Bill (No. 1) respecting the Administration of Oaths of Office.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that when the House did attend His Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Excellency was pleased to present a Speech to the Members of both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy of the Speech, which is as follows:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It affords me much gratification to meet you once more at the commencement of the Parliamentary Session, and to congratulate you upon the general prosperity of the country.

Although the labors of the husbandman have not been rewarded in some portions of the Dominion by an adequate return, the harvest of last year has on the whole been plenteous, while in Manitoba and the North-West Territories it was one of remarkable abundance.

The negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the adjustment of what is known as "The Fishery Question" have, I am pleased to inform you, resulted in a Treaty which will, I venture to hope, be considered by you as honorable and satisfactory to both nations.

The Treaty, with the papers and correspondence relating thereto, will be laid before you, and you will be invited to adopt a measure to give effect to its provisions.

The extension and development of our system of railways have not only rendered necessary additional safeguards for life and property, but have given greater frequency to questions in which the interests of rival companies are found to be in conflict, and to require authoritative adjustment. As further legislation appears to be needed for these purposes, a measure will be submitted to you for the consolidation and improvement of "The Railway Act."

Experience having shown that amendments are required to make the provisions of the Act respecting Elections of the Members of the House of Commons more effective and more convenient in their operation, you will be asked to consider a measure for the amendment of that Statute.

The Act respecting Controverted Elections may likewise require attention with a view to the removal of certain questions of interpretation which have arisen and which should be set at rest.

My Government has availed itself of the opportunity afforded by the recess to consider the numerous suggestions which have been made for improving the details of the Act respecting the Election Franchise, and a measure will be submitted to you for the purpose of simplifying the law and greatly lessening the cost of its operation.

The growth of the North-West Territories renders expedient an improvement in the system of government and legislation affecting those portions of the Dominion, and a Bill for that purpose will be laid before you.

A Bill will be submitted to you to make a larger portion of the modern laws of England applicable to the Province of Manitoba and to the North-West Territories in regard to matters which are within the control of the Parliament of Canada, but which have not as yet been made the subject of Canadian legislation.

Among other measures, Bills will be presented to you relating to the Judiciary, to the Civil Service Act, and to the audit of the Public Accounts.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The Accounts for the past year will be laid before you as well as the Estimates for the ensuing year. They have been prepared with a due regard to economy and the requirements of the public service.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I commend these important subjects and all matters affecting the public interests which may be brought before you to your best consideration, and I feel assured that you will address yourselves to them with earnestness and assiduity.

Sir John A. Macdonald moved:

That the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General be taken into consideration to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir John A. Macdonald moved:

That Select Standing Committees of this House, for the present Session, be appointed for the following purposes:—1. On Privileges and Elections.—2. On Expiring Laws.—3. On Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines.—4. On Miscellaneous Private Bills.—5. On Standing Orders.—6. On Printing.—7. On Public Accounts.—8. On Banking and Commerce.—9. On Immigration and Colonisation;—which said Committees shall severally be empowered to examine and enquire into all such matters and things as may be referred to them by the House, and to report from time to time their observations and opinions thereon; with power to send for persons, papers and records.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of the Joint Librarians of Parliament on the state of the Library.—(Mr. Speaker.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 24th February, 1898.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HIS EXCELLENCY'S SPEECH.

The House proceeded to the consideration of His Excellency's Speech at the opening of the Session.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, At the outset I must express my regret that from among the younger members of the House, there has not been selected some one better able than myself to begin a discussion of the important matters which are referred to in His Excellency's Speech. I am not unmindful, however, that to hon. gentlemen who have in the past performed the duty which to-day has fallen to me, there has been extended an unusual degree of kindness and consideration; and, Sir, having sat for one Session in this House, and having listened to so many hon. gentlemen delivering able addresses from your right and from your left, I the more keenly appreciate the difficulty of the task which I have undertaken, and the need I have to ask that the indulgence so often extended to new members of this House may not be withheld on the present occasion. Hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will remember that, at the opening of last Session, the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake)—whose absence to-day I regret on account of its cause—with that kindness and consideration which usually characterise him, was good enough to connect my name with the duties then so well performed by my hon. friend from West Huron (Mr. Porter). I must believe that only the hon. gentleman's absence to-day prevents him expressing the pleasure, which I am bound to suppose he would feel at my return to this House, and at my engaging to-day in the duty for which he selected me a year ago. Sir, I am well aware that to the members of this House, as well as to the people of all sections of this country, has come, with no considerable regret, the announcement that the gentleman who has administered the affairs of the country for the last four years is about to remove from our midst. Speaking where I do, I need not say that during his incumbency of his office, His Excellency has well performed the high duties that have devolved upon him, and that, whether in public or in private life, he has found a place warm and deep in the hearts of the Canadian people. Succeeding as he did a long list of illustrious Governors, His Excellency leaves us, having added one more brilliant name to the number of those eminent British statesmen who, throughout years, have performed great services for the Empire in this its western portion. In the still more important office to which the Imperial Government have, in their wisdom, called him, we can judge, from his eminent abilities and his long experience, that a noble career awaits him; and I think I can assure His Excellency that nowhere in the Empire will be found friends more anxious to applaud his winning of new honors and fresh laurels than among the people with whom he is soon to sever his connection. It will no doubt be urged, Sir, by hon. gentlemen who sit upon your left that the Speech from the Throne is barren in the mention of great matters, and that the legislation promised by the Government during this Session is not of the usual quantity or the usual quality; but, perhaps, the Government should be congratulated on the fact that the affairs of our country at the present time are so well ordered as to need very little interference from this Parliament. Some of the paragraphs of the Address, however, deal with matters with regard to which our information is explicit enough only to warrant a passing comment, while other paragraphs deal with subjects which may be more fittingly discussed in this Chamber during a later period of the Session. By reason of this, as well as by reason of my unwillingness to provoke a long discussion of these matters, I shall only detain the House a short time in dealing with a few matters mentioned in His Excellency's gracious Speech from the Throne. Sir, to gentlemen who have so recently been among their constituents will have occurred the desirability of certain changes in the Election, the Franchise, and the Controverted Election Acts, and, therefore, I need not anticipate what the proposed changes will be. With regard to the promised measures relating to the Civil Service Act, the application of English laws to Manitoba, the changes in the Judiciary Act, and the auditing of the Public Accounts, I can only say that I suppose the necessity of those measures has been made manifest by the experience of the various Departments, and that they will be in the public interest. We are promised legislation with regard to the government of the North-West Territories. It will be remembered by this House that some time ago the Council of the North-West Territory was simply an advisory board appointed by the Government. At the present time that Council is partly elective and partly appointed, and I have no doubt the legislation which is promised this Session on that subject will be in the direction of extending to our fellow citizens in those Territories the rights of representative local government which we in the older Provinces enjoy. The fact that the Government feels warranted in bringing forward such legislation should be an evidence to us of the growing importance of those Territories, and the probability of their soon taking their places among the great Provinces of this Confederation. Then we are promised railway legislation. Hon. gentlemen will remember that some time ago Commissioners were appointed to take evidence with regard to the relations of the great railway corporations of this country to one another and to the general public. Those Commissioners have gleaned a large quantity of information on this very important matter, and the legislation which is to be laid before us this Session is, no doubt, the result of the representations made by that Commission to the Government. We are well aware, Sir, that evils have existed in connection with our railway system, evils which have become more apparent with the great extension of our railway interests, and which have injuriously affected the public interest, and I think the Government are to be commended for so speedily acting in the direction they have promised in the Speech from the Throne. At the opening of this House, last year, we were free to admit that the Province of Manitoba had suffered from a failure of its wheat crop, and that in consequence the people of that Province were not enjoying that measure of prosperity which we all wished they should enjoy. This year it gives me very great pleasure to be able to turn to my hon. friends representing Manitoba in this House, and congratulate them on the fact that this year their Province, though its soil is only as yet very partially tilled, is sending to the markets of the world 12,000,000 or 13,000,000 bushels of the best grain ever grown on American soil. Notwithstanding the very large amount of information which we have had from various sources with regard to our North-West Provinces and Territories, I think it will be admitted on every hand that we are only beginning to realise their immense wealth and value to this country. The enormous harvest which has been reaped in Manitoba during the past year, must surely convince us that we can form no adequate idea of the future possibilities of that Province—save this, Sir, that it gives us confidence that in a very short time it must become one of the greatest, if not the greatest, of our agricultural Provinces. And what shall I say of that vast territory lying between the Province of Manitoba and the Rocky Mountains? What can I say, Sir, except that we are only beginning to learn something of its immense richness? I understand that in the Upper House this Session a committee will be asked for to gather information with regard to the great Territories lying beyond the well-known fertile belt of the North-West—vast regions which are said to be capable of growing grain and rearing stock as extensively as the settled portions of the older Provinces. The only want I could find in that country, during a brief visit to it, was a want of population. It is true, standing here to-day we cannot say that our schemes for attracting immigration from older countries into this part of the American continent have been as successful as we would desire; we cannot say that we have secured as many of the immigrants coming to this continent as we could wish.

But there is this fact to be taken in conjunction with the one I have just mentioned. When we glance at the statistics, we find that 85 per cent. of our present population are native born, and it is a matter for congratulation, as an evidence of our self-reliance, that our great public works and general development are due, in a large measure, solely to our own native energy. At the present time the prospects, as regards immigration, are much more hopeful. Hon. gentlemen on both sides must admit that the evidence today shows, that very shortly, we shall have an immensely increased immigration. It is not for me to discuss now the reasons why we have not received what we consider would have been our proper share of the immigration to this continent; but I may mention one reason, the force of which hon. gentlemen opposite will appreciate. We know very well that the agents of American land companies, and railway companies, have been very energetic in the distribution of libels on the climate of our North-West, and to a considerable extent succeeded in inducing the people of other countries to put faith in the statements they so industriously circulated; but I am confident hon. gentlemen will agree with me that the events of the past year must have dissipated those false ideas and impressions. In all quarters sympathy has been expressed, and tears have been shed, because of the death and destruction that have followed in the wake of the blizzards which, during the past year, visited those very sections of the United States to which the tide of immigration was directed. But whilst death and destruction have followed in the wake of the blizzards in the American North-West, the people in our North-West have escaped these calamities; they have lived in comfort and safety, enjoying the result of their toil, and their thousands of cattle have been grazing in safety upon our plains. One of the important matters referred to in the Speech is the Fishery question, a question of great interest to the Canadian people. Our fishing industry is undoubtedly a very great industry, one in whose operations no less a sum than $7,000,000 is invested and 60,000 of our population employed, and which yields an annual harvest to the Dominion reaching in the aggregate a score of a million dollars. An industry of this importance is one which commends itself to our protection on all occasions, and I think the action of the Government throughout the whole dispute with the United States, in defending what we regarded as our just rights, meets with the approval of our people, irrespective of party, from one end of the country to the other. The position of our Government in this whole matter was a difficult one. They were compelled by their duty, as the representatives of the Canadian people, to defend our rights; it was their duty as well to see that, if possible, no rupture of the cordial relations which hitherto existed between the two countries should be occasioned. The dispute was an irritating one, one which at no time increased those friendly relations, and at all times was liable to lead to rupture of the same. Last year we were pleased to learn that negotiations, with the view of settling the difficulty, had begun, and I am sure hon. gentlemen on both sides will express their pleasure at the successful termination of these negotiations. This is not just the time to discuss the details of the treaty agreed upon by the Commission. When the Bill for its ratification is brought before the House, I understand it will be accompanied by the correspondence and various papers bearing upon it, so that every facility will be given for a thorough discussion of its clauses and a thorough understanding of its provisions. I believe the treaty to be a fair and equitable settlement of a serious dispute between us and the United States. True, we may not have got all we wanted or demanded, but we could not expect to obtain everything. As I understand the functions of a Commission of that kind, it is organised for the purpose of arranging equivalents. We have had, it is true, very serious attacks on the treaty, but it is not the first treaty which has been attacked in this country. In 1871, the right hon. gentleman who leads this House, was most severely attacked with regard to the treaty which resulted from the negotiations in which he, as a British plenipotentiary, took part. A few years later on, hon. gentlemen will remember, he was also vilified for not having taken a humiliating position in order to secure the extension of that same treaty, for having accepted which he had been previously so violently attacked. In connection with the Fishery Treaty, it is, perhaps, satisfactory to know that the American Administration are also being attacked by the American fishermen for having completely given up the American contentions; the Gloucester fishermen are, to-day, holding indignation meetings and denouncing their Government for having, as they claim, completely surrendered the American rights, by endorsing this same treaty which our Government are condemned on this side for having endorsed. A treaty which is thus condemned on both sides, by a certain section of each people, we may conclude is a fair and equitable settlement of a most serious dispute, one that places in a fair position of rest the Treaty of 1818, concerning the interpretation of which so much difficulty has arisen. At the same time, we must express our belief and hope that, following in the wake of the treaty, we will have enlarged commercial relations with our neighbors. It is true that, in the search for a natural market, we do not find a natural market for all our products in the country further south; but, at the same time, we find there a natural market for a limited number of those products which it would be conducive to the best interests of the people of this country to cultivate. I trust, therefore, we will be successful in arranging for an extension of trade in this respect with our American friends. His Excellency has referred to the prosperity of the country. That, I think, is a matter upon which the Dominion, to-day, can be fairly congratulated. There are evidences of our prosperity in our own country, and there are evidences of that prosperity abroad. In visiting the various classes of our people, we must become convinced that we are enjoying a very widespread prosperity. If we visit our capitalists and our monetary institutions, we find that, with slight exceptions, they have enjoyed a prosperous year; if we visit our business men we find their credit unusually good and our manufacturers increasing their already extensive operations. We also find our artisans and laborers employed at rates of wages very much in advance of what was paid a few years ago. There is one fact to which I cannot help pointing, and that is the absence during this winter of the cries of want and misery we have so often heard during other winters from our cities. At the same time, we must regret that from abroad, from the cities of other countries, appeals for aid have come to our ears. At the present time, while, I understand, a million people are out of employment in Great Britain alone, hon. gentlemen on both sides must admit that in this country not very long willing hands wait for remunerative toil. The Toronto Mail was, I believe, correct a few months ago, when it said, if Canadians would only devote a little attention to the literature, so-called, of poverty in other countries, they would have a higher opinion of the condition of their own. It is true that since then the Mail has largely changed its sympathies, so far as the two political parties are concerned, but I would not suggest, for a moment, that the Mail was less honest in the expression of its opinions than it claims to be at present. Whilst I am dealing with this question, I might refer in words of commendation to the efforts which are being made by the Government for the extension of the trade of this country with various countries throughout the world. We all remember that last year we were congratulated upon the exhibit we made as a country at the Indian and Colonial Exhibition in London. We are glad to learn from our business men in various sections of the country that the result of that exhibit was to bring them trade which they did not enjoy before. We have sent a Commissioner to the Colonies in the Pacific Ocean, and that Commissioner reports that the chances are fair for a very large trade with the Colonies in that part of the Empire. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, a few years ago, there was an exhibition in Sydney, N.S.W., our exhibit at which was the beginning of our trade with the Australasian continent. We learn that there is to be shortly an exhibition at Melbourne, and I have no doubt that our Government, always seeking to extend our trade, will endeavor to obtain an exhibit there which will result in extending our trade connections with Australia and bring about an interchange of trade between us and those our sister Colonies. Then, we have taken steps to seek out a country in the South American continent, the Argentine Republic, a great prosperous country with five millions of people, whose wealth lies in the 100,000,000 sheep and 50,000,000 cattle that feed upon its plains. We find that their imports amount to some $90,000,000 of goods, $50,000,000 worth of which could be supplied from the workshops and factories of Canada, and I think that the Government, in seeking to extend our trade with that Republic, will meet with the approval of the various sections of this country. When I was in the Pacific Province, I was glad to see, as one of the results of the completion of our Canadian Pacific Railway, the shipping of China and Japan resting in the beautiful harbor of the city of Vancouver, bringing the products of the Orient to this continent, and carrying away the lumber and timber from the wonderful forests of the Pacific coast and the agricultural products of our Canadian North-West. It is true that, owing to the nature of these peoples, we may not be able to cultivate that trade as rapidly as we would like, or as rapidly as we might expect otherwise, but I think we are none too hopeful when we say that only a few years must elapse before we shall supply a great portion of what those hundreds of millions of people consume in those two great Eastern Empires. Even now, as I speak, are being built, in the shipyards of the Clyde, steamers for the Pacific trade. I remember that, a few years ago, we congratulated ourselves upon having a line of steamships crossing the Atlantic Ocean. But to-day, Sir, the traveller may, from the ports of the old world, cross the Atlantic upon elegant Canadian steamers. He may flit across the continent in palace cars, over a railroad built by Canadian enterprise, and traversing from the Atlantic to the Pacific nothing but Canadian soil; and in the near future, in a few months, we hope that he will be able to continue his journey across the Pacific Ocean to the ports of China and Japan and the shores of the Island continent itself. A moment ago I incidentally mentioned the city of Vancouver. I must congratulate my hon. friend who comes from that district upon representing a constituency which contains the best evidence of Canadian energy and enterprise. A few years ago a great forest covered its site. Now, anyone who enters its limits will find a magnificent city with miles of well-paved streets, dozens of magnificent business blocks and innumerable well-built homes, having every evidence of culture and refinement. While I have been speaking of this general prosperity of the country, hon. gentlemen may say that I have not spoken of the prosperity of the farmers of Canada. I admit very freely that an effort has been made to discourage our agriculturists in this country, but let me ask in what way are our agriculturists not prosperous, and what agriculturists under the sun are more prosperous than the Canadian farmers at the present time? Let me refer to the condition of the farmers in two great countries at the present hour. The New York Times, which has not very marked sympathy with Canada, tells us that :

"The profit derived from American agriculture is now so small as to be unworthy of the slightest consideration."

And the position of farmers in the great mother country is such as to call from Her Majesty in Her Speech to the British Parliament, the following words:—

"I deeply regret that there has been no corresponding improvement observable in the condition of agriculture. I commend the interests of that great industry to your attentive care, hoping that means may be discovered to enable it to meet more effectively the difficulties under which it labors."

In view of the state of agriculture in England and in the United States, it is pleasing to hear one of the professors in the Agricultural College of the Province of Ontario stating that our farmers as a class are prosperous and are making money. But I need not quote the testimony of any particular gentleman as to that fact. Hon. gentlemen who represent agricultural constituencies will bear me out in what I say. It has been stated that our farmers are for the most part mortgage-burdened. I do not speak for the constituencies of those members who assert that the farmers are mortgage-burdened, but, having the honor to represent the county of Haldimand, an agricultural county, I emphatically deny that the farmers there are a mortgage-burdened community. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have visited that community during the past year—and I may say, by the way, that we have had a number of those visitors—will, I am sure, agree with me that they found there evidences of wealth and prosperity. I believe that what is true of Haldimand is also true of other constituencies in this Province. It is true that we have some mortgages, but the latest returns show us that throughout the Dominion we have mortgages only to the amount of $31,798,288, which, if they were placed wholly on the farms of Ontario, would be only 9 per cent. of the value of the same. Take for a moment the figures in regard to ten States of the American Union, which show the following as the mortgages in those States:—

Ohio	$ 761,000,000
Indiana.....	398,000,000
Illinois.....	620,000,000
Wisconsin.....	250,000,000
Michigan.....	350,000,000
Minnesota.....	175,000,000
Iowa.....	351,000,000
Nebraska.....	140,000,000
Kansas.....	200,000,000
Missouri.....	237,000,000
	$3,422,000,000

That shows a total mortgage liability of $3,422,000,000 on the whole value of the property of $13,931,000,000, or an average of about 25 per cent. on the value of the farm properties in those ten States. The percentage in Ohio is 25, in Illinois it is 25 per cent., in Missouri it is 30 per cent., and so it ranges from 20 to 30 per cent. We have heard a great deal about Dakota. Sometimes some Canadian journals have lauded the condition of the farmers of Dakota. In that Territory they have a population of 600,000, and they have $45,000,000 of mortgages, or $75 for each individual and $375 for each family, and that not on the rate of 6 or 7 per cent., but at the rate of 10 per cent. in almost every case almost every time. Then, take the State of Michigan, with which the Province of Ontario can be very fairly compared, and you find that they have farm property to the value of $1,400,000,000, of which $700,000,000 is encumbered, with mortgages to the amount of $350,000,000, or 25 per cent. of the total value of the farm property in the State. But hon. gentlemen will say, perhaps, that we should take the State of New York, which may be more fairly compared with our own Province of Ontario. I shall not trouble you with the figures, but simply an expression contained in a report of the New York Department of Agriculture with regard to the State of New York. Let me read it all, because it will have a favorable influence upon those gentlemen who think that in the State of New York the farmers are more prosperous than they are in our good Province of Ontario :

" On the whole, New York farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago. There are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which, on an average, is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of the buildings and other improvements, owing to the shrinkage."

Now, then, Sir, hon. gentlemen may say that this large sum of mortgages has been placed on the farms of various States of the Union for the purpose of making improvements, or of purchasing new land. Well, I will not give my own opinion upon that question, but I will give the opinion of the New York Times, which deals with that question, lately, in a long article. It says :

" The greater portion of the money represented by the faces of these mortgages has not been expended in improving farms, because the larger portion of the farms were equipped with buildings before the mortgages were laid. The money has been spent to enable the farmers to live. Ten States mortgaged for $3,422,000,000, and twenty-eight States and eight Territories to hear from. We personally know that all the agricultural Territories are heavily mortgaged. The total of the farm mortgages of America undoubtedly closely approximates $9,000,000,000."

Now, Sir, it may be said that whilst our farms are not as largely mortgaged as the farms of the United States, at the same time our people seem less able to meet their engagements, and the property taken by the mortgage societies is increasing. Well, let me say that the Erie and Huron Loan and Investment Society, whose headquarters are in London, Ont., report that the arrearages are to-day only 4 per cent. of the capital invested, and that they are 22 per cent. less than they were on the 21st January, 1887; that only two-thirds of the 1 per cent. on the capital employed comes back in property to the company; and the farmers of the vicinity have placed in their hands over one million of dollars for the purpose of investment. Then, Sir, taking the report of the various loan societies in this Province I see that, in 1880, the mortgages in default amounted to over 8 per cent. of the whole. In 1886 only 3½ per cent. of the whole. The foreclosed mortgages in 1880 amounted to 4 per cent. of the whole, and in 1886 only 1½ per cent. of the whole. From these facts it may easily be seen that the condition of our farmers, unlike their brethren of the Empire State, is growing more prosperous as the years pass by. Another fact, and I leave this matter, feeling certain, Sir, that I have demonstrated to this House that our agriculturists occupy a position which might well be envied by their fellow farmers in whatever country. In Ontario the value of mortgaged property in 1886 increased, as compared with 1883, by $34,000,000, whilst the amount of mortgages only increased by $12,000,000. Now, I have dealt with the evidences of prosperity at home, let me deal for a moment with the evidences abroad. Hon. gentlemen need not be told that our Provincial securities are high in the foreign markets, nor need they be told that Dominion bonds, which a few years ago were only worth 88, are to-day worth 103. Let me, however, refer for a moment to the decrease in the rate of interest which we are compelled to pay, and to compare that with the decrease in the interest paid by other colonies. Since 1869 the interest upon British consols £100, has decreased 6s., that upon India bonds 11s. 3d., upon Cape Colony bonds £1 5s. 9d., New South Wales £1 12s. 9d., Victoria £1 10s. 9d., whilst the interest upon Canadian bonds has decreased £1 19s. 9d. This state of facts calls forth from the Toronto Globe, a paper which is not in the habit of painting too bright a picture with regard to Canada, the following expression :—

" Thus not only has the credit of Canada risen more than that of any other colony, or than that even of England herself, but the credit of Canada actually stands to-day on the British market next to that of India, which is, to some extent, guaranteed by Britain."

Mr. MONTAGUE.

So, when we come to consider all these facts, we see that His Excellency is abundantly justified in congratulating us in this country upon the prosperity we enjoy. But I may be told that, notwithstanding our seeming prosperity, we have a great debt hanging over our heads which is bringing to us impending ruin. I can only say that, looking at the figures, with regard to our credit in the money markets of the world, the financial kings of those markets must have adopted the idea of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when he presented to those people the silver lining of the shield, and explained, quite properly, that our public debt stood for the large amount of development that we have made and the large amount of public works which we have constructed in this country. Now, Sir, in face of all these facts, in face of the prosperity that we are enjoying, in face of the development that we have made in the few years since Confederation, we have no reason to be discouraged in the work we have undertaken, namely, to rear upon the foundations laid by the fathers, the framers of our Confederation, a great national superstructure, and I trust that, in this House, and at this hour, in view of our achievements in the past, are to be found none who would discourage us in the work we have undertaken. There was a time in this country when, under less favorable circumstances, the pioneers might have become discouraged in the struggle in which they were engaged, but they manfully continued the struggle, and the result of their labors is seen in the great heritage which we enjoy at the present time. I think, Sir, it ill becomes us, their successors, to weary in the struggle we have taken up, where they have dropped the implements of toil. It is, at the present time, encouraging to see that this feeling is widespread, and that everywhere there is a feeling of hopefulness, a feeling of confidence from end to end of the country. It is pleasant to know that among the younger members of our population is being developed a feeling of Canadian nationalism, and it is that feeling only which can assist us in fulfilling the great destiny which is reserved to us. This feeling should pervade all classes of our population. No matter what blood flows in our veins, we are Canadians; no matter to what country we look with pride as the home of our fathers, it is to this country that we owe first and last our devotion. No matter to what Province we may turn with loving thoughts of home, true patriotism will impel us to remember that we are citizens of a country stretching from the shores of one ocean and reaching to the shores of another. I say, Sir, if we are to fulfil our destiny, it can only be by this feeling increasing, by the fusion of the various parts into one great and harmonious whole; it can only be by the Provinces uniting one with the other, giving up the individual for the general weal; it can only be by section joining section, by sect vying with sect in loyalty to the Constitution under which we all enjoy the perfection of Christian liberty; it can only be by the representatives of the various nationalities which go to form our five millions of people joining their hearts and their hands in promoting the welfare of the land, upon whose hospitable shores all find a welcome to full, free citizenship, the enjoyment of political liberties and happy homes. Sir, I beg to thank hon. members on both sides of this House for the kindness and consideration they have extended to me, and to conclude by moving :

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General to thank His Excellency for his gracious Speech at the commencement of the present Session, and further to assure His Excellency :—

1. That we receive with much pleasure His Excellency's expression of gratification at meeting us once more at the commencement of the Parliamentary Session, and of congratulation upon the general prosperity of the country.

2. That we are glad to learn that, although the labors of the husbandman have not been rewarded in some portions of the Dominion by an adequate return, the harvest of last year has, on the whole, been plenteous, while in Manitoba and the North-West Territories it was one of remarkable abundance.

3. That we are pleased to be informed that the negotiations between Her Majesty's Government and that of the United States for the adjustment of what is known as "The Fishery Question," have resulted in a Treaty which we venture to hope, with His Excellency, may be considered by us as honorable and satisfactory to both nations.

4. That we thank His Excellency for his assurance that the Treaty, with the papers and correspondence relating thereto, will be laid before us, and that any measure to give effect to its provisions will receive our careful consideration.

5. That we learn with interest that the extension and development of our system of railways have not only rendered necessary additional safeguards for life and property, but have given greater frequency to questions in which the interests of rival companies are found to be in conflict, and to require authoritative adjustment; and that as further legislation appears to be needed for these purposes, any measure submitted to us for the consolidation and improvement of "The Railway Act" will be carefully considered by us.

6. That we thank His Excellency for informing us that experience has shown that amendments are required to make the provisions of the Act respecting Elections of Members of the House of Commons more effective and more convenient in their operation, and that we will carefully consider any measure submitted to us for the amendment of that Statute.

7. That we will willingly consider any measure laid before us for the amendment of the Act respecting Controverted Elections, with a view to the removal of certain questions of interpretation which have arisen and which should be set at rest.

8. That we are pleased to learn that His Excellency's Government has availed itself of the opportunity afforded by the recess to consider the numerous suggestions which have been made for improving the details of the Act respecting the Electoral Franchise, and that any measure submitted to us for the purpose of simplifying the law and greatly lessening the cost of its operation, will receive our earnest attention.

9. That His Excellency having been pleased to inform us that the growth of the North-West Territories renders expedient an improvement in the system of government and legislation affecting that portion of the Dominion, any Bill for that purpose laid before us will be earnestly considered.

10. That we will carefully consider any Bill submitted to us to make a larger portion of the modern laws of England applicable to the Province of Manitoba, and to the North-West Territories, in regard to matters which are within the control of the Parliament of Canada, but which have not, as yet, been made the subject of Canadian legislation.

11. That His Excellency may rest assured that all measures laid before us, especially Bills relating to the Judiciary, to the Civil Service Act, and to the audit of the Public Accounts, will receive our earnest attention.

12. That we thank His Excellency for informing us that the Accounts for the past year will be laid before us, and that we shall respectfully consider the Estimates for the ensuing year; and that our thanks are due to His Excellency for the information that they have been prepared with a due regard to economy and the requirements of the public service.

13. That His Excellency may rest assured that these important subjects, and all matters affecting the public interests which may be brought before us, will receive our best consideration, and that we thank His Excellency for the expression of his confidence in our readiness to address ourselves to them with earnestness and assiduity.

Mr. JONCAS. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, on rising to second the proposition of my hon. and eloquent friend, the member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague), I cannot refrain from a certain feeling of apprehension which one naturally experiences on being called for the first time to take part in the debates of this House. Had I consulted only my incompetence to treat the important questions which will come up for deliberation during the present Session, I should assuredly have held myself aloof, but, aware that the spirit of indulgence animates all the members of this honorable House, I take heart at this knowledge and feel reassured by the kind welcome which you have just given me. I eagerly join my hon. friend from Haldimand (Mr. Montague) in his regret at the departure from among us of His Excellency the Governor General, and, in the name of the French Canadian population of the Dominion, I am certain that I echo their sentiments when I declare that this departure is viewed by them with sorrow. In summarising and discussing, with his usual eloquence and skill, the several paragraphs of the Speech from the Throne, the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) has singularly lightened my task, and I have comparatively little to add to his remarks. It is the rule, Mr. Speaker, at the opening of a Session of this Parliament, in good years as in evil, in years of dearth as in the years of plenty, to hear those who are commissioned to propose the adoption of an Address in reply to the Speech of His Excellency, declare that peace and prosperity prevail in our country, but there perhaps never was a time when such a declaration was better justified by facts than on this occasion. Our agriculture has not, in a long time, been more productive, our commerce more flourishing, and our industries more thrifty than they are at present. Thanks to the political system whose device is "Canada for Canadians," our manufacturers expand the range of their operations, employ a larger number of hands, enhance the case and contribute a more powerful argument in favor of the wisdom of that policy of protection which has created the wealth and strength of many other countries, and which assures the Canadian Confederation a brilliant future. There is further ground for congratulation, Mr. Speaker, in the intelligence that the sole cloud which darkened our political sky last year is on the eve of disappearing, if it has not already vanished out of sight. There is ground for trust, that the Imperial Parliament, the Congress of the United States, and the Parliament of Canada, will ratify the clauses of the treaty which has just been signed by the gentlemen charged with the duties of the Commission at Washington. The treaty which will be laid upon the Table of this House, probably to-day, for ratification, will furnish proof that the line of conduct, wise, prudent and energetic, followed by the Government, in pursuit of a satisfactory settlement of this knotty fisheries question, deserves the general approval of this House and of the country. The secrets of the future are unknown to me, but the action of the Government inspires me with confidence. I have reason to rest satisfied with the present condition of this question, and I have no doubt that they who assumed the burdensome mission of going to defend our cause at the Washington conference, made sure that, while sturdily guarding our naval interests, they screened us from conflicts detrimental to the general economy of our Confederation. I speak of the energetic defence of our naval interests, because, Mr. Speaker, whether viewed from the national standpoint, the standpoint of economy or the standpoint of business relations, the fisheries of Canada are of the highest importance. I do not hesitate to repeat before this House what I have already stated several times before, and do not apprehend that I shall be charged with exaggeration when I say that the Confederation of Canada is in possession of the richest and most extensive fishing fields of the whole world. As national domain, their value is priceless; as a ground of exploration thrown open to commerce and to the spirit of enterprise and industry, they are well nigh exhaustless, and further, furnish our people a plentiful and cheap food, easily accessible to all. If we examine the pages of history, Mr. Speaker, we find that, in all ages, the nations holding the sea coasts and the people dwelling by the sea, have understood the importance of their fisheries, and those who have worked them have become prosperous, and successful in war and traffic. We see that the most famous and prosperous nations are those who pursue navigation and the fisheries, and that the most prosperous are they who trace their origin from their fishermen. Tyre, Venice, Byzantium, and the Constantinople of to-day were celebrated among the cities of ancient times, and they owed their fame, their power, and their wealth, only to the fishermen who had pitched their tents either on the shores of the Adriatic Sea or on the Straits between the Black Sea and the Mediterranean. Who does not know the important part played by Holland, in Europe, during the sixteenth century? Who does recall the high deeds of renowned Dutch admirals in those days? And to whom is Holland indebted for this fame if not to her fishermen, who became great sailors, and to her fisheries which made her one of the richest nations on the globe? More recently we behold the English, the French, the Norwegians and the Spaniards take an active part in fisheries, with an ardor of rivalry, not alone with the view of nourishment and trade, but especially to preserve the mastery of the seas. And this day, if Britain is the first naval nation in the world, if her commerce is the most outspread, its colonial possessions the vastest and the most important, does she not owe this almost incalculable wealth, according to the opinion of her most distinguished statesmen, to the importance of her fisheries which are the foundation of her present prosperity? And where does the English navy recruit its best sailors, if not among that hardy people, among those bold fishermen who, brought up, as it were, in a fishing-boat are, from infancy, accustomed to face with calm the perils of the ocean and to regard as their territory and their own property the several seas that are crossed by English men of war and merchantmen? And, Mr. Speaker, when we consider the thousands of miles of marine coasts which offer inexhaustible riches to our toil, the 100,000 seamen who, in our young country, are already directly or indirectly employed in the fisheries; when we witness the energy, hardihood and skill of our fishermen, as many of us have had personal opportunity of doing, I cannot help believing that the future, the future more especially of the Provinces of Nova Scotia, Quebec, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island—perhaps, in their whole extent, not as adapted to tilling as our western Provinces—depends in a great measure on the encouragement and protection which we will give our naval population, and that one of the chief sources of our national prosperity is to be found in the depths of the seas, whose value we may not have sufficiently known and appreciated. We are informed by the distinguished writer, Lacépède:

"The fisheries preceded the tillage of the field. It is proper to civilised peoples, and so far from being opposed to the progress of farming, to trade and manufactures, it increases the fruits of the latter.

"If in the beginning of societies, fishing afford men, still half savage, a sufficient and wholesome food, if it teaches them not to fear the danger of the deep, if it makes sailors of them, it gives to more advanced people plentiful harvests for the needs of the poor, varied tributes for the luxuries of the rich, choice preparations for commerce abroad, fertile composts for barren fields. It forces men to cross the seas, to brave the ice of the poles, to stand the fires of the equator, to struggle against storms, and it breeds experienced seamen, bold tradesmen and doughty warriors."

All nations that figure to-day at the head of progress, civilisation and commerce, and, in special, the British, the French, the Dutch, the Americans, the Norwegians and others, attribute and attach as much importance to the products of the sea as they do to the products of the land, and this importance is due not only to the immense riches which may be drawn from the depth of the sea, without visibly draining its supply, but because the fisheries are a school like to no other for a large number of solid men, schooled against danger, skilled in trade during times of peace, and among whom their country will always find valiant defenders in the day of national peril. Bounded on the north by the Arctic Ocean, on the east by the Atlantic Ocean, and on the west by the Pacific Ocean, Canada can boast, Mr. Speaker, of at least 10,000 miles of naval coast, bordered by waters rich in marketable fish of all kinds. It is to these splendid fisheries that our neighbors of the American Union desired to have access. They pretended to have, equally with ourselves, the right to draw from this well of richness. The fact that the Americans have always held, with steadfastness, to a common right and privilege of working these fisheries, the eagerness which they always manifested to obtain the enjoyments of these extensive and lucrative privileges, are so many proofs of the importance of their possession, and their manufacturing and commercial value. We owe a debt of acknowledgment, Mr. Speaker, to the present Government for having understood the importance and value of this national property, and having employed the means of defending it against the encroachments of our neighbors, without ceasing, however, to maintain the good understanding which should never cease to exist between two nations having identical interests to shield and shelter. Although our fisheries are far from having acquired, as yet, all the development which is within them, the yearly product which, in 1870, was only $7,000,000, now rises almost to the sum of $20,000,000. And yet, although the extensive organisation of our Department of Fisheries, and our mode of collecting statistical information are cited as models, our system, as indeed all those of the same sort elsewhere, is deficient in several respects, and one can easily understand that in a country vast and extensive as is Canada where every dweller on the sea-shore, or the lake shore—these lakes a real inland seas. Can, on stepping a few feet away from his door, draw food for his family, it is impossible for our statistical writers to make reports with mathematical accuracy. Thus these $20,000,000, just mentioned, do not represent, so to speak, the value of the fish prepared for the market only. It would be necessary to add to this amount the value of the fish taken for local consumption, and even the fish taken in Canadian waters by foreign fishermen, especially of the neighboring republic. Thus, as was said by my hon. friend, the member for Northumberland, (Mr. Mitchell), when he presided, with equal talent and honor to himself and his country, over the destinies of the Department of Marine and Fisheries of Canada, whether we consider them from the standpoint of the extent, importance, and abundance of food which they afford, as from the point of view of their still greater value as resources susceptible of constantly increasing development and unlimited production, the fisheries of the Canadian coasts are a national property at once precious and enduring. These fisheries annually employ a capital of several millions of dollars, give occupation and the means of livelihood to hundreds of thousands of persons, favors the development of our commercial marine and our foreign trade, keeps ever in activity and ready for use a plucky and stalwart race of sailors, and for these reasons, they deserve our serious attention, an enlightened appreciation, and a protection commensurate with their value and their importance. And still, Mr. Speaker, while acknowledging their whole value and their importance, we should claim from the Government full protection for our fisheries. But we have not the right, however, to ask that greater interests should be sacrificed to this protection. Neither must we overlook the fact—indeed we should seriously consider it—that it is altogether in our interests to maintain, with the 60,000,000 inhabitants of the neighboring republic, the most friendly relations possible in all manner of commercial affairs. Neither must we forget that a continuation of the strained relations existing last year between the United States and Canada, might give rise to serious conflicts and work immense harm to the business of both countries. This has been properly understood by the members of the present Administration, who have surely a right, not only to the greetings, but also to the gratitude of the country. It is a clear case, Mr. Speaker, that to remove the uneasy feeling arising out of the interpretation of the Treaty of 1818, and reaching an understanding on a question which placed so many interests at stake, mutual concessions were imperative, but the debate on the clauses of the treaty which we shall be called upon to ratify, will show that we have not conceded too much; that we have yielded nothing of major importance, and that the complaints already put forth in certain quarters are not well founded. Representing in this House a county deeply interested in the protection of the fisheries, I should be the first to withdraw my support from the Government if I thought that they had sacrificed us in the Washington Commission; but I am happy to be able to proclaim my satisfaction and to state that the interests of my constituents have been guarded by this treaty which is dispel to develop the relations between the two countries and despite an element of serious and dangerous conflict which might have brought on grave complications, and compromise the peace necessary to the advancement of our young country and the development of its immense resources. The revision and amendment of the laws relating to our railways, the Act concerning the Election of Members to the House of Commons, the Controverted Elections Act, the Civil Service Act, the Electoral Franchise Act, and the improvement in the system of Government in the North-West, are all important questions which will occupy our attention. The very considerable increase in the population of the Canadian North-West, and its rapid development will entail not only important amendments, but even an almost radical change in the existing laws in order to harmonise them with the new conditions into which the country has entered in late years. With respect to the laws affecting the election of members of this House, if experience has proved the need of modifying them, to render their administration more effective and easy, we should not be blind to the circumstance, Mr. Speaker, that several of the trials for the invalidation of elections, held during the recess, have brought to light a lamentable state of things, and I feel convinced that every member of the House will back the Government in its attempts to stay this flood of corruption which threatens to invade our electoral body and constitutes a real danger for the future of our Parliamentary institutions. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I beg to thank you and this House for the kind attention and the tokens of sympathy which you have been pleased to impart to me.

Mr. LAURIER. Mr. Speaker: I am entrusted by Her Majesty's Opposition in this House to present the views of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House on the questions suggested by the Speech from the Throne. Before I proceed I am sure the House will bear with me if I pause to give expression to the inexpressible regret felt by the Opposition in this House, and largely shared, I am confident, by hon. gentlemen on the other side, that the seat of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) is still vacant by reason of ill-health. I am sure that everyone will agree with me that at any time Canada could ill afford to lose the services of one of views so broad and of abilities pre-eminent, and I am sure also that on the present occasion when so many important questions are looming up for discussion and determination, the absence of the hon. gentleman from his seat will be felt as a national calamity. It is a more pleasant duty to me, Sir, to offer to the mover and seconder of the Address my hearty congratulations, if they will accept them from me, on the very able manner in which they have discharged what is always a very difficult task. I am sorry to say, and perhaps I will not surprise them or any hon. member in this House, if I state at once that I cannot agree in everything they have said; but there is one thing upon which I can cordially agree with them, and it is one on which everybody, not only in this House but in the country at large, will agree with them, in the gracious tribute which both of those hon. gentlemen paid to His Excellency the Governor General. Lord Lansdowne came here with an illustrious name, made illustrious, not only by his own career but by preceding generations of statesmen, and if I were to characterise, according to my own judgment, what has been his career in this country, I would say that it has been characterised all through by eminent wisdom, and when he leaves us—I am sure I am speaking the feelings of every Canadian when I say this—wherever he goes and wherever he may be he will carry with him our esteem and affection, and our hope of ever-increasing success for himself. Now, Sir, the Speech promises us several measures of legislation, some of which I am sure may prove very useful; but I am rather sceptical, judging of the future by the past, that many of them will come to anything like practical legislation, or, if they do, that they will be put into force. Last year, upon a similar occasion, the right hon. gentleman at the head of the Government stated that he did not share the opinion once expressed by his former colleague, Sir George E. Cartier, who on one occasion stated that he never would be satisfied until the only measure brought down by the Government of the day would be the Supply Bill. But, Sir, while the hon. gentleman protested against that course, in my humble opinion he was doing indirectly the very thing against which he was protesting. For instance, last year the Speech from the Throne stated:

"Your attention will be invited to the expediency of establishing a Department of Trade and Commerce under the supervision of a responsible Minister."

That statement was somewhat controverted by the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake), when reviewing the Speech—that is to say, he doubted the utility or expediency of establishing such a department, and the right hon. gentleman defended his measure, or rather his contemplated measure, with some warmth and vigor. The right hon. gentleman gave his reason for this new departure in the following language:—

"I was not prepared for the sneer of the hon. gentleman as to one of the modes which had been adopted by the Government for the development of the trade and commerce of the country. The hon. gentleman says he hopes there are some other steps to be taken than that of taking a new departure. The hon. gentleman must know that from year to year the different Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade of Canada have been representing to the different Governments of the country, have been petitioning for the establishment of such a department as is proposed, and for the appointment of a Minister specially charged with the interests of trade and the development of the commerce of the Dominion. I have evidence of this desire from every great city in Canada, and from every great commercial body formed for the purpose of aiding in the development of trade, and in obedience to this universal cry the Government have resolved to establish a department especially devoted to those subjects."

That measure was brought down, it was carried and is now on the Statute-book. But, Sir, I vainly look over the Treasury benches to see the Minister who is to take charge of trade and look after the interests of commerce. It would seem as if the Government, as soon as they had resolved to carry out the wishes of the trade and establish a department specially devoted to that purpose, had exhausted their energies. I will not make any odious comparisons, but I will say that in my opinion that the way of the Government seems to be paved with good intentions, but is deficient in good deeds. I ask, what can the matter be? Am I to suppose, I think I am forced to suppose, that the Government have come to the conclusion expressed by Mr. Blake, that the formation of the new department was inexpedient. If I must not believe that, what am I to believe? I would have to believe that this apparent desire to meet the wishes of trade and commerce was nothing else than a blind for the passing of a measure of patronage which might be kept for an emergency; or, perhaps, I would have to believe that the representations of the commercial bodies having once met with the consideration of the Government were returned to the pigeon-holes and there forgotten, and treated with no more respect than if they had come from Indians or Half-breeds. Again, upon the same occasion we were told in the Speech from the Throne:

"You will also be asked to consider the propriety of making such improvements in the organisation of the Departments of Justice, Customs and Inland Revenue as will provide greater facilities for the dispatch of the large and increasing volume of business with which those departments are charged."

But it turned out, when matters were developed, that the improvement so far as regards the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, was that the Minister of Customs and Minister of Inland Revenue were to be improved out of existence. I am glad to see, and I say it in all sincerity, that the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue have both their heads solid on their shoulders. But again I ask, what can the matter be?—what is the reason that, when, last year, it was in the public interest, that those hon.

gentlemen should be improved out of existence, they still are in existence? Are we to suppose again that on this occasion the public weal has been sacrificed for private convenience? There was another measure proposed: an improvement was to be made in the Department of Justice, an improvement which turned out to be the appointment of a Solicitor General. You are aware, Mr. Speaker, that not the slightest word of objection was offered on this side of the House to that measure; on the contrary, it has been for a great many years the opinion on this side of the House that the appointment of such an officer was requisite in the public interest, and, indeed, this was one of the measures brought down by the Mackenzie Administration when they were in power. I am aware that the measure at that time, though it is now acknowledged to be in the public interest, was bitterly assailed, combined though it was with another measure, that is to say a measure for the suppression of the office of Receiver General, which would have made the new office cast no additional burdens on the revenue of the country. That measure was bitterly assailed and finally it was defeated, if I remember rightly, in the other House. But after ten years the Government took up those two measures, and I am glad to say that the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), who I am also sorry to say is kept away from his seat by ill-health, has received the fullest vindication at the hands of its own adversaries, those who opposed it with great vigor at that time; and I can add that this is not the only instance where the course and policy of the hon. gentleman has been vindicated, and the people are commencing to appreciate the value of the services which he gave to the country, and to realise that the most valuable public servant is not he who panders to popular prejudices, but he who seeks to carry out true principles, though they may fail to give him victory, but lead him into defeat. It was in the public interest last year that we should have a Solicitor General; yet this year we have no such officer. Again I ask, what can be the matter? The ministerial press told us, if I recollect correctly, and prominent supporters of the Government told us, that the right hon. gentleman was feeling the pulse of the constituencies to see whether the country was favorable to such an office; whether the pulse was responsive or not we do not know. But here is the fact, that three measures which were brought down last year in the public interest, and which were placed upon the Statute-book, are still inoperative. Again I ask, what can the matter be? If those measures were brought down simply as adornments of the Speech from the Throne, I prefer the frank statement of Sir George Cartier, who said that he would not be satisfied until the Speech from the Throne contained nothing but the Supply Bill; if, on the other hand, those measures were brought down in the public interest, the Government is censurable for not having acted upon them. Several measures which are to be brought down this year will certainly, if they are carried out, prove to be of interest and value to the country. The election law is unsatisfactory as it is, and ought to be amended, and I hope the first amendment which will be made to that law will be one depriving the Government of the power they have to-day of selecting the returning officers, and embodying the principle that the man who is to stand as umpire between contending parties should not be selected at the bidding of the candidate, as has often been the case in the past, but should be a permanent officer of the law, as in every other country. With regard to the Controverted Elections Act, we have certainly seen enough during the recess to convince us that it requires improvement, for we have found judges in Ontario, in Quebec and in New Brunswick differing from each other as to the proper interpretation of the Act, and it is time for us to try to settle by legislation the questions which jurisprudence has not been able to settle, with regard to the Franchise Act. That Act has certainly a very checkered career. It was passed in 1885, put in operation in 1886, suspended in 1887, and is to be amended in 1888; and I express the hope—I do not know whether it will be fulfilled or not—that it will be repealed in 1889. Sir, the more that Act is discussed, the more apparent I believe it will become that the principle advocated by the Opposition is the true principle, namely, that the franchise should be left to be fixed by the different Provinces, because the franchise is a complex question, the application of which must vary according to the education, the manners and the habits of the people of the different Provinces. With regard to the Fisheries Treaty, I think it is premature to discuss that question at this moment, and I am not going to express any opinion upon it just now. The Speech expresses the hope that the treaty will be found to be honorable and satisfactory to both nations. Well, Sir, I will only say that I hope it may, but I would not be led to that conclusion by a perusal of the blue-book which was issued by the Government, and the most admirable Minutes of Council which were prepared and sent to England in support of our contention as to the interpretation of the Treaty of 1818. The Speech affirmed the great prosperity of the country, and both the mover and the seconder of the Address have devoted the greatest portion of their remarks to an emphatic demonstration of that assertion. Sir, I have always marvelled at the resolute tenacity with which ministerial orators continue to affirm, in spite of the facts, that the country is prosperous. I make the completely contrary assertion—I say that to-day the country, far from being prosperous, is in the very reverse condition.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes. I say there never has been a time in the history of Canada when the agricultural classes, who form the bulk of this nation, have been in so depressed a condition as they are in to-day. The truth is, there is to-day a general feeling of discontent, and a desire for something to turn up which will remove the agricultural depression which exists. My hon. friend the member for Halimand (Mr. Montague) quoted statistics to prove that we are prosperous; but if we are, why is it that hundreds of Canadians are turning their backs on this prosperity? How is it that, day after day, hundreds and thousands of our people are leaving that prosperity to seek homes on the other side of the line? The permanent exodus from which this country is suffering is the best evidence that this prosperity, of which ministerial orators so frequently talk, exists only in their mouths; and against the boasting and self-glorification which we constantly hear from them, the 1,000,000 Canadians who are to-day living on the soil of the United States are a living protest. I can understand emigration from distressed Ireland, from over-populated England, from Scandinavia, and from Germany, where the people are crushed by the iron heel of a military despotism; but why is it, I ask, that this free country cannot keep its native population at home? The reason is not to be found in the country itself; it is as good a country as can be found under the sun; but the reason is in the vicious economical system which exists, and it cannot be found in anything else. It has been our aim for many years past to open to settlement the vast and fertile fields which we possess. We have sent agents to Europe who have not painted our country in the black colors in which the hon. member for Halton said it was painted by American agents. We have sent agents to Europe who have done their best to bring immigrants to this country, and to a certain extent they have succeeded. Immigrants have been brought here, but where are the settlers? Not only immigrants, but our own people are deserting in scores, and hundreds and thousands, and what can the cause be if it is not to be found in the vicious economical system which we have followed for several years? By the fruits ye shall know the tree, and what are the fruits of this tree? Rings, monopolies and combinations, which increase the wealth of individuals at the expense of the community—rings and combinations by which greedy men secure by law from foreign competition, are holding the people of this country in their claws, and wringing from them—out of their bread, their fuel, their very necessaries of life—an unfair and illegitimate gain. That is the position of affairs, and that position cannot be long tolerated. I say it is the duty of the people of this country and of Parliament to apply themselves at once to the consideration of the condition of this country, and to take steps to put an end to that condition. We must go further—we must also do something to put an end to the emigration from the country; we must find the means of keeping in our own country our own population with which God has blessed us. It is not only general considerations of policy, but even financial reasons that should make us feel bound to take that course, because to-day we are saddled with financial liabilities which we have incurred under the expectation that we should have in the country not only our own population but a large influx of foreign population. It is a matter of history, which cannot be contradicted, that the people of this country would never have consented to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, had they been led to understand the cost of it would have to be defrayed by increased taxation. While they were willing to build the road, they always insisted that its construction, whether rapid or slow, should not anticipate, but should go on concomitant with our power of bearing taxation. They always insisted that the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, whether rapid or gradual, should keep pace with the resources of the country. That condition was expressed in Parliament again and again. We find it expressed in the very first Act passed, the Act of 1872. In that Act it was provided:

“Whereas the House of Commons of Canada resolved during the said last Session that the said railway should be constructed and worked as a private enterprise and not by the Dominion Government, and that the public aid to be given to such undertaking should consist of such liberal grants of lands, and such subsidies, in money or otherwise, without increasing the present rate of taxation, as the Parliament of Canada should thereafter determine.”

Such was the very first, the initial step, taken in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Two years later, after a change of Government and also after a change of policy, when the Government undertook to build the railway themselves, they determined that it should be built exactly upon the same lines—that is to say, without increasing taxation. After reciting the history of the case, the resolution goes on to say:

“And whereas it is proper to make provision for the construction of the said work as rapidly as the same can be accomplished without further raising the rate of taxation.”

Two years later this feeling was so much ingrained in the minds of the people that it was thought proper, when a sum of money was required, to go on with the construction of the road, that is to say the preliminary work, to add the following rider to the proposition:

“While granting this sum, this House desires to record its view that the arrangements for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway should be such as the resources of the country will permit without increasing the existing rates of taxation.”

There cannot, therefore, be any doubt at all that the object of the Canadian people ever was to keep the cost of construction of the railway within the existing taxation of the country, and to prevent its being made an additional burden. To-day, however, despite this oft-reiterated desire, the people find themselves saddled with an enormous debt, and that in the teeth of these resolutions which still stand upon our Statute-books as the law of the land. Though this law has never been superseded, the resistance of the people was overcome. And how? It was overcome by the delusive promises and by the fallacious statements that the rapid construction of the railway would bring such an influx of population into our territory that there would be no necessity to increase taxation. I beg the House to keep this fact well in mind: that one of the conditions under which the railway was built was the expectation of the people that its construction would bring so great an influx of population into our unsettled North-West, that the cost would not bear upon the people. That was the statement made by the right hon. gentleman himself. He stated, in 1880, after he had come back to power, that, for that year, he calculated the number of immigrants who would come in our North-West, would be 25,000; he calculated upon an increase of 25,000 for the following year, and so on until 1890. Here is the very language he made use of:

“Then we calculate that as 25,000 people will go in this year, we may add, each year, an increase of 5,000, so that we may expect 30,000 to go in next year. This is a very small percentage, if we look to the results from railway enterprise in the United States. We assume, therefore, an increase of 5,000 a year till 1890, and expect in that year 75,000 settlers in our North-West. I think that is a very moderate estimate. On those figures the estimate of the total cash revenue to be received for the lands by 1890, is $38,593,000.”

Then he went on to say what would be the revenue not collected, and he estimated it for mortgages on pre-emptions $16,430,000, mortgages on railway lands, $16,272,000, making a total of $71,395,000 upon which to put the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The calculation would have been perfectly right and legitimate had the expectations of the right hon. gentleman proved true. If we had received immigrants at the rate of 25,000 a year, if we had received something like these figures, nothing could be said against this policy now. If to-day, though we have not reached 1890, we could depend on something approaching those figures, the calculation of the hon. gentleman would have proved true, and the people would have not more taxation to bear than they had formerly. True the hon. gentleman was good enough to deduct from his estimate $2,000,000 for expenses in collecting the $72,000,000, leaving at least $69,000,000 available cash to meet the liabilities incurred by the country in the construction of the road. Some time later, the then Minister of Railways (Sir Charles Tupper) dilated upon the same idea. He did not altogether corroborate the figures of the right hon. gentleman—I do not mean to say that he at all controverted them—but he went on to another side of the argument, and said that the increase of population would, in all probability—not in all probability, but certainly—bring into the Treasury $60,000,000 Customs revenue received from those immigrants. He said:

“But supposing the land does not give us that, we have an authority which hon. gentlemen will accept, that the Customs revenue from the people who will go into the country during the next ten years will furnish the interest on $60,000,000.”

Well, the census of Manitoba, and the census of the North-West Territories have dispelled all those great expectations; and as to the sale of the lands, instead of receiving $60,000,000 or $70,000,000, we have received, from 1880 to 1886, just $4,351,515.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is about as near as he generally gets.

Mr. LAURIER. That is not yet all received, because out of that we have to deduct $3,500,000, for surveys and expenses connected with the surveys, which leaves the small amount of $700,000 or $800,000, and if from that we deduct the other expenses, we will find that absolutely nothing is left. So that of all the great expectations we were deluded with as to the $70,000,000, which was to go into the Treasury to defray the taxation of the people, we have not yet received one cent nor can we depend upon receiving one cent. The result is that while it was contemplated that the construction of the road would not increase the taxation of the country, while the wish of the people was that their taxation should not be increased, they have, to-day, to meet that extra taxation without any of the resources upon which they depended at that time to meet the liabilities. Now, this is an important matter. If we go on with our present population, if we keep on at the same figure, if, instead of increasing, our population is to continue leaving us by the scores and hundreds, the result cannot fail to be very serious. Should a commercial depression occur similar to that which took place some years ago, we would have to face the most serious crisis in our finances. The Speech goes on to deal with the good crop of Manitoba, and my hon. friend from Haldimand also dilated at some length on this subject. True, Manitoba, this year, has been blessed by a superabundant crop. But the blessing of God has been taken away by the hand of man. In what has the position of the people of Manitoba, to-day, with bountiful crops, been better than it was with the scanty crops of years past? Has it been better for their wheat to stand around the stations of the Canadian Pacific Railway, to be wasted by frost, by rain or by roving animals? The evils of monopoly, of which the people of Manitoba have been complaining for so many years, were never so apparent as they have been this year. In former years the monopoly worked to the injury of the people by the increase of prices, but this year the monopoly is sending to waste what it cannot carry. When the Canadian Pacific Railway contract was under discussion, it was felt that the monopoly clause was an evil, but it was distinctly provided that the monopoly was restricted to the Territories, and that it could not affect either the Province of Manitoba or the Province of Ontario, which were exempted by name. In the language of the First Minister, it was stated that they could not check Manitoba, that the legislative power was supreme in its sphere in each Province, and could not be interfered with; but afterwards, in violation of the pledge given to the country, Manitoba was checked and the monopoly was extended over the whole Province. That was not only a fault but a crime, and I say the conduct of the Government is beyond the expression of any adequate condemnation at this time. If we want to know how far the Government is guilty towards Manitoba, let us compare their own railway policy in other parts of the country with their policy in Manitoba. We have adopted a policy of subsidising railways. We have been subsidising all sorts of railways. We have made it part of our policy to subsidise all kinds of railways, from interprovincial lines, or international lines, down to small microscopical lines three miles long, and the reason which has been given has been that these lines were necessary for the development of the settlement of the country. Let me quote here the reason given by the Minister of Railways in introducing one of the Bills with which we have become so familiar. In 1886 he said:

"We find, particularly in the Province of Quebec, that this policy was necessary to restrict the emigration of our own people to the United States. It has been thrown to us across the House by the Opposition that we ought to do something to retain these people in this country, that we ought to be doing something further than building great lines of railway from one end to the other of the country."

So he admits that something must be done to keep our own people within our own limits. Then he says:

"The time is gone by when the country could be opened up by means of turnpike roads. What turnpike roads were to this country forty years ago, railways are to-day, so that there is no possibility of keeping our own people at home except by opening up the country by railways, so as to give them facilities for inter-communication."

