LIMIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Cullen (Sarnia): I have a question for the Minister of Transport arising out of a Canadian Press report that the government of representatives of the federal housing authority were considering a suggestion that the limit on mortgages be raised from $18,000 to $35,000. I ask if this is so, how will it cure the problem of those in the $6,000 to $9,000 income range?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the minister might answer the first part of the question. I would think the second part of the question would be unacceptable.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): In answer to the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, I can only say that every conceivable device is being considered to try to extend to Canadians the maximum range of choice in housing and the maximum financial arrangements to permit them to rent or buy the homes of their choice.

Mr. Cullen: I have a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister is also going to give consideration to increasing the loan limit for refurbishing a home?

Mr. Hellyer: That was covered in my first answer, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): On October 30 the house passed an order for the production of papers which I had requested concerning the British Columbia Hydro rail route from the Matsqui area to Roberts Bank. I wonder if the President of the Privy Council might look into the reason for the delay in these documents becoming available.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I would be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AID

NIGERIA—INQUIRY AS TO REPORT BY CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARIANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister whether he has received or studied a report which would have been supplied by the two Canadian members who went on a visit to Biafra and Nigeria and whether it is his intention to implement their recommendations?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet met those parliamentarians; I hope to meet them soon.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NEWFOUNDLAND—UNEMPLOYMENT RESULTING FROM FISH PLANT CLOSING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): My question is for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the emergency which has arisen in northwest Newfoundland as a result of the closing of a fish plant, thus causing unemployment for some 500 people, would somebody on that side do some thinking to see if we can find a solution to this emergency?

GRAIN

SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED INADEQUATE DRYING FACILITIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture, but in his absence and the absence of both the first and second acting ministers I wish to direct my question to the Prime Minister.

Since the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture has taken serious issue with statements made by the minister in this house regarding the adequacy of grain drying facilities to meet the serious situation in Saskatchewan, and in view of reports by the Saskatchewan department of agriculture about the complete inadequacy of these facilities—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member cannot make a speech; he should ask a question.

Mr. Burton: —would the Prime Minister ask the Minister of Agriculture to give further consideration to this serious problem in order to determine what measures should be taken to deal with it?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

RECLASSIFICATION OF SURPLUS RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In view of the assurances given to the Public Service Alliance of Canada that there would be no change in the status of surplus railway mail clerks until the matter could be settled through collective bargaining, could the minister advise the house why the Post Office Department has begun a reclassification of all surplus railway mail clerks without any prior consultation whatsoever with the bargaining agent for the respective employees?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Speaker, on a point of privilege, I suggest very respectfully that these mail clerks are being reclassified, and that the matter is of utmost urgency to them and should be raised today, not at some later date. I would ask that the minister be allowed to answer.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Témiscamingue.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED LAY-OFF OF SECURITY STAFF, ATLANTIC REGION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport.

The Police Association of the Atlantic area has been informed by the Canadian National Railways of the lay-off recently of about 20 constables. Is the minister aware of the situation and can he tell us what steps his department intends to take so as to avoid the dismissal of these constables in the Atlantic area?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and I have asked the Canadian National Railways for a full report in respect to it.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

PROTECTION OF TELEVISION VIEWERS AGAINST RADIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, since he has been attending so dutifully today and has not had a question directed his way. Could the minister inform the house whether he is considering a bill similar to the one recently passed in the United States to protect television viewers against radiation?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wonder whether this is a matter of such urgency that it should be asked at this time. It seems to me that the hon. member should put the question on the order paper.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

INQUIRY AS TO RETROACTIVE PAY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Minister of National Defence. The minister indicated in mid-October that a statement would be made on the armed forces salary scale about mid-November. I should like to ask the acting minister when the statement will be made.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I understand that an announcement will be made on Monday.

TRANSPORT

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON FERRY SERVICE, SAINT JOHN, N.B.-DIGBY, N.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Would the minister make a statement this afternoon when the transport estimates are brought before the house in regard to the Digby-Saint John ferry, other than saying that he would assure his hon. friends—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has brought the attention of the house to the fact that the transport estimates will be under consideration later today, and this question should be asked then.

FARM MACHINERY

TRACTORS—REPORTED SAVING ON IMPORTS FROM U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Howe (Wellington-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question that should be addressed either to the Minister of Agriculture or to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but in their absence, and since farmers are consumers in Canada, I will address the question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. May I ask the minister whether his attention has been drawn to a news report appearing in today's paper which indicates that seven farmers went to England and purchased tractors, brought them back to Canada and realized a saving of $20,000?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have some doubt whether this question is in order. The hon. member is asking whether this report has been noted by the minister, and that in itself does not justify the question. If the hon. member sees an urgency to the matter which is not apparent to the Chair, then he can give me notice that he wishes to discuss it at the ten o'clock adjournment.

Mr. Howe: With respect, Mr. Speaker, a survey is, after all, being conducted by the Department of Agriculture of the cost of agricultural machinery in Canada. I think this is a very urgent question at this time, and a news report about it has been published.

Mr. Speaker: The purpose of the standing order is to provide that where there is disagreement as to urgency and an hon. member feels that the matter is urgent, the question can be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Howe: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is not in order, so there can be no supplementary.

[Mr. Comeau.]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of his statement yesterday that the Solicitor General had been tracked down, could the Prime Minister give us a progress report on the activities of the Solicitor General?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question period has expired.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Faulkner in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

1. Departmental administration, $8,292,200.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply, revised estimates of the Department of Transport for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969. Vote No. 1 will be found at page 496 of the blue book; the details thereof are listed at page 501. Shall the item carry?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Chairman, in presenting the estimates of the Department of Transport I feel it might be helpful and useful to take a few minutes of the committees' time to give hon. members some general explanations in respect of the more important areas of activity in the Department of Transport, particularly in relation to where substantial expenditures are necessary. I propose to deal with the main estimates of the department first and to confine my remarks to them.

It will be of interest to note that the form of the estimates for 1968-69 is somewhat different from that of previous years. One of the recommendations of the Glassco commission, as approved by the government, was that:

> —where appropriate (i.e. where revenues are sufficiently large in proportion to the total vote to justify it) revenues be offset against related expenditures in individual votes: in such cases votes to be shown in the estimates and controlled on a net basis.

• (11:50 a.m.)

After serious consideration of the many factors involved, not the least of which was that in 1968-69 we expect departmental revenues to exceed $48 million, we decided that we had reached the point where we should give effect to this recommendation. You will note, therefore, that votes 5 and 30 which provide funds for administration, operation and maintenance of marine services and of air services, respectively, have this year been treated on the basis suggested by the Glassco commission, i.e., with the applicable revenues deducted from the gross total of expenditures to arrive at the net amount to be voted. We believe this manner of treatment of departmental revenues will be more informative.

In the year when such a change is first made it results in showing amounts which are not strictly comparable with those of the previous year when voting was on a gross basis, but this is only a one-time effect and will not be a factor in future years. We considered the possibility of showing the revenues of the previous year in the new manner in order to provide an exact basis of comparison, but this was found to be impossible because the previous year's figures would then no longer have indicated the amount actually voted by parliament. Nevertheless, if reference is made to the details of the estimates it will be found that there are listed, by sub-votes, both the revenues and expenditures of the past three years.

In dealing first with the marine services of the department I would like to report that the Canadian Coast Guard is involved in the annual sealift of northern supplies for government posts and installations in the Arctic. The tonnage involved is approximately 100,000, of which something less than half is for military installations. It is departmental policy that as far as possible supplies for the Arctic shall be carried by chartered ships with coast guard support confined to icebreaker and escort, and the provision of specialized landing craft which are not commercially available. An increase in estimated expenditure over last year is attributed to increases in charter rates, costs of stevedoring services and ship operating costs generally as well as some increase in the scope of our icebreaker activities.

Cost of operating coast guard lights and buoy tenders have risen some $74,000, due entirely to increases in wages, materials and supplies. The increase has been modified slightly by the substitution of one ship, the C.C.G.S. Bernier for two old vessels in the Quebec agency.

The Canadian organization for marine search and rescue is based on the use of all available resources under the general co-ordination of the Department of National Defence. In practice, the Department of Transport has a major role in marine search and rescue, as it has the largest fleet of government vessels, through its responsibility for the provision of specialized craft and through the use of the D.O.T. communications network. An increase in estimates for this activity of some $200,000 is accounted for in part by an increasing commitment as a result of the larger number of small pleasure craft in our waters and greater public demand for this service as well as the first steps toward the acquisition of new craft under a program announced earlier.

The increase also reflects the acquisition of a hovercraft for operation on the west coast.

The department operates a service for the support of shipping in the gulf and lower St. Lawrence in winter consisting of aerial ice reconnaissance for the acquisition of information about ice conditions and an ice office in Halifax for interpretation and forecasting operated by the meteorological branch, ice information offices for the provision of information and advice to ships, and icebreaking. In addition, icebreaking is done in coastal fishing harbours, in support of some ferries and for flood control in the St. Lawrence between Quebec and Montreal. In general it is the department's policy to break ice only in the main shipping routes and approach channels, the responsibility for basins and water alongside wharves being left to their owners, except in the case of government-owned wharves.

Cost increases are partly due to general increases in the cost of ship operations, and partly the result of a growing demand for icebreaking brought about by the realization that the movement of commerce through our ice-congested waters in winter is perfectly practicable with the use of suitably strengthened merchant ships. The increase in winter trade in our waters has been spectacular in the last few years, and although it has slowed down it is expected that the long term trend will be toward continued increase.

Canada has responsibility by international agreement for the operation of an ocean weather station in the Pacific and this is undertaken by two coast guard vessels. The estimate for the operation of these craft shows a reduction from last year which was a transitional period between the use of old vessels and their replacement by the larger modern vessels Vancouver and Quadra. During the period of transition it was necessary to keep all four ships in operation while the new ones did trials and work-ups, but this period is over and the older ships are being disposed of.

The department maintains a college for the training of junior officers for the Canadian Coast Guard. The college is also to be used for refresher and specialist training of older officers. The college now inhabits converted temporary wartime buildings formerly occupied by the navy at Point Edward, Nova Scotia, and the estimates include a provision toward the acquisition of a permanent establishment.

Improvements recently introduced in the marine traffic control system in the St. Lawrence river below Montreal will be assessed during the coming year and, except for some improvement in the radio communication facilities, 1969 will be considered as a period of consolidation for both equipment and procedures. Traffic control, with its attendant information services, will continue to extend gradually westward during the coming years in accordance with previously announced plans for an integrated system throughout the St. Lawrence waterway. Improvements in up to date methods of data collection, transmission, display and dissemination will continue in marine information services.

The widening of the ship channel through lake St. Peter began in 1969. When this project is completed, the minimum width of the channel will be 800 ft. throughout. Widening of this 20-mile long channel will take three years to complete at a cost of $7,500,000. The allotment for 1968-69 is $2 million. A project is at present under way to improve the north channel below Quebec. This is the only remaining section of the St. Lawrence ship channel not dredged to the statutory depth of 35 feet. This north channel work replaces the proposed plan to deepen the south channel in the same region to the same depth of 35 feet. Representations by the Pilots' Association, and a subsequently higher estimated cost to bring the south channel to prescribed standards, were instrumental in postponing the south channel project indefinitely. An amount of $2,139,000 has been allotted to the dredging below Quebec for 1968-69.

In the interest of safe navigation, work continued in 1968 on the removal of a mid-river shoal at Trois-Rivières. The 1968-69 allotment is $2,165,000.

Experimental ice booms and islands were placed in lake St. Peter in the fall of 1967 to develop a means to prevent ice from drifting into the main channel. The success of this experiment to date warrants its continuation in 1968-69. The allotment for 1968 is $525,000, to cover the cost of improving the ice boom system and artificial ice retention islands.

[Mr. Hellyer.]

An amount of $300,000 is provided for the construction of a pilot boat to be based at Prince Rupert where it will replace a wooden boat which has come to the end of its useful life after 35 years.

• (12 noon)

Funds are provided to establish a maritime safety council, which would be a consultative body representative of government, management and labour in the commercial shipping industry, for the purpose of advising the Department of Transport on all matters of safety relating to commercial ships and vessels, at an estimated annual cost of $50,000.

Funds are also provided for the construction of 44-foot shore-based lifeboats, various barges and other small craft; also funds to cover research and development toward the construction of better and more efficient vessels to serve the Canadian public.

To increase safety on the St. Lawrence river and extend the navigation season $1.2 million has been provided for the construction of new offshore piers that will provide navigational lights.

Navigation throughout Canada will benefit from the construction of lighthouse buildings, light towers, fog alarms and fog alarm buildings which, together with the cost of equipment required to service these aids, represent an expenditure of approximately $4.5 million.

There are several items of significance in the air services. They include in the airports activity the takeover from municipal governments of the operation of airports at Saint John, New Brunswick, and House Harbour, Quebec, the complete operation of Goose airport for a full year for the first time, and the opening and operation of the new air terminal at Vancouver international airport which commenced operation in September. In the control of civil aviation funds have been provided for a new flight safety division which will permit a more vigorous compaign on air safety practices and accident prevention.

In air traffic control an accelerated program continues for recruiting and training controllers. Funds for five additional control towers are provided in the estimates and it is planned to provide each air services region with one mobile control tower for temporary control services as the need arises.

Funds for the telecommunications bureau and administration bureau, formerly included in air services accounts, now appear under the Post Office Department in the main estimates and this results in a subsequent net reduction of $3,431,000 in air services expenditures.

In meteorological services additional funds are budgeted for new weather observing programs to be undertaken by contract ($200,000), increasing the number of ice reconnaissance flights ($140,000), and an extended program for fellowships and contracts with universities for research studies ($90,000). The estimates also include necessary funds for the transfer of the annual airlift of supplies for Arctic weather stations from the Canadian armed forces to commercial carriers at a cost of $100,000.

Funds are included for the acquisition and construction of complex facilities to serve the rapid development of air transport. Some of the major projects include the construction of a new area control centre at Vancouver international airport ($1,300,000), and the construction of a low level bridge across the middle arm of the Fraser river to improve access to that airport ($825,000), the start of construction on a second air terminal at Toronto international airport and a substantial program to improve existing terminals at Montreal and Calgary.

Special centre line and touchdown lighting, scheduled for major main line airports over the next five years, will be installed at Montreal and Vancouver international airports, costing $300,000 for each installation. These lighting systems will improve the frequency and safety of landings in very poor weather conditions. Provision is made for a start in the development of a main line airport to serve the Churchill Falls development, for a start in the redevelopment of the airport at Matane, Quebec, and for starts of runway improvements at Fort Chimo, Schefferville, Red Lake, Inuvik and Norman Wells. Experience has shown that work of this nature cannot be completed in one construction season. An amount of $600,000 is provided to acquire land for the development of a satellite airport at Calgary for light aircraft in order to prevent the volume of traffic exceeding the capacity of the main airport serving that city. An amount of $300,000 is also provided for further development of the satellite airport serving Winnipeg.

A number of special projects are planned to advance our techniques in the control of air traffic by the use of radar. These include a secondary surveillance radar system which will greatly enhance the amount of flight information which can be sent electronically from the aircraft to the ground controller ($1,450,000); new techniques will be developed in the display of radar data and its conversion to electronic signals which will be adaptable to computer use ($350,000); and the continuation of improvement of radar displays so that they can be monitored under daylight conditions ($474,000). A program of improving instrument landing systems at major airports to meet new international standards is entering the third year of an eight year $5 million program.

With respect to railway and ferry services the introduction of the new rail car ferry Frederick Carter for the major portion of 1968 will result in a decrease from past years' cost on the Cabot strait ferry service. A new ferry service running between North Sydney, Nova Scotia, and Argentia, Newfoundland, commenced operation on June 14, 1968.

The construction program for terminals and vessels on ferry services has decreased considerably as a result of completion of the main facilities and vessels. The federal government has now taken over direct responsibility for provident fund deficits.

The proposed new road and motor vehicle safety office to be established in the department has been delayed somewhat because of the over-all government financial restrictions. It is expected, however, that the staff for this safety office will be recruited shortly and the office will become operational by the end of 1968. Following formation of the safety office a public advisory board will also be created.

In addition to the estimates of the Department of Transport I am submitting those of the National Harbours Board. The capital expenditures proposed for this agency aggregate $29,172,000, of which $5,022,000 will be financed from its replacement and other funds.

The major items in the construction program to be undertaken by the board contemplate expenditures of $11,394,000 for wharf construction and acquisition, $2,546,000 for shed construction and renovation, $2,390,000 for elevator construction and renovation, $5,800,000 for property acquisitions and site development, $2,235,000 for provision of facilities for container handling, $722,000 for renovation and construction of buildings, $304,000 for paving harbour properties, $340,000 for harbour railway extensions, $155,000 for patrol and work vessels, $2,000,000 for St. Charles river project, Quebec—construction of retaining walls, $425,000 for underground services, sewer installation and replacement of electric sub-station, and $225,000 for replacement of electrical equipment—grain elevator system.

If I may I would now like to refer to the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority. As of November 14, 1968, bulk cargoes were up by 8 per cent on the Montreal-Lake Ontario section and by 7 per cent on the Welland section, compared with the same period in 1967. General cargoes increased by 32 per cent on the Montreal-Lake Ontario section and by 40 per cent on the Welland section, compared with the same period last year. Total traffic is 11.6 per cent more on the Montreal-Lake Ontario section and 10.5 per cent more on the Welland than during the same period in 1967. The increase in bulk cargoes took place notwithstanding the seaway strike and a decreased flow of grain from the lakehead. The increase in general cargoes is due mainly to a substantial increase in the movement of manufactured iron and steel.

The 1967 navigation season marked the first full year of operation of the new traffic control centre on the Welland canal. This traffic control system, which had become operational in the summer of 1966, was expanded during the non-navigation season of 1966-67 to include the lock and harbour areas of the canal. The procedure, which includes the use of closed circuit television and telemetry, has improved the scheduling of vessels through the canal and has resulted in substantial reductions in lock cycle and round trip transit times.

The techniques and experience gained on the Welland are being applied gradually in the eastern region, with certain refinements. The first step in this project was the installation of new traffic lights and a surveillance system at the Beauharnois lock, as well as modernization of the Beauharnois traffic control centre. This became fully operational in 1968.

• (12:10 p.m.)

Work continued in 1967 and early 1968 at the Côte Ste. Catherine and St. Lambert locks to provide a better control of icing conditions during the critical closing and opening periods of the seaway each year. These works include ice diversion channels and ice flushing culverts at both locks and an enlargement of the regulating works at the Côte Ste. Catherine lock.

The seaway authority announced in March of this year that the Lachine and Cornwall canals would be closed to navigation permanently at the end of the 1968 season. These shallow draft canals, once important links in the old St. Lawrence canals system, have become increasingly uneconomic in the face of rising operating costs and diminishing traffic resulting from the opening of the seaway in 1959. The 11 million tons carried by these canals in 1958 had decreased by 1967 to 338,000 tons on the Lachine and 100,000 on the Cornwall.

Although the closing will not necessarily affect the water supply and drainage facilities of local industries, the maintenance of such conveniences will, of course, become much more costly. Accordingly, the availability of a cheaper alternative is under study, and the matter will be reverted to when the study and consultations with interested municipalities and industries have been completed. Work continued in 1968 on the construction of a new channel to bypass the city of Welland. Settlement has been reached with about 83.6 per cent of the owners of the 4,000 acres of land expropriated for this purpose. Clearing of the right of way is essentially complete. Five major contracts have been awarded for about 5.93 miles of the total 8.3 miles of excavation required. By the end of 1968 contracts covering channel excavations for approximately 7.28 miles out of the over-all total length of 8.3 miles of the Welland by pass should be under active construction. Approximately 23 per cent of the required total channel excavation for the Welland bypass was completed as of August 31, 1968.

The year 1968-69 represents the first full year of operation of the Canadian Transport Commission which came into being pursuant to the proclamation of part I of the National Transportation Act last fall. While still undergoing the process of organization, the regulatory aspects of the commission's operations, to the extent authorized by the legislation thus far proclaimed, are proceeding in a normal manner and represent to a large extent a continuation of those functions carried out by the commission's predecessor agencies.

In keeping with the government's policy of maintaining the highest possible level of commercial air services in regional areas, the air transport committee has initiated an increasing number of examinations of regional requirements during the past year. For example, public hearings of this nature were undertaken in the maritimes, Manitoba, Yellowknife and Frobisher Bay and resulting decisions have been issued or are under current examination.

The railway transport committee has received and is dealing with some 160 applications relating to the abandonment of non-guaranteed branch lines, discontinuance of railway passenger train service, the removal of railway station agents and caretakers, and applications for the inauguration of master agency and customer service plans of the major railways. In addition the committee has recently conducted a public hearing designed to produce uniform costing procedures to be used by Canadian railways which will ensure that at all times the commission and the railways will use proper costing methods and that cost figures submitted by the railways or determined by the commission will be correct and acceptable for the purposes of the Railway Act.

During the past year over $26 million has been committed from the railway grade crossing fund to provide assistance to municipalities in meeting the costs of constructing or reconstructing 67 railway-highway grade separations, 11 diversions, and the installation or improvement of automatic protection facilities at 544 railway-highway crossings. In accordance with the provisions of the National Transportation Act relating to the gradual reduction in subsidies to railway and transportation companies, it will be noted that a decrease of $14 million has been made in the provision of the estimates now before the house, which reflects the first of the annual decreases established.

In the early part of the year the water transport committee completed the public hearings stage of the inquiry into the ownership and registration of ships in Canada. The committee's report is in the process of preparation and is expected to be completed shortly.

In accordance with the provisions of the National Transportation Act a research division has been created within the commission. In addition, an advisory council on research, comprising informed Canadians outside of government, has been established to assist in developing a research program and assigning priorities within it. The forecasting of transportation supply and demand and the undertaking of broad cost-benefit studies in the transportation area will be central to the research program.

The estimates for the Canadian Transport Commission, the National Harbours Board and the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority have been referred to the parliamentary committee on transportation, while the estimates of the department are being dealt with before the house. Indeed, I understand that the parliamentary committee is meeting today on these subjects. For that reason, in response to any questions from hon. members I propose to limit my comments or answers to matters concerning the department only, since questions relating to these other agencies should be raised and can be answered in the parliamentary committee where special witnesses are available for this purpose.

The Chairman: Order, please. At this time I should like to make a suggestion to the committee. Further to the concluding remarks of the minister, the committee will notice that items 45 and L 115 dealing with the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation are part of the estimates of the Minister of Transport. If there is general agreement, I believe it possibly would be in the interests of orderly procedure if we were to avoid a discussion of these items because they are before a standing committee. We might concentrate in committee of supply on the transportation items alone.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Chairman, I think we are in agreement with the exclusion of the housing item from the discussion, but in so far as these other matters are concerned which are before committees I feel we are entitled to mention them where policy is concerned particularly when the minister, so far as I know, has made no full statement before the committee. The first proviso, however, is valid so far as we are concerned.

May I say we are very pleased to have the comprehensive report the minister has given us. I believe it is one of the first concrete moves he has made to show he is interested in transport. Once or twice I almost detected a faint glimmer of pride when he was outlining the new and extensive activities of his department. The hon. member for Oxford is our chief spokesman in matters of transport and he has dealt extensively with this subject in the committee and in the house from time to time. I am really pinchhitting for him. If the minister understands anything about the navy he will realize that I have been taken out of mothballs to say something on these estimates today.

I recall that when the former minister, Mr. Pickersgill, left he made this announcement which has been mentioned in the house previously: "I am leaving the department. It is in great shape. My job has been completed. I have finished the great work in transport." Yet simultaneously in another interview the present minister said: "I consider this the greatest challenge of my life; the department is in such a mess." Of course, in thinking the minister might be right one is tempted to ask the rhetorical question, what kind of a mess is the Canadian Transport Commission now in with Mr. Pickersgill as its new head? I do not know who is right in this argument, but I do suggest that the department is a tremendously complex one which affects all walks of life in Canada.

I pay tribute to the minister in that I think he has the energy and capacity to tackle the problems facing transport. He did so in respect of national defence. I do not agree with what he did and I said so in the house, but if he puts his mind to these problems I think he has the capacity and has demonstrated that he can use it. I hasten to place on the record that transport has been sadly neglected while the minister has been galavanting about the country on his housing foray which has so far shown little success. We recognized long before the government that housing has a definite priority, but I wonder what is happening to his giant department while the minister is piloting this inquiry.

I cannot help but use nautical expressions when I think of the minister wiping out the navy. He seems to want to assume command and be the pilot. This is about the only nautical action in connection with transport that the minister has taken since assuming his present portfolio. In any event Mr. Pickersgill has left—I will deal with him later—and the present minister is at the helm. But all we have, as has been stated many times in this house, is a lot of unfinished business.

First of all, I think of the various reports and surveys which have been coming up so fast in this department. Many of them have been requested by members on this side of the house, but where are these reports? I have not had the chance to deal extensively with them and I do not know the state of them. This is one of the reasons we want the minister in the house, so he can deal with the problems of transport on a day to day basis and give us up to date information. We do not know, for example, the state of affairs concerning the marine branch of the minister's department. What is happening in respect of the Canada Shipping Act? We know something is to be done in this regard but we have not heard anything about it.

[Mr. Bell.]

The pilotage report was completed, and I agree with many of its recommendations, but how are these being treated by the department? The minister has not said anything in that regard. We also have the National Harbours Board report. I understand the minister fell asleep over the week end while reading it. We do not know the position with respect to that report. The merchant navy has been under study on three occasions in recent years that I can remember. Promises were made during the election campaign in this regard. They have been referred to in the house, but what has the government done? It is going to conduct another study, but the difference is that this one is to be in depth. I hope we do not have to go through all these other studies and start new ones in depth.

The Canadian shipbuilding industry is floundering. What is the government doing in this regard? What is taking place in respect of containers? One of the officers of the transport commission said the other day that within a few weeks another research study would be conducted on containerization. We have many problems in respect of ferries, at least in the maritimes, and they are still up in the air.

I have only dealt thus far with the marine situation, but what is happening in respect of air transport? The minister told us about the many new plans the department has in so far as air transport is concerned. I should like the minister when he replies to tell us what the position is of the Wheatcroft report, the Robinson report and the Thompson report. Those are three I can think of right now without looking anything up, and there may be many more. What is happening to the new plans for airport development to accommodate the new jumbo jets?

We must not forget the rail transportation system. There have been all kinds of promises in this regard, and these promises have been indelibly recorded in this house. The former minister stood up when we were passing the National Transportation Act and said that the government would deal with the problems facing the maritimes if the house would only let that bill go through. We did so but these problems have not even been reported on. How about the changes in the Maritime Freight Rates Act? What is happening in respect of l.c.l. business? There have been so many reports on this subject I cannot keep them straight. They have been passed on to the provincial governments which have in turn passed them back to Ottawa. We must pay attention to those regions of Canada which were left out when the new National Transportation Act was passed.

Many other matters dealing with different facets of transportation have also been postponed. I understand that the entire responsibility in respect of satellites has been turned over to the new Postmaster General. Perhaps that is a good thing. However, I do not know where these reports are. I hope the new Minister of Transport received them when he took over. I have referred to about ten of them. Are they lying around in the minister's office or did Mr. Pickersgill take them with him? Perhaps they are in the reading room of the Rideau Club. I want to know where these reports are and I want an up to date review. Let us know what is happening.

This brings up the question of who is really the boss in respect of transportation in this country. Is it the minister or is it the new chief dictator of the Canadian Transport Commission? One of them is relaxing and holding cabinet meetings—small ones, I must admit—at the Rideau Club each day. On the other hand we have an itinerant traveller in the person of the minister himself running about the country. Who is running this department and who is the real boss? Is it pious Paul or sailor Jack who is running this department?

Mr. Harries: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Bell: Yes.

Mr. Harries: My friend has talked about the itinerant minister. He is referring to one of the most senior cabinet members in the government. Does he not think that part of the duties of the Minister of Transport is to travel about and find out what is going on in this country so that he can assess these problems and their effects on this nation? Does he not think this requires a diligent inquiry?

Mr. Bell: The minister is travelling throughout the country but we would prefer him to be in the house on the days he is supposed to be here, which are few enough as it is. We also think he should pay some attention to transportation as well as to housing. Let me take this opportunity to say something about the outrageous attendance roster for ministers which has been initiated. I see that the understudy to the Minister of Transport is in the house and I am glad he is here. I think I am paying him the biggest compliment I can by suggesting he is the type of man who would be in the house every day of the week if only the Prime Minister would allow him to be here on those days he is not supposed to be here.

I have referred to the czar of the transport commission who holds meetings at the Rideau Club. I think he feels the weight of his responsibilities a little and that on many occasions when he holds these meetings and begins to stick out his chest he feels he is really still the minister of transport. Mr. Pickersgill was discovered at a meeting in Halifax on November 9. I know there has been some denial in the press in this regard, but I suggest there must have been something going on in view of the fact the minister said, as reported in a Halifax newspaper:

> Hon. J. W. Pickersgill said in Halifax during the week end he has confidential information to back up the statement.

The statement was that Halifax will be the likely choice as the eastern container terminal. I am not quarrelling in respect of Halifax v. Saint John, as we are friendly rivals in this regard, but I do not think the head of the transport commission has any business making statements which would indicate that he prefers Halifax over Saint John.

Mr. Hellyer: Would you settle for Halifax, then?

• (12:30 p.m.)

Mr. Bell: This is what we are up against when we talk of transportation. I hope the minister will continue to stand up on his own two feet and be proud of his department. I hope he will accept all his responsibilities. Let us have full cabinet meetings to decide on solutions to transportation problems. Never mind these little meetings in the Rideau Club over lunch.

Another matter I want to refer to concerns the National Harbours Board. Its estimates are being dealt with in committee, as the minister has said. I only want to reiterate what I said the other day, that the National Harbours Board has in my opinion been very fair in the past in its treatment of all Canadian ports that come under its jurisdiction. I have no quarrel with the way it has acted in this regard. Many of us feel the National Harbours Board might have done more, but I do not think there is any allegation that it has given preferential treatment to one port over another.

However, a situation has developed in the eastern Canadian ports which requires that the National Harbours Board continue to be scrupulously fair with regard to providing facilities or advantages to each of the ports. We dealt with this question yesterday. I simply say that in connection with rail transportation rates in and out of these ports, and also the most important matter of wharfage costs, there should not be hidden benefits or advantages to any port. We have every confidence in the officials of the board but we do not want them to say that things are all right and find they are negotiating on an unfair basis with respect to all ports. They will be judged afterwards if it is found that in any agreement there has been any question of preferential treatment.

I am happy that we are moving into the container field. The first step, of course, is the provision of container facilities, but some day we will move into the land bridge concept on which there is some disagreement, according to Mr. Cope of the transport commission. I hope Canada will move forward and take its justifiable geographic position as the centre of the giant bulk transportation system which experts feel will spread throughout the world.

The other matter I want to mention concerns an incident involving myself and two or three other members when we were returning to Ottawa from the November 11 ceremonies in the maritimes and were stuck at Dorval airport for 21 hours. This was an unbelievable occurrence. The delay was due to a freak storm. I have no quarrel with Air Canada in this regard except that I think they were too optimistic about the possibility of clearing traffic. I feel there was a mistake in judgment, but at least it was an honest one and they were probably trying to save the taxpayers' money.

As I say, we were stuck in the airport for 21 hours. We could not even get to the railway station to use the trains that were evidently still running. All this time we were wondering about the runways being cleared, and nothing was done for a great many hours. The next day, 24 hours later, just the main runway was cleared. I made inquiries about the matter. I want the minister to investigate it because Montreal is trying to be the centre of air transport in Canada and to take the overhaul base from Winnipeg. I wonder what the reason was for the runways at Dorval airport not being cleared. It was put to us unofficially that the reason was that the contract did not begin until November 15 and because it was November 12 there was no equipment at the airport.

[Mr. Bell.]

If the minister does not believe what I say about this matter he should talk to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who was right there with us. So that hon. members will not think ministers received preferential treatment I point out that it went through my mind, as we were being herded around like peasants, that the Minister of Manpower and Immigration has been forgotten in this house and in respect of matters concerning the cabinet ever since the last leadership convention, and he was just as forgotten as the rest of us on this occasion. He was forgotten at Dorval airport, because we were all herded around like sheep and had to sit in chairs all night.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I say that we have to get moving in regard to transport. I am pleased to see that the Minister without Portfolio is in the chamber. He has been following these matters. If the Minister of Transport cannot handle the matters that fall within his department and feels that housing is his main interest, I hope that changes will be made because we must have a responsible minister in charge of transportation. He must be here every day reporting on various activities with regard to transportation. Mr. Pickersgill, with all his other faults, did this. Every day he was on his feet in the house saying something, and many times not incorrectly, about transportation matters.

The minister will have the chance to reply to these questions. If he is really making the decisions I want to know what the Canadian Transport Commission is doing. The minute the shipping review was announced the other day the commission hired a group of experts in Toronto to review shipping matters. What is wrong with all the research experts in the department? We know that a former member of this house was appointed a research expert in the department at a salary of $24,000 a year. I am in favour of that. I am glad he got the job because he was a good committee chairman when in this house. I do not think he knows very much about transportation in detail but he will learn. This is all right. He has a good appreciation of over-all transportation problems. But why is it that these high-priced research experts in the department are overlooked every time the commission wants something reviewed? Why do they hire experts from outside the department? Surely there are enough experts within this department to review these questions. I would like to clarify the record at this point, Mr. Chairman. The fact that I am in favour of the appointment of Mr. Macaluso to this position does not mean that I agree with all the appointments made of defeated, former Liberal members.

The main consideration of the transportation committee at this time should be to finish its trip to the maritimes. This point will be developed by other members as they raise various questions. We are trying in this debate to deal with transportation matters in an orderly way. I do not think the minister appreciates what constitutes an orderly development of transportation matters, but we are trying to demonstrate it to him this afternoon.

The other day I wrote the minister a letter. I hope he received it. I received an acknowledgement of my letter. The trip to the maritimes, which was promised in the house in order to study our problems and come up with a solution, has to take place. That promise must be fulfilled. It is indelibly written and has been approved by the committee. This trip was promised to us when we agreed, though we did not vote for the transportation bill last year, thank goodness, to withhold our substantive criticism of the bill because we knew that something would be coming forward.

I believe that the trip has to be completed by March 23, 1969; otherwise the freeze will lapse and new legislation will be required. The briefs which were prepared at great expense by bodies, organizations and communities in the maritimes—I would say the cost must have been in the order of $250,000—are becoming obsolete. We may be faced with a difficult weather problem but the freeze is hovering over us, with a March deadline, and the committee trip must go forward. It may be that the minister is afraid to send the committee on this trip because the members might get stuck in a snowbank again. The minister will also recall that while we were stuck in a snowbank the government was defeated, but surely there is no worry in that regard now.

My main theme is that the department must get to work on these matters. The minister must be in the house even though the Prime Minister may not want him here. He must come into the house frequently and stand up for the department. In addition, the maritimes trip must go ahead.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, my first remarks on the estimates of the Department of Transport will have to do with airstrips. In Canada our airstrips are most important. We must make sure that our major air services have feeder lines from smaller centres. Moose Jaw might be taken as a good example of a community with a small airstrip. We have a private airstrip about 40 miles from the major air base at Regina and there is considerable traffic between our area and the Regina air base. Recent consultations with the airport people and Air Canada officials have confirmed the usefulness of co-operative efforts to provide means for transporting people from our area to Regina. Included in our area, of course, are Assiniboia, Weyburn and other centres in that region. I ask the minister to pay close attention to the provision of feeder lines to major airports. I believe our transport committee has some responsibility for this matter.

I now wish to say a word about Transair. One of the directors of the company is reported to have said, according to a press report:

> —we had to get people who can represent us in Ottawa and elsewhere. We needed people with political know-how to tell us where to go.

He also said that most Canadian companies strive to have well connected politicians or former politicians on their boards of directors. I am sure that the other directors on the board do not appreciate that statement. I suggest there is no place for this type of obvious political patronage in our scheme of things.

Another point I wish to raise has to do with the construction of railway spur lines or branch lines. The people of Canada expend much money in various forms in building spur lines and branch lines to different localities, as was done in the case of Esterhazy. Hon. members will no doubt be aware that the International Mining Company has mined a considerable amount of potash in the area. At present 35 trucks, each holding 20 tons, deliver potash 24 hours a day to the United States town of Northgate. From there the potash is shipped via a United States railroad to Chicago or exported. The question is, why can the railroad not compete with those trucks? There are facilities at Melville for the cleaning of box cars and hopper cars. Our railroad facilities there are now rendered useless by the competition from trucks and many people in the area are losing their jobs.

Why is it that a trucking company finds it economical to transport potash from Esterhazy when the railway does not? Is the question of management involved here? Perhaps the minister can say what is happening. I know there have been suggestions that the Canadian National cannot compete with the trucks, but I submit that does not add up. It costs a fair amount to operate these trucks to Northgate. Roads must be cleared, repaired and maintained. I cannot see how the competitive position of the railroad has been impaired. Perhaps the minister will look into this matter. It has been suggested that some details cannot be aired in public, but I think the minister ought to investigate the entire situation.

Can the minister please tell us how deeply Canadian National Railways are involved in pipe line experimenting? It is well known that after spur lines have been built to certain areas for the benefit of certain companies in those areas the companies have experimented with pipe lines to determine whether transportation by pipe line is economically feasible. A case in point is the construction of the spur line to the Pan American Petroleum Corporation at Big Stone. The company said that Canadian National would be assured of transporting 75 per cent of the sulphur produced in that area; yet some of that sulphur has been hauled by truck. A further examination disclosed that the company is conducting research into transporting sulphur by pipe line. There is nothing wrong with transporting goods by pipe line. Nevertheless I think we ought to examine what has happened in this instance. Why should the Canadian National be asked to build a spur line and then have to compete with a pipe line? Since public moneys have been expended I think the minister ought to look into the entire matter.

I now wish to say a word about the operation of the Great Slave Lake railway. I hope the minister is not condoning what is happening there at this time since it appears that Canadian National is conducting an experiment with that railway line. It seems to me that the railway is trying to operate trains with unqualified people merely to show that it can be done. I am informed that last July there was a major accident on the line with damage amounting to thousands of dollars. I wonder who cleaned up the wreckage and who paid for the damage? It is also apparent that to date no operating order has been issued for this line. Since the railway has hauled revenue generating traffic for three years, does the minister not think it fair that there should be an operating order issued? Failure to do so in my opinion constitutes sharp practice on the part of Canadian National in this area.

[Mr. Skoberg.]

I am also given to understand that a contractor is still in control of the operation of some portion of this railroad. Does the government hand this contractor money to be paid to the employees working on the railroad? If so, I think it is high time for the contractor to take his hand out of the kitty. It is time that this railroad was operated as it ought to be. We have enough qualified personnel in Canada to operate the railroad. It should not be left to an independent contractor to operate. I wish to know whether any commitments regarding the control or operation of the railroad have been made. If so, how deeply is Canadian National Railways committed in this regard?

Although many questions on this matter could be placed on the order paper I wish to ask one question in particular having to do with the operation of the Great Slave Lake railway. I wish to know what employees are now employed by the railroad both in construction work and in operating trains hauling revenue generating loads. Also, is there any effective code of uniform operating rules? If not, why not? The suggestion was made that the Board of Transport Commissioners is responsible for safety on that line. I question this statement. I believe these employees should come directly under the act as it stands today in the same way as all other employees involved in the operations of both Canadian Pacific and Canadian National.

• (12:50 p.m.)

I should like to know also exactly how far we can go in our expectations that Canadian National will assume complete responsibility at an early date. If this question were answered sincerely I believe it might also answer some of the other questions because the whole picture would fall into focus. I am wondering just how much supervision of the operation of this road is being conducted by Canadian National and also what supervision is being conducted of the contractor who is being employed in the furtherance of the construction of this line? I understand that an upgrading of the line is being carried out. I think something is lacking somewhere and it is time we knew how far the transport committee and the minister are going to go in assuming responsibility.

Another point I should like to mention relates to the unsatisfactory settlement made with some contractors employed in the construction of a portion of the Great Slave Lake railway. I am sure the minister is well aware of this problem. I will not go into all the details at this time, but I suggest that many contractors have tried unsuccessfully to have a settlement made of their outstanding claims against the Canadian National or the major contractor who was in charge of the construction of this line. We feel it is important that these contractors be given an answer forthwith. I am quite sure the construction of this line was embarked upon in the interests of this area. I am quite sure also that the many contractors involved are entitled to an answer to their inquiries as to why they have not been paid. Why has there not been a satisfactory arrangement made for the disposition of their outstanding claims? I am sure the minister could give me an answer that would help in this regard.

I was pleased to hear the minister refer to the amount of money expended from the grade crossing fund. I am sure he appreciates the fact that we can spend many thousands of dollars in the elimination of hazardous conditions at railway crossings. I am sure he appreciates also that some of these types of protection do not go far enough. I am pleased to learn that the National Research Council has done a considerable amount of work in this regard. I am pleased to learn too that other means of protection are being offered. I feel it is time the transport committee looked at alternative methods of protection against the hazards to highway traffic which exist at railway crossings. Many other methods of protection have to be examined, as a result of increasing highway traffic, in addition to the ordinary bells, gates, lights and so on. Many hazardous conditions exist today which result from the types of commodities being carried now by trucks. Therefore we can no longer allow this situation to continue. I am pleased to note that definite improvements are being considered.

There is one other point upon which I should like the minister to comment briefly when he answers. Just what control do we have over the passenger operations of the Canadian Pacific? I understand that a deliberate attempt has been made to downgrade the Canadian by reducing the number of cars on that train to as low as ten. Every member of this house appreciates how difficult it is to obtain space on that train. It is difficult to obtain space on Canadian National trains, but I must commend the Canadian National for its progressive attitude toward passenger traffic. I should like to know whether the Canadian Pacific would have to go before the transport commission before it could downgrade the Canadian further by removing the sleeping car facilities. The rumours are that the Canadian Pacific intends to put on a dayliner from Winnipeg to Calgary. If this is so, I should like to know in order that these communities can be notified. I am sure everyone here realizes that this is something that should not and absolutely cannot be allowed.

I should like now to deal with the research program. Many questions have been asked about this program and the new director of the research division of the Canadian Transport Commission. Just what qualifications did that individual have when he applied for the job? I understand that when the requirements for this position were published they were quite restrictive. Did the director actually meet every one of those requirements?