Here the Government admit that railways are a necessity for the development of the country. The people of Manitoba are of the same mind with the hon. gentleman. They also believe that railways are a necessity to develop the settlement of the country. But what is the Government doing? While at one end of the country they subsidise railways with the idea that they will develop the settlement of the country, in Manitoba they crush every effort which is made by the people of that country to build railways for that purpose. Instances are not wanting in history where a tyrannical Government has wrung from the people the earnings obtained by their labor, but it was left for the Government of Canada to do its best and exert its power to crush and to stifle the energy and labor of the people of a Province. I think this is one of the worst forms of misgovernment which has ever been known in any country. When we have come to this point, when rings and combinations can take advantage of the law to oppress the people, when monopolies are protected by the direct interference of the Government, using and abusing the constitutional power given to them, when individuals are made wealthier at the expense of the community, when taxation has been unduly increased, and when the resources upon which we depended to meet the liability are dissipated, when our country is unable to retain its own population, I say the time has come for gentlemen on the other side to cease their boasting and self-glorification, and for the people of this country to open their eyes and say that a new departure must be made from the policy which we have been following for the last ten years. Further than this to-day I will not go. I have said that a change has become absolutely necessary to the well-being of this country. Further than that I will not go. I will follow the almost invariable practice of late years of not moving any amendment to the Address, and will wait for a future day to propose what, on this side of the House, we consider is necessary in the present condition of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As the hon. gentleman has announced that no amendment is to be moved, I may congratulate him on following out what, I think, is a very laudable practice in that regard, and it will not be necessary for me to occupy the time of the House very long in respect to his remarks. I congratulate him upon taking the position he now occupies, and upon the ability which he has displayed in his speech, which, instructive as it is in some parts, shows that he is going to fill that position worthily; and I hope and I believe that he and the leader for the present of the ministerial majority will preserve such relations as to the public business of the country as is usual in England and has been generally in Canada. While offering my sincere congratulations to the hon. gentleman on his appointment to the position he holds, I can agree with him that it is to be regretted on many accounts that the absence of Mr. Blake—we may use his name in his absence—has caused the hon. gentleman opposite to be elevated to his present position. Mr. Blake is a distinguished man, he is a man who would be a credit to any country, from his ability, from his eloquence and from his devotion to public affairs. We have not had the good fortune to agree in our political course from the time he entered Parliament, but I have at all times been ready to pay a just tribute to his great abilities and to the earnestness with which he has paid attention to public matters. I can also more than agree with the hon. gentleman and with my hon. friends behind me, in the regret which they have expressed as to the approaching departure of the present representative of the Sovereign in this country. He has won the hearts of the people of Canada, he has acted the part of a constitutional Governor; he has taken great interest in the development of the country, in all its material aspects and in the encouragement of the arts and mechanical development of the country, but more especially in literature, and all that tends to elevate a nation more than mere material prosperity. I, as having been his adviser during the whole of the period he has been in Canada, could speak much more strongly; I could attest to his devotion to his duties, to the earnestness with which he addressed himself to every subject of public interest, and more than all, to the great ability with which that earnestness was directed. I am greatly relieved from the necessity of answering my hon. friend opposite by the speeches of the mover and second to-day. They have discussed all these subjects and pressed them upon the consideration of the House in a manner which must meet with the general approbation of the majority of this House, and, I believe, with the approbation of the people of this country. They have shown, in contrast with the despondent wail of my hon. friend, despondent for very many causes—a very natural despondency—they have stated their opinion that this is a happy, that this is a prosperous, country, and that this is a satisfied and contented people. Mr. Speaker, at first, when the hon. gentleman began to speak, I thought the millennium had come, since the measures that were to be submitted so completely met his views, that as he had to make a speech, he addressed himself to the Speech from the Throne of last year. He told us that we were full of good intentions but that we did not carry those good intentions into execution. Well, among the good intentions which he desired to be carried into effect, is, in the first place, the establishment of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I thought for a few moments that he approved of that, because we were to cut off the heads of the Minister of Inland Revenue and the Minister of Customs. We ought to have done that, and yet the hon. gentleman said he did not want to have it done. Therefore, instead of making it a matter of charge against us, he ought to have said—I did not observe that he did—that we had learned wisdom from the Opposition, that although numerically small, they were intellectually great, their judgments were great; and that, although armed with a greater numerical strength in this House, we had yielded to the arguments of the intellectual Opposition on the other side, and had reviewed our legislation. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, that is not exactly the case. The hon. gentleman will not dispute that, for many years, the different Chambers of Commerce and Boards of Trade have asked for a Department of Trade and Commerce; he will not dispute, I think, that the Government had a right, and were fully justified, in asking Parliament, in obedience to this general desire, to establish such bureau, to establish such department; and, therefore, the only charges he can bring against us is that we have not carried it out this year. Well, if the hon. gentleman will look at the Act he will see that the Government took, with the consent of Parliament, the power of judging when that department should be established. There is a little clause at the end of that Act which provides that it shall be brought into effect whenever His Excellency the Governor General shall proclaim that it ought to be brought into effect. One reason, perhaps—I merely suggest it to the hon. gentleman because I am not going to let him into the inner circle—I will suggest that one reason why the Department of Trade and Commerce has not yet been established, is that, though we have not a Minister of Trade and Commerce, yet the administration of the affairs was so good, the devotion to the matters of trade and commerce was so complete, that we have ceased to see the necessity of filling the new Department, and there has not been from one single Chamber of Commerce, from one single Mechanics' Institute, from one single body of workingmen, a request that that bureau should be brought into force at once. And so, Mr. Speaker, we have got liberty from the Boards of Trade and Commerce, the permission of the whole of the commercial and manufacturing bodies of Canada, to select our own time, to select our own opportunity for bringing that Act into force. The hon. gentleman would seem to be anxious—although he rather objected to the use of that phrase as applied to my hon. friends the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue—to have their heads cut off. Well, if he will look at the Act he will find a little clause declaring that the Act shall not be brought into force until the necessity for it is proclaimed by the Governor General. Now, we believe ourselves to be a Government with considerable foresight, we like to look ahead, we do not go on from day to day, but we desire to forward the better organisation of the various departments of the Government when the necessity exists. Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that we could well dispense with my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. Although I say it in his presence, I believe that his administration of that Department has been so able, so earnest, and so zealous, that the whole body of the honest traders of this country would regret if that hon. gentleman gave up that position.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not much.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has protected the honest trader, he has put down the dishonest trader, he has not allowed the smuggler or the dishonest merchant—if he can be dignified by the name of merchant—to continue his practices; he has not allowed false invoices, he has not allowed false statements, he has followed with just punishment every effort to defraud the revenue; and the National Policy which the hon. gentleman now decries, although at one time he was a strong advocate of it, and the tariff regulations would have been of no value if it had not been protected by the action of my hon. friend the Minister of Customs. He has met, I say, with general acceptance from the whole of the commercial classes of Canada, and until my hon. friend is disposed to apply otherwise his great abilities, there is no hurry for bringing that Act I speak of into operation. And so I say with respect to the Department of Inland Revenue, the revenue has been protected to the utmost extent, and the department most efficiently administered. The hon. gentleman speaks of the Solicitor Generalship that it was not brought into play. I dare say my hon. friend and colleague, the Minister of Justice, when the time comes, will be able to defend his course in refraining from filling that office. But the hon. gentleman is mistaken in his statement that the legislation is identical or equivalent to the proposition made years ago when Mr. Mackenzie was at the head of the Government. If the hon. gentleman will compare the two propositions he will find that they are not identical, and the objections taken then against that Bill do not apply to the Bill introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice. On the whole, I cannot complain of the remarks of the hon. gentleman with respect to the Speech from the Throne. He says he thinks the election law requires amendment. We agree, therefore, as to the necessity of the action of the Government in that regard, and when the Bill comes down I hope we may get the assistance of the hon. gentleman in amending the Act, and that he may forget for a moment that he is the leader of the Opposition and play the role of a patriot.

Mr. LAURIER. If you will follow my suggestions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then the hon. gentleman objects to the manner of appointing revising officers and wants them to be officers holding fixed positions.

Mr. LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, and the revising officers be selected from among those appointed by the provincial authorities, men often bitterly hostile to the majority of this House, bitterly hostile to the Conservative party,—and the hon. gentleman is anxious for the appointment of men who will at all events give but a scanty measure of justice to Conservative candidates at the polls. The hon. gentleman would have those officials appointed; but the party to which he belongs in his own great Province of Quebec sometimes takes a different course. Look across the River Ottawa. There is a sheriff and a registrar, and if I am not very much mistaken those officers are the officers who ought to perform the duties of returning officers, and yet I believe that those two officers were informed that they must decline to accept the office of returning officer under pain of dismissal by the Government of the day, so that the friends and supporters of the Government of the day might be appointed to fill them, and they did so of course. I would ask if there is not a sufficient justification as to the manner in which the present Government have exercised the power given to them by statutes to appoint returning officers in the fact that, although we have had an enormous crop of election petitions, although corruption and bribery have been charged against candidates on both sides, although a good many, some of whom were from the other side and of the party of purity, have been unseated, yet not one petition has alleged impropriety of conduct on the part of the returning officers chosen and selected by this Government. The hon. gentleman spoke about the Franchise Act, and he has said he hoped it will be repealed in 1889. Well, it may be repealed if the hon. gentleman is in power; but I think, to use Mr. Gladstone's celebrated phrase, that does not come within the limit of measurable possibilities. I am very glad the hon. gentleman and those who support him are about to adopt or have adopted, and will carry out, a judicious reticence respecting the Fishery Treaty. Of course, it would be premature to discuss it now, until the treaty itself and the papers are laid before the House; and even then, for reasons which will be obvious to leading members on the other side, a very considerable degree of caution with respect to the manner in which the discussion is carried on in the public interest should be observed. On that subject I hope to have an unofficial discussion with the hon. gentleman opposite. The hon. gentleman has endeavored to cast some degree of ridicule upon the prophecy which I ventured to make some years ago respecting the settlement of the North-West country. My estimates, although based on the reports of our various officers, I must admit have not been carried out. That they have not been carried out is in a very great degree due to the great earnestness, the great ability, and the great persistence with which hon. gentlemen opposite have expressed their views.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but it is a laugh of the lip and is outward only. The hon. gentlemen know that to them is due the fact that the settlement of this country has been so long retarded.

Mr. LANDERKIN. By bad government we know it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he knows it; it is well he knows something. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Laurier) has remarked the marvelous tenacity with which we proclaim the prosperity of this country. We proclaim it with considerable tenacity because we believe we are justified in doing so. But what is our tenacity compared with that of hon. gentlemen opposite, who from the time of Confederation down to this day, except during the five years when we enjoyed so much prosperity, when it was so much developed under the auspices of hon. gentlemen opposite, have kept up a constant wail about the miserable condition of this country, as to the wretched condition of the people, as to the increasing poverty and increasing dependence of our people. That doctrine has been proclaimed in this House, it has been proclaimed on public platforms, it has been stated in the Opposition press and on the hustings and everywhere, and yet the people of Canada are so utterly ignorant of their misery, so utterly blinded to their misfortunes and the wretchedness under which they suffer, that they discard all the prophecies of hon. gentlemen opposite and they venture, also unconscious of their doom as a victimised people—the victims being the people of Canada—to act as they did on the 22nd February last, as they did in 1882 and as they did in 1878, to support this party which persistently is ruining the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, this is a free country. The people have a right to ruin themselves if they wish, and the people of Canada have, beyond a doubt, declared that ruin at our hands is preferable to prosperity at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a difference of opinion as to what prosperity is, and as to what misfortune and calamity mean, and we happen to differ in opinion; the majority carries the day, and here we are governing the country. By the same token, referring to the elections on the 22nd of February last, there has been some elections since then; and, strange to say, such is the blindness of the people of Canada, although they have the advantage of common schools, of model schools, of high schools and of universities, and in fact every mode of instruction is afforded to the people, yet with all these advantages of education to bring them up to the right consideration of what the interests of Canada are, they deliberately prefer all this ruin at our hands than to take blessings from the hands of the hon. gentlemen and those who fight the battles behind them. Was it not enough to cause the hon. gentleman, if he felt called upon to use strong language, to use that language against the ignorance of the people who have decided in favor of the National Policy, who preferred a vicious economical system to a system of free trade, by which our industries and our trade would be thrown open to foreigners to compete against our own people? As I said a little while ago, the hon. gentleman was strongly in favor of the National Policy. The hon. gentleman's language is on record, and he spoke as strongly as I ever did, and a great deal more strongly in favor of it; and it has been cast up to me that I desired not an increased protection but only a readjustment. Well, I did say that we wanted a readjustment, and the readjustment was simply this: to increase the duty on articles we could manufacture ourselves, and take the duties off articles we could not manufacture or produce in this country. But the hon. gentleman was a protectionist of pure blood, and now, perhaps through the inevitable pressure of his political position, he is obliged to give up his old predilections and his own political opinions, and to declare that what he once said was an absolute requisite to the fiscal system of this country is a vicious economical policy. You know the story of the man in the lunatic asylum. I do not at all mean to say that my hon. friend is not in possession of all those great abilities and intellectual powers which have distinguished him since he has been in this House; I merely mention this story as an illustration. The man in the lunatic asylum was asked why he was there: "Well," he said, "it all arises from a difference of opinion; the people think I am mad, and I think all the people are mad, and the majority have carried it, and I am here." So my hon. friend thinks we have a vicious economical policy, the majority is against him, and he is there. The hon. gentleman also speaks about our wasteful expenditure in the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which he says was built far too fast and cost far too much money and, perhaps, too much land. Well, Sir, suppose the policy of the Government of which the hon. gentleman was a member had been carried out, what would have been the position of affairs to-day? How would a crop of the North-West be got down to the sea-board? There have been about 12,500,000 bushels of wheat, or 400,000 tons, to be brought out of the North-West this year. Now, the water-stretches, with railways here and there, were promised to be capable of moving forty tons a day; so that to remove the whole of this season's crop would require 10,000, days, or, taking the season of navigation, 66½ years. And, to-day, the people of the North-West are crying out against the monopoly, and are saying that half-a-dozen other railways should be built instead of one. Yet the hon. gentleman, in the face of these facts, in the face of the enormous agricultural development of the North-West, and in the face of the magnificent crop which has over-taxed all our means of transport, ventures to get up and impugn the policy of the Government in building so speedily the Canadian Pacific Railway. The hon. gentleman is a French Canadian and of French descent, and if it were not that he is so solid a Liberal, I would almost call him a Bourbon who remembers nothing and forgets nothing. Well, Mr. Speaker, having made these few imperfect remarks in answer to the hon. gentleman, I would simply say that, as we are commencing pleasantly, I hope we shall address ourselves to the business of the country with the same disposition. I have no doubt with the energy, the zeal, and the ability of the gentlemen on that side of the House, we shall be criticised, and we invite criticism, and more than that, we challenge criticism, and our challenge I have no doubt will be accepted by the hon. gentlemen. I have only to say let us have a fair field, and let the best man win.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman had continued to confine himself to the tone with which he commenced his remarks, I do not know that a single word further would have been said on this side of the House; but so far from doing that, the hon. gentleman has, within the last few minutes, assumed to lay on the shoulders of the Opposition the charge that we, forsooth, are responsible for the fact that, to-day, as my hon. friend truly said, not by tens, nor by scores, nor by hundreds or thousands, but by millions, the people of Canada, to whom Canada belongs, have found it impossible to maintain a home in Canada. Sir, we accept the challenge of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman, as we know, is much more prone to make calculations, such as those my hon. friend exposed a few minutes ago, than he is to state the real facts which he, as a prominent statesman of this country, ought to know. But if he wants to know what was the exact movement of population in the Province to which he and I belong, during the period from 1874 to 1879, when my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie was responsible for the administration of the business of this country, and its movement during the last six or eight years, for which he and his policy are answerable, I can tell him in a few words. During the four or five years when Mr. Mackenzie presided over the destinies of this country, the agricultural population of the great Province of Ontario, of which alone we possess accurate statistics, increased just six times as fast as the returns show it has increased during the seven or eight years the hon. member for Kingston has been responsible for our affairs. Now, Sir, I do not want at present to inflict on the House minute statistics showing the movement of population, but I can tell this House that of some 440 rural municipalities in the Province of Ontario, scarcely twenty can be found in which during the seven or eight years that have elapsed since the hon. gentleman's return to power the total growth has equalled the natural increase of the population. Such a statement as that alone far more than bears out the contention of my hon. friend that, from whatever cause it may arise, whether partly from natural causes or partly from misgovernment on the part of those entrusted with the affairs of Canada, we are in a situation which no man who regards the real welfare of Canada can consider to be wholesome or healthy. During that interval, in spite of our remonstrances, in spite of the protest of those who knew what was going on, the hon. gentleman has persisted in the mischievous policy of expending very large sums of public money to bring into the country immigrants whom, when they do come, he cannot keep here. Our census returns show that of these immigrants who have been brought in at an enormous expense, three out of four have gone to the United States. I say that these things were not caused, and the proof I have given is ample to show that they were in no respect caused, by the policy of my hon. friend, who, I am sorry to say, is unable to be present to-day. They have resulted, to a very great extent, from the mischievous policy which my hon. friend has rightly denounced, a policy of enormously increasing the debt and taxes of the country, at the very moment when the great country to the south of us is enormously reducing both. Time and again I have shown on the floor—and no man has yet been able truthfully to contradict my statements—that whereas the hon. gentleman entered office under circumstances which gave us an enormous advantage over the United States, the position of things to-day is that in Canada we have totally, utterly, absolutely reversed those advantages; and we are to-day, relatively to the United States, in just the same disadvantageous position as that in which they were relatively to us some twenty years ago. That, I suppose, is to be advanced as a proof of the marvellous foresight the hon. gentleman has just claimed for himself. The hon. gentleman is good enough to tell us that this is a free country, that we are free to ruin ourselves if we like. Well, that is pretty nearly the only freedom of those we formerly enjoyed which the hon. gentleman has left us. Canada is not a country to-day in which a man is free to buy or sell where he pleases, or free to build a railroad out of his own money. Canada is not a country in which those constitutional rights for which our forefathers fought and bled are any longer respected; and I say my hon. friend is strictly right when he says that such a gross and infamous tyranny as that which the hon. gentleman has been perpetrating on the people of Manitoba, has never been and would not be tolerated in any other country in the world possessing representative institutions. I defy the hon. gentleman and his friends to point out to me in any country under heaven, having representative institutions, another instance in which the Government have given a monopoly extending over 2,000 miles to a private corporation, and have impudently disallowed, contrary to all constitutional usage and precedent, contrary to the spirit and essence of our constitution, the right of the people of that Province, at their own cost and charge, without appealing to us for one penny of subsidy, to build a railroad in order to relieve themselves from that intolerable oppression. I wonder that the hon. gentleman, knowing, as he must have known, the facts with respect to this harvest in Manitoba, has asked to receive with pleasure His Excellency's assurances that the harvest of Manitoba and the North-West has been one of remarkable abundance. I advise the hon. gentleman to read the report of the Board of Trade of the city of Winnipeg on that subject. If he will read that report, made by men of every conceivable shade of politics in the Province, he will learn that while Providence has blessed the country with a most abundant harvest, the dog-in-the-manger policy, sanctioned and enforced by the hon. gentleman, has had the result that at hundreds of stations throughout the country, tens of thousands of bushels of the finest grain in the world are to-day lying rotting in the streets, unable to find a market. That is the direct result of the policy of the hon. gentleman. And if, as the temper displayed in the recent elections in Manitoba goes to show, the people there have become convinced that their only chance of redress lies in asserting their rights at any cost; the hon. gentleman has incurred a great and grave responsibility by persisting in the disallowance which we, on this side, endeavored in vain to remove during the course of last Session. I was amused to hear the hon. gentleman enter into a computation, which I do not take the trouble to check, touching the amount of grain that can be transported by the water stretches in 66½ years. All I can say is he must have been thinking of the period which must elapse before the smallest fragment of his $71,000,000 would be realised by the people of this country. I observe also that the hon. gentleman, and perhaps with some reason, alluded, not at very great length, but still rather pointedly, to the result of certain bye-elections which had taken place. I think that, considering the hon. gentleman has beside him two colleagues, at least, who have shared the fate of war, he might have considered their feelings before calling their attention to the results which sometimes flow from the indiscreet actions of agents and others engaged in elections. In the hon. gentleman's own case I observe that very recently—I suppose I will be pardoned for referring to what took place in the recess—he congratulates himself and his hearers, with good cause, on the fact that this time, at any rate, he was not found guilty of corrupt practices. Practice makes perfect. The hon. gentleman was caught twice, but I am bound to say that he was not caught for the third time. No doubt the hon. gentleman on that occasion was pardonably proud of the victory he had achieved. It was, no doubt, a remarkable one. Here is the hon. gentleman—whose constituent, by the by, I am, and I hope he will remember that fact if I have any application to make to him—here is the hon. gentleman, the Premier of the Dominion, with the power, the prestige, the influence of the position of Premier, returned to a seat which he had represented by great majorities for twenty-five or thirty years—he will correct me if I am wrong.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A good long time at any rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman, the Premier of Canada, succeeds in defeating an absent man by a majority of 12 in that constituency, which, six weeks before, had returned a friendly supporter of the hon. gentleman to the Local House by a majority of 180. It was a great victory, and he has very good ground to be very proud of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another reason why he should be proud of it. I, as I say, am a constituent of the hon. gentleman. I know something of the position of parties in the city of Kingston, and I notice a remarkable thing. There were about one hundred non-residents in Kingston. These are generally pretty well divided between the two parties and there is not much difficulty in knowing, as we are all aware, their opinion; and it must have been a comfort to the hon. gentleman to know that he owes his return to the fact that, while only ten of those non-residents voted for his opponent, fifty-one came from the ends of the earth to vote for him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, the hon. gentleman is quite right. It is a feather in his cap here. We had these men, we had these poor men, we had these men to whom days' wages were matters of great importance, these men to whom the price of a railway ticket there and back was of great importance; we had these men coming, I am told, from Texas, from Port Arthur, from Watertown, in the State of New York, from Rochester, from Chicago, from east and from west, from north and from south, all spurred by a noble ambition to sacrifice their time and their money and to vote for the hon. gentleman. There are few of us who could attract so much enthusiasm, and it was interesting to see how this hon. gentleman's friends acted in the role of good Samaritans, how they met these poor strangers at the railway stations, drove them to the polls, fed and lodged them, and, in accordance with scriptural precedent, lent them twopence, which I see by the record means $15 of Canadian currency, to pay their way. So the hon. gentleman is quite justified in demanding our congratulations, which I freely tender to him, on the marvellous victory he achieved on that occasion. Now, I have heard that the hon. gentleman is a changed man. I sincerely trust that is so, and I sincerely trust that, in regard to these several measures for the improvement of our Election Act, and for the improvement of the trial of controverted elections and other things which are promised us here, we are going at length and at last to have some substantial tokens of the right hon. gentleman's penitence; I trust that he will at once do away with the Gerrymander Act, even if he will not abolish the Franchise Bill. I am very sorry—I am afraid it is an instance of back-sliding on the part of the hon. gentleman—that he cannot see his way to deprive himself of the means which he has taken in certain counties, and notably the County of Queen's, N. B., to promote perfect impartiality in the returning officers by allowing the candidate supporting the Ministry of the day to select his own returning officer and his deputy returning officers too. The hon. gentleman dwelt at length on the power which was vested in those pernicious Local Governments, who do not seem, by the way, to share that confidence in the hon. gentleman which, he says, the people of Canada seem to entertain, to select permanent officers to discharge these duties. But my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Laurier) did not say anything about officers in the employment of the Local Governments. The right hon. gentleman chose, for his own purposes, to add to what my hon. friend said on that subject. What we ask is that we should have returning officers, and deputy returning officers, in whose action both sides could have some reasonable amount of confidence. The right hon. gentleman says that no complaints have been made as to the action of returning officers, but, while that may be true, it has been in the power of the candidate to nominate a score of deputy returning officers who are not likely to be over-scrupulous, as has been shown on several occasions, in the way in which they will promote the return of their patron for the time being. I agree with the right hon. gentleman in part that this is not a fit time, in fact that it is not possible for us now, to discuss the details of the Fishery Treaty, but I do not think that the hon. gentleman is entitled on that ground to expect that no attention should be called to the patent and apparent fact that, whatever may be said as to the merits of that treaty in itself, that treaty is hopelessly, utterly inconsistent with the position which was taken one bare year ago by the hon. gentleman himself, according to the Minutes brought down to us in the blue book which I have here in my desk; nor is he entitled to say that we are going out of the record when we call attention to the fact, whatever may be the merits or demerits of the question, that this treaty, as far as we are advised, has not settled anything. The hon. gentleman and his friends contended, no doubt with great force, for many things which they and we have always agreed were the real and absolute property of the people of Canada, and I can see on the face of it no sort of recognition of the things for which the hon. gentleman contended. I say that either the hon. gentlemen were most grossly in the wrong before, if this treaty be an honorable and satisfactory settlement; or, if they were right before, then I wonder how they, after having His Excellency's signature to these several Minutes which I have alluded to, can come down to us and venture to hope that the House will consider this an honorable and satisfactory settlement. Let them take their choice. One of two things has occurred: either they have most needlessly run frightful risks, have subjected this country to needless humiliation, or, failing that, it will be excessively difficult for them to explain why we should accept this as a just settlement of the claims which Canada has preferred. Nevertheless, in answer to the hon. gentleman's appeal, I do not propose to go further on that subject at this moment, but I do hope and I do expect that the hon. gentleman will place the House at the earliest possible moment in full possession of all these facts and of all these papers to which he has alluded, and will at an early date give us an opportunity of having the fullest discussion on this most important question. I will say this for myself, that I am now, as I always have been, prepared to go as far as any man can possibly go in endeavoring to conciliate the good-will of the great nation beside us. I regard that as a matter of incalculable value to Canada, although I may differ extremely from the hon. gentleman in regard to the mode in which he has been attempting to obtain it. I am afraid that, when these matters come to be considered, the best that we can say will be that possibly out of this evil some good may come, and that possibly the people of Canada may at last find that it is necessary for them to assert their right, in all matters relating to their trade and commerce in North America, to manage their own affairs in the fullest extent. I believe, and I have good reason for believing, that, if that negotiation could have been entrusted wholly and entirely to Canadian hands, very much greater and better results would have accrued to us from such conduct than have resulted in the present instance. I fear that our cause was prejudged by some, at all events, of those to whom it was entrusted, long before they touched the shores of this continent, and that they had then made up their minds that no interests of ours should be allowed to interfere with the supposed interests of the parent country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I believe an agreement has been arrived at by the leaders of both sides to close this debate at 6 o'clock, and, therefore, although I would like to say something criticising some of the views of the right hon. gentleman and criticising also and differing from the views of the two gentlemen who have spoken on the Opposition side, time will not allow of it, because I do not want to prolong the discussion, especially as it would not be fair to discuss the terms of the treaty until we have some further information before us. I must thank the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) for the manner in which he referred to me in this connection, and I must congratulate both the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) and the hon. member for Gaspé (Mr. Joncas) for the able way in which they performed the important duty of placing the views of the Government of the day before this House. I do not agree with the statement contained in the Speech that both nations will be satisfied with this treaty. I do not agree with that. The treaty does not strike me as being in the interest of Canada; I do not see that concessions are made to Canada. But as I said before, I would merely wish to put my statements on record as dissenting from the declaration of satisfaction which is affirmed in the Address, and which is supposed to represent the opinion of the whole House. I will make no further remarks on this subject than to thank the House for giving me an opportunity of setting myself right in reference to the discussion which may come up after the papers are laid upon the Table. There are a variety of other matters in this Speech to which I also take objection. I think that the reference to the increase of trade requires the most close examination at our hands, and that some steps ought to be taken which would lead to that result. But looking at the clock, it is impossible that we can deal with these subjects now, and I merely make these statements in order that it might not be said hereafter that I sat silent, and by my silence gave assent to the statements contained in the Queen's Speech with reference to this particular subject. There is another thing I want to say. I do not like these arrangements made by the leaders of the two great parties in this House, and although I am generally in pretty good accord in voting with the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, there were some statements made by the hon. gentleman in my eye in relation to the railway policy of this Government, and also in relation to the National Policy, which I do not entirely agree with. Now, Sir, I will say in relation to the National Policy, that I was one who supported the right hon. gentleman in 1878, and was defeated on it. I also supported him in 1882, as an independent member, on his National Policy. But, Sir, the National Policy of 1878 is not the National Policy of to-day. When they put twenty-five per cent. on goods consumed in this country, is that to be compared with the duties which they impose to-day? I am credibly informed by some respectable merchants in Montreal that the present tariff amounts to 145 per cent. upon certain classes of goods. Is that the National Policy I supported in 1878 and 1882? No, Sir, it is not. I wish to put myself right upon that point. And then in relation to the railway policy, I differ somewhat from my hon. friend. I believe the policy pursued by the Government of the right hon. gentleman is correct in constructing a railway from one side of this continent to the other. I have supported them in that policy all through, but I must say in relation to some portions of their policy, it may be that we shall have to explain why it is that we cannot go on giving them complete support. Just one thing more. The right hon. gentleman has pointed out what he thinks has created the prosperity of this country. He has ventured to say that the reason why the North-West country is not as prosperous now as he claims it ought to be, lies at the door of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, who, as he says, have decried that country. Well, Sir, it may be that there is some blame attaching to them in that respect; it may be that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have too often condemned the measures which were proposed by the Government. But I tell the right hon. gentleman that the cause of the retarded settlement in the North-West during the past few years is the misgovernment and mismanagement of his Government, which led to a rebellion in which they spent $7,000,000. That is the real cause why the country has been kept in a backward state for the past four or five years; and if the hon. gentleman had paid more attention to the administration and the conduct of the public business of that country, he would have prevented the rebellion, and we would not now have to deplore the unfavorable accounts of that country which are now going abroad and retarding immigration. But on all those subjects I shall take another opportunity of saying something during the progress of the Session.

Paragraphs 1 to 13, inclusive, agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the said resolutions be referred to a Select Committee composed of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, and Messrs. Montague and Joncas, to prepare and report the draft of an Address in answer to the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, from the Committee, reported the draft of an Address, which was read the first and second time and ordered to be engrossed, and to be presented to His Excellency by such members of the House as are of the honorable the Privy Council.

SUPPLY.

Mr. BOWELL moved:

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. BOWELL moved :

That this House will, on Tuesday next, resolve itself into a Committee to consider of the Ways and Means for raising a Supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

DEBATES COMMITTEE.

Mr. BOWELL moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House during the present Session, with power to report from time to time; to be composed of Messrs Baker, Béchard, Charlton, Colby, Davin, Desjardins, Ellis, Innes, Royal, Scriver, Somerville, Taylor, Tupper (Pictou), Weldon (Albert).

REPORT.

Report, Returns and Statistics of the Inland Revenues of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1887.—(Mr. Costigan.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6:10 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 27th February, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBERS INTRODUCED.

The following members, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took their seats in the House:—

Hon. Sir CHARLES TUPPER, G.O.M.G., Member for the Electoral District of Cumberland, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Hon. Mr. Thompson.

Major General JOHN WIMBURN LAURIE, Member for the Electoral District of Shelburne, introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper.

Annual Report of the Department of the Interior, for the year 1887.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

Tables of the Trade and Navigation of the Dominion of Canada, for the fiscal year ended 30th June, 1887, compiled from Official Returns.—(Mr. Bowell.)

Mr. MITCHELL.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved :

That the certificate of the Honorable Mr. Justice Osler, dated the 17th day of November last, in the matter of the controverted election for the Electoral District of the County of Kent, in the Province of Ontario, which was laid before the House on the 23rd instant, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He said: This seat, as is known, was vacated on trial, and the judge's report is as follows:—

"That there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have prevailed extensively at the said election.

"I am not, however, of opinion (so far as I can form an opinion from anything which came before me on the trial) that the enquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, or that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have prevailed extensively is desirable, by which term I understand likely to prove useful or effectual."

If it had not been for the last portion of the certificate which I have just read there would not have been any doubt that a writ could not issue except by the House. The 48th clause of the Controverted Elections Act, Revised Statutes, is as follows:—

"When the judge, in his report on the trial of an election petition under this Act, states that corrupt practices have, or there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed at the election to which the petition relates and that he is of the opinion that the enquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, and that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed is desirable, no new writ shall issue for a new election in such case except by order of the House of Commons."

It would appear that in any of these cases the writ must be hung up until the House orders its issue. However, there has been a difference of opinion in the matter, and some authorities, and important authorities, state that under the construction of the whole of the clause in Chapter 9, read by the light of Chapter 10, which refers to the issue of commissions whenever the judge reports that the evidence has been incomplete, or that there is likely to have been some connivance between the parties, a Royal Commission can issue, and under that provision the Speaker cannot issue his writ without the assent of the House. It is under these circumstances that I make this motion.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask the hon gentleman, under the circumstances, that as this is a motion which is somewhat obsolete, and that this is only the second instance I am aware of when a similar motion has come before the House, to let it stand until to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Mr. LAURIER moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. AMYOT moved first reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman might give us some idea of the nature of the Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. This Bill is the same as the one I presented last year, but it was too late in the Session to pass it through its various stages. Its object is to fix a uniform delay for the contestation of elections, and not to make the date depend on the publication of the return in the official Gazette.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPERVISION OF BANKS.

Mr. CASGRAIN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to adopt during this Session some measure for the better supervision of the Banks in the Dominion?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That subject is now occupying the attention of the Government.

Mr. INNES asked, Is it the intention of the Government, in view of the recent bank failures, to make any amendments to the General Banking Act this Session, or otherwise to have such legislation as will secure a more effective system of supervision and inspection for the chartered banks, more correct certified monthly returns, and generally for the better security of those whose money is invested in such institutions, as depositors or otherwise?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must give the same answer as I did to the previous question.

VESSELS WRECKED ON THE GREAT LAKES.

Mr. DAWSON moved for:

Return showing the number of Canadian vessels lost or wrecked on the great lakes during the past season of navigation; also the number of lives lost in the case of each wreck; also a statement showing what, if any, steps have been taken to ascertain the cause of loss in each case.

He said: In making this motion I do not wish to put the Department to the trouble of giving any very lengthened report. All I should like to see would be a synopsis, something short, which would not occasion a very great deal of work in the Department, and still give the information required. Some years ago I drew attention to the great number of wrecks and losses that had occurred on the great lakes. Within a short time there had been no less than twelve large vessels lost, with a very large loss of life. In one case no less than 200 lives were lost, in another case 25 lives, in another five lives, in another 30 or 40 lives, and so on. The actual loss of life during that period could not be ascertained, but I believe that no less than 300 lives were lost in the waters of Algoma by the wreck of vessels. At that time I drew the attention of the Government to the necessity that existed for some mode of inspection, and I am happy to say that legislation took place which had a very good effect. Inspectors were appointed to examine the hulls. Before that there were only inspectors to examine the machinery. Hull inspectors were appointed, with the result that a great many of the unseaworthy vessels have been prevented from going out. But another set of circumstances has grown up since. The demand for vessels on the lakes for the last few years has been very great. The shipping on the lakes has largely increased, and the rates of freight have been so good that transportation has become remunerative where it scarcely paid at all before. The consequence is that a great many old hulks have been brought into use; vessels that had been for years under water have been raised and sent to the docks for repairs. While these vessels are being repaired, I think it is highly necessary that the hull inspector should examine them and see that they are well repaired and put in proper order. Now, Sir, as I understand, there are at this moment, in the docks and in the shipyards throughout Ontario—of course, I only speak of the lake marine, not of ocean vessels at all—there are now undergoing repairs in the various harbors and docks of Ontario, vessels that have been under water for years. The hull inspector was asked to visit them and make a report; he answered that he had no instructions to do so, and that no provision was made towards paying his expenses. Now, if I may be permitted to suggest a remedy, I think there should be some legislation which would prevent vessels from being sent out which were either overloaded or unseaworthy. The sending out of overloaded vessels is a common thing in Ontario. Old schooners are converted into barges, and these are put in tow of steamers, and the consequence is that when stormy weather comes on, they are cut loose from the steamers, and very often go to the bottom. Now, there was a case in Ontario this year. A vessel called the Oriental, that was considered unseaworthy, was repaired to a certain extent so as just to be able to float. The register of this vessel was 375 tons. She was to be sent across the lake in tow of another vessel, loaded with 700 tons of coal, and, as the report is, she had only a few inches of what the sailors call "free board," that is, the space between the deck and the surface of the water. A storm came on, the steamer left her, and she cast anchor, as a matter of course, and soon went down with all on board. That is not a solitary case. There have been similar cases in Lake Superior. A vessel called the Jane Hurlburt, which was unseaworthy and had been used for carrying firewood, was sent out in tow of a steamer, in the fall of the year, to take a number of men down the lake coast. Encountering somewhat stormy weather, this vessel became unmanageable, as she had neither sail nor oar, nor a man on board who could manage her. When the storm came on, the captain of the steamer, in order to save his own vessel, cut the rope by which this vessel was attached to the steamer, and in a few minutes she went down with thirty people on board, all of them strangers in the country, poor navvies who were seeking for work. Sir, I could repeat a great many similar instances. The cause leading to all these accidents is the desire of making money by carrying freight, and these rotten old hulks are patched up and put in tow of old steamers. Now, a case occurred in Lake Superior this year. A vessel, or rather a barge, as those vessels are called, named the Bessie Barwick, was put in tow of a steamer, and a storm coming on, she was out adrift in Lake Superior, but, fortunately, she made the shore without loss of life. Again, we have the loss of the California, a Canadian vessel, in the Straits of Mackinaw. This vessel was evidently overloaded with wheat, and, in addition, carried no less than 700 barrels of pork as a deckload. Consequently, when she began to roll in the sea, the barrels of pork rolled to one side, and she reeled and sank. On that occasion I think some 13 or 14 lives were lost, and some were saved. I could repeat a good many more instances of the same kind, but what I wish to call attention to is that there should be some legislation which would enable the Government to appoint officials who would prevent vessels from going out either overloaded or in an unseaworthy condition. Now, I think that this duty might be performed at the different ports by Custom house officers. Any man can tell when a vessel is overloaded, and if the Custom house officer at any port saw a barge overloaded in tow of a steamer, he should have power to say, "You shall not go out in that condition and in this weather, because it is not safe. If there was some power of that sort given to the collectors of the different ports, I think the difficulty would be met; but at present the demand for vessels is so great that I am afraid that, during the coming season, unless something is done, the losses will be repeated on a far larger scale than hitherto. The Department of Marine has done a great deal for the lake navigation. We have had a hydrographic survey going on from year to year; rocks and shoals have been discovered which were never dreamed of, some of which, very probably, led to losses on former occasions. Perhaps the Wabuno struck on one of these rocks, and the Asia may have struck one of them. In the case of the Wabuno, not a single soul was saved; in that of the Asia, two got ashore. This hydrographic survey is doing an immense deal of good. I think, however, that the Department of Marine should take this matter up and provide means of inspecting vessels, as to how loaded, before they leave port, and should also give authority to someone at each and all of the different ports to prevent vessels from going out when in an unseaworthy condition, or too heavily laden. I may mention that in the United States they are no better off than we are. On the other side of the lakes a great many losses have also occurred, and the matter has been brought before Congress by some of the representatives of the lake districts. As representing a lake district myself, I considered it my duty to bring this matter before Parliament. The losses on the other side have been even greater than on this side, and the representations I have referred to brought the matter forward with a view to obtaining legislation on the subject. It has been suggested that there should be line marks on the vessels, one for summer and one for fall, what is known as a Plimsoll line, that is, a line beyond which the vessel should not be loaded, one for the stormy weather in the fall and another for the summer season. I think if some such system were adopted, it would be the means of preventing the great loss of life that occurs; but, above all, let something be done to prevent these unseaworthy barges being towed by steamers, for they are sure to be cut adrift any moment a storm arises. That is the main thing to be provided against now, and if that were done I have no doubt the wants of navigation would be met.

Mr. FOSTER. The information for which the hon. gentleman has asked is now being printed or has been printed, in the report of the Department, which will be laid on the Table in a day or two. I suggest that the hon. gentleman allow his motion to stand until he sees that report, and if it does not include all the information desired, additional information will be brought down. I think, however, he will find everything required in the report.

Mr. DAWSON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That a Special Committee of seven members be appointed to prepare and report, with all convenient speed, lists of members to compose the Select Standing Committees, ordered by the House on Thursday, the 23rd inst., and that Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Hector Langevin, Sir Richard Cartwright and Messrs. McLellan, Howell, Laurier and Mills, do compose said Committee.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. May I ask the right hon. gentleman to explain why the Fisheries Treaty and papers have not yet been brought down; also when we may expect them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The papers are not yet complete.

Mr. LAURIER. Can we have them to-morrow?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In a few days.

Mr. LAURIER. Nothing more precise than that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may be misinformed, but I saw it stated in an American newspaper that they had been presented to the Senate, protocols and all. Is that statement correct?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that that statement is not correct. I had a telegram from Mr. Bergae yesterday, saying that he expected to be able to send the final protocols to me in a day or two, that they would leave Washington to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE. It is to be hoped they will improve by keeping.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We shall see.

Mr. DAWSON.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing the several sums of money paid in costs, counsel fees or otherwise, directly or indirectly, connected with the suit, "The St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company vs. The Queen;" the party or parties to whom paid, the date of payment, and the several accounts paid, showing the full amounts paid and the dates of payments.—(Mr. McMullen.)

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3:50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 28th February, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented the Report of the Special Committee appointed to prepare and report lists of the Select Standing Committees for the present Session. He moved that the portion of the Report relating to the Committee on Standing Orders be adopted.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS.

Report of the Postmaster-General for the year 1887.—(Mr. McLellan.)

Report of the Secretary of State of Canada, for the year ended 31st December, 1887.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

DEBATES TRANSLATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I beg to rise to a question of privilege. I am informed that you, Mr. Speaker, in the exercise of the power which you have assumed as Speaker of this House, have dismissed three of the translators of the Debates from the positions which they had received at the hands of the House. I may say at once, Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to your decision, and in my humble judgment, that I have not the least doubt that you have exceeded your authority and invaded the privilege of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman puts it, as I understand it, upon the ground that the Speaker has exceeded his authority?

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That will be a question of privilege. I have no doubt the Speaker will be quite ready to decide.

Mr. SPEAKER. The papers will be brought down to-morrow.

KENT (ONT.) CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir John A. Macdonald: That the certificate of the Honorable Mr. Justice Osler, dated the 17th day of November instant, in the matter of the controverted election for the Electoral District of the County of Kent in the Province of Ontario, which was laid before the House on the 23rd instant, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LAURIER. I would call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to this matter again, and I believe that if he will take it into consideration once more, he will come to the conclusion that the writ ought to issue at once.

The general rule which is followed, and which is a matter of equity, is, that as soon as a vacancy occurs in the representation of the House, Mr. Speaker is to issue his warrant at once for a new election. The aim is to provide that no interregnum shall occur in the representation of this House. There is, however, an exception to this, and it is the only exception, so far as I am aware. If the vacancy occurs after the judgment of a court, and if the judge who has tried the petition, reports to the House that in his opinion there is cause to believe that extensive bribery and corrupt practices have prevailed, or that the enquiry has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, or that a further enquiry be desirable as to whether corrupt practices have extensively prevailed, then, in such a case, the Speaker has to withhold the issuing of a writ, and to await the action of the House, and under such circumstances the House alone is to order the issue of a new writ. Now, what is the reason of this exception? It is to be found in the subsequent Act, which is the "Act respecting enquiries into corrupt practices at Elections of Members of the House of Commons." This Act provides that whenever such a report as I have mentioned is made by a judge, that is to say, when a judge reports that, in his opinion, there have been extensive corrupt practices, or that the enquiry has been incomplete, and that it is desirable to have a further enquiry into the matter, then, upon an address, a Commission may issue further to investigate the matter, further to ascertain how far corrupt practices may have prevailed, and how far the electorate of the county has been affected by corruption, in order that the House, with the evidence before it, may judge whether extraordinary measures are necessitated. Now, in this case, it seems to me that the report made by the judge precludes the House from making any further enquiry. Now, although this matter may be, to a certain extent, left to the discretion of the House, although the statute does not say that, as soon as the judge has made such a report, the Commission is to issue, but the House itself is to say whether the Commission is to issue or not. Under all these circumstances great weight is to be attached to the opinion of the judge. So far as I have observed, whenever a judge has made such a report, if he made it simply in the language of the statute, adding nothing further, I would be disposed, for my part, to take the ruling of the judge and to say that under such circumstances the law and justice would be met by issuing a Commission just to ascertain how far corrupt practices have prevailed. But in this case the judge seems to have made a special report. He not only reported in the language of the statute, but he went beyond the language of the statute. The report made by the judge says:

"There is reason to believe that corrupt practices have prevailed extensively at the said election. I am not, however, of opinion (so far as I can form an opinion from anything which came before me on the trial) that the enquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, or that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have prevailed extensively is desirable, by which term I understand, likely to prove useful or effectual."

Now, it seems to me that in adding these words the judge has precluded that matter from going further, that is to say, his opinion can be accepted by this House and ought to be accepted by this House. He went further than the statute goes. I can understand that there might be some difficulty in the construction of this statute. It is not perhaps framed as happily as it might have been. These words added: "or that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have prevailed, is desirable," whether those terms apply only to a case when an enquiry has been prevented by the action of the parties, or whether they will also apply to this statute, that might perhaps be a subject for a argument and contention. But in this case, I think there is no ground for question. The judge states that in this case, according to his opinion, not only further enquiry is not desirable, but he goes further and says that he does not believe that further enquiry would prove useful or effectual. Well, if in the opinion of the judge who tried the case, that there is no reason for further enquiry, that it would prove useless or ineffectual, I do not see that the House ought to go any further and order a new enquiry. The reference which was made by the right hon. gentleman was to ascertain whether, according to the terms of the statute, a Commission should issue. Now, if the writ is not to issue at present, if it is to be suspended, what can be the reason? Why should we delay the issuing of a writ and leave the county unrepresented, unless there is reason to suppose that a further enquiry may be necessary, in order to ascertain whether any extraordinary measure should be taken? But since the judge says that in his opinion no further enquiry is necessary, that it would prove useless and ineffectual, I think that under such circumstances we should accept his ruling and say that the writ shall issue, and that the county shall not be left unrepresented. We must remember that the judge said he had found certain parties guilty and had punished them, and that, after having exhausted the matter, he advises the House that it would be better to leave the matter where it is and to issue a new writ. We must remember that the judge has had this matter in hand, the trial seems to have been exhausted, nothing seems to have been left undone, all the circumstances must have been considered, the guilty parties seem to have been brought before him, and having all the facts and parties before him he says that, in his opinion, there is no occasion to go any further. I believe under such circumstances, were it not for the rider which the judge himself has placed in his report, I would be disposed to agree with the right hon. gentleman; but as there is such a rider the law may be allowed to take its course and the Speaker order the issue of the writ. If that rider were not in the report I would be glad to have agreed to the course suggested by the hon. gentleman, but as it is inserted there by the judge himself, the matter seems to be determined and a writ might issue at once without any further enquiry.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the hon. gentleman, in discussing this question has to some extent misapprehended the reasons on which the motion has been founded. I think the hon. gentleman has been discussing it as if it were founded on a view of the practice in this case—as if it were proposed that the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be asked to consider the merits of this case of the riding of West Kent alone, and what should be done in regard to it. I think the object of the proposed reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections is somewhat wider than that. If it is not the first time this question has arisen, it is on very rare occasions that such a question does arise, and it is most important that Parliament should settle once for all what should be done when judges make a report like this in regard to the prevalence of corrupt practices at elections, and with this view the matter should be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. I take a somewhat different view from the hon. gentleman, and without at all prejudging the conclusion which may be arrived at by the Committee on Privileges, I may put that view forward for the present as indicating what may be suggested in opposition to the hon. gentleman's line of argument, and it is this: The statute provides—and the hon. gentleman will indulge me in quoting it, because I am stating it from memory, and am only referring to those parts of the statute which may be pertinent to the present discussion—that when a judge reports the seat vacant, a writ may issue on the Speaker's warrant, except in two cases. One is the case in which a judge makes a report that corrupt practices have generally prevailed, and the other is the case in which he reports that enquiry has been frustrated (I am paraphrasing the words of the Act, but I think I am not departing from the sense), and that some further enquiry is therefore necessary. I take it that in either of those two cases Parliament contemplated, in passing the Controverted Elections Act, that the hands of the Speaker should be stayed until the action of Parliament in regard to either of those questions was determined. In the first place because, if it be a case of corrupt practices having extensively prevailed, it is for Parliament to consider what remedy it will apply to that state of affairs in that constituency. It may overlook the fact that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed and order the writ to issue, as the hon. gentleman suggests it should do in this case. It may be, on the other hand, that the House will stay its hand and not order the writ to issue until a Bill has been introduced to disfranchise that constituency for a limited time, as has been done sometimes in the Imperial Parliament; or until a Royal Commission shall issue to ascertain to what extent corrupt practices have generally prevailed, in order that, if they have prevailed to an alarming extent, indicating a disposition in the county to frustrate the will of the constituency, a measure of disfranchisement may follow. So the object of having the judge report that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed may be, first, the introduction of a Bill for the disfranchising of the constituency on the judge's report, or second, the issue of a Commission of Enquiry to ascertain more fully than the judge has been able to do, in disposing of the petition which he had in hand, how far those corrupt practices have generally prevailed. In considering the report which the learned judge has sent in to this House we find, as the hon. gentleman has stated, that he has reported that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed. He has added, as the hon. gentleman has said, a rider stating that full enquiry has been made and no further enquiry is, in his opinion, necessary. I take it, that the judge's report in regard to further enquiry relates entirely to the enquiry before himself. It disposes of the second proposition put forward as an exception in the statute. The learned judge indicates that the trial of the election petition has proceeded without interruption before him, and he had all the evidence necessary to come to a conclusion, not only that the seat ought to be vacated, but to enable him to report that corrupt practices had generally prevailed at the election. But the rider which the judge has added can have no relation whatever to the enquiry which it is the right of this House to make as to how far corrupt practices have prevailed, and as to how far remedial legislation should be passed in regard to the constituency. It was entirely beyond the scope of the judge's enquiry to report in relation to any necessity for any further investigation, beyond those matters which were brought before him under the petition, and he certainly did not intend by that rider to intimate that there was no necessity for Parliament making any further enquiry, but that the writ should forthwith issue. That was a matter in reference to which he has no jurisdiction whatever, and I am sure he did not intend to suggest that. As a further illustration on the point, let me suggest to the House what the result would be of adopting, as a matter of course, the suggestion of the hon. gentleman that the writ should issue immediately on a report like this. It would entirely frustrate the operation of that portion of the section which makes exception of the case in which a judge reports that corrupt practices have generally prevailed. It would lead to this result: That when a judge reports that corrupt practices have generally prevailed, and that the enquiry before him has been conclusive as to the fact that corrupt practices have generally prevailed, that that fact is no longer in controversy, the provision of the statute that the issue of the writ shall be stayed by the report that corrupt practices have prevailed, is entirely frustrated. I do not mean to say that the interpretation I have put forward is one that the House will adopt or the committee will adopt; but inasmuch as the statute is open to the construction and the report of the judge is a special one, I think it is but reasonable that the opinion of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is in the habit of advising the House on questions referred to them, should be ascertained, so that in any such case the practice may be well understood. In this instance no inconvenience has been felt. The report of the judge was received but a short time before the opening of Parliament; but cases might assume much greater importance, if, shortly after prorogation, such a report was made and action was taken without the House having an opportunity to make enquiry or apply the remedy that Parliament, I think, intended should be in the hands of the House, whenever a judge reports that corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in a constituency.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the action of the House is important in establishing a precedent which may probably be hereafter acted upon. If I understand the hon. gentleman correctly, he was of the opinion that the matter should be sent to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because there was some doubtful point of law arising in regard to the statute. I understand that such is not now his desire, and I have failed to ascertain from the speech of the Minister of Justice exactly what were the reasons for proposing to refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the position taken was that the law was doubtful and that the House had a right to be advised by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, composed, as it is, almost entirely of lawyers, I think it was one that ought to be approved and adopted. The practice has been laid down lately by the British Parliament. I take it, that, under our statute, if a judge reports simply that there have been corrupt practices prevailing in the election, or that he has reason to believe that there have been corrupt practices prevailing, then it is the duty of those in charge of the proceedings of this House to propose, not that the House shall act on that report, for there is no evidence before it under which to act, but their duty is, and it is the practice in the British Parliament for the Attorney General to move for a Royal Commission to take evidence on the statement of the judge and report to the House, on which report a Bill is brought in to disfranchise the constituency, or other action is taken by the House. Here, if the learned judge had confined himself to reporting in compliance with the statute, that he had reason to believe that corrupt practices prevailed extensively, I take it that the hon. gentleman could not have referred it to the Elections Committee. There would have been nothing to refer. His course then would have been, in accordance with English precedents, to have moved for the issue of a Royal Commission. The House might, or might not, have assented to his proposition; that would have been a matter entirely in their discretion. In some cases they did accept the notice of the law officers of the Crown, and the Royal Commission issued. In other cases they did not accept it. The Act is, no doubt, defective in some respects, for the House had not the material to enable it to form a proper judgment. In this case I assume that both sides of the House will agree that it is important for the House to act promptly—that if an enquiry ought to be made, it should be made at an early date; and if we have anything on the record to lead us to the conclusion that an enquiry is unnecessary, we ought to have the writ issued without delay. It seems to me we have something on the record. After stating that there is reason to believe that corrupt practices have prevailed, the judge expresses the opinion that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have prevailed extensively is not necessary in the public interest. Well, the judge is the only person capable of forming an opinion on that subject, for he is the only one who has the evidence before him, and therefore at his suggestion it would be proper for the Government to issue the writ. That opinion of the judge appears to be strengthened by statements in other parts of his report. It appears that only two voters were proved to have been guilty of corrupt practices, of whom one has been punished, and proceedings against the other are now pending. In these circumstances, in the face of the judge's advice to the House that, in his opinion, any further enquiry would be useless; in the absence of any statements from a responsible Minister that he has information justifying any further enquiry, and there being no legal question on which the Committee on Privileges and Elections should be called to pronounce, it seems to me that the more liberal and straightforward course for the House to take would be to order that the writ do issue at once. If the judge had not given us the information he has, I for one would have been inclined to favor the adoption of the English practice as the only proper one, namely, that a Royal Commission should issue, so that when we had the evidence before us we could form our own opinion as to whether the constituency should be disfranchised or not. The judge's opinion is not exactly limited as the Minister of Justice stated. It is as follows:—

"I am not, however, of opinion (so far as I can form an opinion from anything which came before me on the trial) that the enquiry into the circumstances of the election has been rendered incomplete by the action of any of the parties to the petition, or that further enquiry as to whether corrupt practices have prevailed extensively is desirable, by which term I understand likely to prove useful or effectual."

In the absence of other information, I think we ought to accept the judge's opinion, and if we do there is no other course open to us but to issue the writ. It seems to me, therefore, that the reference to the committee will only cause delay, incur a precedent which may not be desirable, and not be productive of any good.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I understand, from the hon. gentleman's speech, as well as from the speech of my hon. friend from Quebec, that they agree that the matter is a matter for the House and not for the Speaker.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is to say, the warrant could not issue from the Speaker on the report, but it was an action for the House. If that is the case, the House has to deal with the matter. I contend, as I have always contended, that the House ought not in any case to interfere when a point of law is raised, without the advice of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which is a body specially chosen from the legal experts on both sides of the House to advise the House in all such cases. I think it is of very great importance that the rule should be invariable, that when any question of this kind comes before the House, on which there can be any doubt whatever, the House should get the assistance of the standing committee which it has appointed for that purpose.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not understand, from the observations which have been made on either side of the House, that there is any matter in doubt. The judge has reported that, in his opinion, corrupt practices have extensively prevailed in the constituency. That was sufficient to prevent you issuing the writ immediately. But what is the question at law? Upon what does the House seek advice? I fancy the hon. gentleman does not propose, under any circumstances, to disfranchise the constituency. We are not exactly in the position of England in that respect. Each Province is entitled to a certain representation under our constitution. This Parliament has no right to alter the proportions of that representation, and if the hon. gentleman were to propose to disfranchise the constituency on account of corrupt practices, he would have to find another constituency in the Province of Ontario, to which the right of representation should be, for the time, given. Now, I think that is a very grave question, and it is one which ought not to be raised upon such a report as has been made in this case. If the hon. gentleman thinks that corrupt practices have prevailed extensively in a constituency, and that an investigation should be had for the purpose of ascertaining the extent of those corrupt practices, and meting out punishment, under the law, to those who do not appear to have been adjudged at the trial, that is a matter which can be attended to after the writ has issued quite as well as before. It is wholly independent of the issue of the writ. It is not necessary that the issue of the writ should be delayed for the purpose of pursuing that investigation. The only occasion for delaying the issue of the writ is where corrupt practices have been carried on to such a serious extent as to warrant the House in recommending the withdrawal of the representation from the particular constituency. Now, I have no doubt the First Minister and the Minister of Justice have examined the evidence in this case. I apprehend that they would not, upon the mere recommendation of the judge, without looking at the evidence supporting that opinion, have proposed so grave a course of procedure as that recommended to the House. I venture to say that no election trial has taken place in the Province of Ontario—I do not know what has been the case elsewhere—not even that in which the First Minister was held to have conducted his election in Kingston fairly, in which fewer corrupt practices have been disclosed than in the very election trial which Judge Osler here reports. There may have been something in the conduct of the witnesses who came before the judge, to give him the impression that corrupt practices extensively prevailed; but I think that has not been disclosed in the evidence taken at the trial. The hon. gentleman does not for one moment seriously entertain the idea of disfranchising the constituency. There is then no reason whatever why the issuing of the writ should be further delayed. The writ may be issued at once, and if the hon. gentleman thinks that it is necessary—if these parties that the judge may have had in his mind have been guilty of corrupt practices, and ought to have been punished—then he can proceed with that enquiry under the statute, without reference to any delay in issuing the writ.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not want to have further enquiry, because the judge has stated it is not advisable to have further enquiry. The hon. gentleman volunteers the statement that this constituency has been exceptionally pure, to use a phrase used elsewhere. Is he not rather bringing a serious charge against Judge Osler, who says it has not been exceptionally pure, but that corrupt practices have prevailed there. The hon. gentleman says there is a difference between our constitution and the English constitution, in that every Province here has the right to be represented by so many members. I thought Scotland had a right to have so many members, and Ireland and England; and yet this statute has been passed giving power to suspend an election in any one of the three kingdoms, without the charge being brought that either England, or Ireland, or Scotland, as the case may be, was disfranchised, or the proportion of representation altered.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Parliament of the United Kingdom cannot change the proportion, whether the Parliament of the United Kingdom is not supreme, and whether this Parliament is supreme to change the constitution and determine that representation shall be other than by population?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is not the question. The question is this: Each of the three kingdoms has the right to be represented, of course, in a certain proportion; and until our law is altered by the Imperial power, by the power that has the right to alter it, each Province has the right to a certain number of representatives. While the election law of England exists, providing for the number of representatives in each of the kingdoms, that proportion must be observed; yet in England, again and again, when corrupt practices have been shown, as in Sudbury, St. Albans, and very many other constituencies, the constituencies have been hung up.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is a local change.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Now there is no necessity for a delay like this. The committee will be struck tomorrow, they can meet in a day or two and decide this important question. It is a very important question, looking upon it as I do.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the question?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The question is, what is the consequence here of the report made by the judge?

Motion agreed to, on a division.

CANADIAN FISHING VESSELS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether Canadian fishing vessels are required to report, enter or clear when putting into Canadian ports or harbors for shelter or repairing damages? 2. Whether Canadian fishing vessels, when in any Canadian bay or harbor for the purposes of shelter or repairing damages, of purchasing wood, or of obtaining water, are liable for harbor dues, tonnage dues, buoy dues, light dues or other similar dues?

Mr. FOSTER. Canadian fishing vessels are required to report, enter or clear when they put into Canadian ports or harbors for shelter or repairing damages, provided they require to communicate with the shore or remain over twenty-four hours. When they merely run in and remain at anchor for a few hours, they are not required to report. All fishing vessels are exempt from sick mariners dues. They have, however, the option of paying them and securing the benefits of the fund. Harbor masters' dues are, by Chapter 86, Revised Statutes, exacted at ports proclaimed under the Act, from all vessels entering and discharging or taking in cargo, ballast, stores wood or water. These would not, therefore, be legally required from Canadian fishing vessels in for shelter and repairs, and in practice are seldom exacted from any Canadian fishing vessels. In Halifax, harbor masters' dues are not paid by any vessels under twenty tons, nor by coasting vessels, which include fishing vessels. At Pictou and Sydney, harbor dues are, by Acts of Parliament, exacted from all vessels over forty tons register; whether, in practice, fishing vessels are exempt when over forty tons cannot be stated without correspondence with the harbor masters of these ports. All vessels under eighty tons are exempted from compulsory pilotage dues by the general Act. Pilotage authorities have, in addition, the power to make other exemptions with consent of the Governor in Council, and have generally exempted fishing vessels. No tonnage, light or buoy dues are collected in Canada.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of a despatch, dated 19th July, 1887, from the Right Honorable Sir Henry Holland, Secretary of State for the Colonies, conveying the thanks of Her Majesty for the joint Address of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, offering their sincere congratulations on the completion of the fiftieth year of Her reign.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 28th February, 1888.

ADJOURNMENT—THE TARIFF—COMBINES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the House adjourns I would call the attention of the Finance Minister and the First Minister to the fact that I observe in the Montreal Gazette of Tuesday, February 28th, the statement that they are authorised to announce to all and sundry that no change whatever would be made in the tariff. It may be very convenient indeed that such an announcement should be made, but it strikes me as slightly contrary to custom that any organ, however zealous a supporter of the hon. gentleman, should be authorised to speak in authoritative terms as to such a very important question. I think it would have been better that such a statement had been made in answer to a question put by one of the hon. gentleman's supporters in this House; but are we to understand that from this time forth the Montreal Gazette practically supplants the Canada Gazette for the purpose of giving general information, and most important general information this undoubtedly is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say that, so far as I am concerned, the statement that has been made has not my authority. I was asked by a gentleman connected with the press, whether it was expected that there would be any material modifications of the tariff this Session, and I said I hoped it would not be necessary to open the tariff at all, but it was simply an expression of opinion in answer to an enquiry, and I thought it was of some advantage that the statement should go to the country, because it would prevent a great many deputations and parties coming to Ottawa, at great trouble and expense to themselves, visiting the capital, when I thought it was not likely to be attended with the result they anticipated; but there was no intention to say more than to express my personal impression and hope that it would not be necessary to open the tariff at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Was this an assurance to the sugar combine of Montreal?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to find that the Government have taken a new way of communicating to the public their intentions with regard to public policy. There is a great deal of interest felt now in what are called the combines. In Montreal there are a number of combines now, and I see by this morning's paper that there is a new combine, a combine of wringers, that is, proprietors of washing machines. In Montreal we have a cotton combine, a flour combine, a sugar combine, a rubber combine, a shirt-makers' combine, and an undertakers' combine. We cannot even get buried on moderate terms now, though, no doubt, the Government would like to bury some of us. Though it may be proper for the Government to send this statement through the press, I think it would not be wise to follow that as a principle hereafter, because it is very unwise and very unfair to lay down an absolute statement that there shall not be any changes in the tariff. Some of these combines may make claims for the services which they have rendered to the Government within the last two years, and the Government may be hampered in dealing with their claims by a statement of this kind. I think it would not be wise for the Government to adopt that course in order to inform the public of their intentions. I was rather sorry to hear the Finance Minister say that he had given this as a sort of authoritative statement. At first he said he had not made an authoritative statement on the subject, but afterwards he said something which meant that it was an authoritative statement. If he is going to give this sort of information to the press, let him give it to all the papers; let him give it to the Herald, the true organ of public opinion.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 4:10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 29th February, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

The following member, having previously taken the oath according to law, and subscribed the roll containing the same, took his seat in the House:—

GEORGE F. BAIRD, Esquire, Member for the Electoral District of Queen's, N.B., introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and the Hon. Mr. Foster.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS presented the First Report of the Select Committee appointed to supervise the Debates of this House. He said: With the leave of the House I move that this report be now adopted. It is desirable that no delay should occur in the arrangements for the reporting and publishing of the Debates. These are only preliminary arrangements, and ought to be adopted immediately in order that the work may go on.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think, before we adopt that report, we ought to know what it is.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It has just been read.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it should lie upon the Table of the House, in order that we may have an opportunity of studying it.

Mr. DESJARDINS. There is nothing in it but the appointment of a reporter to succeed Mr. Eyvel, and a recommendation of the same arrangements that we have made the last two years, because the Government printing establishment is not yet in operation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it had better stand over.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved:

That the report of the Special Committee appointed to strike the Select Standing Committees be adopted.

He said: With the consent of the House, I propose to strike from the Committee on Agriculture the name of the Minister of Militia, and insert the name of Mr. Gigault.

Mr. LAURIER. I would at the same time propose that the name of Mr. Langelier (Montmorency) be substituted for that of Mr. Chouinard.

Motion agreed to; said committees being composed as follows:—

REPORT.

Report of the Royal Commission on Railways.—(Mr. Pope.)

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask the Minister of Agriculture, if the report of his department has been brought down, or when he expects to bring it down.