I should like to know also what are the terms of reference of this research division. If this would involve a lengthy answer, perhaps the minister could give it in writing later. It seems to me that we go along consistently adding more research departments but we do not know what type of research they are doing. I am sure that if members were more fully aware of the research that was being conducted they could appreciate the various phases of research.

I should like to refer again to the National Research Council which I feel is doing an excellent job. The council issues an excellent report which enables us to appreciate the work being done. I am not too sure that we fully appreciate the research program that is being undertaken. If it means, in effect, that we are hiring a large group of people just for the purpose of eliminating positions farther down the line, then we might have to consider that fact. I realize that management has to do this sort of thing, but I would question just what the terms of reference of this research branch are and whether it should be given encouragement at this time.

The Chairman: Order. It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2.30 p.m.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Skoberg: Mr. Chairman, another point I wish to bring up concerns the existing situation at Roberts Bank. The transportation committee has discussed this situation but it appears that many factors are shrouded in secrecy and the committee was unable to obtain clearcut answers to some of its questions. It is absolutely imperative that the minister and the government let the people know what is happening in this regard.

In this connection, I should like to pose one or two questions that might help to clear up the situation. First of all, who is going to control the rail line between Crows Nest and Roberts Bank? Who will set the freight rates over this stretch of line? Who is going to set the charges for transporting coal over the new rail line to Roberts Bank? By how much will these charges add to the cost of a ton of coal?

Another facet of the Roberts Bank situation concerns a matter that has been raised in the house, namely, the question of jurisdiction over the facilities in the area. The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway has tried unsuccessfully to find out what action the government intends to take with regard to the problem of constitutional jurisdiction. The hon. member for Kootenay West has also been attempting to get answers as to the jurisdictional problems that are involved in connection with the rail route to Roberts Bank. It would be appreciated if the minister would clear up any misunderstanding that may exist and put the record straight on this question.

I believe it is most important to the people most concerned that they be consulted about the location of the rail route in that area. I am referring to the lower mainland regional planning board. The courtesy should at least have been extended to them of prior consultation as to the location of the rail line, and the railroads concerned should have seen fit to contact the board about this matter. There have been too many innuendoes and arguments made about whether jurisdiction in this area lies with the provincial or the federal government. I am sure the minister recognizes that it is absolutely imperative for the National Harbours Board to have control and administration of ports. There would be a real hodge-podge if we were to allow a province to control one port and the federal government to control another. There would be a continual breakdown of relations.

There is another aspect I should like to refer to. In my opinion it is quite impossible for the present minister to handle the two portfolios of housing and transportation. I cannot see any relation between building a home and providing facilities therefor and constructing railroads to transport people. I hope that the Prime Minister will see fit to divide the functions of the minister because it is apparent to me that his present burdensome task is too much for one man to handle effectively.

I concur completely with some of the statements made by the previous hon. member in regard to the Canadian Transport Commission. I understand that the president of the C.T.C. is being referred to as the czar of transportation in Canada. I would hate to see "czar" change into "scar". It appears to me that too much authority is invested in one department for this state of affairs to continue any longer. The minister must be given time to take a really close look at the whole transportation field.

Another point I want to raise concerns the port of Churchill. I am sure the minister will give us some insight as to any future plans for this port to increase the volume of imports and exports. In my opinion it is fairly well substantiated that savings can be effected by using this port. For example, the shipping season could be extended beyond the present limit. We are aware of the fact that the marine insurance season is now the deciding factor, but I believe that in light of the facts the federal government should lead the way in suggesting that the marine insurance season be extended so that additional time could be made available to export wheat. With additional exports of potash, oil and so on such an extension would be very beneficial.

The first Canadian urban transportation conference is going to be held in Toronto from February 9 to 12. I would like to congratulate the minister on what he has done to assist this conference. I would also congratulate the federation of mayors and municipalities for arranging the conference. I ask the minister to consider seriously sending a goodly delegation from the present transportation committee to the conference in order that the delegation may learn at first hand what is happening in this field today. They have published a pamphlet headed "Opportunity Or Chaos", which I am sure the minister realizes is actually the position in which the entire field of transportation finds itself today. I ask the minister to make sure that as many members as possible attend the conference so that they can take an intelligent look at the picture in all its aspects.

I have one other point in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, concerning the statement made by the Minister of Labour last night on the implementation of the Freedman commission report. If we expect peaceful labour relations in this country the requirement that no material change should be made in the working conditions of employees during the life of a contract must be insisted upon. The minister is aware of the situation which has existed in relation to the C.N.R. It is one which is continuing and until some effect is given to the recommendations of the Freedman report there will be continual disputes arising from material changes made during the life of contracts. I ask the minister to lend his support to the proposal made by the Freedman commission and to do his best to convince his cabinet colleagues of its importance.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the estimates of a department enables us to make suggestions to the minister or to state the complaints which we receive.

It is agreed that as far as transportation is concerned, we have a system connecting east to west by trains, planes, trucks, so that it is possible to cross Canada which is the largest or the second largest country in the world. This was made possible by measures taken not only this year or last year, but since confederation. People before us took decisions so that today we have a transportation system, a Department of Transport which plays a quite important role in the conduct of our national affairs and in the administration of the country.

I think that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) performs his task in a serious manner and as a true Canadian and that he has at heart the general welfare of the people served by these means of cummunication and transportation from one end of our country to the other.

This leads me to make some suggestions and to submit the complaints of some of our organizations with regard to railway services, for instance.

In my area—we also receive complaints from other areas—we have been asking for a number of years, improvements of the passenger train service between Noranda and Senneterre, between Cochrane and Senneterre and between Senneterre, Quebec and Montreal.

At the present time, we are faced with a problem which I think has not yet been solved, that of the Ontario Northland Railway Company which, not so long ago, informed the transport commission of its intention to discontinue service with trains Nos. 83 and 84 between Swastika and Noranda. However, when the administrators of the Ontario Northland Railway presented their opinion to the commission, they did not mention, for instance, the contents of this letter dated October 25, and I quote:

[English]

Although it was not included in the notice, a bus service will be provided as a substitute for trains 83 and 84 if these trains are discontinued. The bus service would be scheduled to provide a close connection at Swastika with Toronto-Cochrane trains 87 and 88.

[Translation]

So, the Swastika-Noranda line would disappear. Representations were received from the cities and towns of Rouyn-Noranda, and from companies whose employees often travel on the Ontario Northland Railway. For instance, the city of Rouyn has sent me resolution No. 15,680 stating that it is categorically opposed to trains Nos. 83 and 84 being discontinued. The city of Noranda also sent me a copy of a resolution passed on October 7, asking that trains Nos. 83 and 84 be kept in service.

The Little Longlac Gold Mines Limited also wrote to the secretary of the railway transport committee, 400 Laurier Avenue West, Ottawa, to express the following views:

[English]

Our mining operations in the Rouyn-Noranda and Arntfield areas include Wasamac Mines Limited with over 300 employees and in addition employees in our other mines, East Malarctic Mines Limited, Barnat Mines Ltd., Malarctic Gold Fields (Quebec) Limited and Anglo American Molybdenite Mines Limited, etc., use the passenger services provided by the Nipissing Central and Ontario Northland railways regularly. Therefore, we feel justified in opposing the application to cancel the railway passenger services. Elimination of the service will greatly inconvenience our employees and their families as well as our technical and executive staff at head office in Toronto who use the travelling accommodation regularly.

[Translation]

Mr. Chairman, those who normally travel on trains Nos. 83 and 84 are opposed to the discontinuation of this service.

Other railway lines in Canada may not be economic, like, for example, that of trains Nos. 83 and 84; this is not the most profitable among the operations of the Ontario Northland Railway. However freight is provided between Noranda, Swastika and Toronto, so that profits are made. The same applies to the Canadian National for the service between Noranda and Montreal where great profits are made thanks to freight. However, the passenger service is not considered very important.

We requested an improvement of the rail service between Noranda and Montreal; we demand it also from the Ontario Northland Railway.

Mr. Chairman, if you had the chance to see what kind of trains Nos. 83 and the 84 are, you would understand why people are not very interested in taking them, although there are some who do regularly. The same thing goes for the Canadian National trains that run from Noranda to Montreal. Once you see what kind of trains are used for passengers, you are not interested in taking them. That is why we are asking that better trains be used to transport people to the larger centres, whether it be Toronto or Montreal, and that the quality of the trains be improved to serve the people of our area.

It seems to me it is bad enough that we should be located 425 miles from Montreal and Toronto, almost isolated in northwestern Quebec, without being forced to travel in the type of trains now being used.

I believe the people up north, in our area, are as important as human beings as the people in Montreal, Toronto, Windsor, Winnipeg, and Vancouver. Let them be treated with more consideration than is now being done by the Canadian National and the Ontario Northland Railway.

I therefore ask the minister and his officials to study the situation before allowing the cancellation of trains Nos. 83 and 84, and see what kind of service should be given to the citizens of Rouyn-Noranda. The problem lies with a small line from Rouyn-Noranda to Swastika. It is just a matter of improving the service; this will attract more customers, because people prefer—I certainly do—travelling by train from Rouyn-Noranda to Swastika instead of by bus.

Now, in another field, something that concerns the Canadian National services in the Atlantic provinces. This morning, I put a question to the minister with regard to the possible dismissal of about 20 policemen. Here is the information I have been given by the Canadian National Railways Police Association, Moncton, Local No. 9, 96 Drummond St., Moncton, New Brunswick. This letter dated October 30, was sent to the members of the union of that police association and signed by Mr. Webster, the secretary-treasurer.

[English]

Dear Sir & Brother:

This is to advise you that the Moncton local executive of the C.N.R. Police Association have been advised by Inspector F. B. Trainer that there will be a lay-off of constables in the Atlantic region.

He stated that there would be 20 constables, more or less, laid off in this department in the near future. No mention was made as to where or what location these men would be laid off. It was stated that Moncton would be hard hit.

This is an urgent matter, and any action which may be taken to alleviate this situation would be greatly appreciated.

[Translation]

The following is a letter I received from Mr. Raymond Pelletier, who is a constable for the Canadian National in Campbellton, New Brunswick.

—Mr. Caouette, this letter is intended to ask for your most urgent support. I am including copy of a letter I received from my union about a decision to be taken in the very near future by the Canadian National concerning the dismissal of twenty or more of my fellow constables in the Atlantic region itself. I feel this is a stupid decision by the authorities, in view of the increasing number of crimes, as dismissing constables is the last thing that should be done. This decision will not affect me as I have a sufficient number of years of service. However, I feel sorry for the younger people being out of work, as our region is especially affected by its low standard of living as compared with the rest of Canada.

Would it be possible for you to make representations to the company in order to have that order rescinded. I can assure you that any representation on your part will be greatly appreciated. I would appreciate it if you would inform me of your action and I will inform my association accordingly.

Today, I informed the minister of these numerous dismissals of Canadian National constables in the Atlantic region.

The minister informs me that an investigation will be carried out and that, eventually, we will be advised of the results of our representations, due no doubt to the strong representations now being made by the Moncton association of the C.N.R. constables. Mr. Chairman, I have no further comments about the Canadian National except that its service should be improved at all costs.

I would now like to comment on Air Canada which is also under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Transport. At the time the bill on the Canadian National was presented to the house, I was saying that Air Canada had improved its services to a great extent and that the department had in many respects contributed to solve some problems. For example, this was done with regard to the Val-d'Or airport, which is a fine airport serving the area. I asked the hon. minister when the official opening of the airport would be announced; he did not know. However, the airport is being used today, and it is pretty enough to be opened officially. I would even invite the minister to take part in the opening ceremonies, for it is worthwhile.

Mr. Chairman, I also called the attention of the right hon Prime Minister to the matter of the passes used on Air Canada planes.

I wrote to Air Canada last August to inquire whether passes could be given to the leaders of the federal parties. There are four of us. I did not make the request for all members of parliament but for the four leaders. All the members can visit their riding every week, as everyone knows. However, they are limited to their own region or to their own ridings.

In the case of the four party leaders, the hon. minister is aware that they receive invitations from St. John's Newfoundland to Vancouver or Victoria. The ordinary members do not receive such invitations. Therefore, in asking for this pass, I would remind the hon. minister that the right hon. Prime Minister has the use of a special plane, to which he is fully entitled.

The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) holds a pass which allows him to travel throughout Canada. On the other hand, two party leaders, the house leader of the New Democratic party (Mr. Lewis) and the house leader of the Ralliement Créditiste, that is myself, have no such passes. Nevertheless, we get invitations and we are recognized by the house as leaders of national parties. Even if we are recognized as such and enjoy the leaders' privileges, our requests are turned down or remain unanswered while those passes would help us fulfil our obligations. I believe that both of us are entitled to advance our own ideas just as much as the Leader of the Official Opposition. Just like him, we have a duty to accept invitations.

As for the right honourable Prime Minister, I understand that on account of his function, the matter ought not to be discussed in his case But as far as the leaders of the opposition parties are concerned, I think, Mr Chairman, that it would be in order for Air Canada, the Department of Transport or the board of internal economy of the house to authorize the delivery of such a pass.

When I wrote Air Canada last August 8, Mr. MacMillan wrote me in answer on September 30—I remind you that I wrote him on August 8—simply as follows:

> Having been away from the office quite a bit, I have been unable to reply earlier to your letter of August 8, delivery of which was undoubtedly delayed by the postal strike.
> Nevertheless, upon receipt of your letter, my office got in touch with Mr. Fraser, clerk of the house, and asked him to explain to you what transport privileges are granted to members of parliament.
>
> As you know, these are provisions of the legislation concerning travel by members of parliament.

It has nothing to do with the matter I raised.

> Yours sincerely—

—Amen.

The letter was addressed to Mr. Fraser, Clerk of the House of Commons. As regards Mr. Fraser, he wrote me a letter on September 6 to tell me this, and I quote:

> I do not suppose you know that, even though, according to the Senate and House of Commons Act, we cannot grant air travel certificates when parliament is dissolved—

It has nothing to do with what I asked.

And further:

> —the internal economy commissioners have decided recently to authorize—

So they want authorization to be given by the internal economy commissioners.

> —to authorize the issuance of three return tickets, economy class, for members wishing to travel from their riding to Ottawa, between August 1 and September 12.

This correspondence was exchanged during the dissolution. The letter goes on as follows:

> The cost of these return tickets will be paid by the government rather than by the House of Commons, and members will only have to keep their ticket to be refunded.

That is a matter of administration, which is no concern of mine and in which I am not interested at all. The only thing I am interested in, Mr. Chairman, is that the hon. member for York South and the leader of the Ralliement Créditiste are issued an Air Canada pass.

• (3:00 p.m.)

If one has to go through the internal economy commissioners, I do not mind, but passes should be issued. This is what interests me.

We should be in a position to accept invitations without any out-of-pocket travelling expenses in Canada.

Some hon. members have stated that the means of transportation are not the same as they were forty years ago and that is true. If the government decides at a given time to issue passes on Air Canada planes, as is done on C.N.R. and C.P.R. trains, I would not object. We are no longer living in a horse and buggy era, we are in 1968, using modern means of transportation in our travels. Indeed, hon. members have representations to make or must travel in the interests of Canada and their constituents. I do not object if all hon. members had one; but at least the leaders of the recognized parties in the house should have their pass just like the Leader of the Opposition. The Prime Minister does not need any, since he has his own plane. Now, that would settle a situation which I find abnormal in the circumstances.

I will now deal with the repairs to Air Canada planes about which the members of western Canada and especially the Winnipeg area have made so much fuss and raised so much objection.

I shall give an example taken from another department, the Post Office Department. My colleague, the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Matte) received recently a letter from Mr. André Houle, special assistant to the Postmaster General, informing him that the post office of Saint-Joseph-de-Mékinac would be closed, thus saving $1,500. The revenues of that post office for the fiscal year 1967-68 amounted to $621, while the operation costs amounted to $1,825. So, to save $1,200, the government closes a post office, depriving 85 users of that service. These people will go elsewhere to buy their postal stamps in order to save some money for the government.

As far as the Air Canada overhaul base at Winnipeg is concerned, it has been clearly established that the government would save millions of dollars in having its repairs made at Montreal rather than in Winnipeg. If such is the case, there is no reason to prevent the transfer of the Winnipeg overhaul base to Montreal. Let us take other means, from the social viewpoint, to prevent the disintegration of certain districts of Winnipeg. We do not object to that.

If the report had established that it would be cheaper to repair the planes in Winnipeg than in Montreal, the question would have been settled a long time ago. But the question is to take something from Winnipeg and to bring it to Montreal. This stirs up a storm. There is even an implication of separatism. The transfer of the Winnipeg base to Montreal would depend on separatists. This is not the question at all. We consider the matter strictly from the viewpoint of economics, of costs, because everyone, especially the hon. ministers, complain that they have no money. If we have no money, it is about time to start cutting down in government expenditures, and it could be done in this area, since it has been established that the government would save millions of dollars by having the planes repaired in Montreal instead of Winnipeg.

Nothing prevents the government from inviting private airplane manufacturing companies to run an overhaul centre in Winnipeg, since there will certainly be an Air Canada base. In fact, Winnipeg is an important city where the majority of Air Canada employees will remain. Let us stop whining in this house and saying that Winnipeg is going to lose that.

We, in Montreal, have lost lots of things and the Maritimes too for example. The Maritimes would be better justified than Winnipeg to complain about the economic situation in Canada, in view of the closing down of the coal mines and the high cost of living. Mr. Chairman, even the Stanfield underwear firm in Nova Scotia has increased its prices by 49 cents per unit. That is inflation in the Maritime provinces.

The government, then, must reduce expenses as much as possible and if it is advisable to leave Winnipeg and go to Montreal, let it be go. The minister did not make the survey. It was done by commissioners, competent people, who established clearly that it would be less costly for Air Canada to operate an overhand base in Montreal rather than in Winnipeg. Something else can be done in Winnipeg, as was the case in other provinces.

Companies in Regina and Edmonton, have closed down, for some reason or other, and moved their business to another city. Why? To save money. Now, the Canadian government must set an example in that field without however neglecting to find solutions to the problems created by moving the people from Winnipeg to Montreal. All this means that we are not eager to create economic chaos in Winnipeg, but on the other hand, we do not want to spend merely for the fun of saying that we are spending in Winnipeg instead of in Montreal.

We of the Ralliement Créditiste take a strong position in favour of displacing the Air Canada overhaul base to Montreal, because this is the recommendation of the commission which made a study on overhaul costs of Air Canada.

Now, Mr. Chairman, before we finish with the Winnipeg overhaul base question, I pointed out this morning that the Montreal area members have not risen very often to deal with that question. I heard the member for Trois-Rivières speak about it, but hardly any from Montreal. I even spoke to the member for Saint-Boniface (Mr. Guay), a very good friend of mine, who is in favour of Winnipeg, even if repairs are to be twice as expensive as in Montreal.

I know that he has to look after number one and, if I were in his place, I would probably do the same. Therefore, we should get together to examine the matter for the general good of Canada. In fact, not only one area is concerned but the whole country. We spend not only the money of the citizens of Winnipeg or Montreal but that of all Canadians. We should therefore co-operate to spend it to better advantage and the hon. member for Saint-Boniface will admit that Montreal must be given the preference over Winnipeg for the maintenance of Air Canada's aircraft.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to talk about Montreal's famous international airport which will be built eventually and which will probably always be called the Montreal International Airport. About two weeks ago, I had the opportunity of meeting the mayor and chief engineer of Drummondville as well as members of the Chamber of Commerce of the area, who made a comprehensive study on the building of such an international airport. Supported by statistics, the brief submitted by those people to the Minister of Transport and to the Transport Commission was very comprehensive. They showed quite clearly that there is in the Drummondville area a site quite suitable to the needs of a new international airport.

That would greatly contribute to the development of the whole eastern townships area as well as the whole province of Quebec. The area is very close, for instance, to the Saint-Maurice, Quebec, Sherbrooke and Montreal areas. It was shown that, in a matter of about 15 or 20 minutes, either by an organized train or another suitable means of transportation, it would be possible to go from the centre of Montreal to the Drummondville airport. Nowadays, whenever we have to board a plane in Dorval, it takes about two hours to go from the centre of the city to Dorval during rush hours. It is not so much distance that counts but the communications means which are unadapted and inadequate.

I should like, first of all, to congratulate the Drummondville authorities for having prepared and presented their brief the way they did. Those people are working seriously on that project and are taking at heart the interest of all that Quebec area without any prejudice to the people as a whole, while taking into account the services an airport should provide. I believe the minister has already received that brief, as well as the commission. It should now be considered thoroughly, and without any parochial considerations. The best proposal must be adopted so as to make sure that the selected site is not changed five or ten years from now.

Mr. Chairman, if Drummondville is a suitable site for an international airport, if the means of communication, the modes of transport from Montreal to that airport are appropriate and adequate, I believe we should recognize the fact and make a choice.

Besides, it is impossible to extend the landing strips in Montreal. They are surrounded by houses and the new jets will be unable to land at Dorval for that airport is no longer adequate. This does not mean that Dorval can no longer be used. It can be used for other purposes, but not as an international airport for it is too small. If the land required to extend the runways had to be expropriated, it would cost a fortune and it would be worse still than moving the Air Canada overhaul base from Winnipeg to Montreal. The economic aspect of the matter must therefore be looked at and the most economical solution found to the problem.

I believe the hon Minister of Transport—as I said in my opening remarks—manages his department in a responsible way. To date, I feel he has not shown too much partisanship in the administration of his department; every time I have needed his help, he has been most obliging with me. When I write to him, he sends me a reply. I say this without partisanship. This is not a matter of being Créditiste or Liberal, but a matter of improving our means of transportation to give the best possible services to the Canadian people.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in this debate on transportation I am acutely conscious of the importance of the role that transportation has played in the development of our nation and its cities, their quality of our life and prosperity. I am also acutely conscious of the role it will play in the future in determining the kind of society we will have. I refer to the sort of thing we hear and read about today in respect of urban renewal, rapid transit, superhighways, automobiles, pollution, and the advent of the jumbo jet which will increase in a very short time the outpouring of people from approximately 200 now in a stretched jet to 450 up to 700 in the space of five years.

I also have reference to the advent of the supersonic jet, which is not that far away, and the fact that we may be able to fly from here to Europe or Asia in a little more than two hours, though it may take some time longer to get to and from the airports. I am aware also of the possibility that ground effect vehicles will be used for moving people at fast speeds. All of this new technology raises the question, what will the effect be on people?

I should like to talk this afternoon about the proposed expansion of the international airport at Malton which was announced in August by the Minister of Transport. He stated this was to be a two-phase operation and that the first phase would carry us to approximately 1973 and would involve the expansion of passenger handling facilities on the ground and perhaps some modification of runways, but there would be no major changes as far as land use or runways were concerned. He was careful to point out at the time of his announcement that this was no more than a proposed expansion and that the closely associated communities would be invited to discuss compatible land use with the federal government.

At the same time the minister also pointed out that it was important to work out arrangements with the provinces in respect of handling of traffic and access. He reaffirmed this in the house last week and I think again this week. The implicit undertaking is, of course, that unless satisfactory arrangements can be worked out the proposals will not go forward in the form first suggested.

I was very happy, as I know all members from the Toronto region and indeed of this house were, to hear the emphasis the minister placed on the importance of the quality of life in reaching a decision on whether or not the proposed expansion would go forward in the form first presented. The question I think we have to concern ourselves with is, what does the proposed expansion of Malton airport mean to the quality of life of those who live in Etobicoke, Mississagua and north?

The essential statistics at the present time indicate that at Malton slightly more than four million passengers a year are moved, that it is expected passenger traffic will build to a little more than double that by 1973, and that in the order of about nineteen million will be moved by 1985. The statistics also indicate that if this expansion goes forward the airport will handle close to 19 million people per year. There will also be a more than corresponding increase in freight handling.

We must concern ourselves with the type of aircraft that will be involved in this type of utilization as a result of the change from the jet as we know it today to the jumbo jet and to the supersonic jet with engines of greater power and, one can only assume at this stage, engines which will make more noise. Noise is the essential factor as far as the quality of life is concerned for those most directly associated with these airports.

Let me refer to the measurement most frequently used, being 100 decibels. This is considered to be above the level at which people can live with any degree of comfort; yet thousands are now being exposed to a level of this magnitude on a daily basis. With the proposed expansion to its ultimate form the figures I have—they are no more than estimates at the present time but reliable ones—indicate that about 160,000 people would be exposed to this noise level on a regular basis.

In assessing these problems in regard to Malton airport and what sort of expansion, if any, should take place, one has to recognize that at the start Malton represents a major investment estimated at $70 million with probably a replacement value very much greater than that. This is an investment which all the people of Canada have made. It is an investment by the community at large. One has to recognize the economic arguments in favour of employment, the creation of new service industries and growth. One must also recognize the needs of the traveller, whether for business purposes or for pleasure. One must recognize the claims of the pilots in respect of safety for those who would land these planes at this airport. One has also to recognize the carriers, those who are providing the aircraft.

But more than any other single factor one has to recognize the people who live close to the airport. One has to recognize their health, happiness and privacy; one has to recognize their property values; one has to recognize that when they purchased their houses they had no conception of the sort of expansion that would take place. I think one also has to recognize the special claims of the municipality. Here there is a double effect.

In the first instance there is the effect on assessment. If this expansion should go forward the municipality might well have to reduce the assessment on a substantial part of the residential area just because the land use had been made less congenial, just because it had been downgraded in value. This means, of course, less revenue at a time when all municipalities are looking for opportunities to find more.

I think one also has to recognize the additional costs involved. This is the second side of the double effect to which I referred and with which the municipality is faced. I refer in particular to the question of soundproofing schools. In Etobicoke alone, for instance, more than $600,000 has been spent on soundproofing schools. This will be no more than a rather small drop in a pretty large bucket if the expansion goes forward in the form proposed. I think one has to recognize that a capital expenditure of this kind has to be considered in terms of the whole community and planning a whole host of community services. In Etobicoke, for instance, a hospital is planned and the construction is to commence early next year. A community college is already under way. Under one set of plans the approaches to runways would be directly overhead. This problem could probably be solved by soundproofing, but at enormous cost.

But I ask, Mr. Chairman, what about some of the other effects on people? No one really knows what these effects will be. Basic research with respect to noise and its effect on people has not been carried out, as far as I know, anywhere in the world. We are able, of course, to use the decibel rating and we know that a decibel rating of 100 is reaching an intolerable noise level. Certainly it is too high for animals.

Perhaps the best way of dramatizing the problem of noise is to contemplate a warm, summer evening in a residential area, the sort of evening one might like to spend outside the house. If aircraft with highly-powered engines are arriving approximately every 30 seconds, the noise fractures the tranquility of this setting. This is no romantic notion, Mr. Chairman; it is a fact, and the noise level will become worse. More than that, the people in the area are not able to open their windows at night because of the noise.

We do not yet know what the effects of pollution will be. We know that they may be serious but we do not know to what extent. At the present level there is every indication that they are not serious. There is not the slightest evidence in fact, to indicate that the present level of activity at Malton constitute any danger at all. But here we are considering a major expansion which will change the rules completely. There are those who say that the Malton expansion must go forward. These people justify it on the basis that the airport was there first and those who bought homes in the area should have known what to expect. I ask, Mr. Chairman, how could they know what to expect when even the experts did not know? I am referring to the experts in the Department of Transport and those who have advised the municipalities in the area. I am also referring to those involved in operating aircraft. The pace of technological change so far as air transport is concerned has moved so rapidly that it has overtaken all the planners.

For these reasons I think we have to realize that the home owner in the area has first priority. I believe there are also other important reasons that we must consider. We must consider the argument that it is more economical to have one large airport than two. I say maybe, but this has not yet been proven. I think the estimates of land assembly costs for one large airport are well underestimated. I think one has to give full consideration to the whole question of waste, in the sense that if we build one large airport we will in my view have to start in 15 years to tear part of it down because we will have to have a second airport in any event. Toronto international airport will reach the saturation point in 1985. This means only one thing, that we must have a second airport. If this is true, let us start now acquiring the land for a second airport. Let us start planning and let us prevent the ultimate waste that a decision to build one large airport would involve.

I think we also have to look into the question of the social effects, again from the economic point of view and the point of view of the people concerned. If one looks at the cost savings of one large airport versus two, one can say there are certain savings so far as the airline companies are concerned in the sense that they do not have to duplicate facilities right away. But there are other factors involved. There is the cost of soundproofing which I have mentioned. There is the cost of land and the congestion that will be caused. There is the factor of human cost which we cannot quantify. I refer to the costs that affect people.

I would like to read two short extracts from letters I have received, and may I say I have received several hundred letters on this subject. This letter was written by a family living close to the airport and one of the runways. It reads in part as follows:

> This past summer, the noise from aircraft coming in to land was deafening. Not to mention the pollution from exhaust and the vibration from the motors causing damage to the structure of our houses. That was last summer. Project this into 1980 and the condition will be intolerable—a health hazard with delayed and far-reaching results . . . All surveys and technical reports on aircraft expansion at other cities in the U.S. favour decentralizing facilities rather than expanding existing outlets.

• (3:30 p.m.)

I have one other letter, Mr. Chairman. It reads as follows:

> Dear Sir,
> Do not destroy our home, please. We are against the plan to expand the airport. These new planes . . . won't give us a day of peace.

That is typical of the kinds of letters which are arriving and which have to do with the proposed expansion. In the light of these representations and in the light of the arguments I have advanced, I strongly urge that the one big airport concept is wrong and should be abandoned in favour of a two airport plan; and further that we should proceed with a modified intermediate stage.

I do not argue that Malton airport should be closed down but I do argue that we ought to limit its expansion and start immediately to plan a second airport which would be built in conjunction with and in harmony with Malton international airport.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Chairman, I had intended dealing later in my speech with a matter the previously speaker has just raised. Since he made such a thoughtful presentation I think it would be better, in the interests of orderly debate, if at the outset I dealt with the matter of airports. Here I speak as a maritime member and not as a caucus spokesman on transport. Since the hon. member for Oxford is not here I am trying to say what he would have said.

[Mr. Gillespie.]

On page 552 of Hansard for the current session the Acting Minister of Transport answered eight questions that had been placed before the department dealing with supersonic transports and how Canada was preparing itself for the supersonic age. It is a matter of wry regret to me that the only people who became terribly excited about he answers were magazines that dealt with the problems of preserving bird life in Canada, and not newspapermen who supposedly deal with human problems. Be that as it may, and my sympathies are with the birds, it ought to be noted that on page 552 of Hansard the acting minister noted that in the Department of Transport a sonic boom subcommittee of the supersonic transport study group is engaged in continuing studies related to the over-all assessment of these noise problems. It was pointed out, however, that locating supersonic transport airports in remote areas would certainly be given consideration if results of the research studies suggested this course of action. The minister said that, hopefully, technological advances will preclude this necessity.

It was also pointed out that considerable research is being conducted in the United States and the United Kingdom on the physiological effects of noise and sonic boom overpressures on human and animal life, and that the local Canadian group has been closely monitoring this research in other countries.

One of my questions was as reported on page 552 of Hansard:

> If the noise level is considered excessive to humans and domestic and wild life (a) is the Department considering the location of SST airfields where such nuisance would have a minimum effect, or (b) is it considering a legislative ban on flights, because of such circumstances?

The reply to the first part of the question with regard to locating airports in remote areas was that this would certainly be given consideration if results of the research study suggested this course of action. And, hopefully, technological advances will preclude this necessity.

The second part of the reply no doubt will interest the hon. member who has just preceded me, since he was most disturbed about the effects of noise on the residents of the beleaguered areas of Etobicoke and Mississagua. Part of the reply is as follows:

> Under the authority of The Aeronautics Act (part I) a regulation has already been promulgated which states that "No aircraft shall be flown in such a manner as to create a shock wave, the effect of which is to create or likely to create a hazard to other aircraft or to persons or property on the ground."

I will not go over the ground the hon. member has covered so ably. Instead may I direct hon. members' attention to page 2968 of Hansard where the following question appears:

Has the federal government considered implementing expropriation proceedings to acquire additional land to increase the present size of the Toronto International Airport—

The answer as reported is:

There has been no decision as yet on acquisition of additional land for expansion of Toronto international airport.

I think the hon. member might be justified in thinking that the matter now rests in limbo.

In my file concerning the noise pollution problem as it relates to Toronto international airport I came across a map prepared by Bolt Beranek and Newman Dr. A. Borgiel. At least it is on the back of a notice sent by Dr. Borgiel to the Applewood Hills Homeowners Association in October 1968. Since Dr. Borgiel is president of the association it might be pertinent to put some of the notice on the record. It says in part:

The Department of Transport policy is as follows:

(a) "In areas subject to noise levels of 110 PNdBs (perceived noise levels) or more, residential development should not be permitted under any circumstances.

(b) In areas subject to noise levels of less than 110 PNdBs but at or above 100 PNdBs single family residential development should be avoided. All multiple family homes should be sound proof."

If that is the policy of the department, as I gather it is, it ought to have some bearing on the decision of he Ontario Municipal Board regarding subdivision development in the area. I think I am right in saying that such development has been held up. People have to wait and see what is to happen to the international airport. For that reason it is important that the minister should make a decision rapidly and make it known.

People in Etobicoke will not be able to enjoy fresh air; they will hardly dare to stick their noses outside their homes for fear of being assaulted with the hellish din coming from outside. That is pretty grim, and the minister ought to act quickly. People should not face such a prospect. The correspondence on the matter has been graphic enough. Since this matter may affect some 100,000 people who may have to live like moles in their homes, coming outside only to scurry to their automobiles, the minister ought to act immediately to try to correct this danger. If the department decides to expand the airport and if no way is found to curtail the noise of the supersonic transports, it will be hell on earth in that area and in all other areas where such noise is permitted. I suggest that the transport committee should get busy and look into the noise problem. Perhaps that part of the minister's estimates having to do with this matter ought to be referred to that committee so that we may have expert advice and find out exactly where we are going.

This morning, sir, the Minister of Transport made a complete, and I think welcome, break with tradition. He made a frank acknowledgement that the ice breaking activities in the gulf of St. Lawrence and St. Lawrence river were exactly for the purpose that we from the Atlantic area have contended for years, that is the development of commerce. This is the first time this acknowledgement has been made, and I give the minister credit for it. He did not, as his predecessors have done for a decade, try to hide behind the story that the icebreaking activities were for the purpose of flood control only and that the increase in commerce was sort of fortuitous. Now that we have the cards frankly on the table, we are enabled to make points which we were not able to make with success before concerning the effects of this deliberate policy on our own commerce in Atlantic Canada. I will get to that point in a moment.

One cannot engage in a transport debate in Canada without bringing in the name of that happy, sailing warrior, John Whitney Pickersgill, the president of the Canadian Transport Commission. In a speech in Halifax recently or in a press interview, Mr. Pickersgill raised the point of the subsidy being paid in Atlantic Canada. He said perhaps the time had come for a fresh look at this, and that the money paid in subsidy which is admittedly a large amount, could more usefully be spent in other ways. I do not know whether or not this was a trial balloon. In view of the very important decisions that have to be made by the minister and his government, I hope it was not a trial balloon and that perhaps Mr. Pickersgill was thinking out loud rather than flying any sort of advance signals on behalf of this government. However, this statement has worried me sufficiently that I should like to make some argument about it. In the abstract, it is a splendid statement, and perhaps that money could have been used for other purposes to improve transportation. By the way, the subsidies paid to the maritimes can be found in vote 25 of the estimates we are considering.

Suppose we take this statement one step further. I am not asking the minister if Mr. Pickersgill was enunciating government policy. However, I do ask the minister, if he considers that Pickersgillian opinion, would he consider this: In 1962, parliament voted $1.9 million for ice breaking in the St. Lawrence. In 1966, the amount was approximately $2.83 million. I presume it has risen since, having in mind inflation and the increase in icebreaking activities. Every time you break ice in the St. Lawrence river you add to the commerce going into the great ports along the St. Lawrence river. Now we have not only the acknowledgement of the minister that this has been done to help commerce, since there has been no alibi about flood control given today, but also we have been told there is going to be an increase in icebreaking activities because they were found to be of benefit to traffic on the St. Lawrence river. I am not one of those who wants to poach in one part of Canada to help another part of Canada. I just draw this very plain argument to the attention of the committee; if you do spend millions of dollars on icebreaking you are, in effect, subsidizing navigation to certain ports which are in competition with certain other ports.

If the Pickersgillian opinion ever becomes a fact and we cut out the maritime transportation subsidy of some $12 million a year, then I ask the government if it would apply these icebreaking charges, which must now be up to $4 million or $5 million a year, to the shippers who use these icebreaking facilities. It is a simple fact that if we cut out subsidies altogether, then special services should be paid for by those who take advantage of the services. So let us take the $4 million or $5 million, whatever the minister planned to use for icebreaking to help commerce, and charge it to the ships taking advantage of that service.

Then, let us go a step further. On page 500 of the estimates book, we find an item to cover the deficits of the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority amounting to $2.4 million. If Mr. Pickersgill is the unhappy harbinger of what is to come, then let us take the $2.4 million and apply it to the ships that use the St. Lawrence seaway. Some of these ships use the Welland canal service. On the same page in the estimates book we find an item for $9.855 million to cover the deficit of that operation. If the Pickersgillian formula is considered, then perhaps it would not be inappropriate if we were to apply that amount of money to the ships that use this great canal system.

I want to remind the committee as emphatically as I can that there are many amounts paid by the taxpayers of Canada which operate rather more to the benefit of central Canada than they do to the benefit of Atlantic Canada. I am not asking to cut them out. I am just arguing that we should not get that hell-bent to remove subsidies for Atlantic transportation that we forget to look at the ramifications involved in this procedure. Perhaps I have spent a little more time on this subject than I should, but after all Mr. Pickersgill does occupy a rather impressive position in the public service. I wanted at least to kick the idea around a bit—not him, because I do not believe in a personal approach and I have not attacked him. However, I did want at least to get my foot at his idea and boot it around the House of Commons for a few minutes for the consideration of members.

I should like now to deal with another matter, and perhaps when the minister replies he will deal with it. I refer to the end of the freeze on maritime freight rates, which I believe occurs around March 23. Perhaps the minister would give us some indication of what we can expect in that direction, and also whether he and the department are coming to grips with the l.c.l. problem that has been raised here before.

Now, there is the new matter of port development. The hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster made many interesting points with regard to the National Harbours Board operations. I agree with him that the board has been scrupulously fair in its decisions and has not acted by selecting one port over another. I think Halifax has had a break in the container age, with all respect to my friend from New Brunswick, because we have had a citizens committee which has been working with the port of Halifax commission, and the province of Nova Scotia has established a crown corporation which will help get Halifax into the new transportation age.

Finally, like most members, I am continually flying on the week ends and I should like to make a suggestion to the minister which I hope he will draw to the attention of the new president of Air Canada when that gentleman or lady is appointed next week. I say "lady" because there are a few people still on the fringes of the just society who have not been looked after yet. In any event, I would ask the minister to make this suggestion to the new president of Air Canada. We have reached the end of the Viscount age, but these planes can probably still be flown economically. Therefore I would ask whether there could be more flights from a city such as Ottawa that bypass the cities of Toronto or Montreal.

• (3:50 p.m.)

For example, Mr. Chairman, there is always a fair crowd of maritimes or Atlanticans on the flight I take to Halifax which leaves Ottawa on Friday afternoon. I do not think that the same traffic is there all week, but it seems to me that a direct flight to Halifax from Ottawa on certain days of the week would be of advantage. This would eliminate time spent in Montreal and the transfer of baggage from one plane to another that Air Canada now has to do.

I think that this is a useful concept. I think it could also be applied to flights from Ottawa to London, Ontario, which bypass Malton airport. Undoubtedly other examples come to the minister's mind. I think this is an approach worth looking at and I would be grateful if the minister would take this up on my behalf.

Mr. Danson: Mr. Chairman, I think this is one of the most worth-while debates we have experienced here recently, dealing with problems of great import. Problems of transportation are a very major factor in our social and economic development. We have agreed not to include in this debate the portion of the minister's portfolio that deals with housing but I suggest in our remarks we cannot be unrelated to urban problems.

I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Etobicoke speak so well and so learnedly about a problem that affects his constituency perhaps more directly than mine at the present time, although in my constituency we are aware of these earth shaking noises that originate 10 to 15 miles away. This is typical of the research that is going on and the study being made by members from the greater Toronto area who are deeply concerned about the problem he raised. The hon. member for Peel South, who I am sure would have enjoyed participating in this debate today, is unfortunately ill, but he has done quite extensive work in this connection. We are trying to avoid parochial considerations in our thinking in relation to Toronto international airport. My colleague for Etobicoke has covered the technical aspects of its development and proposed expansion, I think very creditably indeed.

We from urban areas and the fringes of urban areas do not necessarily think that the big cities of the world are the best cities. We do not even suggest that living in big cities is better than living in small towns or in the country. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, we sometimes have our doubts on that score. However, there certainly is a very great danger being brought home to us as time goes on in the form of proliferation of the great megalopolis and the problems this brings. We see these problems in the United States today, Mr. Chairman, and they are tragic. We have an opportunity to avoid these problems here, and we are very sensitive to them.

In my view, Mr. Chairman, I think we must thoroughly explore the moving of major air traffic away from large population centres. This is not a problem that is peculiar to Montreal, or Toronto, or Winnipeg, or Vancouver, or the other cities across this land. It is a problem that is being faced by every community in every country in the world today. It is a crisis that is upon us. We are forced to react to the problem rather than to plan for or anticipate it, and that is bad. It is a tough problem to anticipate. As my colleagues have said, technology is moving so fast that it is difficult to keep up with it. However, there are certain trends that we can see.

There are several agencies around the world that are dealing with some of the problems, I.A.T.A. being perhaps, the principal one, though I understand the Canadian Transport Commission is doing some excellent work. The commission is hiring some of the most qualified personnel in the world to come to this country to work in the challenging atmosphere of the commission. The Department of Transport itself is also conducting extensive studies. Other institutes are working on approaches to transportation studies, as opposed to urban studies.

In the case of urban studies we have as competent people in Canada as exist anywhere in the world. There are some outstanding people in the world, of course, but country for country and person for person I think that we can hold our heads pretty high and can staff any facility to conduct urban studies. However, there is an extreme shortage of experts in the area of transportation studies.