Mr. CARLING. The report of the department of Agriculture is made up to the end of the year, and it will be laid on the Table in about two weeks.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to make a suggestion to the First Minister. He may have observed that I have given notice of a motion to discuss the trade relations between this country and the United States. Now, it has been represented to me by several members, including some members on the other side of the House, that, in dealing with a motion of this kind, it would be convenient that we should name some definite day on which it might be taken up, and I think it would also be convenient and suit the convenience of the hon. gentlemen, as well as ours, that when once begun the discussion should proceed with and be disposed of de die in diem. It is obvious that it cannot be disposed of in a single evening, in all probability, and it will be very inconvenient, as the hon. gentleman is aware, to throw it over for three or four days. I do not propose to move in the matter now, but I would suggest, if convenient to the First Minister and to the House, that we might name Wednesday of next week for the discussion, and then proceed with it de die in diem.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no objection. I quite agree that this is a very important subject, and should be discussed de die in diem until the whole matter is disposed of. I have no objection to name Wednesday, which will be a very good day, because Wednesday and Thursday belong to the House and not to the Government; with this reservation, that if the protocols are not ready to be sent down, it will be postponed until the House is in possession of all the papers on the fishery question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he would like to have the discussion postponed if the protocols are not ready?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, and on these terms Wednesday would be a very good day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps, then, the First Minister will be able to ascertain to-morrow whether they will be ready or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They will be forwarded to Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Otherwise it would be inconvenient to name a day, and then have to adjourn the debate indefinitely.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It will be known in time.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, an approved Minute of Council, appointing the Right Honorable Sir John Macdonald, G.C.B., President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, the Honorable Sir Hector Langevin, K.C.M.G., Minister of Public Works, the Honorable Sir Charles Tupper, G.C.M.G., Minister of Finance, and the Honorable Mr. Costigan, Minister of Inland Revenue, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as Commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the Act, Chapter 13 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intitled: "An Act respecting the House of Commons."

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,

OTTAWA, 28th February, 1888.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 3) to protect the owners of certain bottles and other vessels therein mentioned.—(Mr. Denison.)

PRESCOTT AND RUSSELL DISTRICT JUDICIARY.

Mr. LABROSSE asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to appoint, at an early day, a Judge for the Judicial District of the Counties of Prescott and Russell, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Daniels, which occurred last spring?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the intention of the Government to make that appointment at an early date.

ELECTORAL LISTS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What is the total amount paid, up to date, for the preparation, revision, &c., of the voters' lists, since the coming into force of the Electoral Franchise Act; and what is the amount claimed for salaries, disbursements, &c., by revising officers, and not yet paid?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. This question should rather have been made in the form of an address. I may say to the hon. member that in the report which will shortly be published on the expenses and the impressions of these electoral lists, a portion of the information asked for will be found. But the item is a considerable one, and I think the hon. member would do better to give notice for an address. At all events, he will have his answer in a report which will be laid before the House within two or three days.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I should like to learn from the hon. Minister if the amount of sums claimed and not yet paid will appear in this report?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes.

ELECTORAL DISTRICT OF DORCHESTER.

Mr. AMYOT asked, On what date was the warrant of the Speaker of the House of Commons issued and transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery for the election of a member for the electoral district of Dorchester, in the place of the late H. Duchesnay?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The order of the Speaker was emanated on the 23rd August, and received in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery the following day.

MONTREAL HARBOR.

Mr. DESJARDINS (for Mr. CURRAN) asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to take measures to relieve the harbor of Montreal of the charge of interest on the cost of deepening the channel of Lake St. Peter?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In reply to the hon. member, I may state that this question is under the present consideration of the Government.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What is the total amount of the receipts and of the expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway during the last four fiscal years?

Mr. POPE. In 1883-4 the earnings of the road were $2,353,647.26, and the working expenses, $2,344,579.09; in 1884-5 the earnings were $2,368,153.65 and the working expenses, $2,411,477.91; in 1885-6 the earnings were $2,383,200.77 and the working expenses, $2,489,243.61; in 1886-7 the earnings were $2,596,009.83, and the working expenses, $2,828,115.58.

COMMISSIONERS ON INDIAN LANDS NEAR CAYUGA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. At what date Walter Jones and ———Glenroy were appointed Commissioners to value improvements and report on titles to certain Indian lands occupied by squatters in the vicinity of Cayuga? 2. Whether said appointment was made by Order in Council or by the Department of Indian Affairs? 3. Whether a circular was issued by the said Department during the month of October, 1887, to the occupants of said lands, advising them of said appointment and of the duties of the said Commissioners?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In obedience to repeated requests for the settlement of this question Messrs. Walter Jones and Robert Glenny were appointed on the 15th October, 1887, to inspect and value certain Indian lands occupied by squatters in the town lot of Cayuga which had been surveyed by Mr. Decew, P.L.S., in the year 1883. The appointment of these gentlemen was made by the Department of Indian Affairs. A circular was issued by the said department on the 28th October, 1887, to the occupants of the said lands, advising them of the appointment of Messrs. Walter Jones and Robert Glenny and of the duties assigned to them in connection with the inspection and valuation of the said lands, and informing each of the squatters that if his title to the improvements made on the land is found to be correct, he would have an opportunity of purchasing such land as he occupied.

CAYUGA POST OFFICE

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, 1. Whether a lot of land was purchased in the village of Cayuga as a site for a post office, and if so, what was agreed to be paid for same? 2. What is the estimated cost of erecting a post office in the said village of Cayuga?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A lot was purchased for $450. A contract has been given for the erection of the buildings, the amount of the contract being $7,874.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND STEAM COMMUNICATION.

Mr. PERRY asked, Have the Dominion Government taken any steps towards carrying out the suggestions of Earl Granville, contained in his despatch to Lord Lansdowne, dated March 30th, 1886, on the subject of carrying out the terms of Confederation on the part of the Federal Government with the Province of Prince Edward Island, with respect to continuous efficient steam communication with the main land?

Mr. FOSTER. The Dominion Government are taking, from time to time, steps towards carrying out the suggestions of Earl Granville, contained in his despatch to Lord Lansdowne, dated March 30th, 1886, on the subject of carrying out the terms of Confederation on the part of the Federal Government with the Province of Prince Edward Island, with respect to continuous efficient steam communication with the main land?

EXPORTS AND IMPORTS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved for:

Return, in the form used in the Statements usually published in the Gazette, of the Exports and Imports from the 1st day of July, 1887, to the 1st day of March, 1889, distinguishing the products of Canada and those of other countries.

He said: I have no objection, if it will facilitate the matter, to the Minister of Customs producing this return, minus British Columbia, as is very often done.

Mr. BOWELL. Very well.

TRADE COMBINATIONS.

Mr. WALLACE moved:

That a Select Committee be appointed to examine into the nature, extent and effect of certain combinations said to exist with reference to the purchase and sale in Canada of any foreign or Canadian products, with power to send for persons, papers and records.

And further, with power to examine persons called before the committee on oath.

Said committee to consist of Messrs. Bain (Soulanges), Bain (Wentworth), Béchard, Boyle, Casgrain, Daly, Flynn, Gillmor, Guillet, Grandbois, Landry, McDougald (Pictou), McKay, Paterson (Brant), Wood (Westmoreland), and the mover.

He said: The question that I have to submit to the consideration of the House to-day is one of very considerable importance. The question of the nature and the extent of the various combines in this country demands at the hands of this Parliament the fullest investigation, not only because it affects the issue as to whether the people are to pay higher prices for manufactured articles and other products under the influence of these com-

binés and trusts, but also because in it are involved the important interests of public morality and personal freedom of action. Certain combinations of persons engaged in the same lines of trade and business are necessary and proper for the legitimate conduct of their affairs; and on this point the Chicago Board of Trade has passed a resolution defining the fundamental principles common to Exchanges, and of Boards of Trade, which resolution I will take the liberty of reading to the House. The resolution declares the purposes of such associations to be:

"To maintain a commercial exchange; to promote uniformity in the customs and usages of merchants; to inculcate principles of justice and equity in trade; to facilitate the speedy adjustment of business disputes; to acquire and disseminate valuable commercial and economic information; and generally to secure to its members the benefits of co-operation in the furtherance of their legitimate pursuits."

These are the lines laid down, not, perhaps, in so many words, but generally by the Boards of Trade of this country, and also may be considered the lines upon which manufacturing industries may combine legitimately. We are told that various Boards of Trade, that combinations of various kinds of manufacturing industries, have gone further than this. We are told that they have combined to regulate prices, and not only to regulate the prices at which the manufacturers shall sell, but also the prices at which the dealers are bound to sell. We have here the evidence of a Montreal firm, Lightbound, Ralston & Co., who refused to join the sugar combine, and who made the following statement, and it is an important one, as showing that this not only affects the manufacturers but the dealers:—

"The Wholesale Grocers' Guild succeeded last September in getting the refiners committed to an arrangement whereby firms whose names were not on the list had to pay rather more than $\frac{1}{4}$ cent per lb. on yellow, and nearly $\frac{1}{2}$ cent per lb. on white sugars, more than members of the Guild were paying, and at the same time, with every 100 barrels of granulated had to purchase 200 barrels of yellow sugar, whether in want of the latter or not."

The effect of which was virtually to drive all those out of the business who were not members of this Grocers' Guild. I have here a copy of the agreement which is said to have been signed by this Grocers' Guild, of which I will read two clauses:

"We, the subscribers to this agreement, hereby covenant and agree for ourselves and with each other to faithfully and honorably perform and carry out the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth for the regulation and sale of all graded sugars.

"Any firm or individual belonging to this association who shall sell the articles stipulated, or allow them to be sold, for less than the price fixed by the committee, shall be reported to the committee of arbitration, and upon conviction of that fact to the satisfaction of the committee, said member shall be expelled from the association by a majority of the votes at any regular meeting, a vote of censure shall be placed upon the records and reported to all the manufacturers of the article in question."

Now, I think the effect of that would be to simply drive those men who do not conform to this cast-iron regulation out of the business. I think it is a most extraordinary proceeding, because it interferes with the freedom of trade, which is the right of men dealing in any article in this country. We know also, or we hear, that these combines are working in other directions. We know that in the article of coal, an article of most vital importance, more particularly to the inhabitants of cities, a ring has been in operation for many years, and that to the disadvantage of the people of this country. I have here a statement compiled by a New York paper, showing the cost of a ton of coal, the cost of handling a ton of coal, the amount of royalties to be paid, and, allowing for large profits, more than 25 per cent. for every one handling it, and showing that coal can be delivered in New York for $3.49 per ton. Estimating the same ratio of expenses, it would cost a little more, say, in the city of Toronto, but, in the calculation which I have here, and the details of which I will not trouble the House with, I find that the rates of freight are three-fourths of a cent per ton per mile, which is a larger amount than the Canadian Pacific Railway charges for the transport of wheat from Winnipeg to Montreal, and we know by experience that coal can be carried on our railroads at a much cheaper rate than wheat, in the proportion of three to five. It will cost $3 for the same weight of coal and $5 for the same weight of wheat. Thus, allowing a profit of not less than 25 per cent. to every one handling it, and more than that in many cases, coal could be sold in Toronto for $4 per ton, while to-day the price is not less than $7 a ton, and I believe more. Some have said that a scarcity of coal occurs, but such is not the case, because the coal miners have to shut down three months out of the twelve in the year, so that the production shall not be too great, so that the supply of coal on hand shall not be too large. They work nine months in the year to produce all the coal necessary for the wants of the United States, Canada and their other markets. I regard these combinations, applied not only to the manufacturers but to the dealers, as being of the most dangerous kind, and I think the Parliament of Canada should deal with and examine into them, as I propose this committee shall do, and report to Parliament in regard to the matter. We hear that there are combinations not only in sugar and in coal, but in many other articles. A combine is in existence to-day for oatmeal, for biscuits, for confectionery, for coal oil; and the financial success which has attended the operations of the combine and trusts already formed will naturally encourage other manufacturers and producers to go into this sort of arrangement from which there seems to be so much profit. We know further that many articles produced in England, which are not produced in this country, or not to any extent, or not of the same quality as those produced in the old country, are sold in Canada according to prices regulated in England. The manufacturer in England sells at a certain price, and he compels the Canadian dealer to sell those articles at not less than a certain figure. I think it should be the duty of this committee, if it should be the wish of the House to appoint it, to investigate these matters also. Some persons have said that the remedy for this state of affairs is to abolish the duties on these articles. I see that some newspapers have taken the ground that the remedy for the sugar combine is to abolish the duties on sugar. I do not agree with that proposition. I think the National Policy is calculated to stand on its own merits. I think that this country can abolish and destroy the combines without destroying the efficacy of the National Policy. Last year, the duty on coal was abolished, but, instead of the combine ceasing to have its influence and power, though we have free coal in Canada, of the kind commonly consumed in our houses, that combine is more powerful to-day than it was last year when there was a duty upon it, showing that the effect of the National Policy, the effect of the duties, has nothing to do with the combines which are formed. I would prefer to have the duty on an article, because we would control, if we can control, and I think we can, those matters more effectively in our own hands, in regard to articles produced in this country. We have precedents for the course we propose to be taken. In the United States, where those trusts and combines are more powerful than they are in Canada, we find that, in the State Legislature at Albany, they have introduced a Bill for the suppression of those combines. I have a copy of that Bill, and it deals most effectively with this question. After the House of Commons have investigated this matter, if necessary, if we cannot accomplish our purpose in any other way—and perhaps we cannot—we can follow the example set by the United States in this matter by bringing in a Bill which will have the effect of destroying and making illegal all these combines, which not only raise the prices to the people of Canada; but interfere with the trade of the country and are an excrescence on the National Policy.

Mr. EDGAR. If the House and the country required any evidence of the evil nature of combines, I think they will find it in the rather painful effort made by the mover of this resolution, to combine in one speech and in one motion a defence of the policy of protection with an attack upon combines. Now, Sir, when I saw this motion upon the paper I certainly thought a new era was dawning for this country, and that hon. gentlemen opposite, who have so long supported the policy of protection in all its features, had begun to see some new light upon the subject, and were yielding to the influence of public opinion, and were going, themselves, to strike the first blow against the policy of protection.

Mr. WALLACE. Oh, no.

Mr. EDGAR. Well, so far as the hon. gentleman's attack upon combines among trades went, I entirely agree with him and I entirely agree with his motion, so far as it goes; but, surely, he is not going as far as the country will require, when he leaves out of his motion combines among the manufacturers. Certainly we want to investigate the results of combines among importers and people who buy and sell. They may be all right—I do not say whether they are right or wrong; but certainly affairs have come to a pass when an investigation should take place as to whether they are right or wrong, and if wrong, some remedy should be found. When I saw this motion, I concluded that we had arrived at the third and last stage of the system of protection. The first stage, we know, was very pleasant for the manufacturers, at least. They had the market to themselves, and they made money, of course, at the expense of the consumers. Well, that lasted a while, until it became apparent to people who had money to invest that there were splendid opportunities for making money by going into some of these protected industries. Then everybody rushed in who could get a chance, and what the result was before long, in this country, is a matter of history. These highly protected industries were nearly all overdone, and the manufacturers in their turn suffered loss. Well, for a short time the consumers reaped the benefit of that, and the advocates of a high tariff told the country: "There you see, you are getting competition; that is what we promised you, you are getting competition, and you are getting cheap goods." As a result of this competition among the manufacturers the third stage of the protective system at last came on, namely, combines among manufacturers to protect themselves against the public. A great deal too much capital had been thrown into these protected industries, they were being worked at a loss, and the third stage has now arrived, that is to say, combines among the manufacturers against the people. Now, we see that exactly the same thing has occurred in the United States. It is true that it took a longer time to manifest itself there, the country being so large that it was more difficult to form combinations of all the persons engaged in the different industries. The new Morrill Tariff came into force in April, 1865, and it was not until the last year or two that these combines have been formed. It took more than 20 years for the interests who were suffering from the competition that naturally came about, to protect themselves by combines. But in Canada, being a much smaller country, we have reached the third stage much more rapidly, and we have caught up to the United States, although we have only been eight or nine years under a high protective tariff. Now, having met here to-day, we ought to try, in a statesmanlike manner, to find a remedy for the evils that exist. Not only at Albany, in the Legislature of the State of New York, as the hon. gentleman says, but in the Congress of the United States, committees have been formed to investigate this subject during the present Session. Now, I do not deny, Sir, that combines may exist without protection; in the case of anthracite coal, for instance, to which the hon. gentleman referred, a combination does exist in the United States, although the anthracite coal is not protected in that country. The reason for that is this: There is not a tariff protection, there is not an artificial protection, there is not a statutory protection on anthracite coal, but there is a protection by nature, because the United States is the only country in the world that produces that particular kind of coal, and therefore all they have to do in the case of this natural production is to make a combination. It might be just the same in Canada, in case maple sugar was not produced in the Northern States. We could form, without any protection on maple sugar, a combination here among the people who would buy it up or produce it, and no artificial tariff protection would be necessary to make a combination in a case of that kind. The case of anthracite coal being the subject of a combination is, I dare say, a very bad one, and one that should be looked into and put a stop to if we can do so. The article of anthracite coal being a subject of combination in Canada as well as the United States, arises from the fact that it is not produced anywhere else than in the United States, and it is the American combination that creates a subordinate combination—a small donkey engine to work out their larger scheme in Canada. It has nothing to do with the tariff either one way or the other. I quite agree with the hon. member that there are combines, or combinations or organisations, that are perfectly lawful and perfectly legitimate. The combinations among workingmen to maintain their own rights, the rights of labor, are, in my judgment, at all events, perfectly right and perfectly legitimate, so long as they keep within the bounds of the law. Then, trade associations are continually making combinations of a very proper character to assist one another in their mutual interests. But when combinations are accompanied by monopolies, there, I think, is the distinction and there is where we ought to interfere, whatever the remedy may be. My impression is that in regard to all those combinations in Canada which occur in articles which are protected by a high tariff, the simple and only radical remedy is to remove those duties and let in foreign competition, and that will kill the combination at once. Other combinations that are not protected by the high tariff may require special legislation, and I dare say this committee will discover it. Public opinion has been aroused very strongly in the United States on this subject. In Congress a committee was appointed this very Session, very much of the same character as the committee proposed, to enquire into and report upon the action of trusts and combines. Perhaps trusts and combines are more dangerous to the community in the United States than they have yet become here; at all events they have had more influence upon the public men and the politicians there than they appear to have had here. I did hope to hear my hon. friend say that, if it were the fact, that the protective tariff renders those combines possible, he would go against the tariff. I hope yet to hear some hon. gentleman opposite make this statement, although my hon. friend has not done so. I will take the liberty of showing the House how some republican protectionists in the Congress of the United States, in the House of Representatives at all events, have taken ground above party on this question, and while they affirm themselves to be adherents of a policy of protection, they say that if it has had the effect, which is attributed to it by the public in the United States to-day, of fostering those combines, they will go for a reduction of duties. Mr. Mason, of Chicago, is an active republican protectionist. He introduced the first resolution on the subject in Congress in January, and it was referred to the Committee on Manufactures, which brought in a recommendation to the House with a more comprehensive resolution of the same character. In the debate that took place on the 26th January upon the latter resolution, Mr. Mason used these words:

"There are some industrious and energetic men in this country who would like to have a corner upon sunshine, and levy a tariff, of a thousand dollars each, on every ray of foreign sunlight."

Then he was asked by Mr. Nelson of Minnesota:

"Have you any doubt in your own mind that the tariff laws indirectly co-operate to aid these trusts?"

Mr. Mason, in reply, said:

"I will say, in response to the gentleman from Minnesota, that I have no doubt there is a class of trusts and a class of men who take advantage of the tariff laws. We, who believe in a higher protective tariff, think there should be some way to avoid taking advantage of the laws and perverting them from their proper purpose. But so far as I am concerned, expressing also, I believe, the sentiments of the people of my district, I presume if there is a proper way of meeting the difficulty this committee can report a proper Bill, but if there is no way to protect the people from these exactions of trusts except the revision of the tariff, so far as I am concerned, I am ready to vote for that now."

I sincerely hope that before the discussion in the country upon this question of combines is finished, we shall find members willing to acknowledge the error, just as Mr. Mason has done as representing his district, which means Chicago, and that they will come forward and say that if it is necessary to remove those duties to prevent combines, they will do so. It is impossible to deny that the feeling in this country against these combines is general, and it is not confined to one set of political thinkers or one class of men. I could quote a very strong article in the New York Herald of Monday last, headed: "Trusts worse than Slavery," in which the trusts are attacked in a most vigorous manner. I do not say that the New York Herald is an infallible authority, but I do say this, that, like the London Times, it tries to go with public opinion, and it may be fairly taken on any great question as representing the public opinion of the day. But we do not require to go to New York to find strong language in the independent press against combines. There is a newspaper published in Montreal, which certainly is not a Liberal paper, it prides itself on being an independent paper, but I have always thought that the Montreal Star was more Conservative than Liberal.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg your pardon.

Mr. EDGAR. I didn't say the Herald; I would not venture to quote the language of that organ of public opinion, the Herald, when the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is here himself. However, I would like to read to the House a short article from the Montreal daily Star, published on the 14th inst., on this subject, and I would commend it to the attention of my hon. friends opposite. It is headed, "The Combines," and is as follows:—

"The question of the suppression of 'the combines' is not merely a question of the whole nation paying a cent or two a pound more for its sugar than it need pay. It is the growth of the 'combine' system that we have to fear. The rapid development of the trade trusts in the United States and the financial success of the trusts in Canada is alarming. Soon every article, the manufacture of which requires the investment of large capital, will be controlled by a trust in the United States, and the spectacle of Canadian commercial corporations earning more than the amount of their whole capital in a single year must prove very tempting to those manufacturers in Canada who have not yet formed 'combines.' The abolition of the protective duties on the articles controlled by the Canadian 'combines,' at the earliest possible day, has become an imperative necessity. The friends of the National Policy must see that this is necessary. The only possible alternative is free trade; and of the two evils, free trade or 'combines' protected at the expense of the nation, we prefer free trade. We believe that under the peculiar conditions which prevail in Canada protection is absolutely necessary to the development of the country—"

So you see this is a protectionist organ.

"—but protection for the benefit of 'combines,' protection to make wealthy monopolists more wealthy, is impossible in a free country.

While 'combines' are protected, the National Policy is in danger. There is another danger to be feared from these gigantic trade monopolies: they constitute a menace to our political freedom."

I would particularly commend that to the attention of the hon. gentleman opposite,—

"They can afford to make liberal contributions to campaign funds out of their enormous profits, in return for the protection afforded them by law."

That is not in the United States, Sir, it is in Canada,—

"In the interests of political morality as well as in the interests of the Canadian consumer, the 'combines' must go."

Now, Sir, I have no doubt that the hon. mover of this motion does not desire to shut out from his committee enquiry into combines which we are told exist among manufacturers, and I dare say the hon. gentleman will accept an amendment which I offer to his resolution, in order to make the investigation include such combines. I also think that the object which he has in moving his resolution, and which I am sure the whole House will have in supporting it, would be promoted by his adding a provision that the committee, in addition to examining into the subject, should suggest to the House what, if any, changes in the law seem to be necessary in the public interest. I am sure he cannot want this committee simply to be an examining committee without any authority or direction from the House to make practical suggestions. In the States they call such committees "smelling committees," and I am sure he does not want this to be a committee simply to smell out grievances and leave them there, but he wants it to suggest some remedy. I have a strong conviction myself that the only real remedy for combines which are protected by a high tariff, is to reduce the duty. But there may be some combines which are not affected by the tariff and which would require some other remedies, and I have no doubt we would all be glad to know what they are. Therefore, in order to include manufacturing combines, I move:

That the said resolution be amended by adding after the word "sale" in the third line thereof, the words, "or manufacture and sale."

Mr. GUILLET. Having seen this resolution before it was moved, and having had some conversation with the mover of it, I am sure he fully intended that the enquiry should cover all combinations, whether those of manufacturers or others, and, therefore, I presume there will be no objection on his part to the amendment. The hon. member who has spoken last might have spared us the ebullition of feeling which, on every occasion on which the question of the National Policy arises, is displayed by the other side of the House. But I suppose we ought not to complain that those gentlemen feel so sore about the National Policy. A little boy once said to his mother: "Mother, I wish you would make sister stop crying every time I strike her with a club." It would be equally unreasonable for us to complain of those gentlemen becoming indignant every time they feel that club. It is well known that the advocates of the National Policy in this House and in the country intended not only that it should stimulate manufactures, but also that it should promote competition in the country; and the patriotic object of this resolution is to see that any attempt which may be made to destroy competition should be prevented. I do not think the people would be willing to see the National Policy wiped out. There are evils incident to every progressive movement and to every reform, as has been well shown by writers on progressive government and political economy, and it is necessary to watch these evils. It is necessary that the friends of the National Policy should discover what these incidental evils are, in order to see that the people of Canada shall not lose the great blessings that have been brought to them by that policy. I say we would be no better off if we removed protection and exposed ourselves to greater combinations which we could not get rid of, whereas now we have only to deal with combinations which we can get rid of. What was said in a report to the British House of Commons? The laboring classes are very little aware of the extent to which they are often indebted for being employed at all, to the capitalists, and of the immense losses which their employers voluntarily incur in order to destroy foreign competition and keep possession of foreign markets. Instances are well known of employers having carried on their works at a loss of £300,000 or £400,000 in order to meet and crush foreign competition. These large capitalists are the great instruments of warfare against competing capitalists in foreign countries. "It is the duty of English manufacturers," says Lord Brougham, "to crush foreign industries in their cradle." To such influences as these would our infant industries be exposed were it not for protection, and were protection removed ruin would soon overtake them. There are other ways of curing the evils, which are of lesser moment as compared with the blessings that have flowed from the National Policy, than by destroying that policy itself. The people, though in some cases unjustly alarmed by exaggerated reports, are not opposed to the National Policy. All they require is that where evils exist, they should be remedied by the strong hand of the law. Modern writers have admitted that the most advanced civilisations are subject to these evils, and that by legislation we must prevent combinations and conspiracies against the individual freedom of the trader. The enquiry we propose to make is not in the interests of the manufacturer, but in the interests of the people, and I trust the Government will grant this committee. I am sure it will result in good; I am sure the result of its deliberations will be to check the evils that may have arisen, if they are such as they have been represented to be, but we know that grave exaggerations and misrepresentations have been made on this subject. I do not think the evils are as extensive as they are represented to be, but, such as they are, this committee will discover them and apply the remedy. Even in the days of free trade, even in that period which is called by comparison the free trade period of Canada, there were rings. There were coal oil rings, and salt rings, and other rings under the administration of the gentlemen opposite, so that these evils cannot be attributed to a protective tariff. In those days of free trade, rings existed which raised the prices of necessaries of life, and yet they were not taken hold of and suppressed by the Government then in power. I will not take up the time of the House by any further remarks in seconding this resolution. It would only prejudice the case to enter into any attack on these combinations, before they have any opportunity of representing their side of the question. They may show that they are not guilty of the charges so recklessly made; and I trust that when the enquiry is made, we will be able to show, by most satisfactory evidence to the House, that we have put the merits of this question on a footing that will enable the House to deal with it in an intelligent manner.

Mr. LISTER. The motion made by the hon. gentleman who introduced this resolution is a timely motion indeed, but I would say to him what has been often said before of men who seek to occupy antagonistic positions, that he cannot chew meal and whistle at the same time. He cannot condemn the combine and at the same time attempt to sustain the so-called National Policy or high tariff policy of this Administration. So far as the combines are concerned or the trusts, they are the natural and inevitable outcome of a high protective tariff, but before I enter into the question at any great length, I desire to say to the hon. gentleman and the Government, that it is ungenerous and ungrateful on their part to make this attack upon the manufacturers of the country. Does not the hon. gentleman remember that it is largely owing to the influence of these manufacturers that he probably holds his seat to day? Does he not remember the celebrated meeting that took place in 1882, in the Queen's Hotel, at which the First Minister presided? Does he not remember how numerous that meeting was attended, and has he forgotten the almost historic words of his right hon. leader, when the latter reminded the manufacturers that he was the monkey in the tree shaking the acorns and they were the hogs below eating it, and that they had to come down, and they did come down? What was the result? Why, in 1882, it is an open secret, which men who profess to know anything of politics in this country will not deny, that the manufacturers subscribed liberally to the election fund. Immediately after the elections, at the next Session, had we not the spectacle of these corridors filled with deputations of manufacturers from all over, and do we not know that at the solicitation of those men the Government were forced to increase the burdensome duties they had already put on the people. When it was proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite to inaugurate a system of high taxation in this country, contrary to the teachings of every eminent authority in the world on political economy, when they pretended they could make something out of nothing, when they pretended they could bring about prosperity by high taxation, did we not tell them the effect would be to wring from the consumers of the country a large portion of their earnings, to their detriment. We were answered with the statement that the result of the policy would be to bring about competition, and that the products of the factory would be lessened instead of increased in price. How has it turned out? We told those hon gentlemen then that, as soon as the manufacturers found they were not manufacturing at a profit, they would combine for the purpose of keeping up prices, and that the result would be disastrous. The policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite invited the investment of millions of money of the people of this country in manufactures, and the result was that when the times which we predicted did come, those men came back to this Parliament, and last Session we had the manufacturers again from all parts of the country seeking the reward for what they had paid out in the elections of 1882. The manufacturers as they had met in Toronto, met again in 1887, and we know the First Minister told them they would have to subscribe, and they did subscribe, to the election fund. Last Session, in consequence of this, the Minister of Finance introduced Tariff resolutions largely adding to the burdens of the people, and now, when the hon. gentleman who moves this resolution, remembers the past, does it not strike him that he is acting in a rather ungenerous and ungrateful manner towards the men who have done so much for him. He tells us we must legislate against these manufacturers, these combines and trusts. His simplicity is refreshing. Does he think these men are going to be suppressed by any legislation that can take place in this House? Does he not know that the true remedy for this great and crying evil is to reduce taxation, so that competition will come into play, and these men be compelled to sell at proper prices? These combinations have become a natural burden and a disgrace, and the Government and their supporters will yet have to answer to the people for permitting such a state of things to exist. Look at it. We have in this country, under this tariff, sugar combinations selling sugar to the people at double or nearly double the price at which it can be obtained in other countries. We have iron combinations, we have cotton combinations, we have rubber goods combinations, we have twine combinations, compelling the farmers of this country to pay over $200,000 more for the twine they use in harvesting their harvest than they otherwise would. All these combinations are existing to-day, taking millions of dollars every year out of the people and creating a class of monopolists who are becoming enormously wealthy at the cost of the people of this country; and, as their wealth increases, so do these combinations increase; and the result could not be otherwise than to have the state of affairs in the business world such as we have never witnessed before. Hon. gentlemen may talk about the times we have to-day, about the favorable condition of things and the prosperity of the country, but no man who goes through this country to-day, no man who knows anything about the affairs of Canada to-day will say that the statements made by those hon. gentlemen are at all supported by facts. This has been a Government of monopolies from first to last. They have created railway monopolies, they have created monopolies in everything that is manufactured in Canada to-day, and they are grinding out of the great body of consumers the last farthing for the purpose of enriching these men. It is a startling thing to learn that one factory in one of the Lower Provinces should have been able in one year to make a profit to the extent of its whole capital, to pay an enormous dividend, and to pay all the liabilities which were against it; that another should have been able to make a profit of $100,000; and we have the fact that the little Magog factory in the Province of Quebec required and obtained for the purpose of starting and supporting it an enormous duty on print goods, so that every old lady throughout the country must pay a larger price on the print goods she has to wear than she otherwise would. It is time that such a state of things as that was stopped, and it is time that the Government should take the matter in hand by offering the true remedy—which is not to prosecute these men for doing what the law permits, because those prosecutions are never successful—but which is to reduce the tariff of this country, and then these matters will regulate themselves.

Mr. SPROULE. I think it is one characteristic of the present Administration that, whenever an evil is apparent in the country that can be remedied by legislation, they are prepared to come forward and effect that legislation, and this present proposal will, I am sure, be endorsed by the people of this country. I was not a little surprised to hear the rule laid down by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister), when he said that "these rings are the natural outcome of a high protective tariff." That hon. gentleman must surely forget that one of the worst rings we have ever experienced in this country was at a time when we had only a 17½ per cent. tariff—I mean the coal oil ring, and I might add the salt ring, and other rings which were just as bad as any we have to-day. I think that hon. gentleman has fallen sadly from grace in the last few months. If my memory is not at fault, I think last year he supported the Government very strongly when they proposed to keep up the duty on coal oil.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken as to the position I took on the coal oil duty. I said that as long as this pernicious system existed—

Mr. MITCHELL. You wanted a share in the plunder.

Mr. SPROULE. When the gentleman's own interests were at stake, he was ready to defend the action of the Government; he was classed at that time among those bloated aristocrats and manufacturers, because he was engaged in the trade.

Mr. LISTER. I am not engaged in the trade.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. LISTER. I have a right to correct the hon. gentleman. I am not engaged in that trade; I never was; and, if all your statements are as true as that, it is very easy to estimate their value.

Mr. SPROULE. All I can say is that I was informed at the time by some of his own friends that he was engaged in the trade, and that was why he was defending that duty, and I thought they were reliable men. Of course I am satisfied to accept the hon. gentleman's explanation; but, instead of making an attack on the National Policy, he should commend those hon. gentlemen who are proposing this means to remedy a grievance which exists in this country. It is yet in its inception, and the time to stop an evil is when it is not great in magnitude. I think the appointment of this committee will be a warning to those who propose to go into these combines, and it may have the effect of preventing these enormous evils from growing. An investigation of this kind will show how far this country is suffering from the combines. If there is no harm in them, there will be no need to provide a remedy, but if they are an evil, it is characteristic of this Government to provide a remedy. To say that combines are due to the National Policy is to say that which is not borne out by facts. What has a high tariff to do with it when in some cases there is no duty at all; such, for instance, as the combine in the trade to regulate the price of anthracite coal? Now on this there is no duty. This is one of the things that spring up under either a high or low tariff, when the people can combine for the purpose of advancing their own interests. We might refer to various lines. Take the lines of coffins and fixtures in reference to funerals and burial affairs, and we are credibly informed that the cost could be reduced one-half but for the fact that these injurious combines exist at the present time. I think it is right that a committee should be appointed on the subject so as to get the information we need on this matter. If the evils are of the magnitude represented, then the sooner the remedy is applied the better. The member for York (Mr. Wallace), and the hon. gentleman who supported him, are deserving of credit for coming forward at this early stage and endeavoring to elicit correct information on the subject so as to obtain a remedy if the evils are as great as they are represented to be to-day.

Mr. WALLACE. I think the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) was a little too previous in his denial of the statement of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule). I read that, last year, in response to the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), he denies that the foreign oil is better than the Canadian oil, and he says:

"I say that the oil manufactured here is equal to any petroleum oil manufactured in the world. We know perfectly well, as far as the United States are concerned, that the whole oil interest of the United States is practically controlled by the Standard Oil Company, and we know that they have been bringing oil into this country to sell at a less price than the cost of producing it, in order to get the control of this market. It would be against the interest of this large industry to do what my hon. friend suggests.

"Mr. MITCHELL. Is not 100 per cent. enough?

"Mr. LISTER. One hundred per cent.? The moment you strangle that industry you will get the price put up at once."

That is the remedy for these combines that he proposes now. Last year, he said, "Abolish the duty and the price will go up at once." The hon. member further said:

"The people of Canada are, to-day, getting their oil much cheaper than they ever did before. If my hon. friend from the sea thinks he will be able to get it much cheaper, perhaps he would for a time, but the moment the Standard Oil Company came here he would have to pay a higher price, and to put the trade restrictions which my hon. friend proposes here would be to give them an advantage of at least 15 or 20 per cent. more. So long as this is the policy of the Government, that industry—the oil industry—ought to be protected and preserved against the United States as any other in the country. If free trade is to be the order of the day, that interest must go with the rest, unable to exist without a high rate of duty; but if protection is to rule, that industry, which is a Canadian industry, a purely native one, an industry belonging purely to Canada, should be looked after as well as any other."

That was the view last year of the hon. gentleman for West Lambton (Mr. Lister.)

Mr. LISTER. That is my view this year.

Mr. WALLACE. He said, also, that the combines and National Policy must go together. Well, I say, too, Mr.

Speaker, that the combines must go, if they are found to be injurious to the interests of the country, but I say the National Policy must stay. These gentlemen went before the country a year ago, and told almost every constituency, at least in Ontario, that the National Policy was a dead issue, that they did not propose to deal with it, that the policy of protection had been adopted by the country; and their leader, Mr. Blake, in his Malvern speech, reiterated the same doctrine for the Reform party. But as soon as they came back to Parliament they renewed their old animosity against the National Policy and tried to make it responsible for every ill that flesh is heir to. The hon. gentleman said again that the products of manufacture had increased in price on account of the National Policy. Well, Sir, I have said and I repeat it again, that the National Policy has reduced the price of everything manufactured in this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! Oh!

Mr. WALLACE. Yes, I can go over a list of a hundred articles in common use in this country, cotton goods, woollen goods, iron goods, agricultural implements—everything that is consumed by the farmers, by the artisans, by all classes of the people, and I can demonstrate, one after the other, that all these articles are reduced in price on account of the National Policy. Why, take cotton alone. Ten years ago seven and a half million pounds of raw cotton was brought into this country and manufactured, while to-day exactly four times that quantity is manufactured here. More than that, the price of raw cotton ten years ago was almost precisely what it is to-day. What are the facts with reference to the manufacture of cotton. The quality is twice as good as it was then, and the price is 30 to 40 per cent. less than it was then. It is exactly the same with all other goods. But, Sir, the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar) by his remarks, has given us to understand, what we all knew before, that his object is not to investigate this matter, but to have a fling at the National Policy. He asks: Why do we not investigate the doings of the manufacturers? Well, if he had read over the motion as carefully as he might have done, he would have found that it covers an investigation into the products of manufacturers as well as the products brought into the country, whether raw material or manufactured articles. The resolution says:—

That a Select Committee be appointed to examine into the nature and extent and effect of certain combinations said to exist with reference to the purchase and sale, in Canada, of any foreign or Canadian products.

That, I presume, will include everything manufactured in Canada—to enquire fully into the sale, because we do not enquire how they manufacture their goods, the object is to enquire how they sell them, under what conditions they sell them after they manufacture them. Now, Sir, I state again, what I said before, that the moment we took the duty off coal in this country, it came more directly under the operation of a combine in the United States. The hon. gentleman told us that the combine in the United States regulated the price here. Now, I deny that. I have the evidence of a dealer in coal in the city of Ottawa, who tells me to-day that he can sell coal at any figure he chooses. The combination as to the sale of it is made outside of Canada, and he has the privilege of selling coal at $4 a ton, if he chooses. There is no restriction in the purchase price in Canada. And so we find that the great evil in regard to coal, is the fact that the dealers in Canada have combines in each of the cities to raise the price, and keep it at a price which is extortionate to those who require to buy. Further, he said that we should have power to do something. Now, I am informed by Dr. Wilson, the Law Clerk of the House, that the resolution as it stands now, carries full power to investigate all things connected with this matter. So far as the amendment is concerned, it is a harmless one. It says, "or manufacture and sale," after the word "sale." If it will ease the mind of my hon. friend, I have no objection to incorporate that in the resolution, but it does not make the resolution go any further than it does now.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is a little unfortunate that this great subject should come up at this stage. For my own part, I did not intend to discuss it, and would not have done so, although the hon. gentleman would not accept the suggestion I made. I told him I thought we had better accept the resolution at this stage without further discussion; but he has gone on and has brought up my name in connection with the motion I made last year in relation to coal oil. Now, Sir, I am going to support the motion for a committee to enquire into this motion of combines. I believe it is a crying and a growing evil, and the hon. gentleman in my eye never said a truer thing than that we should endeavor to kill it before it got too powerful. We should scotch the snake before it got too big and powerful. But, Sir, it has already acquired great power. It is a well known fact that in the city of Montreal, and I suppose it is the same in Toronto and Quebec, and the cities west, almost every man who has money to invest, seeing the enormous protection the duties have given to all the great industries, and enormous duties put upon the chief articles of consumption in this country, such as cotton, sugar, woollens, and boots and shoes,—these capitalists have invested their money in these stock companies; and the effect is that you can scarcely find four out of five of the people who have money to invest, who have not put in it into some of these stock companies that have been paying such large returns. Now, Sir, I have seen this evil growing, and when the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution attempts to justify protection as it stands to-day, or the National Policy, as he chooses to call it—when he seeks a justification for these enormous profits that have been paid, and finds fault with the hon. gentleman in relation to the oil question, because he protected the interest of his constituents, I want to say that I did oppose the enormous duty which the people of the country are paying for oil, which I tell him to-day is about 125 per cent. I opposed it, but the hon. gentleman, while opposing the National Policy, sustained the continuance of the duty on oil. Why? Because it is one of the great industries of his county, and he took the ground that if we are to have high duties, if it is the policy of this country to have duties ranging from 10 to 150 per cent, his constituents might just as well have the benefit of it as not, and if I had been in his place I would have done the same thing. But I happen to live in a constituency which has none of these great national industries which are protected, nor any of those great manufactures which have been fostered and encouraged to an abnormal extent. Sir, I say I am a National Policy man to-day, as that policy was declared in 1878, when the maximum was declared to be 25 per cent, ranging from 2½ to 5, 10, 15, and up to 25. Well, Sir, if it had staid at that, I would have been satisfied with it, but it has been going on until it has reached from 90 to 145 per cent. Hon. gentlemen who supported it as I did, have felt that they have been drifting into an extreme protection which they never contemplated when they started. I, for one, never contemplated such enormous duties as have been placed upon many articles of common consumption. For what was the National Policy adopted? What was the argument used on every platform in the country from Cape Breton to Victoria to induce the people to support the National Policy? It was this:—it was my own argument, and it was used by others,—That we should like free trade with the United States if we could get it, but failing to get it we would endeavor to keep our own pastures for our own cattle, and protect the infant industries of the country against the powerful industries of the neighboring republic.

Mr. WALLACE.

But there is no one who dreamed when the fight was waged in 1878 that if the United States were ready to come in and open their markets to us we would have refused to reciprocate and open our markets to them. The position has changed from a maximum protection of 25 per cent. to one amounting, in some instances, to 145 per cent., as I was informed by a gentleman of the utmost reliability, a leading merchant in Montreal, the other day, that it had reached in some instances. With respect to coal the mover of the motion has used the words: "up to the time coal became free." Why coal is not free. Three-fourths of the coal used in Montreal is coal from Nova Scotia, which is protected to the extent of fifty cents a ton. Does the hon. gentleman say that is free coal? It is a tax on the industries of Canada.

Mr. HESSON. It applies to coal used for manufactures only.

Mr. MITCHELL. Get out; you do not know anything about it. You are talking about what you do not know. Three-fourths of the coal used in Montreal is soft coal, not hard coal.

Mr. HESSON. It is soft coal that is taxed.

Mr. MITCHELL. You had better talk about something you know about. The Government have taken off the duty on hard coal. Why? It suited the west to take off the duty on hard coal. They left the duty on soft coal, which affects the whole eastern portion of the Dominion. Was it right, fair, or just? A few words with respect to the question of oil, to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If I were in the position of the hon. gentleman, representing a constituency in which a great oil industry existed, a natural industry of the country, while the policy of protection prevails in regard to the different industries to such an enormous extent as the policy of this Government has extended, I would have supported a duty on oil as a protection to my own people. But there is another question that comes up in relation to this oil matter, and, I dare say, it may not please the hon. gentleman that I should refer to it. It is this: It is not only the duty on oil, but this Government maintains a system in dealing with this oil question, which presses even more hardly than any other matter you may name. I will tell you what it is. They allow the native producer to transport oil in bulk; they prevent the foreign importer from transporting oil otherwise than in barrels, and the consequence is that it nearly doubles the duty upon the oil consumers of the country. That is a state of things which should not be permitted. I brought this matter before the House last year, and it was stated that it could not be considered that year, but the Government seemed to hint that another year it would be considered. I did not get at the bottom of it then, but I have got at the bottom of it since. A delegation came down from the west, and some of the strong supporters of the Administration were upon that delegation, strong powerful oil men whose influence pervades several western constituencies. They came here and said: "If that motion is carried, if that view is entertained by this Government, it will practically take away all our profits in oil, as it would permit foreign oil to be imported in bulk," while the present system adds 50 per cent. to the cost by compelling the importers to transport it in barrels. I am not going into the question further on such a motion as that now before the House. I do not think it is the right time or the right way to accomplish what we are aiming at; but I will tell the mover of the motion that if he really desires to put a stop to combines and prevent the evil effects which they exert, and the enormous tax they impose on the people who are the consumers and wearers of the manufactures made in this country, and which are enormously protected, the proper way is to reduce the tariff down to reasonable protection, such a protection as will enable those industries to exist. A better way still is to let the Government take hold of this question in earnest; let them say to the Government of the United States: "We desire to deal with you, a people of 65,000,000; we are willing to come in; we simply put on these duties to protect the little industries we possess, and if you are willing to come to terms with us we will throw down the bars, and let you in and adopt a reasonable tariff." That is the true way to kill the combines. I must admit that the appointment of a committee may be beneficial, if it is honestly carried out, and impartial witnesses on both sides are brought before it, and the examination taken and given to the public, so that the public may be let into the secrets, not only of the combines but of the men who desire their repression. If that is done it will do some good, but the true course to pursue is to reduce the tariff, to bring it down to what is reasonable and just, to reasonable protection for our manufactures and our people. That is what should be done, and if that course were adopted it would result in benefit to Canada. I trust the Finance Minister, whose ability no one doubts, who has pursued a course in relation to this tariff which, if followed by any one else, would not have been carried, and who more than any other man is responsible for this tariff which is upon us, will take this matter into his serious consideration. I do not say this out of any ill-feeling to him, for he knows that I feel friendly to him and like to see him occupy the position he does occupy—for I cannot occupy it myself—and I trust he will take it into his serious consideration and endeavor to prevent those great combines from getting a hold, not only on the country alone, but on the Government of the country—I fear they have it now, I fear the combinations had to give such subscriptions that they have a hold upon the Administration, and if it is so, poor unfortunate Canada, I pity you! I hope it is not so, I trust they are not yet too powerful, and that the hon. gentleman, whose great ability every one admits, will put a stop to the combines which are growing and surrounding and grappling every one of us.

Mr. McNEILL. I have been somewhat amused by the remedy which the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat proposes we should adopt to meet these terrible combines. The hon. gentleman proposes we should hand ourselves over to the tender mercies of the gigantic combines of the United States, over which we can have no control whatsoever, and that is the plan which he would adopt to benefit the people of this country. It seems to me that we have a control over the combines in Canada, that we have no control whatever over the combines of the United States, and that about the most gigantic blunder we could possibly make would be to adopt the policy suggested by the hon. gentleman.

Amendment (Mr. Edgar) agreed to.

On the motion as amended,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have great pleasure, of course, in supporting the resolution for the appointment of the committee. I think it is desirable that this question should be enquired into. Facts may be brought to light which are not known at present, and perhaps distinctions will be perceived which are not now apparent. I simply rise for the purpose of saying that my hon. friend opposite had not consulted me before he put my name on the committee, and as I do not desire to act upon it, I would ask that he would substitute the name of Mr. Fisher for mine.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I think it is plain from the range the debate has taken that this is a matter which has engaged the attention of parties on both sides of the House; but I would suggest to the hon. mover of this motion, that he has overlooked a very important, though not numerous, political party in the formation of the committee. I refer to the third party, and I would suggest to him whether he ought not to put the name of the leader of that party, the hon. member for Northumberland, on the committee. Aside from that, I think there is no doubt that the hon. member would be of immense advantage to the committee from his familiarity with the modes in which these combines have operated.

Mr. MITCHELL. If you want that, you had better put the hon. Premier on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He knows too much.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I may suggest to him further that my hon. friend from West Ontario, who has a similar motion on the paper, should also be added to the committee. If the hon. gentleman wishes to balance either of those names by adding the name of another gentleman from that side of the House, I am sure we shall be perfectly satisfied. So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to allow my name to be withdrawn in order that the name of either of these gentlemen may be substituted for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must decline serving. It is not customary to impose a duty of that kind on the leader of a party.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. This motion seems to be approved of unanimously by the House. References have been made to the discussion which took place last Session on the oil question, both by the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) and the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). Unfortunately, at the time of the discussion last Session, in which I was particularly interested, I happened to be absent from the House. The hon. member for Northumberland has spoken about a strong deputation of wealthy oil men who, he said, came here last Session seeking further protection against American oil. I can assure that hon. gentleman that he is mistaken. That deputation, which consisted of both oil manufacturers and oil producers, did not come here for that purpose, but for an entirely different purpose. During the last few years great scientific progress has been made in connection with the manufacture of oil, and to-day and for some time past we have been able to produce as fine a quality of oil as can be manufactured in the United States. The scientific knowledge that we have gained has enabled us wholly to remove the imperfections and impurities that were formerly in it, and this result has been largely due to the combination that has existed in the oil trade. I may say that there is no combination at the present time, and there has not been any this year nor for months before. During the time the combination existed last year, no high price was charged for oil; the oil was sold in the market simply at a fair and reasonable manufacturer's profit. But let me tell this House and the people of Canada that to that very combination they are largely indebted for the high quality of oil that they are burning. It gave the oil manufacturers opportunity and time to employ skilled chemists and to thoroughly ascertain the character of the impurities in the oil. And let me tell the hon. member for Northumberland that the object of the deputation which came here last Session was to ask for legislation regulating the burning and other qualities of our Canadian oil, so that the people of Canada could feel fully assured that every gallon of oil they burned would pass inspection as well in respect to its burning quality as to its safety.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did they say as to the transport of foreign oil in bulk?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. That was no part of their object at all. For the hon. gentleman to say that it makes a difference of 50 per cent. in the price of oil, whether it comes in bulk or in barrels from the United States, is perfect nonsense.

The price of oil coming in barrels from the United States is to-day 23 cents a gallon. Do you mean to tell me that if it came in bulk it would be worth only 11 cents? It may be said of the hon. member who makes such a statement that he is in the position the same hon. gentleman a little while ago said another was in—that “he does not know anything about it.” I have a right to refer to what the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Lister) has said on the question. We both come from the county of Lambton, which is divided in its oil interests, the one-half being in the east and the other half in the west. It would be almost impossible, at present, to estimate the amount of capital invested in that industry. If I should tell hon. gentlemen that $5,000,000 would not touch it, they might say I exaggerated, but if they doubled that amount they would come nearer the truth. I mean the amount invested in the mineral lands, all the machinery involved, all the appliances for pumping, and also the appliances for manufacture, most of which are in the county of Lambton. A year ago, in my absence, the hon. member for West Lambton nobly defended this industry, and I read with great pleasure his remarks. Both his friends and opponents spoke well of him, and if the hon. gentlemen were only as good a protectionist in other respects as he is in the oil question, he would be a valuable addition to our party. I find that, on the floor to-night, hon. gentlemen opposite take the same position they have taken all through the campaign on the National Policy. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) says that if he were in West Lambton he would support the oil industry. There is no oil in his district, he says, and no particular industry that requires protection, but I have no doubt if there was any industry in his county that required fostering, the hon. gentleman would be willing to sacrifice it for the benefit of the rest of Canada. I do not desire to take up further the time of the House, because I do not think that this is the proper time to discuss the subject. But, as I said a moment ago, it seems to be the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side that when any particular county has a particular industry which requires to be fostered, the representative of that county, though in opposition, is a good Conservative so far as that particular industry is concerned. On this side, however, hon. gentlemen take a broader view, and whether any supporter of the Government has in his county an industry that wants fostering or not, he looks at the question from a higher standpoint. We lay aside that selfish nature which crops out in hon. gentlemen opposite, and if they would only lay aside their spirit of partisanship, if every one of them would fight for the general benefit of Canada instead of for his “two-penny-ha-penny,” so to speak, municipality, we would be in a better position to-day, financially, than we are; our country would be benefited and every industry would have the support of the whole country at its back.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. By inadvertence my hon. friend has named sixteen on the committee. That cannot be done without the suspension of the Rule. I move that the rule limiting the number to sixteen be suspended by the House.

Motion agreed to, and Rule 78 suspended accordingly.

INSTRUCTIONS TO LAND AGENTS.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Return giving copy of instructions to Dominion land agents in Manitoba and the North-West, regarding instructions furnished to intending settlers free of charge, and a copy of instructions as to information for which a fee is imposed, &c.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have enquired of the officers of the Department as to these instructions, and they are unable to understand what the hon. gentleman really desires. I think if he would allow his motion to drop and consult me on the point, I would give every possible information, to enable him to prepare another motion, if necessary. No instructions, such as those asked for, have been issued.

Mr. McMULLEN. A case has come under my notice in which an intending settler, who applied to the Dominion land agent for information with regard to certain sections, was told that, on the payment of a certain amount, he would be given the information. He objected to paying the amount asked, and wrote to the department to ascertain whether the Dominion land agent had acted according to instructions. The department replied that in order to procure the information he required, he would have to comply with the demand of the land agent. My object is to find out what fees the land agents have the right to exact before giving the information that would enable intending settlers to make selections of sites. In some cases large sums are extorted, whether done by the sanction of the department or not, I am not prepared to say. I have the letter of the department telling the party in question that if he wants to become a settler and secure information regarding the lands on which he wishes to settle he will have to comply with the land agent's terms. The terms were very exorbitant. I shall be happy to call at the office of the hon. Minister and obtain any information he can give. But I think it is unfair that people seeking to become settlers in a section of this Dominion, which we are anxious to see settled rapidly, should be prevented from doing so by agents who endeavor to extort exorbitant fees.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I can only assure the hon. gentleman that no such instructions as he refers to are given to agents. The instructions are to give every information. There may be a letter such as the hon. gentleman refers to as to the exaction of fees, but, if he means to say that the letter tells the settler that he has to pay certain fees for his information, I think the hon. gentleman must be mistaken as to the terms of it. If a municipal council, for instance, requires to get certain plans or information as to conditions of lands, they have to pay and that goes to the department, but, when an intending settler applies for information, the instructions are to give every information without any fee of any kind. There are no returns which can be brought down in the terms of this motion, and, if the hon. gentleman will see me afterwards, I will be glad to give him every information as to the mode in which our affairs in this respect are carried on in the North-West.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can only say that my information is that a man wrote to the agent for information in regard to lands open to settlement in Townships 17, 18, 19 and 19 A, in Ranges 7, 8 and 9 in Alberta. The answer sent to him was that, on the remittance of $21.50, he would receive the information he required from the agent. He then wrote to the department at Ottawa, and I have here the letter which he received in reply, dated the 11th July, 1887:

“Sir,—In reply to your letter of the 27th ultimo, I beg to inform you that, if you desire to be furnished by the local agent of Dominion lands, with the information you require, you will have to pay the fees demanded by that officer.

“I am, Sir,

“Your obedient servant,

“P. B. DOUGLASS,

“Assistant Secretary.”

That is the letter. The demand was made, and if the hon. gentleman challenges the correctness of my statement, I will write and get the letter from the Dominion lands agent making the demand for $21.50.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not challenge the statement of the hon. gentleman, but as far as appears from the letter he has read, this seems to be the case of a gentleman who goes to the agent and wants information as to all the land open for settlement in nine or ten townships. In that case, he does not stand in the position of an ordinary settler, but more in the position of a speculator. That is not the position taken by an intending settler. If everyone who asks for that sort of information was to get it, the agents would not be able to get on with their office business. That is not a case of information required by an ordinary settler.

Mr. LAURIER. I think the House would like to be informed if that answer was given in accordance with any instructions given by the department or not.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I cannot answer that now.

Mr. LAURIER. If that letter is written under instructions given by the department, then they are the instructions which my hon. friend demands in this motion, and they should be laid before the House. If it was not written under such instructions, then it seems to me to be a clear case of malfeasance in office, and requires the intervention of the Government.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Oh, no.

Mr. LAURIER. Yes, it is one of two things. If that exorbitant sum was demanded, according to instructions from the department, that is one thing; if it was not under such instructions, it is another thing; but it either was or was not. If it was, those instructions are the very information my hon. friend demands. If, on the contrary, this letter was written under any instructions of that kind, then I say it is a clear case of malfeasance of office, and it is a case for the intervention of the hon. Minister. But I understand that he says that there are no such instructions, that the letter has not been written under any instructions given to the officer, and, therefore, if the papers do not exist, they cannot come down; but if that is so, I call the attention of the hon. Minister to that officer.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not state that the letter was written without any instructions. I have stated nothing of the kind. I say there is certain information given to settlers in the ordinary acceptance of the term, because it is understood that intending settlers are to get such information, but, if a person wants to get information as to unoccupied sections in several townships, that is not the kind of information that an ordinary settler wants, and for that a charge is generally made. Of course, I do not know the particulars of this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I could quite understand that, if this should prove to be an application for a minute detailed description such as that given by the Canadian Pacific Railway in the little books with which the hon. gentleman is acquainted, there might be objections, or in fact it might be impossible to furnish such minute details of some 40 or 50 sections without making a special charge for it, but such information as an ordinary settler would want as to the general character of the land in two or three townships, I think is information which ought to be rendered either without a fee at all or for a very small fee, and certainly there ought not to be charged such a prohibitive fee as $21.50. I have heard complaints before, though I am not in a position to speak of my own personal knowledge, that have been made in the North-West and in Manitoba by settlers, that they have been compelled, under one pretext or other, to pay very considerable fees to the agents for information of that kind, and there is no doubt that, at this distance, there is a danger of that kind of thing existing, and there can be nothing more likely to drive settlers away from the country than to allow agents to charge large fees for information which is required for actual settlers.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to stand over, I will endeavor to obtain more information to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. I know that it is quite customary for intending settlers to ask for information as to what lands are vacant. Of course a settler will not select lands unless they are vacant and open to homesteading. I apprehend that, when the returns are brought down, we will find that these lands are held by colonisation companies, and I know that they have exacted these fees, and many settlers have been prevented from settling in that country by these colonisation companies. I know that some of them have charged $50 and $100 for settling people on those lands, and this has been recognised by the Government. I have no doubt that these fees were charged by the colonisation companies who have been authorised to bleed the intending settler just as they please, instead of his going to the agent and getting his settlement for $10.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see that the information asked for was in regard to nine townships, and the charge is said to be $21.50. If the department has no rule as to the cost of furnishing township plans to settlers, it should have one. There should be a fixed schedule for giving marked plans of townships to settlers. That is done in the United States Land Office, and I think they are furnished there for 50 cents a township. It is evident that such a charge as that of $21.50 for nine townships is preposterous. And if the public land policy of the Government is being conducted in that way in the North-West, it is very easy to understand why that country settles up so slowly.

Mr. IVES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

THE CAPTAIN OF THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. WELSH moved for:

Return showing the names and salaries of all captains in charge of Government steamers, together with the salaries and allowances at present payable to and received by them, together with all petitions, correspondence, telegrams, &c., relative to the pay of the captain of the Northern Light, since 1st January, 1879; also for a Return showing the names and number of men employed in or about the Northern Light during last summer, from the time she ceased running in the spring of 1887 until she again resumed in the autumn of same year.

He said: I wish to explain my reasons for moving for these returns. The hon. Minister of Marine says that these matters are engaging his attention from time to time. That reminds me of the words of a very clever and talented gentleman, the editor of a Conservative paper in Prince Edward Island, who said that the Government were trying how not to do things. I think he made a very good remark, and my experience of the action of the hon. Minister of Marine in connection with the Northern Light, and everything belonging to her, is, that he has been trying "how not to do it." But the object I have in view is this: The captain of the Northern Light has been in command of that steamer since she was first built and put upon the route. He was put on at a salary of so much a year, and that has continued for some time. Now, this is a Government boat, and her captain holds one of the most responsible positions in the marine service, because she has to do her work in the worst season of the year, commencing in November and going through December, January and March; then in the spring, when there is nothing to do, she is laid up. This man has been in the service for a long while, he is a man bearing a good class certificate from the Board of Trade, and he left a good situation to take command of the Northern Light. He received his pay in the usual course for the first few years, and, afterwards, the Government thought proper to reduce his pay when the boat was laid up in the spring, after finishing her winter's work. When the boat was laid up this man was sent home and allowed $40 a month for the time the boat was laid up—put on half pay. I never heard of such a thing. I do not think there is a shipowner in the Dominion of Canada or any other Dominion that ever attempted such a mean act as to put the master of a ship on half pay during the time the boat was laid up for repairs or any other purpose. The very last man that ought to be sent off is the master of the ship. They do not pay off the engineer. He has been kept on full pay since the first day the boat was laid up. He has been kept on all the year, but the captain was sent home. I was informed last spring—and I have seen it myself—that this boat was laid up alongside the railway wharf, and the captain was put on half pay and sent home. A man comes along and takes charge of this boat for repairs. There have been men repairing her during the whole of the summer and fall—I think the returns will show it. I hope I am telling the truth. The captain should be there to look after these men while they are repairing that boat; he should be there to see that they are properly doing their duty, and keeping their time. But no, he is at home. Well, I brought this matter to the notice of the Minister of Marine last year; I explained it to him and he promised me that it would be attended to, and he also said that he would pay a visit to Prince Edward Island and look into these things and examine them for himself. He forgot to attend to the last part, but he did visit Prince Edward Island—he paid a visit to Charlottetown. I believe he arrived there at seven o'clock in the evening and left at six o'clock the next morning. He viewed the Northern Light, either by match light, or by the northern lights in the sky, or by some other kind of light. I wonder if he sent a notice to the captain of the Northern Light to meet him there and explain the position of the boat. I think not. I would have liked to see him there myself, but I never knew he was coming until after he was gone. He ought to be called the "Flying Dutchman." I must tell the hon. gentleman that I feel rather annoyed at his action in this matter. I do not know how I can get any satisfaction out of him. We remember the caricature published in a paper called Grip. There was a Mrs. Youmans who had the hon. gentleman across her knees and she was giving him a spanking. I think that is the best way to treat him if I cannot get satisfaction out of him any other way. After this country has made him Minister of Marine, and made him "Ruler over the Queen's navee," this is the return we get for it. Now, I do not think there is another hon. gentleman holding a seat in the Government who will justify or support him in his conduct in this matter—except one, perhaps, that is my hon. friend the Postmaster General. He was very lately Minister of Marine. Well, my hon. friend—for he is my friend, and I am sorry to trample on his corns—but he is not very fast. He does not like a special train to carry the mails to Prince Edward Island. But I see a notice just below mine on this paper which, if the hon. gentleman moves it, will bring this matter up, and we can speak of it afterwards. Now, I want this captain of the Northern Light to be placed on the same footing as other captains in the Government service. What do we see? I am only speaking of what I know to be true when I say that every other captain in the Dominion service has a yearly salary, and he is paid without any deduction from year to year. You may look at the service in Quebec, in the winter, or in any other part of the Dominion, and you will not see a shilling deducted from the captain's pay. I tell the hon. Minister that I think it is a Shylock proceeding, none but a Shylock would undertake to do such a thing. I do not think there is an hon. gentleman, let alone a member of the Government, but an hon. gentleman sitting on that side of the House, or on this side, that would attempt to justify the action of the hon. Minister. I thought myself that all I would have to do was to represent the matter to the hon. gentleman and it would be attended to. I went over to him last year and had a talk with him, and asked him whether it was better to leave him to attend to it, or to discuss it on the floor of the House, and he said he preferred speaking about it. I explained the matter to him fully, and he promised me it would be attended to; but he has broken faith in that matter, although he did not break faith in promising to visit Charlottetown. I have here a memorandum, but I cannot read it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I hope the papers will be all brought down, and then we will be able to make another movement in this matter. I feel very strongly on this point. I think it is very shabby treatment to mete out to a man who has conducted himself efficiently, who is a passed master, and who has proved it by his commanding that boat for so many years without a single accident happening it. Instead of the Government reducing his pay after his being so many years in the service, they should every year increase his pay, and show that they appreciate his conduct. I tell the Minister of Marine that this wrong ought to be redressed, and if this man were placed in his proper position, he would have been retained in command of that boat summer as well as winter. I doubt very much if there is another man, at all events it would be very difficult to find one, competent to take his place. I am not speaking of this matter as a political question; I do not know if the captain of that ship has any political feelings whatever—I do not think he ever voted in his life, and I do not know what his political proclivities might be—but I think it is an act of gross injustice that he should be treated in this way. I believe, I am confident, from my knowledge of the members of the Government, that they will see this wrong will be righted. I have no confidence in the Minister of Marine and I would not speak to him again on the subject; but I have confidence in the other members of the Government that they will see that fair play is meted out to this man.

Motion agreed to.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return of the receipts and expenditure, in detail, chargeable to the Consolidated Fund, from the 1st day of July, 1887, to the 1st day of March, 1888, and from 1st July, 1886, to 1st March, 1887.—(Sir Richard Oatwright.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 1st March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual Report of the Department of Indian Affairs for the year 1887.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

DEBATES TRANSLATORS—QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. SPEAKER laid before the House certain letters, affidavits and other papers relating to the dismissal of Messrs. A. E. Poirier, E. Tremblay and R. Tremblay, who were up to a recent period employed as French translators of the Official Debates of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I presume that it would be regular to have these papers read now, but as they seem to be very bulky, I suppose the usual practice might be followed in this instance of having them printed in the Votes and Proceedings, were it not that there are among them a number of appendices, pamphlets, and so on. I do not ask that those should be printed, but simply the correspondence.

Mr. SPEAKER. It will be for the House to say.

Mr. LAURIER. For instance, I understand that the accusations are based on pamphlets and articles in newspapers. These may not be printed, but the letters which contain the charges of the hon. the Secretary of State and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), together with the answer of the translators, I think ought to be printed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I take it that the appendices contain the reasons why the Speaker has taken this action.

Mr. LAURIER. I think not, because if I remember aright, the hon. Secretary of State particularises what matters he complains of in the conduct of the translators. He specifies that they have used such-and-such language, and if it should be necessary in the course of the discussion to refer to the pamphlets, that can be done. But so far as the charges are concerned, I think the letters containing them and the answers are complete in themselves.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I do not see the necessity of such a proceeding. The complaint which was made by me last Session—and there was reason last Session for the dismissal of these employés—was that they had used certain expressions, which the members of the House can become acquainted with without giving such importance to the case of these gentlemen as to print those papers in the Votes and Proceedings. The case is all in a nutshell. They used expressions which were found offensive to members of the House; they do not deny having used them, but they say they had a right to use them as private citizens. That is all.

Mr. LAURIER. I beg my hon. friend's pardon. The question which I intend bringing before the House is not as to whether these officials were or were not improperly dismissed by the proper authority. The only question upon which I intend to invite the opinion of the House is, whether Mr. Speaker had the authority to dismiss them. In my humble judgment, as I stated the other day, Mr. Speaker had no such authority, but that authority is the exclusive possession of the House. That is the only point before the House at present. It may be that the conduct of these gentlemen was such that they should have been dismissed by the proper authority. That may or may not be, but that is not the question at issue at present; and when the matter is fully before the House, so that the House will be in possession of the facts, we shall be able to determine whether the Speaker has exceeded his authority or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then, on the statement of my hon. friend, it is quite clear that these papers ought not, any of them, to appear at present on the Votes and Proceedings. The question is simply this: Whether you, Mr. Speaker, exceeded your authority in giving notice to these persons not to appear again as translators on the Hansard. Whether the charges brought against these persons justifies their removal by the proper authorities is not the question. The question is now whether you had the right to give them the notice you did. What does the statement you have just read show. It shows that the committee especially charged with the Official Debates has relegated the duty of dealing with these employés to you, with the assent of the House, I take it—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No; the report was not adopted.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They reported, and the Speaker acted upon their report.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I oppose altogether putting these papers on the Votes and Proceedings. Let the hon. gentleman himself state his case now if he wishes, or at the proper time, and I say that the simple question, not as to the proper exercise of your authority, but whether you had any authority under the circumstances, is the question we have to decide. That is the only point before us, and therefore the reference to these papers is of no value at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has not fairly represented the views of the leader of the Opposition. There are two propositions before the House; the one is, whether these parties have done anything worthy of censure or not; and the other is, if it be found that they have, who is the proper authority to call them to account. As I understand this question, Sir, you have as good as dismissed these parties. I do not understand that the Hansard reporters or translators have been placed by any Act of Parliament, or by this House, under your jurisdiction. I may or may not be mistaken in that view; but, as I understand from the papers which you have submitted to Parliament and to which you have referred, you have professedly acted upon the report of the committee controlling the Debates of this House, a report that has never been adopted by this House. That being the case, that report, so far as you are concerned, and this House is concerned, is the same as if it had never been made. I am not anxious to act in the dark in this matter. I say the rights of every party, however unimportant may be his position, are entitled to be respected, and that no arbitrary exercise of authority, no illegal or unconstitutional exercise of authority on the part of yourself, Sir, if such be the case, or on the part of any other party, affecting an officer or employé of this House, ought to be unchallenged. If this House is indifferent to the rights of those whom it has employed and who are its servants, it would be derelict in its duties; and it does seem to me, in order that this House may act intelligently upon this question, it is necessary that the papers which have been submitted by you to the House, as a justification of the course you have taken, should be printed and be put at the disposal of the members of this House, so that we would be in a position to form an intelligent opinion on the subject. The hon. gentleman who leads the Government, instead of undertaking to stifle enquiry, as he has done by the course he has taken, ought to have given this House opportunity for enquiry, to see that the officers of this House are not wronged. I believe that every translator employed in this work belongs to one or the other political party. I understand that every one of these translators is an active party man on the one side or the other; and I understand your action, Sir, which the right hon. the First Minister seems disposed to defend, is of such a character as to deny to those holding one set of political opinions the rights or privileges accorded to those who hold another and a different set. If that be so we are entitled to know it. We are entitled to know whether the translators employed by this House are at liberty to attack members of the Opposition, and the views entertained by the Opposition, through the press and on the platform, while they are denied any such right or privilege as regards the supporters of the Government? We want to know what the rule is to be in this matter? We want to know whether any political party in this country is a proscribed party, and whether the hon. gentleman is prepared to defend the course which it is reported has been taken in this particular matter? If we are to be proscribed, if we are to be put in the position in which Dissenters and Roman Catholics were a hundred years ago, on account of our political sentiments or opinions, we are entitled to know it. There are in some constituencies majorities who do not agree with the views of the hon. gentleman, and have returned members to this House opposed to the hon. gentleman's views; and I am not aware that the laws of this country confer upon the Opposition in the House any less important rights and privileges than they confer upon those who entertain the sentiments and opinions held by the hon. gentleman. It does seem to me that the course recommended by the leader of the Opposition is the proper course, that these papers should be printed at as early a date as possible; it is proper they should be in the hands of the press on both sides, and that we should be in a position to take intelligent action and do justice to those who are in the service of the House, and who, so far as I know, have not been in any respect derelict in their duty. The hon. the Secretary of State seems to think he has been wronged by these gentlemen. Has he been wronged by anything done in their official capacity, as servants of this House? Does he say that? Not at all. He says that, outside of this House, these parties, in the exercise of their rights and privileges as citizens of this country, have taken a course he does not approve. Does the hon. gentleman seek to be vindicated by the law? Not at all. He asks this House in defiance of law, in defiance of what is just and proper and manly, to punish these men—for what? For any dereliction in their duty? No; but because they have offended against his dignity, because they have done something for which the law offers him no means of vindication. I deny the right of the hon. gentleman to make an instrument of this House, or of its Speaker, to gratify his personal animosity by punishing those who have offended against his dignity; he must seek redress elsewhere, and until he is prepared to adopt such a course he has yet to learn the first elements of representative and responsible government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What is the position of hon. gentlemen opposite. There is a difference of opinion between the hon. the leader of the Opposition and the hon. the follower. The leader says the only question before the House which he intends to bring up, is whether the Speaker has the authority to act as he did. The hon. gentleman behind him disputes that, and says there are two points: first, whether the Speaker had any authority; and, second, whether he exercised that authority properly. The leader of the Opposition states there is only one point. I think we must, in the order of discipline to use an expression which has been used, take the statement of the leader of the Opposition as being the question before the House, and that is whether you had the right to exercise the authority you exercised. I have no doubt you had, and I have no doubt the House will sustain you in the exercise of your authority.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad to find that the hon. gentleman has put the question on the ground he has just stated. The other day I took the course which I thought the most courteous to the Speaker, and notified him that I thought he had exceeded his authority. Instead of moving for the papers, I asked him to bring before the House the papers, and to give the House the reasons for his action. He then stated that he would bring down the papers, and to-day he has brought down the papers upon which he has acted, the papers upon which he thinks he was authorised to act in the manner that he has. I have asked that, in courtesy to you, Sir, these papers should be printed. The First Minister says these papers are not to go to the House—they are to remain on the Table, but are not to go any further. I think that is not courtesy to the Chair. I think, when the Chair has laid these papers, upon which the

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.)

Chair has based the action referred to, before the House, those papers should be given to the House in the usual way. The right hon. gentleman says that they are not fit to go to the House, and that they should remain on the Table. I have more courtesy for the Chair than the Prime Minister, the leader of the House. I intend, Mr. Speaker, to question your authority in regard to this matter, and I think it is only fair to you, as well as to the House, that the House should be put in possession of the facts upon which you have acted. The leader of the House thinks differently. I think he is wrong in this matter. I think he should in common courtesy allow the reasons upon which the Chair acted to go to the House and to the country. If not, I will move without them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. All right.

Mr. LAURIER. The hon. gentleman has said that the Speaker will be sustained. I think, if his feeling is right and just, it will be better to have him sustained with the facts before the House than without them.

Mr. IVES. I do not propose to follow the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) into a discussion of the merits of this case. I do not suppose that it would be very profitable to enter into the justification of the Secretary of State, Mr. Labelle and myself at this time, but, when the time comes, I may tell the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) that we shall be prepared to justify the course we have taken. I shall be prepared, at all events, and I think we shall be able to satisfy not only hon. members on this side of the House, but some of the more fair-minded members—if there be any—on the other side of the House, that we have been kind and generous, and that we did not act as rapidly or as speedily as we might have been expected to do under the provocation we received. When the time comes, we shall be prepared to go into that. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there are two questions involved. There is only one question proposed to be raised by the leader of the Opposition, and that is the exercise of your authority. If that is the only question, I do not see why we should wait to have the papers printed in the first instance.

Mr. LAURIER. I asked the Speaker to bring the papers on which he based his action before the House. If there are too many to be printed, it is not for me to judge, but they should be brought before the House.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. They are before the House.

Mr. LAURIER. Most of these papers are printed.

Mr. IVES. They are before the House, and a distinction is always made by the Printing Committee as to what documents are to be printed and what are not. What documents are printed? Documents of importance. What documents are not printed? Documents which are not of sufficient importance to justify their being printed. The document which is not printed is no less before the House than those which are printed. I do not think this matter is of such great importance as to justify the printing of the whole of this record, but I do insist that, if it is printed at all, the very canny suggestion of my hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, made in such a childlike and bland manner, that the newspaper clippings and the pamphlets and the pieces almost obscene, should not be printed, should not be adopted and I protest against his suggestion. If anything is printed, let the whole record be printed. I do not care whether it is printed or not. I am prepared to defend myself and justify myself in the course I have taken in this matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not rise to enter into the merits of this case at all, but I rise to reply to the positions which have been assumed by the leader of the Government. He has taken two or three positions which I think are quite untenable. He says that, as the leader of the Opposition differs from the gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who assumed an attitude further in extent than that assumed by the leader of the Opposition, he will accept the position taken by the leader as expressing the position of the Opposition in this House. He forgets that there happens to be an independent party in this House, not very strong it is true, but, as far as I am concerned, I am determined to speak whenever the freedom and rights of the people are concerned, and I contend that the course taken by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a correct one. The first question is whether the Speaker has taken the correct course, and whether he had authority to dismiss these men; and the other question is more extensive in its character, whether the men should have been dismissed at all for the conduct which is charged against them. I say that the leader of the Opposition has, in this case, stated clearly and distinctly the grounds upon which he laid the matter before the House, but he did not go into the question of whether these men were worthy of dismissal at all. He merely questioned the authority of the court that dismissed them, and, when this report of the committee was never accepted or considered by the House, I question the right of the Speaker to act on the report of the committee without the authority of the House. That is all I desire to say on that branch of the subject. I do not intend to enter into the merits of the case, as to whether the men are guilty or not but I think the leader of the Opposition is quite right in his action, and the motion he has proposed with you, Sir, in the Chair. I also think that the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is quite right in raising the question, not only whether you were right in dismissing these men, but whether they were worthy of dismissal. I think the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the House, should not confine the argument to what the leader of the Opposition says in this case, but that he must consider it on a broader ground altogether.

Mr. EDGAR. If anything were required to show that it was necessary to have the papers printed for the information of the members of this House, it is the fact that the leader of the House, is evidently ignorant of their most important contents. The leader of the House evidently supposed that you, Sir, had been acting on a report of this committee which had been adopted by the House; and if he had only seen the papers, if he had seen the report of the committee or the papers in regard to the Internal Economy Commission, he would have learned that that report was never adopted by this House, that it was a report of last Session, and that it is so much waste paper. I am sure that if we go into the consideration of this question, when even the leader of this House is ignorant as to the contents of these papers, we are not likely to arrive at a decision satisfactory to ourselves or to you. Now, I wish to have your decision, Mr. Speaker, as to whether we are entitled to have the papers, which are laid upon the Table, read for the information of the members, and therefore I ask, as a member of this House, that these papers be read.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member wishes the papers to be read, they may be read.

The ASSISTANT CLERK proceeded with the reading of the papers.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I do not think it is very seemly that we should spend our whole time in listening to a pamphlet being read. I do not think the Rules of the House require it, and I do not think it should be done.

Mr. MITCHELL. Give some reasons.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I hold that only the letters that are passed on this matter should be read and not a long pamphlet. It is simply wasting the time of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that that was the proposal of my hon. friend, which was refused by his leader.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No.

Mr. MULOCK. I think we must have the evidence in some form before us before we can be called upon to pronounce upon this question. It is quite true there is a principle involved in it, but there are also the merits of the particular case, and those merits can only be dealt with by a reference to the evidence; and, inasmuch as the House has, to a certain extent, shown an unwillingness to have the evidence printed in the Votes and Proceedings, I presume members must adopt some other mode whereby the evidence can be brought within the reach of each member. I do not agree with the statement of the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives), that because the papers are technically on the Table they are practically within the reach of each member. The hon. gentleman held them in his hand when he made that statement. It is true they were in the possession of the House, if he was the whole House, which he thought he was when he called for the dismissal of these men. If we are going to deal with the case in any way, we must have the evidence before us in a practical form. I, therefore, for one object to any course calculated to thwart the ends of justice. If that is the meaning of the suggestion, we must enforce the practice and have everything read so as to have the documents practically within the reach of each member.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Kirkpatrick) has chosen to take exception to my asking to have the papers read. He says it is contrary to the Rules of the House, and is unnecessary. It may be unnecessary, and it may be that the hon. gentleman embodies all wisdom in relation to the Rules of the House. I know he was supposed to do so when he occupied the Chair—his word was law then, and his dictum was always obeyed, and we paid every respect to him. But the hon. gentleman now occupies the position of an ordinary member, and he must allow each of us who have had some practice and experience to express our opinion as to whether a certain course proposed is in accordance with the Rules of the House or not. It may be that we are here for the purpose of trying these men; I really do not know whether we are here for that purpose or not. We have not the issue fairly before the House as to whether we are going to try them on the merits of the offence or not, or whether it is on the special question, as stated by the leader of the Opposition, as to the jurisdiction of the Speaker to dismiss these men without the action of the House. These are the points involved. If we are going to try these men on the merits of the case, how can I, who know nothing of the facts, take part in trying them until I know what the evidence is. I regret to say I do not understand the French language, and I insist on my right, if I, as one of the judges, have to try them and to decide as to whether they were first guilty of conduct that warranted dismissal, and, second, whether they were dismissed by an authority having power to dismiss them. I must really know what the charges are, and have them read in a language I understand. The hon. gentleman has chosen to say that we are delaying the business of the country by having these papers read. What was the proposition of the hon. leader of the Opposition? It was that the portion of those papers that was material—the complaints made by the hon. Secretary of State, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, and the hon. member for Sorel,—along with the replies of the persons accused—that limited quantity of evidence that the Clerk is now reading,—should be printed, in order that the members of the House might have an opportunity of forming a correct opinion, and considering judicially before they are asked to decide upon a matter which they cannot understand until the papers are read. I, therefore, have to ask that the letters of the hon. Secretary of State, the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe, and the hon. member for Richelieu, with the replies of the persons accused, and all evidence, should be read both in French and English, so that everybody here can understand what we are deciding upon.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think that the hon. gentleman, before he gets up to lecture me, should know what he is talking about, and exhibit a little common sense, which I do not think he has done on the present occasion. He has stated that I objected to the reading of these papers. If he had heard me, he would have heard that I objected to the reading of that French pamphlet containing over a hundred pages of closely printed matter. I said that it was unseemly that the time of this House should be taken up by reading that which will throw no light on the matter. I said that the letters which had passed should be read, but that this pamphlet should not be read.

Mr. MULOCK. Why not?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Because I said it was unseemly to take up the time of the House by reading a pamphlet in French which the hon. gentleman says he does not understand.

Mr. MULOCK. Does the pamphlet contain any evidence on which these charges are made?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. It does contain it, but I understand the hon. member for Quebec East to state that the letters extracted the objectionable words from the pamphlet, and that therefore that these letters contained all the charges.

Mr. LAURIER. I tried to have these letters read, but I was refused by the other side.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I am agreeing with the hon. member for Quebec East. He said those letters contained all the extracts from the pamphlet which threw light on the case, and I say those letters might be read; but it is wasting the time of the House to read this pamphlet.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise merely to reply to what the hon. gentleman has stated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has spoken twice, and I have a right to reply when he makes personal reference to myself in a manner that is not quite accurate. The hon. gentleman says he does not think I should get up and lecture him. Why, Sir, he lectured me because I asked that what was read in French should be read in a language I could understand, and he lectured the House because the whole House assented to its being read. I said there was no use of it being read in a language I did not understand, and I wanted it read in English if it was read in French. If the charges are based on what is in that pamphlet, we have a right to know what they are. The hon. gentleman has looked through this evidence, but I have not. He is in the counsels of the Government, and is ready to second any motion they may make. No doubt he has had an opportunity of getting at the contents of this pamphlet which I have not had, and therefore I would like to have it read.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether the reading of these documents before the House is to be followed, according to the Rules of the House, by the printing of them in the Votes and Proceedings. There is no Rule, so far as I know just now, that makes it obligatory to read the papers that are laid on the Table, but it may be done on a motion. I understood the hon. member for Quebec East to ask that they should be read, no objection was raised at the time, and I said that if the House wanted them read they should be read.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. LAURIER. I asked that they should be taken as read, which is the practice, and it was refused by the majority. When the papers are taken as read, they always appear in the Votes and Proceedings, but the hon. leader of the Government would not consent to have anything printed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The reason I asked you this question is that I understand the hon. gentleman made a motion to have the papers read.

Mr. EDGAR. No; I asked that they should be read.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The motion was made that they should be read, and I understand that that motion will appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

Mr. MULOCK. There was no motion. They were read with the unanimous consent of the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Was there a motion, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. There was no motion. It was asked that the papers should be read. Nobody objected, and they were read.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In consequence of that, will these papers be printed in the Votes and Proceedings?

Mr. SPEAKER. I suppose all the papers that are before this House and that are read must be printed. That is the procedure followed. Every proceeding that takes place before this House has to appear in the Votes and Proceedings.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the consequence of reading these papers is that they shall appear in the Votes and Proceedings, I believe the House would prefer—I think I am expressing the opinion of both parties—that we should consider them now as read.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. When I first rose I mentioned to the House what I think is the rule and practice before the courts among lawyers who want, not to dispute or quarrel only, but to obtain a fair decision by the court. I stated that the complaint made last year by me was a very short and simple one, contained in four or five lines. The hon. member for Richelieu has been mentioned as one of the complainants, but that is not correct. The expressions complained of by myself and the hon. member for Richmond and Wolfe are few, and they appeared not only in the pamphlet, but in the public press and were circulated all over the country.

Mr. MULOCK. Are they true?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is true that they have been made and published. That is not denied by those against whom the complaint has been made; but their defence consists in their saying this: "We are officers of the House of a certain kind; we have a right to discuss political matters, and we had a right to make use of the expressions complained of in public discussion on the hustings, in the press, or in pamphlets." That is known to every member of the House who has been asking for the reading of these papers. Those expressions were such as, if used by an employé in the service of any hon. gentleman opposite, in the ordinary course of life, would, as I said in my complaint, entitle that servant to immediate dismissal. Then my hon. friend says these officers were engaged by a committee of the House, and you had no right to say that they would not be re-engaged at the beginning of this Session. It appears to me, Sir, that you have the right to declare at the opening of the Session to these officers that they shall be no longer employed, because I understand their engagement closes with the Session and is renewed with the Session, with the consent of this House. The committee, when they engaged these parties, stated that they should continue, but there is no permanent engagement. Every man in the employment of the House must be under your immediate control in all matters of discipline and propriety. The second question, as to whether, under the circumstances, the language and the expressions that were made use of by these men, and which they acknowledge having used, when complained against, would justify their dismissal or justify your intimating to them that they had ceased to form part of the staff of this House, is one which does not at all trench on your authority to act in any case. I maintain that in both cases there is no need of going to the expense of printing these papers, and if that expense is to be incurred merely to gratify the pique of hon. gentlemen opposite, the responsibility must rest on those who have asked for the publication of the papers. I could well understand that the leader of the Opposition should ask what were the complaints made against these persons; but I say that the information having been given, there is no necessity for going further. The whole subject may be discussed without having these papers printed at a heavy cost.

Mr. MULOCK. I was in hopes that when the Minister of Public Works made the suggestion he did, the difficulty had reached its solution. I understood him to assent to the proposition that the whole of the proceedings, the correspondence and evidence, should be taken as read, and put on record in the Votes and Proceedings. That was a proper and manly suggestion, and even though coming somewhat late, I think it is entitled to respect. I regret that the hon. the Secretary of State appears to manifest a desire to suppress a portion of the evidence.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No.

Mr. MULOCK. If he does not, why does he object to follow the advice, or, at all events, the suggestion of the Minister of Public Works, who was desirous of concluding further discussion by treating the papers as read, so that we might proceed with other business. The hon. the Secretary of State says this House should do what he would do himself, dismiss a servant who is objectionable, but in this case, the men charged with the offending do not happen to be the servants of the Secretary of State. It may not happen that just what is distasteful to the hon. gentleman or to the refined member for Richmond and Wolfe (Mr. Ives) is distasteful to the majority of the House. At all events, we are entitled to an independent opinion on the question, and, inasmuch as the Minister of Public Works made a fair suggestion, I hope the Government will be able to reconcile themselves to following the advice of the present leader of the House and let us proceed to business.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If you, Mr. Speaker, desired that the complaint and the answer shall be considered as read and printed, I have no objection to the papers being put on record; but when a discussion comes on, my hon. friend will find, should it be necessary to quote the pamphlet, that there are expressions in it which will be sufficient to make him blush.

Mr. MULOCK. No, no.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Perhaps the hon. gentleman is accustomed to such expressions. Every man has his own sensitiveness, but I am sure the hon. gentleman would not go so far as to say that the expressions made use of are not highly offensive.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad this difficulty has terminated. I have no disposition, at all events, to protract the business of the House by having read a lot of papers, but I feel it my duty, in dealing with this subject as a judge, to know what I am dealing with. I am glad we have come to the resolution to consider the papers as read and let them be entered in the Votes and Proceedings; and I may say, in this connection, one word with relation to the conduct of the Minister of Public Works. I have often noticed that the hon. gentleman, when leading this House in the absence of the First Minister, conducts business in a manner agreeable to the Opposition as well as to the party he leads; and he never could have shown his tact and management more clearly than he has done to-day, in at once consenting to have these papers considered as read and entered in the Votes and Proceedings. I can only express my regret that, perhaps, growing age, perhaps the intolerance which power creates, has made the immediate leader of the House, the First Minister, obstinate, and we know that as age increases so does obstinacy; and, if the right hon. gentleman could only show a little of the forbearance and courtesy to members on this side which is displayed by the Minister of Public Works, the business of this House would not suffer.

Mr. EDGAR. I must say that I only suggested that these papers should be read when it seemed there would be no other way of getting even a part of them printed and before the House. As I understand the position now, these papers have been ordered to be taken as read; and you have ruled that being so read, they must appear in the Votes and Proceedings. That being the distinct understanding, I am glad to support the suggestion of the hon. the Minister of Public Works that they be taken as read, and had that suggestion been made in the first instance, there would not have been all this trouble.

Mr. HESSON. On behalf of the hon. gentlemen on this side, I submit that the course adopted is a much more pleasant one than to have the papers read, and am much pleased to see that the leader of the third party has become himself once more. I remember when he strongly put the point not only that papers should be read, but that they should be read in French as in English, and am glad to see that he is willing now to accept a compromise and have them taken as read. I have a suggestion to make to the hon. gentleman, who seems to take up the cudgel warmly for those employés who have been dismissed, whether wrongly or rightly, and that is, that he would employ them in translating the French pamphlets for his benefit as leader of the third party.

Motion agreed to.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE U.S.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the leader of the House is not present, I may mention to the hon. the Minister of Finance that, yesterday, I came to an understanding with the leader of the House that I would move to-day in reference to certain resolutions which I have on the paper. Under that agreement I now move:

That the resolutions in reference to commercial relations between Canada and the United States be made the First Order of the Day for Wednesday, 7th March, and that the debate thereon proceed de die in diem.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not in the House when the matter was brought up before, but I would ask my hon. friend whether he proposes to go on assuming that the protocols are not in our hands at that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated before that Mr. Bergne, one of the protocolists on the British side of the Commission, had telegraphed me that he expected to send me the protocols on Tuesday. I have not yet received them, nor have I received any other communication from him, but the moment I do receive them, I will lay them on the Table of the House with the Treaty and the modus vivendi, and I would ask my hon. friend whether he proposes to go on with the debate, which might be somewhat affected by the proposals and the counter-proposals which have taken place between the plenipotentiaries, or whether he will postpone the discussion if they are not here at that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister was not present at the time that this was mentioned before, and I then agreed that, if the Government were not able to lay these protocols on the Table by that time, this motion should be waived. The First Minister was to have told me to-day—of course the explanation of the Finance Minister is quite satisfactory—at what time he expected these protocols.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am expecting them hourly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose the hon. gentleman will feel himself justified in having them printed at once.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They will be printed without a moment's delay.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume, from what the hon. gentleman says, that there have been negotiations in regard to the trade relations, as well as in regard to the Fishery Treaty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; I think I am warranted in saying so.

Motion agreed to.

DEFECTIVE LETTERS PATENT ACT.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK (for Mr. McCARTHY) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 4) to amend the Act respecting defective Letters Patent, and the discharge of Securities to the Crown.

Mr. MITCHELL. Please explain.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. The explanation is, that the Bill is intended, in regard to certain lands in Ontario, that they should be discharged from certain bonds given to the Crown.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

RAILWAY EMPLOYÉ'S PROTECTION AID.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK (for Mr. McCARTHY) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) for the protection of railway employés.

Mr. MITCHELL. Explain that.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This Bill is to provide that railway companies shall protect foreign railway frogs, and shall also put rails on their freight cars for the protection of their hands.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK (for Mr. McCARTHY) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to amend the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Explain.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am afraid from past experience, that this Bill will involve a charge on the revenue in favor of Mr. McCarthy, and, therefore, it should be brought down by resolution.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This is simply in regard to voting for the repeal of the Act. At present, the voting is for or against the petition, and it has been represented to the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) that it is often difficult for the voters to know whether they are voting for or against the petition. It is, therefore, proposed they shall be asked to vote for or against the Act instead of for or against the petition.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

AID TO WRECKED VESSELS.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to allow American vessels to aid vessels wrecked or disabled in Canadian waters.

Mr. CHARLTON. Explain.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. This Bill is for the purpose of granting to American vessels the right to come into Canadian waters to render aid to vessels wrecked or disabled, provided that similar privileges are granted by the United States Government to Canadian vessels. It is, in short, a Bill to provide for the rendering of reciprocal aid to wrecked vessels.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LAND SALES IN THE N. W. T.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What sums have been received from the sale of lands in Manitoba and the North-West Territories during the ordinary year 1887? 2. How much from the 1st January, 1888, to the 1st March, 1888?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The amount received for lands in the North-West during the last calendar year is $450,701.08. As for the other information asked, the returns are not in from the several agents, and will not be in for a fortnight; but I will see that the hon. gentleman gets the information as soon as I receive it.

CLEARANCES TO VESSELS FOR BEHRING'S SEA.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether the Customs officers on the Pacific coast of Canada have been instructed, or are permitted, to refuse clearances to sealing vessels for Behring's Sea?

Mr. BOWELL. The Customs officials on the Pacific coast of Canada have not been instructed to refuse clearances to any vessel, either for the Behring's Sea or any other part of the world. It is their duty to grant certificates under the law to all vessels whenever the provisions of that law are complied with.

BEHRING'S SEA AND CANADIAN VESSELS.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Whether any convention, agreement, understanding or modus vivendi has been arrived at with the United States with reference to the use or navigation of the waters or harbors of Behring's Sea during the season of 1888 by Canadian vessels for the purposes of fishing, sealing, trading or shelter, or any of them?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may answer the hon. gentleman by saying that no such convention or arrangement has been arrived at.

MR. J. V. ELLIS, M.P., AND ANNEXATION.

Mr. GUILLET, What action does the Government propose to take in the case of John Valentine Ellis, Esquire, a Member of the House of Commons for the City of St. John, in the Province of New Brunswick, who has declared himself an advocate of the annexation of Canada to the United States?—

Mr. LISTER. I rise to a point of order. The question contains an averment of facts.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the hon. gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. LISTER. I submit the question to the Speaker.

Mr. GUILLET—Who has declared himself an advocate—

Mr. LISTER. I ask for the ruling of the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. Rule 29 reads as follows:—

“Questions may be put to Ministers of the Crown relating to public affairs; and to other members relating to any Bill, motion or other public matter, connected with the business of the House, in which such members may be concerned; but in putting any such question, no argument or opinion is to be offered, nor any facts stated, except so far as may be necessary to explain the same.”

The facts stated here are very serious, and I should think it would be better not to put the question in this form, as it is of a nature to reflect upon one of the members of this House.

Mr. GUILLET. I may say that I am giving the language which the hon. gentleman wrote in his own newspaper, and which has not been retracted, and never been repudiated.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I ask the hon. member to withdraw his question.

Mr. GUILLET. I think I have a right to ask this question. I am reading language that was actually published.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. GUILLET. I wish to say that in putting the question on the paper, I did so with the approval of the authorities of the House, who, I assume, ought to know the rules in relation to such matters.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member withdraw his question?

Mr. GUILLET. If you have ruled so, I shall have to withdraw it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I shall have to rule it out of order.

ICE BREAKERS—COUNTY OF BERTHIER.

Mr. BERNIER (for Mr. BEAUSOLEIL) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to provide, in the Estimates to be laid before the House, for the construction of ice-breakers in the parishes of St. Barthelemy and St. Cuthbert, in the County of Berthier, in order to prevent the disasters which occur every year on the breaking up of the ice in the St. Lawrence, and to deal favorably with the petition presented in that behalf?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I regret to say that I cannot answer just now the hon. member, because the Estimates are not yet before the House. When they are laid upon the table the hon. member will see if there is an item for that purpose; if not, he will perhaps put another question to the same effect.

INSTRUCTIONS TO LAND AGENTS.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. McMullen for a return giving copy of instructions to Dominion Land Agents in Manitoba and the North-West, regarding instructions furnished to intending settlers free of charge, and a copy of instructions as to information for which a fee is imposed; the amount of fees received at the several offices during the years 1885-86 and 1887, for such information; the amount of all fees collected from intending settlers during those years, and for which no credit was given in their purchase of Dominion Lands.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I shall be very glad to bring down all the information in our possession on this point for the hon. gentleman. I have had a thorough examination made to-day, and have found the original of the letter which was read last night. It will be remembered that the statement made by the hon. gentleman was to the effect that a certain settler had asked for information from one of the land offices in regard to nine townships, that he was told he could get the information on the payment of a fee of $21.50, that thereupon he wrote to the department, and the Assistant Secretary wrote him to the effect that if he would pay the amount asked he would get the information, but not otherwise. I find the original letter of the gentleman, Mr. Edward Gregson, who asked for the information with respect to the nine townships as stated. I have here the original letter from Mr. Stephenson, agent at the Dominion Lands office at Regina, to this effect:

“I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter, dated 14th inst., and in reply to say, that if you send me $1.20 office fees for the information you ask for, I will then send you the diagrams.”

So what this gentleman asked for was the diagrams of nine townships, the fees required were not $21.50 but $1.20, and he was told by the department he would have to pay that small sum for the diagrams. These are the actual facts as they appear from the original documents in the department. However, I will bring down all the information I have on the subject.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am not prepared to challenge the statement just made by the hon. Minister. My reason for bringing forward the resolution was for the purpose of gathering information with regard to the information furnished to intending settlers in the North-West. The statement made by Mr. Gregson to me was that a demand for $21.50 had been made on him by an agent of the Dominion Lands in the North-West, for the information he asked respecting the townships to which the Minister has referred. I have since written to the gentleman, asking him to send the letter he received from the Dominion Lands agent making a demand for $21.50. I am satisfied that the demand for $21.50 was undoubtedly made by the Dominion Lands agent, whether in his letter to the department here he admits that such a demand was made or not. He may have stated that a demand for $1.20 was made—he may have led the department to understand that that was the demand made, but Mr. Gregson has stated that he was required to furnish $21.50. My remarks are in accordance with those made by the hon. gentleman behind me (Mr. Watson), who stated yesterday that, on several occasions, people desiring to settle in the North-West had been asked by those in official positions there for sums of money for information so furnished to them, altogether in excess of what the departmental regulations would warrant. The Minister said I had stated it was an actual settler who had made that complaint and asked this information. My statement was that it was an intending settler. He said he intended to become a settler in the North-West, and in order to do so, both he and his four sons had asked for information in regard to those particular lands. I am sorry he did not become a settler. He became so disgusted with the manner in which he was treated that he returned home, and is now preparing to go to Dakota, for which I am sorry.

Mr. DAVIN. I live in the North-West. I know Mr. Stephenson, the land agent, and other land agents. I hear most of what goes on in regard to matters of this kind, and all I can tell the House is this: that even if the Minister had not brought down the papers he has brought down today, I would have had no hesitation in rising here and saying that there could not be the least foundation for the statement made by the hon. gentleman. It has been my business to enquire into the way those gentlemen have conducted themselves, it has been forced on me to do so, sometimes by criticism of this sort, and I have made a point to find out how a settler or an enquirer was treated at those offices. I have made a point to find out whether such charges as these have any foundation, and all I can say is that, having made such enquiries, there is not a shadow of foundation for those charges that are constantly brought forward. It is very important to repel such innuendoes, because there is an innuendo in the question, for they are calculated to do any amount of harm to a country, part of which I represent and in which we are all deeply interested. In fact, it is only part and parcel of a well-considered policy of many hon. gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. No.

Mr. DAVIN. I say yes. It is only part and parcel of a well-considered policy, and it is a policy that is sure to act as a boomerang and reflect on themselves, injuring them in the estimation of the country.

Mr. WATSON. I made certain statements last night, and my hon. friend for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has used my name in connection with what he has said. I did not say that regularly appointed agents of the Government had acted improperly towards settlers. I do not wish to be so misunderstood on that matter by the House. I said that I expected, when the facts were known, that the agents of the colonisation companies, who act in some districts as Dominion agents to receive applications for lands, would be found to have extorted exorbitant fees from intending settlers. I know that in 1881 and 1882 the country was full of colonisation companies' agents, and they demanded fees varying from $20 to $100 from intending settlers for information furnished them. I am not at all surprised at the warmth with which my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) has entered into the defence of Government officials. We know the wonderful amount of ability he possesses for the defence of Government officials. Of course, I do not know whether he has made all the enquiries of which he has spoken, but we find he not only defends Government officials but he attacks some men in the west who are as much interested in the country as he is. We find from the public press that we may on some occasions doubt that the hon. gentleman is thoroughly accurate in making statements regarding the North-West. He always waxes warm in advocating the policy of the Government in the North-West. I wish to state on behalf of the Dominion Land agents, that I am not aware of any instances where a regularly appointed agent has extorted exorbitant fees from intending settlers; but I did say, yesterday, and I repeat to-day, that the Government policy of granting large tracts of land to colonisation companies enable them to exact large fees from intending settlers.

TRADE UNIONS.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Copies of the rules of all Trade Unions registered under the Act 35 Victoria and the Trade Unions Act, with a list and designation of their several officers.

He said: My object in making this motion is to draw the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to some of the by-laws passed by the trade unions. I do not make the motion in opposition to the trade unions, but for the protection of the laborers themselves. I may at once state that I have in my hand the rules and by-laws of a society that calls itself the Quebec Ship Laborers' Benevolent Society, which was incorporated for the following purpose, as set forth in its Bill of incorporation:—

"That they are subjected to peculiar hardships and accidents in the pursuit of their daily avocations, and that they are desirous of forming themselves into an association, under the name of the Quebec Ship Laborers' Benevolent Society, for the purpose of assisting, in so far as it may be found practicable, the families of members reduced to distress by the illness or death of such members."

This society was incorporated on the 9th of June, 1862, says the first clause of the Bill, "for the purpose aforesaid"; but if I look at the by-laws of this society, I find a number of by-laws, which are called "practical by-laws," which show a very different purpose. Article 39 says:

"The following is the tariff rate of wages demanded by this association, viz., holders and swingers, $1.00 per day; winchers and watchmen, $3.00 per day; stagers, $2.00 per day. Any member of this association who shall work on board ship for less than the established wages, or more than the established hours for said wages, or giving any of his time gratis, such as putting up gear, on being found guilty shall be fined for the first offence, $5.00, second offence, $10.00, and for the third offence he shall be dealt with as the association may determine."

In what way we do not know; whether he will be put in such a physical way as not to be able to reach another vessel we do not know. Then, provisions are made with regard to the number of men who shall be engaged on each vessel. Article 40 says:

"The necessary complement of men to form a gang will be the following: 1st. Vessels working 8 winches, shall employ no less than 24 winchers, 9 holders, 3 swingers and 2 stagers. 2nd. Vessels 600 tons and over, known as double-ported, that is, having a port on the larboard and starboard sides in one end of the lower hold or similar in the between decks, said ports if placed in the bow or stern shall employ no less than 18 winchers, 7 holders, 2 swingers and 2 stagers."

It goes on in the same way providing for the different styles of vessels. One of these clauses says:

"Steamships loading or discharging general cargo shall employ no less than 16 men in each compartment, the stevedore having the privilege to discharge the men at the finishing of the said compartment."

Article 41:

"Eight hours will constitute a day's work, commencing at 7 in the morning, one hour to breakfast, the same to dinner, and leave off at 5 in the evening."

Article 42:

"No member of this society will work on board any vessel where a donkey engine is used in loading or discharging timber, deals, boards, &c., except spool-wood."

Article 43:

"Any member of this society who works with a foreman who is not a member will be fined one day's pay for each day he shall have worked."

"Any member of this society who is discharged without a fault, is obliged to inform the other men who are working in the same ship; and if they do not knock off until such time as such man is allowed to resume his work, they will be fined one day's pay for each day they have worked."

According to this, the man who is discharged has only to declare that he has been discharged without a fault and the whole society is bound to strike and prevent anybody from working. Article 49:

"No members of this society will work in any vessels where the sailors are employed in the capacity of laborers at the loading or taking in broken stowage."

Article 50:

"Any member of this society who may be employed by any stevedore or captain to discharge a vessel, such member will be entitled to work at the loading of same vessel; and it shall be the duty of all members to protect each other in this case, under a penalty of one day's pay for each day he has worked. The same rule shall apply to watchmen."

What the protection is I do not know. Article 51:

"All vessels loading a cargo or taking a portion of a cargo of deals, staves, boards or any kind of lumber must employ four men to stow said cargo at the rate of $4.00 per day; and it shall be distinctly understood that the four men stowing are not to carry under a penalty of one day's pay for each day they have worked."

Article 54:

"No member of this society will furnish labor to the loading of any vessel when the said vessel has been discharged by non-members."

Article 55:

"If any master undertakes to load his vessel with his crew, a record of such shall be taken, and he shall be deprived of labor hereafter by the association."

And it must be remembered that this association has forced—I use the word advisedly—nearly all the ship laborers of that city to enrol in its ranks. Article 59:

"Any member working with a stevedore who has been refused labor from the society will be fined the sum of $10.00 for each day he has worked."

The consequence of these by-laws is very plain. The finest harbor in the world is now the poorest and the barest. Very few ships come there now—only one or two a week—and the revenues of the harbor, instead of increasing, are decreasing. According to the statement made by the Harbor Commissioners themselves, I find that the exportations in 1885 were, in round numbers, $6,700,000, in 1886 they were reduced to $5,800,000, and in 1887 they were still further reduced to $5,100,000. The importations have also been reduced from $3,700,000 in 1885, to $3,500,000 in 1886, and $3,200,000 in 1887. The population of Quebec is also decreasing, and this is all due to these by-laws, which are not sanctioned by law, but by force and intimidation. I am not against the workmen organising themselves; I believe in the protection of labor. I think that the Commission appointed to report on the protection due to laborers is a proper one. I believe in protecting laborers so far as morality is concerned, so far as the employment of young children and women is concerned, so far even as wages are concerned; but I do not believe in these coalitions, combinations, and associations which, in spite of law, rule by force and violence. I state, as a fact, that this association has ruined the harbor of Quebec, and I ask the Minister of Justice to come and give us help in the matter. We have got from our district certain Ministers, whose capacity I will not deny, but probably they are too much employed otherwise and cannot give us any aid. Therefore I make application to the Minister of Justice to come to the help of Quebec in this matter, and I have brought this motion in order that Parliament may acquire some information as to the cause of the ruin of the harbor of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) moved for:

Return of all correspondence by letter or telegram, and all other papers, relative to the conveyance of extra Provincial mails in Prince Edward Island since the 1st of September last.

He said: My object is to draw the attention of the Government to the unfortunate condition of affairs in Prince Edward Island, arising from the action of the Postmaster General. In 1886, the then Postmaster General, Sir Alex. Campbell, owing to the representations of some of his subordinates, withdrew the special trains which formerly existed in the Island for carrying the mails from the place where the Northern Light or the ice-boats land. On representations being made to him of the inconvenience which followed the withdrawal of the special trains, Sir Alex. Campbell removed the grievance and replaced the train, although to replace it involved considerable expense. A retrograde movement has, however, again been made by the new Postmaster General, and during the past winter we have not only suffered the inconveniences that must necessarily arise in an Island isolated as is Prince Edward Island, but these inconveniences have been intensified and increased by the action of the Government. Neither the Post Office Department nor the Marine Department will allow any agents of theirs in that Province to act upon their own judgment or discretion. When the fall begins and the Northern Light has to take the place of the summer steamers, common sense would lead one to suppose that the Departments here would select some man in whose judgment they had full confidence, and allow him to direct when these steamers shall or shall not make the passage. But such seems to be the official perversity that prevails in the Post Office and the Marine Departments, that they will not allow even their own officials to direct when the steamers or boats shall cross, and everything has to be done by instructions from Ottawa, given by men who, from the nature of things, cannot know anything of the service and are not able to exercise reasonable discretion in the matter. Therefore, not only egregious official blunders, but blunders which act most prejudicially on the commercial community, are committed. I submit to the Postmaster General whether it would not be judicious on his part to place some little confidence in the Post Office Inspector on the island, and allow him to direct the manner in which the mails shall be carried after they are landed. I wish the House to understand that I am not making any complaint or bringing up any question with reference to the conveyance of mails across the Straits. Every year complaints are made, and probably will again be made at the proper time, on this subject, but what I now complain of is that, after the mails are delivered on the Prince Edward Island side, the special means of conveying them, which for years we have been supplied with, have been taken away. Hon. gentlemen can see the reasons why there should be some special means. Sometimes the mails are delayed on the other side at Cape Tormentine from one to five days, so that when a crossing is effected no means should be neglected to carry the mails speedily to their destination. Sir Alexander Campbell, when Postmaster General, had withdrawn, on the report of some wretched subordinate who knew nothing about it, the special trains, but the moment the matter was brought to his attention by the Senators representing the Island, he at once ordered the train to be replaced; and the service then gave every satisfaction. Now the Postmaster General has seen fit to withdraw that privilege, and will not allow his Post Office Inspector to exercise any discretion in the matter. He will not give us special trains, he will not pay for the conveyance of the mails by horse and sleigh, so that we are really worse off than we were forty or fifty years ago. To-day, if the mail is four or five days late in crossing, it must remain after it has got over, though it may contain 50, 60 or 150 mail bags, at Cape Tormentine, from 6 hours to 24 or 28 hours as the case may be. Now there is no excuse for anything of that kind. The matter was brought to the notice of the Postmaster General, and, when the Northern Light was disabled last October, the postmaster of the Island wrote to the Postmaster General and asked if it was not possible, in order that the long-suffering people might have their grievances removed, to have special trains employed when necessary. The Postmaster General replied that he should not exercise any such discretion, and that the postmaster was not to employ a special train or even a horse and sleigh to haul the letters to the capital of the Island without special orders from Ottawa. The unfortunate man had to act on that, and what was the result? In the month of December the Northern Light ceased to run, and instead of the agent of the Marine Department at once placing the boats on to take her place, it was found that no one had authority to put the boats on. They telegraphed to Ottawa, and after a lapse of four or five days, the boats were got ready under an order from Ottawa. There was an inexcusable delay in getting means to take the mails across. The boats were got ready, and after they were got ready the Board of Trade of Charlottetown telegraphed to the Postmaster General as follows:—

" CHARLOTTETOWN, 28th December, 1887.

" Postmaster here having no authority to employ special trains to deliver Northern Light's mails causes serious inconvenience to business. The Charlottetown Board of Trade respectfully urge that arrangements be at once made to obviate this. No outside mails received since Saturday last."

Two days passed by without a reply, and they telegraphed again asking for a reply. On the 3rd January, nearly a week afterwards, the Postmaster General replies :

" Matter submitted to Council. The expense, about $7,000, considered too great, besides giving precedent to Western Canada to demand specials from Quebec for eastern mails."

Now, that whole telegram is an absurdity. The Postmaster General ought to have known, if he had enquired of his deputies, that the precedent had been already set, that his predecessor, and every man who had any cognisance of the facts and any authority over this matter from winter to winter, had ordered that special trains should be employed to carry the mails. They knew that very few mails were landed from the boats or from the Northern Light which had not to be carried to the capital; and, as to Quebec, I say that is a flimsy excuse which was unworthy of the hon. gentleman. The precedent had existed for years. Supposing the Northern Light, after being one or two days crossing, or even one day crossing, arrived at Georgetown or one of the termini an hour or two hours, as she generally did, after the departure of the morning train, those mails, which were already perhaps three or four days old, had to remain 24 hours in Georgetown until the next day's train. The whole commerce of those engaged in business would be partially paralysed owing to the want of action and the refusal of ordinary and reasonable facilities by the Department. Then there was no special train to carry a reply immediately back, so that a gentleman writing from Halifax, to another gentleman in Charlottetown, would have to wait about one week to write a letter and get a reply over this distance of about 150 or 160 miles, and that owing to the want of action, the want of judgment, and the culpable negligence of the department over which the hon. gentleman presides; and this in the face of a previous decision arrived at by his predecessor, who had given a great deal of consideration to the matter and had listened in the Senate for many years to the complaints of Senators from Prince Edward Island, that the specials should be run there all the time to carry the matter to the capital. Then he says it will cost $7,000. If it did cost $7,000, there is no reason why the people of that Island should be deprived of that special train, but he must have known that, in sending that telegram, he was not conveying the whole truth. That service did not cost $1,000. The officials of the train were there. It was merely a cross entry of the Railway Department against the Post Office Department. It was merely the cost of the fuel to run 20 or 30 miles to carry the mails to the capital. On the 9th January the mails were ordered to go by the capes, but there were no boats ready to take them. The same policy which I have been so much deprecating, and which prevails in the Post Office Department, prevails also in the Marine Department. They seem to have no confidence in their agent. He had no authority to lay out $5 to get the boats ready to carry the mails without authority from Ottawa. It was only on the 12th January that the boats were ready. Although it may be a little tedious, I want to call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the facts under which we suffer, and then to ask if it is reasonable that those things should continue. So, after nearly a week's delay, when the boats were ready on the 12th January, that day was stormy and they could not go out, but on the 13th January they went out. There were 165 bags of mail matter at Cape Tormentine. The boats brought over 70 bags and left 95 behind. We had been a week without mails and, when they arrived, they were not much more than a third of the whole of the mails that were ready, and that, and the delay for that week, nearly the whole of it was due to the culpable negligence and inaction of those two departments. Then when those 70 bags arrived, they were allowed to remain all that day at Cape Traverse, and it was not until the 14th that they reached Charlottetown. I venture to say that, if a little village containing 300 voters in the hon. gentleman's county had been treated half so shabbily as the population of 120,000 people on the Island of Prince Edward has been, he would have given orders very quickly to have the evil remedied. The conduct of the hon. gentleman seems inexplicable. I cannot understand it. The Conservative newspaper in Prince Edward Island had tried to account for it, and after commenting for some time on the delay, it wound up as follows:—

" For the grossest and most inexcusable stupidity, Mr. McLellan, in his official capacity, has certainly no superior. Our language may appear strong, but we submit that our case warrants its use."

That is not the language of any Grit or Liberal, but it is the language of one of the strongest Tory newspapers in the Dominion, and the facts bear it out. Hon. gentlemen smile, but, if they were conducting a large business and waiting for returns from the United States of their shipments of oats and potatoes, and found that the mail had crossed and that 165 mail bags were lying there, and that the Postmaster General had telegraphed that they were not to be brought to town for 48 hours, they would think "inexcusable stupidity" as mild a term as could be used; and, for my part, I endorse the term as far as it is parliamentary to do it. Well, let me proceed with the facts of that week. On Saturday they again crossed, and the remaining 95 bags were brought over. These 95 bags remained all day Saturday, and all day Sunday, and the ordinary train which left Cape Traverse in the morning, brought them down, and they reached Charlottetown on Monday. On the 22nd, the mail again crossed, but the train, by order of the Postmaster General, had again left—the boat was about an hour late. The train would not wait. There were no passengers to take, however. Hon. gentlemen know that this railway which was built at a cost of $175,000 by the Government, a few years ago, was built, as they themselves stated, to carry out the terms which they had made with Prince Edward Island, terms for the conveyance of the mails and passengers. There are no towns to be served by it. The main object of the railway was to carry passengers and the mails to and fro. They started the train in the morning with, perhaps one or two passengers, certainly not more. They run that railway 13 miles to get to the main line, and they will not wait until the mail crosses. That is the complaint. The mail crossed too late that day. The train went forward on the 23rd, 24 hours after it crossed that mail was brought to town. On the 24th, another mail crossed, and it was too late for the town. Then the Board of Trade commenced telegraphing to the Premier. This thing was intolerable. Mind you, it has nothing to do with parties, it has nothing to do with politics; it is a matter that interests every grown-up man and woman on the Island. Well, the Board of Trade telegraphed to the Premier on the 12th January :

" The Right Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD, Ottawa.

Charlottetown Board of Trade, in annual meeting assembled, solemnly protest against present arrangement of mail and passenger service with mainland. No mails received since that of Thursday, 5th inst., from Pictou, although weather fine and Straits suitable for ice-boat crossing. No out going mails since yesterday week, except one by Northern Light last evening, which was dispatched on Saturday with accumulations of previous two days. These mails were sent by Georgetown against judgment of everybody here, because Cape service was not ready; crew not organised for crossing Tormentine to-day. When mail crosses from Tormentine in a forenoon, the proper time, it cannot be delivered here by regular train until noon the following day. Under present arrangement of Traverse Railway, there is a positive injury to the Island, as mails take an average of twenty-four hours from Traverse by regular train, while they could be through by teams in three hours. Management of mail, steam and ice-boat service, from Ottawa, complete failure. We pray that a special train from Traverse be granted as in former years. Not possible to arrange regular trains to suit crossing. Please telegraph reply."

Now, hon. gentlemen will see that before the railway was built at all, before we ever joined—I was going to say, unfortunately joined—Confederation, when the mails did cross, they were brought to Charlottetown by special teams in two or three hours—always; and within three or four hours afterwards, a team took out the return mail, just allowing sufficient time for the letters to be delivered, and time to answer them. Now, under the masterly arrangement made by the present Postmaster General, these mails that were formerly delivered by horse and sleigh in three hours, are delivered by his railway in twenty-four. Sir, that is intolerable, and cannot be submitted to. Well, on the 13th the Postmaster General telegraphs in reply:

"Sir John asked me to reply to your message. On information received on the 8th, it was decided to put on ice-boats. Application was made to Marine Department to commence the service. Railway will run a train from Traverse at half past eleven to connect with through train to Charlottetown. In past years, boats have generally crossed in time to connect, and special efforts will be made to ensure this."

Now, the hon. gentleman says, instead of starting the train in the early morning at 9, I will meet your wishes by delaying it until 11. I dare say his intentions were good, but his ignorance of times and the facts about the crossing, frustrated entirely his good intentions. As a matter of fact, the boats do not get over by 11 o'clock except on rare occasions—my hon. friend near me says not once in 50 times. They leave the other side at 7 or 8 o'clock, and get over by 12 or 1 o'clock. I went to Cape Traverse about it and I found that the boats had crossed and reached the board ice, and when within five or six hundred yards of the train, the whistle blew, and the train started and left behind 100 mail bags that were to be carried to the city. Well, Sir, the Board of Trade was not satisfied with the answer given by the Postmaster General, and they again telegraphed to the Premier on the 23rd:

"Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD,
Ottawa.

"First mail since Wednesday crossed yesterday; forwarded this morning from Traverse to Summerside, missing the train."

Now, I want to explain what that is. There was a masterly stroke of genius exhibited there by the Postmaster General. After complaint had been made, and after it was apparent that the delay in the starting the train at 11 o'clock did no good, the Postmaster General thought the matter over, and, as I say, by a masterly stroke of genius, he adopted a policy which, I think, ought to recommend him to Her Majesty for some signal mark of her royal favor. He directed that the mails, instead of being carried to Charlottetown, should be put in a sleigh and carried 17 miles further away to the town of Summerside, in the west, in order that they might possibly catch the train coming down by the evening. What was the result? The Charlottetown Board of Trade say what the results were:

"First mail since Wednesday crossed yesterday; forwarded this morning from Traverse to Summerside, missing the train."

It got in too late again, and I asked the man who drove it up how late he was. He said he had arrived at the station with four teams and some 75 mail bags the moment the train was steaming out—the train with which the hon. gentleman was going to carry the mails, would not even allow the bags to be transferred from the sleighs into the train; so that did no good. But he persisted in it and kept on, in spite of the protests of the Board of Trade. That telegram goes on:

"Will not now arrive in Charlottetown until to-morrow, nearly two days after arrival at Traverse. If sent to Charlottetown direct by team, 30 miles, could have been here this morning. Traverse branch opened this morning, and might have brought mails to intercept main line trains at County Line, Charlottetown, by post road, about two hours further than Summerside from Traverse. Would it not be possible to permit postal authorities here to meet the reasonable requirements of the community?"

On the 26th the Charlottetown Board of Trade again telegraphed to Sir John A. Macdonald:

"No foreign mail crossed since Sunday last until to-day, when train left Traverse 15 minutes before ice-boats lauded the mails" —

That is a nice state of affairs, —

—"thus preventing the arrival of mails at Charlottetown before to-morrow. We again ask, is there no remedy for this condition of things?"

The Postmaster General replied to that as follows:—

"Your message of 26th to Sir John, reached me to-day. At once saw Superintendent of Railways, who will give instructions to prevent similar occurrences. Please communicate on postal matters with me direct."

I do not know why, but the Mail Department and Board of Trade did not seem to have that confidence in the hon. gentleman that was desirable, so they telegraphed to Sir John A.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They had confidence in me.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) They seem to have had confidence in the Premier, and I am anxious to bring the facts before him again, because I am satisfied that if he would give five minutes attention to this matter, he would remedy it. The policy of the hon. gentleman does not commend itself to me, but I believe that he will not see a gross injustice done to the community, when it is explained to him, without remedying it. But the Postmaster General was responsible for the whole trouble. He will pay $6 for a team to haul those mails 17 miles further away, and will not pay $13 to haul them to Charlottetown. The 120,000 people of Prince Edward Island, who are at very great natural inconvenience, supposing the best was done, would have to suffer a good deal; but these natural inconveniences are intensified and duplicated ten times over by the stupidity and ignorance of these officials. If the hon. gentleman had acted for the first time in this way I would have thought it was through sheer ignorance; but when his predecessor, having considered the whole matter, had determined that special trains ought to run, and he came in and revoked that order, and would not grant teams to carry the mails, but persisted in carrying them 17 miles further than was necessary, and at the same time declared that a special train would cost $7,000 when he knew it meant simply a cross entry in the books of the Railway Department as against the Post Office Department, I say I almost despair of anything being done to have these wrongs set right until at least some pressure is brought to bear on the hon. gentleman by his colleagues. I do not want to detain the House on this matter any longer, but I wish to impress this fact: that while Parliament voted $175,000 to build that short line of road, by the perverseness with which it is managed by the authorities, it is, instead of a blessing, a curse, and, while before the rail road was built we had the mails delivered in three hours, the same mails now take twenty-four hours to make the run. Thirty or forty years ago our mail service was in ten times as good a condition as it is to-day. We had special teams to haul the mails before the railroad was built, and now that we have the road we have gone backward. We have members from every part of the Dominion rising in their places and stating that all reasonable efforts are made by the Post Office, if by no other department, to give the people the benefit of modern improvements, to carry the mails from one place to another rapidly, and I believe this is the case all through the North-West and everywhere else. Parsimony and cheese-paring and meanness have not formed the policy which has characterised the Post Office in days gone by. Both parties have recognised the supreme importance of the prompt delivery of postal matter, especially in the present day. Why, the Finance Minister gave a quasi-sanction to a scheme for the construction of a tunnel which was going to cost millions, and yet in the face of that we hear the Postmaster General complaining of a nominal charge on the Government books of $7,000 being too much to be paid in connection with Prince Edward Island, while, as a matter of fact, it will not cost $1,000. If the hon. gentleman will not give us a special train, the oil and coal for the running of which might possibly cost $1,000 to the country, let him do what was done forty years ago in the Island, let him employ horses and sleighs. It formerly cost $13 the round trip, four horses and sleigh, for a distance of 30 miles. If we are to be cut off from the rest of the Dominion, if we are to be deprived of the advantages which every other Province enjoys, let the hon. gentleman say so. I have read the comments made by the Tory press, I have read the telegrams of the Board of Trade, a strictly non-political body, stating that matters there are intolerable; all due entirely to the mismanagement of the hon. gentleman, and I believe with the Tory newspaper that the hon. gentleman has some intense grudge to satisfy against the people of the Island or he would not have acted so parsimoniously and contemptibly as he has done.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman has relieved himself I suppose very considerably. He has told us that the arrangements for the transmission of the mails in the town of Charlottetown are ten times worse than they were thirty or forty years ago. The hon. gentleman knows that this Government has expended enormous sums in subsidising a railway to Cape Tormentine, and that the land carriage to Cape Tormentine, in the period to which he refers twenty or thirty years ago, was the greatest difficulty in the transmission of the mails, and it was a journey that was most dreaded by passengers. By expending $120,000 or $130,000, in subsidising a railway to Cape Tormentine, twenty-four hours at least were saved on the passage of the mails by that railway from what it occupied in the old time.

Mr. WELSH. No.