I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that we in Canada should take the initiative to set up a world institute of transportation studies. It could be situated somewhere in this country and staffed by people pre-eminent in this field. We could make it a world centre for transportation studies. We could use our own people and also bring in on a permanent basis experts from around the world associated with the institute as members of the faculty. We could also invite visiting experts from all parts of the world. I do not like to keep using the word "experts" because I do not think that anyone can be that expert. Expert implies a perfection; I am referring to the highly qualified specialist. These people can conduct studies on methods of transportation. As my hon. friend from Etobicoke said, Mr. Chairman, this institute could conduct studies which are presently not being done on the effect of noise.

What we require, Mr. Chairman, are long range programs. We have to have—I was going to say crash programs but I should not use that word in terms of air transportation. What we require are studies that focus upon constructing terminals which are situated some distance from urban areas to handle the supersonic and jumbo jets, as I mentioned before.

This would eliminate, Mr. Chairman, the great problem caused by noise. It does not eliminate the noise, but at least it would place it somewhere else than in a densely populated area. It would also eliminate air pollution, if that proves to be a problem; it would help air safety and ease congestion in the air and on the ground around the airport.

If we could use the Toronto international airport as an example, Mr. Chairman, and consider that Toronto is facing the same problem as Montreal, then we could conceivably establish one major facility midway between Toronto and Montreal. This would involve one cost rather than two costs. The economic studies on this matter indicate that the actual cost factors, aside from the social factors, are so very much in favour of a single facility.

The key to this concept, Mr. Chairman, is of course getting people from the major centres of Montreal and Toronto to the central facility which, let us assume, is in the Kingston-Trenton area. There is a lot of advantage to an area such as this in that the lake is to the south, and you have largely unused land, certainly land with a much lighter density of population than in the major centres, to the north. Straight across the lake there are communities like Syracuse and Rochester, and possibly Buffalo. These communities could be serviced perhaps by hovercraft; so that the facility would truly be an international one.

However, Mr. Chairman, as I have pointed out, the key to this is getting people to the airport from major cities. This is where I suggest our basic study be done, and that we establish an institute to study the problem. Once we begin to move these people from urban centres to the facility at speeds well in excess of 100 miles an hour—and I think we have to talk in terms of moving them at 200 miles an hour—then the journey can be done well within the hour. This is the time it takes to get to airports now, and it will take much longer in future unless something is done. Once we solve this problem, we solve the problem of short-range transportation. If we can move people between Montreal and a midway point in an hour, we can move them from Montreal to Toronto in two hours, and I believe a lot of people would be delighted to go to Toronto. The point is that we should be taking 80 or 90 per cent of the inter-city traffic out of the air and putting it on the ground. Let us begin to think in terms of bringing people back to the ground. The same solution handles the two problems. Cities within a radius of 500 miles could all be served by a radically designed method of fast transport. It is not enough to schedule turbo trains four times a day, because planes are taking off constantly.

We are inclined to think of air traffic only in terms of people, but the airlines are quickly becoming large-scale carriers of cargo. The trend shows a rapidly accelerating increase in the amount of cargo handled, and means must be found of getting this traffic in and out of the major communities to which in most cases it is headed. I suggest two forms of transportation should be studied more thoroughly than others. One is the monorail system, the techniques of which have already been worked out. Special containers could be designed for both passengers and freight, in large and small units, for use on this system. Since the power source would be kept going all the time, people and goods could be moved along a monorail as the need arose. High speeds would be possible and great flexibility could be achieved. Right-of-way problems would still remain, but not nearly to the extent created by tracks on the ground. Traffic engineering would be simplified since, of course, roads could be built beneath the monorail.

The form of transport which I really think should be investigated is the pipe line system. As people, we do not like to think of ourselves being propelled through a pipe line. Most of us are familiar with the apparatus used in some stores by means of which money and messages are sped through tubes by use of a vacuum. This principle can be applied on a much larger scale to carry cargo and human beings. Right-of-way problems would be greatly reduced because, of course, a tube can be buried underground. Here again, containers could be specially designed, and aircraft could be built to accommodate these containers. We might indeed reach a stage at which every passenger had his own little container; we would be loaded into the tube with our luggage and remain there until reaching our destination. This may appear far out, but it is not so far out that we should not look to it as a real alternative to the chaos which is developing now.

There are subsidiary benefits. An intermediate location between Toronto and Montreal could serve the upper New York state area as well. Remember, we have a man like Mr. Buckminster Fuller, an artist in materials and a clear thinker at 73 years of age—a present-day Leonardo de Vinci, and one of the great men of our age. He has suggested the construction of a proto-city for Toronto, but such a city could be built anywhere. The optimum population would be about 100,000 people, and the new city might very well be built to accommodate those who will have to serve and maintain the projected airport, together with their wives and families, the services they themselves will need, and so on.

It would not need to be under the noise pattern either. Taking advantage of high speed transportation, these people could live a hundred miles away and still get to work daily. Such a project allows a great opportunity for planning. If a new city were built on the east side of the airport, and worked out well, we could build another on the west side, taking the pressure of growth from the metropolis and spreading it across the country where work is needed and where people can live well. Profiting by high speed transportation they would still be able to experience the advantages and disadvantages of the city, if they wished.

Combined with action along these lines we could take advantage of our International Institute of Transportation Studies and associate it with a university such as Queen's at Kingston. It would be a good idea to make Queen's pre-eminent throughout the world in transport studies. There are other things, such as the Bureau for Municipal Research in Toronto which is doing excellent studies for 45 cities around the world with populations of a million or more. It is pleasant to think that there people can come from countries all over the world directly to our great international airport, and be in Toronto within an hour, or in Montreal in the same time should they wish to visit IATO or EXPO. But if we can institute such a rapid transit system between Toronto and Montreal, what is to prevent our extending it to Quebec or, maybe ultimately, right to the end of the St. Lawrence?

An hon. Member: Or to Moncton?

Mr. Danson: Or to Moncton; an important place. Or right down to Windsor. Then we would have fast transport from Detroit to the mouth of the St. Lawrence. And what would prevent our running a transportation link to Ottawa? Once we have achieved this technology we shall have solved a problem of particular importance to a country such as ours, with its vast distances and difficulties in communication which make it hard to get around, even to summer resorts; at one stroke we shall have found a way toward an improved economy and a richer life. For reasons which may not even be known to ourselves, Canada is a country highly regarded around the world and any initiative on our part would be well received by other nations, many of which would be glad to join with us in a venture of this kind, making Canada an outstanding centre for developing a better way of life.

Mr. Lundrigan: I did not at first intend to take part in the discussion of these estimates. Lately I have developed a habit of becoming involved in discussions concerning a number of estimates produced by various departments, and today I thought I would remain silent. But then I realized we do not see the minister in the house every day of the week. We know he is a very busy man who has been moving around Canada a great deal in the last couple of months.

It is not every day that we have a chance to present our points of view and discuss our problems with a minister who himself confronts one of the greatest problems in Canada, which is the satisfactory discharge of his duties as minister responsible for both transportation and housing. In these circumstances I thought I would say a few words. I am all in favour of having a minister take the bull by the horns. When we ask this or any other minister to take the bull by the tail and do a good job, it is really asking too much. I concur with a number of other hon. members who have made reference to the onerous burden carried by this minister in having to administer a dual portfolio. As I say, this is asking him to take the bull by the tail and, although I would have to ask some of my western colleagues about it, I believe this is a nearly impossible job.

I consider the transport portfolio to be one of the most important areas of activity and endeavour with respect to most of the regions of Canada. How can we talk about economic development unless we are prepared to talk first about transportation? Everybody knows that Canada is a resource country. How can we talk about opening up the resources of our nation without first considering transportation? How can we talk about markets and labour problems, and how can we cope with the costs of living when we have transportation problems that concern these things? I consider transportation to be one of the main avenues, one of the main foci for the development of parts of Canada which are suffering as the result of regional disparity.

I do not pretend to be an expert on transportation, but if I had time today to develop the position of many great thinkers, many great economists and many great people in the areas of development in other countries, in the United States and other countries of the world, I could show that transportation is the necessary avenue for the development of our nation and for the elimination of many of our regional problems.

Today I wish to focus on one major problem in transportation, and that is Canadian ferry services. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of people in many parts of the Atlantic region I have already made representations to the Minister of Transport about ferry services, and I must admit that most of what I have been seeking is at least receiving some consideration. But I think it is time that the question of ferry services in the whole of Canada came up for revision and discussion.

The only trans-Canada highway for people living on islands that are not going to be connected with the mainland is the ocean, and the ferry which bridges the gap. This is their trans-Canada highway. I am aware that substantial subsidies are being paid to individuals and various organizations and groups to operate ferries in various places, but I cannot understand why significant segments of the population living on islands have to pay for the use of their trans-Canada highway.

Why is it that people living on islands four of five miles off the coast, islands with populations of 5,000 and 6,000 people, have to tolerate the kind of services now provided by private enterprise with the assistance of the federal government, and yet have to pay to the point where it is prohibitive for them to use the ferry services? How can we give equal economic, social and cultural benefits to all the people of Canada if we prevent people from travelling to the mainland by not providing good ferry services and, when we do provide those services we do it at such a cost that it is literally impossible for them to travel?

I could describe in detail a number of problems faced by my colleagues from the Atlantic region, and by a good number of my friends from British Columbia, from various parts of Quebec and other parts of Canada. I could describe the costs that people living on islands have to pay in order to travel on their trans-Canada highway. It is time that we gave up this higgledy-piggledy method of providing services to people in island communities, and that we took a hard look at what we are actually doing.

Every now and then a private operator who is not getting enough from his ferry service makes representations to his member of parliament, to the Minister of Transport, and to Jack Pickersgill if he knows him well enough, and the result is that we get an extra $2,000 or $5,000 channeled into that service. This is the sort of lack of planning that my hon. friend from one of the important ridings in the Atlantic region mentioned several days ago. This is not taking issue with the problem.

Although I know I will not get attention given to this point tomorrow morning I think it is time that the government of Canada started treating people on island areas—I do not mean areas which contain only five or ten families, but areas where ferry transportation will have to be provided for much larger numbers over the next 10, 20 or 50 years—as if they are part of Canada. The government should provide these people wtih free ferry services so that they can have a better chance to take advantage of the economic circumstances that people in other parts of Canada take advantge of at present. The government should help these people take part in this just society of ours. Ferry services should be provided free of cost by the Canadian government, or by private enterprise with the assistance of the government, so that these island people can use their trans-Canada highway without paying a prohibitive cost.

A few months ago I had the privilege of visiting one island community in my riding. I got to the island but I was a little leery about getting back when I realized how much it cost to get there. It cost two friends and myself $48 to travel six or seven miles of ocean, and this is a service that is provided only five or six times a week. Some 5,000 people live on that island and I say they are not treated like people in other parts of our country. As I say, it is time the government of Canada started treating these people in accordance with the facts, which are that the ocean they travel over is part of their trans-Canada highway, and is the only trans-Canada highway they will ever know.

To be more specific, Mr. Chairman, I would like to take issue with only one section of the estimates of the Department of Transport. I have been looking rather closely at the costs of administration of the Canadian Transport Commission. We hear all kinds of conversations and reasons as to why we cannot provide this or that, that we have scarce economic resources, that we are scarce in dollars and cents and must budget accordingly. Yet at page 537 of the blue book it has been drawn to my attention by quite a number of my friends who are not of my political affiliation, who are not even members of the opposition, that 17 members of the Canadian Transport Commission receive a grand total of $461,000 in salaries. We have a president of that commission who gets $40,000, enough to see him through the winter. Two vice presidents get $35,000 each. We had three chairmen getting $27,000 each and now we are being asked to increase the number to five chairmen, each getting $27,000. Then there are nine commission members who receive the lowly figure of $24,000 each.

The 17 people working for the federal government get an average of $27,000 a man, not including expenses. I do not know what the grand total would be, including expenses. The Minister of Transport will know that, but this is a staggering figure $461,000 to run one commission, and that covers just the top executive, just the crust of the commission. If we were to poll the 264 members of the house I believe the great majority of them, at least people who have a conscience, would take issue with this kind of spending of the people's taxes. To me this is an atrocity. I cannot support this kind of spending.

I shall not go into the detail of a few specific problems I have, because I believe the minister is already aware of these, since I have had a discussion with him concerning the problem of Gander international airport. However, I might make one brief reference to Gander international airport. I have spoken to him and have made representations to his office. I feel one way in which the government of Canada can take issue with the problem of disparity in one part of Canada is by paying the attention it should to Gander international airport, because this airport could provide economic stimulus to the whole of the east coast of Newfoundland. I hope the parliamentary secretary will communicate this to the minister. I have already made representations, but I have not received a response to these, although I understand the minister is considering my problem.

I did indicate that the present 8,900 feet of runway space there is inadequate to serve the growing needs of changing technology, if I might use the jargon that is used by people. The 8,900 feet of runway will not serve the needs of the aircraft. Several prominent people in aviation, including a noted Canadian figure, have stated that unless runway facilities are at least 11,000 feet, within a year many of the present airports not having these facilities will soon be out of date.

The international airport at Gander has a great future and I believe it could provide a stimulus for the whole of the east coast of Newfoundland. I will not go into any of the plans which are presently being negotiated with regard to other phases of the airport, because with the advent of the jumbo jets and stretched jets we cannot discuss these concepts until we have adequate landing facilities. We have a fine airport at Gander, but unless we get the little bit of extra runway which is necessary we can forget about the future development of the east coast of Newfoundland as I envisage it at the present moment.

Lastly, in looking at the estimates, page 539, I see an item of $27,500 for a ferry service between Carmanville and Fogo Island in Newfoundland. This amount of $27,500 is about one fifth of what should have been provided to serve the people in this island community. As a result of my correspondence with the minister's office I have information that the amount of the subsidy to be paid in 1968-69 will be $40,000. I wonder what the reason is for the discrepancy. Perhaps I am misinterpreting the intent of the estimates. I bring this specific point to the attention of the minister, and he might like to comment on this later on.

Mr. Schreyer: Mr. Chairman, I have found it interesting and informative to listen to the statements made in the past while by the previous three speakers. I was particularly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for York North, who made some mention of Mr. Buckminster Fuller. It seems to me that the hon. member would strike one as being a junior Canadian version of Mr. Fuller. The majestic sweep of his forecasting leaves one in awe. I do no say that in a facetious manner. I certainly concur with his long range view that with the advent of supersonic and jumbo jet aircraft it will be necessary to depart substantially in our thinking from the present practice and attitude of the officials of the department, and even of Air Canada. The notion of a regional airport or regional air service centre to serve a vast region including the metropolitan complexes of Toronto, Montreal and Ottawa strikes me in a very positive way. I am one of those who believe that a national policy is not worthy of its name unless it takes adequate cognizance of the regional needs of the different areas of the country.

I should now like to refer for a few moments to the fate of the Air Canada base at Winnipeg. I notice that the hon. member for York North extended the geographic regions that this air centre would serve first to Montreal, then Quebec, and then moving east to Moncton after I talked him into it. I was hoping he would find something in the scheme of things for Winnipeg in respect of the overhaul facilities it has for jet aircraft at the present time. What is pertinent at this time is that just last night the minister for regional development made a speech in the city of Montreal on the concept of regional disparity in Canada. Since I cannot find a report of his speech in any other paper except La Presse I should like to place on the record one paragraph which I believe relates directly to this entire problem of regional disparity. This ties in directly with the problem of the transfer of the Air Canada base. It is as follows:

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand defined as a long term objective of his regional department the regrouping of industries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Schreyer: The honourable members are too enthusiastic.

Mr. Clermont: No, it is for the way you speak French.

Mr. Schreyer: I continue, Mr. Chairman.

—not in huge "cancerous urban centres" but in three or four average-sized industrial centres which would be, for instance, in Quebec: Montreal, Quebec, Rimouski and Chicoutimi. On the other hand, the implantation of industries adapted to the needs and regional conditions in the underdeveloped areas.

[English]

As I understand the hon. minister he is saying that it is a great mistake, in respect of the national economy, to take a laissez-faire attitude and not take an interest in the phenomenon whereby more and more industry and more and more technical capability becomes crammed into one or two metropolitan complexes, while the rest of the country remains underdeveloped and some areas which have been slow developing slide back. In connection with the great metropolitan complex of Montreal I should like to say it is my understanding that because of the tremendous increase in air traffic in the next few years it will be necessary to spend many millions of dollars to extend the air terminal facilities at Montreal. No one is complaining about that. This is an obvious necessity and one which will be taken care of by any government at the federal level. In addition to that, however, it is my understanding that not only will millions of dollars be spent on expanding the air terminal facilities but also that it will be necessary for Air Canada to spend millions of dollars in increasing its jet aircraft hangar facilities. This is something that was not taken into account at the time when one or two inquiry commissions made their inquiry and report on the problem of the location of the Air Canada base.

I should like the Minister of Transport to indicate clearly whether or not it is a fact that in the next decade there will be a major capital expenditure for increased air terminal facilities at Montreal. In addition, would the minister indicate clearly whether it is in the plans of Air Canada to spend a major amount of money in capital construction costs to increase the size of the jet engine overhaul and hangar facilities at Montreal. If that should be true, then it does in a substantial way impinge upon the decision as to whether or not there is a purely economic overwhelming case that this overhaul base should be transferred from Winnipeg to Montreal.

There is much more I should like to say in this connection, but since I made some reference to the subject not long ago I shall desist from saying anything more at this time. It is difficult for me to understand the hon. member for Témiscamingue—not my colleague, but the leader of the Ralliement Creditiste—who said, and I believe I understood him correctly, that we must consider the problem of the location of the Air Canada base "strictement du point de vue économique": that is, strictly from an economic point of view. I was surprised to hear the hon. member say that, because he knows full well that other considerations are involved. He has had to fight hard during the past five years for the establishment of a policy in our crown corporations and the C.N.R., which should be used as an instrument reflecting the bilingual character of this country. You cannot look at these operations all the time strictly from the point of view of economics. If that were so, how could one hope to persuade these crown corporations that they should, even at extra expense, undertake to provide services in a bilingual manner in order to meet the needs of Canadians, regardless of whether they are French or English speaking? The hon. member for Témiscamingue was not taking the position that the operations of our crown corporations must be looked at only from an economic point of view, because at times there are other factors which become overriding.

In connection with the Air Canada base at Winnipeg and whether it should be removed completely and added to the already large operation at Montreal, this does not involve just a matter of the internal operation of that crown corporation but also the question as to the regional needs in different parts of the country. We must consider whether we should put our eggs in one basket and follow the trend of some of the so-called banana republics, where everything is crammed into one or two large metropolitan cities and the rest of the country remains in extreme poverty and squalor with very little opportunity. This is what is involved, not just the internal economic operations of crown corporations and balance sheets.

At this time I wish to refer to a subject which has been touched upon by two previous speakers on the other side of the house, the hon. members for Etobicoke and York North. They ventured to suggest that within the Department of Transport a greater effort should be made, either under the aegis of the D.O.T. or a separate body, to perform a greater amount of research in the field of transportation, its economics, the implications of new modes of transportation and public health and safety. I am in complete agreement. Neither of those gentlemen referred to research into the effects of sound, but mentioned only research in respect of noise, as they put it. They mentioned noise in relation to public health and safety, or the dangers involved.

It is my feeling that this idea should be extended to encompass research into the effects of sound, not just noise, which implies sound at the upper decibel range. We should also consider sound which is imperceptive to the human ear; the sounds of high frequencies, supersonics and so on. It is my conviction, having been interested for several months in this matter, that the Department of Transport, although it performs the function of licensing of equipment and operators, does not really know what the safe permissive standard of radiant energy emission is. I would not say that if I did not feel convinced that this is so. There are a number of officials in the Department of Transport licensing branch whose function it is to check all applications for telecommunications equipment operations. Presumably they check to make sure that the power output is within a frequency range, and issue a license on the assumption that the equipment will operate within that acceptable range and that the power output will not be such as to pose a threat to public health and safety.

Much more research has been done in the United States in this regard than here in Canada. Many millions of dollars have been spent in this area and the people there are much more uncertain and uneasy about their standards of safety than we are in Canada. This is a very puzzling situation. If one asks the Department of Transport here whether it is satisfied that a microwave tower emitting energy at the rate of about 5 watts, at a frequency range of 6,000 megacycles, is safe, he is told it comes within the standards which have been accepted for a number of years and that there cannot be any possibility of danger.

I have found from reading through some of the records of the hearings by the United States senate commerce committee, on this topic of radiation control for health safety, that the top experts in the United States agree almost unanimously, or certainly by an overwhelming majority, that the standards maintained there during the past decade are seriously out of date. They suggest they are crude, require refinement and that a better assessment of standards should be made. The standards upon which we issue licences do not take into account the possible non-thermal effect of radiant energy over long periods of time on human tissue, and forms of biological plant and animal life.

What are we doing in this country to deal with this problem or potential hazard? It is becoming more important with each passing year that something be done, because there is an increasing use of this kind of equipment. There is greater use by military authorities and the telecommunications industry. Beginning about two years ago there has been a steady increase in the use of this type of equipment in kitchens. Many ovens are equipped to use microwave radiant energy to cook foods.

The examples I have given represent only a small part of this phenomenon, which is growing with the state of knowledge in this area. I say without apology or wish to hurt anyone's feelings that our research and understanding in this regard is extremely inadequate. Our Department of Agriculture is conducting some research in this field. It has granted $3,000 to the University of Manitoba for research into the potential hazards of the thermal effect of microwave radiation and microwave energy. I suggest this is nonsense. Any research worthy of the name in this field must engage itself over a long period of time in field conditions, and not just laboratory conditions. It must concern itself with research into possible non-thermal effects of microwave and electrical frequency radiation. I am not speaking futuristically when I say there is an urgent need in this respect. The need is now. Since the Department of Transport issues licences for the operation of this equipment, it must undertake the research and not leave it to the Department of Agriculture. The Department of National Health and Welfare is not carrying out this research either. There does not seem to be any liaison between the departments that might be concerned, and to the extent that there is research it is inadequate not only in terms of dollars and cents but in the terms of reference. All in all, it is a pretty sad situation.

[Mr. Schreyer.]

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the suggestion of the hon. member for York North and others for more research by the D.O.T. is accepted. I hope this research will be undertaken in a more comprehensive way, rather than confining it to noise. I hope the research will direct itself to the possible harmful effects of sound on all ranges, and radiation energy.

I would like to put on the record excerpts from the hearings held before a United States Congress committee, but because of the time factor and the fact that other hon. members wish to speak on these estimates I will deny myself that temptation. I feel tempted, however, to send to the Minister of Transport not just a few excerpts but all three volumes of the hearings, so that he will not treat this matter cavalierly and with indifference.

Another matter I should like to mention is the attitude of the Department of Transport with respect to regional air carriers. I know that the D.O.T. is preoccupied with our large-scale rail and air operations, but in Canada there are air lines of small and intermediate size that are of significant importance to the economies of their areas. I find, just as the hon. member for Churchill has been pointing out in the last few days, that the Department of Transport is not very much concerned with the operating difficulties which some of our regional air lines have to face.

Let us take, for example, the Winnipeg international airport complex. The regional air carriers—and there are a number of them often find it difficult to get enough hangar space, area space, in order to service, maintain and overhaul their aircraft. They find it difficult, therefore, to always meet their licence requirements in terms of frequency of service, and the like, and this becomes an increasing problem to them. This is a pity indeed, because for the northern areas of every province, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and others—in fact, from sea to sea—the importance of the smaller carriers cannot be overestimated. To the extent that the Department of Transport is unco-operative in assisting these air carriers to maintain their operations, the department is doing a disservice to the economic development and servicing of the north country.

A few days ago, in a rather informal way and at rather short notice someone in the Department of Transport—I suspect it was the minister or the minister without portfolio from Winnipeg, or both of them—ordered the convening of a meeting at Winnipeg to which were invited the regional, smaller air carriers. This meeting was convened because there has been a persistent problem over the last few years for these air line managers and operators to obtain co-operation from the Department of Transport with regard to getting hangar space.

I want to know how much longer this situation will persist. The Department of National Defence has a few air force hangars there. The rumour is that for long periods of time these hangars are under-utilized and could be made available on a rental basis to some of the smaller air line operators. This has not been done. I think the Department of Transport could give some help in this regard. The leasing policy of the department is not any help. As I understand the situation at the airport sites, they insist upon only short term leases and expect the smaller air lines to build permanent facilities. There is a need for conciliation to solve this problem.

I think it would be just as well, Mr. Chairman, if I resumed my place. I have drawn to the attention of the minister and his associate three problems which I consider to be important at the present time. One is the question of the proposed move of the overhaul base from Winnipeg; the second is the lack of enthusiasm by the Department of Transport with regard to accommodating the needs of regional air carriers and smaller air line operators in different parts of the country, with particular reference to Winnipeg; and the third is the need for vastly expanded research by the D.O.T. in the area of the hazard and threat to public health and safety of various forms of microwave energy, which is the form of energy used in telecommunications and which the D.O.T. licenses.

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Chairman, I would like to answer as many questions as possible in the few minutes remaining this afternoon. May I begin by answering some of the questions raised by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster. With regard to the Robinson report which was received in October, 1967, I can say that the department has been actively engaged in the evaluation and implementation of the recommendations. The recommendations covered a broad range of activities—organization, recruitment, training, personnel matters and operational equipment.

Many of the recommendations respecting terms and conditions of employment are subject to the collective bargaining process. In this regard the Canadian air traffic controllers and the employer completed negotiation of their first collective agreement in August of this year. The tremendous growth in aviation has required that there be continuing improvement and adjustment in the air traffic control services—recruitment, staffing, training, equipment, etc.—on a programmed basis to keep pace with the requirements and maintain the department's standard of safety, which is second to none in any country. The hon. member also raised the question of general assistance to the Atlantic area, maritimes freight rates assistance, less-than-carload lot rates, and so on.

I will not take much time to deal with the matter at the moment. I shall merely assure my hon. friend that we are undertaking a very active study. A day or two ago I had a chance to speak to one of the people directly involved in the task force which was established by the Atlantic premiers. He has indicated they are well advanced with their thinking and we should have a report from them in a few weeks. In the meantime the studies which have been done by the Canadian Transport Commission have been going forward in parallel, so that we may look at them both concurrently. Very early in the new year we hope to give these our undivided attention in the hope that we can come to some conclusion designed to provide the best value with regard to transportation facilities for the people of the Atlantic region.

Mr. Bell: May I interrupt the minister, Mr. Chairman. Will he undertake, say in the next two weeks at some appropriate time, to say something about the matter of the expiry of the freeze on certain types of rates. I ask that, since it looks as if we shall have no new legislation before March. That is our insurmountable problem. I assume the minister agrees that the freeze will cause trouble. I understand the governor in council might be able to deal with it; but since this matter is fairly important and looms large I should appreciate an assurance from the minister with regard to the expiry of the freeze on rates. That might be enough for the time being.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think I can give that commitment, Mr. Chairman, because it is related to all the other aspects of Atlantic transportation. I would not want to comment on one aspect, when that might be out of context with other aspects.

With regard to the other reports referred to by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster that come within the jurisdiction of the department, I can assure the committee that work is proceeding as quickly and as effectively as possible.

With regard to revising the Canada Shipping Act, an outside consultant has been engaged to take an independent view of the research work done by our own experts, as well as to recommend a form that new legislation ought to take.

With regard to the report of the royal commission on pilotage, the government has received the first part of the five part report and a team of departmental officials has been established to prepare the groundwork for policy decisions by the government, in addition to those already known to my hon. friend.

The hon. member also wanted to know what happened at Dorval on November 11. Perhaps the hon. member's knowledge is more extensive than mine. In any event, the department has sufficient equipment to keep the airport open and, as a matter of fact, runways were never closed at any time during the storm in question. The aircraft parking apron was, however, in a bad condition, because of inability to move snow off the apron. Trucking of snow off the airport was carried out by contract; the airport was not equipped with trucks for this purpose. The contractor was advised that his services would be required by a stated time but his trucks were unable to reach the airport, due to the blockage of roads leading to the airport. Vehicular traffic was completely disrupted due to stalled cars, etc., and some of the airport staff who left work at 4 p.m. did not reach their homes until midnight. Operations at the airport were suspended for ten hours due to a combination of blockage of road traffic to the airport, conditions of the parking apron and visibility. The latter factor was instrumental in many airlines suspending their operations. The storm in question was the worst in years in the Montreal area from the point of view of snowfall. I assure my hon. friend that I will speak to the personnel of our meteorological branch and ask them to see that this does not happen again.

[Mr. Bell.]

Mr. Bell: May I interject, Mr. Chairman that we, who were on the way to the House of Commons in Ottawa, were most upset because we could not find the V.I.P. room until five o'clock in the morning.

Mr. Stanfield: It must not happen again.

An hon. Member: Is that the washroom?

Mr. Hellyer: I think I had better not comment further on that interjection. The hon. member for Moose Jaw inquired about extending the season at the port of Churchill. We have a study nearing completion that deals with the extension of the shipping season. This is being carried out, with some degree of co-operation, with the Manitoba royal commission investigating the future of northern Manitoba. It is expected that a preliminary finding will be available in published form within three or four months. I can also assure my hon. friend that at the proposed first urban conference on transportation, members of this house will be represented. I hope they will include some members of our transport committee.

The hon. member for Témiscamingue asked for consideration with respect to the continuation of trains 83 and 84. I am sure he will appreciate that this is a matter for the Canadian Transport Commission and that representations should be made to the railway committee of that commission when public hearings are held. I noted, however, a slight degree of inconsistency in the hon. member's remarks. Although he insisted that the decision respecting the Winnipeg air base should be made strictly on economic grounds, he said that these trains ought to be kept in service notwithstanding—and I took this admission from his remarks—that they are not economical. This lack of consistency appears from time to time in public life and must be taken into account when future plans are being made.

Mr. Stanfield: That is a good sentence.

Mr. Hellyer: It is one I copied from a former holder of the office now occupied by the hon. gentleman.

The hon. member for Etobicoke made an excellent representation on behalf of the residents of his riding advising against the major expansion at Toronto international airport. He raised a number of problems which are indeed relevant. All I can say at this time is that they were also raised by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants and all those factors that have been raised will be taken into consideration before a final decision is made. I think that has been understood from the beginning. There are many factors in favour of the major expansion, although there are good reasons to know that would disturb quite a number of people. I can only assure my hon. friends that all points of view will be listened to and considered before we make a final decision.

The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate asked a number of questions. I shall only deal with one of them as my time has almost expired. He mentioned the Carmanville-Fogo subsidy. I can only say that this is administered by the water transport committee. Perhaps the hon. member could pass his question to the Canadian Transport Commission and have it dealt with before the committee of that commission. In addition he asked about the possibility of extending the runway at Gander. In that regard I have a letter which I will send him in answer to an earlier inquiry. It states, in effect, that the department will expand these runways when there is a demand for this from the users. At present we have not been requested, either by international or domestic users of this airport, to expand the runway facilities there. These questions are constantly under review and if it is decided that an additional runway is required in order to facilitate the landings of aircraft, that of course will be taken into consideration by the department.

The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants raised a question similar to the one raised by the hon. member for Saint John-Lancaster with respect to maritime transportation generally. I can also assure him that this matter will come under very active consideration in the weeks ahead and I hope it will not be too long before a report on the matter is presented.

He also asked for consideration to be given to providing flights from Halifax to places like Ottawa. I expect he realizes that this will come about when traffic is sufficient to support that kind of service. A number of new services have been inaugurated; for example, there is a flight now from Winnipeg to Ottawa. Without doubt a great many more services will come into being in the months and years ahead as additional traffic is generated.

• (5:00 p.m.)

The hon. member for York North made a very interesting speech in which he proposed a far out, but perhaps not that far out, alternative to the expansion of Toronto international airport. In doing so he also raised a number of interesting ideas and suggestions in respect of urban development in the broader sense, and better value in housing. I was therefore listening in both capacities and trying to put the whole scheme together in my mind. I can only thank him for at least stretching our minds a little by giving us these ideas to consider.

The hon. member for Selkirk mentioned his concern about the five watt microwave transmitter of 6,000 megacycles. I should like to remind him, not as an indication of my lack of concern, that during the war radar was operated on the order of one million watts without any harmful effects being observed. At the same time I can assure my hon. friend we are interested and concerned in adding to the total bank of scientific knowledge relating to modern technological developments. I am sure there is a lot we do not know as yet. I am sure, too, that the hon. member knows that the sun radiates energy not far from this section of the spectrum. This, too, has effects on the human body which are not fully appreciated.

An hon. Member: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Hellyer: I think perhaps the next time around, because there is one more answer I should like to give and I have already transgressed on the good nature of the house to the extent of an extra five minutes.

In so far as the Winnipeg airport is concerned, I should like to advise that recently there were negotiations between my department and the Department of National Defence as a result of which the Department of National Defence agreed to make available to us half of hangar No. 4, that is on the east side. This space will be available immediately and will partially accommodate the traffic there. We have also made an arrangement for a parcel of land adjacent to hangar No. 4. Next summer we will commence construction of additional facilities on that parcel. Furthermore, the consultant's long range study that the government requested has been considered by our department. This is the subject of further negotiations which are presently taking place with the Department of National Defence and will enable us to provide additional facilities. I think it will not be too long before we will be able to provide adequate facilities for commercial users at Winnipeg.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, may I thank all hon. gentlemen who have participated in the debate this afternoon. I think they have been most constructive in their interventions and I hope that if there are any questions remaining we can deal with them at a future date, or on orders of the day.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and request leave to sit again at the next sitting of the house?

Progress reported.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MOTION TO FORGO SITTING ON THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 28

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I should like to request permission to revert to motions so that we can make an order with respect to the business for next week.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Has the minister leave to put his proposal forward at this time.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): It was suggested that the house might not sit one or two days during next week so that members could give all their attention for a day or two to the business before the standing committees of the house. Consultations have taken place through the usual channels, and I believe that the motion which I am going to suggest to the house would be generally accepted. I move, therefore:

That the sitting of this house on Thursday, November 28, 1968, shall be suspended, but for the purposes of the special order made on September 20, 1968, that day is to be counted against the total of 17 days allotted to the business of supply.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to say a word at this time, Mr. Speaker, to indicate that we are prepared to go along with this motion in an effort to expedite the work of the committees. I should point out, of course, as is indicated in the motion, that this day comes off the very limited number of days available to the house for supply. We are agreeable to this in an effort to be co-operative, in view of the very high degree of congestion in the work of the committees which is aggravated, of course, by the fact that there are two sets of estimates coming before this session of parliament. This means that the committees, in addition to being concerned with their ordinary work over a full session, are confronted by an additional work load.

Quite frankly, I think the committees are finding it difficult to be properly manned and to discharge the burden of work with which they are confronted. We are agreeing to this motion, not because we do not value the relatively few supply days that are available, but because we feel it is necessary to do so, in view of the congestion of work with which the committees are confronted. We are prepared to try this procedure for one day, to see if it will afford some relief to this extreme congestion.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Naturally, Mr. Speaker, we welcome this motion since it implements a suggestion made from this corner of the house. I just have one point I should like to make, and this is not a reservation or qualification so far as this motion is concerned. If this experiment is tried again, we would not like it to be a precedent to be followed every time the house takes a day off for committee work that the day has to come off our supply days. We think that can be negotiated in the future, and we would not want the passing of this motion to be taken as a precedent in that respect.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Since there is a time limit on the consideration of the estimates, Mr. Speaker—I think it is December 12—would the house leader not consider extending this motion to cover two days in this week rather than just one? It seems to me if it is good to have one day, then it is better to have two. If we are willing to give up this time, there is no reason why that should not be done.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I indicated to my hon. friends opposite that initially the government would have been prepared to take two days. There was a disagreement about taking Wednesday. Tuesday, as you know, has been the subject of a special order by the house for a debate on external affairs, and there seemed to be a general reluctance to take Monday or Friday. By the process of elimination, therefore, only one day was available.

An hon. Member: We might get a second day the following week.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, because the committees are burdened with work this session, we agree that it is advisable to take that day as an experiment, to see if that would give results. But, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) pointed out, we would not like it to be a precedent in case the experience does not prove as successful as we hope.

[English]

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): May I direct a question to the minister? At the last meeting of the standing committee on agriculture we were informed that the committee would not meet on either of the two regular days next week, that is Tuesday or Thursday. May I ask the minister if, in the event the house agrees to this procedure, this situation will be changed, and the standing committee will be able to meet next week?

• (5:10 p.m.)

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I would have to draw that to the attention of the co-ordinating committee.

Mr. Gleave: Then I have the minister's assurance that he will do so; am I correct?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I will bring the matter to the attention of the co-ordinating committee. I cannot make a commitment now. This committee has the job of co-ordinating the committee work of the house.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Does the house give unanimous consent to the approval of this order?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, might I at the same time make a confirmation with regard to Tuesday's business. The business for the early part of next week is as I outlined yesterday; that is to say, on Monday the estimates of the National Capital Commission. I should like to call special attention to the fact that on Tuesday we will be considering a motion for concurrence in the second report of the standing committee on external affairs and national defence, under the terms of the special order of the house made on November 6, 1968. I call this to the attention of the house, principally so that it might be reflected in the proceedings of the house that day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock this house will now turn to the consideration of private members business, as appearing on page 12 of the order paper, public bills.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT

CONDITIONAL ADMISSION OF MENTALLY RETARDED PERSONS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-10, to amend the Immigration Act (mental retardation).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I notice in rising to speak that approximately one quarter of the time that is usually devoted to private members bills has already expired. With that in mind I intend to be even briefer than I usually am, and I recommend the same policy to other hon. members who I am sure will rise to speak in support of my proposal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Especially the "talker-outers".

Mr. Mather: Thank you. I was motivated to introduce this bill by the troubles and appeals of a number of people in my area of British Columbia who are parents of mentally retarded children and members of the local Mental Retardation Society. Their complaint, which they still make today, Mr. Speaker, is that when they and their families visit across the border in Washington, Oregon and other states with their children who are mentally retarded, they run into a good deal of trouble and delay. As we can understand, people with mentally retarded children have so many troubles in the ordinary course of events that they naturally wish if possible to avoid additional friction when visiting relations or friends in another part of this continent. This is why, Mr. Speaker, I am trying to put forward in legislative form the suggestion that families who come from the United States to visit Canada and who similarly have mentally retarded members should not run into similar difficulty in our border restrictions.

The hope of the families on behalf of whom I speak was, and still is, that if Canada would reform and update our border crossing regulations in this respect it might well be that this would encourage the making of a mutual arrangement with our neighbours to the south, the United States, in regard to their regulations. The explanatory note to Bill No. C-10 which I have put forward reads as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to provide that a person afflicted with mental retardation may be admitted to Canada under the Immigration Act if he is not likely to become a public charge. In other words—the absolute prohibition against such a person is relaxed to the degree applicable to persons who are "dumb, blind, or otherwise physically defective".

The phrase which I have used—"dumb, blind, or otherwise physically defective"—appears in section 5 of our present Immigration Act, which deals with prohibited classes. Under existing laws these persons may be admitted to Canada if they have sufficient means of support, if they are not likely to become public charges, or are members of a family accompaying them or already in Canada and the family gives satisfactory security against such immigrants becoming public charges.

In brief, Mr. Speaker, the bill before the house would provide similar safeguards and privileges for members of families who are mentally retarded to come into this country. The effect of the bill would be to eliminate the additional trouble caused those families with mentally retarded members when crossing the United States border into Canada. Hopefully, Mr. Speaker, the country to our south, the United States, would respond by passing similar legislation.

The intent of the bill was to ease, if this is possible, entry from the United States to Canada of families with mentally retarded members, in the hope, as I say, of reciprocal legislation. This restriction was to be lifted for visits only. However, as drafted the bill would also provide for the visit or permanent entry into Canada of such persons, with the safeguards that I have enumerated.

There are, of course, provisions in the United States in the form of waivers to help in this sort of situation. I believe these waivers are attached to the entry visa and provide a way around the prohibition that exists in their immigration legislation in regard to mentally retarded people. I am also informed that for our part Canada has a similar type of waiver which can be applied for in order to permit the entry of such persons.

However, in both countries the actual immigration legislation does not in itself provide for what, to me at least, seems a common sense, humanitarian thing, namely the entry without special application of people who conform to the provisions in the act regarding persons who are dumb, blind or otherwise physically defective.

I have in front of me the current issue, fall 1968, of the publication "Mental Retardation". The general question that my bill concerns itself with—that is, the passage across the international border of the type of person I have described in the bill—is very well dealt with, to the extent of several pages. A chapter dealing with the retarded and border crossing regulations is included in the pamphlet for the information and help of people concerned, namely those families with mentally retarded members who wish to make visits to or take up permanent residence in the United States or Canada, as the case may be. There are certain regulations in both countries with which these people must concur, and the chapter describes in detail over the course of several pages the different steps that should be taken to surmount the prohibition that exists in the legislation. It ends by saying:

It is perhaps unnecessary to point out how archaic these provisions in the Immigration Act are. Changes should be made to reflect more adequately the social and economic realities of present day life.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The same idea as is expressed in the publication from which I have quoted, and in my own bill, was also put forward by the former minister of citizenship and immigration, now the minister responsible for forestry and rural development (Mr. Marchand). In 1966 a white paper was issued under the name of that hon. gentleman in which the following is stated in section 58 under the heading Immigration Policy:

Scientific knowledge and medical skill have reduced substantially the element of risk once inherent in certain illnesses. The present grounds for prohibition do not altogether reflect this advance. Nor are they altogether in line with modern medical and sociological concepts, particularly in respect of mental illness and epilepsy. Persons actually insane or suffering from contagious or infectious diseases ought not to be admitted as immigrants or non-immigrants, unless they are coming to Canada by previous arrangement and under proper safeguards to take treatment. However, an illness that has been cured or brought under control to the point where no danger to public health or safety exists, should not be a bar to either temporary or permanent admission.

Nor should mental or physical defectives be excluded for that reason alone, but only if they represent a danger to society or are not assured of private care.

With this I fully agree, and I urge the house to give at least approval in principle this evening to the subject matter of the proposed bill so that it may be proceeded with at committee level.

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Fort William): The purpose of this bill, as outlined by the hon.

member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) is to provide that a person afflicted with mental retardation may be admitted to Canada under the Immigration Act, if he is not likely to become a public charge. In other words, the prohibition against the admission to Canada as a landed immigrant of such person would be removed.

I wish to commend the hon. member for his humanitarian attitude, because I have also had the privilege of introducing bills of similar intent which had the effect of proposing amendments to the Immigration Act. In my case, the proposed amendments were designed to give permanent status to immigrants who had suffered mental disorders, who had been admitted to a mental institution after their admission to Canada as landed immigrants, and who had apparently been cured. I am referring to the introduction of Bill C-30. I was very fortunate in that this bill was accepted by the government, and that on March 22 of this year the amendment which I had proposed became law.

As a former parliamentary secretary to two ministers of citizenship and immigration, I am naturally in sympathy with the objective which the bill under discussion would achieve, if approved by parliament, and I welcome the opportunity to make a few observations about it. First of all, I would agree that a person afflicted with mental retardation should not always be regarded as hopeless. Recent advances in medical knowledge and techniques may well, in some cases, have the effect of alleviating the affliction. From a report on mental retardation by the executive director of the National Association for Retarded Children, I wish to quote the following:

> Historically, mental retardation has been viewed for the most part as a static, unchanging, incurable condition. Although there were some brilliant thinkers and gifted practitioners who envisioned the potentials of training and treatment for the retarded, the idea "Once retarded always retarded" led over the years to the general practice of providing humane treatment with little hope that the afflicted individuals could ever participate in the competitive world of employment and civic responsibility.
> Indeed, the concept had so strongly crystallized that, in 1916, Terman described the mentally retarded as follows—"They will make a little progress in a well-managed special class, but with the approach of adolescence, at latest, the state should take them into custodial care for its own protection." Terman held that mental retardation was inherited—that mental deficiency and moral deficiency were synonymous, that mental growth stopped in adolescence, and that since intelligence was a general problem-solving behaviour then if one was retarded at all one was retarded in each specific area of human functioning. With this type of concept, it is small wonder that little effort was made to try and improve the performance of the mentally retarded.

Several years ago, as a matter of fact, scientists were working to lay the foundation for a revolution in the physical sciences, one which has changed our lives and is changing them every day. Our present world has been transformed by the great scientific revolution of the last quarter of a century, from television to the space rocket. Science has created a new world with new problems, dangers and challenges. A number of Nobel prize winners have devoted themselves to the subject of mental retardation. For example, in 1958 a man by the name of Lederberg shared the Nobel prize for uncovering some of the basic mechanisms underlying heredity and worked in the Kennedy laboratories devoted to mental retardation. A Dr. Lejeune from France won the Kennedy award by proving that certain characteristics in the cells of the human body offer hope of controlling some forms of mental retardation. Another scientist by the name of Donald Glaser, winner of a Nobel prize in physics, was so interested in mental retardation that he switched his field of interest to microbiology, feeling that in this field lay the challenge of the future. The work of these scientists who are seeking an understanding of the human mind and body, together with the processes of fundamental life, will have consequences for the surprisingly vast number of the mentally retarded in Canada as well as for the millions elsewhere in the world.

It has been reliably reported that nearly half a million Canadians suffer the handicap of mental retardation in one degree or another. In other words, it is estimated that about 3 per cent of Canadians are to some extent retarded. Only four other disabling conditions, mental illness, cardiac disease, arthritis and cancer have a higher prevalence, and these tend to come later in life, whereas mental retardation comes early.

Mental retardation ranks as a major national health, social and economic problem. It afflicts twice as many individuals as blindness, polio, cerebral palsy and rheumatic heart disease combined. Mental retardation does not respect station in life, or geography. It may afflict the children of the rich, or of the poor, in any part of the country.

Great strides have been made in learning new ways to educate and rehabilitate those, who a few years ago, had no hope. The Canadian Association for Retarded Children, the Canadian Mental Health Association, and others, have made outstanding efforts to help the mentally retarded. But surveys made by the Canadian Association for Retarded Children, its member associations and other organizations, reveal a serious shortage of facilities for mentally retarded children and adults alike.

• (5:30 p.m.)

The great hope of these handicapped persons lies in the implementation of the many new concepts developed in treatment, training, vocational guidance and permanent care, which will bring about a greater integration of the mentally handicapped into the community, and more humane treatment for those whose disabilities are so severe as to require constant supervision.

I have no hesitation in saying that in my view the problem of mental retardation has been neglected, and only in recent years have we become conscious of the need to do something about it. In order successfully to meet the problem more co-ordinated efforts should be made on the part of the municipalities, the provinces, and the federal government.

In 1964 there was the first Canadian federal-provincial conference on mental retardation. The conference was conceived as a timely and essential step in seeking to improve, extend and achieve greater co-ordination of health, welfare, education and vocational services for mentally retarded children and adults.

Following the conference a steering committee met in Ottawa in February 1965, to review the work of the conference. The committee felt that it was the federal government's responsibility to provide leadership by working with the provincial authorities and voluntary health and welfare groups. It felt that attention should be given to mental retardation in mental health research, child and maternal health research, and related research programs. It believed that the conference itself had indicated that there were many avenues to improve services and better co-ordination of agencies and facilities, and that to pursue these required only a spirit of conscious concern on the part of all responsible persons. The committee also felt that the conference, in heightening this sense of conscious concern, had accomplished its major purpose.

What we have been able in past to accomplish for the mentally retarded in Canada is only a beginning when related to the great accomplishments that we can attain in the years ahead. I suggest that we should accept a more responsible role in the field of mental retardation, as our knowledge expands in this great field of public welfare which offers avenues of hope undreamed of in the past.

In my opinion the bill in question could well be broader, affecting not only paragraph (s) of section 5 of the Immigration Act, but it might well have also dealt with section 5(a) (iv) which refers to those afflicted with epilepsy. This is also an affliction that has responded to new medical knowledge and techniques.

However, I must point out that the bill which I have referred to as Bill C-30 dealt with an amendment to give permanent status under the Immigration Act to immigrants who have suffered from a mental disorder, but who apparently have been cured. The minister realized that when the Immigration Act was framed insanity was regarded as an incurable illness, and saw the merit of the need for a change in the act. We are all grateful to the former minister of manpower and immigration for his foresight and humane understanding, from which many immigrants are enjoying the benefits in the change of the legislation, restoring to them the dignity and the right to apply for Canadian citizenship which was denied to them under an unfair section in the Immigration Act.

Whether paragraph (s) of section 5 of the Immigration Act, which this bill is trying to change, is unfair, has to be examined in the light of circumstances surrounding individual cases. For instance if the person seeking admission is a member of a family already in Canada, financially responsible and capable of giving satisfactory security against such an immigrant becoming a public charge, in such a case there would appear to be sufficient justification to relax the regulations to enable that person to join his family. On the other hand, a person with no family ties in Canada would most likely become a public charge, and a rather serious one. The amount involved would run into thousands of dollars for each person.

Another point on which I would like to make an observation is that other departments of government, besides that of manpower and immigration, are particularly concerned, such as the Department of National Health and Welfare on the medical side, and the Department of Justice with regard to legal consideration of this bill. They should express their views on the bill.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I would say that the intent of Bill C-10 is certainly commendable. It is the sort of measure that one can gladly support, but it could profit by amendments that would widen its scope. We should be certain that it is acceptable, from the medical and legal point of view, by those departments of the federal government that are also concerned with its application.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is with much pleasure that I lend my support to this bill. I express our gratitude to the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) for introducing it. It is a very minute bill but it is of much importance to a lot of people.

I have listened with much interest to the very eloquent speech just made by the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Badanai) and I gather from those remarks, from one who is interested in the whole problem of mental retardation and our responsibility in society to those so afflicted, that here is a gentleman who does have a concern and also an in-depth knowledge of the problem. I commend him for the remarks he made. However, I find it difficult to understand his reasoning in asking that this bill be set aside for the purpose of expanding it to meet other inadequacies in the immigration law, because to open the whole Immigration Act, even to this problem, is something that goes far beyond the scope of Bill C-10. Therefore I would urge him to reconsider his stand and look at Bill C-10 for what it actually says.

The bill is intended to make it possible for parents who have retarded children in their families to bring those children to this country in the same way as they are able to bring their other children. The bill is even so cautious as to specify that the parents must be able to guarantee that there is support for such children.

Let me be specific. I know of at least three cases, and I am thinking of one in particular, of families having a very real problem because our immigration laws do not permit a child suffering from mental retardation to have the normal status of his brothers and sisters in this country. The particular case I have in mind is that of a professional man. He came to this country, well qualified, a few years ago, but he has to go back to the immigration people year by year to receive a permit to allow his only child, who happens to be retarded, to stay here in Canada. There is doubt and a lack of security hanging over the heads of this family, and this is something which is just not reasonable.

This regulation in the act must date back to the dark ages, or at least back to a time when people looked on retardation as some sin of parents expressed in their offspring. It just is not logical in the light of what we know today concerning retardation, and is not in agreement with the progress we have made in society. I would go even further than the hon. member sponsoring this bill, who very mildly suggested that we should let the bill pass so that it could go to the appropriate committee and be studied further.

My mind goes back to the time when I was a quite junior member of this house. The hon. member who now is the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Chrétien) proposed a seemingly insignificant bill the effect of which was to change the name of our national air lines from Trans-Canada Air Lines to Air Canada. There was good will in the house with regard to this one particular bill, which might have been much more controversial than the one we have before us. The house let the bill go through. Not only was it in effect a very major change in so far as Air Canada was concerned, but it also gave hope to many backbenchers in the house that perhaps they did have some worth, perhaps some of their suggestions were reasonable and perhaps there was some justification for being a backbencher in this house.

I suggest to members of the house that we have here a bill with which everybody can agree. It is very short and concise. Its purpose, as is stated, is to provide that a person afflicted with mental retardation may be admitted to Canada under the Immigration Act, if he is not likely to become a public charge. That is all it says. We can accept that. We cannot really argue against it. Why do we not end our deliberations and permit this bill to pass?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): In this way we would make a worthwhile contribution to a surprising number of families who would otherwise suffer an unjust hardship because of the antiquated effect of the Immigration Act. I suggest that at the same time we would give some encouragement to the backbenchers, indicate to them that they have some ideas which are worthwhile, and show that they can make some contribution in this chamber as lawmakers.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gérard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill No. C-10 is to provide that a person afflicted with mental retardation may be admitted to Canada under the Immigration Act if he is not likely to become a public charge. In other words, the absolute prohibition against such a person would be relaxed to the degree applicable to persons who are dumb, blind or otherwise physically defective. To accomplish the objective, the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) proposes to repeal paragraph (s) of section 5 of the Immigration Act which prohibits the admission of the following individuals:

> Parsons, not included in any other prohibited class, who are certified by a medical officer as being mentally or physically abnormal to such a degree as to impair seriously their ability to earn a living.

The sponsor would substitute:

> Persons, not included in any other prohibited class, who are certified by a medical officer as being mentally or physically abnormal to such a degree as to impair seriously their ability to earn a living, unless, where such persons are abnormal by reason of mental retardation.
>
> (i) they have sufficient means of support or such profession, trade, occupation, employment or other legitimate mode of earning a living that they are not likely to become public charges, or
> (ii) they are members of a family accompanying or already in Canada and the family gives satisfactory security against such immigrants becoming public charges.

I am certain the hon. member has proposed his amendment with the best of intentions. I think we all agree that its expressed objective is a commendable one. I cannot, however, support Bill C-10 since unfortunately it would not accomplish the intended purpose.

Mr. Thompson (Red Deer): Of course it will.

Mr. Loiselle: My hon. friend proposes to amend section 5(s) of the Immigration Act as a means of facilitating the admission of the mentally retarded. I think, however, he has misunderstood the nature of section 5(s). By including section 5(s) in the Immigration Act parliament provided a discretionary power which can be used under very limited circumstances and only on the basis of a medical certification. Section 5(s) is a residual section. It covers individuals not included in any other prohibited class. It cannot be applied without medical certification. A certification can only be made if an individual is mentally or physically abnormal "to such a degree as to impair seriously their ability to earn a living".

Because of the restrictions contained in section 5(s) it is rarely used. As a matter of fact it was used on only two occasions in 1965, five occasions in 1966 and six occasions in 1967. If the mentally retarded are prohibited, it is usually because their retardation is so severe as to place them within section 5(a)(i) of the act which absolutely prohibits the admission of idiots, imbeciles and morons whether they wish to come to Canada as immigrants or non-immigrants. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend would neither remove nor relax that prohibition. Hence its passage would give only the semblance of a relaxation on behalf of those unfortunates who are mentally retarded.

I think the members of this house will agree that the absolute prohibition on the admission of those who suffer severe mental retardation probably accurately reflects the views which were prevalent some 15 years ago when the present Immigration Act was passed. But I think it will be generally agreed that it does not reflect today's attitudes. The previous minister and the present minister relaxed the absolute prohibition on the admission of those afflicted with mental retardation by using the authority provided by parliament, and allowed them to enter under ministers' permits. In 1966, there were 65 ministers' permits issued allowing the admission of such persons. In 1967, we see that 72 were issued, while 56 were issued during the first nine months of 1968.

This of course is a temporary solution. The white paper gives a clear indication of this government's opinion that substantial changes are desirable in the existing statutory grounds for prohibiting the admission of people to Canada. These changes would include a removal of the absolute prohibition on those afflicted by severe mental retardation. As indicated in paragraph 58, page 25 of the white paper, which the hon. member for Surrey read when he was speaking, they would be prohibited only if they represented a danger to society or were not assured of private care.

The views contained in the white paper will be reflected in the new immigration act. Until that act is passed we shall continue to provide relief through the use of ministers' permits. The need for this practice would not be removed by the passage of Bill C-10 because, as I hope hon. members now realize, this bill would not in effect relax the present statutory prohibition against the mentally retarded.

In summary, may I say that I appreciate and share the desire of the sponsor of this bill to facilitate the admission of the mentally retarded by amending the act. I cannot however support his bill since it would not accomplish that objective but indeed might raise false hopes.

As was mentioned by the hon. member for Surrey some changes should be made in this act concerning the rules. In article 63(b) of the white paper we find that the following type of person would be prohibited:

A mentally or physically defective person unless he is a member of a family otherwise admissible and well able to look after him.

So, this is clear-cut in the white paper on immigration of 1966, when this white paper is acted upon.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When will that be?

Mr. Loiselle: The hon. member asks when that will be. Well, I am not a minister; I am not a minister yet. The hon. member has asked me when the subject of this bill could become part of the immigration law. I suggest this will not happen this session, but not later than next session. If I was the minister perhaps I could suggest a date, but I cannot implicate the minister by making a declaration. I feel that at the next session this parliament will decide on the recommendations in the white paper on immigration. The subject of this clause will be included in the new act and there will be no further question in respect of ministerial permits referred to by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson).

• (5:50 p.m.)

As I mentioned earlier, there has been a change regarding the issuing of these permits; the immigration law has been changed since 1953. Between now and the time the new immigration act becomes law this problem will be taken care of, in the same way the hon. member suggested earlier the problems in respect of parents and children are handled.

I feel that until we have a new immigration act we should carry on in the same manner, allowing the department to look after these special cases as it does now. Perhaps the hon. member does not agree, but I think we should continue in that way. The result of the hon. member's bill will not correct the part of the immigration law he wishes to change. Perhaps by some other bill the hon. member could make this correction in the law. Bill C-10 does not cure the problem referred to.

For various reasons I agree there is a problem. The government has felt there is a problem, as indicated by references in the white paper on immigration. The minister has indicated that he intends to correct this difficulty and will do so when the new act becomes law. I ask the hon. member to be patient for another few months and allow the department to take care of this situation as it has done in the past. Within a year everything will be corrected, and in the meantime the department will follow this practice, even though it may not be satisfactory to the hon. member.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, perhaps we could make a suggestion in respect of this bill, because there seems to be general support for the principle. Even the hon. member for Saint-Henri (Mr. Loiselle), who thinks the bill is defective in drafting, supports its principle. I draw attention to the fact that we have lost 15 minutes of allotted time for this discussion. I realize this was agreed upon by all, but this loss of debating time is unfortunate and I wonder whether we might not continue the discussion in one of two ways. We could let the bill retain its place for another time—

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —or perhaps we could refer the subject matter—not the bill—to one of the standing committees. I heard "no" in reply to the suggestion that it retain its place. Let me try the alternative. I move:

That Bill C-10 be not now read a second time, but that the subject matter thereof be referred to the standing committee on labour, manpower and immigration.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, if I correctly understood the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), he wants to postpone second reading in order to refer the bill to the committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just the subject matter, not the bill. There is quite a difference. This is a means of having the matter discussed in the committee.

Mr. Loiselle: Why should we have this matter discussed in the committee when we are now attempting to deal with it, and know that the Department of Immigration is already taking care of these cases? We will solve nothing by bringing this matter before the committee. We will not solve the problem by discussing the bill during three, four or five sittings of the committee. I think it would be much preferable if the hon. member for Surrey (Mr. Mather) proposed another bill which would correct the proper part of the Immigration Act.

Mr. Godin: Question.

Mr. Loiselle: If the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) wants to speak he should get permission to do so. I now have the floor and he should let me talk. I know the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is an expert in the rules of the house and the committees, but I still do not see what use there could be in sending this to the standing committee.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did the hon. member not hear the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) say today that thinking about these things is a good idea? We should do some thinking in the committee.

Mr. Loiselle: Let us dispose of this bill today. We have discussed and explained what the government is doing about the situation. If the hon. member is a member of that committee he can pose this question and discuss it the way he wants to, when the committee—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Order, please. It being six o'clock the hour for consideration of private members business has now expired.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

FINANCE

REPORT ON MEETINGS RESPECTING INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CRISIS

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to give a brief report on the important meetings in Bonn last week of the ministers and central bank governors of the Group of Ten. The meetings were called to discuss the measures that could be taken to restore equilibrium in the international monetary system which had been disturbed by massive speculative capital movements involving some European currencies. The governor of the Bank of Canada and I participated in the discussions.

The authorities of the Federal Republic of Germany announced their decision to take parliamentary action immediately to alter their border tax adjustments in such a way as to reduce substantially the German trade surplus. They are also taking steps to inhibit the inflow of short term capital.

The French authorities have announced that they will take steps immediately to reduce their budgetary deficit, to restrict the use of credit, to slow down price and wage increases, and to impose foreign exchange controls.

No change in the par values of the Deutschmark or the French franc is involved in any of these measures.

A new central bank credit facility for France was arranged in the amount of two billion U.S. dollars. The Bank of Canada's share of this facility is 100 million U.S. dollars. The new facility is in addition to France's substantial drawing facilities in the International Monetary Fund.

The authorities of the countries concerned are determined to seek a better equilibrium in their international payments, to counter speculation, and to offset the effect on exchange reserves of destabilizing short term capital flows. The measures taken are an expression of this determination. The response of financial markets in Europe and North America today has been encouraging. Throughout the period of disturbance the Canadian dollar has remained strong.

Mr. Speaker, if the house will permit I will table the communiqué issued at the end of the meetings of the Group of Ten.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think I ought to object very firmly to the unwillingness of the government, through the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), on Friday last to give the house the information on this subject for which I asked at that time, and the supplementary information requested by the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). There does not seem to me to be any excuse for the failure of the government to give the house the information at that time, because at the very time or just about the same time we were seeking this information the Minister of Finance indicated in Bonn that Canada would indeed be taking part in the credit arrangement granted to France and referred to by both the hon. member for Waterloo and myself. This does not involve the Minister of Finance—

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the meeting in Bonn did not conclude until about nine o'clock Canadian time.

• (2:40 p.m.)

Mr. Stanfield: It is difficult for me to believe that the Minister of Finance had not consulted the government of Canada about commitments that would be appropriate on behalf of Canada at this time. I had also hoped to receive some information from the minister's statement. Without being offensive, let me say he has not told us anything we had not read in the press.

The impression one gets is that the decision of the government of France not to devalue the franc took everybody completely by surprise. The minister has not indicated whether this is so, but this is the impression we have gained from the news media, and it has not been corrected by the minister. In addition, this decision has placed a severe strain upon some other international currencies, notably the pound sterling; and the minister has not made any comment in this regard nor about the measures the British government has had to support within the last few days, constituting another series of tough measures.

Frankly, I must say it does not seem to me the minister has given us any information or any reassurance in respect of the existing situation, and in view of experience during the past year I am sure we all agree that if these difficulties spread they could spread to us as well. After all, this is the third monetary crisis this year. As recently as October 7 the Minister of Finance returned from a series of international finance meetings in South America, rather blandly I thought—satisfied and optimistic about arrangements that had been made to "enhance", as he put it, "the stability of sterling and of the international monetary situation".

At that time I could not share the minister's satisfaction, and I was disappointed that more progress had not been made in the area of strengthening international currency arrangements. I said then that the proper time had arrived for more permanent arrangements to be made, and that progress had been slow. What seemed to be appropriate a month ago has become a matter of extreme urgency today. I suggest to the Minister of Finance in Canada that he ought to take the lead in pressing with utmost vigour the necessity for a new international currencies arrangement.

I believe the minister is living in a paradise of some sort if he thinks the measures taken to get us out of recent crises can be regarded as satisfactory over the long term without more permanent arrangements, or if he thinks for a moment that the dollar, and therefore the Canadian economy, can escape the possible ramifications of this crisis.

Let me repeat the need for immediate further action for more permanent arrangements, recognizing the instability of the present situation and the efforts to, in fact, stabilize the international monetary situation.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister would be the first to agree that his report told us nothing we have not already read in the newspapers, and that the hope expressed in the report is entirely ill-founded; that the situation has not improved, that the crisis has not ended and that the foundation has been laid for further crises, particularly in respect of the British pound and probably the French franc and the German mark.

As the Leader of the Opposition has said, we have experienced three serious international monetary crises in the last year in respect of the British pound, the United States dollar and the French franc. None of the steps taken or being taken have solved or gone any distance toward solving this international problem.

I want us to note that the results of these discussions have been not only austerity measures in France but serious austerity measures in Britain. I do not say that the Canadian government is responsible or that the Minister of Finance alone could do anything to solve this problem, but as one citizen of the world I am fed up to the teeth by the fact that the entire world can be set on its ear partly by the unscrupulous gambling of speculators and partly because of other reasons which I realize are there.

It is time the international community took steps to stop this speculation on the international monetary markets even if it should mean closing the various markets on which currencies can be bought and sold, except for the legitimate purposes of trading and tourist travelling. I suggest it is time that a country like Canada took that kind of initiative at the International Monetary Fund, at the World Bank and at all these international meetings of ministers of finance. It is just shameful that this dark and dusty corner of international monetary gambling should be able to trap the world and its policies.

Second, I suggest it is time we in this country in particular took the initiative and started discussions to end the pegged rates of the various currencies. The other day when the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton) asked the Prime Minister whether the government would not consider a floating exchange rate, the Prime Minister's irritating way of answering it, as with some other questions, was simply "Heavens, no." That may be a nice undergraduate answer, but it certainly does not deal with a very serious problem.

The fact is that this pegging of the various currency rates across the world is the equivalent of the gold standard in principle. We have been in exactly the same position in the last ten years as we were years ago in the days of the gold standard, when every currency was pegged to gold and then pegged to each other by gold. Now every currency is pegged to the U.S. dollar and pegged to each other by the U.S. dollar. Precisely the same stagnation, the same strait-jacket has been created in the international monetary system by this arrangement as was the case when we had the gold standard across the world. It is time the Prime Minister, instead of saying "Heavens, no", said "Heavens, yes; I am going to start thinking about this problem." It is time this government took the initiative in international monetary arrangements of one sort or another to open up the thinking of the bankers and some of the businessmen toward considering a floating exchange rate system rather than a pegged one.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to comment briefly on the statement of the hon. Minister of Finance and say at the start that I cannot understand why it is that when there are such monetary crises just about everywhere in the world—we have seen many of them in the last few months and even in the last few years—the Canadian government, in co-operation with the other governments, does not appoint a royal commission of inquiry to look into the situation and report after a few months or even a few years to solve the problems which are submitted to it. That is what happens when there are internal problems, but when human beings are to be safeguarded, a situation improved, a commission of inquiry is appointed which reports after a few years, when it is realized that it is too late.

The Canadian government has just put at the disposal of the German mark and the French franc an amount of $100 million in order to save the currency that is in danger. I feel the same steps should be taken to remedy the situation in Canada for, with regard to our internal affairs and the human being in Canada, especially in the field of unemployment, families, citizens, serious danger exists although there does not seem to be any corncern about what goes on here. I feel the same speed should be applied to solving our own problems and taking better care of human beings, instead of money and the monetary system.

Question No. 409—Mr. Valade:

1. Has the Prime Minister or any other member of the government requested the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to investigate and report on whether the improper and injurious statements made by Pat Burns on radio station C.K.G.M. of Montreal over the last several years with regard to French Canadians and the public in general are contrary to Sections 2b and 2g (iv) of Part I of the "Broadcasting Act of Canada" or any other Section of the Law passed by Parliament on March 7, 1968 and, if not, is it the intention to request such an investigation?

2. Does the government intend to exercise its authority under Section 22 (1), a (iii), to cancel operating licence of radio station C.K.G.M., if, after investigation and report by the Canadian Radio-Television Commission or public hearing under Section 19(2) (c) of the Broadcasting Act, it is established that this radio station and its commentator have acted contrary to the intent and purposes of the Canadian Broadcasting Act?

LOW INTEREST LOANS TO MUNICIPALITIES

Question No. 446—Mr. Rose:

Has the government given any consideration to making low interest loans available to municipalities in co-operation with the provinces to assist municipalities in their intermediate term capital expenditure programs?

Questions

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The government of Canada is constantly considering the growing requirements for social and development capital at all levels in the Canadian economy. Municipal needs are balanced against those of the private sector and other governments and agencies, by a competitive capital market. At present the federal government is making every effort consistent with its responsibilities to limit its own demands on the market and thus to assist in improving the access of other public and private borrowers.

BULK CARRIER TERMINAL DEVELOPMENT, DIGBY, N.S.

Question No. 482—Mr. Comeau:

1. Has the government recognized the potential of the Port of Digby for development as a bulk carrier terminal, and (a) if not, for what reason (b) if so, what action is the government initiating for the development of such a project?

2. Is it the intention of the government to incorporate this development with the proposed harbour improvements as concerns the Digby-Saint John Ferry?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. Continuing review of requirements for port development in all Canadian harbours is a responsibility of the various agencies under the Minister of Transport, including evaluation of requirements and appropriate locations for bulk carrier terminals, and including also evaluation of specific requests which may be received from shipping or harbour interests in this connection. There is, however, no current special study underway with regard to the port of Digby, apart from the general consideration of possible bulk carrier terminal requirements in the Atlantic provinces.

MIGRATION TO AND FROM ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 611—Mr. Robinson:

1. How many people from (a) Prince Edward Island (b) Nova Scotia (c) New Brunswick (d) Newfoundland, have emigrated to other parts of Canada in the years 1960-68 respectively?

2. How many people from the rest of Canada have immigrated to (a) Prince Edward Island (b) Nova Scotia (c) New Brunswick (d) Newfoundland, in each of the years 1960-68 respectively?

3. How many immigrants have settled in (a) Prince Edward Island (b) Nova Scotia (c) New Brunswick (d) Newfoundland, in each of the years 1960-68 respectively?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that: There are no actual counts of people moving from one province to another within a given year. However, estimates have been prepared based on the movements of families in receipt of family allowance payments, i.e., families having at least one child under 16 years of age. The duration of the move is unknown so that the same persons may be included in both the "to" and "from" estimates, possibly more than once.

It should be noted, also, that the movers "to" a given Atlantic province include movers from the remaining Atlantic provinces as well as from the rest of Canada. Likewise, the movement "from" an Atlantic province includes those moving to the other Atlantic provinces as well as to the rest of Canada.

Questions

DISPOSAL TIME FOR SHACK TENTS, NATIONAL PARKS

Question No. 621—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What period of time was made available to (a) the Riding Mountain National Park (b) the Prince Albert National Park within which to dispose of shack tents?

2. If different periods were provided for, what was the reason for the differentiation in terms?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. (a) There are no shack tents in Riding Mountain national park. The portable cabin owners have, to date, not received any official notification that they will be required to vacate the land presently occupied by their summer cabins, because the Wasagaming townsite development plan has not as yet been finalized and approved. (b) In Prince Albert national park, the shack tent owners were told in August, 1967, that shack tents would eventually be phased out as part of the overall development plan for the park. Present permit holders or their spouses will still be allowed to renew their permits every year. However, as of the 1968 season, no new permits have been issued to those who did not hold a valid permit for the 1967 camping season. Portable cabin owners in Prince Albert national park have been given until 1970 before the same policy will go into effect for portable cabins.

2. No differentiation in terms or time periods for the phasing out of portable cabins has been made between the two parks.

It is expected that the development plan for Riding Mountain national park will be completed by 1970 at which time the same policy with respect to portable cabins will be applied at both parks.

Newfoundland	727.2	600.0	995.5	599.4	834.2	1,041.8

British Columbia	5,067.3	3,596.8	5,002.9	3,597.7	3,279.3	3,637.0

2. Discussions with Quebec authorities concerning the establishment of federal parks in Quebec are continuing between officials of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and officials of the Quebec ministry of tourism, fish and game. These discussions concern the outline of what would be an agreement between the two governments for the establishment of national parks in the province.

DEFENCE RESEARCH BOARD ACTIVITIES

Question No. 684—Mr. MacLean:

1. Is it the intention of the government to close some of the eight research stations of the Defence Research Board?

2. Does government policy require changes in the direction of the activities of the Defence Research Board and, if so, what changes are contemplated?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. No.

2. Changes in the direction of the activities of the Defence Research Board, in common with all other public services, are planned and made from time to time to meet changing situations and requirements. Such changes are usually conditioned by security considerations which affect defence planning.

POST OFFICE CHANGES

Question No. 701—Mr. McCutcheon:

1. Under the new reorganization of postal services, how many small post offices will be closed in each province?

2. At what locations?

3. How many rural routes will be affected?

4. How many post office enlargements are visualized?

5. How many new post office buildings are planned and at what locations?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): 1. Approximately 3,500 post offices meet the basic criteria for closing under the newly established policy. Each of these offices will have to be examined individually and the decision with respect to closing will be based on this individual survey. It is not possible at this time to state how many closings will actually take place.

2. See answer to question 1.

3. The rural routes to be affected will, of course, be dependent not only on the number of offices closed but on the particular office closed. Consequently, no indication can be given at this time as to how many rural routes will be affected.

4. Assuming that the enlargement of the post office is the result of the program for the closing of other small post offices, it cannot be stated at this time how many such enlargements will be necessary as such would depend on the number and location of the post offices which are actually closed.

5. See answer to question 4.

6. What is the rank, name and address of each of the recipients of Centennial Medals in the Militia?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Devotion to duty, an exemplary conduct record, and at least six years' service. Less preference was given to those already in possession of the Queen Elizabeth II Coronation Medal.

2. An allocation of Centennial Medals was made to each major command and to Canadian forces headquarters in the case of other units. Based on unit allocations, units recommended officers and men to receive the medal, and all recommendations were subject to the concurrence of the officer commanding the command. If the commander considered that the unit commander should be included in the list, he had the prerogative of doing so. SALARY INCREASES, CAMP VALCARTIER PERSONNEL

When can the civilian employees working for the Department of National Defence at Camp Valcartier expect to receive the salary increase granted them in 1966?

[Translation]

Mr. David Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The only civilian employees working for the Department of National Defence at Camp Valcartier who have not received a salary increase since 1966 are those members of bargaining units for which agreements have not yet, or have just recently been negotiated. The majority of these employees are in the General Labour and Trades or the General Services Occupational Groups. The General Labour and Trades agreement was signed on 27 September and conversion action is underway. The General Services Occupational agreement is still under negotiation. Usually salary increases are paid within ninety days of the signing of an agreement.

2. Does the Canada Safety Council work with the department of transportation and communication of Quebec and, if so, in what way?

[Translation]

Hon. John Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. It was formed through the amalgamation of the Canadian Highway Safety Council, the National Safety League of Canada and the Canadian Industrial Safety Association.

To fulfill its role in safety, the Canada Safety Council will be dealing with the Federal Government Departments of National Health and Welfare, Labour, Transport, Justice, Industry, Consumer and Corporate Affairs, National Defence, Agriculture and also the National Film Board, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, National Research Council and the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. FINANCE

INQUIRIES AS TO MEETING ON INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CRISIS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question for some clarification. Am I correct in believing, in view of the statement tabled by the Minister of Finance in the house today, that the government of Canada and members of the Group of Ten did not receive any specific assurances from the government of France as to what action that government would take with a view to meeting its currency and exchange problem?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, many matters were discussed at the meeting. I do not feel free to indicate what matters were discussed. I think my hon. friend should know, from looking at the communiqué I passed to him, that no mention of specific action by the French government is made in that communiqué. While I am on my feet I should like to correct an impression left by the hon. member that I was in Brazil. I have never been in South America in my life. He mentioned something in his statement about my coming back from Brazil.

Mr. Stanfield: I was so glad to see the minister back; I am sorry if I was a bit confused. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance through you, sir, what steps Canada is taking to urge a meeting at the earliest possible date of the countries concerned to make more satisfactory arrangements for the strengthening of international currencies and any possible readjustments which may be necessary. Does the government of Canada propose to take any initiatives, or is the government satisfied to let things go on as they are for the time being?

Mr. Benson: Canada, as my hon. friend knows, is a member of the Group of Ten. The Group of Ten meets from time to time, and I am sure as the situation develops we will take our full part in any discussions which the group may deem necessary under the circumstances.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Finance, and ask him whether during the discussions of the Ten the question of a Bretton type meeting was discussed, with a view to calling the Ten together to put some order into the chaos that exists in financial markets.

Mr. Benson: As I indicated in my statement earlier reports from the financial markets in Europe, which have now been closed for the day, and from those in Canada and the United States have been very encouraging. With regard to discussions which took place within the Group of Ten when we met together, I feel I am not at liberty to make any more disclosures than were made in the communiqué. These meetings are confidential, and a communiqué is issued which is agreed upon by everyone there.

Mr. Saltsman: I am wondering whether the Minister of Finance has seen a report that the president-elect of the United States has been advised to seek a meeting along the lines of the Bretton Woods meeting. I should like to ask the minister whether he will support this position in view of the urgent situation facing the world's currencies.

Mr. Benson: Without agreeing that urgency still exists with regard to the world's currencies, I may say that I have not seen the report referred to by the hon. member. I am sure as soon as we have seen it the government will give it due consideration, as well as any requests that may come from the United States in this regard.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister seek an early meeting with the United States to see whether the ceiling imposed on Canada's holdings of United States currency and investments can be increased in order to increase Canada's options, either independently or in co-ordination with its fiscal allies during this financial crisis?

Mr. Benson: As I mentioned previously in the house, this matter is under discussion between officials of the government of Canada and of the United States treasury at the present time.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I should like to ask the minister whether he gave any assurance that a further contribution by Canada would be available if required in order to meet the present monetary crisis.

[Mr. Saltsman.]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the meetings were held during a monetary crisis in which the exchange markets were closed. They have now been reopened, as my hon. friend knows, and I have reported on the activity therein. I may say the government of Canada has made no additional commitments within the group beyond its normal commitments to the International Monetary Fund and so on.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I should like to ask the minister whether in view of Canada's position, being more or less dissociated from the other nine, consideration has been given to extending an invitation to a monetary conference which would consider the revision of GATT, inasmuch as its present provisions prevent the imposition of import and export controls by the member countries. Does the minister not think Canada is in a position to extend an invitation of this kind, which would be widely welcomed?

Mr. Benson: First I should like to indicate that Canada is not dissociated from the other nine. We feel we are an active part of the Group of Ten, and we shall continue to play our full part within this group. With regard to the second question raised by the right hon. gentleman, the matter of the revision of GATT, meetings go on continuously at the official level concerning this organization. If undue barriers are being placed against the goods from any country, that country can of course make representations to GATT and subsequently, as the right hon. gentleman knows, there has to be a hearing in this regard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The word "dissociated" was not perhaps the best word to have used, but it was the one which was used in the press in connection with Canada's position; Canada's contribution of $100 million in a $2 billion arrangement was almost one of dissociation. My question was, will any invitation be extended by Canada in connection with the convening of a monetary conference so that a repetition of the series of difficulties which have arisen over the past year may be obviated if not entirely avoided?

Mr. Benson: I am very surprised to hear the right hon. gentleman say "What is $100 million?"

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not say that. That is the way in which the hon. gentleman has misinterpreted me.

Mr. Benson: After all, the central bankers in the Group of Ten decided at their meeting that this would be an appropriate commitment for Canada to make within the over-all guarantee. As to the second question, as the right hon. gentleman knows Herr Schiller of West Germany is chairman of the Group of Ten which will meet from time to time, and I am sure if there is a serious change in events or if it is deemed necessary to call another meeting in the near future because of future developments, Canada will play its full part as it has always done.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is just repetition.

[Translation]

Mr. Léonel Beaudoin (Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the hon. Minister of Finance.

In view of the current difficult situation with regard to the franc, the pound sterling, and the dollar, does the government intend to pass legislation which would lead eventually to control the prices and salaries?

[English]

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—INQUIRIES RESPECTING CANADIAN COMMITMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister; I asked one on a similar subject in another field the other day. Does the statement made or reported to have been made by the Postmaster General with regard to NATO and the possible desirability of Canada withdrawing from that organization in order to make available a peace keeping force in Viet Nam, and so on, represent government policy?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I only saw the newspaper report of this, but it is my impression that the Postmaster General was taking into account, as all ministers do, that this whole policy is under review, and he found it useful to offer suggestions for thinking to the Canadian people.

An hon. Member: Flying kites.

Mr. Lewis: If it is necessary to offer suggestions for the thinking of the Canadian people, would the Prime Minister consider that ministers, particularly he and the Secretary of State for External Affairs, might give this parliament some of their ideas during the course of this review so that members of this house could offer some ideas to assist the government in its appraisal of policy?

Mr. Trudeau: Members of this house would be very welcome to do this when the estimates of the minister are up for debate.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): I have a question for the Minister of National Defence, but I should like to take this opportunity to welcome him back to the house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacLean: With regard to commitments made to our NATO allies, for example, that there would be no reduction in the strength of our air division, would the minister say for what period these commitments will be firm?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): These commitments will have to be confirmed at the January meeting. The meeting which took place last week was an anticipatory meeting expressing the reaction of members to the Czechoslovak crisis. The undertakings which were given then by member states of the alliance will have to be confirmed at the next meeting of ministers.

Mr. MacLean: Can the minister make any statement now as to the length of time during which they will be firm?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): They will be firm for a period of one year, which is the customary period.

Mr. MacLean: I would ask the minister whether at the Brussels meeting he agreed that the four destroyer escorts now under construction would be committed by Canada to NATO, and whether there was any further suggestion that they should be committed to service in the Mediterranean rather than for service with SACLANT as is usual.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): These four destroyers were earmarked for NATO two years ago under what is called the defence plan. As they become available they would be assigned, and this calls for a decision which will have to be taken at the time. There was never any suggestion from me or, I am sure, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that these ships would be involved in any operation in the Mediterranean.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister of defence whether the current review of defence policy is leading to a new white paper on defence which the minister will be presenting to the house before any actual revision of defence policy is made by the government.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): That will have to be a collective decision of cabinet.

[Later:]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Did the Postmaster General consult with the minister before enunciating his own defence policy for Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This matter was raised a moment ago.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence. When he was abroad at the recent NATO meeting did he advance the idea or concept that some of the ministers of the Canadian government had in mind, that our NATO forces should be withdrawn and used as peace keeping forces in such places as Viet Nam? Did he advance such a proposition?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): No, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact I have been led to believe that what we are doing in Europe could also be called peace keeping.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the answer to the Postmaster General.

Mr. Mark Rose (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence concerning a larger role for NATO. Did the ministerial meeting held recently in Brussels discuss ways by which an east-west détente might be encouraged or facilitated?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Of course it did, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence on his return from Europe whether he found any indication of a move by the Soviet union toward Yugoslavia or Roumania.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt that this is a question which should be asked at this time.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Minister of National Defence for the brevity of his answer to my question about NATO. Is the minister now in a position to be more specific about the methods by which this détente may be affected, and would he consider making a statement to the house outlining the ways in which the various NATO allies think this might be made effective by the NATO alliance?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This question is of such a wide scope that it should only be asked in the form of a suggestion that the minister might make a statement on motions.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of National Defence whether he will make a statement on motions soon about the topic I have just raised?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I am authorized to make a statement in the name of NATO. What we have seen in the last couple of years was an effort by NATO to encourage the United States delegation to start conversations with their counterparts in the Soviet union. This has the blessing of the alliance and I understand some preliminary discussions have taken place. I suppose this would eventually lead the alliance to further discussions with the Warsaw pact countries, but certainly a Canadian minister cannot be expected to make a statement on a subject like that in the name of NATO.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I would remind hon. members that we should not have a debate on external affairs at this time. I understand there will be an opportunity for this within the next few days.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in my supplementary question I intended to make a suggestion relating to the suggestion Your Honour has made. I should like to ask the Prime Minister, since the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State for External Affairs are to appear before the joint committee, whether he would arrange for the presence there of the Postmaster General so that all shades of the problem could be represented.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this type of question does not lead us anywhere.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CONFERENCE OF EDUCATION MINISTERS OF FRENCH SPEAKING COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): I should like to put a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Could he tells us whether he has informed the Niger government of Canada's intention, if such an intention exists, to participate in the next conference of the Ministers of Education of French-speaking countries, which is to take place in Niger soon?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no such intention has yet been indicated, but I think an answer will be sent this week.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): I should like to direct this question to the Prime Minister. Is it the policy of the government to have the task force on housing and urban development take time off from receiving briefs to appear as the featured attraction at Liberal party constituency meetings as happened last week in Edmonton?

On a question of privilege, I attended this meeting which was due to begin at ten o'clock in the morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Paproski: It was a very good meeting, yes. But the task force did not show up at ten o'clock in the morning; they postponed the meeting until two o'clock in the afternoon. Further to that, an advertisement appeared in the paper sponsored by the Edmonton-Strathcona Liberal Association—

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Although the hon. member may not have a question of privilege he has a grievance, and it has been properly aired.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. Will he advise the house of the necessity for the extraordinary accommodation that has been booked for the Commonwealth prime ministers conference in London, particularly in view of the government's alleged cut-backs in spending?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Solicitor General. Is he aware of the fact that we on this side of the house are very glad to see him back in his place?