Mr. McLELAN. I think those who conveyed the mails ten or twenty years ago, or even five years ago, will say that a large saving in time has been made by the construction of the railway to Cape Tormentine. A few years ago there were complaints as to the crossing of the Straits by the ice-boats, and accidents were occurring. It was under the same management and, perhaps, under the same captains as those who were running it before the Island entered the Confederation. I asked the Postmaster General when I was in charge of the Marine Department, to give me charge of that service, as I believed I could organise a better system for crossing the Straits than that which existed then, or had existed previous to Confederation. I placed it in the hands of a gentleman who had years of experience in winter passages in the Gulf, and an improved system was organised. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, Estimates of sums required for the service of the Dominion for the year ending 30th June, 1888, and in accordance with the provisions of "The British

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

North America Act, 1867," the Governor General recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 1st March, 1888.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the said Message and Estimates be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT—THE ESTIMATES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I congratulate the Minister of Finance on the promptness with which he has brought down the Estimates, and I may say it appears well for the expedition with which the Session may be conducted. I would ask the hon. Minister if he is prepared to tell the House whether he will or will not be likely to proceed with his financial statement at an early day?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I am not able to state how early it will be in my power to make the financial statement, but I may inform the hon. gentleman and the House that it is our intention to proceed at once with the Estimates. The practice in England, as the hon. gentleman is aware, is to proceed with the Estimates long before the Chancellor of the Exchequer brings down his Budget, and we propose to proceed with the consideration of the Estimates in advance of the financial statement being made.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a new departure. I am not at all disposed myself at present to raise any objection to it. I have no doubt it has been well considered, and I am aware of the English practice; in fact, I see certain conveniences in it. I understand, then, that the hon. gentleman has it not in contemplation to proceed either on Friday or Tuesday next.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it will be well for the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, in connection with the statement just made, to call together the Committee at once, because in connection with the passage of many of the items we first want to know how the money voted last Session has been disposed of.

Mr. LAURIER. I would suggest also that a meeting of the Committee on Privileges and Elections be called for an early day, as a most important matter has been referred to it.

RETURNS ORDERED.

List of Trade Unions which have complied with the provisions of the Act 35 Victoria, chapter 30, and the Trade Unions Act, showing the date in each case.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Copies of regulations made by the Governor in Council respecting the registry of Trade Unions.—(Mr. Amyot.)

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 2nd March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRIVATE BILLS—EXTENSION OF TIME.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved:

That the time for receiving petitions for Private Bills be extended to the 24th March instant, and the time for presenting Private Bills to the 29th March.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 8) to incorporate the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Patterson, Essex.)

Bill (No. 9) respecting the Canada Southern, and Erie and the Niagara Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

TRADE COMBINATIONS.

Mr. WALLACE (York) moved that the Select Committee appointed on Wednesday last to examine into certain trade combinations be empowered to employ a shorthand writer to take down such evidence as the committee may deem necessary.

Motion agreed to.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF DEBATES.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the First Report of the Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of this House be adopted. He said: I must explain that there are three recommendations contained in this report. First, the recommendation to appoint Mr. Owen to fill the vacancy caused by the decease of Mr. Eyvel. Mr. Owens has been recommended to us as one of the most efficient reporters that could be found here, so that, after consideration, the committee beg to recommend his appointment. The second recommendation is that a gratuity equal to two months' salary be granted the widow of the unfortunate Mr. Eyvel, on account of the circumstances that led to his death; and the third recommendation is one we have been obliged to make since the last two years concerning the arrangement for the printing of the Official Reports, as we have not yet been able to carry out the rules on this subject adopted by the House in July, 1885. We expect this will be the last year we will ask to continue this arrangement, because we believe that the Government printing establishment will be in operation next Session. The report also contains the recommendation to continue the contract for binding with the same contractor, as last year, on the same terms and conditions.

Mr. WALLACE. With reference to the second recommendation of the report, I regret the committee have not seen their way to make a still larger appropriation for the family of the late George Eyvel. The circumstances that led to his death are very well known to every member of this House. Mr. Eyvel, in the performance of his duty as a servant of this House and the Government, was reporting the proceedings of the Labor Commission meetings in the city of Toronto, and on his way home he was attacked by robbers, struck down in the street, on a bitterly cold night, and lay insensible until nearly dead. When he recovered consciousness, he was so much reduced in strength he could scarcely help himself, and as a result of the injuries received he died a few days ago, his death being the direct result of the injuries he received that night. I think, therefore, this House should deal a little more generously with the family of the late George Eyvel than the committee propose in this report. We have a precedent for such action, in the fact that the House of Commons has, on previous occasions, made grants to the widows and relatives of deceased servants, under circumstances that do not claim our sympathy so strongly as do the circumstances in this case. Mrs. Todd was voted by this House $1,000 on the death of her husband. The family of the late Mr. Coffin, Commissioner of Ordnance Lands, was voted the sum of $2,000. The Senate voted the family of the late Mr. Fennings Taylor a year's salary, and the family of the late Rev. Mr. Johnson, Chaplain of the Senate, six months' pay. There are also other cases affording precedents for the action I recommend, and I would suggest that the report be referred back to the committee with instructions to make the amount at least six months' pay, or $1,000; and I am confident that such a grant will meet the approval of this House and the country as well.

Mr. DENISON. I merely desire to say a word in seconding the motion of the hon. member for York. I believe it is highly desirable that what he suggests should be done for the family of Mr. Eyvel. The circumstance of his being attacked is one this House should bear in mind. It is not the usual case of a man meeting his death through old age, but of his being taken off in the prime of life.

Mr. LISTER. I may be permitted to say a word in support of the hon. member for North York, and that is that I think the suggestion is the most generous act on his part. So far as the late Mr. Eyvel is concerned, he was for many years an official of this House, and for many years served this House at the small salary of $1,000. He was a most efficient reporter and courteous gentleman, and I am sure I echo the sentiments of this side of the House in saying we will be glad to see the Government deal generously with his widow. He was a resident for many years of the town of Sarnia, and I had opportunities of knowing him intimately, and can appreciate his good qualities. A more diligent and more faithful servant this House could not have had, and I think the Government would be only doing an act of generosity, and kindness, and justice, in recognising his services by dealing generously with his dependent wife and family. I believe he leaves his family of three small children almost entirely destitute, and, as we all know, the circumstances connected with his death were of a most painful character. He was stricken down, as my hon. friend has said, on his way home from the Labor Commission, where he was discharging his duties as a servant of this House, and was left on the street for hours on a bitterly cold night until he was picked up by a policeman, who did not know him, and who took him to the police station, where he was put into a warm room, when his hands were frozen at the time, and the result of that was his death. I believe that if medical men had been called in immediately, his life would have been saved to himself and his family. I think the House, in taking a generous view of this case, will at least grant six months' salary to his widow.

Mr. DAVIN. I am glad to see that it is unnecessary to rise to support this motion, because it seems to meet with the general consent of the House, but I cannot deny myself the pleasure of speaking in favor of it. As a member of the committee, I may say that many, if not all, of the members were in favor of taking some such course as this, but they felt it would not be within their province to do so, and that it was better that it should come from the House itself. I think I may say that the committee were unanimous in favor of a liberal grant being made in this case. I knew Mr. Eyvel well, and a man more calculated to inspire and fix esteem has never been in the gallery of this House, or, for that matter, in this House. Before he was on the Hansard staff he served the House with perfect propriety and great ability in another capacity. He worked for a newspaper in that gallery, and I do think that, in regard to a man who has had relations of this kind with the House, the House will always be ready to manifest sentiments such as I am happy to hear expressed to-day.

Mr. SCRIVER. I desire simply to say that while, as my hon. friend who has just taken his seat has said, the committee did not feel at liberty to recommend any other than the usual course pursued under such circumstances, that two months' pay should be given as a gratuity to the widow, they would have been glad to have recommended a larger appropriation; but, even in regard to this, they acted under a misapprehension, I find, in regard to one matter. I am told that civil servants are paid a month in advance, and that is not the case in regard to the official stenographers of the House. If the committee had been aware of that fact, they would certainly have recommended that at least three months' salary should be paid.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After the expression of the opinion which seems to be so general on both sides of the House in regard to this case, perhaps the committee had better withdraw their report and limit themselves to calling the attention of the House to this case, and then leave it in the hands of the Government to consider it, and to place in the Supplementary Estimates what we think would be proper in consideration of the circumstances.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I am sure that the members of the committee who have united in making their recommendation will be satisfied to see that they have met so well the feelings of the House. As my hon. friend at my side (Mr. Davin) has said, the feeling of the committee was that something ought to be done, and that Mr. Eyvel's family was entitled to the recognition which we desired to offer, so, for my part, I am sure that we shall willingly take back that part of the report which refers to that recommendation and ask that the report be adopted without that portion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand that the hon. gentleman wants the first and third paragraphs adopted. Perhaps the House will consider that the second paragraph is not before the House.

Mr. DESJARDINS moved that the First Report of the Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates of the House be adopted, with the exception of the recommendation that a gratuity be granted to Mrs. Eyvel.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Report of Royal Commission on the leasing of water-power, Lachine Canal.—(Mr. Pope.)

CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. JAMIESON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 10) to amend the Canada Temperance Act. He said: No lengthened explanation of this Bill will be required from me. It contains the provisions of the Bill introduced by me at two previous Sessions of this House. In addition to that, I have embodied in it some other amendments which have been found to be necessary, owing to the defective working of the Act. We have experienced considerable difficulties in the working of the Act, and it is thought necessary to have it amended in some particulars. It has been thought advisable that the Act should be applicable to the whole Dominion. At present, it is not applicable to the Province of British Columbia, owing to the fact that they have no county organisations there. We propose, therefore, to make it applicable there. It is not applicable, either, to temporary judicial districts, and we propose to apply it to those districts, of which there are several in the Province of Ontario. It is also proposed that no repeal vote shall be taken until the Act has been in force at least two years and ten months. We also propose that, in the case of liquor being sold for medicinal purposes, under the certificate of a medical man, a penalty shall be imposed on him if he gives a colorable or fraudulent certificate. We also propose to repeal the 103rd section of the Act. A good deal of difficulty has arisen owing to the over-particularity of that clause. There is a special rule laid down for each Province separately. The clause I refer to is the one which deals with the magisterial authority before which the trials may take place. We propose to make one law applicable to each part of the Dominion. In the Province of Ontario difficulties have arisen in consequence of the conflict of authority, and in this and many other respects we believe the law would be much better enforced if one provision were made for the whole Dominion. An amendment is also proposed to the search clause. At present a search cannot be made for liquor under the Act unless a prosecution is pending, and when a prosecution is pending, parties who are in the habit of infringing the law take advantage of the clause to dispose of their liquor. We propose that on the information of a credible witness, a Justice of the Peace, or a person having authority under the Act, shall be permitted to issue a search warrant in the first instance. It is also proposed to extend the right of search, so that it may be made at any time. At present it can only be made in the day time. It is also proposed to append to the Bill a set of forms for the guidance of Justices of the Peace and others connected with the enforcement of the law. It has been found that, owing to technical defects, many indictments have been quashed before Justices of the Peace, which should have been upheld. Finally, there is a provision in the Bill respecting the application of fines. It is deemed advisable by those promoting this Bill that in cases where an officer of the Provincial Government is party to the prosecution, one half the penalty shall be paid to him for the enforcement of the law. In all other cases, as in the case where a private individual prosecutes, it is proposed that one half the penalty be paid to him and the other half to the treasurer of the municipality. These, in brief, are the amendments I propose, which, I hope, will meet with the favorable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND MAIL SERVICE.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Davies for a return of correspondence, by letter or telegram, and all other papers relative to the conveyance of extra Provincial mails in Prince Edward Island since 1st September last.

Mr. McLELAN. When the House adjourned last evening I was making some remark, in answer to the extraordinary statements made by the hon. gentleman from Queen's (Prince Edward Island) in his usual manner. I was dealing with his statement that there have been no improvements in the means of communication for the last forty or fifty years; and I was reminding the House that, forty or fifty years ago, communication during the winter months for five or six months in the year, was made by a land voyage of fifty-two miles, and by ice-boats, under the control of certain men living at Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse. I had occasion to look into the history of that service, and I was unable to ascertain that any improvement had been made for thirty or forty years by the Local Government previous to Confederation. When the service came under the control of the Post Office Department at Ottawa, complaints were made by people of the Island that it was insufficient, that the service with which they had so long been content, apparently, had become insufficient, and that steps should be taken by the Government to improve it. I am not now speaking of the steam communication, but of the ice-boat service, to which the hon. gentleman has more particularly referred. The first step taken was to improve the means of transit to the Capes.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman will permit me to say that I carefully excluded any reference to the ice-boat service. I stated distinctly that I was making no complaint about it.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman said that we were retrograding, and that the communication was worse than it was forty or fifty years ago.

Mr. DAVIES. The mail service on the Island.

Mr. McLELAN. I told the House last evening that the first step that the Government took was to construct railways down to the ice, so as to dispense with that long route of fifty-two miles of land travel, in the season of the year when travellers experienced the greatest hardships. In order to avoid that difficulty, we subsidised a railway in the county of Westmoreland at an expense of $120,000, and on the Cape Traverse side we expended $175,000 in building a railway down to the Cape, and a wharf at that point. The Government also provided a grant in the Estimates for the construction, at Cape Tormentine, of a wharf costing about $100,000 more, to facilitate this service. Now, the carriage of the mails across the Straits was generally done by certain individuals living on the Cape, under a contract of so much per trip, just the same as contracts were given to other mail conductors throughout the country. They were not bound to any particular hours in crossing, but it was left to their own judgment as to when they should cross. Complaints were made as to the manner in which that service was being performed. I may say that no change had taken place in the manner of its performance since the time the hon. gentleman was a member of the Government and controlled it himself. When I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries I suggested to the Postmaster General, shortly after an accident occurred, when I had occasion to study more especially the condition of the service, and found that it was capable of improvement—I suggested to the Postmaster General that we should place that service in the hands of the Marine and Fisheries Department. He consented, and the Government approved of the change. I sent an officer from my department down there to study the subject, before the winter set in, and he came back and reported to me. I approved of his plans, in a great measure, and we agreed upon a system for the winter. I sent him down to organise that system and carry it out, and I gave him an open order for any expense he thought to be necessary. And let me say that when I sent that officer down there and kept him in charge of that service all winter, complaints came to me continually from the Island that I was interfering with an old institution, and was taking the management out of the hands of the people who had held it for forty or fifty years. I went on, and I believe gentlemen from Prince Edward Island now will say that the changes made in that service are beneficial and have effected a great improvement, as compared with the service that previously existed under the management of the Local Government, and up to the time I took charge of it.

Mr. WELSH. Yes.

Mr. McLELAN. I have the testimony of the hon. gentleman who says "yes," and of a great many more from Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia who have crossed the Straits and who say that the system now is almost as perfect as it can be made. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made another statement which I consider rather extraordinary, namely, that the arrangement which I made for the connection of the ice-boat service was such that not once in fifty times did the service connect. In looking at the time-table of the Island Railway I found that there was a train leaving Cape Traverse about 6:45 in the morning to connect with the train that runs from Summerside to Charlottetown, arriving there at about 10 in the morning. I found there was another train running through the Island with which that train, if delayed until about 12 o'clock, would be able to connect. I asked the Railway Department to change the hour of running on that branch to Cape Traverse to 11:30, which they did, and I believe in almost every case that would enable connection to be made between the ice-boats and the railway. The hon. gentleman has risen in his place and stated that not once in fifty times was that connection made. The hon. gentleman should have known, if he came here with the intention of giving the facts to the House, how many times they failed to connect before making his assertion to the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I had a statement here, and I read it

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman in making a speech depended on his imagination and political feeling, in order to make capital against the department and the Government in this matter. The hon. gentleman, if he had made enquiries, would have found from the return that from the time the boats commenced running up to 28th February, the last return we have, there were only nine occasions on which they failed to connect, and on one of those occasions, when there was unusual delay, a special train was sent on with the mails. The hon. gentleman, I say, should have made due enquiries before he ventured on the assertion that only once in fifty times had they been able to make connection. The hon. gentleman complains that we do not put on special trains for this service when they do fail to connect, and he complains that we send the mails to Summerside by land. Under the arrangement Summerside receives the mails at every crossing, and we have a contract with the land service to carry the mails from Traverse to Summerside when we cannot send them by train. When they fail to connect we have sent forward the mails from Charlottetown to Summerside in order that they might go forward by the night train and reach Charlottetown at 10 o'clock next morning. So they do not lie over to the next day, but, instead of reaching Charlottetown at about 3 o'clock in the day, as they will do if they connect, they reach there the next morning by train from Summerside. That is the reason why we send the mails to Summerside. The hon. gentleman complains that it is a great hardship because the Government do not send forward special trains. I have enquired as to how often the mails from the whole Lower Provinces have failed to connect with Montreal this winter, and I have just received a telegram which states that since 1st November the mails from Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island have sixteen times failed to connect at Montreal with trains running to Ottawa and the west. We do not send on, and do not expect to send on, special trains to carry the mails in case they miss the connection. They lie there till the next train, and mails that should have been delivered to us at noon would not be delivered before the morning following. So that if the people of Prince Edward Island complain because we do not immediately charter a train and send forward the mails which miss connection, and only nine times during the season of crossing, from 13th January up to 28th February, they should remember that the mails failed to connect sixteen times at Montreal with the western train. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has complained that we do not give to our agents there authority to act upon their own responsibility. When I was Minister of Marine and Fisheries I gave such an order to the captain of the Northern Light, to act upon his own responsibility. I told him that as he was upon the spot he should consider the condition of the ice in the Gulf, and he was to be the judge as to when he could proceed to sea with due regard to the safety of the vessel. That order was unsatisfactory to the people of the Island. They said we should order the captain to go to sea; and so unsatisfactory was it that the Government of the Island embodied it in the complaints which they laid at the foot of the Throne, that I had given an order to the captain to act upon his own authority.

Mr. WELSH. Quite right, too.

Mr. McLELAN. It seems to be impossible to please the people of Prince Edward Island in anything. If I undertake to improve the ice-boat service, fault is found with me on the ground that I am interfering with an old institution, and people who have long held that monopoly are put aside while officers of the Fishery Department are sent down from Ottawa to take charge of it. If I give an order to the captain of a steamer that he should exercise his judgment as to when he should risk a vessel in crossing the Straits, complaint is made that he should be given that responsibility; and now, when we do not give authority to our officers in connection with the mails, complaint is made by the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman has intimated to the House that I have withheld those special trains upon those nine occasions—I suppose he will refer to some other occasions at Georgetown also, out of some grudge I feel to the people of the Island. I deny it. I deny that I have any such feeling as the hon. gentleman would impute to me. It is not possible for me to have such a feeling; it is not possible for me to exercise such a feeling with the full knowledge of this subject which my colleagues possess. The Government would not permit any member of the Cabinet to bring his feelings into any matter that affected the people of any section or Province of the Dominion. I have nothing but the most kindly and generous feelings towards the people of Prince Edward Island, and the Government has always treated that Province, in its isolated condition, bountifully, and especially the postal service. If the hon. gentleman had examined the facts, he would have found that when that Province entered Confederation in 1874 it had only 179 post offices, while we have increased the number to 298 at the present time. It had an annual mail travel in 1874 of 249,000 miles, which we have increased to 489,000 miles. The percentage of increase in these things has been greater in Prince Edward Island than it has been in either New Brunswick or Nova Scotia. The increase in the annual mileage travelled in connection with the postal service from 1874 to 1887 was 44 per cent. in Nova Scotia, 53 per cent. in New Brunswick, and 96 per cent. in Prince Edward Island. These figures show how exceptionally well treated is the Province of Prince Edward Island in these respects. The hon. gentleman referred to my own county of Colchester, telling the House that if there was a matter affecting a little village of 300 population in my county, a special means would be adopted by me to accommodate those 300 people. Well, Sir, we have not only villages of 300 population in the county of Colchester, but we have also villages growing to the dignity of small towns; and some of these towns regard themselves as of considerable commercial importance. I may tell the hon. gentleman that one little town in the county I have the honor to represent pays to the Minister of Customs within $1,000 of one-half as much revenue as the whole Province of Prince Edward Island. Yet, instead of interfering specially for the benefit of the little villages and towns in his own county, the Postmaster General does not order special trains to carry the English mails to that county, nor even to the large and flourishing cities of Halifax and St. John. And so, Sir, if the hon. gentleman had not felt it necessary to draw upon his imagination and his political feelings, he would not have made a statement so unworthy of him, as that I would have appropriated the public funds in order to benefit little villages of 300 inhabitants in the county of Colchester. The hon. gentleman says that even supposing the running of those special trains does cost $7,000, we should not hesitate to run them on all occasions. Notwithstanding that great stupidity with which the hon. gentleman says the Postmaster General is endowed, I think the arrangement I have made, by changing the time of starting the Cape Traverse Railway, has resulted in a large saving of money, and the railway failed to connect only nine times during the season. Therefore, I think that so long as there was a reasonable prospect of meeting the wants of the community, I was justified in making that change, in order to effect a saving of public money. The hon. gentleman says he could run all the trains that were run last year, at a cost of $1,000, for which we paid $6,700.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) May I ask the hon. gentleman to state to the House to whom he paid this money? Did he not pay it to the Post Office Department, and let it stand simply as a cross-entry in the Government books?

Mr. McLELAN. I paid it to the Railway Department, and the Railway Department paid it out for the expense of running the trains. If the hon. gentleman could run them for $1,000, it would be well to remove the gentleman who is now running them and put the hon. gentleman in his place. But he says the cost was only $7,000, at any rate, and why should we not expend that money? Well, Sir, I did not think it was advisable. The post office service at the best, if reasonable accommodation is given to the people, is very expensive, and the revenue from it falls very short of the expense; and I believe that wherever we can effect a saving in that expense without injuring the service, it is right that we should do so. There are many places calling for postal accommodation, and it is better to cut down the expense in some places, and apply it to the wants of the people who need accommodation. Therefore, I think I was justified in reducing largely the expense on these special trains. If the hon. gentleman looks at the post office accounts, which show what we have expended on the postal service of Prince Edward Island and on the communication between that Province and the other Provinces, I think he will quietly admit to himself, if he does not to the House, that we are justified in saving that expenditure in every way we possibly can. The expense on the ordinary service on the Island, last year, was $50,262; the subsidy for carrying the mails from the mainland was $10,000; the cost of the service at the Capes was $6,312; the cost of running the Northern Light and the Neptune was $33,000; and other subsidies were $3,000; making in all an expenditure of $103,000 for postal services for Prince Edward Island and for maintaining communication with the mainland. Now, I think the hon. gentleman will admit that this is a very large expenditure indeed, and that if we can, without great inconvenience to the Island, save from $5,000 to $7,000 yearly, we will be justified in doing it, in order that the money saved may be appropriated to provide for other postal services in the country. I do not expect to save the entire amount of $7,000, for an agreement was made by the Government some days previous to the delivery of the hon. gentleman's speech; and I may say that if the hon. gentleman had delivered the speech he made yesterday, previous to the decision of the Government, I very much doubt if it would have been reached.

Mr. DAVIES. You do not decide on justice, then?

Mr. McLELAN. If the hon. gentleman had made that speech and the extraordinary statements it contained—

Mr. DAVIES. I can verify every one of them.

Mr. McLELAN—statements unfounded on fact, it would have gone a great way to prejudice the minds of my colleagues and myself in making any change in the matter. During the early part of the winter, the hon. gentleman knows that, all commercial activity on the Island comparatively ceases, and there is but little shipment of freight. There is no commercial activity, or very little, outside of the Island itself, and, therefore, it is not so important that there should be expensive rapid communication then as it is later on in the season; and as the season advances and the merchants are commencing their operations, it will be more important they should have more rapid communication. The Government, therefore, have decided that, under the circumstances, as spring advances, we shall have special trains whenever the mails fail to connect at Cape Traverse. As I have shown the House, up to the present, the mails have failed to connect only nine times, and there will be very few failures from this out, as the days lengthen, daylight begins earlier. As commercial activity revives for the spring operations, it will be more important to have rapid mail communication, and special trains will be given to forward the mails when they fail to connect. I am sorry to have been obliged to take up the time of the House on this matter, but the hon. gentleman made such extraordinary statements that I felt it was due to the Government and myself to make some explanation.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I do not think there is any use in prolonging this discussion, as I understand the Government have just ordered a special train to be put on, in order that the grievances may be removed, thus acknowledging that for the rest of the past year the Province has suffered wrong. We do not complain at all of the service of the ice-boats; we are prepared to commend the Government for the expenditure they have made on the branch railway from Sackville to Cape Tormentine, but I do not wish that it be understood in this House that Prince Edward Island is to be charged entirely with the road as being built entirely for that Province, for the road is of great benefit to the northern part of New Brunswick as well as to Prince Edward Island. I am also quite willing to commend the Government for having built the road from Cape Traverse and for the manner in which they have organised the ice-boat service, which, I believe, they have put on a much better footing than it previously had. My hon. colleague from Queen's (Mr. Davies) did not complain of the ice-boat service, but passed that over, as we all know it is a difficult service, and we are perfectly satisfied the Government are doing what they can in that regard, but what we do complain of is the irregularity in the delivery of the mails after they reach the Island. The Postmaster General ought to know that the months of November and December are our busiest months. They are those among which our business men use all haste to get their produce shipped, and their importations in, and it is then we expect the Government more particularly to provide us with a most efficient service. In the midwinter we are not so exacting. But after the summer boats ceased running, a day or two were lost before the winter boat was put on the route, and then, when she was put on, she made the round trip in the day, arriving at Georgetown about three or four o'clock, and the mails were not sent to Charlottetown for twenty-four hours. This happened during the month of December; and I find that one of the organs supporting the Government in the Island pointed out that in the month of December, for fourteen days we only received seven mails, and sometimes we were three or four days without any mails at all. Again, after the Northern Light was laid up, three or four days elapsed before the ice-boats were put on; and after they were organised, there were no special trains to carry the mails for distribution throughout the Island. These are the irregularities we complain of, these are the grievances that have been discussed again and again in this House and the Senate, and we regret having, year after year, to bring this question up. This time I hope the grievances will be settled at once and for ever. I hope that when this train is put on it will be kept on, and we will not have again to refer to this subject. I am sorry the Northern Light has not been able to do better work than she has done this year. Had the suggestion I threw out last year, to put on a second boat in conjunction with the Northern Light, been acted on, I believe that service would have been better performed than it is, and the people would be much more satisfied. The manner in which they have been treated with regard to the winter navigation, is causing a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Province, dissatisfaction which, through the neglect of the Government, is becoming worse every year. The result in the colony will be that by-and-bye an agitation will arise there, I am confident, for separation from the Union. I do not want to continue this at any length, but I must refer to one small item with which the Postmaster General dealt, viz.: that the revenue from a little town in his Province is nearly as large as that of the whole of Prince Edward Island. I may reply that we only get back two thirds of the revenue we pay into the Dominion Treasury, and I think it is out of place for the hon. gentleman to make the boast he did, coming as he does from the Lower Provinces, and knowing that our merchants get their supplies principally from Montreal and Halifax, and pay duties on their goods in those cities instead of at Charlottetown, where they ought to be paid and credited to our account.

Mr. WELSH. I do not want to prolong this discussion, but the hon. the Postmaster General has made reference to the instructions he sent to the captain of the Northern Light that he could proceed, but holding him responsible, and he says that the people of Prince Edward Island were not satisfied with that. I should think they would not be satisfied with that. Fancy giving the captain instructions to go on, and holding him responsible for the safety of his boat. Naturally, he would lie in port. That is not what my hon. colleague referred to at all. In the winter we find that we have to consult the Railway Department, the Post Office Department and the Marine Department, and we know how the official business is carried on, and how long it takes for all these departments to be consulted. The Government ought to have sufficient confidence in their agents, and I believe they will have in future, in their agents in the Island, so that those matters can be attended to without the necessity of holding consultations in Ottawa as to the procedure they will adopt in Prince Edward Island. I say that these matters can safely be left in the hands of the superintendent of the Railway Department, the postmaster, and the agent of the Marine Department, without consulting Ottawa, and I am quite certain that the good sense of the Government will decide to take that course. My hon. friend has referred to the matter of ice-boats. I was not aware that my hon. colleague referred to the ice-boats at all, but I must say that the hon. gentleman has improved the service of ice-boats very much, and the gentleman he appointed to take charge of that, Captain McElhinney, had a great deal of difficulty to contend against, and he did a great deal of good in that service. The Postmaster General, when he was in the Marine Department, did good work there, but in the matter of the railways, as soon as I found out that special trains were being taken, I called on him and he treated me most courteously and kindly, but he said he thought he could save so much money. I said: "You do not feel as the people of the Island do, and they will not put up with it, and you must do something for them." Still, it was evident that he thought it was his duty to save as much money for the country as he could. We had some correspondence on the subject, but he decided that we could do without it. I will say for the hon. gentleman that he treated me most kindly and courteously. I will not occupy the time of the House, although I might, but I will let the matter drop, as I understand the special trains have been ordered.

Mr. PERRY. The Postmaster General has made a statement which I cannot let pass unnoticed. He made a charge against the Province of Prince Edward Island of the amount expended last year for mail accommodation. I did not catch the amount, but in that he has included the amount paid to the steamer Neptune. He must remember that the steamer Neptune is not working across the Straits.

We must bear in mind that no steamer at all is going across there now; that the Northern Light has been idle since the 8th January, and I find, from a return which was printed last Session, that the Government has been very generous in the payment of the Neptune. I believe it has been stated that the Minister of Marine has some private interest in that steamboat, but, at all events, there was an amount paid of $18,500 for the small services which that steamer performed last year in crossing from Georgetown to Pictou, and that is a charge which stares the people of Prince Edward Island in the face. How many trips did that steamer make last year? The Neptune would not have been sent for to assist the Northern Light if it had not been in view of the general election. The Neptune made 38 trips last year, and I was surprised to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the discussion last year, state that the steamer Neptune had been plying for two and a-half months from Nova Scotia to Prince Edward Island. That shows that the Minister of Marine does not know what he is saying in regard to the Province of Prince Edward Island, or, if he does, that he cares very little. It was only a month and a-half that the Neptune was plying there. She commenced on December 20th, and stopped on February 4th. The Minister of Marine contends that she took two and a-half months, and he will find that statement in the Hansard of last year, if he does not believe me. So little does that hon. gentleman know or care, I suppose, as to the terms of Confederation being carried out with the people of Prince Edward Island, that he does not know how many days, weeks or months the steamer Neptune, which he sent for, and employed, and paid for, was in the service there. I find she was there about six weeks, for which he has paid her owners $18,500, and the Postmaster General charges that, without even a blush upon his face, as an expenditure against Prince Edward Island for the carriage of mails. The hon. gentleman made a statement, and I think a very weak statement, here, and says the Government have been generous to the people of Prince Edward Island. They have been generous with a vengeance. I tell him now, and I tell the Government and the members of this House, that the present Government have not made a decent attempt to carry out the terms of agreement with the people of that Island. I say the crossing by the Capes is no better than it was fifteen years ago. I say that the present Government have imposed upon the people who cross there the necessity to sign away their lives and their property before they do cross, because they make them sign a statement that the Government is not responsible for any loss they may sustain. Sir, I would scorn to sign away my life and property in that way. I say it is a shame and a reflection on the Government to allow a state of affairs to exist where opposition boats can make money. Although they are not subsidised by the Government, although they have no mails to carry, they are making money. Why does not the Government have boats enough to carry all the mails and passengers? Sir, the day we crossed, if there had been no opposition boats we would have had to stay over on the other side. I say it is a shame to allow opposition boats. They ought to have boats enough of their own, without having to fall back upon opposition to cross from one side to the other. Now, Sir, I complain that they have cast old servants overboard; they have dispensed with the services of Captain Irvine, who has been in the service for thirty years. I remember well when he came all the way from Prince Edward Island here for the purpose of giving information to the Government about the crossing. I am glad to find that the Government have adopted a good many of Captain Irvine's suggestions. They have built houses for boats, and done some other things. But how did they pay this old servant? Did they superannuate him? Did they even recognise his past services? Can they point now to any other man in the service that makes more successful passages, from one side to the other, than Captain Irvine has done for the past thirty years? Sir, I defy them to do it. I say it is a reflection upon the people of Prince Edward Island when we find that while our mails used to be carried, twenty or twenty-five years ago, in three hours from Cape Traverse to Charlottetown, it now takes forty-eight hours to carry them. I say it is a reflection upon the administration of the Postmaster General. Sir, I remember quite well that members supporting the present Administration from 1879 to 1886 have brought this matter, year after year, to the notice of the Government, but without any success. And to show how this Administration is regarded in Prince Edward Island, I will quote from the Guardian, a Conservative paper printed in Charlottetown. This is what it says, in its issue of the 28th January, of the present year:

"We received a mail from the mainland on Tuesday, the first for one week. It reached Cape Traverse on Sabbath, but forty-eight hours elapsed before it reached this city. A special train might have brought the mails to Charlottetown early on Monday. But it seems as if neither a sense of justice, nor the responsibilities of a solemn contract, have any influence in some quarters. If Prince Edward Island is not of sufficient importance to merit even fair treatment at the hands of our rulers, they had better cut us adrift, and allow us to shape our own destinies. With regard to postal accommodation, we could not be in any worse condition than we are at present."

The administration of that service is also condemned by a Conservative paper, called the Summerside Journal, which says that Mr. Brecken, the postmaster at Charlottetown and post office inspector, wrote a letter to the editor and sent it off on the 14th, and on the 20th the letter reached its destination—only 40 miles between the two points, but six days on the road. He asks, very naturally, what became of this letter during this time. Well, Sir, he goes on to remark that it is hard to expect the water at the foot of the stream to be any purer than the spring itself, and so he holds the Postmaster General responsible for all this mismanagement. I will now read an extract from the Summerside Journal, a strong supporter of the present Administration. I will not read it all, but I will read an extract:

"Last week we formulated a complaint against the Post Office Department, that several bundles of the Agriculturist, directed to Kelly's Cross, Clyde Station and Fredericton, had been delayed for several days in transit, and that long after they should have been in the hands of their readers they were lying in the Summerside Post Office. We complained to Mr. Brecken, but his investigation of the irregularity has not yet been attended with any satisfactory result. The most gross and inexcusable carelessness exists among some of the postal officials in this Province, who are not only paid for, but sworn to, the faithful performance of their duty."

Now, that statement is from a Conservative paper, the only Conservative paper published in the county. I will read another extract from the Examiner, a paper which is very well known, I have no doubt, in the department. I suppose it is one of those papers for which the Government pay $1,000 a year for the use of one department alone. But when the people of Prince Edward Island ask for two or three thousand dollars, they are told: "No, we cannot give it." These gentlemen are able to help themselves—$30,000 a year for travelling expenses, cab hire, and street car; $27,000 a year paid in the city of Ottawa alone—but when the people of Prince Edward Island ask for a small instalment of their rights, a small portion of what is due them under the terms of Confederation, they are denied—the Dominion of Canada cannot afford to pay for that. I say it is a reflection upon the Government of Canada to perpetrate such wrongs upon one of the smallest Provinces, one of the most loyal Provinces. This is what the Examiner says, and I know the Postmaster General is well acquainted with that paper:

"If some radical change is not made in the mail arrangements, many of our people will be obliged to open branch offices at Summerside. Others talk of getting the contents of their letters through by telegraph."

Now, what a statement that is, and my hon. friend has the boldness to come here and tell us that he has done all that could be done. Does he suppose that we are standing still on the Island? Does he suppose we are not civilised, that we do not want to get the news—even from Ottawa, even from his own Department? Sir, we are an intelligent people, and the result of the last election on the 22nd February, 1887, shows the intelligence of the people of Prince Edward Island—not only shows their intelligence, but it shows their independence. This shows that the people of Prince Edward Island are able to judge for themselves, and do not allow themselves to be blinded by the spectacles that blind the hon. gentleman, I mean the money bags, but they endeavor to promote their own interests. I was surprised to hear the statement of the Minister that he had administered the affairs of the Island to his own satisfaction. This may occur in the case of a gentleman who makes his own political conscience; but the people of the Island do not speak in that strain—they speak in a different way, as they have a right to speak. At the same time the people of the Island have no feelings of spite toward the hon. gentleman or the present Administration; they would like to be friendly with the Government, but we consider that the Administration should make decent attempts to give us justice. If they are not able to keep up communication with the Island by steamer, let them try to build a tunnel. They have had this matter under consideration three or four years, a Bill has been passed by Parliament to incorporate a company, different surveys have been made and reports issued, and the Government should be able to come to a decision as to whether the scheme is practicable. If it is impracticable, of course we will not look for impossibilities, but let us have the best that can be done; and almost the worst that can be done has been done to the Island in this respect. When the statement is openly made in the House by an hon. member that the means of communication is no better than it was forty years ago, that is a reflection upon the Government. I say that they have not made any definite attempt to remedy this grievance. What have they done this year? In order to punish the people for the great Grit vote they gave in 1887, the Northern Light has been thrown to one side for want of repairs. The captain is afraid to put out to sea, especially when he looks at the directions he received from the present Postmaster General, that if the vessel was strained it would be at the captain's peril. I have always been surprised, and I am surprised yet, that up to this day the Government have not improved the means of crossing the Straits, and it does not appear as if they intended to do anything more. I suppose, however, on the eve of an election another attempt will be made, which will doubtless turn out as this has done and prove abortive. The question of crossing will come up again, and I will not therefore further refer to it. It has been shown that letters have been allowed to lie in the post office from day to day and week to week, and that a letter due on the 14th, never reached Charlottetown till the 20th, and the postmaster at Summerside marked on the back the date on which the letter made its appearance in his office. Where was it during the balance of the time? There must be something wrong in regard to the post office service, and the sooner the Postmaster General has these wrongs rectified and justice done in regard to carrying the Island mails the better, for this is one of the reasons why the people of the Island are dissatisfied with the present Administration.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It would be ungenerous on my part to occupy any more of the time of the House with this question, and I would not do so were it not that the Postmaster General had attempted this afternoon to lead the House to believe that, in stating my case yesterday, I had overstated the facts. The hon. gentleman has been overrated by his colleagues, or he has come to a better determination, for he has informed the House that the grievances of which we complained will be remedied, and special trains will be put on. If he had come to that conclusion either by any process of reasoning, or from any information he had received from me or from my colleagues, or from any source, he might have stated it to the House without indulging in the remarks he has offered to-day. But he shows that he has some feeling against the Island. He is now going to give special trains, but he tells the House that he doubts whether he is doing right because the amount the Island pays into the Treasury is ridiculously small. I had thought at this time of the day there was no one in this House, particularly anyone holding the position of a Cabinet Minister, who was not aware that the statement in the Trade and Navigation Returns as to the amount paid by each Province was entirely misleading. Why, the hon. gentleman knows himself that the statement in the Trade and Navigation Returns shows the Province of Quebec to pay nearly two millions more duty than does the great Province of Ontario. The hon. gentleman ought to know, if he does not know, that the statement is entirely misleading, and that Quebec does not pay more than the great Province of Ontario into the Treasury of this country. And when the hon. gentleman thought to lead this House to believe that the small amount that appears to have been paid or collected in the ports of the Island on dutiable goods was the only sum the Island paid, he did so either through crass ignorance or a feeling which I say is very reprehensible. That old idea has been exploded long ago. The hon. gentleman cannot be excused when he makes that statement. He knows that the average man on the Island consumes as much dutiable goods as the average man in the Dominion, and that per head we pay as much on the goods consumed and consume as much dutiable goods as does the Province from which he hails and the wonderful county from which he comes. The hon. gentleman refers to the fact that they pay nearly one-half as much in Truro as is collected in the Island. Does he wish the House to understand that Truro pays more per head than does Charlottetown? If he does not intend to mislead the House, why does he make such a statement? The hon. gentleman stands convicted by the records of having made a statement that will not bear the slightest investigation, and I will not permit him to make that statement without contradiction—a statement that once misled the country, and I hope will not again do so, namely, that the Island does not pay its quota of the taxes of the country. The only reason I rose was on account of the statement of the Minister that I had, in stating my case, exaggerated the facts. The facts required no exaggeration. The statements I read to the House were telegrams from the Charlottetown Board of Trade, a non-political body, and they stated the facts which were reiterated by myself in bringing the question before the House. The hon. gentleman has tried to make it appear that the statements of the Board of Trade are not true. Does he not know that from the 5th to the 12th of January not a mail was received on the Island. I did not make my statements without making myself thoroughly acquainted with the facts. I went to the Charlottetown Post Office and obtained the day and hour of every crossing, and the time when the mails left Cape Traverse, and I found that from the 5th to the 12th of January no mail arrived. The hon. gentleman sought to lead the House to believe, or at least those members who were ignorant of the situation down there, that there were only nine days during which the people of the Island were deprived of their mails. I have already said that from the 5th to the 12th of January they never received a mail of any kind, and when the mail did arrive, he let it lie for twenty-four hours before he had it conveyed to Charlottetown, and that in face of the fact that his predecessor in office had at one time withdrawn the special trains, and then, seeing the injustice of the withdrawal, had put them on again; and it remained for this hon. gentleman to come forward and withdraw the privilege or the right which his predecessor in office had given. I have shown that from the 5th to the 8th of January the mails did not cross at all, and that on the 13th, 14th, 22nd, 23rd and 26th of January, and on the 2nd, 8th, 11th, 13th and 18th of February, the mails did not connect, and were sometimes left standing from twenty-four to forty-eight hours. I do not want to weary the House with these statements, but I should be sorry to think that any member of the House should imagine that I could get up and exaggerate or misstate the facts. The hon. gentleman knows the facts, and if he can point out one day on which I have incorrectly stated that the mails did not cross I will withdraw the statement. When I stated that the trains did not cost $7,000, I meant that they did not actually cost that much. Technically they might have cost that, but practically they did not, for, as I pointed out, that expenditure consisted largely in a cross-entry of the Post Office Department against the Railway Department; and I venture the assertion that $1,000 would cover the cash cost of that train to the Government. I do not make that statement without having made enquiry. I find that the hon. gentleman himself states, in a telegram which he sent to the Board of Trade, that the Railway Department charged the Post Office Department for special trains at the same rate as they charge a private party. The Railway Department does not charge private parties for the simple outlay, but a large sum in addition; and when the train is there, and remains on the county line the whole day, with the officials on board kicking their heels and waiting for something to do, their pay goes on all the while, and the only increased cost of running it would be the wear and tear of the track and train and the cost of coal and oil. However, I am only too glad to learn that a change is to be made and the grievance removed; but I am exceedingly sorry that in mentioning that, the hon. gentleman should have said that he would have been prevented making the change if, before making it, he had heard the speech I have made.

Mr. McLELAN. No, you are wrong. What I said was that I was afraid such a speech would have prevented myself and my colleagues.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, I hope better things of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, and I think some at least of his colleagues would be prepared to do justice when it is necessary, even if he would not be. I do not think there was any need of his leading the House to believe that any statements I made were not true, for they are all historical statements, as they appear in the telegrams and the official documents to which I have referred.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman has attempted to give the House the impression that I have made statements that are not borne out by the official records. The statement I made as to the number of times the boats and trains have failed to connect are from the official records of the department. He says I have expressed a doubt as to whether it was right to put on these special trains. I have certainly been misunderstood by the hon. gentleman. I expressed no doubt whether it was right or not. The hon. member for Prince (Mr. Perry) has given a reason why the special trains may now be put on. That hon. gentleman has said, in a manner which should be a pattern for the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that it is comparatively unimportant to have the special trains on in mid-winter—that it is not of such importance as earlier in the season or in the spring, when the people of the Island are arranging for their summer business. For that reason I have thought it best, and my colleagues have agreed with me, to maintain the connection. The hon. gentleman says I want to withhold that expenditure because Prince Edward Island pays only $1.28 a head into the revenue, and, comparing his Province with the Province of Quebec, he wants to show that the people of the Island pay their full quota. I only allude to that matter incidentally, stating that the town of Truro paid half as much into the Customs revenue, as the whole Island of Prince Edward. I did not regard that as a guide to my actions in this matter. If the Island required that there should be special trains to maintain the service efficiently, they would be put on even if the Island did not pay a dollar into the Customs revenue, if it was right and in the interest of that community that they should be put on. The hon. gentleman says that although his Province pays only $153,000 into the revenue, it purchases goods from other Provinces. I wish to call his attention to the fact that the Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia pay from $3 to $4 a head into the revenue, although they enjoy throughout the year uninterrupted communication with the Upper Provinces, and so are in a better position to make, and do make, large purchases in the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. But I am not going to be drawn into a discussion on that subject, on the present occasion; I think it is quite sufficient to deal with this matter on its merits. I want to remind the hon. gentleman that, a year or two ago, when one of the boats on the service between the Island and the mainland became disabled, the Government sent down a government boat which plied between the mainland and the Island, in addition to the two regular boats. The people of Prince Edward Island have complained from year to year of the Northern Light, and they have frequently pressed on the department the necessity of getting a sealing vessel from Newfoundland, which they claimed would give better service than the Northern Light. Yielding to that pressure the department last year procured from Newfoundland the most powerful sealing vessel they could bring up, at a cost of over $18,000. She was run for a month and a half as a test; the result of the experiment was not satisfactory, except in showing that the Northern Light gave a better service. And now the hon. gentleman who spoke previously complains that we made that expenditure.

Motion agreed to.

PENSION TO MRS. GOWANLOCK.

Mr. BARRON asked, Does the Government intend to pay Mrs. Gowanlock, the widow of——Gowanlock, who was killed by Indians at Frog Lake, during the late North-West Rebellion, a pension in the same manner and to the same extent as that paid to Mrs. Delaney?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mrs. Gowanlock's husband was not an employé of the Indian Department, while Mrs. Delaney's was. The former was at the time of the outbreak building a mill in partnership with Mr. Laurie at Battleford. The department had paid them part of a bonus in advance, and was to have paid the balance on the completion of the mill, but the mill was never completed. Mr. Delaney held the position of farm instructor at Frog Lake at the time of the massacre, and it was on this account his widow received the pension. I may say further that Mrs. Gowanlock has received for personal losses from the Department of the Interior, under the Rebellion Losses Commission, $907, and that the firm of which Mr. Gowanlock was a member received $4,202, one-half of which went, I believe, to the Gowanlock estate.

BEXLEY POSTMASTER.

Mr. BARRON asked, Have the Government yet filled the office of Postmaster at Bexley Post Office? If so, who has been appointed?

Mr. McLELAN. The office has not yet been filled, but I have given instructions to have it filled.

COLLECTION OF CRIMINAL LAWS.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (for Mr. BERNIER) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to furnish to Justices of the Peace throughout the Dominion a collection of the Criminal Laws, as promised by the Honorable Secretary of State; and if so, when?

Mr. CHAPLEAU (Translation.) As I stated last Session, an order was issued by the Government that this collection of criminal laws should be sent to the commission of peace, pursuant to the request made by the Provincial Government at the time. This was done. Since then, a number of justices of the peace have been appointed. I shall enquire whether the latter have received this collection, and the Government will deliberate whether it will renew the issue of these criminal laws to each new commission of the peace.

SPEAKER'S ORDER—DORCHESTER ELECTION.

Mr. CHOQUETTE (for Mr. AMYOT) asked, What is the reason of the delay which occurred between the issuing of his warrant by the Honorable the Speaker of the House of Commons, on the 23rd August last, respecting the election for the Electoral District of Dorchester, and the issuing of the writ of election for that district, dated the 22nd December last, or thereabouts?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I presume the reason must have been that, as the Session was not soon forthcoming, there was no hurry for this election. I presume, furthermore, that the hon. member putting the question, as well as the gentleman in whose name it is put, have had no ground of complaint at this delay.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY CAPITAL ACCOUNT.

Mr. WELDON asked, What amount had been placed or charged to capital account of the Intercolonial Railway during the last four fiscal years?

Mr. POPE. $3,934,650.83.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. DENISON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to compel the Grand Trunk Railway Company to obey the order of the Railway Committee of the Privy Council, made in November,—that they should, by the 1st of January, 1888, erect and maintain gates at the York and Simcoe-street crossings, near the Union Station, in the city of Toronto.

Mr. POPE. This is the first complaint I have heard with reference to this matter. I supposed that the gates were already there. I have no doubt the Grand Trunk Company will, as they have always hitherto done, carry out the order of the Railway Committee. If not we will see that they do.

RENDERED LARD.

Mr. TAYLOR moved:

That the House resolve itself into Committee to consider a resolution declaring it expedient to introduce a Bill providing for the regulation of the manufacture and sale of rendered lard.

He said: Some two years ago I moved a resolution somewhat similar to this. It read as follows: "That it is expedient to bring in a bill to regulate the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine, butterine, or other substitutes for butter." When I made that motion, there were many hon. gentlemen on both sides who were not familiar with the subject, and some of them made statements at the time which, I think, they have ever since regretted. I am referring to Mr. Jackson, who was then member for South Norfolk, and I think it was due to the statements he made on that occasion that he does not represent that constituency at present. I wish now to draw the attention of the House and the country to the effect of the legislation then passed on this article of oleomargarine. In 1884-5 we imported 1,162,337 lbs. butter; in 1885-6 we imported 1,249,090, while this year, 1886-7, we have imported but a total of 246,272 lbs. We imported into Ontario 6,155 lbs., Quebec 542 lbs., Nova Scotia 189 lbs., New Brunswick 1,881 lbs., Manitoba 9 lbs., and in British Columbia the large quantity of 237,496 lbs., or within 9,000 lbs of the total import. Nearly 1,000,000 lbs. less have been imported into Canada since legislation was passed affecting the article, compared with what was imported in the ten months of the preceding year, the legislation having been passed two months previous to the end of the fiscal year. We exported in 1886-7 5,455,809 lbs. of butter. I am of the impression that the 237,000 lbs. imported into British Columbia, and paying four cents a pound duty might profitably have been exported from Ontario. I am strongly of opinion that a large quantity of this 237,000 lbs. was a spurious article of butter. I think it would be well if the Customs authorities would instruct their officers to place in bond any butter imported into this country, so that it might be properly analysed, for I am strongly of opinion that there is yet spurious butter brought into the country; and, in dealing with this article of lard, I think that legislation should take the same direction as that dealing with the article of oleomargarine, and that all lard brought into this country should be placed in bond and only liberated after having been analysed and inspected. I purpose by the resolution I am about to move to draw the attention of the Government and this House to the large importation into this country annually from the United States of lard, which I believe to be as spurious in many respects as the oleomargarine that we were importing previous to the passing of the Act two years ago. I think it is due to the agriculturists of this country that the article of lard should be as properly protected as the article of butter, because it is one of the staple articles of the farmers of this country. We find that with the amount of two cents per lb., the enormous quantity of 3,522,464 lbs. were imported last year, besides grease for soap factories, amounting to 2,440,301 lbs., making a total of nearly 6,000,000 lbs. of lard and grease imported from the United States last year. I am satisfied in regard to this, because we have purchased it in our own family, and have found that this article of spurious lard is made largely from cotton seed and other articles of that class, and, perhaps, grease of an inferior quality, so that, when you bring it into your house, it is impossible to detect it from the good article. We have manufactories which are manufacturing pure lard in this country, and I do not think they have yet got into the habit of adulterating their lard; but the article which is imported from the United States is largely adulterated, most of it being manufactured from cotton seed or cotton seed oil. I ask that legislation may be had to prevent these people from competing with the spurious article now imported against the genuine article made in this country. I suggest to the Government that this lard should be inspected before it is taken out of the Customs, and that it should be prohibited altogether, if it is found to be adulterated, in the same way as we have acted with regard to oleomargarine.

Mr. SPROULE. In seconding the motion, I do so because I believe that it aims at a matter which is very important to a large number of the people of this country. This is one of the lines in which the agriculturists of this country either make profits or have to sustain losses, and they are subjected to a very unfair competition by the spurious articles which are brought in from the United States. At the time the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) introduced his resolution relative to oleomargarine and butterine, it was thought that no good could be accomplished in that direction, that the benefit to the farmer was of no value, that his interests could not be advanced in any way by any restrictions proposed to be put on the introduction of butter; but the result has proved that it was of the greatest good to the farmers, because it has kept out an article which was not butter at all, but a spurious article, to the extent of nearly 1,000,000 lbs., and the farmers have benefited by the restrictions which were put on that trade. I believe there has been a large amount of spurious lard and grease introduced for making soap, and that, under the name of lard, a great deal has been brought in which has been afterwards sold under the name of butter. I think there is still some coming in under the name of butter, and I think this would stop the introduction of this very injurious article, because, if it were submitted to a chemical test, it would be impossible for it to be palmed off on the people as taking the place of the dairy products of this country. As farming is failing in many other lines, it is the more important to protect the interests of that large class of people in this country in regard to their dairy products, and if it only affects the tenth part of the amount in the line of butter, it will accomplish a great good and we will be well satisfied with such legislation as may affect it.

Motion agreed to.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER FLOODS.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL (Translation) moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, documents, representations or information received by the Government in relation to the inundations which occur periodically on the north and south shores of the River St. Lawrence, and more particularly respecting the great inundation which occurred in the spring of 1887; also copies of all reports made by the Commission of Engineers appointed to enquire as to the cause of the inundations and to ascertain the best means of preventing the same or of diminishing the disastrous effects thereof for the future.

He said: In making this motion, I am desirous of drawing the attention of the Government and of the House to the necessity of taking immediate steps to obviate and lessen the ravages which are caused, every year, by the overflow of the St. Lawrence River. The House will remember that, last year, the flood was of extraordinary proportions, and the consequent damage at Montreal, Laprairie, Longueuil, Berthier, St. Cuthbert, St. Barthélemy and the adjoining counties, was very considerable, rising even to the sum of several hundreds of thousands of dollars. The Government and municipalities, which suffered by these floods, were naturally affected by this state of things. A commission of engineers was charged with an enquiry into the causes of these floods, and into the measures to be taken to prevent similar disasters in future. This commission consisted of three engineers, one nominated by the Montreal Harbor Commissioners, the second by the Corporation of Montreal, and the third by the Federal Government. Several sittings were held and a number of witnesses heard. A close examination of several portions of the St. Lawrence River was made, and the report to the Government showed certain information and recommendations which ought to be laid before this House. Furthermore, the mayors of the different interested municipalities were called upon to supply the Department of Public Works with personal information and observations on the causes of these overflows. I have knowledge of the fact that a large number of mayors have sent important reports on the subject. The most widely received opinion is that which holds the Montreal Board of Harbor Commissioners responsible for the disasters, by reason that it has dumped into the channels dividing the Boucherville Islands and the Berthier Island, enormous quantities of earth drawn from the digging of Montreal Harbor and the Lake St. Peter Channel. The Board is charged with having thus given the ice solid bulwarks, causing the formation of dykes which forced the river to flow backward and overflow the adjoining country with the flood of water that could not follow its regular course. In Berthier county, the water stretched over an area of several miles; the ice gathered; new currents were formed; houses, barns and fences were swept away or injured, with considerable loss to the farmers. It is time, Mr. Speaker, that the Government took the matter in hand. It is time that the House should be fully informed on the subject, and that it force the Government to bring down a measure, comprising not merely a few individual works in a particular locality, but a complete system of protection for the two shores of the river. I make this motion at the beginning of the Session, in order that time may not elapse before the hon. Minister of Public Works submits a measure that will allow the work to be begun next summer so as to be completed in good time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow me to answer him in English. I know he understands that language perfectly well, and, perhaps, the English members would like to know my answer. To the first part of the motion there is no objection. To the last part of the motion there is this objection: The reports so far received have been published, and if the hon. gentleman will examine the records of my department this year, he will find the last report at the end of one of the appendices. I would, therefore, ask him to drop the last part of the motion. When the final report reaches me, which may be in two or three weeks, I will take care to have it laid on the Table of the House as soon as possible.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. I have no objection to the amendment.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

"TRUSTS" OR "COMBINES."

Mr. EDGAR, upon the Order standing in his name being read, for a Select Committee to enquire into and report as to the existence, operations and effect of certain organisations in Canada, known as "trusts" or "combines," said: I do not think that all the friends of the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace) felt sufficiently grateful to me for the assistance I rendered him the other evening in securing an amendment to his motion, which was for a committee of a similar character to the one which stands in my name on the notice paper. I think I have improved his motion very much by having a reference contained in it as to combines among manufacturers. However, the great organ-in-chief of the combines, in Toronto, did not think that I had a right to interfere in the matter. Of course they are entitled to their opinion, but they went a little further than expressing an opinion, and undertook to make a statement of fact to which I shall refer for a moment. The Empire, published in Toronto, yesterday, in its editorial article, objects to my interfering with combines, and gives this as one of the reasons:

"It may not be known to every one, but it is a fact, that Mr. Edgar is himself a member of a combine to prevent competition and keep up prices, but such is a fact."

Now, they seem to have strained the Queen's English to get in the double assertion that their statement was a fact. Well, Mr. Speaker, it may be a good enough fact for that paper, but it is rather an extraordinary thing that the information never reached me yet that I was a member of a combine of any kind, now or at any other time in the past, and I wish to give that statement an explicit and emphatic denial. If no amendment had been made in the sense of my amendment to the hon. gentleman's motion, I would have felt it my duty to go on with this motion for a committee, but I do not see now that there would be any particular advantage in doing so. Moreover, I think that two committees are not necessary to enquire into this subject, because the conviction is very strong in my mind, and I think it is gaining ground in the minds of the public, that combines can be remedied in this country, most of them at any rate, in a very much simpler way than by elaborate legislation in this House. There are certain combines into which I have no doubt this committee will find it their duty to examine carefully, which do not depend for their existence upon a Customs tariff. But it will be found that most of the combines in this country, especially those relating to the necessaries of life, have only come into existence, and can only maintain their existence, by reason of the protection thrown around them by the high tariff upon those articles the price of which a combine is formed to raise. Now, I am perfectly willing to give the Finance Minister credit for being sincere when he strongly supported a protective tariff, and I am ready to admit that he believed it would be for the good of the country. I am also willing to give him credit for enough intelligence to recognise the fact that, in many instances, his tariff will require revision to meet this evil of combines. The hon. Finance Minister must see, as well as other people can, that a number of these combines are propped up, and held up, and continued in existence simply by the high tariff which surrounds the particular article; and that if these proppes were knocked away, the combines must come to an end as a consequence. Now, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Finance Minister could not use his great ability, and the very powerful position which he occupies in this country, to greater advantage than by taking up this matter and dealing with it fearlessly. I do not say that the hon. gentleman will have to abandon any of his theories in favor of protection, but if he finds that his system, in which he had so much confidence, has blemishes and spots in it, and foreign growths about it, surely he ought not to hesitate to apply the knife and make his system, in which he still has faith, more perfect than it is. Surely his long visit to Washington has shown him that a great many protectionist statesmen in that country are now recognising the fact that their high protective system, in some respects at least, must fall to the ground, and that so far as trusts and combines of highly protected articles are concerned, protection must go. The hon. gentleman cannot forget that a great Conservative statesman in another country, and of a former time, who had been strongly in favor of protection, saw that cereals were being protected greatly to the injury of the people of England, and that statesman, Sir Robert Peel, did not hesitate to change his policy in that particular, and let the food of the people come in free. And so I believe that if the hon. gentleman sees that the people are suffering, that the necessaries of life in this country are made dear to them by combines, and leagues, and trusts, he will apply the pruning knife to the Customs tariff upon those articles. If the hon. gentleman would take that course he would do a service to the country; and if the manufacturers, whose profits might be diminished, were to cry out to him, saying he was removing from them the protection to which they were entitled, I think he could very well answer them by saying: Well, as a substitute for that protection, I will assist to throw open the markets to the south of you, of over 60 millions of people, and let you send the products of your manufactures in there. If the Finance Minister would only take those steps which are so much in the interests of the country, I am sure he would be entitled to the gratitude of the people for his action. With the leave of the House, I beg to withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

CASUALTIES ON INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) moved for:

Return of all casualties to trains on the Intercolonial Railway arising from collisions, broken rails or any other cause from 1st April, 1887, to 1st March, 1888; the respective causes and dates; the names of the conductors, engine-drivers or other officials dismissed, suspended or fined for any such collisions or neglect of duty, the amount of damage (if any) to property in such cases, the amount of compensation paid to owners of property destroyed or damaged, as well as amount of claims for loss or damage to property unsettled (if any).

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to the adoption of this motion, but I may say to the hon. gentleman that a considerable time will be occupied in preparing the return.

Motion agreed to.

ROLLING STOCK FOR INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) moved for:

Return showing the quantity of rolling stock purchased for the Intercolonial Railway during the last six months ending 31st December, 1887, giving each kind of rolling stock, and whether purchased under contract or otherwise, the parties from whom bought and the cost of each kind; also a statement of what has been built in Government workshops.

Mr. POPE. There is no objection to the adoption of this motion. The hon. gentleman must know, as he lives at St. John, that it was very late before the Government were aware that ocean traffic was coming that way this year; and although we make very large contracts for rolling stock, we bought some without contracts to accommodate the traffic; otherwise the necessary rolling stock would not be on the road.

Motion agreed to.

THE STEAMER NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Return showing the date the steamer Northern Light commenced running between Prince Edward Island and Pictou, Nova Scotia; the number of trips made, the number of passengers crossed, and the date of last trip made up to date.

He said: The subject of crossing to the Island from the mainland has been so often discussed in this House that it is unnecessary to make any further statement to show that there has been very little improvement, if any, during the last twenty years, or since Confederation, in the method of crossing the Straits.

Motion agreed to.

CONFEDERATION TERMS WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Copies of all despatches, telegrams, and correspondence (if any) that may have taken place between the Canadian Government and the Government of Prince Edward Island, having reference to the suggestions of Earl Granville, contained in his despatch to Lord Lansdowne, dated March 31st, 1886, on the subject of carrying out the terms of Confederation with Prince Edward Island with respect to continuous efficient steam communication with the main land.

Motion agreed to.