Mr. Barney Danson (York North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the terms of reference relating to the research funds being made available to the members of the opposition would preclude the hiring of a special assistant for the right hon. member for Prince Albert, now that Mr. Camp is available?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I don't belong to that camp.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

INDUSTRY

STRIP MINING—SUGGESTED NEED FOR LEGISLATIVE REGULATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): In the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources may I direct my question to the acting minister. Is it the intention of the government to meet with the provinces to discuss legislation covering the destructive effect of strip mining?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if I may I will take notice of this suggestion of the hon. member and draw it to the minister's attention.

Mr. Harding: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the department point out to the provinces the urgent need for appropriate legislation to protect our resources from unregulated strip mining practices?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member has made a suggestion.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of last night's news of the avalanche of waste from that strip mining operation which has affected the trans-Canada highway, will the minister see that action is taken to protect the interests of the travelling public in that area?

Mr. Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, all these representations will be brought to the minister's attention.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

WINDSOR—IMPENDING LAY-OFFS AT FORD COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. Can he report to the house at this time on the meetings being held between himself or the Minister of Manpower and Immigration and the representatives of the United Auto Workers regarding the lay-offs at Windsor?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, there will be the utmost degree of co-operation with representatives of the union from Windsor who will be here this afternoon to meet the various ministers concerning the changes in Windsor. We shall do our best to reduce the degree of disruption in Windsor, as well as to increase the efficiency of retraining programs in that area.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Minister of Labour, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration or the appropriate minister indicate whether the government intends to change the regulations relating to transitional assistance benefits, and thereby enable affected employees to be eligible for government assistance under this plan?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, this has already been done. If a worker's claim is filed before the end of the year he will be eligible for transitional benefits if he has met the other conditions.

Mr. MacEwan: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister of Manpower and Immigration say whether, after what he said in the house last week, he will suggest to his colleagues in cabinet that legislation be brought down to provide that longer notice be required in situations similar to the one presently existing in Windsor?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the idea is receiving consideration.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. When the Minister of Labour is discussing this matter with his colleagues will he also discuss the serious problem that will be created by moving tool and die facilities out of Canada, thus creating serious unemployment among our tool and die workers?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, one of the results of the proposed changes in the Windsor plant may make it unnecessary to move tool and die facilities out of Windsor. The changes should have the opposite effect on the workers.

[Later:]

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Labour. In view of the recent benevolent action of the Ford Motor Company in laying off employees in Windsor, and forthcoming lay-offs in other parts of Canada, as well as the minister's recent statement to the effect that he would urge his cabinet colleagues to implement sections of the Freedman report, would he indicate to the house when he thinks he will be in a position to report back with regard to his colleagues' feelings on this matter?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, in the same speech I also pointed out my responsibility to take into consideration before making any report the Woods task force report, which should be tabled some time in December.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE IN REVIEW BY FORMER PRIME MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will he tell the house if Right Hon. Lester Pearson is one of those helping the government with its review of foreign affairs and defence policy?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Not on a formal basis, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA-NIGERIA—POSSIBLE RESUMPTION OF RELIEF FLIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In light of the communication from Mr. Justice

Onyiuke, head of the Biafran delegation in the United States, saying that his government would agree to the daylight flights into Biafra, has the government made plans to restart the Hercules air flights? Has it considered adding to the number of aircraft available for that purpose?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see that there is at least some indication by some authorities of the rebel held area that they are willing to consider this. But I will draw to the attention of the house that the most essential part of the suggestion was left out of the statement. The sole condition on which General Gowon insisted when saying he would authorize daylight flights was that there be an assurance from the Biafran authorities that they would not use daylight hours for arms shipments, because he did not want to confuse relief and arms flights. I see that is the precise part which has been omitted from the statement to which the hon. member refers. As long as there is no guarantee of that kind, then of course the essential part of the bargain is missing. I would add that we have been asking the International Red Cross for further news on this, and their latest report is that the Biafran authorities are still refusing to meet this one essential condition.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I direct the Prime Minister's attention to the eastern part of Nigeria that is occupied by federal forces. In light of the statement by the Canadian commander of our Hercules aircraft in Lagos that the Hercules was not too large to land at Enugu, Calabar, Port Harcourt and so on, and since that was the pretext for preventing the use of Hercules aircraft, will the government again discuss the matter of Hercules flights into that area with the Nigerian government?

Mr. Trudeau: Apparently there is some misunderstanding on that point. I believe the hon. member is referring to the impression of an interview in which one of our pilots said it would have been possible to land. Our information is that of course one or two landings might have been possible, but by inquiring from the Nigerian authorities we learned that the airstrips at Enugu, Calabar, Port Harcourt and so on could not take repeated landings by aircraft the size of the Hercules, and that the size and weight of the Hercules would destroy the airstrips. After all, it is the Nigerian people and their government who would be interested in having these aircraft land if they could land. Therefore we must take their advice and the advice of our own aircraft authorities on this matter.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Prime Minister inform the house whether the Canadian Caribou aircraft we were supposed to send to Nigeria for relief work have yet arrived at Lagos?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I shall have to seek information on whether these Caribou have left yet.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the one directed a few minutes ago to the Prime Minister. I direct my question to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member must ask a new question. He may not ask a supplementary question to one that has not been accepted by the Chair.

Mr. Forrestall: I am sorry but with respect, sir, it was a question you did allow and that the Prime Minister was not able to answer. I would simply redirect it to the Minister of National Defence. Could he tell us where the Caribou are, what stage they have reached in their progress toward Nigeria?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I have to confess, Mr. Speaker, that this is an embarrassing question.

Mr. Forrestall: I am sorry; I thought you would know.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): No, no. As the hon. member knows, I was away for a week and I thought the request for these Caribou had been cancelled.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think I will be able to shed a little light on this question. I have a note here that it is the Nigerian Red Cross who had said they could not make use of the Caribou. Apparently there was subsequent information from the Nigerian authorities themselves that they would like to have the Caribou aircraft, but we indicated that our offer was through the Canadian Red Cross to the Nigerian Red Cross and not to the government of Nigeria itself. This is consistent with our position of not taking sides. We want the Red Cross to be the ones to decide whether they can or cannot use the aircraft, and we are still waiting for a reply on that.

Inquiries of the Ministry

HOUSING

LAC-LA-BICHE, ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR VISIT BY TASK FORCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will he arrange for the task force on housing to visit the town of Lac-la-Biche and see at first hand the deplorable conditions of Métis Indian housing there. I shall be happy to arrange a meeting of the Progressive Conservative association, if that is a prerequisite for a visit by the task force to a rural riding.

TRADE

STEPS TO PRESERVE EXPORT MARKET IN U.K.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Rod Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the serious financial problem in Great Britain and the potential loss of half our exports to that market due to that country's recently imposed restrictions on imports, can the minister say what action is being taken by the Canadian government to preserve our export markets?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are looking very carefully at the action taken by the British government. I have not complete information at the present time, but I understand that only about 20 per cent of our exports to Britain would be affected. However, this would not mean that they would be cut off. As I understand it they would have to be paid for in cash.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): As a supplementary question, in view of statements that are appearing in the press indicating that half our exports to Great Britain will be affected by the British austerity measures, will the Minister of Finance seek an immediate opportunity to make a statement to allay these fears?

Mr. Benson: As I said, Mr. Speaker, my information is that only about 20 per cent of our exports would be affected. This would not mean an end to such exports. It would simply mean, as I understand the situation, that they must be paid for in cash when they arrive in Britain. As I indicated before, I am having the matter investigated further, and I will be pleased to pass on any further information.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

PROVISION OF SUMMER EMPLOYMENT FOR UNIVERSITY STUDENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Len Marchand (Kamloops-Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. I have been receiving inquiries from students in various parts of the country about employment for next summer. Could he advise the house whether his department or the government is taking any particular action to look after the employment needs of students next summer?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am wondering whether this is not the type of information which the minister might consider giving at the time of motions.

PUBLIC SERVICE

LANGUAGE REQUIREMENTS RESPECTING FUTURE APPOINTMENTS AND PROMOTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could get an answer to the question I directed to the Secretary of State last Thursday with respect to a statement made by a member of the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Robert Stanbury (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I have been given the following information by the Public Service Commission.

There has been no change in policy with regard to the administration of language proficiency requirements in staffing the public service. The policy which continues to be followed by the Public Service Commission is that outlined in Prime Minister Pearson's statement of April 6, 1966.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question, does this mean that the statement attributed in the press to a member of the Public Service Commission is erroneous?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question as asked is not in order. The hon. gentleman knows he cannot ask if a statement in the press is correct or incorrect.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put the question in such a manner that it is in order, because I think it is an important matter of public interest.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps we might allow the parliamentary secretary to reply to the question.

Mr. Stanbury: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not compared these two statements, but it is apparent that the policy is as conveyed to the house through the Secretary of State today.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State. Would the parliamentary secretary be able to obtain a transcript or the text of the remarks made by a member of the Public Service Commission and table it in this house so that a comparison can be made?

Mr. Stanfield: As a further supplementary question, in order to eliminate all possible confusion on this subject I wonder if the parliamentary secretary would consider making a statement as to what is the policy in this regard.

Mr. Benson: He just did.

Mr. Stanbury: Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to read to the house the statement that was made by the right hon. prime minister of the day, to which the Public Service Commission has referred. I think, however, perhaps the Leader of the Opposition could find that for himself. I also suggest that the person who made the remarks to which reference was made would be glad to provide the house leader of the opposition with a copy of those remarks.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DATE OF PAYMENT OF RETROACTIVE PAY INCREASES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, may I address a most urgent question to the Minister of National Defence. I do so at the request of many members of the armed forces. In view of the announced increase in wages to the members of the armed forces, retroactive to October 1, can the minister inform the house whether the retroactive increase will be paid by December 30 of this year, in order that they may avoid having to pay the 2 per cent surcharge next year on money earned and authorized this year?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to reassure the hon. member and to tell him that this morning I insisted with the deputy minister that this be done.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question, and I welcome this forthright minister back to the house. Can he give the same assurance about civilians working for his department, who in many respects are faced with a much more severe situation?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Actually, Mr. Speaker, most of the civilian employees of the Department of National Defence have enjoyed an increase. Some of them have not yet, and this is because their collective bargaining units with the government have not concluded negotiations. I believe there are only a few areas in which this applies.

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Will the minister be introducing legislation during this session of parliament or taking any other action to bring the pensions of servicemen who have retired over the last few years more in line with present pay scales?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, this is being studied now. I do not know whether the study will be conducted in time for us to present it, but I really expect this could be done in the spring. Therefore we would meet the hon. member's request.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I take it that inasmuch as this study is going on with regard to retired members of the armed forces, the same study is going on with respect to retired civil servants? This question is addressed to the Minister of Finance.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows we are continually studying the question in respect of retired civil servants.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): How long does "continually" last?

IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL ENGLISH TRAINING FOR IMMIGRANT CHILDREN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Has the government reached a definite decision in respect of the requests for financial assistance with regard to special English training for immigrant children? If so, what is the decision?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The decision was to confirm the previous decision taken by my predecessor.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REVIEW OF PENSIONS OF RETIRED PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence and the Minister of Finance have indicated that a review of pensions of the retired persons coming under their supervision is now under way, is the same thing being done with regard to retired members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer to take the question as notice in order to give a fully accurate reply.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

20. Operation and maintenance, general administration and interest charges on outstanding loans that were made for the purpose of acquiring property in the national capital region, $9,500,000.

The Deputy Chairman: Revised estimates of the National Capital Commission for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1969, vote 20. This will be found at page 425 of the blue book. The details are listed at page 436.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Chairman, before the house deals with the estimates of the National Capital Commission for 1968-69, I would like to say a few words about the work of the commission for which I have been responsible since July 12, 1968.

Over the years, the house has been kept informed about the work of the commission through its annual reports and its capital investment programs tabled in the house. The work of the commission is based for the most part on the main recommendations of the Gréber report and is concerned with implementing the principles outlined to the house on June 28, 1948 when the National Capital Fund was set up. That fund was meant to supply the amounts needed to pay the cost of the undertakings approved by the governor in council to improve and develop the national capital. This is what the Prime Minister said at that time:

> It also, and even more, seeks to anticipate the needs of Canada's capital in the future as we believe that future will shape our country. We desire, above all else, a capital worthy of the high place that Canada holds in the world today and of the Canada that is yet to be.

The national capital program designed by Mr. Jacques Gréber, was tabled in the house in 1951. For the past 17 years, the government and the commission have amended and improved this plan. It was revised by a joint parliamentary committee which, in turn, recommended some changes. The committee report was tabled in the house on August 1, 1956. These changes, as well as the 12 years of experience in the meantime, have clearly demonstrated that the plan of a capital, like that of any other large city, has to be the continuing subject of criticism, studies and improvements.

In the meantime, the commission, by spending a great deal of time and money, had to acquire a large number of properties in order to implement the important recommendations of the plan. The period of time devoted to the acquisition of properties according to the recommendations of the plan is nearly over and the construction period is well under way. A new long term plan is being prepared in order to further improve and develop the national capital area. These new proposals will be introduced to the house in due time.

• (3:40 p.m.)

[English]

The commission's annual report for 1967-68, which has been tabled in the house, gives information of the commission's activities and expenditures for that year.

The estimates of the commission for 1968-69 amount to $24,500,000 for ordinary operations, interest on loans, improvements, and development within the national capital region, and $4,900,000 for loans to acquire property. These compare with $23,100,000 and $6,850,000 respectively in 1967-68. The actual expenditures for 1967-68 amounted to $21,600,000 gross. I have a detailed indication of the estimates, and I hope this will be tabled so that hon. members will have it.

[Translation]

Serious consideration is now being given to the renovation of the centretown of Ottawa. Most parcels of land in the central area of the city, some belonging to the federal government, are ready to be re-developed. The commission had studies prepared on the economic prospects of the capital, with a view to establishing re-development plans to meet the needs and the prestige of the national capital.

That is one of the complex problems which holds the attention of the National Capital Commission, whose objectives are "to prepare plans for and assist in the development, conservation and improvement of the national capital region in order that the nature and character of the seat of the government of Canada may be in accordance with its national significance." Canada is a young country which, in all probability, will have a dynamic growth in the coming years. Ottawa, capital of Canada, is called to a brilliant future. Within the framework of its constitutional powers and thanks to its long experience in the field of town-planning, the commission plays a key role in the capital. Through its co-operation with the municipalities of the area, ensuring the wise use of federal properties and developing its own lands, the commission can make a valuable contribution to the expansion of the national capital. It will proceed with its town-planning work using tested techniques, allowing timely grants, encouraging general planning and the development of the lands and properties of the government, according to a long-term and flexible program.

Last year, in a speech which I delivered to the Chamber of Commerce in Hull, I noted the appreciable disproportion between the expenses made to improve the national capital—Ottawa—and those made for the improvement of the city of Hull. I wish to repeat today that the development plans of the national capital area should take into account not only the necessity of improving Hull—which is part of Ottawa on the economic as well as the social levels—but also the concern of the government to the effect that planning for the capital area in Quebec, especially in Hull, provides a just proportion of the over-all improvement proposed for the region. This planning must provide for the integration of the whole national capital area. It would be foolish to expect this undertaking to succeed while ignoring a vitally important part of the area such as the city of Hull and the rest of the area which is located in Quebec.

[English]

My hon. friends will no doubt be conscious of the need to plan for a fair share of the development proposed for the national capital region to be made in Hull, Quebec, which for economic and social purposes is a part of the capital. It is my understanding that plans and proposals are being proposed to that end. The Promenade des Voyageurs, a parkway proposed for the Quebec side of the Ottawa river, from Hull to Deschênes, Quebec, a distance of approximately 5 miles, is an example of the improvements proposed for Hull. I cannot speak for my colleague, the Minister of Public Works, but I know that careful consideration is being given to the probable construction soon of federal government buildings in Hull. Also new bridges linking Hull closer to Ottawa are now being considered. All these proposals will contribute largely to the betterment of economic conditions in Hull and encourage the development of Hull, not as a poor suburb of Ottawa but on a comparable and competitive basis with Ottawa.

The commission, having put under way or completed the larger part of the recommendations contained in the Gréber report, has reached an important crossroad in its planning for the region as a whole. Further, the creation of a new regional municipal authority in Ontario to absorb many of the responsibilities formerly borne by the city of Ottawa and other Ontario municipalities ought to pave the way for a much closer planning liaison between the regional council and the National Capital Commission. No doubt similar steps, if taken in the province of Quebec, would make the planning easier for that area of the national capital region. The government is deeply conscious of the need to promote to a greater extent the bilingual and bicultural aspect of the national capital region, so that it will be more truly representative of the founding peoples of this great country and, at the same time, be a living symbol of the unity and understanding which has prevailed since confederation.

I trust that these proposals will commend themselves to this committee.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, we on this side of the house, particularly members of this party, welcome this opportunity to discuss the estimates of the National Capital Commission. We need not remind ourselves of the beautiful geography which this involves. Surely there is no better place in Canada than right here on parliament hill to begin this development.

I was particularly interested in the minister's suggestion that we will have a further opportunity to consider this measure. The geographical area involved takes in parts of two great provinces or the two founding nations, so to speak, which have been put together to some extent in relation to these estimates. We must remember, in being slightly critical, that it has been five years since we have had the opportunity to discuss the estimates we are considering this afternoon. We must therefore take advantage of the opportunity to put forth sincerely constructive criticism in a manner which, if not in detail, will bring to the minister's attention the situation which exists.

If I may digress for a moment, we find that with greater regularity ministers are announcing government proposals outside this house, and I refer particularly to the minister's statements in respect of the proposed developments for Hull. Certainly we are in favour of these developments. The national capital area involves two cities, a number of municipalities and two provinces. In this regard we must consider this whole situation as one involving a language of its own. It seems to me it has become increasingly the policy of the government, in particular of certain ministers, to make statements outside the house.

Because a committee has not been set up for five years, we shall ask for and in fact insist upon such a committee being set up to study these problems. It should be a broad committee. I hope these remarks will be taken by the minister as constructive criticism. A committee of the house should be immediately set up to consider these estimates in great detail. It should consist of people interested in the development of our capital city. The provinces of Ontario and Quebec and the municipalities of Ottawa and Hull are not the only ones concerned with this question. People from all walks of life and all parts of this country are deeply concerned in the matter. This is why I suggest we should make sure that the committee is a very broad one.

As I have already pointed out, for five years nothing has been done in this respect, with the very laudable exception of the national gallery. I suppose here there have been two mistakes. First, this is all that has been done in this long period of time and, second, there was the gross mistake of underestimating the cost of the national gallery. But I suppose things will work out in the end and I am not too critical of that mistake. During centennial year there were numerous functions on the lawns of parliament hill in our capital city. Here again I point out critically that in the last five years many things could have been done to culminate in centennial year. At least a committee could have been set up consisting of all the parties involved. One small matter that might have been considered by the committee is high-rise apartment buildings in Ottawa. This question has not even been properly considered. Why cannot these things be done? Why cannot this committee be set up where everybody concerned could put forward their points of view and we could listen and decide?

We read about these things in the newspapers but in the house have heard nothing about them. I suggest this is the place where these questions should be considered because we represent the whole of the country. In spite of the fact that some ministers and in fact the government itself would sometimes have us believe otherwise, this house is still the place where the people of Canada can speak.

The minister mentioned several things that have been done. I was glad to hear what he said about bridges. I was glad to hear the suggestion that a committee might study these matters. I cannot express my view too strongly that this whole question should be considered by a committee of the house. I do not refer to the one-man commission of Dr. Rowatt, I think it is, set up by the Ontario government. The federal government took part in it and took credit for it. However, I do not complain too much about that; it is probably a natural thing to do. The doctor has not yet reported, but the minister goes over to Hull and makes statements on these matters before the commission has reported. He also makes statements in the house before any committee has reported.

I suggest to you with all deference, Mr. Chairman, that statements of this kind should not be made before the commission and the committees report, because there are differences among the municipalities and, if I have to say it in so many words, there is a little distrust among them. Several prospective buildings in Hull have been mentioned. People in Eastview, Ottawa and the outlying municipalities have this distrust simply because of a lack of knowledge and understanding of the matter. This emphasizes the fact that a committee should be set up to study these problems. Let everybody concerned have an understanding of what is involved.

The National Capital Commission and our capital city should really speak a language of their own in this country. We have the same problems. We have talked so much about them in this house in recent years, particularly last fall. These problems also concern other parts of the world. Neighbours living in the same community mistrust one another simply because of lack of understanding. If we understand one another, particularly our aims and views, I think there will no longer be any animosity. We find we have a common goal, we trust one another, and we reach that goal.

I thank the minister for his statement. I hope he will seriously consider the points that we in this party and all parties in the house have in mind. We are simply asking, and if we could we would demand it, that a broad committee be set up to undertake a detailed examination of these estimates. The minister must be aware that the commission has had a detailed report ready for two years, I understand, but no one has been able to listen to it. I think this is appalling. I refer to the commission whose estimates we are examining. The minister has said they are doing the planning; yet he goes to Hull and makes announcements there, as he does in this house, without reference to that report.

I ask that this committee be set up so we may have its ideas and recommendations. I believe this is only fair. I have tried to be sensible. I have been a little critical in order to bring forward these points. I hope the minister responsible for these matters will remember some of the points that have been raised and will take action to solve the problems that exist. I do not want to digress, Mr. Chairman, but we all have visitors from our constituencies from time to time. Constituents come here and say: Isn't the government in action wonderful? I sometimes wonder whether they are talking about one word or two words. It is time there was real action in this area on the part of the government.

Mr. Mather: Mr. Chairman, in rising to say a few words on the subject before us I am sure I feel very much like many other members of parliament in that we think of ourselves, at least in a way, as trustees of the public's money in our functions here regarding the financing of projects and works in connection with the business of the National Capital Commission. I think the business of the National Capital Commission is very much to that point. Here we are in the national capital of Canada surrounded by buildings, projects, landscaping and monuments to make it an even better capital for our country. Whether the Canadians who paid for it live in the eastern Arctic, in Frobisher Bay, away in the northeast or in my own southwestern area of Canada, in Surrey and White Rock city, they are all contributing, either in a small or in a major way, toward paying for what is being done here and for what is being planned for the national capital. I am sure we are all in favour of making it the best possible centre of its kind that we can.

I think a good deal might be said today about the outline the minister sketched for us with regard to improving the centre of the national capital and expanding the expenditure of public funds on the development of Hull as part of the national capital area. I am in favour of both these plans. My only regret is that these projects were not implemented 10 or 15 years ago when they might have been done a great deal more economically and we might have been benefiting from them during all these years.

Aside from these points I shall confine myself today to making a few criticisms regarding the situation in this area as I see it and our lack of perspective, planning and action. I should also like to reiterate the point which the previous speaker has made so well and which I and other members of our party have urged over the years. I refer to the wisdom of establishing a parliamentary committee on the national capital so that the members of this house will have a continuing and better understanding as well as an informed basis for their comments regarding what is being done with Canadian money in developing the national capital. This would enable hon. members to consult from time to time with the members of the National Capital Commission, the city of Ottawa authorities and any others who may have ideas on the improvement of Canada's national capital.

I am not quite sure whether the project I shall mention next comes under the jurisdiction of this minister but I do know that the construction of the National Centre for the Performing Arts will, according to the last figure I saw, cost between 300 and 400 per cent above the original estimates. This is really part of our concern as parliamentarians dealing with the improvement of our national capital. The last figure I saw relating to the cost of the theatre centre was over $40 million. This means it will cost every Canadian between $2 and $3 or about $10 for every Canadian family in the country. This will be the contribution of Canadians toward the construction of a national theatre in the capital.

In Vancouver, for example, which is my general home base, we built a theatre about ten years ago for $3 million. It is a very fine theatre called the Queen Elizabeth. Frankly the reason it was called that and not the Pauline Johnson theatre was that it was felt that the name of Queen Elizabeth would attract more attention across Canada and from our friends to the south, the Americans, who may be rather intrigued by such a title for the theatre. The point I want to make is that such a theatre was built by the Vancouver people for the low cost I mentioned and it performs the same function as will the national theatre in Ottawa.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to make a helpful comment at this point may I say that this is not the responsibility of the commission or of my department. This was done under the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Mather: I am sure that is the case, but if I can say another sentence or two on this general subject I will be able to relate it to the responsibility of parliamentarians in supervising the spending of money on the development of our national capital. May I say that we have some better looking penitentiaries in British Columbia than the national capital theatre.

The reason I speak on this subject now is that we think a part of the increased cost of this building, which will be borne by the taxpayers, came about as a result of the lack of understanding and co-ordination between the federal government and the city of Ottawa. The federal government in making its decision regarding the construction of this expensive theatre decided to take advantage of the offer of land made by the city of Ottawa. It has been admitted on all sides that this has greatly added to the cost now being borne by the taxpayers. I strongly urge that the parliament of Canada, which is the trustee of the money that will be expended for the expansion of the Quebec side of the national capital area and for any major developments in the centre core of the capital, be consulted and that we set up a committee representing every party in the house so we will have, as the previous speaker said, a number of better informed parliamentarians who will be dealing with the estimates and reports such as the one we have before us today.

I should like to say in conclusion—and this may not be specifically to the point—that when we are dealing with the national capital we are in a sense dealing with our national culture. I think that perhaps too high a priority has been given to the performing arts such as ballet. Let us seriously consider the fact that in Canada we have very little that relates us east to west; our thinking is apt to be directed toward the south. I find that in our culture, whether it is expressed in terms of the national capital or in terms of art or athletics, one part of our country, the maritimes, is entirely cut off from one of the greatest common denominators in our Canadian relationship, athletics. I am referring to the forthcoming national spectacle, the Grey cup game. If the parliament of Canada had had any say in regard to the spending of tax money to develop the national capital I wonder whether it might not have thought it better, instead of spending so many millions of dollars on building a structure here in Ottawa for the performing arts, perhaps to subsidize the city of Halifax so as to enable it to be represented in our national sports events. Perhaps this would be in the interest of the whole nation because I consider athletics to be a cultural activity, just as is opera or ballet, and one calculated to improve our national relationships. I think the house would have done something good for Canada if it had been able to give favourable consideration to such a suggestion.

Before sitting down I should like to reiterate the hope of the members of our party that, as the minister has said, he will set up a parliamentary committee which will concern itself with the better handling of public money and the improvement of Canada's national capital. The predecessor minister in the public works portfolio, who in the last parliament was in charge of national capital concerns, also made this promise.

Mr. Richard: Mr. Chairman, at the outset I should like to congratulate the minister who has shown already a great interest in the regional development of Ottawa and Hull. I hope he will maintain that spirit and that he will consult with those who are interested in the different sections of the national capital they represent. For many years our voice has not been heard, but we could have made a contribution to the improvement of relationships between this government and the municipal authorities. I do not want to make lengthy remarks today because I am still hoping that as soon as possible after the new year a committee will be established to study closely all aspects of the national capital. There is a great deal to be done. I hope the minister will begin early in January to convene this committee and give it the opportunity of studying all aspects of the life of the national capital.

I cannot help but think back to the time of confederation. I have read some of the original confederation debates, and it is too bad the suggestion of one of the speakers at that time could not have been adopted. He wanted to set aside the land which is now the core of the national capital as federal land. If this had been done, many of the problems we have today would not be with us.

During the 23 years I have been here I have said time and time again that one of the difficulties connected with improving this capital has been the lack of a close relationship between the provincial and federal governments. They were all always at loggerheads. In fact, they were not even at loggerheads because most of the time they did not even meet. Furthermore, there has always been a lack of liaison between the Department of Public Works and the city of Ottawa or the Prime Minister when he was in charge of the federal commission. We have had this trouble with zoning. There has never been a proper zoning plan of the city. There was little use in the National Capital Commission making plans when they were always running up against zoning which did not suit their plans. Even the departments within the government do not agree with each other. We have had clashes between the minister representing the National Capital Commission, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of National Defence. At the moment there is a battle over zoning in the centre part of Ottawa. One builder desires to put up a very high building but the National Capital Commission opposes it. But, who will be the first tenant of that building if it is erected. The Department of Public Works. As long as there is no proper liaison between the province and the federal government or between the various departments of the government, plans cannot be made which will be useful.

There is a great deal of work to be done in this city. No one can deny that. However, it cannot be done if the same procedure is followed as has been followed in the past. I have heard the minister say that Hull cannot be treated as a suburb. It may be easy to do what the minister suggests, and I hope it is. However, these suggestions will not solve the problem of the core of my city. I happen to be the representative for Ottawa East which includes the area east of the Canal, Eastview and Overbrook. To my knowledge, no building has been erected in this part of Ottawa and Eastview for 35 years. If we did not have the Chateau Laurier in Ottawa East we would not have anything. In all of the region between here and the residences of the Governor General and the Prime Minister there is not a single new government building. We have been told for years that a building for external affairs might be constructed. I suppose that will happen some day but that is not sufficient to improve the whole area between here and Rockcliffe or between here and the Montreal Road.

Perhaps members do not realize that Ottawa East includes Eastview and Overbrook and that in this area the people are bilingual. This is a truly bilingual section of the country, with its own university and newspaper. Why search all over the place to improve bilingual and bicultural relations when we have this area right in the centre of the city? This area is in Ontario, and French speaking and English speaking people are trying to live together in unity and I feel they should be encouraged. They have not received any encouragement so far. I felt it was time to make this statement because apparently the quieter you are the more people seem to think that things are going along well.

The eastern part of the city from the Chateau along the river to Rockcliffe and down the Rideau river to Hog's Back is probably the most beautiful part of the city. If there is a more scenic area and a better population in any other part of the country, I should like to know where it is. I urge the minister, when he is thinking of developing the bicultural aspect of this region, to think of the eastern part of this city. I am sure he will have to give that part of the city his support, as will the members of this house when they know what needs to be done.

I would not want to close my remarks without saying something about the National Capital Commission. They deserve congratulations for the wonderful work they have done on our parkways and the improvements along the Ottawa river. Those of us who knew these areas in the past realize the wonderful work that has been done by the engineers and planners of the National Capital Commission. On behalf of the people of Ottawa, I want to say thank you. However, the commission can only do what its powers will permit it to do. Any misgivings there may be about the development of the national capital can be attributed to the fact that the powers of the National Capital Commission are limited and sometimes their budget is not sufficient.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am inspired, Mr. Chairman, by the words of the hon. member for Ottawa East to make a brief contribution to this discussion. This afternoon we have heard from a member from the far western part of Canada and from a member who represents a constituency within this national capital. I think it is high time we heard from someone who comes from the heart of the nation, the province of Manitoba. I speak this afternoon as one who represents a constituency that is not only close to the centre of Canada but is close to the geographic centre of the North American continent. If logic were to control where capital cities are located, our capital, of course, would have been located right in the heart of my constituency.

The hon. member for Ottawa East has indicated, with the wisdom of hindsight, that certain suggestions were made in the early days for Canada's capital and if that advice had been followed we would not be in difficulty with respect to co-ordination and we would not have made some of the mistakes that have obviously been made over the years in the development of Canada's capital as one of the loveliest, if not the best, of the major capital cities of the world. In addition to the impassioned remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa East, I rise to my feet because of a phrase that was used by the minister in his introductory remarks. He told us that from time to time the plans are "modified and revised". That was the phrase he used. This immediately raises the question just how fluid is the plan for Canada's national capital and just how far can long term planning be modified or distorted. During centennial year a model of the future development of our Canadian capital city was displayed on the mall. It seems to me that during the relatively short time I have been in this house the Gréber plan has been modified in such a way as not to enhance the beauty of the capital as originally conceived by Mr. Jacques Gréber. I refer particularly to the development in the centre of the city. People who come from western Canada, where they are used to wide open spaces, are shocked to see the congestion in the heart of the nation's capital, which is described as confederation square and is popularly known as confusion square.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mr. Stanbury: Not any more.

Mr. Dinsdale: Over the years, that is so. I hear the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State saying "not any more". That is one man's opinion. Obviously he has not travelled west to appreciate the magnificent spaciousness of that region of Canada.

Mr. Stanbury: I have.

Mr. Dinsdale: Otherwise he would not suggest that the designation "confusion square" does not apply.

Mr. Peters: The real confusion square is in Toronto.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is possibly one explanation for the hon. gentleman's viewpoint. When certain demolition work took place in the vicinity of the square in recent years we hoped it might be in preparation for the provision of a suitable open space and park area to give an impression of the spaciousness which is typical of Canada. We have all been to Washington. I think one of the most impressive aspects of the centre of Washington as a capital city is the open space which exists in such abundance around the capitol building. Here in Canada we have much more geography available with our relatively small population; yet we persist in concentrating everything in what would seem to be the smallest area possible.

Mr. Francis: Would the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that the city of Ottawa has a larger percentage of land devoted to public purposes than any other North American city? I am thinking of the experimental farm, of major park areas such as Vincent Massey Park, and so on, all entirely within the city boundaries.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am aware of that. I also think that the green belt plan has much to commend it.

Mr. Francis: I was talking about space within the city.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, but I was referring to the centre of the city which, after all, is the focus. It is within the shadow of the parliament buildings and receives the greatest attention from all visiting Canadians. This is why I raised the question I did, and I trust the minister can explain the situation a little more clearly.

Mr. Francis: Does the hon. member think we should not do business?

Mr. Dinsdale: I am interested in knowing how far it is possible to modify and refine the original plan as laid down by Jacques Gréber. My hon. friend from Surrey introduced the subject of the centre for the performing arts. I shall not discuss the merits of that institution this afternoon; we have been doing that in the committee on broadcasting and the arts. But I think this point is relevant to the subject matter now under discussion. It seems to me that a further fundamental mistake was made by adding to the congestion and confusion in the centre of our nation's capital when it was decided to create this massive complex of buildings in a most strategic location. I shall not use the strong words used by the hon. member for Surrey, who said it was less attractive than many penal institutions, but I will go this far: in terms of beautifying a strategic part of Ottawa, or the capital district, it does not make any substantial contribution. Once the centre is opened and in full operation with its underground parking provided at a cost of $7 million I shall be most interested to see just how the reputation of confusion square will be altered by this development.

I raise this point because obviously there have been modifications in the plan. This was not the location originally designed for the arts centre, and the soaring cost of construction was, as we discovered in our committee studies, largely the result of the decision to build on this particular site, a decision to relocate which was obviously taken hastily and without careful planning in terms of the long term effect on traffic patterns, the preservation of open spaces and similar considerations.

The construction of this complex of buildings in the area known as confusion square, which we had hoped would become Confederation Square, in fact was made possible by virtue of the phrase which the minister used when he talked about the possibility of modification and refinement. I agree that there has been modification but I am not sure there was refinement in this particular instance. I suppose things like this happen because, as the hon. member for Ottawa East indicated, the N.C.C. lacks sufficient authority to overrule the various conflicting interests which zero in when the use of these strategic locations is under consideration. I am sure the N.C.C. was overruled in this instance because the development is by no means in the grand style originally conceived by the architect, Mr. Gréber.

I hope the minister will comment on these remarks and indicate just how far modification or violation is possible in the planning of our capital city. Even though we use the postal address "Ottawa, Ontario", or "Hull, Quebec" this city does not belong to Ontario or Quebec in the way that other provincial capitals or cities belong to their provinces. Ottawa is the focal point of all the people of Canada, and all people in Canada make substantial contributions to its development.

Mr. Francis: The hon. member must not forget that the municipality makes contributions.

Mr. Dinsdale: A moment ago my hon. friend from Ottawa West said that many parks in our capital city proper are paid for by the good citizens of this country from British Columbia to Newfoundland. A substantial part of the upkeep of course is paid by the citizens of this country.

Mr. Francis: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, I do not suggest that all these parks are provided at public expense by the federal government. Quite a number of them are provided by the municipalities. I call the hon. member's attention to our very large proportion of park service areas which, to the best of my recollection, is not exceeded by any other city on the North American continent. No other North American city as far as I know devotes such a proportion of its area to canals, parks and public services of this nature.

Mr. Dinsdale: We are splitting hairs on this matter, Mr. Chairman. I think the hon. member will agree that the national capital parkways, the experimental farm and many of other specialized and beautiful park areas are supported by the people of Canada through public funds expended by the National Capital Commission whose estimates we are now discussing.

Mr. Francis: One must also consider city property.

Mr. Dinsdale: I have been looking through the commission's report and I am amazed at the substantial sum of money spent. I see that the graph of expenditures goes onward and upward to a cumulative total of $206.3 million. That money comes from the taxpayers of every part of Canada.

That is why I feel there ought to be greater co-ordination. A jurisdictional dispute is going on involving city versus city, municipality versus municipality and province versus province. In this process of modification and refinement I suppose the noisy wheel gets the grease in the long run. I sympathize with the hon. member for Ottawa East when he complains that there is a lopsided development. It appears that one municipality is not as influential as another in resolving these jurisdictional disputes. I presume that the city of Ottawa will have a strong voice in these deliberations. I do not think that is the way it should be. There ought to be co-ordination which takes into consideration not the parochial needs of one municipality, council or what have you but the fact that we are developing here our nation's capital which we hope will be one of the finest of all the world's capitals.

We have made an error in pre-empting a stragetic location for the National Centre for the Performing Arts. I had visualized a beautiful, expansive view from parliament hill. But now we see a pile of stone that is supposed to typify or symbolize, as we were told in the committee, the great Canadian pre-Cambrian shield, as if that is the only thing representative of Canada. In this project there was a lack of imagination, a lack of vision. Even though a few maple trees are to be planted around the enormous pile of rock, along with some Dutch elms which I suppose will die of Dutch elm disease, the problem will not be resolved.

When we discussed this matter in committee it was said, "You cannot tear the building down." Certainly you cannot tear it down. You cannot unscramble an omelet. I speak of this matter now in the hope that we do not continue making mistakes on this grandiose scale in our planning.

Perhaps I might refer to the Beachburg line which has also been discussed by many in recent years. I notice that in the estimates an expenditure of $39.3 million is listed for relocation of railway lines, construction of overpasses and bridges and so on. Yet here in the nation's capital we have a railway line going through one of the most exclusive residential areas. In the original proposal put forward in the capital plan of the N.C.C., the station was to have been located on Walkley Road to avoid what has become a sore spot in the heart of our national capital. These mistakes must be avoided because they are obviously costly and spoil the beauty of the city to an enormous extent.

We were told in committee that relocation caused the cost of the centre for the performing arts to soar from an estimate of $18 million to a final figure of approximately $46 million. Yet there was an interdepartmental committee working on this matter. Although we had experts and consultants costing us hundreds of thousands of dollars for their advice, the costs of the centre continued to go up and up and up, completely out of control. I suppose similar remarks would be true with respect to bridges, overpasses and things of that sort in any consideration of the Beachburg line. We must have necessary changes, of course, with respect to the Beachburg line but we ought to see that there is co-ordination in planning and that the N.C.C. is not interfered with in its over-all responsibility in these matters in the future.

Mr. Stanbury: I am not surprised, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member who has just sat down has been chewing again at his favourite bone, the National Arts Centre. It must not be thought that his low opinion of the architecture is shared by all.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am concerned about the site.

Mr. Stanbury: The hon. member talks of the site but he was quite insulting about the aesthetic aspect of the building. I will not discuss the site with him since I expect the minister may want to do that. I merely point out that a similar Philistine attitude toward modern architecture was displayed by some of the less farsighted citizens of Toronto. I suggest that the national arts centre will be to Ottawa what the fine, new city hall is to Toronto.

May I refer the hon. member to a commentary which appeared in the Montreal Star of November 23. It was written by Eric McLean and reads as follows:

• (4:40 p.m.)

I have seen most of the new theatre, concert-hall, and opera buildings on this continent, the ones at Los Angeles and Indianapolis being the most important exceptions, and I have no hesitation in saying that the Ottawa project will outshine them all.

Farther on he describes the National Arts Centre as:

—a real work of art; an enduring piece of architecture that will go a long way towards making the heart of Ottawa a showplace.

I do not say whether the opinion of Eric McLean, which is shared by others, is correct, or whether the artistic judgment of the hon. member who has just taken his seat is correct, but I do point out that there are different points of view on this matter. Personally I think that the National Arts Centre will be a structure of which the citizens of Ottawa as well as the people of Canada generally will be justly proud.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I was interested in the remarks made this afternoon by the hon. member for Ottawa East because of his particular knowledge of this subject and his particular interest in it over a long period of time. I share his regret that the minister really did not say anything about what he hoped the National Capital Commission would do with regard to the many problems it has, except that we need to equalize the bilingual and bicultural balance by having more buildings erected in the province of Quebec. But this is only a small part of the commission's problems, unless the commission chooses to build another edifice like the one erected recently in confusion square.

Our national capital should be developed in a way acceptable to Canadians who visit it from all parts of Canada. I agree that Ottawa and its surrounding area are in a most beautiful location. I will not disagree with the hon. member for Ottawa West who has said that there are probably more green areas in Ottawa than anywhere else, but I point out that Ottawa has the worst transportation system of any place of comparable size. What does the minister suggest that we do to cope with the transportation problem? I am sure he will tell us that he is going to put up bilingual signs. Such a suggestion burns me up. The province of Quebec has already passed that stage. It has erected international signs that anybody can understand.

People come from all parts of Canada to do business with the various branches of government located in Ottawa. But once they reach here they encounter the transportation problem. The other night was a good example when people found themselves seven hours away from the airport. I would like to discuss the reason for this.

The National Capital Commission started out with a very good plan, the Greber plan, which has already been mentioned in this debate. It was a long-range, 50-year plan which could be extended indefinitely to take care of future expansion. But changes have been made.

If we decided tomorrow to build a road from downtown Ottawa to the airport we would probably have to start construction from the airport end. We already own most of the land as far as Bronson Avenue, but when we reached that point we would probably find that the city fathers could screw up our plan because there would be no outlet for the road to the downtown area. We have done our share in buying up land for the National Capital Commission. We are probably the biggest owners of real estate in the city, although possibly Campeau may be bigger. However, we rent, buy and expropriate property to help develop a national capital plan. But what happens? Every time some joker gets an idea that he wants to build a high-rise building in Ottawa, the city of Ottawa changes its zoning plans.

In effect the city seems subject to the plans of two or three entrepreneurs. In effect there is no plan so far as the city itself is concerned. As I say, we own a lot of land from the airport to Bronson Avenue. It is a combination of abandoned railway line and of land that we bought running along a ravine. But we have never sat down with the National Capital Commission and told the commission what its role should be in negotiating with the municipalities of the area.

I do not know what the relationship is with Hull. I do know we had an unfortunate experience in Hull with respect to the printing bureau. That was not a municipal problem, but there is a building problem in that area. However, I am sure that if we sat down with representatives from Hull we would welcome their participation in the erection of a number of buildings in their area, if that is the over-all plan for the national capital area. On the other hand, I do not think we should build a couple of buildings in Hull if that is not part of the plan, and I do not think we should continue to erect buildings all across the Ottawa scene if this is not in accordance with the Greber plan.

I did not agree, and neither did the late Alexis Caron, with the irresponsible manner in which the abandonment of railway lines was handled in the national capital area. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris has mentioned the Beachburg line. There is not an honest member of this house from the city area who, in considering the abandonment of railway lines and the deals made in that regard, has not had serious doubts as to the shortsightedness of the program. This is a plan which has been changed about a dozen times. I see the hon. member for Ottawa West shakes his head. He has a certain propensity for the city of Ottawa, but some of the city's efforts have had calamitous results.

As an example I mention the building of half a million dollars worth of overpasses for the Beachburg line. I believe the city got two of them constructed. Then it went to the Ontario Municipal Board and found it could not pay for them. Who will pick up the tab for those overpasses? I am sure the minister can tell me. I am sure the National Capital Commission will have to pick it up.

Mr. Dinsdale: It is in the estimates.

Mr. Peters: Those overpasses should never have been built. The N.C.C. will agree they should never have been built.

Mr. Francis: Where are they?

Mr. Peters: They are at the end of the station, crossing off Industrial Road and Smythe Road.

Mr. Francis: They do not exist. You would have to look hard to find them.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like the minister to explain why they do not exist, and what was this exercise in going before the Ontario Municipal Board. An amount of $1 million for two overpasses or two under passes is not a small consideration. It is an example of the inability of the N.C.C. to lay down guide lines for the whole national capital region.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Francis: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member made a statement—and I believe he was referring to myself—that the overpasses which were built did not need to be built. He said that the Ontario Municipal Board did not give the authority. The facts are that the overpasses were absolutely essential, are being used, and the decision by the Ontario Municipal Board—

The Deputy Chairman: Order. There is no question of privilege in the remarks of the hon. member. I will ask the hon. member for Timiskaming to continue.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to become involved in an argument on this subject, but I suggest there is considerable controversy in respect of this matter. I should like to refer to the argument used by my colleague and several other members to the effect that a committee should be set up to study this matter. It is my understanding the hon. member is probably right in saying that these overpasses are being used, but it was not necessary that they be built. The railway should not have gone there. It should have been removed. More consideration should have been given to the moving of the passenger service from downtown. This matter will have to be reconsidered in another ten years if one wants to get to the city of Montreal on a rapid ground transportation system. This was one of the mistakes that were made.

I might also point out that I believe the hon. member was a member of the city council at the time the plan originally called for the station to be located a considerable distance from where it is now. At that time, because of pressure put on council by the real estate people of Ottawa who control the board of control, the station was moved a number of blocks farther in. No explanation was ever given concerning why this took place.

My complaint is against the government because of its failure to establish enough control through the National Capital Commission over these things in the interest of over-all planning. I do not blame the people of Ottawa or the city of Ottawa for wishing to build the tallest high-rise buildings that can be built. The cost of $1 per foot for high-rise apartment or office buildings is obviously related to real estate values and because of this I do not blame anybody for wanting to erect high-rise buildings. What I do wonder about, however, is whether we should allow them to do this if it is not in our interests or in the interests of the National Capital Commission on the basis of orderly development. If somebody wants to erect an office building in downtown Ottawa and exceed the height limit, perhaps the peace tower should be raised another 100 or 200 feet at their expense. In this way possibly we could keep ahead of them. Maybe we should raise the peace tower until it becomes another Eiffel tower. As someone just pointed out, perhaps it would help some of my colleagues attain their final resting place with a higher authority.

Personally I have no use for the city of Ottawa or its administration. I have never seen a city so badly administered. The contribution the federal government must give through the National Capital Commission is much greater then the contribution we would normally give to any other city. First of all, I believe it is necessary that the city not be industrialized but rather be oriented toward government offices, civil servants, and this type of thing. I do not believe we should attempt to mix industrial development and capital development in the same city on any basis. I am not opposed to the government helping to fix some of the streets. Anybody who drives on some of the streets must wonder whether money can improve their condition. They would probably think that what is needed is brains. In the ten years I have been driving down Kent street it has always seemed that the street was being torn up.

I might give an example. At one time I lived in the east end of the city of Ottawa. A colleague and I shared a house there. There was a gravel road on the street. There was no water. The house in which we lived had a pump in the basement as well as a septic tank in the backyard. One morning when we came down to get our car we noticed that the street had been dug up to put in water pipes. It was filled in and then a couple of days later we drove over a new gravel road which was being ripped up again to put in sewers. They did the same thing three or four times. Finally the road was paved. One day I saw a man there with a little electric device. He was looking at everybody's lawn. I said to him, "Now, what?" He said, "I am looking for the telephone line." So they dug it up again. This is the way everything is done in this town. It would appear that money is no object. But I do not think we should be providing it.

The National Capital Commission has accomplished very good things. I believe that anyone who comes to Ottawa from another part of Canada must gain a very good impression of the type of country in which we live when they drive along the parkways we have developed through the Gatineau hills. Facilities have been provided there for tourists. I am sure everyone feels at home in that area. Every year the Rotary Club has what is called an adventure in citizenship for bright young people from across this country. Frankly, I might say that this is the only way members of parliament have an opportunity to see the National Capital Commission. They are hosts to us, with our own money. At such times we have an opportunity to visit some of these parks and parkways with these young people. I am very pleased that these young people have an opportunity to see what has been done in this regard by the National Capital Commission.

Nothing is said, however, about the cesspools in Ottawa. We really have two. We have a large one and a smaller one. The whole Rideau river is a cesspool. There are weeds right down to the bottom; it stinks. Property along this river should be very valuable, but with the present situation the farther one gets away from the river the more valuable property should be. There seems to be an inability to do anything about this situation. It is not really the responsibility of the National Capital Commission, but I believe it is something about which we should be concerned. I believe also that some money should be spent on the canal. In my opinion it is the canal around which the beauty of the city should be built.

Then there is the new arts centre. I am not an architect and therefore I do not know whether it is good or bad. But what about the driveway? How does one get on and off it? Because of the location of the arts centre the end of the driveway just filters into a maze of city streets. There really is no federal driveway there. You have to be an expert to get on it at all and almost have to be an expert in order to get off. It is necessary to go through back alleys.

I believe there are many things we should be thinking about. I feel that the minister is very much of a provincialist. If he were not he would be doing something about a problem which is unique not only in respect of Ottawa and Hull but in respect of the other areas involved. I refer to the difficulty in fitting the regional government plan into the national capital plan. If we want this, then I believe the federal government will have to put up the money. In fairness to the city of Ottawa I would agree that the overpasses were their interpretation of what they would finally be able to get away with in terms of the Beachburg line and connecting roadways in that area. It should never have been left in doubt as to what they would be able to get away with, particularly when the federal government picks up much of the tab regional development. The federal government will have to make an offer to the 50 or 60 municipalities concerned in this area in return for control.

Supply—National Capital Commission

At some time in the future we will have to make some provision to institute an electoral procedure in respect of these necessary changes. I am not in favour of doing what has been done in Washington and taking away voting rights. On the other hand, I do not think we should provide large sums of money and allow these authorities to take control over a great number of things including the problem of pollution in the Ottawa and Rideau rivers and the Rideau canal. These authorities should not have control over roads in this area. If the federal government is going to put up the money, as it should, it must retain some control on a basis which will allow the people of Ottawa a vote or a say of some sort.

As an example let me refer to what happened on the street where I live. The people found that the hydro authority had torn down the street lights and replaced them with new ones located up in the branches of trees. The people filed a petition and as a result of representations the new lights were taken down and replaced by a system similar to the original one. They now are faced with an additional tax of $70 per year to cover the cost of tearing down the new street lighting system which replaced the original system. Of course, this is progress. If this is progress, surely we are not interested in having the National Capital Commission assist.

If Kent street is going to be paved and the federal government intends to participate, we had better find out what is being done and has been done under the ground before we make an agreement. This is the type of control which should be exercised by the National Capital Commission. The people of Ottawa are getting tired of this sort of thing.

This whole thing does not involve a part time ministry because this is not a part time job. The job of the National Capital Commission requires a great deal of attention. During the 11 years I have been here the federal government has not exercised sufficient control in this direction. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris has referred to corporate planning. I am not sure that this is a good idea. Certainly the government has not looked into it sufficiently. No minister in power since I have been here has had time to look into this situation. Neither has any committee of this house had the opportunity to consider what is being done. Surely at some point of time this should be done. I hope the minister will consider sending this subject matter to a committee which will have the opportunity of looking at the problem.

Let me conclude by suggesting that the problems involved are not few. Ottawa city council as well as Eastview and the city of Hull will fight for their rights. A great many things are involved. A number of the authorities have mixed feelings about regional development which was brought about in this area by the provincial government not long ago. I personally do not feel that regional development should have been allowed to proceed as far as it has without the involvement of the federal government. This government has made tremendous contributions to this area and will undoubtedly contribute a great deal more. If this is not done there will be no acceptance of this area as the national capital. The national capital should and must satisfy the needs of the people in all parts of Canada. Development must be considered from a cost point of view and must involve the co-operation of every district in this area.

Let me leave with the minister the hope that he will accept his responsibility and that in respect of necessary changes he will consider the full scope of the operation. It might well be that the minister might consider the appointment of a minister without portfolio under the jurisdiction of his department to take this responsibility. It seems to me that we are moving in all directions. It may well be that we feel the National Arts Centre is an advantage. I am sure it was given careful consideration. It may well be that the person we hired may have increased the cost by 100 per cent as a result of suggestions made to people who were not aware of the situation. Perhaps they accepted his suggestions, whether good or bad, because he was the expert and they were not.

This may well be true of the National Capital Commission in recent years. Perhaps we have not given enough direction for them to exercise authority. We should seek a somewhat stronger method of providing for those changes which should be made and a stronger National Capital Commission authority. Obviously its authority is not sufficient at this time to solve regional development problems as they occur in respect of individual streets, the green belt, parks and other areas which make up this city. This authority should take into consideration many other problems which concern extending the area. We may want to extend the national capital region in other directons, for example, to include Eastview which has never been considered to any extent in the development of this capital area.

• (5:10 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Chairman, I would like first of all to say how much interest I take in the National Capital Commission and today I would like to make my humble contribution to the study of the estimates of that commission which was created many years ago and which, although it might make mistakes, has certainly brought some benefits to the region of Hull and vicinity which I represent.

However, since all things must pass, I would say that the National Capital Commission is now facing a problem which may extend a little beyond the scope of its terms of reference.

I think that problem is urgent, since it was mentioned by members of all parties in the house. To give only a few dates when the National Capital Commission was mentioned, I would refer first to Hansard for September 19, 20, 23 and 25, October 2, 16, 17, 21, 23 and 31, and November 5 and 6 of this year. There is certainly a problem, and something must be done in that direction.

Looking at geography, one notices that the area of Hull—which I am happy to represent—is truly part of the region of the national capital, and it has been for a long time.

The object of the National Capital Commission has mainly been re-development as far as parks and planning are concerned, with a view to beautifying the national capital, Ottawa. For that, some kind of monster government was created, the administration of which proved very difficult due to manifold jurisdictions on both sides. The National Capital Commission is like a mushroon which grew and to which we did not pay much attention. Today, it has become an organization which has to be rejuvenated and whose jurisdiction must be amended.

Mr. Chairman, I now wish to deal with a problem about which the National Capital Commission should do more, even though it may not be concerned directly. I am thinking of transportation which I will discuss in a few moments.

I feel that, today, the N.C.C. should be replaced—and not because it did not play a great or useful role—by a type of tripartite commission grouping representatives of the Ontario, Quebec and federal governments within which the N.C.C. could become a division of the Department of Public Works. In that way, the N.C.C. would not run into problems of jurisdiction, at times with Quebec, at others with Ontario, as well as—it must be recognized—with Ottawa, especially where modes of transportation between provinces are concerned.

Mr. Chairman, I decided to participate in the debate because when I spoke of geography a while ago, I also wished to point out the fact that 38.5 per cent of the people living in Hull and vicinity, that "task force" as it is called, work in federal buildings in Ottawa. Another fairly substantial percentage of the population works in Ottawa, so that approximately 50 per cent of the labour force in Hull works in Ottawa. It is therefore obvious that the federal government is responsible for seeing that these people can get to work rapidly and efficiently, and also that transportation be facilitated for those who must use the bridges and who lose an hour or two every day during rush hours.

Another sector of the field of transportation which should fall within federal jurisdiction is that of the joint jurisdiction involved in crossing a river to go from one province to another. The Hull region is part of the national capital area. For this reason, I say that the federal government shares an important responsibility in the transportation field.

Transportation problems do not affect our region only, according to an article I read in a communique released by the Department of Transport, on November 6, 1968. I quote:

> Canada cannot maintain a healthy economy if overcrowded roads and inefficient public transportation hinder productivity of the cities. Due to the fact that urban transportation constitutes about one fifth of the total cost of the urban economic activity, measures intended to improve the efficiency of urban transportation may be profitable to the national economy as well as to the improvement of the standard of living of most Canadians.

Mr. Chairman, this brings me to the subject I had in mind, namely the ever present traffic problem between our two cities.

There is no point in my referring to previous years to remind you that transportation in Ottawa is creating problems beyond the imagination of its civic leaders. I do not have to picture for you the extent to which the city of Hull is getting bogged down in its city transportation.

The whole problem is due to the fact that, two or three times a day during peak hours, there are huge traffic bottlenecks on the bridges which result in bringing traffic to a crawl as thousands of persons are waiting in inadequate automobiles which pollute the air and paralyse traffic.

This traffic problem is not unique. But why should we attempt to develop our industrial, touristic and commercial activities if, because of the increased density of traffic, they bring about bottlenecks, confusion and a deplorable delays.

Mr. Chairman, it is a well known fact, although it is hard to explain, that in an intelligently organized society such as ours, we always think of transportation and communication problems too late, when they reach a dangerous and even catastrophic stage.

To give an example of what I mean, just consider that, in a country such as ours, buzzing with activity, dynamic and open to every technical progress, means of transportation in the capital area are as obsolete, old fashioned, inadequate and deplorable as in the days of the horse and buggy. As I said, the national capital problem, with regard to traffic and transportation between both provinces, is not of course peculiar to our country.

Every large city in the world is faced with this kind of traffic thrombosis. The problem is considered so serious by our American neighbours that the government places it immediately after the Viet Nam conflict as a matter of public concern. Specialized services spend millions of dollars in an attempt to find new solutions.

• (5:20 p.m.)

In fact, the main problem in the national capital area is the automobile which the majority of people use as a means of transportation in the cities. Most of the time, it is used strictly for personal prestige.

At the present time, there are in the United States 90 million passenger cars, and this figure increases by 5 per cent every year. At the same time, there is a spectacular decrease in travel by railways. From 790 million in 1964, the number of passengers decreased to 299 million in 1965, while the number of users of city transportation decreased by 45 per cent.

Furthermore, the automobile is responsible in the country for about 50,000 accidental deaths a year, for pollution of the air, and for noise in the city, to say nothing of the inconvenience it creates for pedestrians as well as parking problems in certain cities such as New York, Montreal, Paris, Tokyo and so on.

The time has come for us to consider in a realistic and intelligent way the problem of traffic congestion in the national capital area. Studies have also been made in our region. In fact, there has been a master plan since 1964, and various reports have been prepared on ways to improve our transportation system. However, a report is just another document if it is not followed by concrete measures. The best study, if it remains on file for years, is as useless as if it did not exist.

In the national capital area, we are facing the urgent need to set up immediately an adequate transportation system to facilitate the human and commercial traffic between the Ottawa and Hull areas; there are about 175,000 inhabitants in the latter. As I said earlier, 50 per cent of those people work in Ottawa and their only means of transport are slow and clumsy busses which, during rush hours, pollute the air and slow down traffic. The result is hours of waiting, delays, annoyance and added fatigue for the public, not to speak of a waste, that is hard to assess but very real. I would not be surprized if there were soon to be more psychiatrists in the area on account of the psychological troubles which may be caused by this waste of the talents of most of the Public Service employees who go home by bus in the evening.

In wintertime, the situation is worse and even more complicated. It becomes a real hardship for the workers and with the continual development of industrial and commercial activity in the area, with the great urban and social projects we are planning, the transportation problem will soon become unbearable.

In fact, those who are in charge of the National Capital Commission today, of whom the hon. Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) is one, hope that we will see in the Hull area one day developments as spectacular as those now taking place in Ottawa. In view of the good intentions of the minister, I am confident that the Hull area will at last be given the attention it deserves, since it is an integral part of the national capital.

Naturally, this situation does not enhance our prestige. If the national capital area itself does not have an adequate transportation system, what suggestions will be made for the other cities in the country? I think action should be taken. It is high time we did something, since we have the perfect opportunity of linking the centre of Hull and the centre of Ottawa by a system which I should like to outline, and which could be used as a pilot project for rapid transportation to different points within certain Canadian cities.

First of all, we would have to build a line about a mile long which would cost several million dollars. The other day I read in the newspaper that a line about 1 mile long for example, would immediately eliminate daily traffic congestion between Ottawa and Hull.

In this field, Mr. Chairman, we would find the opportunity to make innovations and to equip our capital with the most flexible, economic, efficient, as well as the most modern means of transportation, the monorail transportation which is not affected by crowds or whether conditions. It uses free space allowing all sorts of future developments and technical daring. Besides—this is an important feature for those who have at heart the comfort of our citizens—aerial transportation by monorail or hanging containers constitutes the most pleasant system for the user.

It was said recently that this might cost more than $2 million per mile. I checked those figures and I must say that, in France—where it has become the fashion to build some almost every year—they add to this rapid mode of transport and it costs from $600,000 to $800,000 per mile. The railway costs from $2.5 to 3 million per mile while the highway costs from $1 to $1.5 million per mile. So, this is more economical.

I should also say that this means of transportation is not hypothetical, and I am not suggesting it as an experiment. After extensive studies, some foreign cities, several years ago, decided on elevated transportation systems, of which there are several types. These are Pittsburgh, Diablo in California, Tokyo, Châteauneuf, Grenoble and Chamonix, where the economic and human advantages of this transportation system have been confirmed. I hope I will be able to submit in the near future a detailed report on the subject by consulting engineers. Unfortunately, during my trip to Europe, I did not have time to visit the system being built in Lyons. I hope to do so before long.

This would be an ideal way of communication for those two parts of population having to cross the river two or three times a day to reach their working place in Ottawa. I understand that it is a somewhat challenging project and that many people may say I am perhaps dreaming in colour. Some may also say that, according to experts, the monorail is an unpractical mode of transport.

I know that in Tokyo, for instance, the monorail that was built in 1964 proved uneconomic, for the simple reason that an error was made in its design. The monorail is designed to transport a large number of people from one point to another, and not to stop at several stations. Neither is it used—at least in 1964, in Tokyo—to connect the capital to the airport. As a matter of fact, when it was built, this transportation system was still too new to derive full benefit from its use.

At all events, at the rate things are going, it is being experimented in France where it has been found the fastest means of transportation to carry people from one point to another.

I would favour the idea of a monorail linking Ottawa and Hull and going back and forth between the old Union station and the old streetcar terminal in Hull. This would call for the construction of a line about three quarters of a mile long, which would allow the transportation of thousands of commuters every fifteen minutes. In addition to unburdening urban transportation systems on both sides of the river, it would reduce their load by about 75 per cent and increase their efficiency by about 50 per cent. I am making this suggestion because I think it might be profitable. However, I think the federal government should pour in some of its own money to help launch this pilot-project which, in addition to being a tourist attraction, would allow thousands of people in Hull and Ottawa to commute more easily across the river to get to work and back.

If I made that proposal it is because I have been considering the problem of public transportation for a long time. If we follow the principle that automobiles must be withdrawn from traffic, in order to increase the available space for tourists and those who have some shopping to do, I think that this would be great savings for workers who have to come to work in Ottawa as well as for those who are working in Hull.

Mr. Chairman, if I said at the beginning of my remarks that I thought it advisable to substitute to the National Capital Commission a tripartite commission, it is because I believe that the National Capital Commission at the present time is outmoded. Consequently, instead of trying to amend the legislation, this commission should be established and then the National Capital Commission would become what it has always been basically, a branch of the Department of Public Works. This new commission would have jurisdiction, after consultations with the Quebec and Ontario governments and the federal government.

This is the humble contribution which I wanted to make, Mr. Chairman. I would like to see that implemented one day or another—before my death—since I know that I will live a long time and that it often takes some time before projects are carried out for the Hull area. Moreover, I know that thanks to our dynamic minister, to people like his friend on the right, the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) to the intelligence of the mayors of Ottawa and Hull, one day we will all be in a position to meet—for the welfare of the people whom we represent—so that the capital of Ottawa-Hull may become a cristallization of all that has been advocated on bilingualism for the last 50 years. It will be for all Canadians who will come to Ottawa the crystallization of that idea of bilingualism and two cultures existing side by side and separated by an obstacle, a purely imaginary border line.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Isabelle: I hope also that the time will be past when the people of Hull crossing over to Ottawa were punished because they came to work in Ottawa. Having to work in Ottawa—when one travels from north to south one pays double fare whereas when one travels from east to west, on the south shore of the river, one pays single fare only. Since the majority of the people in Hull work in Ottawa, I think that is a grave injustice that should be rectified.

I am grateful to the National Capital Commission for everything it has done. In my opinion, no other body, if it were created today, could do as much, but I think that the usefulness of the National Capital Commission is over. Other means must be used in the administration and that is what I am hoping for with all my heart.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go back over every problem put before the committee this afternoon. Let me merely point out that the powers of the National Capital Commission are extremely restricted, that is the only true powers it has are powers of expropriation. Besides those, the actual powers still belong to municipalities and the provincial government. So when the commission is blamed for not being perspicacious or for not doing certain things, in most cases, that is wrong, because the actual powers—even those of planning and development—belong to municipalities and to provinces, and not to the National Capital Commission.

[Mr. Isabelle.]

In December 1967, the federal government, in co-operation with the Ontario and Quebec governments, established a special committee to study the problem of the national capital area. This committee has just reported to the Prime Minister of Canada and, through him, to the Ontario and Quebec premiers. This report has not yet been considered but it has been presented and we do hope that, in a short time—that is, within a few months—the government will have been able not only to formulate its own policy with regard to the National Capital area but, at the same time, to convince the provinces and the municipalities as to the best way to proceed in order to reach the objectives set forward in the legislation on the National Capital Commission.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think that the most legitimate request formulated this afternoon was to the effect that a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, or a committee of the house only, be appointed to study more closely the estimates of the National Capital Commission and all its projects as well as, let us say, its procedure with regard to its objectives as set forth in the legislation.

I intend to set up that committee as soon as the government is ready to present an overall plan, on new structures or new objectives, which should be proposed to the National Capital Commission.

However, that may take months, Mr. Chairman, and I feel that the wisest thing to do would be for the committee to approve, this afternoon, the estimates as they stand and then wait until that committee is created. Personally, I feel it should be a joint committee of the House of Commons and Senate, so that the members who are interested can discuss at length, without any rush, the problem of the national capital which, as has already been mentioned, is not merely the problem of the people of Ottawa, or the people of Hull, but the problem of the whole Canadian people.

And so, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this procedure should be followed. I suggest to those who have specific and well-founded problems, in most cases, that they wait, for I am convinced that they are not satisfied with the representations they made and that they intend to pursue the matter further. That opportunity will be given to them when a joint committee is set up which will have all the time required to look into the matter and report to the house.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, under vote No. 20, I read:

Planning and Design, $1,175,000.

Is there a portion of this amount for planning and design earmarked for western Quebec or the city of Hull?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, this money is earmarked for the two provinces, for the two cities of Ottawa and Hull.

Mr. Clermont: Again under vote No. 20, We can read:

Grants in lieu of Taxes—

No doubt, Mr. Chairman, the minister is aware that, from time to time, we read in newspapers criticisms with regard to the National Capital Commission's property in western Quebec, and particularly in the city of Hull, because these properties are not subject to taxation. Will this sum of $475,000, for 1968-69 remedy the situation?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, this money is intended for all the municipalities of the national capital region.

As everyone knows, all the sums must be approved by the Treasury Board before they are paid to the municipalities.

I cannot say what was done about each recommendation of the commission, but regarding those amounts, I know that some recommendations concerned not only the city of Ottawa, but other municipalities as well.

Mr. Clermont: Mr. Chairman, this is the purpose of my question: once in a while, I read in the newspapers that some representatives of the city of Hull complain about the fact that the National Capital Commission does not pay the full amount of property taxes that it should and that the city loses an annual revenue of many thousands of dollars. Will the $475,000 help correct this deficiency, if any?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, I know that the request mentioned by the hon. member (Mr. Clermont) came to my office. It was referred to Treasury Board with the recommendation of the commission. We are waiting for the decision of Treasury Board.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall vote No. 20 carry?

Item agreed to.

25. Payment to the National Capital Fund, $15,000,000.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman I should like to find a vote referred to by another member, the one covering the cost to the National Capital Commission of the over-passes on the Beachburg line. Would it be possible to draw that to my attention?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): That is not in there; it has been paid for previously.

Mr. Dinsdale: Perhaps I could be helpful in this respect. Is it covered in the $39 million that is mentioned in the annual report with regard to railway relocation and construction?

• (5:40 p.m.)

Mr. Peters: I mention this because I discussed the matter with officials of the commission at the time. They said they would not be paying this amount and had no authority to do so. But I told them: You can cover it up much better than the city of Ottawa can. And now we will have to pay for it. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris said the report indicated that payment had been made, obviously by the commission. But this was not an agreement reached with anyone; it was not part of the deal when the line was abandoned. It was a tab that somebody had to pick up because the arrangement had been proceeded with. Even the minister must agree that this is a sloppy way of doing business. Our partners in an agreement cannot do something because the law does not allow it so we have to do it on their behalf. The sum at issue here amounts to about $1,500,000. It is all out in the open because the Ontario Municipal Board held a hearing in connection with it. Residents in the Beachburg line area made very good representations.

If we pass this estimate, what we are really saying is that we do not care whether matters are arranged in this way or whether it is a good way or not. In my opinion this is a poor deal, and the Canadian public will once again have to pick up the bill for Ottawa's mistakes without the house being asked to give formal approval to the expenditure. If the minister says it has already been paid, very well. But I think the country will be awfully surprised if this committee agrees to making good a mistake of this kind in Ottawa's favour without getting anything in return.

The minister is familiar with the process of negotiation. Usually one is prepared to make a concession if something else is given by the other side. We do not seem to be negotiating in this way with Ottawa. At least five more overpasses are involved, besides the removal of the Beachburg line itself. There should be a clear understanding that the federal government, through the commission, will not bear the cost of the other four or five overpasses and one underpass, and that we intend to demand the removal of the line itself. The underpass at Smythe Road may not be a total loss because the commission might be able to use that area for its buildings and enterprises. But the others could well be a total loss.

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Mr. Chairman, as regards the request made by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale), we do not have the details. We shall obtain them and we shall then be in a position to distribute the costs between the National Capital Commission and the city of Ottawa. This will be done and the hon. member will get the information.

[English]

Mr. Peters: I am sure that if hon. members had read the Ottawa papers they would not agree that this item could be allowed to pass unchallenged. In my opinion the National Capital Commission had no legal authority whatsoever to hand over this money. It had less legal authority than the city of Ottawa did, and the city had absolutely none. Somebody had to pay for this so we paid for it. I do not know whether hon. members think this is a good way of doing business. As far as I am concerned the argument this afternoon is all about the authority of the commission in relation to agreements of this kind. We make agreements and then the city does not live up to them and we get stuck with the consequences. If members agree to this item they have either changed their minds on the question of its legality or else they do not know that they are paying it, which is worse.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): There is no provision in the estimates for an overpass this year. The hon. member is talking about money that is already spent. All those expenditures have been approved by the Treasury Board and by the Minister of Finance. We do not propose in these estimates any amount concerning overpasses in Ottawa.

Mr. Peters: I think you do.

Mr. Bell: As one who resides in Ottawa in the Beachburg line area I wish to support the hon. member for Timiskaming and the hon. member for Brandon-Souris in asking whether the amounts which were paid out from the federal treasury in connection with the Beachburg line subdivision, Smythe Road, the Hurdman area and so on are included in this item of $39 million which is shown as cumulative assets in schedule A. If they are I think at some stage, not necessarily immediately, we are entitled to information as to our contribution to this whole Beachburg line fiasco, if I may use that word.

Mr. Peters: It has been paid for, it is being paid for, and it is being paid for by the treasury. Therefore some provision must be in this estimate. I do not see any details at all, just a general figure. Payment was not authorized under the original agreement and it was not authorized in the course of the deal which was made between the railways, the city of Ottawa and the National Capital Commission. This arrangement was made by the city of Ottawa itself. I am sure the National Capital Commission is picking up this tab. It is the only body that can do so. The law does not allow the city of Ottawa to pick it up, and I do not believe the aldermen and council of that day paid it out of their own pockets. I assume we paid it. If the minister says we did not, I should be interested to hear him.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I can tell the hon. member that all the money which was spent was approved by the Treasury Board, by the Minister of Finance and by the minister responsible for the National Capital Commission. If members want a breakdown of the $39 million we are ready to provide it so that the committee may know exactly how the money was spent.

Mr. Dinsdale: I am sure the minister has the report of the National Capital Commission before him—the 1967-68 report, Part II. I have been trying to discover for myself just what is involved in this cumulative total presented on page 14 under the heading "railway lines and structures". In 1967 the total was $35,634,719, and in 1968 it was $39,307,116. I presume that the Beachburg line expenditure would be included in that total. I have searched through this report and there is no breakdown anywhere. We are told that the acquisition of property, for example, in connection with the green belt, cost almost $37 million, which is a substantial amount, but there is no similar breakdown as far as I can see in connection with the subject we are now discussing. I presume this omission arises from the fact that the whole Beachburg proposition was an afterthought, not included in the original planning. There still seems to be confusion in this regard.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Is it not possible to indicate to the satisfaction of the committee whether the additional expenditures for the Beachburg plan, as contrasted with the Walkley Road plan, are represented in this substantial figure of $39 million? I made the point in my initial statement that it is these sudden changes, on the basis of modification and refinement, that seem to get us into trouble with these huge expenditures. The committee ought to know the basis of these estimates.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We might break the estimates down, Mr. Chairman. When the hon. member complains that the expenditures on the green belt have been $36 million I point out that that amount is not for last year. That has been spent since 1947. The same is true for the $39 million spent on railways. That $39 million has been spent since the inception of the commission, or in the period from April 1, 1947, to March 31, 1968. Of course, we can break down the amounts that have been spent but all these amounts of money have been approved regularly. If the hon. member wishes for more details we can try to produce them.

Mr. Peters: The minister seems unable to say how these expenditures have been covered, if one may put it that way. Obviously the National Capital Commission has had authority for that expenditure. It has been approved by the minister and by Treasury Board. Yet it seems to me that the matter of the Beachburg line contravenes certain agreements which have been made, and I am wondering how that has come about. Why are these matters not set out more clearly in the commission's estimates so that we can find out exactly what has happened? One may argue that expenditures which have been made were foolish. Nevertheless, when a contractor has done a job he is entitled to be paid. I think there ought to be greater detail in these estimates. Certainly I do not think we ought to go back 30 years to find out what happened. The Beachburg matter is a special expenditure and ought to appear as such.

Clearly the municipality and the federal government do not always see eye to eye. If the government says it will build a road from the airport to Heron Road, the municipality may say: In that case we shall build a road somewhere else. That kind of thing does go on.

An hon. Member: We have had sloppy bookkeeping.

Mr. Peters: I wonder why a better job was not done with regard to these estimates. Certainly this expenditure is not normal. I do not see why it does not appear in a different form.

Mr. Bell: Although I am not too knowledgeable about the Beachburg line matter I do say that under our parliamentary system members must exercise their responsibilities. I realize that the minister was not involved in the original decisions on this matter. All the same, under our parliamentary system we must approve in a general way lavish expenditures such as those that have obviously been made on the Beachburg line.

I do not know whether those expenditures were justified. From what I have heard generally and in the streets of Ottawa, the Beachburg line appears to be a fiasco. Perhaps the entire matter ought to be investigated by a committee. Obviously it is too late to stop the entire business but we must exercise our responsibilities under the parliamentary system and go into the matter to determine in dollars and cents how much has been spent and how much ought to be spent on the Beachburg line project.

The form of the estimates is to be changed and there is no sense in holding up these estimates. I think, however, that it might be a good idea to bring this entire matter before the public accounts committee. I say that as one who has always had doubts about this matter. As members of parliament we all have a responsibility to look into the matter. I am not suggesting that there has been anything dishonest here.

An hon. Member: It was sloppy.

Mr. Bell: There has been no corruption. It is just a matter of sloppy bookkeeping and we ought to look into the entire business, no matter if we are from Ottawa or from other parts of Canada.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I think the hon. member is quite right. We do not want to hide anything and I hope we shall have an opportunity to look into this in depth. I hope to bring this opportunity about in future.

The overpasses are part of an agreement. The N.C.C. paid its share and the city of Ottawa paid its share, and there is nothing wrong with that arrangement. As the hon. member knows, parliament votes certain funds to the commission and before expenditures are made they are once again approved by the Treasury Board, the Minister of Finance and the minister in charge of the project. This has been the general procedure that has been followed. Of course, if the house wishes any information it is entitled to have it. That is why I want to break down some of these items and at the next opportunity or occasion we will supply the details to the house.

Mr. Dinsdale: When the minister says "the next occasion", what occasion does he have in mind? It is important for us to know how soon this information will be available and in what form it will be given to us. Will the minister present it to a committee of the house?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): Of course, there will be the estimates for 1969-70. Those are far away, I know. But if we constitute this committee we speak of I hope to have all the information ready to supply to its members. In that way they will know exactly what is going on in the commission.

Mr. Peters: Could the minister ask the National Capital Commission to give interested members of parliament a report on all the stages the commission went through in arriving at its decision to act on the Beachburg line matter? I am not asking for original agreements or anything like that. At one stage there seems to have been a breakdown in discussions. We want to know what took place after that.

An agreement was entered into and then some things were done that were contrary to that agreement. It is true that the National Capital Commission acted reluctantly. We want a breakdown of what happened. On the understanding we are to have that breakdown we are prepared to pass these estimates. This is a matter of public accounting.

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): We will try to supply the information the hon. member seeks as soon as possible. Perhaps it will be within the next few days.

Item agreed to.

(The following items were agreed to:)

National Capital Commission—

L90. Loans to the National Capital Commission in accordance with section 16 of the National Capital Act for the purpose of acquiring property in the National Capital Region, excluding property being acquired for the purpose of establishing what is commonly referred to as the "Greenbelt", $4,500,000.

L95. Loans to the National Capital Commission in the current and subsequent fiscal years in accordance with section 16 of the National Capital Act for the purpose of acquiring property in that area of the National Capital Region commonly referred to as the "Greenbelt", $400,000.

The Chairman: That concludes consideration of the estimates of the National Capital Commission.

The time being six o'clock shall I rise, report certain resolutions and request leave to sit again later this day?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock it is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at the time of adjournment tonight are as follows: The hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton)—Grain—Saskatchewan—reported inadequate drying facilities; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Skoberg)—Post Office Department—reclassification of surplus railway mail clerks.

It being six o'clock the house will now proceed to consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motions.

HOSPITAL INSURANCE

SUGGESTED INCLUSION OF MENTAL HOSPITALS AND T.B. SANITORIA

On the order:

Notices of Motions—Mr. Orlikow:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of including mental hospitals and T.B. sanitoria in the federal hospital insurance program (Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act) so that the provinces will have available sufficient funds to provide for adequate treatment of the mentally ill, those people suffering from T.B. and the care and training of mentally retarded children.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) is at the United Nations I wonder whether this motion could stand and retain its position?

Mr. Speaker: Stand at the request of the government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And retain its position?

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed that this motion will retain its position on the order paper?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING—SUGGESTED STUDY AND REPORT BY STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Robert Stanbury (York-Scarborough) moved:

That the standing committee on justice and legal affairs be empowered and directed to consider and report on the subject matter of electronic eavesdropping and to recommend legislative action which may be desirable and effective for its control.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I must confess that this motion was placed on the order paper in the hope that it would bring before the house more promptly than a private bill the subject of electronic eavesdropping. I first introduced a bill on this subject at the beginning of the twenty-seventh parliament. I have introduced a more refined bill in this parliament, but I recognize that neither my bill nor others dealing with the same subject which are on the order paper are adequate to cope with the very serious threat to freedom posed by electronic eavesdropping practised in this country.

I am glad to see that this danger has become better known within the last few months. I think there is now the prospect of action on the part of the government to recognize the invasion of privacy which electronic eavesdropping devices represent.

My own bill, Mr. Speaker, tries to raise and touch on most of the issues which have been considered by law, police and civil rights authorities in discussing electronic eavesdropping. It covers a somewhat wider field than proposals which deal with only wiretapping, a rather primitive form of electronic eavesdropping. I do not put forward the suggestions in my bill as the last word but rather as a basis for discussion, and I have submitted this motion in an effort to have the kind of public discussion which I feel is needed in order to develop adequate laws for the control of electronic eavesdropping. My own view is that electronic eavesdropping or wiretapping should be a criminal offence except when performed by police under strict statutory controls. My bill stresses the seriousness of this matter by providing for mandatory imprisonment of between one month and two years upon conviction of unauthorized use of any device for eavesdropping or interception of telephone and telegraph messages, and makes inadmissible in any trial or inquiry information obtained by such means where the use of such listening devices was not authorized in accordance with the statute.

I am encouraged by the fact that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has indicated that he looks for legislation somewhat along these lines early in the coming year. I think it would be a mistake for the government to propose such legislation without having the benefit of public hearings and a great deal of technical data on this most complicated matter, as well as the opinions of interested individuals and groups in our country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hope that my motion will be accepted so that this most serious matter will receive the attention of the standing committee on justice and legal affairs in wide-ranging public hearings, and that legislative action will then be recommended by that committee for consideration by the government and by this house.

I do not see how any member of the house could fail to recognize the serious risk to our freedoms which wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping now constitute. I hope that all hon. members will support this effort to bring the practices in this field out into the open, to learn the extent of the problem, and to develop means of coping with it.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to support the proposal in this motion and I commend the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury) for his initiative in placing this matter before parliament. I hope that the necessary arrangements have been made within the structure of parliament so that the motion can be adopted.

It is more than desirable, it is necessary that criminals be detected and prosecuted as vigilantly as possible. It is more necessary that citizens of a democracy be protected in their rights of privacy from unwarranted snooping. As an instrument for oppression of free citizens, I can think of none worse than indiscriminate wiretapping.

That is an extract from a letter written by the late President Franklin Roosevelt to representative Thomas Eliot some 27 years ago. It was published as part of the material during the hearings of the house judiciary subcommittee on wiretapping in the 77th Congress of the United States.

I think it is extremely valuable that this matter is at last being raised here in Canada through the instrument of parliament. Police and crown prosecutors who have no doubt that an accused is guilty feel frustrated when they cannot prove it. In such cases the use of wiretapping, microphones and other devices of the same kind could be a useful weapon. But such means of combating crime can open the door to many abuses and dangers affecting the privacy of people. Privacy, or the right to be let alone, is perhaps the most personal of all principles. It is also one of the newest in societies which have the capacity to nurture that subtle and most treasured possession of man, his dignity.

I believe it also rather appropriate at this stage, when meetings are to be held here in Ottawa on human rights starting on Sunday, December 1, and continuing for a number of days with a rather ambitious program, and when human rights are being so appropriately stressed by the United Nations, that this issue which affects the human rights of all of us should be the subject matter of debate. The dilemma is whether and to what extent law enforcement officers should be allowed to engage in wiretapping and, if the right is conceded, under which circumstances the tapping should be tolerated?

Already another question arises: Is evidence obtained by tapping in derogation of the law admissible before the courts? A few months ago a royal commission was set up in British Columbia with full powers to conduct the fullest possible inquiry into bugging, the word commonly used. This happened when a certain pulp union president, Lloyd Craig, was found dead in a hotel in Vancouver and electronic eavesdropping equipment was discovered in his room as well as in two other rooms of the hotel. The premier of British Columbia stated that there would be a wide open investigation into all aspects of the case. About the same time in 1967 the prime minister of Britain was asked whether telephones of members of parliament were being tapped. I am glad to see that he allayed the fears of members. He said:

> I feel it right to inform the house that that there is no tapping of the telephones of hon. members, nor has there been since this government came into office.

As the hon. member for York-Scarborough points out, the issue here has been the subject matter of various bills but their progress has been frustrated by the fact that up until now parliament, with rare exceptions, has not seen fit to let private members' bills go through. Ramsay Clark, the present attorney general of the United States—and I think the record will show him to be a distinguished one when the heat of the election battle dies—told a senate judiciary committee:

> Public safety will not be found in wiretapping. Security is to be found in excellence in law enforcement, in courts, and in corrections. That excellence has not been demonstrated to include wiretapping.

The same report continues:

> Legislation proposed by President Johnson would prohibit wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping except in cases directly related to the national security.

In the context of matters which affect our national security I would hope that there would be very careful guide lines set out concerning the circumstances under which the police could exercise this extraordinary remedy. Years ago that very great justice of the United States supreme court, Louis D. Brandeis, had this to say about privacy—and if he were living today I think he would want to have these words underlined three times because our privacy today is being invaded far more than it was in the days of that great judge:

> The right to be alone—the most comprehensive of rights, and the right most valued by civilized men.

The writer of the article, Mr. Carl T. Rowan, wrote:

> I find it saddening, perhaps shocking, that the civilized men of our generation submit so meekly to the grossest invasion of privacy—and all because of the expediency of fighting crime or securing the nation against communists and other spies.

Mr. Rowan concludes with these words:

> And the right of privacy isn't terribly precious if you don't stand for anything, if you run from all controversy, if your private love life is close enough to non-existent that you aren't bothered by having your boudoir turned into an electronic maze. You can say righteously, "I've got nothing to hide. Only somebody with something to hide should mind wiretaps and buggings."

Surely our society is not so desperately endangered that to cope with the thugs and the spies we have to give up that "most comprehensive of rights" enjoyed by civilized men.