THE LATE ALEXANDER ROBERTSON, M.P.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before moving the adjournment of the House, I wish to state that the First Minister would have wished to be here this evening to express the deep regret which I am sure we all feel at the sad news of the death of one of our colleagues, the late hon. member for West Hastings. Though the hon. gentleman was of rather a retiring disposition, yet we have all appreciated his kindness of heart and his friendship, and we know that he always took a great interest in the public affairs of the country, and especially in the advancement of his own Province, particularly the district in which he resided. I am sure I am only expressing the feelings of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House when I say we all regret exceedingly his being carried away from us at a comparatively early period of life, and we shall always remember not only his friendship, but his loyal devotion to his Queen and country. I move that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. I am sure that we on this side of the House can fully endorse everything that has been said by the hon. gentleman with regard to our late colleague, Mr. Robertson. It was his and the House's misfortune that while he was here his health never was such as to enable him to take as prominent a part in the debates and proceedings of the House as his natural abilities would otherwise have warranted. But even while laboring under that disadvantage he always occupied a very respectable and honorable place in this House, and I am sure that I am only doing him justice in saying that he had no enemies, but that his adversaries were among his friends. That I am sure was true, not only here, but also where he resided, and the death of such a man is always a loss to his country.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood from the hon. Minister of Finance that he had not yet received the despatches which he expected from Washington. I would ask him whether, should they arrive within the next few hours, it is his intention to have them printed for distribution on Monday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have not yet received them. I have sent another urgent telegram to Mr. Berne, asking him to forward them with the least possible delay. I hope to receive them very soon, and I shall not lose a moment in having them printed and laid before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because, as he will see, if they arrive to-morrow morning, it will be a great convenience to have them printed so that they can be distributed on Monday.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Return showing the names of all retired Judges of Superior Courts of Law or Equity in the Dominion of Canada, with the dates of their respective patents, and a copy of the last patent issued to a retired Judge of the Superior Court.—(Mr. Small.)

Return of the Railway accidents which were reported to the Government during 1886, and in respect of which actions are not now pending.—(Mr. Denison.)

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 5th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 11) to empower the Merchants Marine Insurance Co. of Canada to give up its charter and provide for the winding-up of its affairs.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 12) to amend Chapter 127 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, intituled "An Act respecting Interest."—(Mr. Landry.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Ontario Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Ward.)

Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Nisbet Academy of Prince Albert.—(Mr. Macdowall.)

CIVIL SERVICE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. McNEILL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 13) to amend the Act respecting the Civil Service of Canada. He said: The Bill is simply the same as the one introduced last Session, and provides that civil servants who entered the service prior to 1882 shall not be subject to examination for promotion in the service.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEATH OF MR. CLAYES.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I feel it my sad duty to inform the House that death has stricken another of its members, Mr. Clayer, the member for Missisquoi, who died last evening. In the person of Mr. Clayer, the House suffers a very great loss—a greater loss, in fact, than the House is aware of. He was only elected at the general election of last year, and he was then suffering from the disease which has carried him off. He had, therefore, no occasion to display in this House his great abilities, but all who knew him will testify to the fact that he was a man of great ability, of uncommon eloquence, of vast information, to which was added great literary culture; and I am sure that if his health had been spared he would not only have been a valuable addition to this House, but would have rendered great services to the party to which he belonged. In addition to that, I may say that he was a man of most warm heart, of generous leanings, who endeared himself not only to those who were his friends but to all who came in contact with him; and, under such circumstances, I am sure that every member of the House will agree with me that his loss is a loss to the country, and I may say also for myself and for those who agree with me on this side, that his loss is an irreparable loss to his party.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Although the hon. gentleman whose death we deplore to-day had been in this House only a short time, and though, as my hon. friend has just stated, his illness prevented him from taking a very active part in the debates of this House, nevertheless we remember that, on the one or two occasions when he did take part in the debates, he showed that he would have become a very useful member, by the knowledge he displayed of the subjects then under discussion. Although I had not the pleasure of a very intimate acquaintance with the hon. gentleman, still such of my hon. friends to whom I have spoken to-day have all agreed that he was a good friend, an amiable gentleman and a member who would certainly have taken a stand in this House and would have done credit to his party.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I should like to enquire of the Finance Minister whether the protocols and other papers in connection with the Fisheries Treaty have been received?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may inform my hon. friend that these papers have arrived. They reached me on Saturday morning, and they are now in the hands of the printer, and I hope to be able to lay them on the Table before the House rises to-day. I will take this opportunity of expressing my great disappointment at the contents of the protocols, and I think it is necessary, after the remark which I made in reply to a question of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) a day or two ago, that the protocols would be found to contain reference to trade questions, that I should explain for a moment to the House the position of this question. When I left Washington, the question was not finally settled as to what the protocols should contain, and how far the various papers that had been formally submitted to the Conference by both sides should be incorporated in the protocols. During my illness, a message arrived from Mr. Chamberlain saying that it was proposed that they should be purely formal, and my assent was asked to that proposition. I gave that assent, or rather my hon. friends the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice, who took the matter up for me, caused a message to be sent to Mr. Chamberlain in reply, expressing my assent, with the condition that at a future period fuller information should be given. But at that time I fully anticipated that these formal protocols would contain the proposals and counter-proposals made by both sides.

Mr. MITCHELL. As to trade?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That they would contain the formal proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries on the one side, and the reply made by the American plenipotentiaries on the other side. I assumed that what was termed the formal propositions to which I gave assent, would contain these papers, and I take this opportunity of expressing to the House my great regret at finding that the protocols contained nothing except the simple statement of the various meetings that were held and the final conclusions arrived at, the treaty and the modus vivendi; so that there is no information conveyed in the protocols beyond that which has already been made public by the publication of the treaty and the protocols by the Senate of the United States. I feel it only right that I should take the first opportunity of explaining the disappointment that I feel. I telegraphed immediately to Mr. Chamberlain, at New York, but the answer was returned that the message was undelivered, as he had already sailed. In the telegram I explained to him my great disappointment at finding that even the proposals of the two sides were not contained in the protocols; and I have been considering to what extent I would be justified, under the circumstances, in sustaining the statement which I made to the House that there were proposals for trade submitted to the conference. I think I would be quite warranted, at all events, in placing in the hands of the leader of the Opposition, and of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who has a motion on the paper in relation to this matter, the proposal made by the British plenipotentiaries, and the answer given to that by the United States plenipotentiaries, in reference to greater freedom to commercial intercourse, as it has a very direct and important bearing upon the motion to be made by the hon. member for South Oxford. I feel somewhat embarrassed, as the House will understand, by the departure from the decision which was arrived at in my absence as to the protocols not embodying the proposals and counter-proposals made during the conference.

Mr. JONES. Is it too late to communicate with Mr. Chamberlain?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will communicate by cable to Mr. Chamberlain so that a message may reach him on the other side; and I will also place myself in communication with Mr. Bayard and Sir Lionel Sackville West, in Washington, with a view to obtaining their assent to allow the British proposal for greater freedom of commercial intercourse, and the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries to be made public.

Mr. CHARLTON. I think it is highly desirable that not only the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman who has the motion in hand before the House, but that the House and the country should be made cognisant of the efforts that were made in regard to the trade relations, and if the matter is to be made public at all for the benefit of any one member of this House, it should be made so for the benefit of all. I imagine that if it is feasible to accomplish the suggestion made by the Finance Minister, to cable to Mr. Chamberlain and to communicate with the Secretary of State of the United States, to get their permission to making these papers public, it had better be adopted, as they will have a most important bearing upon the discussion which is about to take place, and I think it highly desirable that the country should know what these proposals and the counter-proposals were.

Mr. CASEY. I quite agree with my hon. friend who has just sat down, that if the Finance Minister lays these proposals before the leader of the Opposition and the hon. gentleman in charge of the motion, of course it would only be for the purpose of making them public to the House and of using them in the discussion of the question before the House. If they are to be so used at all, I think it would be better that they should be made known in the usual manner by being printed and laid before all the members of the House, and that the discussion of the question should be postponed until such time as not only the members of the House, but the public generally who are interested in the matter, should have the opportunity of considering the proposals and of making known their opinions to the members who are about to discuss the question. I hope the hon. gentleman will consider that view of the matter, and if he considers himself authorised, without consulting Mr. Chamberlain, or Mr. Bayard, or anybody else, to lay them before these two gentlemen for the purpose of being made public in the debates, surely he will feel authorised to lay them before the House in the usual manner. I hope he will consider this matter thoroughly, and give the House and the public at large the fullest opportunity of considering the propositions made and the answers thereto, so that we, as the representatives of the country, may be able to shape our action in reference to them. I am not now speaking, of course, in any partisan sense. This is a matter, I fancy, which at present is very ill-understood by the people of the Dominion, and it is essential that the full import of the treaty and the full import of all that has been done should be known by the public as well as by the members of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that I shall consider that question very carefully. But when I spoke of placing the facts in the hands of those gentlemen, it was scarcely for the purpose of publishing them to the House, but it was for their information and guidance in discussing the very important motion which is on the Order paper. It was in that sense that I felt it was due to them, especially after what I had already said in the House. I am relieved, however, to a certain extent, from the difficulty, by the fact that I find in the Montreal Star what purports to be a report of an interview with Mr. Angell, one of the United States plenipotentiaries, in which he is reported to have said:

"The British and Canadian Commissioners were specially anxious to make a reciprocal free trade treaty a part of the treaty, before they would settle the fishery question. More than half the time was occupied in this manner. The real work has been done within, perhaps, a month. We told them over and over again that the tariff was a matter which must be settled by Congress, and that we could do nothing about it."

This is a report of a statement made by one of the United States plenipotentiaries, a very able and accomplished gentleman, Mr. Angell, President of the Michigan University, and I can only say that he could have made this statement with entire accuracy.

Mr. CHARLTON. This is merely a newspaper report.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a newspaper report, but as I say, it is a statement that could have been made accurately. As the House can see, no person can be more anxious than I am myself—because I conceive it a very important point—to have, at all events, that proposal and the reply to it placed before the House, and I will endeavor, if possible, to obtain such authority as will enable me to take that step. In the meantime I shall, of course, consider that in placing it in the hands of the leader of the Opposition, and the hon. member for South Oxford, it is for their confidential information, as it is information that I feel they are entitled to have before dealing with the question of which they have given notice.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very sorry that my hon. friend appears to forget that there is an element in this House that is not taken into the counsels of the Government on the one hand, nor of the leader of the Opposition on the other. I know there are several hon. gentlemen here who sympathise somewhat with me in the attitude which I assume as an independent member. And I think my hon. friend would do well to bear in mind that that element exists, and that he has a right, as a person who is deeply interested in that matter, to a copy of the paper also. While I am up I may say that I do not see the necessity of waiting to get Mr. Chamberlain's consent to lay these protocols before the House. There is a majority of the British committee on this side, and the Hon. Mr. West can be communicated with in half an hour. The Finance Minister and Mr. West form a majority of the committee, and they can get the sanction of Mr. Bayard, the Secretary of State at Washington. It does appear to me that the hon. gentleman should not keep the legislation of this country waiting—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I concur in that.

Mr. MITCHELL—to suit Mr. Chamberlain's convenience. I do not see the necessity of waiting for him. It is quite possible there may be no other reasons, and I do not say this in a party spirit, but I do say that perhaps it is in the interests of the country that this discussion should not come too rapidly. My impression is, however, that in discussing this matter and dealing with the question of the treaty such as it may be, it is not in the interests of this country that this discussion should take place before the discussion takes place in the Senate at Washington, unless it is too long delayed. My hon. friend opposite who has taken such a leading part in these negotiations knows full well that he will have to make out a very strong case to satisfy this country that Canada has the best of the bargain, and every word uttered will be quoted by the enemies of the treaty on the other side of the line in favor of rejecting the treaty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I, therefore, do not wish to embarrass the hon. gentleman. I suggest it may be advisable, while the House receives all possible information on the subject, and to that it is entitled, not to have this discussion come on too rapidly. I speak now in the interests of Canada. If the treaty is a good treaty we ought to do nothing to embarrass its passage, or furnish arguments by forcing hon. gentlemen on that side of the House to show how good the treaty is that has been entered into, and thus place in the hands of the enemies of Canada and of the treaty arguments against its passage. What course the Government may adopt I cannot say, but I will not endeavor to unduly press them, taking that view of the case; but all the same the House should be furnished with a copy of the protocols at an early day, not confidential, so that we may be able to see them and discuss them, and I as one member of the House claim that when a copy of the protocols is placed in the hands of the leader of the Opposition and the mover of the resolution, I am also entitled to a copy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask the Finance Minister if the papers, to which he has referred as having been sent in by the American plenipotentiaries and reply thereto will cover the whole case, or whether there are counter-proposals? The Minister has only referred to two documents, which he claims did not appear in the protocols sent in. If these two embrace all the documents and information on the subject, well and good; if not, the others should be produced. I would like to ask the Minister of Finance, too, what arrangements were made when he left Washington as to what these protocols were to contain—I mean as to whether they were to embody any part of the proceedings?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As I stated, when I left Washington the question was under consideration as to how much should be contained in the protocols. In the first instance, there are the proposals, the formal proposals, and the counter-proposals made on both sides; in the second place, there are elaborate papers and arguments sustaining the views on both sides; and, in the third place, there are condensed reports of the discussions that took place among the plenipotentiaries on both sides upon those various points. Now, the protocols could contain all those; they could contain the formal proposals; they could contain the papers that were put in as arguments sustaining those proposals, or in opposition to those proposals, as the case may be, and they could also embody the leading arguments by which in the conference the views of both sides were maintained. The question was, as I understood, practically settled when I left Washington, that the arguments were not to be embraced, that is to say, the reasoning upon the two sides would not be necessary; but it was a question as to how far the various papers put in, in support of the proposals or in opposition to the proposals, should form a part of the protocols; and when I was asked the question by telegraph to assent to the protocols being purely formal, I assumed and took it for granted that what was termed a formal protocol would contain the proposals and counter-proposals—that that, at all events, would be a part of it.

Mr. MITCHELL. And the answer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I assented to it. Yes, the proposals and the answers. A proposal is put in and an answer is put in in relation to it; and I assumed that those protocols, what were termed formal protocols, would, at all events, contain the proposals and the replies on both sides. When I assented to the protocols being of a purely formal character I took it for granted that was what was meant, and I was very much surprised that, on the contrary, it was meant that they should contain absolutely nothing except the record of the meetings and the results finally arrived at. As has been suggested, I shall take prompt and immediate means to obtain permission, at all events, to lay this paper to which I have referred upon the Table of the House, so as to put it in possession of every hon. member. I may say in reply to the last enquiry, that the proposal and the reply to it will cover the entire case so far as the trade relations are concerned.

Mr. MULOCK. I thank the Minister so far as he has gone; but it appears to me that in order to properly understand the attitude of the various plenipotentiaries in this case it is material that the very words of each proposal and counter-proposal should be laid before this House. As I understand the Minister, the conclusion arrived at when the conference closed was that some persons at Washington were to be charged with the duty of analysing these proposals, and preparing such a proposal as he considered would represent the attitude of the British plenipotentiaries, and also such an answer as, in his opinion, represented the views of the American authorities. Now, that would hardly meet the case. It appears to me that whether those papers should be laid before the public or not, the House is entitled to have laid before it, every argument advanced by the British plenipotentiaries and the replies made by the American authorities, so far as the American replies are not privileged. I presume none of the communications are privileged communications, or are to be treated as such. The Minister now admits that no return will contain the argument of the British plenipotentiaries; therefore, when the Minister of Finance brings down the protocols he should supplement his return by adding the arguments and answers advanced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, in reply to the hon. gentleman, that the protocolists, the gentlemen who prepared the protocols, are the two official protocolists of the conference—Mr. Bergne, the Secretary of the British side, and Mr. Moore, the Secretary of the United States side, and it was their duty to prepare the protocols under the direction of the conference. The United States and British plenipotentiaries agreed, at the commencement of the conference, that the proceedings should be secret, and that only when a result was arrived at should anything whatever be made known; and I may say that course was observed throughout. It then became important as to what the protocols should contain, the proceedings having taken place on an arrangement that the conferences were to be regarded as secret, and only that was to be made known which it was agreed should be made known by the respective parties; and as I said, the question as to what those protocols should contain, was not finally settled when I left Washington, but I had no doubt myself that they would contain the exact words. It was not for the protocolists to give their version at all of what had taken place. Those proposals and counter-proposals were put in writing, and if I obtain the necessary assent, as I hope, on the matter, they will be part of the papers to which I refer, and they will be laid upon the Table of the House in the exact words in which they were made by the British plenipotentiaries and the exact words of the United States plenipotentiaries in reply, which was also put in writing. As I have stated before, that will cover the entire grounds upon which so much interest is felt in regard to the trade relations and tariff arrangements of the two countries. I will endeavor to obtain, as early as possible, permission to make that portion public, and I hope I may be able to lay it on the Table at an early date.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would say from the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Finance, it seems to me those protocols are prepared in precisely the way protocols usually are prepared. I do not remember a single instance in the preparation of protocols, the exact language of the proposals and the counter-proposals have been expressed in those protocols. I would say further, that the functions of the Commission that was appointed to negotiate this treaty are at an end, and it seems to me now that the President and his advisers on the one side, and Lord Salisbury on the other, must give their consent to make public any portion of those documents. It is, Sir, in my opinion, necessary for the hon. gentleman to get the consent of the Prime Minister of England to the publication of the papers to which he refers. I understood him from the statement that he made the other day, that the papers he proposed to bring down did not relate specially to the discussion of the treaty, but it was for the special purpose of discussing the trade policy of this country, and upon the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), it was with reference to that motion that the hon. gentleman proposed to bring down those papers; and while it is most important that we should have the fullest information for the consideration of the treaty, it was also specially important that we should have at once those propositions made by the Government on the subject of trade. To get that information it appears to me that the proper course is, for the Government here, through His Excellency, to apply to the Prime Minister of England—the Foreign Secretary—

Mr. MACKENZIE. I object to any invitation of the kind. We need not ask Lord Salisbury to interfere in Canadian affairs. I say to the Finance Minister that we ought not to invite Lord Salisbury or any other statesman on the other side to interfere more than in what is absolutely necessary. I entirely object to it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he does not think it is desirable that we should invite the interference, any further than is absolutely necessary, of the Foreign Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE. That is what I said.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In regard to the matter which is so materially affecting ourselves, I quite appreciate the views that the hon. gentleman has thrown out in that suggestion; although, of course, there is a good deal of force in the suggestion made by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills).

BRIDGE OVER WELLAND RIVER.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to take possession of the bridge over the Welland River at the village of Chippawa? 2. Whether it is their intention to construct a new bridge?

Mr. POPE. This matter has been pressed upon us very strongly by the member for Welland (Mr. Ferguson), and we have given our assent to him, privately, to build a new bridge at that place, and we shall probably carry it out.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURE.

Mr. CHARLTON (for Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT) asked, What were the receipts and expenditure of the Intercolonial Railway, from 1st July, 1887, to 1st February, 1888; also to 1st March, 1888? From 1st July, 1886, to 1st February, 1887; and to 1st March, 1887?

Mr. POPE. It would be much more convenient in those questions requiring a good deal of figures that they should be moved by an Address. However, I think I can answer this one. Before I answer the question I would say that this is the worst time of the year at which we could give returns for the railway. The earnings of the railway from this time generally to the 1st of July are much larger than they are at any other part of the year. I would also say that we have a very large accumulation—very large indeed—of ocean traffic. Unexpectedly it came upon us for the first time about November, and that traffic is a non-paying traffic. More than half of our entire through traffic has been of this nature. The figures stand thus: The earnings from 1st July, 1887, to 1st February, 1888, were $1,691,029.73; the working expenses, $2,030,385.29. From the 1st of July, 1887, to the 1st of March, 1888, the earnings were $1,898,153.66; the working expenses are not yet made up. From the 1st of July, 1886, to the 1st of February, 1887, the earnings were $1,543,709.52; working expenses $1,943,396.84. From the 1st of July, 1886, to the 1st of March, 1887, the earnings were $1,696,095.37; working expenses, $2,036,513.90. I may add that the year which ended in June last was an exceptional year with regard to the quantity of snow which fell. We never had in any previous year so much snow to contend with, and it was estimated that to that item alone was due about $200,000 of the expenditure.

Mr. CHARLTON. I notice that the hon. gentleman is discussing the question. I would suggest that he lay on the Table his memorandum, which contains the information asked for.

Mr. POPE. If anyone objects to my saying a few words, I will stop.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. POPE. What I was saying was that the expense of handling the snow amounted to about $200,000. The same circumstance has added to the expenses of this year, because such a season's experience leaves the rolling stock and engines considerably out of repair, and we have had to use all the shops for the purpose of putting them in good order again.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there not another reason? Last year was election year, and I noticed that a great many people were employed in my section. I merely throw this out as an explanation, as the hon. gentleman seems to have forgotten it.

Mr. POPE. It was done in the interests of my hon. friend. I put on as many as I could to oblige him.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am sorry my hon. friend should be guilty of—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has made a statement not strictly in accordance with the fact. I know he did not mean it. I know he did not mean to convey to this House that I ever asked him to put a man on, and, therefore, I wish to correct him and to say that it was in the interest of my opponent that it was done.

Mr. CHARLTON. Will the hon. gentleman lay his memorandum on the Table so that we may consult it.

Mr. POPE. I will send it to the reporter.

THE PURCHASE AND SALE OF LEAF TOBACCO.

Mr. THÉRIEN asked, Whether the Government have received a petition from the manufacturers of Canadian tobacco at Montreal, asking for such legislation as would give them a monopoly for the purchase and sale of leaf tobacco?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No petitions of that kind have been received.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN STRATHROY.

Mr. TROW (for Mr. McMULLEN) asked, Has a selection been made of a site for a public building in Strathroy under the appropriation of $4,000 made last Session; and, if so, where and at what cost? Have tenders been called for in connection therewith?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I sent an officer of my department to look over the different sites that were eligible, but the department has not selected a site. As soon as we have done so, tenders for the construction of the building will be called for.

Mr. MACKENZIE. As soon as the election is over, I suppose.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES FOR BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Mr. MARA asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint additional County Court Judges in the Province of British Columbia, at an early date?

Mr. POPE.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the intention of the Government to recommend to the House an increase in the number of County Court Judges in British Columbia.

YORK-SIMCOE BATTALION—KIT ALLOWANCE.

Mr. MULOCK moved for:

Return showing copies of all applications, letters or other communications to the Government or any department or Minister, in connection with the application on behalf of the York-Simcoe Battalion for kit allowance whilst on service in the North-West Territories, and of replies thereto.

He said: I may remind the House that last Session, in Committee of Supply, I brought this matter to the attention of the Minister of Militia, who then informed the House that he had disallowed the application on behalf of the York-Simcoe Battalion for kit allowance on the ground that they had no claim, inasmuch as he had been advised that the county of York made an allowance to the battalion; but I think that fact in itself does not justify the attitude of the Minister. The battalion in question went to the North-West, served there during the suppression of the Rebellion, and returned home after an absence of about three months. Other battalions did the same; and I find in the report of the Department of Militia and Defence the principle laid down upon which the department made such allowances. The first case in which this claim appears to have been made was in the case of the 90th Battalion of Winnipeg, and at page 72 of the Report of the Commission on the War Claims, appears the following memorandum:—

"This is a claim from the officer commanding the 90th Battalion of Winnipeg to cover the cost of underclothing, boots, necessaries, &c. It appears that this corps was ordered to take the field without having been provided with these articles by the department. The Commission are of opinion that corps ordered on service should be fully provided by the Government."

At the bottom of this report are the words "Approved—A. P. C.;" from which I infer that the Department of Militia and Defence approved of the principle here laid down that all corps that went to the North-West should be supplied by the Government with underclothing, boots, necessaries, &c. The Minister of Militia seems to dissent from that proposition. He may have changed his policy or altered his judgment, but this was the judgment that he approved of on the 5th of February, 1885. You will observe that the allowance in question is not limited to particular items such as underclothing and boots, but applies also to necessaries, &c., and as if these words might not be sufficiently comprehensive, the Commission expresses the opinion that corps ordered on service should be fully provided by the Government. In consequence of this decision, the Government did make an allowance to the Winnipeg Battalion considerably more than what is asked for here, an allowance of $13.95 per head. The next application comes from the Winnipeg Field Battery, and will be found on page 102 of the Commissioners' Report. It is as follows:—

"Winnipeg Field Battery, expenses of clothing, &c., $1,260. $13.95 per man is recommended, being the same as is recommended for the 90th Battalion, amounting to $378.85, less sums already paid by the Hudson's Bay Company, $197.46, charged to the Government; and so on."

In this case, following the precedent laid down in the case of the 90th Battalion, the Government made an allowance to the Winnipeg Field Battery. Later on, on page 118, the Winnipeg Troop of Cavalry apply for an allowance in lieu of kit. I do not know what articles of apparel are covered by the word "kit," but it was considered sufficient to entitle them to an allowance of $13.95 per man. Further on, at page 143, we have the application of the 10th Battalion, Toronto, commonly known as the Royal Grenadiers, and this battalion asked for compensation in lieu of boots and underclothing of $8.15 per man. I may say, that in the case of the 10th Royals and Queen's Own Rifles, the city of Toronto made certain grants for the purpose of supplying them with an outfit; nevertheless, that was not deemed sufficient in this case to disentitle them to compensation. Then came the application of the Queen's Own, which appears on page 295, and the report contains the following words:

"It appears this corps were not provided with necessaries—"

In this case the report simply speaks of "necessaries," not of boots and underclothing, so I presume there are other things besides boots and underclothing, with which the men had to provide themselves, and which are not provided by the department,—

"It appears this corps was not provided with necessaries by the department before leaving Toronto, but certain articles had been given to the corps by the City Council of Toronto, similar to what was given to the 10th Royal Grenadiers."

Then it goes on to say:

"In lieu of kit and necessaries, the same allowance as granted the 10th Royal Grenadiers, $8.15 per man."

The War Commission uses the word "kit" as entirely distinct from "necessaries." If "kit" embraces boots and underclothing, "necessaries" must refer to other articles, because in the case of the Queen's Own, the department consented to payment for the "kit" and for "necessaries." When the York and Simcoe Battalion took the field, as I mentioned before, a certain allowance was made to them by the county of York, and when last Session I asked the Minister why the Government had not made the same allowance to the York and Simcoe Battalion that had been made to the Queen's Own and to the 10th, the Minister replied they had no claim, that they had been supplied with boots and underclothing by the county of York, and that the county having made a claim the men were not entitled also to make one. For that reason, the Minister declined to place in the Estimates an item to pay this money. It was on the 2nd June, 1887, that the Minister gave this House to understand he was disallowing the claim of the York and Simcoe Battalion No 1, because there was at that time before the department a claim of the county of York to be recouped, but I find on turning up the records that on the 5th February, 1886, the county of York had made a claim for this sum which it had paid to the battalion, and that the department or the Commission had reported adverse to the claim, and the Minister approved of their report. Accordingly, some 15 or 16 months ago, I brought the matter to the notice of this House, and the hon. the Minister told us that the reason he would not pay the men was because the county was making a claim, and the Commission had decided not to pay the county claim. I have no doubt on that point. The hon. gentleman had simply forgotten the report he approved of, and was at that time of the opinion that the claim was still pending before the Government. On that occasion he told us he had come to the conclusion that the men in question had made no expenditure in regard to their outfit, that they had been supplied with boots and underclothing by the county, that they had, therefore, made no disbursements and were not entitled to receive anything as they were not out of pocket at all. I asked the hon. gentleman if he had caused enquiry to be made to see if these men had disbursed anything, and he replied that his decision had been arrived at in consequence of a report made by one of the majors of one of the battalions during the troubles of the North-West, Major Windham, and gave me to understand there was in the department a report from Major Windham on this point. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, intimating that he did not give us to understand there was at that time a report from that officer. On page 716 of Hansard, the hon. the Minister says:

"The officer who acted as major stated that the men had no claim, as they had been provided for by the county, and if payment were made, it should be to the municipality. Some battalions were given an allowance, but they proved they had expended the amount for the purpose of kits for the men. The York and Simcoe Battalion does not appear to have any claim to such an allowance."

Those are the words of the hon. gentleman. I am reported as having put this question:

"May I ask: Is there any report from the major to that effect?"

"Sir A. P. CARON. There must have been, because it was submitted to me in answer to the enquiry made by my hon. friend."

"Mr. MULOCK. Can the report be laid before the House?"

"Sir A. P. CARON. If the hon. gentleman wishes the report, I will look into the matter and see whether it can be produced. I merely take this statement as forming part of the answer."

Now, if there was no written report from the major, what do you think of a Department of Militia and Defence who proceeds in this irregular way to adjudicate upon claims of men entitled to justice at the hands of the Minister. I do not wish to speak adversely of the department further than the circumstances demand, but, in the first place, it appears to me the hon. gentleman admits that he has been guilty of a gross breach of military discipline in applying to the major commanding the battalion for a report, when there was a superior officer with whom he could have communicated. We know that an hon. gentleman, a member of this House, was in command of the battalion, and I presume he could have been reached; at all events, no explanation has been advanced by the Minister to show us why he did not apply in the proper departmental way, through the commanding officer, for a report in this matter. He chooses to take advice from a subordinate, from one of the majors. Did he also take advice from the other major. My hon. friend from South Simcoe was one of the officers commanding the battalion; and if the colonel was to be passed over and the majors consulted, one major's advice was as good as that of another. In this case, I think we have it on record that the officer commanding that battalion, in his place in this House, last Session, declared he disagreed with the hon. Minister with regard to the alleged facts given by him, and that these men had a claim. Now, did the Minister decide this question on a verbal report of one of the majors? Either there was a written report which he ought to have brought down, or there was a verbal report. If it was a verbal report, it is a very loose and a very unfair way to decide on the rights of absent men on the ex parte statement of one of the majors commanding, when his advice and opinion differ from the advice and opinion which the Minister would have obtained if he had applied either to the officer commanding or to the other and senior major in the regiment. I am unable to understand on what principle the Minister of Militia has proceeded in this case, if he is moved with a desire to do justice to the men in question. Did they not do their duty? Were they overpaid, or does not every man who goes into the service of the country make a considerable sacrifice? How comes it then that the battalion in question is to be treated in this manner, and is this a mode of treatment that men are entitled to at the hands of the Minister of Militia. I do not speak in this way of the Minister of Militia merely for the sake of censuring him, but I say that the circumstances demand that he should either explain this matter or do justice to these people. He has not given a valid reason for their non-payment, except that these men happened to be treated with more consideration by one of the counties to which they belonged than by the Minister whose duty it was to do them justice. He now puts the county in a peculiar position. This county—the county of York—is out of its own funds to bear part of the militia expenses. It just stepped into the breach in an emergency and gave these men an outfit, and the Minister will neither recoup the county nor pay the men. That is the position he has taken by his action. The precedent laid down by the Commission in the case of the Winnipeg Battalion has had this result. The Minister of Militia approved of the words of the War

Commission when they recommended that a full allowance should be made to those men for all the necessaries required for their services in the North-West. That report said that, when the pay-sheets were sent in, the payment should be made. That report constituted that precedent, and that was acted upon in the case of other battalions. In the case of this particular battalion, I know that the precedent which was laid down has had its effect. The pay-sheets were prepared and the receipts signed by the men for this kit allowance. I do not say that the department sent out these pay-sheets. I assume that they did not. I assume that they would originate with the battalion; but, at all events, the decision of the Government in one case was assumed to be of general application, and I know that the men have acted upon that; that in some cases they have obtained credit and in other cases have incurred liability, and there has been a considerable amount of embarrassment because they relied on the word of the Government. I hope, therefore, that when the Supplementary Estimates come down, there will be an item doing justice to this battalion. If that is not the decision of the Government, I ask the Minister of Militia to have a proper enquiry made before he decides that these men have no claim. He says that last June he decided that they had no claim, and he based that on the statement of one of the majors. I assert, on information that I have, that these men have a claim. I am told that they did disburse money, and I ask, as a matter of justice to each man, that they should be given an opportunity, at least, to show whether they have a claim or not.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think it would have been very much more convenient to have discussed this matter when the papers were brought down. As the hon. gentleman has stated, the matter has already been brought before Parliament, and I can refer the hon. gentleman to the very words he has quoted, and which explains the position taken by the department in reference to this claim as having been pronounced by myself, quoted from Hansard by him. I stated at that time, and I repeat it to-day, that, at the beginning of the troubles in the North-West, hon. gentlemen well know the Government stores were not in a condition to provide—just on an emergency—all that was required for a force going to the front, at the most trying season of the year. The department felt it was necessary, in many cases, to authorise the commanders of various battalions to provide the necessaries required by the men who were to proceed to the front. When these necessaries were provided by the commanding officers authorised by the department, the bills were sent in to the department, and were in every case, without a single exception, paid, as if the necessaries had been issued by the department itself, the department not having been able to provide the necessaries which were required for the troops, and having authorised the commanding officers to provide them at their cost. Those officers were, therefore, afterwards recouped. In other cases, hon. gentlemen will remember that municipalities, counties, and other large corporations, provided for the troops certain necessaries which, without being in the sense of military necessaries, naturally would contribute, and did contribute, very much to the comfort of the men. When claims in reference to that sort of thing came in to the department, they were invariably refused, and they were refused upon this one principle, that the municipalities, or the counties having chosen to exercise their liberality in favor of these battalions, and having provided the articles which they considered they ought to provide for the forces without any authority from the Department of Militia, that was to be looked upon as a gratuitous present made to these men, and the department invariably refused to recoup the municipalities, or the county councils, which had acted in that way. In the case of the York Battalion, I think I can appeal even to the hon. gentleman who has argued their case so ably and so calmly, that it would be quite useless to discuss the point, that I can have no hostile feeling against the York Battalion. That battalion, like all the other battalions which went to the front, did its duty in a manner to do credit to Canada, and to the section of the country from which its members left their homes to go and fight the battle at the front. But in the case of the York Battalion, as I have stated on a previous occasion, and in other similar cases, the goods which had been furnished to the men were furnished by the county council. The hon. gentleman, in discussing this matter, has referred to what I said about one of the majors having stated that if anybody had to be recouped it must be the council, and not the men. I think the major was perfectly correct, from the information which we have been able to collect in the Department of Militia. After having ascertained that the council had invested the funds of the county to provide these necessaries for the men, it seems to me that the claim could only come from the council, and not from the men. Upon that ground we decided that the department could not recoup the council, because in similar cases we had refused to recoup other councils who had acted in a similar way, and we stated that we could not recoup the men because the commanding officers had not received authority to purchase the goods, and the men had not expended their own money in purchasing those goods which had been given them by the council. I am prepared to bring down all the papers, and I will lay on the Table of the House all correspondence, every letter which has been exchanged between the department and various officers who have taken an interest in this matter. But I must disclaim any possible hostility, or any appearance of hostility, on my part, acting on behalf of the Militia Department, against the York Battalion. I had friends who had taken the deepest interest in the militia force of Canada, who were in command of that battalion, and I knew that those gentlemen who had applied to me would see, when the case was fairly set before them, that we have treated the battalion as we have treated every other battalion similarly situated, and I knew they would be the first to accept the explanations which I have given, and I regret to-day that it is impossible for me to make those explanations accord with the views of the battalion. Now, just one word more before I resume my seat. The hon. gentleman censures me for what he calls a gross violation of military discipline, in applying to the major whose name has been referred to. I did not apply to any major to get any report from him. As I understand the report, it was to the effect that the application of the York Battalion was replied to through the general officer commanding, on the 4th January, 1887, he stating that the officer who had acted as major had said:

"The men had no claim, as they had been provided for by the county, and if payment were made it should be made to the municipality."

In the ordinary course I sent that reply to Lieut.-Col. Otter, who communicated it to the parties who were interested in the matter. Now, if the hon. gentleman says that I stated there was a written report from that major, I must confess that I have forgotten it entirely. When the hon. gentleman moved for the returns, which I am perfectly prepared to bring down, I remember stating distinctly that a report had been received at the department from one of the acting majors, stating that the municipality had furnished the money for the purchase of the articles in question. And, Sir, was I not right in supposing that the report was correct, when we had before the department, as the hon. gentleman himself states, the application of the municipality to be recouped for that amount of money the battalion was trying to get from the Department of Militia? It may have been a written report, or it may have been a verbal report; no doubt the papers, when produced, will show by what means the Department of Militia arrived at that conclusion. The report being corroborated, as it was, by the action of the municipality, was one to which due credence should be given by the department. Under the circumstances I am prepared to bring down all the papers, and to lay before the House the correspondence which has been exchanged between the officers and the department.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am very sorry that the action of the Minister of Militia should have given any ground for bringing this matter again before the House. I feel a very considerable degree of vexation in reference to this matter, because I very much regret there should be any difference of opinion between myself, feeling as I naturally do, interested in this matter—because these men were under my command—and the Minister of Militia, with whom I desire to act with cordiality, and to give every support I reasonably can. But in this case I think the Minister has failed to meet my objections to the course he has pursued. I would like to ask him how he reconciles the statement that the accounts for clothing were paid, with the statement, as disclosed in the Commissioners' report, that the money was paid on the pay-list signed by the men. Now, these appear to me, in the absence of any further information, to be statements which cannot be reconciled. As a matter of fact, the men were only partially supplied by the county council; they were supplied, in the hurry of the moment, with some things which were absolutely necessary, and the other things they paid for themselves. Nor did the Minister of Militia satisfy me on a former occasion that his conclusions were correct, nor that there has not been, apparently—I do not mean to say intentionally, but certainly apparently—a discrimination between the manner in which this regiment was dealt with and that of other regiments referred to by the hon. member for North York.

Mr. MULOCK. We have the admission of the Government distinctly laid down in the report of the Commission, approved of by the Minister of Militia, that these articles were to be furnished to the men by the Government; and we have further admission made now from the floor of the House, that, as the Government could not supply the things themselves, they were willing to pay the men to purchase them, or to pay for them, when purchased on behalf of the men. We have the further fact that the City Council of Toronto, as disclosed also by the evidence before the Commission, did themselves provide the money to purchase certain articles, and that in some balancing of the accounts between the men and the department, the men were paid $8 a piece in addition to what the city gave them. Why should there not be an enquiry into the accounts of the County Council of Simcoe, who contributed just as well as the county of York, so as to find out whether these men were entitled to the balance of the money precisely as the two other regiments referred to? I cannot see any distinction. It seems to me that there is no justification, either in common reason or in justice, for the Minister of Militia refusing to recognise this claim. I feel very deeply on the subject. I feel exceedingly annoyed that these men, who naturally look to me to secure them their rights in this matter, should be dealt with from year to year in this manner. I trust that the Minister will reconsider this question, that he will examine into it a little more closely than he has heretofore, and I am confident that if he does, he will find that these men have a strong case which it is exceedingly unwise for him, in the interest of the force, any longer to resist.

Mr. TYRWHITT. I have much pleasure in endorsing everything that has been said by the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) in regard to the justice of the claim for the kit allowance. I have from the first been impressed with the justice of this claim; and in proof of that I may say that almost immediately after our return from the North-West, I advertised that on a certain day their medals would be presented to the men of my regiment at a central point. With the view of attracting a large number of men I also advertised that all the men who presented themselves to receive their medals would on that day receive their kit allowance. So firmly was I impressed at that time with the justice of the claim, that I authorised the captains in my regimental division to advance the money to their men. They did so, and gave the money to all the men who presented themselves on that day. Without entering into the question as to what constitutes a kit, or as to what a soldier is entitled to in addition to his pay, I may say that at that time I felt confident that the Government would do justice to us, from the simple fact that when our services were required, when the men were called on to take the field, they did not hesitate to ask what they were to receive or what would be given them; and I think the hon. member for Shelburne (General Laurier) will bear me out when I say that, on one occasion, when I had the pleasure of meeting him, many of my men had thrown their boots away and were actually marching in their stockings, being unable to walk in their boots, which were misfits, they being determined to go ahead and do their duty. I am also glad to have the opportunity of bearing testimony to the liberality of the different counties to which I have appealed at different times for assistance towards the volunteer force, the counties of Simcoe, Dufferin and Peel having responded generously to appeals I have made to them for assistance. The county of Simcoe has on many occasions supplemented the pay of the men. We know that the pay of fifty cents is a very small remuneration for their services. Many of those men left good situations, in which they were earning two and three dollars a day, which were not kept open, and I think in simple justice they should receive everything to which they are honestly entitled, and to which they may be supposed to have the slightest claim. It is perfectly true that the county gave a certain portion of the kit; but they gave it as a gift. It was not understood that it was to be a portion of the pay; the county gave it as a gift and, I am proud to say, that the county of Simcoe, at all events, has never asked that to be returned. They gave it as a gift, the battalion accepted it as a gift, and that was the end of it. I can only hope that the Minister of Militia will reconsider his decision. I have lost no opportunity of bringing this matter to his notice. I have written on the subject two or three times during the recess, for the simple fact that I was an interested party. I had already guaranteed the amount advanced to the different captains, and they to this day look to me to make good my promise. I feel a certain amount of reluctance in addressing the department on the subject, for the simple reason that I am personally interested; but I am in honor bound, nevertheless, to make good my promise to the captains under my command, for the simple reason that I had such faith at that time in the desire of the Government to do justice to the men, and meet their claims, that I guaranteed the payment of such sums as the captains advanced. In conclusion, I only hope that the Minister will reconsider his decision and yet do us justice.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Militia states that he thinks it would be better if I had deferred discussing this matter until the papers came down. I do not know how long he desires me to wait. I did bring the matter to his notice on 2nd June, 1887. The House continued in Session over three weeks after that, and it is now nearly nine months since the House adjourned, and we have had no sight of the papers yet. How long must we wait for the papers to come down? If nine months be not proved sufficiently long to enable the Minister to produce the papers, I am justified in trying to stimulate him through the medium of a discussion in this House. I ask leave to amend the motion by including the words "copies of any reports."

General LAURIE. I do not know that I can add much to this discussion, or speak particularly to the matter before the House; but as the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. Tyrwhitt) has appealed to me, I feel I must at least afford any information in my power. I had the honor of having his battalion under my command in the North-West. General Middleton telegraphed me that he wished for reinforcements, and he asked me to send that particular battalion up to join him as early as possible. I at once issued the orders, and called on Colonel Tyrwhitt, who was then acting as Major in that battalion, to push his men on. I went out to meet them to expedite the movement, and I saw the men, as the hon. gentleman has said, marching in their stocking-feet. I asked the reason, and they told me they wished to carry out the instructions they had received, and they found they could travel better in that way as their boots did not fit. I mention this, not as dealing with the question immediately before the House, but simply because I have been appealed to, to give my testimony as showing the zeal that stimulated those men in the discharge of their duty.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. A few days ago I had the honor of presenting a petition from the County Council of Oxford, asking that better provision should be made for the volunteer forces of the country. I think this discussion has brought out the fact that not only in time of peace but in time of trouble, the volunteer force is not equipped and supplied as it should be, but it has had to fall back upon the officers of the companies, on the county councils, or on some good friends, for assistance when the time arrived that they need to be properly equipped. I hope the department will take this matter under consideration, and see that officers and men who give their services have those supplies necessary to place them, at least, in comfortable shape in attending camp or going on duty in time of trouble. I know from experience the expense entailed on the officers and the men, and I hope the present discussion, although I know nothing particularly about the merits of the case under consideration, will be beneficial. I take this opportunity to bring this matter before the House, and I trust it will have a good effect.

Motion agreed to.

NAVIGATION AT NAUFRAGE, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. McINTYRE moved for :

Copy of the report of the engineer who was sent to Naufrage, King's County, Prince Edward Island, in 1884, for the purpose of reporting on the feasibility of improving the navigation at that place.

He said: Before reading the motion you hold in your hand, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words by way of explanation. My object in making the motion is to get a survey of the locality mentioned, with the view of having a harbor constructed there by the removal of a portion of sand beach which intervenes between Naufrage and the sea. This sand beach is composed of marshy material, but in course of time, by the action of the sea, it has become covered with sand. The breadth of the beach is thirty or forty yards. The pond itself is a considerable sheet of water, varying in width from 100 to 500 feet, and in length from 2,000 to 3,000 feet, with a depth varying from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to $6\frac{1}{2}$ feet. It is supplied by the Naufrage River, which is a considerable stream, as well as by several streams falling into it. The locality where this survey is asked for is situated on the north shore, and for forty or fifty miles along the shore there is no harbor whatever. The people of the locality are engaged in agriculture and fishing, and they very justly complain of the want of harbor accommodation for fishing boats as well as for larger craft. In 1878 there was a petition forwarded to the then Minister of Public Works. It was the last Session of the then Parliament, and the elections coming on that summer the matter was dropped. In 1885 another large petition was sent to the Minister of Public Works, and in the fall of that year—late in the fall—an engineer was sent down to make a survey. On account of the lateness of the season and the tempestuous nature of the weather it was found difficult, or nearly impossible, to make a thorough survey. Therefore, the engineer had not sufficient data to make an exhaustive or complete report. But notwithstanding this he sent in a report which proved altogether unsatisfactory to the inhabitants of the locality. This winter, shortly before leaving home, there was another large meeting held in the neighborhood of this locality, for the purpose of urging forward another survey. At this meeting certain resolutions were adopted, which I will read. They will perhaps give the Minister of Public Works a better idea of what I have been endeavoring to represent to him. The resolutions were as follows:—

"Whereas in the opinion of this meeting the report of Chief Engineer Perley is based on notes and data furnished by Engineer Shewan.

"And whereas, the time when he visited Naufrage for the purposes of his survey, was most unfavorable on account of stress of weather, which prevented sea soundings from being taken, a precaution most necessary in this connection to render his work complete.

"Therefore resolved, That this meeting do request our Dominion representatives to approach the Minister of Public Works with the view of removing the erroneous impressions this report is calculated to convey.

"And further resolved, That our representatives, acting on the petition sent to the department in 1883, do request the hon. the Minister to send an engineer in midsummer to report anew on this to us important public work."

I have now, Mr. Speaker, laid the case before the Minister of Public Works in as few words and as plainly as I possibly could. I need scarcely remind the Minister that this work is required for the fishermen at that locality. They have no harbor accommodation, as I have already explained, for forty of fifty miles along that coast. In the morning they have to launch their boats from the shore, and in the evening haul them up again. This is a great hardship for the people engaged in the fishery business. I think I have, as fully as I possibly could, explained the matter to the Minister of Public Works, and I trust that next summer he will see the advisability of acceding to the request of those people, and sending an engineer at a proper season of the year to make a thorough and exhaustive survey of the locality.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I would say a few words in support of the motion made by my hon. friend and colleague, and with the intention of bringing before the House and the Minister of Public Works the fact that the report made by the engineer was not complete, and could not possibly be complete, because he came in such an inclement season of the year that it was impossible for him to take the soundings on the sea side of the beach. We simply ask the Minister of Public Works to send an engineer during the summer season to make a more thorough survey. We believe that if he does make a more thorough survey we will get a more favorable report than on the last occasion. In supporting my hon. colleague in regard to his reference to the importance of this matter, I would remind the House again, that for forty or fifty miles there is no harbor of refuge for boats of any description—all the way from Campbell's Cove to St. Peter's Bay. This part of the Gulf is one of the best fishing grounds on the north side of Prince Edward Island, or the Gulf of St. Lawrence. A great number of people are engaged in the fishing business there. They find it a great hardship every morning, when going fishing, to pull their boats off the beach and then carry ballast to those boats, and when they return they have to take the ballast out and haul their boats up again. We believe, from local estimates, that for $5,000 or $3,000 the work could be done and that the sum would make a harbor sufficient to accommodate the fishing boats of that locality. Considering the importance of this work we simply ask the Minister of Public Works to give his attention to the matter, and we ask him to kindly send an engineer there during the coming summer to make a survey. We feel no doubt that it will be favorable. We wish that at as early a date as possible he will make an expenditure there which will give a harbor of refuge for the boats of the fishermen of the locality. I do not wish to detain the House further than to bring this matter as prominently as possible before the Minister of Public Works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The report that was made in 1885, which I have here together with the data, was submitted to the chief engineer, and the report that is now before me shows that the work was estimated at a very high figure indeed. I think it was $38,000. The Government at the time thought that under the circumstances they could not undertake that work for such a large sum of money. When I heard both of the hon. gentlemen who have just spoken say that most likely the time chosen for the survey was not exactly the proper season, that it was rather late in the year, and that they believed that an additional survey, or the completion of the survey which was taken at the time, would be the proper thing to do, I certainly will lay the matter before my colleagues with a view to obtain their consent to have an additional survey made during this summer. I suppose that, under those circumstances, as the report will be of no use if brought down, the hon. gentleman will consent to have his motion withdrawn.

Motion withdrawn.

MANITOBA HOMESTEAD INSPECTORS.

Mr. WATSON moved for:

Returns showing the names and residences of each Homestead Inspector in Manitoba and the North-West; the number of inspections and reports made by each, in each month of the years 1882-83-84-85-86 and 1887. The name of each Colonisation Inspector, his residence, the number of inspections and reports made by each, in each month of the years 1882-83-84-85-86 and 1887, and copies of said reports.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) The hon. gentleman will understand that some of these reports may be of a confidential nature, and those cannot be brought down. But I will bring down all the other information asked for.

Motion agreed to.

NAVIGATION OF THE ST. LAWRENCE RIVER— MONTREAL AND QUEBEC.

Mr. AMYOT moved for:

Return showing the amount expended by the Government of the Province of Canada:

1. For the improvement of the harbor of Montreal;
2. For the improvement of the harbor of Quebec;
3. For the deepening of Lake Saint Peter;

The amount expended by the Dominion Government:

1. For the improvement of the harbor of Montreal;
2. For the improvement of the harbor of Quebec;
3. For the deepening of Lake Saint Peter.

The total amount expended by the Dominion Government for the improvement of the River St. Lawrence generally, in order to facilitate the navigation thereof, from the western extremity of the harbor of Quebec to the harbor of Montreal, inclusively.

The total amount guaranteed by the Dominion Government: 1. For the improvement of the harbor of Montreal; 2. For the improvement of the harbor of Quebec.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Might I ask the hon. member if the object of the first part of his motion is to obtain the amount of expenses incurred by the Government in the Province of Canada? He mentions the Government of Canada. I presume the hon. member means the Government of the Province of Canada.

Mr. AMYOT. I mean the Government which existed before Confederation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In that case I have no objection to the motion.

Motion agreed to.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. BARRON moved for:

Return of copies of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Commissioners appointed by the Government to take evidence and acquire information relative to the Trent Valley Canal, and the further progress thereof; of copies of all instructions authorising the Commissioners to act in the premises, and defining their powers and authority and mode of procedure; and of a copy of any and all reports of the Engineer or Engineers in charge of the works of said canal, made to the Government since the last Session of this Parliament.

He said: I make this motion because I believe it will be greatly in the public interest, and especially in the interest of the people living along the route of the Trent Valley Canal, that these papers should be brought down at as early a date as possible. The Government of Canada has thought fit to appoint a Trent Valley Canal Commission, for what purpose we do not yet know, and I desire to inform the members of that Government that the appointment of this Commission has created in the minds of the public a feeling of want of confidence in the Government's sincerity regarding the prosecution of that work. At this stage I do not intend to attack the Government for appointing that Commission. Perhaps at a later time I may have an opportunity to do so, if I think it right and proper. But I think it was perhaps a very unwise step to appoint it, for the reason that the Government has promised, time and time again, that the work should be gone on with as rapidly as possible, and the appointment of the Commission has given the impression throughout the country that the Government does not intend to go on with it. I need not remind the House of the promises made by the different members of the Government. I shall not remind it of the visit of the hon. Minister of Finance to the district, and of the impression he left upon the minds of the people that that great work, second only to our railway system, should be gone on with as speedily as possible. Perhaps I may remind the House that the Minister of Public Works, whom I see in his seat, himself promised to the member for East Peterborough, just prior to the last election, not only that the work should be speedily proceeded with to its completion, but that there should be work gone on with between the town of Peterborough and the village of Lakefield. Therefore, I think we have a right to ask the Government to go on with this work as speedily as possible, irrespective altogether of what the report of the Commission may be. I wish to say that so favorable am I to the early completion of that great work that, so far as I can do so with my feeble ability and voice, I shall be always ready and willing to assist the Government in carrying it forward. But there is one difficulty felt by the people along the route of this canal. The general impression among them is that though the Commission has been appointed, it has no powers; and we wish to have the papers laid on the Table in order to see whether they have any specific powers, to obtain evidence, and the mode in which they are going to proceed. So little confidence have the people in the powers of the Commission, that they themselves have been compelled to subscribe large sums of money to procure evidence to bring before the Commission, evidence which, I suppose, was before the Government when they saw fit to make promises as to proceeding with the work. If the Government will allow me to make a suggestion I think it is only right and proper that they should express their willingness to pay the expenses of the different witnesses who may be brought before the Commission. It may be that many witnesses would be brought before it who would give unimportant evidence, but that difficulty would be easily got over by the Government only paying the expenses of such witnesses as the Commission should certify to be necessary and material witnesses, or to have given necessary and material evidence. I hope the papers will be brought down at as early a day as possible.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I was not exactly listening to the hon. gentleman, as this matter refers to the department of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, but my attention was called to the speech of the hon. gentleman by one of my colleagues, because the hon. gentleman said that the Minister of Public Works had made certain promises. I think he must have meant the Minister of Railways, if any promises were made, because I am not aware of having made any promise, or of having spoken of this enquiry to anyone except my colleagues in Council. Therefore I am not in a position to answer the hon. gentleman, and my colleague being absent, he cannot answer. No doubt, when he sees the charge of the hon. gentleman, he will be able to reply for himself, and I do not see any objection to granting the Address asked for.

Mr. BARRON. I, of course, endeavor to be very accurate, and if I have made any mistake it is not mine, but that of the hon. member for West Peterborough, because, on the evening of his election, that hon. gentleman is reported, in the Government organ of that locality, as having said:

"The Minister of Public Works had given him every assurance that the Trent Valley contract between Peterborough and Lakefield would be let during the coming summer. This was no electioneering dodge, because the elections were now all over."

The elections were over about an hour when the speech was made."

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman will please change "Public Works" into "Railways and Canals," and then he will have an answer from my colleague.

Mr. MULOCK. It is important that the attitude of the Government on this question should be made perfectly clear. I do not wonder that the hon. the Minister of Public Works may be in doubt as to what promises he may have made. It may be that the newspaper report is accurate, or that it has charged him with having given a promise made by his colleague. But I presume that the promise of a colleague involving an expenditure of nine million dollars would at least have been treated with the consideration to which it was entitled, and have had, before being made, the sanction of the Governor in Council, or, at all events, have been made the subject of an understanding among the various Ministers of the Crown. It appears, however, now that the hon. Finance Minister made a promise involving an expenditure of many millions of dollars, and that his colleague, the Minister of Public Works, who will have something to do with the carrying out of the work, knows nothing of any such promise. There have been a great many like promises made in Canada. If there is one thing for which this Government is entitled to credit, it is that there is one thing which their policy has produced, if it is promises. On the eve of elections, whether general or bye, we find a goodly crop of promises. The National Policy is prolific in promises. When a bye election took place the other day in Shelburne, I am told there were promises made, and probably the hon. gentleman who gained his election by their means, will be able to tell us whether there was anything in the promises or not. In a bye election a short time ago in an Ontario constituency, there were also promises made. Were these promises mere election promises, mere shams, with which to delude the public? or were they honestly intended to be carried out in the interests of the country? The project now under discussion is entitled to be treated more seriously than to be used as a mere electioneering dodge. No doubt the work can be made of great value to the country, both locally and as a through line. I am not in a position to say what the Government engineers are able to say—whether it is a feasible scheme or not; but the Government have held out the idea that it is a feasible scheme, and one of their supporters, who formerly represented Peterborough in this House, is reported in the press as having said the other day, that the Trent Valley Canal was his policy, first, last, and always, and that no Government who did not support that policy would have his support. He sailed into this House on that canal, and no doubt his successor was equally borne into our midst on its raging waters. Now, we are told, a Commission is to ascertain whether the canal is or is not a practical scheme, or whether it exists solely in the imaginations of the Government. What is the object of the Commission? Is it to enable the Government to escape perhaps from the dilemma in which they have placed themselves, and enable them to retreat in a somewhat dignified manner. If not, why has the work not been proceeded with as promised? Why has not the promised expenditure been made? Why now send forth a Commission clothed with no power except the power of delaying, in the hope that, in time, the people will be out of patience, or, at all events, so impatient that at the next election a good promise made, when they are still warm on the subject of the canal, will bear good fruit at the polls. If this scheme is a practical one, if the Government have any honest views with regard to it, I want to know it. The part of the country in which I am interested, is interested in this scheme. Nothing will be of greater service to the country than a canal system, even if it be only used for local purposes. I do not say it should not be used as a through line as well, but in order to enable the public to escape railway monopolies, a canal system is of incalculable benefit. When you locate a railway it takes possession of the district served, and no matter what regulations you may seek to enforce, the railway will have practically a monopoly of the carrying trade. In opposition to railways a good canal may, therefore, be of great service. Every man can sail his vessel on a canal on paying toll, and the Trent Valley Canal, if it is only to do local work, will serve a great purpose, in protecting the community from excessive railway rates. If connected with the waters of Lake Simcoe, this canal would be able to draw to itself, for local freight alone, vast quantities of produce from the interior of Ontario; and even if the produce did not go by the canal, the canal rates would have a most beneficial effect by keeping down the railway rates. Anyone who looks at the map of Ontario will find that, while it is supposed we have competing lines running east and west, yet, so far as the branch lines are concerned, they have the monopoly, and as a consequence the freight rates on the branch line are exorbitant. The sooner that state of affairs is put an end to the better for the farmers, and I, therefore, trust, if it is possible, that the Government will free them from the thralldom under which they now suffer, by the construction of canals for local purposes.

General LAURIE. I do not rise to speak to the subject before the House, but merely as a matter of explanation, as the hon. member from York has brought my name into this discussion. The hon. gentleman has stated that the Government, in connection with the election in which I recently took a prominent part, were profuse of promises. It has been stated also, not only in this House, but outside, it has been stated in the public press, that my election was largely owing to promises made by members of the Government severally, and also as a body, and also to promises made by myself. I am very glad the hon. member for York

(Mr. Mulock) has given me the opportunity, at the earliest possible moment, positively to contradict this statement. I wish to say emphatically that no promise whatever was made by any member of the Government, or by the Government as a body, except the one that, if I were elected, any representations I might make would receive reasonable consideration. If the Government would not listen to the representations of a member, to whom would they listen?

An hon. MEMBER. How would it be if your opponent was elected?

General LAURIE. I am speaking of what exists at present. I am the member now; and I am happy to say that I find the Government willing to listen to reasonable representations. Then it is stated that I made promises. I made but one promise in that election, and that was that, if I were elected, I would do my best for my constituency. If that is not a right promise to make, I question what position any member can take in his canvass. These were the only promises made during my contest, and I am glad, at this early stage of the Session, to be able to puncture this bubble, this story which has been circulated over the Dominion, that that election was won by promises.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST REBELLION LOSSES COMMISSION.

Mr. LAURIER moved for:

Copy of all reports of the Commissioners appointed by Royal Commission to enquire into the losses sustained in the North-West Territories during the recent Rebellion, and a statement of all payments made under the recommendation of such reports.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Sometime ago I intimated to the hon. member for Saskatchewan (Mr. Macdowall) that it was my intention to lay these papers on the Table of the House at the earliest possible moment, irrespective of any motion. I am happy to tell the hon. gentleman that they are nearly all copied, and will be here within a day or two.

Motion agreed to.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Order for the second reading of Bill (No. 2) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act (Mr. Amyot), read.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I ask the hon. gentleman to allow his Bill to stand. The Government has promised to bring down a Bill on this question, and, if he will let his Bill stand until the Government Bill is printed, the House will be able to see what is proposed.

Mr. AMYOT. I will do that with pleasure, on condition that, if that clause is not inserted in the Government Bill, an opportunity will be given to me to press my Bill during the present Session.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Certainly.

Mr. CASGRAIN. Is it intended to bring down the Government Bill early in the Session?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. At an early date.

Order allowed to stand.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he will lay before the House the report of the Commissioners appointed on the lobster question?

Mr. FOSTER. It was pretty nearly printed when I went away on Thursday, and I think it will be here this week, but I would not like to bind myself to a day or two.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5:35 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 6th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 16) to incorporate the Chinook Belt and Peace River Railway Company.—(Mr. Perley, Assiniboia.)

Bill (No. 17) respecting the River St. Clair Railway, Bridge and Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 18) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western and Lake Ontario Shore Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Collingwood and Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. Montague.)

Bill (No. 20) relating to the Upper Ottawa Improvement Company.—(Mr. White, Renfrew.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 22) to incorporate the Eastern Assurance Company.—(Mr. McDougald.)

Bill (No. 23) to reduce the capital stock of La Banque Nationale.—(Mr. Bryson.)

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received from the Hon. Mr. Justice Taschereau, one of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a certificate and report relating to the election for the Electoral District of L'Assomption, by which the election is declared void. An appeal having been made from the said judgment, I have the honor to report that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, the judgment of the said court by which the said appeal was quashed for want of jurisdiction. I have accordingly issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district. I have also the honor to inform the House that I have received from the Registrar of the Supreme Court of Canada, judgments of the said court in the following election appeals:—

For the electoral districts of L'Islet and Montmorency, by which judgments the appeals are quashed for want of jurisdiction.

REPORT.

Annual Report of the Minister of Railways and Canals, for the past fiscal year, from the 1st July, 1886, to the 30th June, 1887, on the works under his control.—(Mr. Pope.)

THE RAILWAY ACT.

Mr. POPE moved for leave to introduce a Bill (No. 24) to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. POPE. It is almost too long to explain, but I will say, that the Bill is intended to make arrangements and to regulate matters between the trading community and farmers and the railways. It is intended that the Railway Committee of the Privy Council shall have more power in dealing with this matter than they have possessed hitherto. Generally, the Bill follows the recommendations, though not altogether, of the Commission that was appointed to enquire into this matter.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE U. S.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, as I understand that the formal protocols have been laid on the Table, and I suppose will be printed sometime to-day and distributed, I would like to know whether the Government are prepared to allow the Order for to-morrow to proceed, by which we have agreed to take the motion of which I gave notice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that, unfortunately, the hon. gentleman was not in his place in the House yesterday when I made some explanations with regard to the protocols. I suppose he has, through the medium of the press, seen substantially what occurred. But I may repeat, that the information which I hoped to be able to lay upon the Table of the House when the day arrived for going on with this discussion, we are not yet in a position to place before the House. I suggested, however, that as the hon. gentleman had a motion having an important bearing upon that question, I would place, confidentially, in the hands of the leader of the Opposition and of the mover of the resolution, the information which I was not at the moment in a position to lay before the House, so that they might have as full possession of all the facts in relation to the question as myself. I may say that I am now in communication with Sir Lionel West, with a view to be able to lay, at all events, so much of the protocols relating to the trade question, which would affect the motion of the hon. gentleman, and would have a bearing on the motion on the paper which the hon. gentleman proposes to go on with, and I hope to be able to lay it before the House. I am prepared to place it confidentially in the hands of the hon. gentleman (Sir Richard Cartwright) and in the hands of the leader of the Opposition, and I do not see why the motion should not be proceeded with. I think there is sufficient information before the House in relation to that subject, although in a somewhat indirect way, to avoid the necessity of delay in proceeding with the motion; but I leave that entirely to the hon. gentleman himself.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thank the hon. gentleman for the courtesy he proposes to extend to the hon. gentleman and myself. Speaking for myself, personally, I would be very willing to proceed, but I understand that, yesterday, a good many hon. gentlemen expressed a desire to get this information, and if we might be sure of obtaining it within two or three days it might be more convenient, as no doubt from what the Minister has said the information is important, that the House should be put in possession of it. I suppose that at the outside in a couple of days the hon. gentleman will obtain a reply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, then, perhaps it will be well to fix a day next week.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can assure the hon. gentleman that I am quite as anxious as he is that the motion be proceeded with.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, perhaps, under the circumstances, it would meet the views of the House that we should exhaust every means of having in the possession of the whole House the information referred to before proceeding with the motion, and, therefore, I would suggest to the hon. gentleman to fix an early day next week, and no doubt we will then be in a position to know what information we can lay before the House.

Mr. POPP.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What day would suit hon. gentlemen opposite?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then let us say Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A good many members are absent on Monday, and I think it might be better to fix Wednesday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very well. We will make it a First Order for Wednesday, to-morrow week, and it will be proceeded with then in any case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

SUPPLY—CANADA TEMPERANCE ACT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is the uniform practice in the Imperial Parliament to bring under the attention of the House every matter of importance which relates to individuals, or which relates to matters that more closely concern the public in general. I wish to call the attention of the House to the extent to which the subject of the Canada Temperance Act has been made a topic of discussion in almost every constituency, and at every bye-election which has occurred since we last met here. There is, perhaps, nothing better settled in parliamentary government than that in any matter which concerns the administration of public affairs the Government, who are entrusted with the control for the time being, shall be called upon to adopt such legislative measures as will secure a more efficient administration of the law with which they are charged. This principle has been well recognised, both in this country and in the United Kingdom. The hon. gentleman who now leads the Government was, a few years ago, the leader of the Opposition, and at that time the hon. gentleman supported a motion which I will read to the House. It was this:

"That, in the opinion of this House, a prohibitory liquor law is the only effectual remedy for the evil of intemperance, and that it is the duty of the Government to submit such a measure for the approval of Parliament at the earliest moment practicable."

That resolution was proposed by one of the hon. gentleman's supporters, it was seconded by another, and it was supported by every hon. gentleman who was then a follower of his in this House. It will, therefore, not be a matter of controversy between hon. gentlemen on that side of the House and on this, that on a matter of this kind relating to the administration of a law upon the Statute-book, when experience shows that the law is practically defective, it is the special business and duty of the Administration for the time being to take charge of such legislation as may be necessary to render the law perfect and its administration complete and satisfactory. We know that hon. gentlemen who have been favorable to the principles of temperance in this House, both on that side and on this, have during each Session, for the last four Sessions, proposed legislation which they believed would have the effect of securing those improvements. In not one case had that legislation been successful. The hon. gentleman who has given notice to this House of a Bill, I think during the present week, took charge of a measure last year which he failed to carry forward to completion—which, at all events, did not become law; and I think there can be no doubt whatever that the Government either should assume the responsibility of repealing the law altogether, or they should propose such amendments to the law as would enable those entrusted with its administration to carry it honestly and fully into effect. The hon. gentleman has not proposed such legislation, it is not suggested in the Speech from the Throne;

and it seems to me that that duty which he thought devolved upon the Government when he sat upon this side of the House, equally devolves upon the Government at the present moment. At that time there was no such law upon the Statute-book. What the hon. gentleman declared, was something even much broader than what I propose to the House on this occasion. He proposed that the Government should initiate legislation, should put on the Statute-book, with a view to protecting the morals of the country, a measure which had as yet no existence. There was a measure introduced by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), the succeeding Session. That Government assumed the responsibility of legislation, they took up the question and dealt with it, and they placed upon the Statute-book the measure known as the Canada Temperance Act. Now, experience has shown—an experience extending over ten years—that that Act requires amendment; that certain changes are needed in order to make more efficient the measure, and if it was the duty of the Government, as we at that time admitted it was the duty of the Government, to deal with the subject in consonance with public opinion, it is certainly not less the duty of the Government when the measure has been enacted, to make such amendments as experience has shown are necessary in the public interest. I do not propose to weary the House by a long discussion upon the subject. It is perfectly intelligible to every member of the House and further observations from me are not needed on the subject, seeing that hon. gentlemen upon that side of the House, as well as on this, have put themselves on record on this subject. I move:

That all the words after the word "That" be left out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:—"In the opinion of this House it is the duty of the Ministry to submit to Parliament a measure embracing such provisions as will remove all legal impediments to the efficient working of the Canada Temperance Act."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This motion in its present form may be considered as begging the question. The motion assumes that there are certain legal impediments as to the working of the Canada Temperance Act; in fact, it states that there are those impediments. The hon. gentleman in his speech does not explain what impediments he sought to be removed, or what impediments actually exist, and as we know impediments must be found to exist before they can be removed, all I can say is this: There is a measure on the Statute-book for the past ten years. It has been brought into force in a great many constituencies, and in these constituencies there does not seem to be any legal impediment to the introduction of the Act. If you look at the newspapers and see the number of convictions that have been obtained in all parts of Ontario especially, to which Province my attention has been specially directed, there does not seem, from the returns, to be any impediment in getting the penalties, and there does not seem to be any impediment to sending a man to gaol, in the absence of the penalty. I am not aware, and at all events we are not informed in any way, that there are impediments. The Act is in force, and vigorously in force—so vigorously it would seem in one constituency, at all events, that the people have rebelled against it as being too strongly enforced. They complain there are too many assistants to carry the Act into force, rather than too many impediments to prevent its being brought into force. This question, in my opinion, has proved more than any other the necessity of considering it as a moral question and not as a political question. No party can provide upon that question. No party of sufficient weight can influence it. Though I give every credit to the ability and earnestness of those who are called the temperance party, and look upon the temperance question as a very prominent question in the country, yet this party does not in their numbers seem to be able in any way to control the Legislatures or to get possession of the Administration of the country. Whether the hon. gentlemen on the other side were here or whether we remain here, as they have found before, they will find again, that the only real way to deal with that question is to consider it apart from politics altogether, and as a moral question, in which men, whether they belong to the ministerial party or the opposition party, can afford to join to carry or feel themselves constrained to oppose. This resolution, from its vagueness and want of certainty, and in its want of anything like a specific statement, it seems to me cannot be received in this House. It is simply a motion made by the hon. gentleman with a most praiseworthy object, an object which we can all understand, and which some of us can quite appreciate or refuse to vote for it.

Mr. LAURIER. It is an old saying that there is no one so blind as he who will not see. If the hon. gentleman does not know what are the impediments to the Scott Act, he would not be so keen and far-sighted as we know him to be. If he will only recollect the depositions which interviewed him, and recollect reading the records of the deliberations of the temperance party, from time to time, he will know that the Scott Act is deficient in some particulars, and is rendered, as the phrase is, unworkable. I agree with the hon. gentleman that this is largely a moral question, which can, to a certain extent, be settled by the moral feeling of the people alone, but the hon. gentleman is aware that though it is largely a moral question, still it has taken a legal aspect, since we have a law on the Statute-book which regulates the liquor traffic. Public opinion has gone so far that though it is a moral question it is still a legal one as well. If the principle of the Bill is right, it is the duty of the Government to enforce it; if it is bad, it is its first duty to repeal it. The Government cannot afford upon such a question as this to have no opinion. It is their duty to have an opinion on this question, and the country expects them to have it. The Government is placed there by the people for the object of having an opinion on all questions which affect the public good, and, for being prepared to take action upon such opinion. It is their duty, therefore, to have an opinion on this question, and I believe that the people of this country, whether the legislation they find on the Statute-book is praiseworthy or blameworthy, expect the Government to take some action on it. If the legislation is blameworthy, it is the duty of the Government to repeal it; on the other hand, if they are of opinion that the law is a good one but deficient in some particulars, it is their duty to take steps to see that this law is put in such shape as to carry out the object for which it has been placed on the Statute-book. The complaint of the temperance body is that the law is deficient at the present moment. We have the law on the Statute-book. If my memory serves me aright, the hon. gentleman did not object to the law when it was before Parliament. When the Bill was before Parliament, and when he could have objected to it, he acquiesced in the principle of the Bill, thereby admitting that the principle of the Bill was good. Under such circumstances, when the principle of an Act is rendered inefficient, because the machinery provided to work it is not as suitable as it ought to be, we claim it is the duty of the Government not to leave such an important matter to individual members of the House, but that the Government should come to the assistance of that legislation and make it as good as it ought to be. That is the duty we think ought to be imposed by the House at once on the Government, and which the Government should not delay to accept.

Mr. JAMIESON. I just came into the House a few moments ago after this discussion had commenced. The hon. member for Bothwell was discussing the question, and afterwards submitted his motion in amendment to going into Committee of Supply. It was very awkward, perhaps, to meet a motion of that kind in an off-hand way, and it seems difficult to give a reason why one should either oppose or support such a motion. Unless I change my opinion, in order simply to be consistent, I suppose I shall be obliged to vote for the amendment of the hon. member from Bothwell. I see reasons, however, which would justify me in pursuing a different course if I thought proper. Hitherto the question of the amendment of the Canada Temperance Act, as well as the general question of prohibition, has been treated quite aside from the questions of party or politics, and I am sorry that the present movement is not in keeping with the former action of the prohibitionists of this House. For my part, I have been taken considerably by surprise by this motion. In the city to-day, there is a meeting of the Dominion Alliance, and my absence from the House may be accounted for by that fact. The representatives of the two political parties in this House were present at that meeting, discussing the ways and means of best advancing the cause of temperance. Of course the hon. gentleman's action is quite at variance with the deliverance of the Dominion Alliance. Hitherto the course taken by the friends of temperance in this House has been guided by the wishes of the Alliance, and within the past hour the Alliance has endorsed the action which I have already taken of introducing to this House a Bill for the purpose of amending the Canada Temperance Act, and making it more like what the friends of temperance desire to have it. I am at one with the hon. member for Bothwell in reference to the desirability of having all the imperfections of the Canada Temperance Act removed, and improving it as much as possible. It is scarcely fair for the opponents of temperance to say that the Act is becoming unpopular, whilst at the same time it is impossible to secure amendments which would make it more popular and more workable. I may further remark that hitherto, in connection with all actions emanating from the Dominion Alliance, it has been usual to select an hon. gentleman from each side of the House for the purpose of moving and seconding any motion which may be made here either in reference to the prohibition of the liquor traffic or in reference to the amendment of the Canada Temperance Act. Consequently, while I thoroughly agree with the motion which has been submitted by the hon. member for Bothwell, I am bound to say that it is a breach of the arrangement which has hitherto existed between the temperance men in this House belonging to the two political parties. It is not for me, as a supporter of the Government, to say that it would have been right and proper for the hon. member for Bothwell to consult me or any other member on this side of the House, in reference to the action which he has thought proper to take. My own judgment is that if any amendments to the Canada Temperance Act are carried, and if we ever secure prohibition in this country, those results must be brought about by the joint action of both political parties. I do not know that I should follow up this discussion at any length, as other members will no doubt take this opportunity of expressing their opinion on the action of the hon. member for Bothwell. The course which has been taken is so unusual and so extraordinary that I think there ought to be a general discussion upon the question now, so that there may be no entanglement, and so that the defeat of the motion, if it be defeated, may not be looked upon as a deliverance of this House against any proposed amendments to the Canada Temperance Act. It is my intention to press the Bill which is now before the House, and to secure as large a support for that measure as possible, and I have no doubt that its provisions will receive the sanction of this House. Two years ago a somewhat similar Bill was carried through this House, and the calamity which happened to it was at the hands of another body altogether. My own judgment is that there is a strong enough desire on the part of the members of this House that the Canada Temperance Act should be improved, to give to the measure which has been introduced a careful consideration; I have no doubt it will pass this House, and I trust that it will receive more favorable consideration at the hands of the Senate than the Bill which was introduced two Sessions ago. I may further state that it is the intention of the Dominion Alliance to have the sentiment of this House again tested upon the question of the general prohibition of the liquor traffic. It may be said that that course is somewhat extraordinary, in view of the fact that a resolution of that kind has already been dealt with by this Parliament. It will be recollected that a resolution of that kind was submitted by me at the last Session; but the friends of temperance are so earnest, and are so anxious that this question should be kept to the front, that it is their desire that the question shall be brought before the House at every Session of this Parliament, until we shall ultimately secure, we trust, what we are striving for, the entire suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Those who remember the history of the temperance question in this country will remember that, in 1873, a very large number of petitions were presented to this House from different parts of the country, asking for a prohibitory liquor law. No law was placed on the Statute-book on the subject, however, until 1878, when the Canada Temperance Act was deliberately passed by the Canadian Parliament. Now, if there is a necessity for an improvement or amendment to that Act, I apprehend that the Government is the proper party to amend it, and place it in such a position that the temperance people of this country can operate it to the advantage of temperance principles. Last Session a vote was taken on a motion to repeal the Scott Act, which was lost by a majority of 108 against the repeal, and the hon. member for Bothwell then arose in his place and stated to the First Minister that it was the duty of the Government, in the face of that vote, when the House of Commons by so large a majority decided that the people were in favor of continuing the Act, to bring in a Bill to amend the Scott Act and make it more workable. It is the duty of the Dominion Alliance to bring their influence and power to bear on the Ministers of the day, in order that amendments to the Act may be operated through them, because, if the people desire the continuation of this Act, as it is undeniable they do, they have a right to look to the Ministers of the day as the channel through whom any amendments should come. I believe that the friends of temperance would act best in the interests of their cause, if, instead of bringing in amendments by means of private Bills, they would bring all their influence to bear on the Government, to induce the Government to introduce the necessary temperance legislation. They can say in plain language to the Ministers that, the House of Commons having declared by a large majority that the people are in favor of continuing the Temperance Act, it is, therefore, the duty of the Government to make the necessary amendments. The importance of taking such action should be strongly impressed upon the Government. It would be better that a movement of that kind should be made on the part of the Dominion Alliance, than to continue the policy of every year introducing amendments, by means of private Bills. I am sure that if the amendments we desire were brought in by the Government, they would be carried through this House by three-fourths of a majority, so that the Government would run no risk whatever, in introducing such legislation. But, if the hon. the Ministers are not true temperance men, if they look mainly to political influences, we can understand that they should try to play into the hands of the two parties, those opposed to and those in favor of temperance. If the Government desire that the cause of temperance should improve, let them bring in the amendments, and they will be supported by every temperance organisation in the country; they will be supported by the Dominion Alliance, and by every hon. member who professes temperance principles, and they will undoubtedly be supported by the great majority of the Canadian people. For these reasons I believe that any amendment to the Scott Act should be made as a Government measure, and I could not let this occasion pass without expressing my approval of the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. FREEMAN. The temperance people of this country will be greatly encouraged by what has passed here within the last hour. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), as he has stated, intends bringing in a Bill to amend the Scott Act. That proceeding was decided upon in the meeting of the Alliance a short time ago, and I remember distinctly, as I took some part in the proceedings, that fears were expressed that a Bill to amend the Act might not find favor in this House, and those fears were based upon the votes taken here last Session. Now, Sir, when the gentlemen who are popularly or generally supposed to be not advocates of the temperance cause or not supporters of it, gentlemen who are generally taken by the public as opponents to prohibition—when they come forward so suddenly, as the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and his friends have, on this occasion, to advocate amendments to the Scott Act by the Government, I cannot doubt but that there has been a great reformation in these hon. gentlemen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would remind the hon. gentleman that I was a member of the Government which put that Act on the Statute-book.

Mr. FREEMAN. If I have intimated that the hon. member for Bothwell is not a friend of temperance, and he wishes to say that he is—for I could not hear what he said—I beg his pardon fully, and trust he will forgive me, but I must draw the conclusion that if he is a friend of temperance reformation, if he is a friend of prohibition, he carries his leaders with him in this matter. I must assume that the leaders of the party, of which he is a very prominent member, are certainly with him in this matter, and the application of my observations will be to them if not to him. As an advocate of prohibition, as a member of a temperance society for some 30 years, and having observed the drift of opinion on this temperance question during that time, indeed, for years before, I have been led to regret that, within the last few years, at all events, there has been a tendency to introduce politics into this temperance question; and I have frequently, at meetings of the friends of temperance, expressed the opinion that, however guarded gentlemen may be in their expressions with regard to this temperance cause, this political animus, this political feeling is continually sticking out, if you will allow me the expression. I regret exceedingly whenever I see this to be the case, for, as a friend of temperance, as an earnest, and, I believe, honest supporter of prohibition, I feel that if ever we are to carry prohibition in this country, we must carry it independent of politics, and I regret exceedingly whenever I see any introduction of this element into the question. If the hon. gentlemen opposite are honest, as I presume they are, and if, as I presume he does, the hon. member for Bothwell carries his friends with him, if the Opposition party in this House are prepared to support their leader or one of their leaders, there will be no trouble carrying the Bill which the hon. member for Lanark intends to introduce. I feel satisfied the hon. gentlemen opposite will set a good example to the hon. gentlemen on this side who did not support us last Session. There are a number of hon. gentlemen on this side, whom I would have gladly seen voting with us on this question, who voted against us last Session, and I feel satisfied that if the hon. gentlemen opposite are sincere in the statement that the leader of the Government would carry three-fourths of this House with him in a measure such as has been proposed, and that statement is well grounded, then I must conclude that the leaders of the Opposition would carry a like proportion of their followers for such a measure. If the leader of the Government has such influence with this House, certainly the leaders of the Opposition have great influence, and I feel satisfied, if they vote in a body, we shall have no trouble in carrying those amendments which are necessary to the proper carrying out of the Act. Another point I wish to make is this: The prohibitionists feel that the legislation of the country should be in the hands of the friends of prohibition, the tried friends of prohibition, the men who in years past when it was not so fashionable and not so favorably received as now, fought the battle of temperance and prohibition; they feel that at this time of day there is no excuse for leaving the carrying forward of this work in the hands of lukewarm men, who may be perhaps their enemies, and they, therefore, feel that legislation in this matter should be directed by the friends of temperance in this House, and I feel sure that hon. gentlemen opposite will quietly acquiesce in the work that has been laid out by the Dominion Alliance, and that, if they are honest in this matter, they will say to my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson): Bring in your measure and we will support you; we will not press the leader of the Government to take this work upon himself; bring in your Bill and we will support you and support the amendments which you propose. That is the course which the Opposition should take in this matter, and I think they ought not to press the matter where we do not want it pressed.

Mr. SCRIVER. Like my hon. friend from Lanark, I had the pleasure of being present a short time ago at the meeting of the Dominion Alliance. I noticed what passed there, and I do not agree with him in saying that the action taken by that body is at all inconsistent with the motion presented to the House now by my hon. friend (Mr. Mills). I suppose the resolution to which my hon. friend (Mr. Jamieson) refers was one approving of an early presentation to this House of legislation in amendment to the Scott Act, and also a motion favoring the presentation of a resolution similar to the one my hon. friend brought before the House last year in favor of prohibition; but I feel quite confident that, if my hon. friend or any other member of the Dominion Alliance had brought forward a motion to-day asking that the Government should bring in legislation in amendment of the Scott Act, that motion would have been carried unanimously—I will not say enthusiastically, because, from our knowledge of the past, I think no one would have felt confident that it would have had any effect. But I would remind my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) that, two or three years ago, that body did pass a resolution instructing or requesting the members of the temperance party in this House to ask the Government to introduce legislation in amendment of the Scott Act, and I would further remind my hon. friend that several members of the House, who, like himself, were active and consistent temperance men, did wait upon the Government and did urge them to bring forward such measures as the temperance members of the House and the members of the Dominion Alliance thought necessary to make the Scott Act effective. My hon. friend knows very well what was the result of that mission. He knows that we were kept without an answer for some time, and that at last we were given to understand that the Government did not propose to interfere in the matter. I have not been a member of this House for the many long years during which I have enjoyed that honor, without knowing that it is next to impossible for a private member, however earnest, however consistent and however eloquent he may be, to succeed in getting amendments made to an Act of this kind which is on the Statute-book. I have learned that, unless the Government introduce desired amendments to Government measures, it is difficult and almost impossible to get amendments passed. And we know very well—those of us who have been members of this House for some years past—what result has always attended the efforts which have been made by my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) and others to get amendments made to the Scott Act. We know that those attempts have resulted in defeat in every instance. I think I may claim from those who have sat with me in the House for many long years past, that I am not assuming too much in claiming that, upon the whole, my political conduct has been characterised by candor and by honesty, and therefore, when I make the declaration which I do, that it is my honest and firm opinion that the amendments which my hon. friend indicates he is going to introduce at a later stage cannot be carried without the intervention of the Government, and without his Bill being made a Government measure, I think my hon. friends will believe that I am honest in the statement I make.

Mr. FISHER. Unfortunately, I was not in the House at the time when my hon. friend made the motion which is under discussion at this moment. Unfortunately, also, in consequence of a sad duty which I had to perform last evening, I was not able to be present at the discussion in the Alliance council this forenoon, and, therefore, perhaps I am not in the same position as that of my hon. friend from Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver) and my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), in discussing this question, but I venture to say that this is a question in which the best interests of the temperance people of this country are seriously involved, and that it is very important that this question should be discussed from all sides here when it is presented to us, it matters not by whom or at whose hands it comes before this House. As I understand the hon. member who sat down on the other side of the House a few moments ago, he said that if this was before the House in the way which he thought right, he would be prepared to support it and vote for it; and I understood from what he said that if it had been presented by hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches he would have supported it, but that as it was moved by an hon. member on this side of the House, who was a member of the Government when the Scott Act was made law by the Parliament of this country, he could not support it and could not endorse the resolution. If such a temper as that is displayed by the temperance people in this House, and the representatives of the temperance constituencies in this House, there is evidently an impossibility that party differences can be sunk, and that temperance legislation can be successfully carried through; but I was surprised, I must confess, to hear him say that he believed that temperance legislation in this House must necessarily and only be introduced by the temperance men, implying thereby that my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) was not justified in introducing legislation on this question. I do not know who is better qualified to introduce amendments to the Scott Act or to improve that measure than the members of the Government who forced that measure through Parliament at the time that it became law. We owe it to the Government of my hon. friend, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), that we have now in existence a local option law so perfect as the Scott Act, and if it was not then made quite as perfect as we would wish to see it now, it was because the experience which the promoters of that Bill had at that time was not so great as the experience of its working is to-day. We know that the temperance people throughout this country hailed the appearance of that Act with pleasure at that time, and that it met with the approval of all the advocates of temperance; but, in the course of years, difficulties have cropped out in the working of the Act, and no one knows that better than the members of the Government of the day, because, unfortunately, these difficulties have been laid before them from time to time, because the committees of the Alliance have, collectively and individually, explained to the Government what these difficulties are over and over again, and have asked the Government of the day to remove those difficulties; and the reply we have invariably received has been that they would not do it. When that has been the result of our efforts and the applications we have made to the Government, how are we to proceed and gain our object unless independent members of the House, who may not be connected, perhaps, with the temperance movement, take up that question? And I am glad to see that it is a leader of mine and a leader of the party to which I belong, who has seen that it is in the interests of the country at large that the Scott Act should be made perfect, and that the violations of that Act, which are bringing discredit, not upon the temperance people or the temperance sentiment of this country, but upon the administration of law and good order in this country, should be put an end to, and that we ought to have power to enforce this Act as it should be enforced. I am informed that, some time before I came into the House, the right hon. the leader of the Government intimated that there were no difficulties in the way of enforcing the Act, that he asked what were the imperfections which existed, and why he and his Government were asked to amend it. I can tell the right hon. gentleman very easily what are the difficulties in enforcing the Act; and I am glad to say that the Local Government of Ontario has stepped into the breach and is doing what it is his duty to do. The Local Government of the Province of Ontario has distinctly declared that they believed it is not their duty to do this work, but the Government of that Province, in the interest of the people of that Province, have stepped into the breach and are doing that work. Unfortunately, Sir, all the Provinces of the Dominion of Canada are not in that happy position; unfortunately, the Province of Quebec has not yet been able to induce its Local Government to do this work; unfortunately, until lately, the Province of Quebec has been in the hands of a Government who, when asked by the temperance people to enforce the Scott Act, replied to them: The Scott Act has prevented us from getting a revenue from licenses in your counties; and with that fact in view, we will not aid you to enforce the Scott Act. But as a different Government is in power in the Province of Quebec to-day, I trust that when the temperance people go to that Government for assistance to enforce the Act they will obtain it. Sir, I believe it to be the duty of this Government to enforce an Act which is on the Statute-book in consequence of their own action. I am not a lawyer, and I cannot pretend to discuss the constitutional question, but it seems to me to be in accord with common sense that when the Government pass an Act, it is their duty to enforce it. I believe that the temperance people of the country have a perfect right to demand that special facilities be given them for the enforcement of this Act which is, in its essence, a special law. The natural conclusion would be that this law should be enforced, just as other laws are, by the ordinary authorities of the land. In the first place this law is a particular and special one; it is slightly different from all other laws with which I am acquainted, in its bearing upon good government and order, and therefore we have a special claim upon the Government in asking that special facilities be given for enforcing this law. I contend that the facts of the case and statistics will bear me out in saying that wherever the Scott Act is in force to-day, the ordinary expenses of the county in connection with criminal prosecutions in that county are decreased in consequence of the operation of the Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Not so.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman says it is not so. I will refer him to the report of the Criminal Statistics of the Province of Ontario. I have not those Criminal Statistics in my hand at the moment; I hoped to have them before the debate on this question came up, so that I might be able to refer to them. But I can tell the hon. gentleman that persons who have seen them and studied them, declare that they prove conclusively that in Scott Act counties general crime and violations of the law, in proportion to the population, have decreased, and that in comparison with those parts of the Province which are not under the Scott Act, those statistics show a glorious exhibit in favor of the Act.

Mr. HAGGART. Crime has increased in my county.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman particularise, and as soon as I can get hold of these statistics, I shall make it a point to study them in relation to his own county. But, Sir, it is a well known fact, which has been publicly stated in many places, that in the county of Halton, for the last eleven sessions of the courts there, the judge has been presented with a pair of white gloves in celebration of the fact that there was no criminal case before him; and I do not believe that there is another county in the Dominion of Canada where a similar state of affairs exist. I know it will be said that the Scott Act was defeated there, and I am free to confess that I consider it a very serious blow to the progress of temperance in this county, although I do not believe that that result is due in any sense to a weakening of the temperance sentiment of Halton, but it is due rather to the fact that the temperance people have not organised themselves so as to be able to watch the voters' lists, and to bring their entire forces to bear in the same way as is done by the ordinary political organisations. But, taking the country as a whole, I believe it has been conclusively proved many a time on the floor of this House, by hon. gentlemen advocating total prohibition, that the result of prohibition wherever enforced, has been to reduce the ordinary criminal expense and to reduce the expense for the enforcement of criminal laws in general. That being the case, I believe we have a fair ground to ask that the Government of our country should make the necessary expenditure properly to enforce the temperance laws. Now, Sir, there is another very important point in connection with this question of the enforcement of the Scott Act. The right hon. leader of the Government, I understand, stated that there were no defects in the law which the Government could remedy. Well Sir, I must condemn the right hon. leader and his Government for not having, in the immediate past, assisted the friends of temperance in enforcing the Scott Act. Two years ago, a request was made that an Order in Council should be issued applying the fines in Scott Act counties in a particular way, a way which was pointed out by the temperance people through the Dominion Alliance. I, myself, was member of a deputation who waited upon the Minister of Justice, asking that the fines be applied in a particular way. Resolutions were passed at various meetings of the Alliance, which were laid before the Ministry, pointing out the way in which the application of the fines would best promote the interests of temperance. The Government replied by passing an Order in Council which did not at all accord with the resolutions of the Alliance, or with the wishes of the temperance people of the country. On the contrary, that Order in Council directly militated against the successful enforcement of the Act. Sir, we consider that the Government of the day, by that Order in Council, in a matter which was entirely under their own control, in which they had not to consult the representatives of the people, showed that they were not desirous of assisting the temperance people in enforcing this Act. I regret that was the case; I regret to find that the Government of the country to-day has shown by their acts that they do not desire to assist us. The result of that Order in Council has been to throw back the enforcement of local temperance laws entirely into the arena of municipal contests and municipal governments. One of the great advantages which we believed we had gained by the Scott Act was that, by its provisions, the enforcement of those laws was withdrawn from the arena of municipal politics and relegated to the general Government. I believe that was a wise provision of the Act. I believe it was important to the successful carrying out of the wishes of the people in reference to that Act, and I regret that this action of the Government, in passing that Order in Council, has thrown back once more the question of the fines and penalties, and, incidentally, the whole question of the enforcement of the law, into the arena of municipal politics, which fact I consider to be a very serious obstacle to the proper enforcement of the Act. In consequence of the fact that I was not present in the early part of this debate I may have said something that has been already stated. Unfortunately, I am not prepared to speak at great length on this question, but I feel confident that the resolution now before the House is in the true interests of the temperance legislation of this country, and that it is absolutely necessary, if the Act is to be enforced throughout the length and breadth of the land and carried out in a uniform manner, that its enforcement should be entrusted to the Dominion House and the Dominion Government. It is important that the enforcement of the Scott Act, which is a Dominion law, should be under the control of the Dominion Parliament, which is empowered to amend that law. It is important that the regulations regarding the enforcement of the Act should be uniform all over the Dominion, because it would seriously impede the work of the temperance people if they were obliged to work under different regulations, laws and arrangements in Ontario and Quebec, and again in the Maritime Provinces. To-day the Provincial Government of Ontario is doing this work; to-day, I understand, the Provincial Governments in Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island are assisting in this work, each doing it in their own way and each doing it according to their own light; but it is in the true interests of temperance that the work should be done on one line, in one manner from one end of the country to the other, and it should be done by an authority which is amenable to the power of the House which passed the law. Believing this to be the case, I have great pleasure in thoroughly endorsing the motion before the House, and will certainly support it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I do not desire to occupy much of the time of the House in discussing a matter of this kind. If we find there is friction in the working of the Scott Act, if we find that any of the machinery is deficient when we come to put the Act in force, I consider it is the bounden duty of the Government to come to the rescue, and so amend the Act as to make it efficient. The question then arises whether the machinery provided for working the Act is efficient, and is such as it ought to be, and by the vote of the House in previous Sessions it has been shown that there is a feeling that the machinery is not ample for the efficient working of the Act. True, it is said that the Act is complete in all its parts, that there is machinery whereby it can be enforced; but we find that hon. gentlemen opposite complain that the Act is not satisfactorily enforced in the various counties where it has been carried. That being so, I repeat that it is the duty of the Government to come to the aid of the advocates of the Act, and so amend it that it may be enforced. It is very true that some of the hon. gentlemen opposite say that this is not just the proper time to bring a measure of this kind forward, that they would be inclined to support it if it came at the proper time and in the proper way. Sir, am I to understand they consider the opportuneness of a motion of this kind of more importance than the principles of temperance? Am I to understand that they ignore the principles of temperance in consideration of advantages to be gained to their own party? Am I to understand that the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman) could so forget the principles of temperance that he could totally ignore them if a motion was made on this side of the House with a view to amending the Scott Act? That is what he stated to the House. Again, we find the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) stating that the Dominion Alliance is not in accord with the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I certainly think that the Dominion Alliance is sincere in the welfare and success of temperance. I believe they feel it is the duty of the Government, and not of any private individual, so to amend the Act that it will meet with the approbation of the people of the country; and, feeling that this is the duty of the Government, this is a proper motion, and all those who feel anxious for the success of temperance, and for the efficient working of the Scott Act, will record their votes in favor of the motion presented by the hon. member for Bothwell. The hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) also stated that the number of crimes committed in his county had increased since the passage of the Scott Act. Such, I think, is not the report of the Inspector of Prisons for Ontario; in fact, I find, on looking at the report, that it presents quite a different statement in regard to the hon. gentleman's own county. The Ontario prisons report shows this: In the counties of Durham and Northumberland, Elgin (including the city of St. Thomas), Kent, Lambton, Lanark, Lennox and Addington, Leeds and Grenville, Ontario, Peterborough, Victoria and Wellington (including the city of Guelph), there were in 1885, under license, 399 commitments for drunkenness, and in the next year, with only five months of Scott Act, the number fell to 200—nearly one-half. The statement made by the hon. gentleman is, therefore, not supported by the report of the Inspector of Prisons, and although I am not inclined to discuss the relative merits of success following the Act in the various counties in the Province, I think statistics will show a diminution of commitments wherever the Scott Act has been put in force, even in an inefficient manner. Believing that to be the case, and believing, as I do believe, and as I have before stated, that if the Act cannot be efficiently enforced it should be amended, and the House having by an overwhelming majority expressed its views that it was not in the interests of temperance that a private individual should have charge of the legislation affecting such an important subject as the Scott Act, I consider it is the bounden duty of the Government to take charge of this measure, and holding that opinion, I shall with great pleasure vote for the motion of the hon. member for Bothwell.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I only wish to say a few words upon this question. It will be borne in mind by those hon. gentlemen who seem to covertly, if not openly, find fault with the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) in introducing his resolution, that he has held the views to which he has given expression in his resolution for some time. I think it will be in the memory of members of this House that last Session, at all events, he spoke in the same direction and very strongly, as he has done to-day, though he did not follow up his speech with a motion. If I am not mistaken, in the preceding Session, he spoke in the same manner. I think the hon. members may judge from that as to his sincerity in the motion which he offers. It cannot be termed a new motion that he has just devised and sprung upon the House, because hon. members must know that he has pressed this view upon the House on previous occasions. Now, Sir, with reference to the duty of the Government in this matter. It appears to me that it is one of the laws of the land, one of the statutes. The Government, I suppose, view it as a law that ought to remain on the Statute-book, and that being the case, as has been said by previous speakers, the question arises, is it a law that requires amendment at the hands of this Parliament or not? The right hon. gentleman, the First Minister, professed ignorance of any improvements that could be made, but I think that he ought to remember the fact that this House—I am not sure whether it was this House or the preceding House—passed upon that question, as the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has told us, by a large majority, declaring that amendments were requisite to make the Act efficient, and also embodying the necessary amendments in the Bill which passed this House, but which, as he tells us, did not succeed in passing in another place. We have then the authority of the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) we have also the authority of the majority of the members of the late Parliament if not of this, that the Act does require amendments, and if that be the case the proper course for the Government is to deal with it. Has the member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) initiated some novel procedure in this matter? Do not the Ministers themselves recognise the facts of the case that if the laws of the land which are on the Statute-book, are found to be inefficient whether by legal impediments in the proper enacting of them, do they not recognise and act upon the fact that it is their duty to make those laws efficient? Let me call your attention to what we are invited by the Government to do as legislators this Session. In the speech that was delivered from the Throne if you will take the trouble to read it, or without reading it you will remember, and every member of this House will also remember it, the only legislation we are asked to give any consideration or thought to is the amendment and perfection of measures that are upon the Statute book at the present time:

"The extension and development of our system of railways have not only rendered necessary additional safeguards for life and property, but have given greater frequency to questions in which the interests of rival companies are found to be in conflict, and to require authoritative adjustment. As further legislation appears to be needed for these purposes, a measure will be submitted to you for the consolidation and improvement of 'The Railway Act.'

"Experience having shown that amendments are required to make the provisions of the Act respecting Elections of the Members of the House of Commons more effective and more convenient in their operation, you will be asked to consider a measure for the amendment of the statute.

"The Act respecting Controverted Elections may likewise require attention, with a view to the removal of certain questions of interpretation which have arisen and which should be set at rest.

"My Government has availed itself of the opportunity afforded by the recess to consider the numerous suggestions which have been made for improving the details of the Act respecting the Electoral Franchise, and a measure will be submitted to you for the purpose of simplifying the law and greatly lessening the cost of its operation."

Now, Mr. Speaker, you will see that, as I said before, nearly all the legislation that we are asked by the Government to give our attention to this Session is in the direction of amending laws that are upon the Statute-book, with a view to their improvement. This amendment refers to the improving of a law in which is taken a deep interest by the vast majority of the people of this country. My hon. friend has pointed out the fact that private members have introduced legislation, and that they have not been successful in it. He pressed last year his motion with regard to this question. To-day he repeats his views. He affirms it by resolution, and he asks this House to concur with him that it is the duty of the Government, in view of the fact that this Act requires amendment, and, if they propose to let it remain on the Statute-book, to take measures to render it effective. The member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) cannot lose sight of the great advantage he would have in supporting this resolution in preference to pressing the Bill which he has introduced himself. He has told us that he succeeded in the House of Commons in carrying his amendments, that he succeeded in carrying the Bill embodying the amendments he thought were necessary, but that in another Chamber it failed. Has he any intimation from members in that other Chamber, that their views have changed in this direction; has he any reason to suppose that legislation initiated by him will succeed any better there this year than it has succeeded before? I would be glad to hear if he has any such information, but I do not think he will venture to say that he has. I will then ask him this: If he would object to laying the duty of bringing in those resolutions upon the Government? If the House lays such duty on the Government, I suppose the Government will undertake it. If my hon. friend lays the duty upon the Government of taking up the Bill and making it a Government measure, then it would prevail in that other place where it was not carried before. That is the way we have to look at this, and it is the only way that the question which has agitated the community so much can be successfully carried through. I do not see why the Government cannot take up this question and deal with it as they are taking up and dealing with many other amendments to the laws of the land during the present Session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have had one or two rather extraordinary statements in the course of this debate. We had first the statement from the First Minister that he is not aware that any amendments are called for, or necessary to the working of the Canada Temperance Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Those were the words as I took them down. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what he did say?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said the hon. gentleman, in moving the amendments, had not shown any objections in his speech.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of course we cannot expect the hon. the First Minister to take advice from this side of the House, or the advice of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), as to the amendments. The general principle is, whether it is the duty of the Government or not to amend an Act which has given rise to more expensive, teasing, and harassing legislation during the last ten years than all the other Acts on the Statute-book put together, I believe. The hon. the First Minister must know of this, and as my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. Fisher) has told us, he has been interviewed and deputed on the subject time and time again, and has had all kinds of suggestions made to him. It is strange, under those circumstances, that he does not know what amendments are wanted. Another declaration made by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman) was of a remarkable character. The hon. gentleman, when my friends here proposed to entrust the amendment of the Scott Act to the Government of Canada, declares that he, speaking on behalf of the Dominion Alliance, does not think it desirable to trust the amendment of that Act to a lukewarm and, perhaps, unfriendly body. I do not doubt the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Freeman) knows whereof he was speaking. He might have given us his reason; he might have told us in more detail why he would not entrust the administration of that Act to a lukewarm and unfriendly body, or entrust to them the proper amendment of the Canada Temperance Act.

I think the First Minister and his colleagues beside him, are precluded from taking the least exception to the impeachment of my hon. friend. I remember in 1877, I think it was, that those hon. gentlemen insisted on our taking up a question which was more a moral and a purely moral question than the amendment of the Act now on the Statute-book, because they wanted us to declare that it was the duty of the Government to act on the question of prohibition throughout this Dominion, and I think he will find, on the vote which took place on that occasion, the names of the First Minister, of the Minister of Finance, of the Minister of Public Works, of the Minister of Militia, and such others of their colleagues who happened to have seats in the House at that time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a mistake.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What you said just now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say that I recollect the motion made by Mr. Schultz, who was then a member of the House—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT,—that we should declare it, and I recollect that all the friends of the hon. member in this House pressed upon us very strongly the necessity of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the amendment was moved I am aware the motion was not voted on directly. But the hon. gentlemen did their best to insist upon our voting on it. That is quite true.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. The motion was made in amendment to Mr. Ross. The hon. gentleman will remember that it was stated the question was a matter of doubt as to jurisdiction, and therefore it was inexpedient to press it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know the motion quite well.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I voted for that amendment because I had the opinion then, although it has been overruled since, that we had the jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman gave countenance and support to Mr. Schultz's motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not in any way whatever.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The country will understand when they look at the vote and find the hon. gentleman and all his friends negating the motion of Mr. Ross, who was an advocate of temperance. They will understand quite well that the hon. gentleman then, as he said in the case of my hon. friend, for his own purpose wished to compel the Government of Canada to take up the question of prohibition. I think there will be no doubt outside of this House, whatever there may be inside of it, as to that. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman tells us that it is very difficult for them to understand what the temperance people want. Why, Sir, have they not got one of their own colleagues there expressly for the purpose of advising them what the temperance people want, or for the purpose, perhaps, of counteracting those other gentlemen who are not exactly supposed to represent the temperance interest? Now, Sir, I say there is one practical fact which every man within the sound of my voice knows quite well, and that is, as we have seen proved time and again on the floor of this House, that if these amendments, whatever they may be, which the friends of temperance say are necessary to make that Act workable, are to be got through both Houses of this Parliament, they will only be got through when the Government puts its hand to them and insists that they shall be carried. They will be got through then, and not before; and it is well that the temperance organisations throughout Canada should understand that thoroughly.

An hon. MEMBER. They do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope they do, and will remember it. Let me say in conclusion that there has been only one Government since Confederation that put an Act on the Statute-book which has really and substantially promoted the cause of temperance in Canada. Let me ask those who remember—and there are a good many in this House who do remember—whether at the time that question was under discussion, the Mackenzie Government did take charge of that Act and make it a Government measure. No temperance man, whatever his politics might be, whether he was a Conservative or a Reformer, had any doubt as to whether or not it was the duty of my hon. friend and his Government to do so. From one end of Canada to the other my hon. friend was deluged with remonstrances and petitions from temperance men, wholly irrespective of party, asking him to take charge of that Act and pass it; and now my hon. friend asks that hon. gentlemen opposite should follow in the line of my hon. friend and make that same Act more practical and workable. I ask, have the temperance organisations throughout Canada one line and one measure to apply to the Mackenzie Administration, and another line and another measure to apply to the Macdonald Administration? Let the temperance organisations answer as they see fit. I ask the temperance men in this House, on either side, to do as the temperance men did in 1877, and insist that the defects in this Act and the obstacles to its effective operation, which experience has shown to exist, shall be removed by the only power that can remove them, and that is the Government of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the vote is taken on this question I have a word or two to say. I think I might congratulate the temperance people of the Dominion on this new access of zeal which has been to-day demonstrated on the opposite side of the House in favor of the Canada Temperance Act generally. I hope this is not an evanescent feeling that will rapidly pass away, but that it has come to stay.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It came ten years ago as far as we are concerned.

Mr. FOSTER. Much has been said about the Canada Temperance Act having been put on the Statute-book by the Mackenzie Administration, and about the honor which is due to an Administration for having done so. So far as that is concerned, I am quite free to give it, and to let it rest there. This fact, however, remains, that that Administration did put a certain Act upon the Statute-book; that was the Canada Temperance Act about as it stands to-day. That Administration was a wise one in the opinion of its own friends; it had carefully and thoroughly studied the matter; no one who supported that Administration then, or who supports that party now, will deny that it understood the province of making law and the province of enforcing much of law just as well then as the country understands it now; and yet that Act was put on the Statute-book with the very defects in it that these hon. gentlemen to-day point out. And when that Act was put on the Statute-book there was not a single suggestion of the position that the Dominion Government as a Government was obliged to carry out that law in its entirety in the different Provinces. Some of my hon. friends say that it is the duty of the Dominion Government to carry out this law. Well, if they look back a little while, they will remember that when the law of 1883 was being passed, some of the temperance people, I think I myself was one of them, tried to get a clause placed in that Act which would make it imperative on the Dominion Government to carry out the law; we were successful in getting the Government to insert such a clause; and machinery as free from partisanship as was possible to be devised, was provided in that Act for the carrying out of the Canada Temperance Act. And yet from the very moment it was introduced into this House until the time when it was hounded out of existence by legal decisions, from the first moment to the last, there was not an hon. gentleman on that side of the House who did not howl against that clause as much as against any other clause of that Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No, they did not.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) says there ought to be a uniformity in the Canada Temperance Act. There ought to be, especially in a certain respect. An Act which is intended to be adopted by any municipality in the Dominion, ought to be interpreted in the same way by every municipality the wide Dominion through. There is one method by which this Act can be adopted, and that is the same for Ontario, for Quebec and for the Maritime Provinces. That is the uniformity that it possesses; but when that law is adopted, it is the duty of the Provinces to carry it out. And I can state to the hon. member for Bothwell that a lawyer equally as high as he, one as strong in his allegiance to the party opposite as he, and a man who stands before the country with less probability of political exigencies about him than the hon. member for Bothwell—that is, Mr. McLaren, a Q. C. of undoubted reputation—has made it his express duty to go with a deputation from the Dominion Alliance to Mr. Mowat, and has placed himself on record before that Government and the country at large, as being of opinion that it is not the duty of the Dominion Government, but the duty of the Provincial Government to enforce the law. Now, what has happened in the past? There has been one policy ever since I have had anything to do with temperance organisations in regard to legal temperance, it has been the policy to place it on a non-partisan basis. It has been the design, steadily observed from the very first, to carry on everything in the way of legal temperance, with the support of both parties, and without putting one party against the other. I think there is no gentleman in this House who will dispute that that has been the policy of the Alliance from the first hour of the Alliance's birth until to-day. It has been declared there: Do not let us put party against party, do not let us use this question as a football for parties to play with. Let us rather endeavor to gather the best sentiments of each party on this question and bind them together so as to get exactly what is needed. Is there any doubt that this has been the basis on which the Dominion Alliance has always acted? Take the resolutions of that body year after year. Take the action predicated upon them in this House by gentlemen on each side, fairly representing each party, as shown in the measures laid before Parliament which seemed to them best suited to carry out the object of the Alliance. That object has hitherto always had a leading place in every temperance measure brought before this House. But what do we find here to-day? We find an hon. gentleman, who has not, as far as I know, attended the meetings of the Alliance, who has not been very active in furthering the aim of that great temperance organisation; he has not been noted, as far as I am aware, for superabundance of temperance zeal, but we find that, without deigning to ask the opinion of the members of this House, who are strong supporters of the cause of temperance, as to what is the best plan to take, without having even consulted the two hon. members, the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) and the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), who stand as the mouthpiece of the Alliance, which is the mouthpiece of the best temperance sentiments of the country, without even taking them in his confidence, he proposes this measure in a way calculated to obtain for it the least support. On the motion of the Government to go into Supply, my hon. friend moves an amendment; he moves that that motion be defeated and his taken up in its place. In other words, he proposes that he shall dictate to the Government what business the House will consider. Well, if that is not a motion of want of confidence, my hon. friend knows well it is as near a motion of want of confidence as can be brought and is often treated as such. Is that the way to go steadily, calmly and earnestly to work to get the best expression of the temperance sentiment of the House? I say it is not. I say it is a transparent method to raise a political cry, and the hon. gentlemen who followed the hon. member for Bothwell argued, as from a brief, against the Government, thus showing that what the hon. gentleman intended by his amendment was an indictment of the Government and of the hon. gentlemen who follow the Government, and an endeavor to place them in the wrong in the country at large. I used to be frightened occasionally at that kind of pettifoggery, but I am not frightened any longer. I intend to do what I consider best in the matter, and will leave the country to judge of my action, as it has judged of my actions in the past. I am not afraid of my record. The hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher) tried to throw odium on the Government because of the Order in Council that they passed. The Ontario branch of the Alliance wished what? They wished to have the fines disposed of in a certain way. They put their petition before the Government; there were other petitions and representations before the Government on the same subject, and the Government, on considering the whole matter, passed an Order in Council which placed the fund on its proper basis. It is the county and it is the city that has to do with the law and that puts it in force. It is the county and the city which must bear the onus of carrying out the law. It is the municipality which alone has power to bring the law into and take it out of force. It is they who receive the funds which arise from the enforcement of the law, according to the Government's decision, and which are to be applied in order to carry out the law. That was the proper principle, and my hon. friends must be aware that although gentlemen in Ontario may have wanted that money to be placed in the hands of the Provincial Government, there were gentlemen, just as strong and good temperance men, in other Provinces, who did not want the money to go into the hands of the Provincial Legislatures, but to remain in the hands of the municipal authorities, who alone have full control over the operation of the law. Under all these circumstances, I intend to vote against the amendment of the hon. gentleman. When the Bill which is to be proposed, when the measure which is to be brought before the House as an outcome of the recognized sentiments of the country, is laid before us, you will find just where I stand upon it; but as to this amendment, brought in as it has been, contravening the policy of the temperance men of this country, the policy which they have followed for years past, and made with a motive apparent to any one who studies out its object, I shall oppose it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Whether the hon. gentleman had good grounds for charging that my hon. friend for Bothwell and those acting with him were prompted by a new access of zeal for temperance or not, is a question which can be fairly debated. I must say that since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, I have always seen my hon. friend moving, speaking, and working in the one direction as regards temperance; but whether that charge can be brought against my hon. friend and his supporters or not, it is perfectly apparent that the charge cannot be made against the hon. Minister of Marine, that he has got any new zeal in the temperance cause.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not need any.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If any charge were made, it would be rather that he has fallen from his former position and become a backslider. Not many years ago I heard the hon. gentleman lecture the Government which he supported, and supporting the Opposition to which he was opposed on main political grounds, for not taking action in the temperance question, which, he said, was one so important that every individual member should make it the one prominent question and the test of his political allegiance. All other questions, he said, should sink into insignificance, and this moral temperance question was the one they should stand by. He was prepared to mould his political life on those principles, and to sink all other questions in order that he might promote the temperance cause. He contended then with great force and volubility that it was the duty of the Government to take steps to carry out the temperance legislation on the Statute-book, and that if they could not do so, they overlooked their duty. He spoke for hours in that strain, and cited authorities home and abroad, to prove that such was the duty of the Government; and when he was asked to accept a seat in the Government, it was his duty, if he believed in the principles he had taught for years, to say: yes, I agree with you on general principles, but unless you are prepared to accept the principles I lay down on this great moral question, which is above all others, I cannot join you. He did not do that, but he swallowed his temperance principles in order to take a seat on the Treasury benches. What does the hon. gentleman say to-day when a proposition is made laying down the principle that it is the duty of the Government to amend and carry out the law of the land? He says: I will not vote for that, because, forsooth, it might be construed into, or the Government might say it was, a vote of want of confidence. The hon. gentleman knows his leader has not said so. It is perfectly competent for the leader of the Government now, as leaders of Governments have done in times past, if he believes in the principles embodied in the resolution, to say that he accepts it. I remember reading, a few years ago, when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was leader of the Government, that on an amendment being made to the motion to go into Supply, that the House should take up instead the boundary question, the proposition was accepted by the then leader of the Government. He did not treat it as necessarily a vote of want of confidence, because it was moved as an amendment to going into Supply, but when the principle was one of which he approved, he accepted it. Therefore, the attempt made by the former temperance advocate, now the Minister of Marine, to move his followers to vote against this amendment, on the ground of its being a motion of want of confidence, falls to the ground. I wonder if he agrees in the reason I understood to be advanced by the leader of the Government, viz, that he was not aware this Act required amendment at all. The leader of the Government said he had been looking at the returns of those imprisoned and the fines collected under the Act, and he failed to see from any of these evidences there were any defects in the Act at all. If the hon. the Minister of Marine does not understand from that, that the Government will not amend the Act but are perfectly satisfied with it, then his understanding falls far short of what it used to be. What means the recommendations made, year after year, by the Alliance? Is it all a farce? Are they merely playing with the question when they come to the House year after year, and say that the great experiment connected with prohibition, contained in the Scott Act, has not been successful, because that Act is defective in certain respects? The Minister of Marine says, you put that Act on the Statute-book with all its defects. The hon. gentleman knows full well that, when the Act was put there by the Government of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), it was put there as a tentative measure, he knows that at the time it embodied the best views and the best wishes of the temperance people of that day; he knows that it was fought by the opponents of the temperance cause from court to court, he knows that some courts held it to be unconstitutional and that it was years before the attempts made to set aside that Act in the courts of law were ended, because the law was declared by the Privy Council to be constitutional and right. Then, after that law was declared to be constitutional, the hon. gentleman's friends came into power. Its defects became apparent from year to year, and the Dominion Alliance, of which he has been a member, presented those defects to this House from time to time. He has seen private members struggling for years in the useless effort to try to amend those defects, and, sitting there as a supposed representative of the temperance people and as their supposed mouth-piece in the Government, he has been silent and has never pretended to say: We will settle this matter, we will amend these defects, we will put an end to this farce by the strong hand of the Government laying hold of these amendments and making them law. If the hon. gentleman was sincere in the statements he made some years ago in regard to the great importance of this matter, he would not have acted in this way; and he knows full well the course which ought to be followed when a junior member or any other member of a Government differs from his leaders on a matter of such importance. He is not prepared to take that course, but he is willing to let the temperance legislation slide in the future as it has slid in the past; and I am afraid that the attempts, the abortive attempts, which the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) is making in this matter from year to year will fail, and, if they do fail, upon the Minister of Marine and upon those who have claimed to be the leaders of the temperance party in this House let the responsibility fall. I could not understand the leader of the House when he said that, because this is a great moral question, the Government should shirk its responsibility in relation to it. Have not the Government a right to deal with great moral questions? Why, if there was anything which the Minister of Marine threshed out in this House, it was the contention that, because this was a moral question, the Government were bound to take it up. Because it was a moral question, because great moral truths were involved, the party which alone had the power to carry it into effect, was the party to take hold of it. The hon. gentleman has fallen from grace. He says now that he will not be a party to what he calls pettifoggery legislation. In the first place, coming from a member of the Government especially, that was unparliamentary language, and he should have withdrawn it; but I want to know on what ground he dares to charge that the hon. member who moved this amendment was not sincere. Was he not one of those who were advisers of His Excellency as members of the Government, who put this law on the Statute-book, and has he not spoken here every year in favor of every amendment which has been proposed to improve that Act? Has there been any occasion on which he has not recorded his vote in favor of what are popularly called temperance measures, and in the face of all that, the hon. gentleman who has turned his coat says, I will not follow you, because I do not believe your motives are right. Why, Mr. Speaker, he is the last man in this House who should talk about motives. He is one who was once the apostle of temperance, and now is—I was going to say, if it were parliamentary to do so—its apostate.

Mr. HAGGART. It is not my intention to discuss whether it is expedient to introduce amendments to the Scott Act.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Act or not. I interrupted the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), when he said that crime had not increased in Scott Act counties, and that figures would prove it. I said it was not so, that I knew that crime had increased in the county I represent. I understand that, when I was absent, the member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson) quoted statistics to show that crime had not increased in the county of Lanark. I was not here at the time, and, of course, did not hear his remarks, but I state plainly and openly that it is known to my constituency, and known to that section of the country, that crime has increased. I do not know what the returns are under the Criminal Statistics Act, but I do know that the gaol of the town in which I live is full. I know that trials before the magistrate have increased to an extent never before known in the constituency; I know that trials are continuously taking place from week to week; I know that parties are brought up, some of whom are convicted and some not, for infringements of the Scott Act; but what I state openly is that crimes of other kinds, offences against morality, and against the law, and against everything that is good in the community—perjury, divisions amongst people who ought to be friendly—are greatly on the increase. I consider the present time inexpedient for the discussion of the question whether it is proper that amendments should be made to the Scott Act or not, or whether it is necessary that a prohibitory law should be enforced or not. My hon. friend the member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) intends to introduce a Bill to make the Scott Act more effective if possible, and I shall take an opportunity, when that comes up, to speak as to the expediency of a prohibitory liquor law, and as to whether the Scott Act, as now in force, tends to the morality of the community, or is better for the community in which it is in force.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Mills (Bothwell):

Amendment negatived.

Mr. JONCAS. The hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) has not voted.

Mr. Fiset. I paired with the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Grandbois).

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I only propose to take a single vote, after which the Committee will rise, as I believe it is not intended that the House should meet to-night.

Governor General's Secretary's Office..... $9,750

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a little increase here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are four statutory increases.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the Minister of Finance whether he proposes to pursue the same practice that we have heretofore pursued, that is to say, to take the separate estimates up in due rotation, unless he gives notice the day before that he intends to depart from it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; the practice of last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it is understood that we take them up in rotation, and if for any reason you want to change, you will give us notice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 7th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honor to inform the House that I have received notification of a vacancy in the representation of the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Hastings, by the decease of Alexander Robertson, Esq., and I have issued my warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 25) to confirm the charter of incorporation of the Great North-West Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Daly.)

Bill (No. 26) to confirm a certain Agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Canada Southern Railway Company, and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company, and a certain Agreement made between the London and South-Eastern Railway Company and the Canada Southern Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

HORSE BREEDING IN CANADA.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the pamphlet intitled "Horse Breeding in Canada," has been translated into French, printed and distributed in like numerical proportion with the English edition to members of this House who take an interest in the subject. If not, is it the intention of the Government to cause the same to be so distributed, and when?

Mr. CARLING. The pamphlet entitled "Horse Breeding in Canada," has been translated, and I expect it will be distributed to members in a few days.

MILITARY BOOKS.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to publish a French edition of the following official books:—1. The Field exercises now in force; 2. The Musketry instructions now in force; 3. The Regulations and Orders for the Militia of Canada, 1857. And when shall such French editions be published and distributed for the use of the Force?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Translation). The printing of the French translation of the drill hand-book, School, and the by-laws and orders for the use of the Canada militia, was begun in 1881. Owing to a misunderstanding between the translator and the Department, it was discontinued for a time. Since then a new edition of these works has appeared in England, and the Department has made arrangements to have a translation done in the course of the present year.

WATER FOR THE QUEBEC DRILL SHED.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to supply the drill shed at Quebec with the water necessary for the use of officers and men and for the improvement of the ground which serves as a paving; and will this water be supplied in time to enable the several volunteer corps to perform the yearly drill which they are now empowered to make?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Translation). The intention of the Government is to supply the drill shed with the water necessary for the use of officers and men and for the improvement of the ground which serves as paving. But as the Government have not yet determined on the establishment of a corps of marines, their yearly drill cannot be held in those waters.

VETERANS OF 1837.

Mr. PURCELL asked, Whether the Government have reconsidered their objections to granting pensions to the veterans who served the Crown in 1837, and whether they intend to make provision therefor in the Estimates for the present Session?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It is not the intention of the Government to make provision in the Estimates for the veterans who served the Crown in 1837.

POST OFFICE AT EIGHT ISLAND LAKE, N.S.

Mr. KIRK asked, Has a post office been established at Eight Island Lake, in the county of Guysborough, N.S., agreeably to the request of the people of that district? If not, is it the intention of the Government to establish one? If so, when?

Mr. MoLELAN. Instructions have been given to establish that office.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY SECTIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the total amount claimed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for work done, or required to be done by them on the several sections of the Canadian Pacific Railway constructed by Government in British Columbia, in order to bring the road up to the proper standard alleged to have been agreed on?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the absence of the Minister of Railways, I may say that no amount was suggested.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In that claim

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No.

THE COLLECTION OF CRIMINAL LAWS.

Mr. RINFRET (for Mr. CHOQUETTE) asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to furnish to members of this House who make application therefor, the collection of Criminal Laws?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is the intention that the volume in question shall be distributed in the way the statutes have ordinarily been distributed.

TIGNISH AND MIMINEGASH BREAKWATERS, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is the Government aware of the amount of damages done to the Tignish and Miminegash Breakwaters, in Prince Edward Island, by the storms in the fall of 1887?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

STEAM COMMUNICATION WITH P. E. I.

Mr. PERRY asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to place a sum in the Estimates to meet the sum of $5,000,000, or any part thereof, as compensation to Prince Edward Island, for non-fulfilment of the Terms of Confederation on the part of the Government of Canada, with respect to continuous efficient steam communication with the mainland, as asked for in a Joint Address of both branches of the Legislature of Prince Edward Island, during the Session of 1884?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention of the Government.

ST. JOHN HARBOR.

Mr. ELLIS asked, Has Mr. H. F. Perley, of the Public Works Department, who was sent to St. John early in 1887 to confer with the Board of Trade of that city as to certain suggested improvements in the harbor there and along the harbor front, made a formal report upon the improvements proposed and upon the conferences which he held with the parties interested?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Mr. Perley has not yet been in a position to make a formal report.

DUTIES ON LOGS.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What amount of duty has been collected during the past year up to 1st January last, upon pine and spruce logs, shingle bolts, cedar and pine, and cedar logs, in the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec and New Brunswick respectively?

Mr. BOWELL. The amount of duties collected and the articles embraced in the question of the hon. member for St. John are as follows: From Ontario, pine logs, $10,643.82; spruce logs, $3; shingle bolts, $88.50. From Quebec there was no export duty collected on pine logs; on spruce logs, $18,397.88; no duty upon shingle bolts. New Brunswick, no duty on pine logs; $8 on spruce logs, and $272 on shingle bolts. There was no duty collected on cedar logs.

THE LOBSTER INDUSTRY.

Mr. FLYNN moved for:

Report or reports of the Commissioners, or any member thereof, appointed to enquire into the condition of the lobster industry of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. FOSTER. The documents asked for by this motion are already printed and are being bound. They will be laid on the Table of the House in a few days. Under the circumstances the hon. gentleman might as well withdraw his motion.

Mr. FLYNN. In view of this statement, I consent.

Mr. KIRK. I hope, however, there will be no delay in laying those reports on the Table. This matter is of vital importance to many thousands of people in the Maritime Provinces, and they are very anxious to know upon what grounds and upon what reasons the Government have acted for restricting the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces—a large proportion of whom are engaged in the lobster fishery industry—to two months or six weeks in order to enable them to procure food for the whole year. For that reason I sincerely hope we will not be left without those reports for any length of time.

Mr. FOSTER. No doubt the speech of the hon. gentleman will facilitate the bringing down of those reports much more speedily than would otherwise be the case.

Motion withdrawn.

COMMERCIAL INTERCOURSE WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In accordance with the understanding arrived at yesterday across the floor regarding this resolution (on largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse between the Dominion of Canada and the United States), I move that this resolution, which was the First Order of the Day for to-day, be made the First Order for Wednesday, the 14th instant, after Questions. I think that will bring it up in due form.