I think the standing committee on justice and legal affairs would be an appropriate forum before which to have this issued considered. I hope the house will see fit to endorse the proposal.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I take delight in endorsing this motion. It has our wholehearted support and approval. I shall demonstrate my interest in it by saying very little on the subject because it is so commendable I do not think a lot of extra words will add to it. I certainly hope it is passed by the house so that the committee will have an opportunity to examine this question.

As the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) has so eloquently said, there is nothing more fundamental than the right to privacy. We live in an age of electronics and technology. It is an age of ever-expanding means of suppressing the spirit, initiative and individualism of men. We must be very careful in this modern world with its marvels of science and technology that we do not destroy the human spirit.

It is very often suggested that electronic eavesdropping is justified on the ground of efficiency. I do not think it is even efficient. I was involved in one of the first cases in our courts when some electronic eavesdropping material was offered in evidence and as a matter of fact was accepted. From that experience I found how painfully easy it is to doctor up the tapes and recordings that are made by electronic devices. A man could be sentenced to imprisonment or death as a result of doctored evidence that was supposed to have some scientific validity. There are handwriting experts who can deal with writing, but when a voice comes through an electronic device an alteration can be made very easily by a skilful person. Therefore I do not think these devices are even efficient.

I believe that in respect of crime there must be a balance between the public interest and the individual. There must be a balance, but in this field I believe the balance should be weighted on the side of individual rights. So in keeping with my undertaking to be brief I simply commend this motion and hope it will come to a vote.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) shares the opinion of members of this house who consider the development of this modern technique as having serious effects upon the private life of citizens.

Looking carefully at the motion, one finds that the definition of electronic eavesdropping is flexible enough to include wire tapping in the case of telegraph communications. Therefore, I intend to propose later on, seconded by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) that not only this motion but also Bills Nos. C-17, C-18, C-24 and C-78 be referred to the standing committee of this house on justice and legal affairs.

It is also my intention to ask the house to permit the scope of this motion to be broadened so as to include the bills mentioned above.

Besides, I know that other members would like to speak on this subject. I shall yield to them now, in the hope that I will be given the opportunity to rise again at about 6:55 p.m. and present the motion I just mentioned.

• (6:20 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I was very pleased to hear the parliamentary secretary state he was prepared to permit this motion to be referred to the committee. As a matter of fact, the motion itself suggests that the question of electronic eavesdropping be referred to the committee on justice and legal affairs. I merely want to state that I give the motion my full support, because of experience I have had with private investigators. There seem to be more and more of them who are using these new electronic devices for eavesdropping or listening in on people. In this day and age people are living in closer and more cramped quarters. Our cities are becoming more populous and people are living almost on top of one another. Privacy is becoming a very rare thing and we must do everything possible to protect it. Perhaps we have reached the point where eavesdropping should be made a crime so that every citizen is protected in respect of his right to privacy.

The hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) quoted some prominent gentlemen and pointed out the importance of the right to privacy, as was pointed out by the hon. member who introduced this measure. The citizens of this country are already being looked at, listened to and telephoned against their will. They have very little privacy left, and we must make sure they are not overly subjected to any more infringements of this kind.

The Canadian Bar Association dealt with this matter at a convention held this year, and at that time a lengthy debate on this subject was held. I personally prefer the resolution which was prepared by the civil liberties section of that Canadian Bar Association. However, the one finally passed more or less expresses my thoughts on this subject. It suggested that as a general rule all electronic eavesdropping be made a criminal offence except as may be specifically provided by statute. As I said, I prefer the exception in the original resolution put forward by the civil liberties section, which was to the effect that all electronic eavesdropping be made a criminal offence, with the proviso that electronic eavesdropping may be employed by law enforcement agencies under judicial control; in other words that this should be dealt with in the same way as we now grant warrants for search, arrest and so on.

As some hon. members have said, it is possible that under judicial control, agencies of the crown which are necessary to detect crime might have to use these methods; but they should be subject to strict judicial control. Otherwise we would end up having a system similar to that described by Mr. Orwell, where big brother would have the right to peek in at us, and listen to us against our will. If we were to allow that we would end up with a gradual destruction of one of the most cherished rights we have; that is, the right to privacy.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, eavesdropping and wiretapping are vicious practices and highly immoral evils. I support the reasonable suggestions advanced today which would empower parliament to enact measures to restrict these evils. It is true that in the field of crime detection, with proper safeguards, such as obtaining an order from a judge, the crown should not be prevented from using these devices in the interests of justice. However, such practice should be carefully confined to approved investigations under strict judicial control, and such controls can be imposed by an alert and modern House of Commons. In my view eavesdropping and wiretapping are extensions of the old law of trespass. The right to privacy needs judicial expression, and now is the time for parliament to create legislation to protect the citizen from abuse of his right to privacy.

We have this evil in two contexts. First we have the criminal context where, if controls are imposed by parliament with care, eavesdropping and wiretapping may have a good effect in the field of Canadian justice. On the other hand if there is any stretching of the legislative use, or any illegal use, we may have more injustice and a marked increase in trespass.

So far our law does not protect the citizen by spelling out the right to privacy. Capricious business practices must be prohibited as we advance with the technological age. It will be a matter of great satisfaction if parliament brings in progressive legislation to curb the trend toward the invasion of privacy. The time has come to treat such invasions as crimes.

Our neighbours in the United States of America are struggling with this problem. To quote the United States text, "The Intruders" by Senator Edward Long, at page 183:

> Most state legislatures, like Congress itself, have failed to keep abreast of advances in the field of privacy invasion.

It continues:

> If some vestige of individual privacy is to be preserved for the average American adequate laws both state and federal must be enacted and enforced.

• (6:30 p.m.)

In this great country of ours I suggest this is a field in which the provinces and the federal government should act. I strongly urge that at subsequent federal-provincial conferences, and if possible at the current one if there is time, this matter should be included on the agenda. The provinces are closely identified with the federal government in tracking down criminals, and I think if there was uniformity through use of the federal-provincial conference as a guide line, all the legislatures could adopt uniform and standard practices from one end of this great nation to the other.

Mr. Hyliard Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, as a practising barrister I appreciate the problem these new electronic devices have created, including the threat to privacy in almost every way of life. At the same time I recognize the need to use these new devices under control to combat crime as it becomes more sophisticated. It would seem the subject warrants detailed and thoughtful study. We in the committee on justice and legal affairs will welcome it there.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to support the motion which is before the house because it seems to me this is a subject which requires a great deal more detailed consideration than it has been possible for it to receive up to this time. I think one of the main reasons for this situation is that traditionally the right of privacy has not been firmly established as one of those rights of the subject which have come down to us through the ages. It is a developing right, a modern right perhaps, as contrasted with some of those which we have had through centuries of English history.

The traditional political freedoms such as the freedom of the press, freedom of speech, freedom of religion, freedom of assembly and association, are those which are considered to be necessary for the continuance of our democratic system; they are those which are basic to the political process of this country. Freedom of speech is so directly related to this concept as to require no comment at all. The freedom of assembly, and even that of association, are also, I think, so directly related to the question of maintaining our democratic political system as to require no comment.

But the right of privacy does not have such an intrinsic place in terms of the political process; though I venture to say that many people in this country, if put to the test, if questioned whether they thought the right of privacy was an existing and important right, would perhaps contend that it is the most important right of all. It would seem to them, perhaps, to be more closely related to very fundamental matters such as the freedom of conscience and the freedom of religion.

This whole area has perhaps not been as firmly established in our jurisprudence and history as the more public rights. If we are ever to establish this right more firmly, to consider it not just in its context of wire tapping but also in the other manifestations which it may have in modern life, I think we will have to devote a great deal more study to this matter. This is now being done, of course, in other jurisdictions. In the United States a great deal of attention has recently been devoted to the question of the right of privacy, but it is not a right which in this country has been the subject of such great attention.

I do not believe it is covered in the Canadian Bill of Rights, and perhaps it would not even be included in any revised bill of rights which might be adopted by a Canadian constitutional convention. It has its relationship to the law of torts and to private law subjects such as that, rather than to the field of public law, which is normally the one which is more securely and definitely covered by the bill of rights.

I suppose the justice committee would be restricted in its consideration of the right of privacy to this particular kind of infringement of it. Nevertheless, even in considering this one particular type of infringement a wider consideration would have to be given to this very fundamental and basic right. I would therefore hope that a much more thorough idea of this basic right and its place in our society would emerge as a result of the kind of study which could be given. Therefore I am pleased to support this motion and to express my hope that the justice committee will give the widest possible interpretation to the terms of reference.

Mr. D. W. Groos (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak in support of this motion I have only a very few words to say. They are directed to part of the wording of the second line of the motion as follows, "the subject matter of electronic eavesdropping". It is the word "electronic" to which I wish to refer. I hope that when the committee gets down to the work of studying this matter they will not limit themselves to purely electronic eavesdropping, because as they get into this matter they will be aware, as probably you are also, Mr. Speaker, that the matter of surreptitiously listening to other people's conversations goes far beyond purely and simply electronic means.

In this day of such sophisticated Buck Rogers types of things as laser beams, and so forth, which are not exactly electronic in themselves although they may require some electronic device attached to them to suit the purpose—

Mr. Fairweather: Those regional desks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) might want them.

Mr. Groos: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker; I could not hear what the hon. member said, so I cannot comment on it. When the committee gets down to the study of this matter I hope they will not, in these days when there are so many more sophisticated means of listening in to other people's conversations than by purely electronic means, in these days of laser beams and optical means of picking up conversation, find the wording of this notice of motion is too restricted to give them the full benefit in what I think will be very important work.

Mr. Speaker: I appreciate that the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Cantin) wishes to take part in the debate, but I must bring to the attention of the house that the hon. member has already spoken on this motion and can take part again only by unanimous consent. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (6:40 p.m.)

Mr. Cantin: Mr. Speaker, as I said a minute ago I am rising to propose that the standing committee on justice and legal affairs be empowered and directed to consider and report on the subject matter of electronic eavesdropping and on the subject matter of Bills C-17, C-18, C-24 and C-78, and to recommend legislative action which may be desirable and effective for its control.

Mr. Speaker: Before putting the motion before the house I should like to bring to the attention of the house that we are dealing with bills standing in the names of a number of hon. members. I am wondering whether it is quite in order to ask that these bills be discharged from the order paper without some assurance that there is agreement on the part of the members involved to have the subject matter of their bills referred to the committee in question.

Mr. Cantin: I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I have the agreement of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to put forward this motion.

Bill C-17 is to amend the Criminal Code (invasion of privacy) put forward by Mr. Mather; Bill C-18, to amend the Criminal Code (wiretapping, etc.) is put forward by Mr. Peters; Bill C-24, to amend the Criminal Code (control of electronic eavesdropping and wiretapping) is put forward by Mr. Stanbury, and Bill C-78, to amend the Criminal Code (wiretapping, etc.) is put forward by Mr. Orlikow.

Mr. Speaker: My understanding of the motion proposed by the hon. member for Louis-Hébert is that it would read as follows:

That the motion now before the house be amended by adding after the word "eavesdropping"

[Mr. Groos.]

the following: "and of the subject matter of Bills C-17, C-18, C-24, C-78—"

Mr. Cantin: I so move.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question on the amendment?

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: Is the motion as amended agreed to?

Motion (Mr. Stanbury) as amended agreed to.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, considering the progress we have made tonight, I wonder if the house would agree to call it seven o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: Is there agreement to this proposal?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

At seven o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Béchard in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: The committee will resume consideration of the estimates of the Department of Labour which will found at page 264 of the Blue Book, and the details at page 266. For the information of hon. members I may say the estimates were last considered on November 21.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

1. General Administration, including grants as detailed in the Estimates, $1,962,100.

Mr. Skoberg: The other day when vote No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Labour was being considered, it was suggested by an hon. member that there would be a great exodus of workers from Saskatchewan. I should like to suggest that the exodus of workers from Saskatchewan only began when the Liberal government, the far right Liberal government, took over in that province. It was suggested also that the New Democrats had failed in their attempt to govern that province. I should like to suggest that the only failure of the New Democrats in Saskatchewan was to allow this prairie Goldwater type to get his tentacles on the reins of government. It would be interesting if the premier of the province of Saskatchewan were able to listen to the comments of the Minister of Labour, in so far as these estimates are concerned. I am sure it would be an education for him.

The fact of the matter is that the province, of which I am proud to be a member, experienced an increase in population of some 100,000 during the time the New Democrats were in power. Since the advent of the new Barry Goldwater type of government, we have failed to maintain our natural increase in growth. I am sure this statement could be substantiated quite easily. I may say that whenever the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour speaks I am led to believe that the premier of Saskatchewan is speaking in Ottawa at that time.

There is one aspect of these estimates with which I am pleased, and that is the continual participation of our government in the labour college of Canada. If I read the estimates correctly, I believe the government has increased its objective somewhat in that area. In my view this is one of the most worthwhile projects in which the government can participate. I should like to see the government give serious consideration to increasing the grants to both Canadian students and people who come from abroad to this college. This brings about a closer relationship between the various nations of the world.

Another point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister concerns our participation in the I.L.O. It is my understanding that the representatives we send to the I.L.O. take a very active part in that organization. However, it is unfortunate that these representatives are not able to ratify any of the proposals made in the I.L.O. until such time as the provincial governments are consulted. We are aware of course that some of the proposals made in the I.L.O. deal with the very minimum standards and regulations governing labour in the world. I believe it might be useful if our representatives could be given the authority to ratify these proposals at the I.L.O. I realize of course that such a move would necessitate close working relationships with the provinces, and I ask the minister to pay particular attention to that phase of the operations of his department.

I am sure, Mr. Chairman, that the job retraining program is one that needs very close co-operation between the federal government and the provinces. Everyone is aware of the fact that many municipalities have high rates of unemployment, and for that reason it is important that technical schools be available in these municipalities. When one realizes that it is sometimes necessary for an individual to undergo six retraining programs in order to make his contribution to society, he can realize how important it is that we look after the retraining of these people. I believe this program is one of the most worth-while contributions the government can make. We do know that technical schools provide a service, and that without them we would be in dire straits on many occasions. I hope there will be no need to bring in anybody from another nation to fill some of the vacancies especially in the field of languages, because I am sure we have qualified personnel in this nation to look after that situation.

One of the members on the government side spoke about the Rocky Mountain House area and the lack of people to mine coal in that particular section. While this may be true, from what I have been able to ascertain, the living facilities in this area leave much to be desired. I believe it is the duty of the federal government to make sure that, if we are going to retrain and relocate people, we have the living facilities for those people in the areas concerned. While it may be true that there is a need for miners in the Canmore area, I am sure many families would not want to be uprooted from Nova Scotia and sent to Canmore, if they were unable to find places in which to live.

There is one thing I should like to question, Mr. Chairman, and this relates to the labour and manpower departments. It does not make any sense to me to have two departments, especially in view of the amount of indecision that could result therefrom. No doubt there are jurisdictional disputes between these departments as to which will handle a particular matter that may come up for decision. We often hear of jurisdictional disputes amongst labour unions, but I suggest that this government certainly stands accused of having jurisdictional disputes within it. As a new member of parliament I know that often when I try to get information I have to go to sometimes six different departments before I find the right one which will give me the information. I suggest that we should take a very close look at these two departments from the point of view of having the two departments merged into one.

In so far as labour legislation is concerned I am sure many of us know that some of the most irresponsible labour legislation passed in any nation in the world has been passed in this country. I am sure there will be some members who will stand up and cite certain cases in their own provinces. I am sure many of us know that many provinces have an anti-labour element in them, and as a result little consideration is given to the democratic rights of the individuals living within the boundaries of these provinces. I feel that if we had a strong lead from the federal government we would not find so many of these provincial governments deliberately trying to take away the rights of the working people. I do not say for one moment that labour should not accept a responsible role. In my contacts with the majority of labour leaders in this country I have found they were prepared to accept their responsibilities at any time, provided management would do the same, and here the term management must include federal and provincial governments. Unfortunately this has not been the situation in all cases. However, from the attitude of the minister, I would hope that within a very short time—I mean, in a matter of months—we shall see some lead taken by this government.

I should like to refer briefly, now, to one or two of the recommendations contained in the report of the Freedman commission. The situation today makes it necessary to consider the fundamental reasons behind these recommendations. For instance, the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen has tried its utmost to get this government to realize that it is important to recognize the doctrine of managerial rights for what it is. To this date, the union has been unsuccessful in this approach, like many other unions in the running trades. The Freedman commission pointed out that there is a gap in the provisions of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act which permits employers to run roughshod over the rights of employees during the closed period of an agreement. By contrast, I would refer briefly to the legislation covering collective bargaining in Sweden. One section of the relevant act provides that during the lifetime of an agreement neither party can resort to direct action to change its terms or to settle a dispute over the interpretation or application of those terms.

This is at the root of the majority of labour problems across Canada today. Employers are trying to change the interpretation of collective agreements during the life of the contract. The legislation never intended that this should be possible. But management has used the present provisions to its advantage, and the federal government itself is at fault for allowing the situation to continue for so long. At the request of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, a conciliation board was established by the federal labour department, one of many such boards. One of the major items the board was called upon to deal with was the union demand to give effect to the Freedman proposals. Having heard arguments from both parties, the board concluded as follows:

> We believe that the differing viewpoints will not be resolved by negotiation. The only alternative therefore is legislation.

This was in 1966. Let us go back as far as 1961, when I am sure there was another government in power. The brotherhood then asked for a rule to provide that no material change or alteration of conditions of employment should be made during the currency of the contract unless mutually agreed to by both parties. In the absence of agreement the dispute was ultimately dealt with by the Robinson conciliation board. In a majority decision dated April 2, 1962, the board found as follows:

> That this is a major problem which will require the full co-operation of management and labour alike is generally recognized but it would appear the solution is not likely to be readily found and may require the attention of parliament itself.

As was required by the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, copies of the majority report were sent not only to the parties in dispute but also to the federal labour department. My point is that we called attention to this problem as far back as 1961, but nothing was done. If this government means what it says, and if the minister means what he said, there is no reason why these recommendations of the Freedman report should not be brought before parliament for approval. And I see no reason why any hon. member should oppose these recommendations.

Responsible management has nothing to fear from the implementation of these recommendations. It is true that in various parts of the country types of management can be found who claim that the recommendations of the Freedman report would, if implemented, remove their right to initiate working conditions, and so on. None the less, many people high up in management are quite prepared to accept the recommendations, and I am sure that those who do not wish to accept them, preferring the old laissez-faire system, are long outdated and should be given no consideration whatsoever.

The organization to which I referred earlier in connection with its efforts over many years to give effect to the recommendations of the Freedman report is now once more going before the public with its contract negotiations. The brotherhood intends to make a determined effort to protect its members from the adverse effects of technological and organizational changes. It is again demanding a rule which would require the railway companies to negotiate the introduction of operational changes which would affect working conditions, as recommended by the Freedman commission. Seven years have gone by during which nothing has been done. The minister told us he is prepared to sit on the back benches if his proposal is not accepted by the cabinet. I hope he is not required to do so, but that remedial measures will be introduced during the next few months.

What about the government's own position as an employer? I will mention briefly the position of the postal workers. As things stand today, the rights of management are spelled out clearly but the rights of the postal workers are buried in civil service jargon which confuses everyone who attempts to understand it. The Public Service Alliance of Canada and some of the associations it represents have been given repeated assurances that there will be no change in the terms of contracts until the bargaining process had been completed. It is my understanding, however, that the federal government has made a unilateral interpretation concerning working rights without bothering to consult the other parties concerned. I suggest it is high time this government accepted its responsibility and listened to the proper sources for advice as far as the rights of parties to a contract are concerned.

There is another matter which consistently bothers me. I refer to the position taken by those who urge legislation to bring about compulsory arbitration of labour disputes. Various voices are raised from time to time to this effect, including those of the builders exchange, the U.G.G. and the wheat pools. In some areas they are joined by the chambers of commerce, though not in all cases—chambers of commerce have gone a long way to recognizing the fact that workers should have equal opportunity with management. Then, of course, there are the John Birch societies and the Ross Thatchers in whatever province they may be. That is a political question, and I hope something can be done about it.

I should like to remind those who suggest the introduction of compulsory measures that on May day, 1933, Hitler declared a national holiday, officially called the day of national labour. The trade unions, taken by surprise, thought this was a wonderful thing. But on the following day trade union offices were occupied, union funds were confiscated, the unions were dissolved and their leaders arrested. Hitler brought in a law providing for the abolition of collective bargaining, and he said that henceforth labour disputes would be determined by trustees. Have we not all heard the term "labour trustee" recently? Hitler then went further and said that the decision of the trustees was to be legally binding. The law outlawed strikes. We have heard about this, too, in recent days. Hitler promised to restore the absolute leadership and authority of the employers, and said to them, "You let me decide what should be done." Before the employers realized what had happened, Hitler had taken over the employers' associations and the cycle which destroyed democratic institutions and associations in Germany was complete. Hon. members ought to read "The Rise and Fall of the Third Reich" to learn what may be the final implications of compulsory arbitration. Hon. members who advocate compulsory arbitration ought to know exactly what they advocate. In any event, the rest of us ought to inform them what is involved. I suggest that the Minister of Labour is on trial today. If he does not produce the goods—and he knows what I mean—he will suffer the consequences.

I now wish to talk about the matter of trade union returns. Since the minister is not here perhaps his representative will take note of what I am saying. The Trade Unions Act as well as the Corporations Act require unions to file certain returns. It may not be known that labour unions voluntarily publish that information in a booklet that deals with labour organizations in Canada. The information published therein is a duplicate of the statistical information that must be filed with the Department of Labour. Hence there is duplication of effort here, the labour unions being forced, so to speak, to compile two identical sets of data. I hope the minister will examine this matter, since there is no need to publish two similar sets of figures.

One reason for unrest in the labour field stems from the foreign ownership of our industry. A case in point is the Robin Hood flour mill at Moose Jaw. That Robin Hood flour mill was owned by a Minneapolis milling concern. At one time in Moose Jaw, on the company's notice board, there appeared a notice having to do with the Trading with the Enemy Act. It was quickly removed, no doubt on advice from higher authority within the company. The point is that the mill closed down and moved elsewhere. That mill, which was located in one of the best wheat growing areas of Canada, was forced to close because its parent company stated there was no market for its product. The mill was not under Canadian management. When it closed, many were unemployed. The point is that all across this country many people are faced with a similar situation. What is of concern to our labour force ought to be of concern to us all.

Another point I wish to raise, which admittedly is of minor importance, has to do with returns that labour unions are to file under the Corporations Act. It seems that the law has not been applied equally. Since the act was passed by the house I think only one corporation return has been filed; at the same time I think all unions that were supposed to file a return have filed one. That is no way to enforce legislation. It is no use saying that the legislation cannot be enforced, because too many small companies would have to file returns. The law should apply equally to all. It is up to government to make certain that management and labour co-operate effectively. We shall not have a good spirit between labour and management if the law is applied to labour but not to management.

May I conclude my remarks by saying a word about human rights. The international human rights year was celebrated last year. Out of that celebration came a document entitled, "Universal Declaration of Human Rights". The two articles I wish to bring to the attention of the house are as follows:

Article 23. (1) Everyone has the right to work, to free choice of employment, to just and favourable conditions of work and to protection against unemployment.

(2) Everyone, without any discrimination, has the right to equal pay for equal work.

I suggest that the Minister of Labour ought to take note to those two clauses, especially when one considers the promise he made a few days ago.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak about the 338 workers at the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited at Windsor, who were laid off last week. I also want to speak of the lay-offs which will occur in the next few months, until approximately 1,000 men have been laid off. Unquestionably, the automotive agreement between Canada and the United States has been beneficial to us. It has meant that there has been an increase of $4 billion worth of trade between our two countries since 1964. It has meant an increase in jobs among the independent parts manufacturers of Canada, and it has also meant that Canadian productivity has risen from about 70 per cent of the United States level to approximately 80 per cent of that level. Chrysler Canada Limited said recently that now, on a proportionate basis, they can produce in their Canadian plants as much as the parent company can produce in an equal period in United States plants. That, however, is not the question. The question is the disadvantages and the consequences of the agreement which were made evident last week.

Of course there are a number of programs which are designed to alleviate the consequences of lay-offs. One of them is the unemployment insurance program of the federal government. Another is the manpower retraining program which enables those who are admitted to it to extend their skills and to take advantage of the opportunity of upgrading their earning power.

A relocation program is also available, although this is not very palatable to most communities. I shall indicate later why I think a relocation program is not the best answer in this case.

In addition to the programs I have mentioned there are other additional programs, one of them being operated by the company. That is the S.U.B—the Supplementary Unemployment Benefit program of the Ford Motor Company of Canada Limited. Also there is a federal government program. Under the S.U.B program the company sets aside five cents for each hour of work done by each worker. The fund which was recently introduced will at present pay workers who have been with the company for one year something like—

Mr. Lewis: Will the hon. member permit a question?

• (8:30 p.m.)

Mr. MacGuigan: I would prefer to have it at the end of my remarks.

Mr. Lewis: It is a very simple one. Did he say the S.U.B program was a Ford Program?

Mr. MacGuigan: I will take that question at the end of my remarks, Mr. Chairman. As I was saying, this is a contribution by the company of five cents for each hour of work by its employees. This is a benefit negotiated by the Ford workers in their collective agreement. At present the payment is something like 65 per cent of the weekly wage if the unemployment insurance benefits are added in, and on December 1 this will rise to something like 95 per cent of the weekly wage.

The T.A.B, or transitional assistance benefits program, is a federal government program, and comes into operation when the worker has been employed for 30 weeks in the automotive industry—not necessarily with the same corporation, provided he has been in the industry for that period of time. It pays something like 62 per cent to 75 per cent of the weekly wage, if the unemployment insurance benefits are included.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that several weaknesses have become apparent in the T.A.B program during the last few days. One of these is in the qualifying period, which is set at 30 weeks. In the case of these particular workmen, all of whom I believe were hired on August 19 or subsequent to that date, the longest period of service with the Ford Company is 14 weeks. They may have been employed previously in some other part of the automotive industry, and some of them may be eligible as a result of that, but a great many of them will not be eligible for the T.A.B grants.

These workers were not employed as part of any expansion in the Ford Motor Company. They were employed merely to replace those who had retired or gone on to other jobs. This was not an expansion program but merely the filling up of gaps that had developed among the work force.

I think the government ought to give some consideration to the payment of T.A.B benefits even when the qualifying period has been much less than 30 weeks, in a case where it is a question of replacing workers, rather than of expanding business, because it is clearly a consequence of the automobile pact. We are assured that in the long run there will be 300 more jobs available at Ford of Windsor, when the transition period has passed, but this is small comfort for the 338 workers now affected, all of whom may be laid off for 18 months during the transition period.

In addition, workers who are entitled to the S.U.B benefits are not entitled to the T.A.B benefits. In terms of the amount of money they receive this may not make that much difference, but in terms of the equities of the case there is a great deal to be said for making the T.A.B program apply all across the board, to all the workers who may be unemployed and who qualify under the minimum qualifications which, as I have already suggested, ought to be somewhat modified.

At present, if a motor company wishes, it may pay into the T.A.B fund, so that even workers who are covered by the S.U.B program may receive T.A.B benefits, but it is perhaps a little unrealistic to expect automobile companies to pay moneys into the T.A.B fund that they do not legally have to pay. As a result the worker's benefits under S.U.B which they have built up over the requisite amount of time with the corporation, are expended much sooner than they otherwise have to be. This was not the role that was intended for the S.U.B program when it was negotiated between the company and the union. The S.U.B program was intended to cover unemployment during periods of retooling and style changes. It was not to cover unemployment caused by technological changes in the industry resulting from the Canada-United States agreement.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would draw the minister's attention to the fact that there appears to be a second gap in this program. It is to be hoped that some steps can be taken by the government in the weeks and months to come to fill up this gap by changing the regulations or, if necessary, by changing the statutes, or by renegotiating certain parts of the automobile agreement.

There are several other questions that ought to be raised. One is the question of notice. No one can seriously believe that a motor company as large as Ford of Canada decided just a week before Friday morning last that it was to make these gigantic changes. Indeed the very careful preparation of the publicity involved, which was largely focussed on the expansion in the future rather than on the short run disadvantages—the preparation of pictures and releases—indicates that the Ford Motor Company was aware, long in advance of the time that the program was announced, that it was about to take place.

If as much preparation had been lavished by the corporation upon preparing its workers and the public for what was to come, the government of Canada would have been given an adequate time to deal with the problem in a way more compatible with the seriousness of the situation. One wonders indeed if even seven days notice would have been given, if it were not provided for in the collective agreement between the company and the workers.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question on that point?

Mr. MacGuigan: I will be pleased to take any question at the end of my remarks.

Then there is the question with respect to overtime. Overtime in the Windsor operations of the Ford Motor Company is compulsory. Even at a time when there are not enough jobs for those people employed with Ford—338 have been laid off, and some 600 more will be laid off—the company is able to give extensive overtime to the rest of its workers. This is the reason why I suggest relocation is not the answer. The work is there in Windsor, at the actual plant affected by the layoff. There is work for a great many more men than are presently employed but it is taken up by way of overtime.

This is not of course a question for the government alone; it is a question for all the parties involved. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman, that is the final point I would like to make. Matters such as this are not matters for the company alone or for the working force alone. These matters require a tripartite approach, involving the government as the representative of the public, as well as management and labour. We are long past the day when one can speak of management's prerogative to make on short notice fundamental changes which affect, and in some cases greatly impair, the lives of those working for them.

This is not a question which ought to be left to management. It is not a question which ought to be left even to management and the working force. It is a question which concerns the whole public; and I would suggest, Mr. Chairman, that if no solution can be found by way of agreement, if we cannot have co-operative efforts between the three forces involved, then it will very soon be time for us to consider whether or not some solution should be brought forward by legislation. I would hope, although I am not always confident, that the solution would be found by co-operation and negotiation.

I would emphasize the fact that in this age of automation, and even cybernation, the old ways cannot be allowed to go on unhindered by government. I would commend to the minister the changes I have suggested, and hope that the government will act as a party between management and labour in matters such as this.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

• (8:40 p.m.)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question. In view of his criticism of the Ford Motor Company's rather hasty announcement to lay off these people, and the equally short notice given the government, would he agree with the suggestion made by a number of people that the government should not wait for the Woods report before answering the question about making it mandatory that advance notice be given both to the government and employees about a forthcoming lay-off.

Mr. MacGuigan: Mr. Chairman, I would be in favour of awaiting the Woods report. I do not believe this is a matter which can be considered wholly in isolation from the other problems of labour relations. As a result of my knowledge of what the Woods task force is doing, and my knowledge of the people in this task force, I expect a great deal from the report, and I have reason to believe it will be before the house before many more months have passed. I would think that unless the report is delayed long beyond the time when I would expect it, we should be willing to await it before proceeding on this particular matter.

Mr. Broadbent: Can the hon. member suggest even one possible argument against this part of the Freedman report that would warrant any rational justification for waiting. I am not suggesting that we have labour legislation in many fields; I am restricting it to this one field on which the hon. member focused his attention in his argument.

Mr. Lewis: The report is two years old.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, the report, of course, is two years old. Can the hon. member suggest one argument a rational man might use as a ground for hesitating.

Mr. MacGuigan: Had I been in the house at the time the Freedman report was presented I think I would have pressed for its speedy implementation, but now when we are within a month or two of the completion of this report, I think we should wait the additional time. Undoubtedly some action must be taken, but the question is how far one should go, and how stringent the legislation should be. I would hope the Woods report would give us some guidance on this.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Chairman, at this time I should like to say a few words about the serious problems faced by middle aged workers when they endeavour to find employment. During the three years I have been in parliament I have learned of many sad cases involving men in their forties and fifties. These were cases of competent experienced men who had much to offer. They wanted to work. Many of them still had young families, but for many reasons they were unable to find employment. As a member of parliament I have endeavoured to help these men. I have spoken to personnel managers whom I know. I have tried to direct them to government jobs. In most cases, however, there seems to be some bar to the employment of men in these age categories.

If this is a serious problem today I maintain it will become much more serious unless some action is taken very shortly because, as many people have pointed out in this era of technological change and automation, many men will change their trade or employment during their lifetime, not once but two or three times. Hon. members who have spoken on the estimates so far have pointed out that men in their thirties, forties and fifties have been out of work after having been employed for many years. In these cases it is necessary for them quite often to develop new skills and look for a new type of work.

In the last few years the manpower retraining and relocation program has been introduced. This is a very good program under which we try to train men so that they will learn new skills, in order that they may fit into other employment. However, I believe all this will be of no avail if we do not do something about the restrictions and bars there seem to be in respect of employment for men in these age categories. The men who are faced with these problems are not only the blue collar workers; they are also the white collar workers, and professional people in all categories, some of whom have held very good positions for 20 or 30 years. Some of the cases I have known have involved men who have had the misfortune of being in hospital for a year or two because of serious illness. Then when they returned to the employment market they could not find anything.

It has been suggested that the solution to this problem might be through an amendment to the Fair Employment Practices Act by adding discrimination in respect of age to the present categories of discrimination which are mentioned in that act. At present this act prohibits discrimination, I believe, for race, creed, colour and national origin. It has been suggested that discrimination based on age might be added. Some provinces have fair employment practices act, in which this is included as one of the prohibitive classes.

I believe an amendment of this type could be made, but I do not think it is the most effective answer to the problem. It would seem that one of the main reasons given by employers for not hiring men in these age categories is that their pension plans are set up in such a way that they discourage the entry into the pension plan of people at age 40, and more progressively as they become over 40. There may be other reasons. I suggest it might be very worth while for our progressive Minister of Labour to call together the major employers in Canada, trade union leaders and those insurance and trust companies which run these company pension plans. If these people were brought together it might be possible to work out a solution to this problem and, if the pension plan really is the bar, find ways in which something might be done to eliminate this problem.

It could be that perhaps the government, through some type of legislation or incentive program, might be able to help the companies and those administering the pension plans to remove these restrictions in one way or another. I do not know the answer, but I think the answer could be found, and I believe it should be found very quickly. Not only are we losing very productive people from our labour force, and potential taxpayers, but we are also placing men in a position where they must rely on pension plans, relief, unemployment insurance and unemployment assistance. We are setting up a group of very frustrated people. I can testify to this because of the experience I have had in respect of the cases with which I personally have dealt.

I know the Minister of Labour is considering a program of legislation. Perhaps there are other matters which have a higher priority. If we consider the number of matters involved, I suppose there are things with higher priority; but I believe this matter deserves a very high place in his legislative planning. I would hope that next year or as soon as possible he would try to do something about this problem, which is faced by many of our medium aged workers. I might point out also that there are many middle aged women who often try to re-enter the labour force after they have brought up their families.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Chairman, I have one or two points which I should like to raise tonight, one of which is in connection with the women's bureau. I am aware that the Minister of Labour referred to it briefly. The fact that we have a women's bureau indicates that women workers do not have equality in this country. If they did, I do not believe we would have any need for a women's bureau. I hope, now that we have a new director, that certain points will be borne in mind and specifically dealt with in the near future. Women do not have equality, although they make up one third of the labour force. They do not have equality in their choice of work. We find that a great percentage of them are working in about 15 occupations in industry.

I was very much interested in an article which appeared in the current issue of the Labour Gazette. The minister must be aware of it because his department was responsible for this survey being made under Dr. Stanislaw Judek. There were a number of very interesting things pointed out about women in industry and women in the public service of Canada. He pointed out that while there were women on the labour force in higher paid positions and grades, there were relatively few employed in these positions, particularly in administration. He also pointed out that, not only is there discrimination in respect of the kind of work that women can do, but there is great discrimination so far as pay is concerned. In his article he states:

> Women in the public service earn less than men. The author attributes this to the fact that most women are placed in the lower paid occupations, and also have lower grades within these occupations. Among male employees, 8.2 per cent earned $10,000 and above in 1966, compared with 0.5 per cent of female employees. In that year, the median income of women was slightly below $4,000, whereas the median income of men was approximately $5,350.

He goes on to state:

> Women with university education (except a very few) are, apparently, not being utilized, and the differential in salary exceeds, in some cases, $4,000.

The article then states:

> More than 24 per cent earn between $6,000 and $10,000 whereas only 6 per cent of women are in this salary range.
>
> There is no special program to develop better utilization of womanpower in the public service, and opportunities for advancement follow identical routes.

[Mr. Allmand.]

When appearing before the royal commission on the status of women recently, the Canadian Labour Congress, the largest body of organized workers in Canada, pointed out these same things about women workers. They pointed out that in the choice of work, in pay and advancement women were very badly discriminated against. They also indicated there was a need for a fair employment act at the federal level. The congress suggested that so far only a couple of provinces, notably Saskatchewan and to a certain extent Quebec, had attempted to legislate along these lines. The congress felt this discrimination against women related particularly to the same three fields, choice of work, pay and advancement.

It is my belief that there are two main reasons for this discrimination. The first is that traditionally women have not been out in industry or in the public service for any length of time. Second, women have been handed by nature a full time occupation for at least part of their lives. Biologically they must have the children and raise them, while at the same time keeping a home together. We should recognize that the time has come when women, are going to be out in the public service and in industry. The question is, are we going to have them occupying these positions under something like equal conditions, or do we intend to ignore the fact that they cannot spend their time working outside of the home while at the same time carrying out the job given them by nature. We must in some way equalize this situation.

Let me suggest to the Minister of Labour that a part of the time of the women's bureau should be devoted to the consideration of how we can achieve equality for women workers in industry and in various gainful occupations outside the home. It is now time for the government to attempt to become, as the minister suggested, a conscientious and model employer. Let me place before the minister a number of measures the women's bureau ought to look into, and I might predict that these measures will be found among the recommendations of the royal commission on the status of women when its report is presented.

I am sure this commission will recommend the establishment of child care centres, particularly to look after the children of those women who are employed outside their homes. I realize the Department of Labour, through the women's bureau, has already made a study of this need for child care facilities. This women's bureau should be attempting to develop legislation in this field, in concert with provincial governments. There should be a drive on the part of the women's bureau and the Department of Labour, working with employees and organized workers, to see what can be done in respect of part time or half day work for women. It is not good enough to put women on shift work because it may be inconvenient for women to do so, and also look after their home-making duties.

Home duties should be given priority, and I think a study ought to be made by the women's bureau to see which part of the day is more convenient for women to work outside and which to keep up with their duties at home. It might well be found that the day could be divided into two parts. Women could use one part for home duties and work around the home, and the other part could be used for work in industry.

It is my suggestion that we should also explore at the federal level a measure for maternity leave. This is in line with the recommendation of the International Labour Organization. Surely we should define a maternity leave measure in light of the I.L.O. provisions. British Columbia and the province of New Brunswick are the only provinces in Canada which have maternity leave legislation in actual operation at this time. Other provinces have such legislation on their books, but as yet the regulations have not been promulgated.

I cannot go into this matter in any detail tonight, but my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Jaw, made the point that the Department of Labour ought to work more closely with the department of manpower. There could be no greater necessity in this regard than in the field of training for women. Married women who cannot now qualify for manpower training ought to be included and treated on a fair basis.

Let me refer to another point which ought to be considered by the women's bureau. A great many women are concerned in this matter because not only do they have the burden of bringing up families and making homes, but on them devolves the care of elderly parents or elderly relatives. Some attempt ought to be made to see whether a visiting homemaker service under the aegis of the women's bureau could be provided to help out in these circumstances. I know I am suggesting very heavy and new duties for the women's bureau, but I believe they are important, and that if the women's bureau is to be of value to women workers it should enlarge its responsibilities to take in these fields. If the minister can look at the women's bureau as a means of legislating or operating so that women workers can have a chance of equality with men workers, I think this will result after some years in cutting out the women's bureau; but the women's bureau will be serving a very useful purpose between now and the time it destroys its reason for existence.

I shall touch on one other question, and I shall not take too long to do so. However I think it should be raised. We in Canada have been greatly disturbed and upset this fall in connection with the boycott of table grapes from California. I want to say a few words about this subject tonight, because I think the Minister of Labour might be able to play a role in it, even if it is only making a statement in regard to where the Department of Labour or this country ought to stand in this respect.

This is an important question in labour relations between our country and the United States. The United Farm Workers organizing committee in connection with the grape workers sent up to this country early in the summer, I believe, United States organizers to promote the boycott of California grapes. They decided to promote this boycott in the large Canadian cities of Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver because these were the cities being used as an outlet for grapes produced by non-union labour, non-organized labour in California.

The grape workers organizers complained that these non-union people were living under very substandard conditions, that their wages were substandard that Canadian citizens were being flooded by grapes. They pointed out that some American cities were not going along with this underpaid, scab labour of non-union employees. I learned about this back in the summer, when these organizers called on me, and no doubt on other members of parliament, and certainly on other civic workers. The first I heard about it was when the mayor of Vancouver made a statement urging people to go along with these people and help boycott grapes. A few days later the people on the other side of the grape conflict got in touch with the mayor and he was invited to California by Governor Ronald Reagan to see conditions down there. He came back saying that these workers lived in air-conditioned buildings and had fine working conditions. On the other hand, Ray Haynes, secretary of the B.C. Federation of Labour, said that the mayor spent 35 minutes with the workers and the rest of the week end with the growers and Governor Ronald Reagan.

There were two sides to this story because in the meantime the mayors of New York and Detroit boycotted the grapes and publicly urged that this be done by people generally. But the matter kept hanging fire and hanging fire. Be that as it may, the grape workers kept on organizing here and apparently nothing definitive came of it. In the Globe and Mail of October 18 there appeared an article dealing with the boycott in Toronto. It seems that some stores in Toronto had been moved to restrain from selling California grapes. Then the matter was brought to the attention of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act, who said that if there were any agreement among the stores to boycott non-union grapes, he would have to launch an inquiry into the matter. He also said that if there was found to be a combination in restraint of trade, he would have to prosecute. One of the chains in Ontario expressed sympathy with the grape workers but said that because of the attitude of the combines branch the chains could not do anything about it.

In view of these conflicting stories quite a number of us—I am one of them—have had to forgo buying any grapes at all this fall, although I like them very much. We are uncertain about the rights and wrongs of these stories, and I therefore appeal to the minister to clear up this matter. I do not think Canada should be left in an ambiguous position in this regard. If the stories of the grape workers are correct, surely we should find ways and means of confining ourselves to Canadian grapes. We do not want to be a dumping ground for products sent here as a result of unfair labour practices in the United States.