Motion agreed to.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message, as follows:—

LAWDOWN.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons, a copy of the Fishery Treaty between Great Britain and the United States, in relation to the Fisheries of Canada and Newfoundland, signed at Washington, on the fifteenth day of February, 1888; and the Protocols of the various conferences, together with the Protocols from the British plenipotentiaries offering to make a temporary arrangement for a period not exceeding two years in order to afford a modus vivendi pending the ratification of the Treaty, and the protocol of the American plenipotentiaries expressing their satisfaction with the modus vivendi communicated by the British plenipotentiaries.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 5th March, 1888.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to inform the House that I have obtained from Sir Lionel West and from Mr. Bayard their consent to lay upon the Table of the House the proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries, and the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries to those proposals, in regard to greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the two countries. These are now being printed and will be placed immediately in the hands of every member. I may, perhaps, be permitted to read this proposal and the answer. The following is the proposal from the British plenipotentiaries:

"That with the view of removing all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, it is proposed by Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries that the fishermen of both countries shall have all the privileges enjoyed during the existence of the Fishery Articles of the Treaty of Washington, in consideration of a mutual arrangement providing for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland."

The answer to that proposal is in the following terms:—

"While continuing their proposal heretofore submitted—on the 30th ultimo,—and fully sharing the desire of Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries to remove all causes of difference in connection with the fisheries, the American plenipotentiaries are constrained, after careful consideration, to decline to ask from the President authority requisite to consider the proposal conveyed to them on the 3rd instant, as a means to the desired end,—because the greater freedom of commercial intercourse so proposed would necessitate an adjustment of the present tariff of the United States by Congressional action, which adjustment the American plenipotentiaries consider to be manifestly impracticable of accomplishment through the medium of a treaty under the circumstances now existing.

"Nor could the American plenipotentiaries admit that such a mutual arrangement as is proposed by Her Britannic Majesty's plenipotentiaries could be accepted as constituting a suitable basis of negotiation concerning the rights and privileges claimed for American fishing vessels. It still appears to the American plenipotentiaries to be possible to find an adjustment of differences by agreeing on an interpretation or modification of the Treaty of 1818, which will be honorable to both parties and remove the present causes of complaint, to which end they are now—as they have been from the beginning of this conference—ready to devote themselves."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. May I enquire of the Minister of Finance whether those comprise all the papers and details that he is able to bring down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These papers comprise everything regarding the trade relations between the two countries, or regarding any proposal of the nature of a reciprocal or tariff arrangement; and they comprise all the papers which it is in my power to lay on the Table of the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman, the other day, spoke of a lengthy argument which he submitted to the Commission in support of the proposition laid before them, and he said he hoped to be able to lay that argument before the House together with the proposition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman did, I understood him to say, present a lengthy argument in support of the proposition. He certainly said that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; what I stated to the House was that it was a question whether the protocols should contain the proposals and counter-proposals, or the proposals and the replies of the other side, and, in addition, the lengthy arguments on various points that were submitted to the conference. I had always supposed that even a formal protocol would contain the proposals and counter-proposals, but it was a question whether those papers which were submitted by both sides, embodying lengthy arguments on various questions, would also form part of it. But I did not state that I expected to lay those papers on the Table, because it had been decided after I left Washington that the papers should include merely the formal protocols, which were considered by the American and British Plenipotentiaries still remaining in Washington to be simply the dates of meeting and adjournment, contrary to what I understood the formal protocols would contain. I assumed that they would contain, at all events, the proposals and the answers of both sides.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume that in addition to that written protocol, some considerable discussion must have arisen between the hon. commissioner and the gentlemen representing the American interests on that occasion; and it would be very satisfactory—because these protocols contain practically very little—if the hon. commissioner felt himself at liberty to inform the House what he meant by those trade relations—whether he meant trade in natural products or whether he included certain classes of manufactured articles. That is a point which, if he is at liberty to tell it, I would very much like to be informed upon, in view of the discussion which is to come up on Wednesday next. Of course I do not wish him to say or do anything that will embarrass the fishery question, but I think the country would very much like to know whether, in the proposition the hon. gentleman made, there was anything more than is described in general terms in the papers as a mutual arrangement for promoting greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the United States and Canada. That, of course, is a very vague expression; it may mean a great deal or it may mean very little; and if he is at liberty to tell us the exact details of what he proposed to cover by these terms, I think the country would feel relieved.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend will see, if he looks at those terms, that there is nothing vague about them. The proposal was a bald proposal to meet the settlement of the existing difficulties between the two countries by an arrangement for greater freedom of commercial intercourse between the two countries. That proposal was made in the most broad and general terms, and the hon. gentleman will see that it was then open to the United States plenipotentiaries to say, "Well, we will discuss that question with you; what greater freedom do you ask in order to remove those difficulties?" But we never reached the point as to the extent to which that freedom of commercial intercourse would go, because we were met by a categorical refusal on the part of the United States plenipotentiaries to entertain the question of trade arrangements at all, and for the reason, which they assigned, that both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, in Congress, had determined that they would not permit any treaty arrangement with any other country which should interfere with the uncontrolled power of Congress to deal from day to day with the tariff. So that my hon. friend will see that instead of our putting any specific proposal before the United States commissioners, we placed the question before them in the broadest terms, so that if they were willing to entertain it, however extended or however narrow, we could then discuss it. But we were met, as he will observe, by a categorical refusal on the part of the United States commissioners to entertain the question at all—not because they were indisposed to take up the question, but because it would be impracticable to deal with it in that way owing to the attitude of Congress. And the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), who asks whether there were lengthy discussions, will, I think, find the answer in the statement I have laid before the House, purporting to have been made by President Angell of Michigan University, one of the United States plenipotentiaries, in which he declared that a great deal of time was consumed by the determined efforts of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries to obtain reciprocal trade arrangements, and that the United States plenipotentiaries told them over and over again that it was utterly impossible for them to deal with the question in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL. The very statement which the hon. gentleman has made shows that what I have all along suspected is very likely to have been the case. He admits that President Angell made the statement that a very large amount of time had been taken up by the determined efforts of the Canadian commissioners to get a trade arrangement. I never had a doubt that the hon. gentleman would use every means at his disposal to induce the American commissioners to consent to it; but when he was met by the bald refusal at the outset to deal with it, on the ground that the commissioners had no power to deal with that question, but only the Congress of the United States, I cannot conceive how those continued negotiations and that pressure of arguments on the part of the hon. gentleman could have been kept up and maintained. That is the point. I value the abilities and efforts of my hon. friend opposite, very much more than he might suppose, by the bald statement he has laid before this House, and I fail to see how every effort could be used, because he could not be continually repeating what I call a very bald demand for a mutual arrangement for promoting greater freedom of commercial intercourse; and I cannot conceive that days and days would be taken up by a repetition of that bald statement. I could quite understand the hon. gentleman stating at considerable length and in detail the proposals that Canada was prepared to make. I do not want to embarrass the hon. gentleman, but I think it is due to this House and to the country that if such arguments were used, whether they are contained in the protocols or not, we should be informed whether the proposals were confined to natural productions, or whether they extended to the larger and more desirable arrangement of opening up reciprocal markets for the manufactures of both countries. That is what I want to get at if we can. I do not know that we will be able, as perhaps the hon. gentleman is not at liberty to tell us at this stage, but I would like to know what is the extent of these proposed trade arrangements, and what were the offers made. They may not be contained in the protocol; but if the hon. gentleman, in his capacity as commissioner, made specific offers, I should think we are entitled to know what these offers were.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman whetted our curiosity very much on Monday by referring to the minute statements of which he has spoken. In the first place, he said there were formal proposals and counter proposals made on both sides; and in the second place, there were elaborate arguments sustaining the views on both sides.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is no question now before the House and no discussion can go on.

Mr. CASEY. There is just as much question as there has been for the last few minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER. There has been simply explanations.

Mr. CASEY. I will then move that the House adjourn, and I make this motion simply for the purpose of reading what the hon. gentleman said on Monday in regard to this question. There were proposals in the rough, and there were formal proposals in which these rough proposals were, after some discussion, boiled down, and then there were elaborate papers and arguments, as the hon. gentleman has said, sustaining the views on both sides. After having been given this peep into the penetralia of the Commission Chamber, we are naturally curious to hear what these elaborate papers and arguments were, and whether they contain specific proposals or not. It is quite impossible to suppose that a discussion could have taken place without specific proposals having been submitted on either side; and before we can intelligently discuss the matter here, we ought to know what our representative proposed. I beg leave to withdraw the motion for the adjournment of the House.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Office of the Receiver General, Halifax. $10,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no specific reduction in this. The item is simply as large as was the expenditure.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Is not the work on the Halifax branch larger than on any other branch in the Dominion? I think the receipts and payments are very much larger in that branch, and the Assistant Receiver-General there is hardly paid as well for his services as those in other places. The hon. gentleman should remember that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No doubt that is true, but I have taken the same amount as that which was expended last year. It is not proposed to increase the amount.

Auditor and Assistant Receiver-General, Winnipeg. $3,800

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is a considerable increase.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At Winnipeg, owing to a readjustment of the salaries and the increased cost of management, a larger amount is required than was asked last year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I could not exactly catch what the hon. gentleman said as to the necessity for the increase, but I understood he said there was more work. In what way was there more work? There is not, I should suppose, any very large increase of business, and the salaries at Winnipeg were made large some years ago in consideration of the alleged additional expense of living.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think there was an additional officer required at Winnipeg.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does that come about? And who is the additional officer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will make a memorandum and give the hon. gentleman the information.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope we will be given the information when we next take up Supply, because it is not convenient to wait for concurrence, in view of the way in which concurrence is generally rushed through.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; I will give it at the next sitting.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has set a very excellent example in bringing down his Estimates earlier than any of his predecessors did—as early, I believe, as I did myself. I hope he will also follow my example by giving a reasonable time for the consideration of the items in concurrence. I do not think that our habit, which has prevailed for some years back, of rushing through concurrence, sometimes at a single sitting, is either decorous in itself or right for the House to indulge in, and I trust that the hon. Minister will make a note of that. I understand that, when next we go into Supply, he will give the information with reference to this particular item?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On that understanding, I will let it go. I see that in the country savings banks in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and British Columbia, you are making a reduction of $1,000. Are any of these offices shut up?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are transferring, as far as we have the opportunity, the savings banks under the control of the Finance Department, to the Post Office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that the Minister intends to completely abrogate the savings banks under the control of the Finance Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. As far as we find it practicable. Of course, in some cases, it is not practicable.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How far does the hon. gentleman think that can be done?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are some cases in which it cannot be done. In some cases a postmaster may be a very good postmaster, but he may not be adapted for the management of a savings bank. As far as it is practicable, it is our policy to dispense with savings banks in connection with the Finance Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I dare say that will work well. At all events, it will be better to have these under one head. About how much has the hon. gentleman in the country savings banks, apart from the amount at the credit of the Receiver General?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We agreed to make some alterations and restrictions in regard to deposits in the Dominion savings banks, and whether that has effected it or not, I do not know, but there has been a decrease. We have received $724,583.35 less from the 1st July to the 29th February, than in the corresponding period of the previous year. There is an increase in the receipts of the Post Office savings banks in that period amounting to $539,331.14, leaving a net decrease of $185,252.21 in that period.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the Minister of Finance what percentage of the moneys received in the saving banks in these Provinces is taken to pay these charges. I see that he is asking for $18,000 to pay the cost of management in these three Provinces. What is the amount of money received in the saving banks in these Provinces?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman can hardly expect me to answer that question across the floor, but the Public Accounts will give the information.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The sum is very considerable, and I think the hon. gentleman should give the information to the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If I had known that any question of the kind would have been asked, I would have been ready to give the information.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to have some information in reference to the commission on the payment of interest on public debt.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will be glad to find that there is a decrease in that of $534.09. That arises from the fact that the commission on the interest payable in England has decreased with the diminution of our funded debt there.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is a commission which we pay to our agents there?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. To whom is it paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is paid to the financial agents.

Mr. MITCHELL. There are no other agents now, are there?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. Sir John Rose is not one, is he?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, he is not.

Mr. MITCHELL. Well, I am glad to hear that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Last year I asked the hon. gentleman as to what was intended to be done with that large amount of sinking fund which has accumulated under the old 5 per cent. loan, and he told me that the matter was under negotiation. As I understand, that is still in our books. We have not written it off on both sides of our account as yet?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman what he proposes to do about that, and whether the amount of interest on that continues to be reinvested in the purchase of our various securities?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is so up to the present time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister will remember that I expressed, across the House, the opinion which in former times, I expressed to the agents, that I thought that sum ought to be completely written off, and our sinking fund diminished to that extent. It is not a profitable employment of our funds, and has the effect of raising the prices of our own bonds when this large sum is devoted to the purchase of our own securities. As I understand, we have the option of purchasing any securities under par.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are obliged to purchase our own securities unless they are above par. The obligation to purchase our own securities ceases when they are above par. That is the present arrangement.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What, then, becomes of the money?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Either we must go on and invest in our own securities, which is a very unprofitable business at present when they are at the high premium they are, or the Government would have to become speculators in stocks, neither of which course is desirable; but if the hon. gentleman will defer that question, I propose to raise it in my financial statement, when I will discuss it fully.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By the way, I presume there has been some correspondence on the subject with our financial agent. Will the hon. gentleman be able to bring that down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will look at it and see how far it can be submitted. I think I will be able to state the result, at all events.

Printing of Dominion Notes..... $10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is rather an expensive item.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that the amount asked for in previous years has always been too small. In 1885-6, the expense was $61,503.71; in 1886-7 it was $37,556.58; so it will be seen a larger sum is absolutely necessary in order to cover the expense.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who does that printing at the present time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is done by the contractors, Burland & Co., I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman give me, or give the House, a statement showing about what quantity of notes of the several denominations will be obtained with this $40,000? The question, I may tell him, has been raised, and he probably has seen some discussion about it in the papers, as to whether Messrs. Burland & Co. have not been receiving a very much larger sum than the work could be done for by other parties who are supposed to be well qualified. That is a point upon which, perhaps, in another place, we may have some discussion; but, at any rate, the hon. gentleman can tell us, I suppose, about what quantity of notes, and in what denominations, an expense of $40,000 might represent.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I will get that information.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the contract is from year to year, or for a term of years?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a contract for a term of years.

Mr. DAVIES. When will that contract expire?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it has about four years to run; but I am speaking from memory.

Mr. DAVIES. Does it include this last year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was made previously, I think. They have had the contract for a long time. I think a new contract was entered into about two years ago; but I will get the information. I think it has something like four years more to run.

Office of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada ... $25,462 50

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that there are here ten statutory increases of $50, making $500; one at $25, and two at $30. We have effected a reduction of $1,050 in differences between the salaries of new and old appointments; and as there is an increase of $885, the net decrease is $165.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman, who is now Clerk of the Crown in Chancery? I understood that the gentleman who held that office had last year taken some other appointment, and that another party had been appointed. Is that so?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; Mr. St. Onge Chapeau.

Mr. MILLS. Is that the gentleman who was formerly in the Public Works Department?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS. I understood the hon. gentleman had dismissed him from the Public Works Department, for some reason. Was that dismissal founded upon some misapprehension? Was Mr. Chapeau not an offender, as the Government supposed? and what reasons had the Government, after having dismissed him from one office, for appointing him to another of still greater importance?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware he was dismissed.

Mr. MILLS. Well, Sir, there was a statement given to the public by the Government organs, if I remember rightly, by members of the Government themselves. I think the Finance Minister will be able to answer that question. I think, if I remember rightly, that there were certain charges made—that he had revealed tenders deposited with the Minister of Railways—that information which it was necessary should be kept secret, was disclosed, and was disclosed for a consideration; and that upon that information the Government had dismissed this individual. Is that so or not?
Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I answered that question already.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I said the gentleman was not dismissed.

Mr. MILLS. Then I understand the hon. gentleman is not dealing candidly with the House, for if that individual was not dismissed, did not the Government insist upon his tendering his resignation? Was he not given a choice between resigning and being dismissed by the Administration?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will give notice of that question, we will bring down the information.

Mr. MILLS. I think I am not called upon to give notice. We are discussing the public expenditure; we have a right to know how the Government are dealing with the funds of which they are the trustees on behalf of the country. We have a right to know whether the Government are entrusting important public functions to parties whom they themselves have besmirched; and if there has been wrong done them, I think the House is entitled to know what the wrong was. Certainly, I think I am entitled to ask for information on this subject. If there is one thing which concerns the representatives of the people in Parliament, I think it is the expenditure of the public money. Their control over the expenditure of the country is even more ancient than their control over the legislation of the country. This is the special function of those who represent the people, and we are entitled to know who the Government has appointed to office. We know that, last year, in this very office, they proposed to increase the salary of a man who disregarded the law, who disregarded his solemn obligations, and wronged at least eighty members on this side of the House. Now, we understand that another official has been appointed to whom the Government themselves gave the choice between resigning and being dismissed. I say that full information on that subject ought to be given to the House, and any member is entitled to ask for it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, Mr. Chairman, we must have a Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. He draws the same salary this year as he did last year. The hon. gentleman says that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, the present occupant of that office, was dismissed from another office. I say he was not dismissed; I say that he resigned. I say that afterwards he was appointed a sheriff of the North-West, and that Parliament has been voting him a salary—

Mr. MILLS. He was sent into exile.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—in the North-West, and that on the reorganisation of the administration of affairs in the North-West, he was legislated out of office, and was appointed Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If the hon. gentleman has any charges to bring against that official, I think he ought to give notice, and the matter should be discussed. We have no objection to discuss it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot agree with the doctrine laid down by the First Minister. No place is more fitting than Committee of Supply to discuss charges made against any man who is in the public service. It has always been done, it is the clear right of every member to do it, and I myself must say that, remembering what occurred with respect to this gentleman, I cannot but regard his appointment as a most unfortunate one. There can be no doubt whatever that his resignation, or his permission to resign I should say, or his dismissal was for an offence against those rules which ought to dominate the Civil Service, and was very great. Nor can there be anything calculated more to demoralise the Civil Service, more to degrade the Civil Service, I will add, than the sight of a man who is known to have deliberately disregarded the obligations which ought to bind every member of the Civil Service, being promoted to a high office, over the heads of men who have sustained an unspotted record for a great many years.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not at all disposed to object to the hon. gentleman bringing up the matter or speaking as he has just spoken, but I say in fairness to the officer that, after the remarks that have been made, the item should stand over; because that officer has rights, and we will regard those rights, and I am sure the hon. gentleman who has spoken will do so. We must in the meantime have a Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to issue writs, and he must have a salary.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I should like to know something more about this item. It was said at the time, that Mr. Chapleau was dismissed from the public service. If this was brought about by asking him to resign, I should like to know it. If after that had taken place, he was brought back and appointed to another office, we should know that also. Then I might ask, what has become of the late occupant of that office, Mr. Pope? Has he been dismissed, or, if not dismissed, has he been removed? It was considered by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House last year that his offence was sufficient to cause his removal from the office of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and to forever remove him from the service of the country. I believe it is the duty of the Government and of this House to see that the officials attend to their duties and perform them faithfully, and not waver either to the right or left, but that in such an event the Government will order that their services be dispensed with. A decision should be arrived at as to the position occupied by the House towards this office. It is a very important one, for the dignity and privileges of the House are to some extent placed in the hands of that officer, and it is therefore important to know if this officer has committed a grievous offence against the Civil Service of which he was a member, and if the offence was so grievous that the Government asked him to resign. We think, we are morally certain, that such was the case, and now without any penance being shown on his part, he is placed in another position to which large privileges belong; and we would be violating the obligation we took at the beginning of this Parliament if we allowed an officer to be reinstated against whom charges were made, and in reference to which nothing has been said to palliate or deny. We would like to know about this matter. We feel we have a duty to perform; and if the officer acted unworthily on one occasion, it is probable that if another occasion presents itself he will repeat the offence, and perhaps in a worse form than before.

Department of Justice $19,925

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In this department there are five statutory increases of $50 each, and an amount of $62.50 short estimated last year, which makes the amount $312.50, and there is a decrease in the messengers of $60, leaving a net increase of $252.50.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has there not been a change in the personnel?

Mr. THOMPSON. Within the last two or three weeks a new Deputy Minister has been appointed. That is the only change.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is the gentleman?

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Robert Sedgwick.

Mr. MITCHELL. One thing very flattering about this Department of Justice is, that when they want a really able and clever man they go to the Maritime Provinces for him. I am very pleased this course is followed, and I believe Mr. Sedgwick to be a very able and clever man.

Penitentiaries Branch $6,150

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is an increase of $400 to Mr. Moylan's salary, a statutory increase of $50, and a new messenger at $300; total increase, $750.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is rather a heavy increase to make. Does not Mr. Moylan receive allowances in addition to his salary?

Mr. THOMPSON. No allowances except the ordinary travelling expenses, which are not sufficient, considering the amount of travelling he has to do, to make any important addition to his salary. His duties, as the hon. gentleman knows, are very important, and he has direct supervision over a number of wardens who receive a salary nearly as high as we now propose to give him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see the hon. gentleman makes his salary as large as that of a deputy head.

Mr. THOMPSON. He stands in relation to this work in the position of a deputy head.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To my mind we are appointing too many deputy heads; and although I do not object to paying high officers well, I think as the matter stands the practical multiplication, which I take this to be, of deputy heads is likely to lead to some inconvenience. They will not stop content, they will all be clamoring for higher salaries. I think, too, looking over these Estimates, that it is tolerably apparent that we pay pretty high allowances, more than the work is worth, for a great deal of the purely clerical work done, and I would rather see purely clerical work paid at its market value and the higher officers better paid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is very apt to take one-half of our advice and not the other. He is very apt to make the increases, but forgets to decrease the expenditure at the other end.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a libel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may be a libel under the ancient law, that the greater the truth the greater the libel.

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot agree with my hon. friend that it is not in the public interest to appoint more deputy heads. When I had the honor of submitting a plan for the organisation of the Marine and Fisheries Department I recommended a deputy head for the Fisheries branch as well as for the Marine branch, but the proposal was pooh-poohed, and the department was considered too unimportant to have those officers. I am glad to find that, in these later days, the service has been remodelled in accordance with the report I then made. Moreover, when the right hon. First Minister was Minister of the Interior he created four different branches with four different deputy heads, some of whom were, I think, a little unnecessary, and the branches might have been a little amalgamated; but no doubt where there are different branches in one department, the performance of the duties of which is inconsistent with the performance of duties in another branch, it is desirable to separate the branches under a main head, and therefore I would not object to the increase to the deputy head.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know as a matter of fact that Mr. Inspector Moylan is very constantly away, and I fancy but little of his time is spent in Ottawa. I see in this branch now there is practically but two officers, an accountant and a third-class clerk. And the Minister of Justice proposes to attach a messenger. That seems rather a surplussage. They would hardly want a messenger for dancing attendance on two or three gentlemen all the time, one would think.

Mr. THOMPSON. Ever since I have had charge of the department and for some years before there were three messengers; two of them under the head of Department of Justice, and one of them was paid out of contingencies of the Penitentiary branch. Although this appears to be an increase it is not an actual increase either of the staff or expenditure. The messenger is not exclusively at the disposal of the officials of the Penitentiary branch, but the three messengers are at the disposal of the department for all messages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I don't observe any decrease in the items of contingencies for the Penitentiary branch, which was $2,250, for 1888, and is also $2,250 for 1889. It seems to me that if the hon. gentleman is taking $300 which was formerly paid out of contingencies, he ought to decrease the contingency by that sum.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. Minister says that some time before he took possession of the department there were three or four messengers.

Mr. THOMPSON. Three.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see there is only two in the Department of Justice, and one in the Penitentiary branch. He now charges the three men to the Penitentiary branch.

Mr. THOMPSON. This messenger has been paid heretofore as contingencies of the Penitentiary branch. The three messengers continue to do duty for the whole department. Instead of paying one out of contingencies of the Penitentiary branch, we put it in the Estimates.

Department of Militia and Defence..... $42,600

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are in this case thirteen statutory increases of $50, and the difference between the salary of a first-class clerk from $1,550 to $1,400, that is $150, leaving an increase of $500.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask how it happens that the messengers in this department are paid so much more than in the Department of Justice? They are paid $500, I see, in the Militia Department, and only $300 in the Department of Justice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They may have been a much longer time there.

Mr. EDGAR. All of them?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think so; they are all very old messengers, and they are getting the maximum of what is allowed to messengers.

Department of Secretary of State $31,037 50

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In this case there is promotion from second to first-class clerks, $87.50. From third to second, $100. Ten statutory increases at $50—$500. Three at $25, making $75; two at $30, that is $60, making in all $822.50. There is less the difference in the messenger's salary, $200, and in Mr. Morgan's salary from chief to first-class clerk, $600, a decrease of $800, leaving a net increase of $22.50.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This can hardly pass without some explanation. I see that Mr. Morgan was Mr. MITCHELL.

chief clerk, and that he is apparently reduced to first-class clerk. For what reason has that been done? Some explanation ought to be given as to that, I think.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With respect to that case I would state that there were certain irregularities reported upon by the Secretary of State to the Government connected with Mr. Morgan's performance of his duty. It was considered that those irregularities were not sufficient in their quality or amount to make it necessary to dismiss him, but we thought that those irregularities should be marked with the disapprobation of the Government, and so his position was reduced one step and with the necessary complement of reduction of salary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What were the irregularities?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The irregularities are contained in rather an elaborate correspondence. I cannot carry it in my memory sufficiently to venture on an explanation of it. If the papers are wanted they will be brought down.

Department of Public Printing and Stationery... $22,620 82

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here are a large set of increases. We should have some explanation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In the Department of Printing and Stationery there are seven statutory increases of $50, making $350, and one at $30, and one at $15, making $395 in all. There is an increase to the deputy of $800; promotion of two clerks from third to second class, one $100 and the other $150, $250. Promotion of one first-class clerk to chief clerk, $300, making $1,350 in all. New appointments: Three at $300, one at $500, one at $800, one for eight months at $1,400, and one at $1,800, making in all $6,678.82, less the difference between the late Mr. Robertson's salary and new appointment, $50, and the late Mr. Mousseau's salary of $1,262.50, the increase being $5,365.82.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All this, no doubt, is connected with the new departure of doing our own printing, I suppose. Perhaps, if the hon. Minister can do so, it would be as convenient at this time as at any other, to tell us generally what this is likely to cost, and how it would compare with our contracts?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It is a new branch of the department. There is a chief clerk at $1,800—appointed under the Act for the establishment of a Bureau of Printing and Stationery—who will be Superintendent of Printing. A first-class clerk will be assistant at a yearly salary of $1,400, and there will be two third-class clerks, one at $800, who is a new officer; the other is an officer already in the department, the first will be a typewriter and a special correspondent for the Superintendent. In the accountant's branch, the chief clerk at $1,800 is also appointed under the statute. That officer formerly occupied the position of first-class clerk, at a salary of $1,500. I may inform the House that after the present incumbent, that office will be regulated by Order in Council; but it is proposed not to take away the rights of an officer who has been already twenty years in the service. The second-class clerk was already in the department; one of the two third-class clerks was before in the department, and appears as suppressed in the Queen's Printer's staff, the other is necessitated by the establishment of the Department of Printing. The House will observe that in the department forty-three officers were employed last year, and forty-one would be entitled to an increase of $50 a year; but it will be seen that under this arrangement the yearly increase in the correspondence and registry branch, with twenty-six employes, is only $22. That has been accomplished by transferring some of those officers to this new branch. The Printing and Stationery Department shows an increase of about $5,000. That is necessitated by the establishment of the new department, but the total increase in the whole department is not more than $3,000, not counting the statutory increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman give us any idea about what will be the sum total which will be required for starting this printing establishment, and how the cost of it will compare with the expenditure under the old system?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The cost of the building will largely exceed my expectations. The officers at the head of the Department of Public Works thought that a building which would be suited for the work and would be a lasting building, would cost a good deal more than I anticipated. I do not believe I exaggerate when I say that even after the first year, counting the interest on the cost of the building and the material necessary for establishing the Printing Department, the expenditure will show a reduction calculated at $20,000 a year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the Minister of Public Works tell us what he expects that building will cost?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I cannot say, but I will give all the information to the hon. gentleman a little later on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We would like at this stage to have some general idea of what this new department is to cost. I observe there is to be a vote taken of $65,000 for plant, of which about $70,000 is a revote. The cost of the building I can form no idea of.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. When the building is completed, the whole cost, with heating apparatus, I think will be $140,000 or $150,000; but I do not wish to be bound to these as the exact figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume we shall have a further vote for plant, which is already standing us $165,000, and apparently $58,000 more, amounting to $220,000 in round numbers. Judging from old experience, I suppose we may put down $250,000 for plant and about $150,000 for the building, making $400,000. It looks as if it were going to cost us half a million dollars to start the experiment. I shall be very glad if the project results in saving $20,000, but I must confess I have my doubts about it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The plant is not only for the original project, but it will include also what is necessary for the printing of the voters' lists, and I hope to be in a position to show to the House that in that item a reduction in expense will be effected.

Mr. EDGAR. As the hon. gentleman has mentioned the printing of the voters' lists, can he give the House any idea of what the cost of the plant for that work will be?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I shall give all the statements in detail in due time.

Department of Interior..... $126,757 50

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are forty-four statutory increases at $50 each, $2,200; two at $37.50, $75; one at $30, and one at $25, making a total of $2,350. There is one new third-class clerk at $562.50, making an increase of $2,892.50, less $500 for a messenger, or a net increase of $2,392.50. The Geological Survey Branch—twenty-four statutory increases at $50, $1,200. The total increase is thus $3,592.50, less the difference of $100 in the salary of one clerk, which was voted last year at $1,200 and this year at $1,100, or a net increase of $3,492.50.

North-West Mounted Police. $8,580

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are four statutory increases at $50, $200, and one at $30; total, $230.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where does the comptroller reside?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At Ottawa.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that not rather an inconvenient arrangement. I should imagine that the officer who has control of the North-West Mounted Police should be a resident of Winnipeg.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think not. The comptroller is a civil officer altogether. He is comptroller in the accountant sense of the word. All the payments and all the contracts made with respect to the supply of the Mounted Police, everything of that kind, the provisions, everything connected with the organisation, management and the maintenance of the force, is attended to here, and, ex necessitate, there must be an officer here to look after that. The organisation in the North-West is in the hands of a commissioner, Colonel Herchmer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The matter is a question of departmental management and administration, and I asked the question because, prima facie, it would appear to me that, being at the great distance we are from the headquarters of the Mounted Police, unless this officer be kept a very great portion of his time on the road, he could not properly carry out his functions; and it would be a much better plan, for the purpose of promoting an efficient inspection, if the matter could be so arranged, that he should reside in Winnipeg rather than here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, but he has nothing to do with that. He is a civil officer altogether.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood from the hon. Minister that he was largely concerned with the supervising of the contracts, which are submitted to him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, this is a large item of the expenditure. Quite $800,000 a year are required for this service, perhaps more. Last year, I think, we spent $800,000, and very often we have expended a million. It looks to me almost as if it would be more advisable in the public interest to have transferred the comptroller to a nearer point than Ottawa, if we want him to do his work efficiently.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Experience has shown that the present system is more advisable. The contracts are let after tenders are received. Then tenders are sent here, and are put in months before the time when they are to begin, and there is more immediate supervision by the comptroller here at headquarters than there could be if he were up there. We must have an officer here to look after that machinery, and the comptroller is that officer. Just as in England, the paymaster of all the forces is in London, to compare small things with large.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would rather reverse the comparison and say it was comparing great things to small, because, as far as extent of jurisdiction and territory is concerned, that is greater here than in England. Under whose control is this officer? Under the First Minister's?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman laid down a different rule altogether with regard to the expenditure necessary to be incurred on behalf of the Indians. He complained, when my hon. friend was in office, that he tried to centralise the management of Indian affairs at Ottawa, and held that the expenditure should be looked after by an officer on the ground. The hon. gentleman, I think, gave that as a reason for entrusting Indian affairs to the Lieutenant Governor of the North-West Territories to the extent he did. I would like to know upon what theory a different rule applies to the Indian expenditure, from that which applies to the Mounted Police expenditure. The contracts are let, I suppose, in the same way, and the supplies are somewhat similar. The distribution and everything of that sort would be in the one case about the same as in the other; and it would be interesting to the Committee to learn why the hon. gentleman lays down one rule with regard to the supervision of the supplies for the Mounted Police, and a different rule with regard to those matters which relate to the Department of Indian Affairs.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not lay down any rule at all. With respect to Indian matters, I took the management as I found it left by the hon. gentleman, after a great deal of care, no doubt. The commissioner for managing the Indian affairs in the North-West was Mr. Laird, I think, but he resigned, and, following the system adopted by the hon. gentleman, we appointed a commissioner in his stead. At that time, in the infant state of the North-West, we thought it would be extravagant rather to pay a salary for a Lieutenant Governor of the North-West who had only that to do, so we united the two offices, the office of Commissioner of Indian Affairs and that of the Lieutenant Governor, with the salary of the Lieutenant Governor. That system has been continued ever since; but I do not think it can be continued much longer. The business has so largely increased there, I think eventually the two offices will have to be severed. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs has a great deal more to do than the mere issuing of tenders for supplies. He is responsible for the organisation and management of the whole system, and he has to supervise the acts of all the Indian agents, so that the two cases are not analogous at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was simply talking of the matter of expenditure in the two cases.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The matter of expenditure, the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs looks after, I think, very closely. My hon. friend behind me does, whether I did so or not, and the tenders, as a general rule, are examined here. All the important tenders certainly are. There may be exigencies occasionally, but I am not aware that there are any, and the hon. gentleman will quite understand that in a special case, such as starvation for instance, it may be necessary to act promptly on the spot. The system in respect to the Indian Department, is just as the hon. gentleman left it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And which you thought all wrong.

Mr. MITCHELL. I recollect, when we were passing the Estimates last year, I called the attention of the First Minister to the manner in which the estimates were asked for the supply, not only of the Mounted Police but of the Indian Department were asked for; and I pointed out the difficulties that existed under the present system, under which some three or four large monopolists got all the contracts, and the merchants, traders, and manufacturers in different parts of the country were prevented from tendering for the supply of the articles they could furnish. As to the delivery of the articles, I suggested that in place of requiring that they be delivered at the ranges or Indian reserves, they should be required to be delivered at certain specific points on the railway. The hon. gentleman said the suggestion was a good one, but that the department was not quite in a position to adopt it; that, however, in a year or two it might be carried out. I would like to know whether he proposes to alter the present arrangements or not?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Eventually, I think the delivery might be made at certain specified points along the railway, but I fancy the same state of things exists now as existed when I spoke last year. It would add greatly to the expense of a contract, if in the case of supplies for places 200, 300 and 400 miles away from the places of the original deposit along the line of railway, there had to be separate contracts made by the Government with the contractors to carry the supplies to the various points throughout the country, from the points along the railway. The contractor who undertakes to deliver these articles at the different reserves or the different stations, can always make cheaper contracts for delivery than the Government can, as the hon. gentleman can well understand, and hitherto I think a great saving has been caused by the pursuance of that system. Of course, with the railway extension in that country, a different state of things will obtain, and, whenever the supplies can be delivered near the places of consumption, the hon. gentleman's plan should be carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was the same argument which was used five years ago when I raised this question. Then we had not the railway in full blast in that country. Now we have a good many railways in that country; and, in reply to the remarks of the right hon. gentlemen, I may say that the effect of the present system, which has prevailed during all the time since the country was opened up, has been to put the contracts into the hands of two or three large corporations, such as the Hudson's Bay Company and Baker & Co. They have monopolised the whole matter, the supplies and the transport as well. I have nothing to say against those corporations. I have nothing to say against the way in which they do their work. I believe they have done it well, but, instead of giving these contracts to large firms, the Government might give contracts for supplies at a distance of 20 or 40 or 100 miles from the stations, and that more particularly in regard to the Indian supplies, because the police stations are much nearer to the railway, except, as I understand, in one place. But, instead of giving the farmers the right to tender for the transport of these supplies, it is given to these large corporations or companies, who become the middlemen between the Government and the people of the country. In that case, the profit goes to these large companies which should be divided amongst the people of the country. Instead of coats, and boots and shoes, and flour and so on being given all in bulk contracts to these large companies, the Government should give the manufacturers of coats, and the manufacturers of clothing, and the other manufacturers who are in Toronto, Hamilton, Montreal and Quebec and elsewhere, the opportunity of tendering without making them pay a tribute to the middlemen, who are the only contractors that the Government deals with. The right hon. gentleman is not quite correct when he says that the facilities for transport by rail are not such as would meet the suggestion which I made five years ago, and have made frequently since. I suppose that three-fourths, certainly two-thirds, of the supplies which are required by the police and the Indians can be supplied within fifty miles from certain points on the railway; and I ask, why should this system be carried on, year after year, of throwing this amount into the hands of these monopolists? I have nothing to say against these corporations. I hope they have made a good deal of money out of their contracts; but it is time that it should be given to the people, that some opportunity should be given to them to tender for these supplies, not in bulk, but in detail.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As to the Mounted Police, the supplies are very small in comparison with those of the Indian Department. They are very small, insignificant, but a change has been introduced in that respect in regard to the supply of hay, vegetables, and food generally, so that the people in the neighborhood supply the different Mounted Police stations by tender. Tenders are asked for in the immediate vicinity of the police station. As to the Indian Department, that is quite a different affair. The whole principle upon which the Government proceeds, upon which every Government proceeds, is to get its supplies and to get work of every kind done as cheaply as possible. The whole principle which pervades, for instance, the Board of Works is that everything should be put up to public tender, and that the lowest should get it. That is the principle in the Indian Department. It was when I was the Superintendent General, and I have no doubt it is the principle now when my hon. friend behind me is the Superintendent General.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not want to protract the discussion, but the hon. gentleman has admitted that he has adopted my suggestion made some years ago and repeated since in regard to the police service, and I think he might adopt the same principle with regard to the Indian Department, with good results to the people of this country.

Department of Indian Affairs..... $40,647 50

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are twenty-four statutory increases at $50, $1,200, one at $37.50, one at $25, one at $30, one promotion from second to first class, and an increase in one case, making a total of $2,915 increase. Then there is a decrease in Mr. Plummer's salary of $1,800 and Mr. McKenna, $262.50.

Office of the Auditor General..... $25,750

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a considerable increase here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are sixteen statutory increases, making $800; there is one paid at $500 in 1887-8, which should be $600; there are two additional clerks to be provided for, one at $800 and one at $400; a messenger, who was dropped because he was ill, but has since recovered, $250; making a total increase of $2,350.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the work increased largely?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Department of Finance and Treasury Board..... $53,980

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are twenty-two statutory increases at $50, $1,100; one of $27.50, one of $30, making $1,157.50, less the difference between the salaries of one officer who resigned and Mr. Sanders, which account for the total increase of $1,105.

Department of Inland Revenue..... $41,175

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are nineteen statutory increases at $50, $950, two at $30, one at $25, making $1,535, less the salary of Mr. Measam, superannuated, $1,800, making a net decrease of $765.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What were Mr. Measam's duties?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He was a first class clerk.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What superannuation did that gentleman get?

Mr. COSTIGAN. He got the ordinary allowance under the Act. I forget the amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see there is one officer less, a first-class clerk. Is it expected that this will be maintained, or are we to look at a little later date for an additional first class clerk? Will these twenty-nine officers do the work? Usually speaking, when a man is superannuated, another, or for that matter, half-a-dozen others are ready to take his place.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, there is to be no increase.

Expenses of the Department of Agriculture..... $51,220

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are nineteen statutory increases at $50, three at $30; two new chief clerks, one at $2,250, and one at $1,800; one additional clerk, $400; one new messenger, $300; promotion of first class clerk to chief clerk, Mr. Jackson, $150; promotion of Mr. St. Denis, $150; making $6,900 of increases. Less over-estimate in 1887-8, $75; difference between the salary of a new second class clerk, Mr. Jarvis, and the estimate of last year, $100. There are some other reductions, amounting on the whole to $3,095, leaving a net increase of $2,995.

Mr. MILLS. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what these divisions are—the second division, in which a second class clerk has been appointed at $1,800, and the third division, in which a chief clerk has been appointed at a salary of $1,800, and the new office of chief clerk of the Patent division, $2,250. Now, I understand that the party who was formerly Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, has been transferred to this new office of chief clerk of the Patent division, and that it is, to a certain extent, to be made a judicial office, with the duties which sometimes devolve upon the Minister at the head of that department, as Commissioner of Patents, and that they will hereafter devolve upon that officer as deputy. Is that the case, and is there any further increase to this salary contemplated? Is the chief clerk of this division to be raised to the rank of a deputy?

Mr. CARLING. The chief clerk whom the hon. gentleman has mentioned just now in the Patent Office, was Mr. Cambie. He was appointed last year at a salary of $2,400. Now we propose to transfer Mr. Pope from another department to this department, at the same salary which he has been receiving.

Mr. MILLS. How about the other two?

Mr. CARLING. Mr. Brymner, who was at the maximum of his class, who has charge of the archives, has been put into the first class at the minimum salary; Mr. Jackson, who is also a very efficient officer, is the other clerk.

Mr. MILLS. I suppose we are to understand that the eminent services of this officer who is now chief clerk of the Patent Office, performed last year, in his devotion to the Government, in withholding the returns from being gazetted of eighty members on this side, are to be recognised in this kind of a way.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was one of those gentlemen whose returns were held back by the gentleman who has been promoted to this position with an increase of salary; and when a motion to increase his salary was brought down last year, I objected to giving it to a man who was arraigned by public opinion, and arraigned by this House, for what was, and practically, a malfeasance of office. I say that such a man ought not to have been transferred to so important a position. I have heard it stated by some one here—I do not speak from the book, as I do not know whether the law gives to this gentleman the functions and powers that were formerly vested in the Minister of Agriculture in relation to patents, but I say that it would be very unwise to allow questions relating to patents to come before a man of that character, involving, as some of them do, hundreds of thousands of dollars. Why, Sir, there was a case before the late Minister of Agriculture where he sat for days and days with some nine or ten of the brightest lawyers of this country arguing before him, upon a matter in which the parties could afford to pay these lawyers $25 to $50 a day—even $250 a day, as my hon. friend beside me (Sir Richard Cartwright) states. I say that if the statement of my hon.

friend is true, that the powers which were formerly vested in the Minister are to be vested in that man, arraigned by public opinion, and by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, for his misconduct—I say, Sir, that a mistake has been committed. I ask if it is right that such great power should be given to a man with that reputation and with that record? I do not think it is.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The gentleman, Mr. Pope, who was put in Mr. Cambie's place, has the powers that Mr. Cambie had, and no other.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am glad to hear he has no more.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. State what the duties are?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Cambie was head of the Patent Office, but he did not try cases in any way whatever.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He advised the Minister.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Every employé advises the Minister at the head of his department, I take it. No, he has strictly executive and administrative duties, he has no judicial duties whatever, and the salary is the same as that he had when he was Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. My hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture has given notice of a Bill for the purpose of appointing a deputy commissioner, who will have no judicial functions; and if the House does not choose to pass that Bill, there will be an end to it; and if they think there are improper appointments made under that Bill, then the House can object to them.

Mr. MITCHELL. As a public journalist, questions are brought before me very frequently in relation to the Patent laws. We know that Mr. Pope made a very serious mistake in relation to his duties of publishing the returns of a great many members of this House—most remarkably, my own, which he kept back for nearly three weeks; for what purpose I do not know—whether it was under instructions or not, I do not know. But if he makes similar mistakes in the dates of patents, there will be special benefits conferred on special individuals. I am satisfied that $100,000 or $200,000 would not have been any consideration in obtaining a favorable decision in a patent case that came before the former Minister of Agriculture. If we are going to give powers to this gentleman such as were formerly enjoyed by the Minister, or exercised by the Minister, it appears to me we are running a great risk, and I hope Mr. Pope will not make any mistake in the patents in his charge.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to say further that this officer was guilty of dereliction of duty, that he was guilty of malfeasance in office. This matter was brought before the attention of the Government. He was also guilty of making a false statement to the House, a statement that bore on its face evidence of falsity, a statement in regard to which it was only necessary to examine the returns to which he referred to see its falsity; and in the face of the wrong done to nearly one-half of the members of this House, and known to the Government, the Government, instead of dismissing that officer from office, have undertaken to promote him. They have transferred him from one office to another, and, as the Bill shows, it is proposed to give him the rank of Deputy Minister, and impose on him duties of a far more serious and responsible character than he has shown himself capable of performing in the office he formerly held. I say, if the hon. gentlemen who sit on the Treasury benches had done their duty in this matter, that, without any motion on the part of the House, and without any formal complaint having been made, they would have dismissed that officer; but, instead of dismissing him, they have undertaken, by his transference, to give him promotion.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. EDGAR. Do I understand from the Minister of Agriculture that the Deputy Minister of Agriculture is to be relieved of the duties of Deputy Commissioner of Patents?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Mr. EDGAR. Then what is the Bill for?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will discuss the Bill when it comes up.

Mr. EDGAR. I think we have a right to ask what the policy of the Government is, and I intend to stop here until I get some answer. What I want to know is this: Whether the deputy head of the Department of Agriculture, whose salary is provided by this vote, is to continue to perform the duties which, under the statute, the Deputy Minister of Agriculture has to do, the duties of Deputy Commissioner of Patents; or whether another officer is to be appointed in his place?

Mr. CARLING. I can only say that this item before the House gives no increased power to this officer; he will have exactly the same power as Mr. Cambie possessed, and he has no power similar to the power of the deputy commissioner. The Deputy Minister is Deputy Commissioner of Patents at the present time, and there is no change at present in the law. That is a question for the future. Mr. Pope holds exactly the same position as chief clerk as Mr. Cambie held.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you not propose making a change by the proposed Bill?

Mr. CARLING. That is another matter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not object to the removal of Mr. Pope from the position of Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, because he has proved himself to be utterly and entirely unfit to perform those duties, and had not performed them. But it is a very remarkable proceeding that he should be substantially promoted, as I understand he is about to be; and it is the more remarkable because this House will very well recollect that when, again and again, we demanded to know whether Mr. Pope was acting in the way he did act under the direct authority or at the instigation of members of the Government, but one hon. gentleman on the Treasury benches, if I recollect rightly—and that was the Secretary of State—rose to deny that he had any conversation with him; and, therefore, when we see this, we are justified in supposing that Mr. Pope, in what I must call the scandalous malfeasance of office that he committed in postponing the publication of the returns of nearly eighty members, contrary to law, and contrary to his manifest, if not his sworn duty, was acting at the instigation and instance of his masters, the Government of Canada, who now take the opportunity of rewarding him.

Department of Fisheries..... $15,425

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are these changes, statutory?

Mr. FOSTER. They are statutory increases.

Department of Public Works .. $43,510

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are eighteen statutory increases of $50 each, decrease in messengers $120, leaving a net increase of $680.

Department of Railways..... $47,930

Mr. POPE. By some accident there is an item of $400 inserted for Mr. McLaughlin, that was formerly paid by the Public Works. The item is entered as $1,800, whereas it should be $1,400 as before.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Last year the Minister of Railways asked for those two sums of $1,400 and $400.

The committee thought it was desirable that they should be put under the same head, and, therefore, this was done; but my colleague does not desire to have the amount voted for his department increased by $400. It can be arranged by inserting $1,800, and making a note that $400 has to be paid annually by the Department of Public Works.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see there is another item touching Mr. Schreiber's salary. Does that still continue?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because I thought he had done all the work an engineer required to do in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Mr. POPE. He is still at work in settling up matters connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway and consequently it will continue for this year.

Mr. MITCHELL. I had a little business, not very large, to do with the Railway and Canals Department, and I did not get very much satisfaction out of it. When I spoke about snow-shovelling the other day the hon. Minister said that he put the men there in my interest, when he knew very well it was in the interest of my opponents. Do I understand that Mr. Schreiber gets $2,000 besides $1,500?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. He is the biggest paid officer in the whole service. I hope the hon. Minister will attend to those two or three little trifles I spoke to him about the other day.

Mr. POPE. It is very hard for me to attend to those trifles if the hon. gentleman is going to pitch into my engineer.

Mr. MITCHELL. We will see to that on concurrence, if you are not considerate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Let the hon. the Minister of Railways recollect Mrs. Murphy's cow, and he will be considerate.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 5:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 8th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

REPORT.

Report of the Royal Commission appointed to enquire into losses sustained by settlers in consequence of the rebellion in the North West Territories.—(Mr. White, Cardwell.)

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 27) to incorporate the Bronsons & Weston Lumber Co.—(Mr. Perley.)

Bill (No. 28) to repeal an Act intituled: "An Act for facilitating navigation of the River St. Lawrence, in and near the harbor of Quebec."—(Mr. Guay.)

Bill (No. 30) to enable the Town of Kincardine, County of Bruce, to impose and collect certain tolls in the harbor of the said town.—(Mr. Rowand.)

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. BROWN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 29) to make further provisions as to the prevention of cruelty to animals. He said: The introduction of this Bill is to make certain provision for the prevention of cruelty to animals, not provided for by law at present. This Act is asked for by the various Humane Societies throughout the Dominion. When the Bill comes before the House again I will fully inform the House as to the details of the measure.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—ST. CHARLES BRANCH.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, What is the total amount expended up to date on the St. Charles Branch of the Intercolonial Railway, and what is the amount of claims not yet paid?

Mr. POPE. The total amount expended is $1,274,620; the amount of claims presented by claimants, whose claims have not been disposed of, amounts to $721,650.

THE FENELON RIVER.

Mr. BARRON asked, Is the water in the Fenelon River, at the outlet of Cameron Lake and above the lock at Fenelon Falls, of sufficient depth to permit of free navigation by steamboats, vessels and barges passing through the lock? If not, does the Government propose making the river navigable in time for this year's navigation? Will the bridge across said river above the lock impede navigation? If so, when is the same to be reconstructed so as to permit of uninterrupted navigation?

Mr. POPE. There is at present a small rocky bar at the entrance to Cameron's Lake (which lake is about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles long), from the River Fenelon, the removal of which is necessary to clear navigation. The railway bridge across the river being a fixed structure does impede navigation. The department, however, are now in correspondence with the Grand Trunk Railway Company, the operators of the road, with a view to the substitution of a swing. The department are also constructing a swing in place of an existing fixed road bridge over the lock. The works will not be in readiness for next season.

Mr. BARRON. I think the hon. gentleman misunderstood the question. I did not refer to the bridge over the lock at Fenelon Falls, but to the river above the lock at the outlet at Cameron Lake. The question was if the obstructions at the outlet at Cameron Lake are going to be removed in time for navigation. There is no trouble across the bridge. The trouble is at the outlet of Cameron Lake.

Mr. POPE. Yes, there is.

Mr. BARRON. At all events there is where I am advised they want the obstruction removed from.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT.

Mr. McMILLAN (South Huron) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to amend the Weights and Measures Act so as to define the weight of salt in barrels, bags and packages? Is it the intention to adopt a standard similar to that in the United States?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Notice has been given of a Bill to deal with that subject. There is no uniform standard established in the United States.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOR.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether it was the intention of the Government to cause the evidence taken before the Labor Commission, prior to the meeting of Parliament, to be laid before the House; and if so, when?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not the intention of the Government to lay the evidence taken before the Labor Commission, before this House until a report is made by the Commissioners.

REPORT OF GENERAL STRANGE.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the Government have taken cognisance of the following letter:—

"MILITARY COLONISATION RANCHER,
"P. O. GLEICHEN, ALBERTA, N.W.T., 26th July, 1886.

"To the Editor of La Presse, "Montreal.

"SIR,—An article in La Presse, Montreal, 17th July, called my attention to the Report of the Minister of Militia for the past year. I obtained a copy through a friend, as the department did not honor me with one.

"I am pained, but not surprised, to see the extraordinary injustice done to the gallant troops I commanded in the late campaign, especially to the 65th Battalion. Though they are not alone, as 'Steel's Scouts' and the 'Alberta Mounted Rifles' are absolutely omitted in the list of troops engaged in the campaign, as shown in the statement on the back of the map from which the locality of 'Frenchman's Butte' has been erased.

"In the Deputy Minister's Report, page xi, no mention is made of the casualties in the action at that place, 'Frenchman's Butte,' the very existence of which has been so carefully suppressed.

"For myself it does not trouble me that the rank and title of Major General, which Her Majesty did me the honor to confer, has also been suppressed. This occurs in the case of no other officer mentioned in the report. Part of the report in question purports to be based on extracts from newspapers.

"It is a novelty to base official reports of military operations on disconnected and unauthenticated extracts from newspapers, when the official reports of the officers themselves are at hand.

"The singular egotism of the report in question ignores the first advance of the Alberta Field Force for the relief of Edmonton, and would make it seem that the force, having miraculously appeared in Edmonton, commenced operations on the 20th May, the words being: 'May 20th. Strange leaves Edmonton with 65th by boat; rest by trail.' As a fact the 65th did not leave Edmonton by boat, but marched to Victoria.

"The object aimed at is evident to any casual reader of the report, and you will not be surprised to hear that a part of my official report has been omitted altogether. As it concerns the reputation of the soldiers I commanded, it is to be regretted that an official report to Parliament must become the basis of history which it will falsify by its omissions, which answer the same purpose as perversion of facts.

"I thank you for the justice with which you treat me. It is a contrast to the injustice I have suffered at the hands of Her Majesty's Imperial Government, which has deprived me of my pension for the half year during which I left my home and sacrificed my private business, as did many others, to save this fair Province from desolation and bloodshed.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

"J. B. STRANGE,

"Major General, late Com. Alberta Force.

"P.S.—I regret that I have not written in French, but translation will be less troublesome to you than to me. I fear that half a dozen years' absence from my French Canadian friends, among whom I passed so many happy years, has rendered my French a little rusty, though my gallant French Canadian soldiers always responded to it on the march, the bivouac and the battle-field."

2. Is it true that a part of the report of General Strange was omitted, as stated in the above letter?

3. If it was so omitted, do the Government intend to remedy such omission?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON (Translation). The Minister of Militia had cognisance of General Strange's letter at the time of its publication. The unpublished portion of General Strange's report was not published through any representations made to the Minister by the Major General commanding the forces, stating that that portion of the report should be set aside. It is not the intention of the Government to reconsider this question and to publish the unpublished portion of the report.

Mr. COSTIGAN.

COPYRIGHT.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Is it the intention of the Government to propose any measure of legislation this Session upon the subject of copyright?

Mr. THOMPSON. The matter is still under consideration, and will be dealt with probably during the Session at an early day.

MAIL SERVICE IN LOTBINIÈRE.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to grant a mail three times a week, in place of twice a week, to the post office of Armagh, in the county of Lotbinière?

Mr. McLELAN. It is not the intention of the Government.

MR. LYNCH'S WORK ON BUTTER-MAKING.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Whether the French edition of Mr. Lynch's work on Butter-making has been printed? If not, when will it be?

Mr. CARLING. The translation is already printed, and will be circulated among the members next week.

MAIL SERVICE BETWEEN QUEBEC AND DEQUEN.

Mr. COUTURE asked, Whether the Government has made arrangements with the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company for the transport of the mails between Quebec and Dequen. If it has done so, whether orders in accordance therewith have been issued to the Post Office Inspector at Quebec?

Mr. McLELAN. Arrangements have been made with the Railway Company for the transmission of the mails.

THE ONDERDONK ARBITRATION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, What number of locomotives and cars and what quantity of other railway stock were taken by the Government under the award made by the Arbitrators on the matter in dispute between Mr. Onderdonk and the Government? What quantity of such railway stock and how many locomotives and cars are now employed on the Intercolonial Railway or elsewhere, and what amount has been expended on the same for repairs or otherwise? What amount was paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company for the transport of such locomotives, cars and railway stock from British Columbia? What amount was paid for similar services to the Grand Trunk Railway Company? What was the total cost of transporting the said locomotives, cars and railway stock from British Columbia to New Brunswick?

Mr. POPE. I would much prefer that the hon. gentleman should move for this information as an Address, though I will get the information as soon as I can and lay it on the Table.

THE FISHERIES TREATY.

Mr. LAURIER. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to ask the Government whether the papers brought down yesterday with regard to the Fisheries Treaty contain all the information which the Government intend to lay on the Table of the House regarding that treaty?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be able, I hope, at an early date to lay on the Table of the House the correspondence on the fisheries question down to the present period. Some delay has taken place in connection with the arrangement with the Imperial Government as to what papers should be brought down, but all the papers that can be brought down in connection with that subject will be laid on the Table at an early date. It is not the intention to lay on the Table anything further connected with the conference of the plenipotentiaries at Washington.

Mr. LAURIER. I think it will be a very disappointing announcement to the House. From what the hon. Minister himself stated the other day, the House was not at all prepared for the statement he now makes, for I understood him to state distinctly that during his illness the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice had agreed that the protocols to be laid before the House should be only formal, but that at the same time his assent to that arrangement was conveyed; but it was also stated that at a future period further information should be given, and I claim that nothing will be satisfactory except absolutely full information. The Government have thought proper, for some reason of their own, to bring down a part of the proceedings of the conference, that is to say, a part of the propositions submitted by the British plenipotentiaries, and the answer made by the American plenipotentiaries. From the very terms of the papers which have been laid before the House, it is evident that the offer which was made on the part of the British plenipotentiaries came after, and in consequence of some previous discussion, because at the beginning the paper reads thus: "Sir Charles Tupper therefore hands in for consideration," &c. What is the meaning of "therefore?" What had come before that? The proposition made here came in consequence of something that had previously come before the Conference. Under the circumstances I submit with full confidence that all the precedents are on my side, that it was the duty of the Government to lay before the House everything that took place before the conference. What are the protocols? They are not merely the headings which we have before us: "The conference met, all the plenipotentiaries being present; the protocol of the previous session was approved, and after further discussion of matters under consideration, the conference was adjourned till the 21st of January," and so on in similar terms. These are not the protocols; they are only extracts from them. The protocols are the procès-verbal of the meetings of the conference. I submit that it is the right of this House to have everything that took place before the conference—the proposals made on our side and the answers on the American side, together with the proposals made on the American side and the answers on our side; and that is in accordance with all the precedents. We had all the protocols of the Washington Treaty, and the whole information, brought before the House in 1872. Under such circumstances I think the House will be very much disappointed if we are not given the whole of the proceedings that took place on that occasion; and it seems to me, in view of the statements made by the hon. Minister himself the other day, that it is the right of the House to have all the protocols in their entirety.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I share with my hon. friend the great disappointment which I think will be felt not only in this House, but outside of this House, in finding that all the protocols, which I supposed would include the results which had been arrived at, if not the arguments on both sides, are contained in twenty-five pages of just such a bald and meagre statement as my hon. friend has read. Here we have a formal treaty, and a modus vivendi, and the official confirmation and authority to treat, and then for five and twenty pages this is presented to us as the record of the protocols: "The conference met, all the plenipotentiaries being present. The protocol of the previous session was approved, and the conference adjourned;" and this goes on for five-and-twenty pages. They might just as well have sent down but one page and put down in one line that the conference met twenty-five times, that the protocols were read and that adjournments took place that number of times. I am quite sure the hon. the Minister of Finance, in his heart of hearts, must entirely disapprove of this, what I must call a very discourteous mode of treating the Parliament of Canada. The Parliament of Canada ought, before they close this treaty, to have these protocols before them. That is my opinion, and that is what was done respecting the first Treaty of Washington. There we had, not the lengthened arguments by which the intentions of the various plenipotentiaries were supported, but the results as embodied in the usual diplomatic protocol form and the various proposals in detail that were made. I think that every consideration of reason, and every consideration of deference to this House, aye, Sir, and of deference to the people we represent, requires that we ought to have these protocols in full as they were laid before the plenipotentiaries, or, at least, as they were approved by the plenipotentiaries, before we are called on to discuss this treaty. I must say that, up to the present moment, no sort of argument has been advanced, either by the right hon. the First Minister or by the hon. the Minister of Finance, why this should not take place. I am inclined myself to acquit the Minister of Finance of this. I think he desired, and for his own sake he was right in desiring that what he had done should be shown, that it should be shown how he had striven to secure better terms for Canada; and I think he will find in the course of this discussion that he will be placed at very great disadvantage, unless, sooner or later, we receive the protocols to which my hon. friend has alluded.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I share the disappointment as I have already stated to the House, that both those hon. gentlemen have expressed, at the protocols not being fuller but they are protocols all the same. Any person who knows anything of negotiations of that kind, knows that the protocolists, under the direction of the commissioners who are engaged in an international conference, prepare the protocols. They are the official secretaries on the two sides, and they prepare the protocols under the direction of the Commission. As I have already stated, when I left Washington the matter was not finally determined as to what the protocols should contain, and, as I have also explained to the House, the message which was sent asking my assent to the protocols, being of a purely formal character, and which was answered in the affirmative, was assumed by me to mean that what were called purely formal protocols would contain the proposals made on both sides. I state that very frankly, because I have taken the House entirely into my confidence in this matter. There is nothing which I wish to withhold from it in the slightest degree. I regret very much, I do not hesitate to say, that these protocols do not contain what I expected they would, when I agreed that they should be purely formal. But all the same it was not so decided by the British plenipotentiaries who remained in Washington, and by the United States plenipotentiaries. It was decided by them that all the protocols should contain was the statements contained in these papers laid before the House. There is no disrespect to the Parliament of Canada in this, that is not equally a disrespect to the Parliament of Great Britain. Every word in relation to this matter that will be laid before the Parliament of England, every word that has been laid before the Senate of the United States, as contained in the protocols, as the results arrived at, is precisely the same as is laid upon the Table of this House. I observe that Mr. Bayard has, since these protocols and the treaty were submitted to the Senate of the United States, sent down further correspondence upon this subject, but not anything further in relation to what took place in the Conference. The further correspondence contained, as hon. gentlemen who have seen the New York papers will see, in full the letter addressed by Mr. Bayard to myself, and the answer to it, upon which this conference was originated.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You mean the conference that took place last Easter?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I mean the letter from Mr. Bayard which followed my visit to Washington last Easter, and my reply; and upon the communication of that correspondence to Lord Salisbury and Mr. Phelps the American Minister, the international conference at Washington in regard to the fisheries was arranged. I