If on the other hand the grape workers of California are receiving just treatment, we should know about it. I suggest that the Minister of Labour contact his opposite number in the United States, Secretary of Labour Willard Wirtz, and find out the rights and wrongs of this question. He should find out why the mayors of some cities are boycotting these grapes and the mayors of other cities are not. Why are we having this fuss about grapes in Canada? I suggest that perhaps the I.L.O. could be consulted. In any event, Mr. Chairman, I ask the minister to clear the air in this regard and let us know where we stand. I for one would very much like to know whether he knows something about this question and, if not, whether he will find out.

[Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway).]

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, when the Minister of Labour opened this debate on his estimates he made a most eloquent statement of his philosophy of labour-management relations, of his ideas of what the federal Department of Labour under his leadership should be doing and, I am confident, will be doing. In this statement he drew attention to one of the central issues, one of the central questions in the field of labour-management relations today when he said that "if increased productivity depends on our willingness to accept technological change, we must be prepared to face squarely the disruptive forces that technological change creates." If technological change benefits the entire community, and generally it does, then the principle burden of adjusting to such change cannot and should not be shouldered mainly by the workers concerned. This burden must be shared by the company carrying out the change; it must be shared by the entire community, by the entire country.

There are still too many instances of managements which use the highest degree of planning and organization for every phase of technological change except the phase which concerns one of the most vital portions of the labour-management equation, namely the workers involved. They use these high skills of planning and organization to determine trends in markets, changes in products required and new machinery needed to make these products; but all too often they do not use even a small fraction of this management skill in determining the effects on their workers and what should be done to assist them to adjust to the changes to be carried out.

• (9:10 p.m.)

In other words, plans are made for almost everything except the fair and reasonable use of manpower, of the workers concerned. Even though, in the long run, the new engine plant announced by the Ford Motor Company for its Windsor operations will bring benefits to the workers concerned and to the community, certainly in the short run what has been happening there, appears to be an example of the lack of attention and the lack of planning with respect to the use of manpower and to the human factor to which I have been referring.

At approximately 11 a.m. last Friday, November 15, the Ford Motor Company announced it would be creating a second engine plant as part of its Windsor operations. The Windsor Star speculated it would be a multi-million dollar program and estimated it would cost in the neighbourhood of $100 million. The work involved would mean the converting of an existing chassis plant to high volume engine production. The work would take some 18 months, but in the meantime a total of some 1,000 men would have to be laid off while their present place of employment was being converted to the high volume engine production I have just mentioned. The company claimed at the time of its announcement that not only would the 1,000 men in question be called back to work in the new plant but that there would be 200 and perhaps as many as 365 new jobs added to the 1,000 existing before the plant was converted.

However, not only was notice of only approximately one week given to the workers concerned, but even the federal government departments—the Department of Labour and the Department of Manpower and Immigration which were going to be called upon to put programs into effect to ease the burden of the lay-offs on these workers—were not given more than a week's notice of the lay-offs. The first announcement said that the first lay-off would be of some 475 men but this was later amended so that 338 men would be laid off only a week later.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Gray: I will be very happy to answer the hon. member's question after I have concluded my remarks. I will not be speaking at any great length.

I do not claim to be an expert in the field of automobile production and on industrial matters of that sort, but I find it difficult to see how a company could decide to spend $100 million on a new engine plant only about a week before the work began. I suspect the project in question took many months of planning, and it seems to me more could and should have been done to plan the work with the workers concerned.

In a report in The Windsor Star for Friday, November 15, the president of the Ford Motor Company said:

> We have been building engines in Windsor for a long, long time . . . One of the best labour forces in North America is to be found here.

If this is true, and I think I and the people in our community would agree that it is, then something more should have been done to make sure that not only the morale but also the material well-being of this labour force was maintained during this lay-off to the greatest possible degree.

It is true that in the initial announcement of the lay-off the Ford Motor Company suggested that—and here I am quoting from the press release issued by the company at the time—> —eligible employees who are temporarily laid off may draw benefits under the company-paid supplemental unemployment benefits program. When combined with unemployment insurance benefits the total can amount to almost 95 per cent of take-home pay.

Of course, as has already been pointed out in statements both outside and inside this house, this is not exactly the whole story because at least 338 of the workers concerned have been hired only since approximately August 19 of this year. Therefore there is a question whether they would be eligible for unemployment insurance and to what extent if any they would be eligible even for the transitional benefits which are available for people who cannot get the supplemental unemployment benefits referred to in the company's statement. Of course, it can be guessed that the first group who are being laid off this weekend would not have worked long enough at the Ford Motor Company to qualify for the supplemental unemployment benefits. Also, even though the next lay-off is not going to come until some time in February one has to speculate also on how many of the others to be laid off will actually draw the equivalent of 95 per cent of the take-home pay mentioned in the release.

In any event, it would seem to me that this particular incident is one from which a number of conclusions can be drawn. First, it seems to me that it is essential that companies carrying out changes of this type give a longer period of notice to the workers and to the government, departments which will be called upon to assist them during this kind of lay-off. Certainly if a longer period of notice had been given, government departments could have begun putting into effect programs that are now being implemented on a crash basis sooner than has been possible under the circumstances, and the workers concerned also could have arranged their own lives and have made plans for themselves and their families different from the ones a number of them probably made. They would have made different plans than they did when they believed they would have steady employment except for lay-offs due to model changes or possible down-turns in the market for the product of the company. I suspect that a number of workers may have previously made commitments to purchase automobiles, appliances or homes, or else to move into new rented premises based on the expectation of continued employment over the next 18 months period, except for what might be considered to be more or less normal lay-offs because of model changes in the industry.

Second, I think that now that we have had a greater degree of experience with the operation of the transitional assistance benefits program put into effect by the government to assist workers involved in technological change arising out of adjustment due to the automotive pact, when they are not eligible for supplemental unemployment benefits, the time has come to take a good look at this program and to examine very carefully the need for modifications in the existing program. Certainly I think the contention of the unions concerned that transitional assistance benefits should be available even when workers are eligible for supplemental unemployment benefits is one that has a lot of merit. The union argues, with merit, that supplemental unemployment benefits are something that was negotiated by workers as part of the total wage package to tide them over what might be considered normal and expected lay-offs for model changes or down-turns in the market, not for lay-offs of the type that come about through the expansion or changes of plant to adjust to different opportunities in markets lined with changes in government policy.

Also I think another conclusion to be drawn is that the government should encourage companies to take a look at their operations in nearby communities or the same community. If, as I understand is the case in the Windsor area, other plants which are part of the same operation are working with a high degree of overtime, then something should be done, instead of merely having the group of workers in the plants not affected by the technological change piling up overtime, to make some of the work available to workers laid off from plants where technological changes are being carried out. Certainly those concerned would much rather be working for normal wages and in normal working conditions than receiving assistance through special programs designed to cushion the impact of lay-offs.

I might also add that in the case of the first lay-off of the Ford Motor Company at Windsor which is just taking place, many of the workers are quite young and many have not completed their high school education. Therefore every effort must be made to encourage them and to give them an opportunity to retrain and upgrade their education so that this period of lay-off could be used to give them greater opportunity in later years for a more secure employment involving higher degrees of skill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, industry and business often complain about government intervention in what they deem to be their private affairs. It seems to me that any industry of the size of the auto industry, one with such an impact on the total economy, there is almost nothing that is strictly an internal matter and does not affect the community in which the operations are carried out or for that matter the entire country. Even though in the long run it may turn out to be beneficial to the community as I believe this expansion of the Ford Motor Company will, I think it leads in the long run to more government intervention rather than less when the human factor such as the interest of the workers concerned is not taken into account, at least to the same extent as the problems of planning production with respect to raw materials and machinery, certainly you cannot put workers into some form of suspended animation; you cannot put them in some warehouse as you would a machine that is not needed for a few months until some plant is rebuilt.

I think that the industry has to be more conscious of its responsibility to its workers to help them adjust to the impact of technological change. Certainly, if this responsibility is not forthcoming on a more voluntary basis, then it would seem to me, within the constitutional authority available to the various levels of government, public opinion will lead to government intervention even more than has been the case in the past to make sure that the human factor is given attention, and to make sure that the industrial development of our country has a just degree of equity and fairness for all concerned.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think that the words the Minister of Labour as he presented his estimates are ones that all of us must bear in mind. We must be prepared, as he said, to face clearly the disruptive forces that technological change creates and be prepared to take measures to make sure that the burden of this change is one which is shared in an equitable way by all the community and not merely by the workers concerned. In the long run, as I have said, the new engine plant of Ford at Windsor, in my opinion, is a development which will be of benefit to the community and to the workers concerned. It is unfortunate, in my opinion, that what would ordinarily be considered a favourable announcement by the community and the country was marred by lack of attention to the problems which this change would create in the short run for the workers who are in the plant which is now going to be converted. We must face up to the human problems of technological change if we want to make sure that such change will be of benefit to our country.

Mr. Broadbent: I will be very brief because I see the minister would like to answer. I should like to put a few questions to the hon. member who just spoke, since he was courteous enough to state that he would answer. My first question relates to his comments about an advance industry like the Ford Motor Company. Such a company knows well in advance when it is going to be laying off people. This is not a rhetorical question on my part. I am quite sure that in an area like Windsor, as in Oshawa from which I come, these questions are considered from a sociological point of view. In the latter part of the summer people from school go to work for this company and within three months they are thrown out. Does the hon. member think that perhaps we no longer can rely upon moral persuasion but should do two things: first of all, we should require the companies to give some indication when they hire people how long they are likely to be employed. There has to be some flexibility in this matter, obviously. Second, I should like to repeat the question I asked the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville: Would he be in favour now of the implementation of that recommendation in the Freedman report which refers to compulsory information being provided by companies, both to governments and employees, well in advance of lay-offs?

Mr. Gray: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby has raised a very important point. It is my impression that many of those to whom he refers were hired in August by Ford actually to take the place of people who were retiring in the normal course of retirement schemes. They were filling existing places in the company rather than some special expansion. It seems to me the company either should have been more forthcoming with them as to their prospects for continued employment or if, for what the company considered to be compelling reasons they could not be, the company should be willing now to do more to assist them in adjusting to the burden.

In so far as the Freedman report is concerned, I think that my approach is basically similar to that expressed by the Minister of Labour. The philosophy of the Freedman report is one which I accept. Certainly there is room for more to be done by governments to make sure that the governments themselves and the workers concerned are more aware of changes in plans by companies which could affect the workers and affect the entire country. I think in this discussion if we are going to be fair and frank with those who are following our words, we should be sure to make clear just what, under our existing constitutional structure, lies within the jurisdiction of the various levels of government. Perhaps there will be other occasions when we will be able to discuss this, and I think there will be. I think we should make clear just what the limits are under the present labour relations jurisdiction of the federal government to compel moves of this type in industries which are not completely within federal jurisdiction in all aspects of labour relations.

One may wish that our constitution had evolved somewhat differently in this regard, but we have to deal with the situation as it is. Therefore, to conclude my response to the hon. member's question, which I think was a most useful question, I feel we have to make sure that in discussing these matters in this house and outside we do not inadvertently give the impression that this level of government, for example, can do things which under our present constitutional set-up the courts have decided, rightly or wrongly—perhaps wrongly—we do not have authority to do. We should seek most actively to implement the philosophy of the Freedman report along the line suggested by the Minister of Labour, to the fullest extent of our federal jurisdiction.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I intend to be very brief. We are still on vote 1 and this is the second day the estimates of the Department of Labour have been considered. I welcome this, incidentally, because it has been many years since the estimates of the Department of Labour have been debated by so many speakers from all parts of the house, who have concerned themselves with the problems of labour in such a sympathetic manner. I think if there is one theme that I have noticed in just about all the speeches on these labour estimates it has been the realization that, in general, if this country is to survive in an economic sense we need a much greater degree of co-operation between labour, management and government.

I was particularly pleased, Mr. Chairman, to note that I, as Minister of Labour, the member for the New Democratic party and also the official spokesman of the official opposition, the hon. member for Central Nova, all in effect adopted, commended and endorsed the philosophy of Freedman. I think this is a breakthrough in this House of Commons, and really it has to come if we are going to maintain the maximum degree of co-operation between the three important segments. We need this type of enlightened legislation for those few industries that fail to live up to their moral obligation.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, in her usual eloquent style, mentioned the need in the very near future for some substantial legislation more favourable to the female labour force of this country. Her points were well taken. The idea of maternity leave is certainly not an original one. It makes sense and it should at least be part of the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act, if nothing else, when unemployment insurance comes up for drastic overhaul early in the new year. As the hon. lady knows, we were fortunate in obtaining the services of Mrs. Gelber to head this important branch of the department. She is already chairing a strong interdepartmental committee made up of representatives of labour, manpower and other departments concerned, preparing legislation in anticipation of some of the recommendations of the task force as well as reviewing the report to which the hon. member alluded, one which should be required reading.

The hon. lady also mentioned the problems of the underprivileged in California reflected in the appearance of California grapes on the market here. I notice that one of our leading supermarkets indicated today that it would no longer handle this product. We are fortunate in having an excellent product from the Niagara peninsula, one to which we should be giving a preference anyway, other things being equal.

Mr. Lewis: You are referring to the parliamentary secretary no doubt.

Mr. Mackasey: I might say to the older members of the house, particularly to those who have strong labour contacts, that instead of having to contact my counterpart in the United States regarding the true story behind the grape situation in California, I need go no further than Mr. Pat Conroy, the labour attaché for our department in Washington who is now in Ottawa for a week or so. Without being at all facetious, let me say I would be most happy if the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and others who are friends of Mr. Conroy could see him for half an hour or so, to discuss this problem with a gentleman who is a walking encyclopaedia, as most people know, as far as situations of this sort are concerned.

We heard an excellent intervention by the hon. member for Moose Jaw. I will not say I can comment openly on all his observations, but he was certainly accurate in his assumption that on the surface many of the recommendations of the International Labour Organization have not been implemented in this country. However I think he realizes, as most members do, that many of the recommendations of the I.L.O.—recommendations which we should like to see part and parcel of our legislation—have not been implemented for the good reason that to do so would infringe the constitution of our country. We have succeeded in ratifying at least 24 I.L.O. conventions to date. We are in constant communication with the deputy ministers of the various provinces. They attend various committee meetings of the I.L.O. as well as the annual convention in Geneva every June.

I think we are about due to get through, in some of the provinces at least, three or four recommendations of the I.L.O., particularly in the field of discrimination in employment policy and underground work for women in mines. There are many countries where there is no legislation specifying that women may not work underground in mines.

I might remind hon. members that next year is the fiftieth anniversary of the International Labour Organization, the oldest international organization in the world today. During the war years it established its base of operation in Montreal, particularly at McGill University, if I recall correctly.

I believe sufficient has been said about the auto pact. Certainly much has been said about the necessity of giving notice as far in advance as possible concerning lay-offs. The Economic Council has suggested a period of three months. I must in all fairness remind hon. members that many of the unions have included in their collective agreements provisions which prevent this type of grievance. Possibly some of the stronger unions will now be more militant in insisting upon incorporating clauses in their collective agreements which will provide for a longer period than is presently given.

It seems I have now covered all the points which have been made on clause 1. There are only four items in these estimates, and I am hoping to receive the co-operation of the committee in getting my estimates passed this evening. I should repeat that much of the legislation which is now the responsibility of the Minister of Labour needs drastic overhauling. I can think of no act, including the Labour (Standards) Code, and the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which I am called upon to administer, which does not need a thorough overhaul. It is my opinion therefore that the year 1969 will see much activity by members of all parties when we bring forward proposed legislation, and I would welcome the participation of members of all parties as early as possible, in any legislation which is proposed next year, possibly from the white paper stage. Certainly the Woods task report should be made available as early as possible, perhaps even before the holidays, in order that when we get back all parties can get together to formulate progressive legislation based on the recommendations of that report. Perhaps we could now move on from clause 1 and get on to the specific items which complete the estimates of my department.

Mr. Harding: I had hoped to get in a few words before the minister rose, so that he could answer the comments which I intend to make, as he did those of speakers who preceded me. I intend to be brief, but there are one or two points I feel I should put on record as far as labour organizations are concerned, and as far as the labour picture in this country is concerned.

I listened with a great deal of interest when the minister indicated several days ago that collective bargaining as between labour and management is to continue. I think this is a very sound decision; it is one with which our party agrees. As the minister is aware, there are moves in certain parts of the country to change the nature of collective bargaining. Indeed, a delegation to this government was pressing very recently, I believe, for changes in this connection. I must say it was with relief that I heard the minister announce the other day that he had looked over the Freedman report and felt his department would have some interesting legislation to present to the house along the lines of the recommendations contained in it. As other hon. members have already dealt with this I do not intend to go over this item tonight.

I wish to make one or two comments on compulsory arbitration. I think every member of this house agrees that the fruits of the productivity of this nation should be shared to a much greater degree than we see at the present time. I am not thinking only in terms of labour unions which are strong enough to go to an employer and demand their share. Of course, the employer gets a larger share of the fruits of productivity in the form of larger profits. Another group of citizens must be considered. I am speaking of those on fixed incomes—pensioners, retired civil servants and other people in this category. They are the ones who frequently do not receive their fair share of the increased productivity of this nation. Those who sit in the seats of government, who govern this nation, make its laws and are in a position to change what is happening, are the ones who ought to be making certain that the fruits of our productivity are shared justly by all. Until we reach that stage we will not have the just society which our friends of the Liberal party talk about.

Much can be done to guarantee the people on fixed incomes that we will not erode the standard of living they now enjoy—poor as that may be—by increasing prices without at the same time increasing their initial pensions or fixed incomes. If the standard of living of this nation is to rise, and it is rising steadily, every individual in Canada should share in that prosperity. There is nothing wrong with that outlook.

Mr. Lewis: Hear, hear.

Mr. Harding: I now wish to say a few words about compulsory arbitration. I come from a province where in the spring of this year, 1968, we passd a bill known as bill 33 which brought a measure of cumpulsory arbitration for the first time to British Columbia. I am very much opposed to this concept. Our party is opposed to it. We fought the legislation through its various stages. The Social Credit government of the province felt this type of legislation was needed on the statute books of the province, and the legislation was enacted.

Nothing has been done under this legislation. That is, nothing so far has been given to the mediation board. In short, they have not tried the legislation out to see if it will work. Yet the method by which this compulsory arbitration board has been set up will make collective bargaining a farce. Here you have a board. The government knows, the labour groups know and the employers know that if negotiations do not go properly the dispute can go to the board. And what will happen? Employers and labour will stop trying to settle their differences collectively around a table. That is not what we want. We need not be ashamed of the collective bargaining record of unions and employers in Canada. If one looks at the record, and with few exceptions the record is quite good, he will see that 30, 40 or 50 times more man-days in this country are lost through unemployment than through strikes. For every man-day lost through strikes in this country there are 20 or 30 man-days lost through sickness.

If the government wants to save man-days that are lost to employment it ought to curtail unemployment, which is currently running at 5 per cent of our Canadian labour force. That is far higher than is good for a healthy economy. That is what we are advocating—get rid of unemployment, or curtail it as much as possible.

Labour and management need not be ashamed of their bargaining record. You know, it amazes me to hear politicians say that the labouring man should not have the right to sell his labour. That is the only thing he has to sell, and he has the right to go to the market and demand as high a price as he can obtain for it. Tonight I was watching a medical man talking on television. He was talking about higher fees and saying that no one should interfere with the raising of doctors' fees. Those who are in the legal profession, or in any other professional group, no doubt make the same plea. Yet, once you begin with compulsory arbitration to set wage rates for the ordinary workmen, where will you stop? Will you go right down the line and take in the professional groups? If you are to be fair that is what you must do. How far down the line will you go, and where does the process stop? I suggest the collective bargaining system we have today is good enough and ought to be retained without change.

I wish to point out to the minister one of the big weaknesses in some of our labour legislation and some of the collective bargaining procedures we have today. This government, and provincial governments in Canada, have not provided a strong enough mediation service—and the minister pointed this out the other day. That is abundantly clear. No matter where you go in this country you will find that one of the keys to successful labour management relations is mediation. We must enter this field with experts and trained personnel, and dig out the facts.

We must also ask labour and management, when they sit around the table, to put all their cards on the table. Far too often we find that in disputes one side will refuse to divulge information. I suggest to the minister that it is in this area we ought to tighten up; we ought to tighten the regulations in the field of mediation services. If we do we shall have untold dividends in terms of industrial peace in Canada. I cannot urge this course to the minister too strongly. In all sincerity I say to the house, do not be misled by a few people who think compulsory arbitration will solve the ills of the management and labour in Canada. It will not. It will have an adverse effect and cause far more trouble than it will ever cure.

I will not take up more of the committee's time. There are other matters I wished to raise, and I hope to have the opportunity on some other day to bring them to the attention of the house.

Item agreed to.

Labour Relations—

5. Administration including the promotion of labour-management consultation, $1,233,200.

Item agreed to.

• (9:50 p.m.)

Labour Standards and Benefits—

10. Administration, including the Government's contribution to Annuities Agents Pension Account in accordance with regulations made pursuant to Vote 181, Appropriation Act No. 5, 1961 and $10,000 for grants for special research studies, $3,012,700.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On vote 10, Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister of Labour could tell us what is happening with respect to Canadian government annuities which I believe still come under his aegis. I am aware of the fact that certain cutbacks in staff have been made and that no efforts are being made to persuade more people to take out Canadian government annuities. But what is the picture? In particular, may I ask the minister if any consideration is being given to increasing the rate of interest that is applied in the computation of annuities paid by this branch? I remind the minister that the government is paying higher interest rates on Canada savings bonds and other money it borrows. Some people who have government annuities wonder if their benefits should not be adjusted accordingly.

I realize this as a very old program. In fact it came into being the very day I was born.

An hon. Member: Thirty nine years ago.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, thank you; so after those 39 years maybe it could be improved.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Chairman, I must admit I have very little in the way of detail but I shall get more detail for the hon. member tomorrow. He of course knows that the emphasis on this branch was drastically reduced some time ago, I presume by my predecessor. The branch still functions because of the fact that there are many plans still in existence funded with the government. One of the problems is that there has been added incentive by the provinces to acquire many of the old, traditional funds that were placed with the federal government in the Department of Labour. In the past firemen's unions, towns and cities were among the better customers of the Department of Labour in this area. In recent years certain provinces have made efforts—I know this is the case in my own province of Quebec—to discourage the placing of funds with the Department of Labour in Ottawa and have them placed with some body on the provincial level. This comes back to the rate of interest that we are paying on this particular fund.

The government has been reluctant to increase the rate of interest, perhaps through a degree of over-conservatism and a concern to protect the fund. In any event it is felt the time has come for the Department of Labour to get out of this particular function. In 1967-68 there were 1,058 group certificates issued, 1,332 individual contracts issued, 966,000 annuity cheques issued and over $66 million disbursed, and so it is still a fairly active program in that sense. But the emphasis has been removed from soliciting new business, and I will only suggest that I will discuss with the annuities branch the suggestion of the hon. member that a review be made of the rate of interest paid on this particular fund.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, it is not my wish to hold up this item and so perhaps I will settle for what the minister has said he would do. Perhaps he would get someone in his department to write me a letter giving the information I have requested.

Mr. Mackasey: And I will deliver it myself, to save the price of stamps these days.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The minister is feeling that too?

Item agreed to.

(The following items were agreed to:)

Research and Development—

15. Administration including the co-ordination and advancement of Canada's role in international labour affairs, the administration of transitional assistance to workers in automotive manufacturing and parts industries, and related activities, $1,734,800.

20. Grants, Contributions and Subsidies as detailed in the Estimates, $1,175,000.

B—Unemployment Insurance Commission—

25. Administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act including recoverable expenditures on behalf of the Canada Pension Plan, $41,545,700.

The Deputy Chairman: This completes the estimates of the Department of Labour. The committee of supply—

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I realize I am probably too late from a legal point of view, but the minister, being a very honourable gentleman, might decide to answer my question in any case.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. We will need unanimous consent to authorize this. Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Deputy Chairman: I regret that I hear some nays. The committee of supply will now consider the estimates of the Department of Public Works.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Is it the wish of the committee that I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, for the convenience of hon. members can the government house leader put on the record what legislation or other business the government plans to place before the house for the rest of the week?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Tomorrow we will be dealing with the special order made by the house to discuss the question of the report from the external affairs and national defence committee on the matter of Nigeria. On Wednesday next we will be dealing with the estimates of the Minister of Public Works. On Thursday, as the house knows, we have the special order whereby the house will not sit but the standing committees of the house will sit to consider estimates; and on Friday, subject to further confirmation, it will be my proposal to call the estimates of the Department of Finance.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

GRAIN—SASKATCHEWAN—REPORTED INADEQUATE DRYING FACILITIES

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, on November 22 I drew the attention of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to a protest sent to the government by the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture with respect to the adequacy of grain drying facilities and programs. I also inquired if the Prime Minister would ask the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to give further consideration to this serious problem in order to determine what measures should be taken to deal with it.

The subject of harvest and grain conditions in western Canada was raised on the second day of the session. We were assured at that time by the minister that action was being taken to make full use of drying facilities. Subsequently the situation deteriorated. On September 25 the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) asked for a statement dealing with the tough and damp grain situation. In a statement made on September 27 the government assured the house that matters were under control.

On October 9 the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) asked about drying and storage facilities. He was told that inland terminals, lakehead terminals and the wheat board were acting on the problem. On October 10 the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) asked about delivery quotas, and the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) informed the house that the matter would be assessed after the unit quota had been filled.

On October 15 on the adjournment motion I discussed deteriorating conditions on the prairies. Several points were urged upon the government at that time. First of all, there should be special over-delivery quotas to enable tough and damp grain to move to terminals. Some action has been taken on this now. Second, there should be special action to clear space at elevator points now plugged with dry grain, which prevents facilities being used to move tough and damp grain. Third, there should be adequate co-ordination and control to ensure that drying facilities are used to the maximum, and to develop emergency facilities as needed. Fourth, there should be special depreciation allowances for storage and drying facilities.

On October 16, 17 and 21 there were more questions on the subject. On October 23 the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) moved an adjournment motion for discussion of this matter. This was not granted at that time. Later, on several other occasions, several members on this side of the house attempted to obtain more information from the government with regard to the program the government planned to initiate. On October 24 the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) asked about the possibility of extending accelerated depreciation allowances in respect of grain drying equipment. He asked the question again on October 25. On November 6 I asked the same question and was told that the matter was being studied. As yet we have not had any announcement or decision from the government. On November 6 the Minister of Agriculture (Mr.

Olson) informed the house that the situation was well in hand with regard to grain drying. Later, the next day, the Minister of Agriculture backtracked somewhat in dealing with the same problem.

In the past couple of weeks there have been further statements with regard to the inadequacy of box cars for the movement of grain. This is a matter in respect of which it has been difficult to obtain some of the facts. However, I think the house should be aware of the protest by the Saskatchewan Federation of Agriculture after a meeting with provincial government officials and representatives of other farm organizations. As I understand it, they sent a telegram to the Minister of Agriculture dealing with this situation and protesting the viewpoint that the situation is well in hand. I should like to quote from the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool farm news broadcast for November 12, 1968:

> The committee strongly states that this is not the case. According to the information received from the northern and eastern parts of the province, farmers believe that there will be little or no problem in getting rid of the damp grain. Publicity in recent weeks relating to the availability of box cars and the availability of grain drying facilities and storage at terminals has helped them to arrive at this conclusion.
> However, we wish to stress that, contrary to popular belief, both the inland and port terminals are drying insignificant amounts of grain at the present time. We ask that prompt action be taken by all authorities involved to put more pressure on railway companies to spot cars and speed up the eventual movement of grain to the terminals. The matter is urgent. Ports will close to shipping in a few weeks and as much damp grain as possible must be moved before then.

As reported in the Regina Leader-Post of November 19, 1968 the director of the Saskatchewan government agricultural representative branch stated:

> Nearly 100 million bushels of damp wheat will have to be dried on the prairies this year.

He went on to state as quoted in this article:

> An estimated 160,000,000 bushels had been harvested above the 17 per cent moisture content level, but drying facilities at all terminal elevators would be able to handle only 62,000,000 bushels for conditioning before the end of April, leaving 98,000,000 bushels to be dried elsewhere, he said.
>
> But the total extent of the problem is even greater when the amounts of very tough wheat, which also need drying, are taken into consideration.
> Mr. Boyes estimated that 170,000,000 bushels will have to be dried at some place other than the terminals.
>
> In Saskatchewan there are an estimated 170,000,000 bushels of damp or very tough wheat as well as 12,000,000 bushels of damp oats.
> "It doesn't look like we will come anywhere close to handling the damp grain without farm drying," he said.

At its recent convention the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool passed a resolution which stated as follows:

> That, in view of the impending disastrous economic situation facing farmers with damp, low-grade grain that could go out of condition, be it resolved that a program of financial assistance by the governments be sought, to assist producers in drying or caring for these stocks.

I would suggest that other than making use of already existing facilities which would have been used under any normal circumstances the government has not taken any extra special efforts, at least to the knowledge of members of this house and to the knowledge of the public, to deal with the situation which faces those on the prairie provinces.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have only three minutes, therefore it is going to take some special effort to try to answer all of the problems and questions which have been raised by the hon. member for Regina East (Mr. Burton).

First of all, I want to say categorically that we do not accept his assertion that the government has not taken any action. We do not accept his assertion that the government has been something less than frank in giving members of this house information in respect of this matter, in spite of his recital of all the questions which have been asked during the period when this harvest was coming in. For his information there will be a meeting tomorrow called by the Canadian Wheat Board, because of the serious implications of the tough and damp grain situation as it now exists in all sectors of the Canadian economy. More specifically, the western producers will be called in because it is essential that everyone affected by tough and damp grain be fully aware of the magnitude of the problems and the most effective and expeditious way of dealing with them throughout the ensuing months.

We have a report from the Saskatchewan department of agriculture which made a survey several days or, indeed, several weeks ago which indicates there are something in excess of 800 on-farm dryers, and the number is going up every day. This government has announced its intention to provide for accelerated depreciation in respect of on-farm dryers, but it requires action on the part of this house in passing the budget resolutions and the budget bills before that can be brought into effect. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) announced that there would be accelerated depreciation in respect of on-farm storage, and an arrangement will be worked out in this regard as well as in respect of additional on-farm dryers.

The hon. member complained about the over-delivery quotas being set for tough and damp grain, and the fact that there were not enough box cars to deal with it. He must realize that there are millions of acres in western Canada, and when you multiply that by three bushels, that does not mean automatically that the next day you can get this grain out of western Canada. Anyone who has any familiarity with the situation knows that there are physical limitations involved. It is also a well known fact that in western Canada there has been some movement of dry grain out of inland terminals to provide for sufficient space around the drying facilities in these five terminal elevators; so the maximum use can in fact be made of these drying facilities, which is something of the order of 165,000 bushels per day.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

Mr. Olson: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, that I have run out of time, because I have lots more to say on this subject.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—RECLASSIFICATION OF SURPLUS RAILWAY MAIL CLERKS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should give the minister my time. When I read an article regarding the blast that had occurred regarding the bad faith treatment of surplus railway mail clerks, it immediately came to my mind that this situation exists in my own city of Moose Jaw. This situation can be traced directly back to the action of the Post Office Department and the Postmaster General in cancelling the mail contracts to the mail passenger trains which were in existence. That cancellation of mail contracts to these passenger trains brought about this classification of surplus railway mail clerks. This was never required before. We all know that Moose Jaw at one time was one of the centres which employed a large number of railway mail clerks. At this time they are practically non-existent.

I should like to ask the Postmaster General three questions. I am sure he has read the article to which I have reference. I should like to know whether or not railway mail clerks have been integrated in a seniority list. Let me make it absolutely clear that I am not entering into any jurisdictional dispute between the postal workers and the Public Service Alliance of Canada, or any association which is represented in this particular regard.

• (10:10 p.m.)

I would like to ask whether the Post Office Department unilaterally withdrew the guarantees given by the Craig formula to maintain job security for surplus railway mail clerks. My second question is: Was any assurance given to the surplus railway mail clerks' representatives by either the Post Office Department or Treasury Board to the effect that there would be no change in the status of surplus mail clerks until the matter could be settled through collective bargaining? If the surplus railway mail clerks have been reclassified by the Post Office Department and approved by Treasury Board without consultation or collective bargaining, I suggest this government stands convicted of bargaining in bad faith, and their word is completely suspect.

The Postmaster General should clarify this matter. In my opinion it is a complete farce to even suggest that some of the members of this cabinet are remotely concerned about democratic, collective bargaining if what is said to be happening is really a fact. I refer to what we have read in this paper. I ask the minister to clarify the points I have raised at this time.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, those are clearly inflammatory charges. I think I could probably answer all three questions by saying that on Wednesday next there will be a meeting between members of Treasury Board, the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada and officials of my department in which they will review the whole situation. Therefore I can say that no action has been taken to reclassify the surplus mail clerks, of which the hon. member has accused us.

I would say however that we are quite impatient that this reclassification get on, because we now have a situation where there are what you might call active surplus mail clerks and those who are waiting for an assignment of new tasks. The problem that concerns us is that the ones who have already been assigned other tasks, whether as postal clerks or whatever it might be, are being reintegrated into the department, and a group of those employees are still surplus. The board has ruled that they shall be represented by the Public Service Alliance, and we have no quarrel with that as such, except that it does raise some very considerable problems. If the Alliance acts for both, we will have the situation where probably red circled employees will be performing the same jobs as employees represented by the council, who receive different rates of pay and of course have different fringe benefits and other conditions of work.

Therefore, I would hope that most of this matter can be cleared up on Wednesday without any accusations of bad faith being imputed to anyone.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.16 p.m.

HEALTH, WELFARE AND SOCIAL AFFAIRS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Second report of permanent committee on health, welfare and social affairs—Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull).

[Editor's Note: Text of foregoing report appears in today's Votes and Proceedings.]

TOBACCO RESTRAINT ACT

REQUIREMENT THAT HEALTH WARNING APPEAR ON CIGARETTE PACKAGES

Mr. Antonio Yanakis (Berthier) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-134 intituled "An Act to amend the Tobacco Restraint Act".

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Yanakis: Mr. Speaker, last week in a news release, the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) drew the attention of Canadians to the health hazards of tobacco and published, for information purposes, a table of 85 brands of cigarettes giving their nicotine and tar contents.

Reports published recently by prominent chemists such as Dr. N. F. Forbes, professor at the Waterloo University, and other doctors throughout the world, have proved beyond a doubt that cigarettes can cause cancer, respiratory ailments, emphysema, coronary and other diseases.

Mr. Speaker: I must remind the hon. member that the provisions of standing order 71 allow him only a brief explanation at this time.

Mr. Yanakis: I therefore ask the house to give priority to this bill so that it may be referred as soon as possible to the committee on health, welfare and social affairs for consideration and immediate steps to be taken in the interest of the citizens of the country in order to force the cigarette companies to print on the packages: "Warning—Smoking is a—

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF WHITE PAPER ON COSTS AND PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a follow up question to one I asked the Prime Minister a number of weeks ago. It relates to a promised or indicated white paper or statement regarding measures the government proposes to take to support its anti-inflationary program. My recollection is that the Prime Minister indicated that within a relatively short period of time he would be in a position to state the intention of the government in this regard. Can he tell me when we might expect such a statement?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the Leader of the Opposition is referring to a white paper on stabilization, or a board to stabilize prices and incomes. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs indicated in his speech to the house of about ten days ago, I believe, that this white paper would be in before the end of the year. That is as close a commitment as I can now give to the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it proper to assume that the concept announced by the former prime minister last February with regard to the role of a prices and review board has been dropped, or at least very substantially changed, and a new concept adopted?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think there will be any fundamental departure from what was indicated by the then prime minister. As a matter of fact some of the plans he set forth have been followed by me in the sense that I have had meetings with leaders of labour and industry and have discussed these plans with them. I have also had several meetings with responsible people in the area of finance. I have asked advice of people who have looked at this kind of experiment in the United Kingdom, and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has done a great deal of work on it. I believe all this is in the general direction indicated earlier last year by Right Hon. L. B. Pearson.

Inquiries of the Ministry

COMMUNICATIONS

SATELLITE DESIGN STUDIES COMMISSIONED BY GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General. In light of press reports of designs of and plans for a communications satellite, publicized by Northern Electric, can the minister inform the house whether the government commissioned any firm to make a feasibility study, for a fee, on this subject; and if so, has he received any report?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to inform this house that the first I learned of the results of two studies that were commissioned by the government on May 1, was last night after one of the firms had held a press conference.

In answer to the hon. member's question I may say that in May through the Department of Industry the government had commissioned two studies respecting the design, development and supply of a domestic satellite communications system. The contracts were let at a cost of approximately $550,000. The part that bothers me is that neither I nor my colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has yet received such reports.

I see that one of the companies, and the other company this morning, are prepared to launch satellites of a certain size and design. This has not been decided by the cabinet, nor has my department made any recommendations to my colleagues in the cabinet. At the present time my office is in touch with the two companies concerned. I expect to see them. I expect to receive copies of the reports, at which time I think I will make the point that such studies, when commissioned by the government, are the property of the government—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Kierans: —and are not to be used as springboards for public relations circuses or in an attempt to sell their other wares.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question arises out of the commendable indignation of the Postmaster General, which I share. I ask the Postmaster General whether when he receives those reports he will study them to see how much of the publicity derives from them and from the information in them, and assure the house that he will take the necessary action against the companies for using information and reports which are the property of the government and for which the government has paid.

Mr. Kierans: One thing I intend to make sure of, Mr. Speaker, is that the cost of the two press conferences will not be chargeable to the government.

Mr. Lewis: That is not very much consolation.

Mr. Kierans: Certainly my officers are very anxious also to see and evaluate the two reports, and to make such recommendations as may then seem to them to be appropriate.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I would just like to ask the minister responsible for communications if it is his intention to improve communications between the departments.

Mr. Lewis: I have a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether the Postmaster General did not hear my question or deliberately thought it unwise to answer it, but I would like to ask whether he would assure the house that he will take action against these companies if they have used any information in any parts of the report for which the government has paid.

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I do not think they have used any information. If they have, of course we will take steps to safeguard the interests of the government and the people of Canada. Of that I can assure the hon. member. I think they were probably very proud of their work and wanted to boast about it before they informed the people who had commissioned the work.

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the Postmaster General assure the house that the firms which were commissioned to do this research study will not necessarily be called upon to involve themselves in the development of the satellite?

Mr. Kierans: I can give no such assurance because obviously we have a tremendous capability within the department itself, that is within the defence research telecommunications establishment. They are the ones who will direct the work leading to the placing in orbit of the first operational satellite of any western country. I will be guided by their advice, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRIES OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Did he send a message of congratulations to the president of the French republic about his decision not to devaluate the franc, as did the President of the United States?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not send any telegram, but Canada did send France $100 million.

[English]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister explain the mission undertaken by the government leader in the other place?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Will I explain what, sir?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member realizes that the Speaker has to make a ruling on questions, and I suppose they should be just a little clearer than this so he can determine whether it is a matter of urgency, or a matter of national importance, and whether the question can be asked at this time.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): With all due respect I will forgo the opportunity, since it is not clear to the Prime Minister who is running the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ambrose H. Peddle (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. In view of a report in today's Globe and Mail to the effect that the government is giving some $75,000 to a manufacturer to investigate three proposals for the modernization of bathrooms—

An hon. Member: For the Privy Council.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Will the hon. member kindly ask his question?

Mr. Peddle: —and in view of the avowed intention of the Prime Minister and his government to stay out of the nation's bedrooms, would it not be wise for the Prime Minister and his government also to stay out of the nation's bathrooms?

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): It really does not matter who answers this question, but I would appreciate it very much if the Prime Minister could be recognized. He is beginning to look like a yo-yo.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The Prime Minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Because of the prevailing good mood of the house perhaps I might be allowed to direct a question to the Postmaster General. In his recent comments on defence matters was the hon. gentleman speaking as a leadership candidate or was he merely flying a satellite?

Mr. Speaker: Order. In spite of the good mood of the house, the hon. member cannot ask that question.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): My question is prompted by the declaration of the Prime Minister concerning the independence of cabinet ministers when commenting on various items. I should like to direct a question to the Solicitor General and ask him whether he has read and would care to comment upon the derogatory and slighting remarks made about him by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

THE MINISTRY

FREEDOM TO EXPRESS PERSONAL OPINIONS ON POLICIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I have a question for the Prime Minister. Would he confirm to this house that he has authorized, as a matter of government practice in respect of policies in the process of formulation, ministers of the crown to express their personal opinions, as for example ministers to whom the reports of the companies referred to by the Postmaster General were given? Would these ministers be free to express their opinions about these reports once they had received them?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I fail to get the point of the question.

Mr. Baldwin: I will put it more simply, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister confirm that as a matter of government practice he has authorized ministers of the crown to express their personal opinions in respect of policies being formulated?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think this government encourages ministers and members of its caucus to express opinions in as wide an area as possible. The only prudent thing for a minister or for a member of parliament—especially for a minister—to do is to make sure he does not place himself in an irrevocable position which might be contrary to that which the government might eventually take.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the Prime Minister confirm that ministers will be free to do this in the House of Commons as well as outside it, and in general debates during which future policies are being formulated?

Mr. Trudeau: I suggest the hon. member should listen to more of our ministerial speeches in the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Baldwin: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt very much that this type of question can be asked at this time. This is certainly changing into a debate or even an argument between the hon. member and the Prime Minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I have one more supplementary question which I think is essential on this matter, and I would like leave to put it. Has the Prime Minister not considered the very serious problems this would pose, having in mind how difficult it is to find out what is government policy?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is precisely what I had in mind. The original question and the supplementary questions have turned into debate and argument, and should not be asked at this time.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REPORTED STATEMENTS BY U.S. NATIONAL AT UNIVERSITY OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): My question is directed to the Solicitor General. I am glad he is here, but we always knew where he was. In view of the large influx of good representatives, properly interspersed with revolutionaries, who are en route to Montreal or already there, I should like to ask the minister if he is now in a position to answer the question I asked him on October 28. At that time I was referring to Rubin and other revolutionaries of the kind who advocate bloody revolution in Canada. Everybody knows they are endeavouring to foment revolution—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the right hon. gentleman kindly ask his question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have to identify what the question was. As long as the minister has it before him I ask him now, in view of the statement that he would take the matter as notice and secure information thereon, whether he is now able to tell us what is the attitude of the government toward putting out the welcome mat for those who are coming into this country to advocate open revolution.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): The question referred to appears at page 2084 of Hansard. It occupies rather more than a column of Hansard, and I feel I should read to the house what I said on that occasion:
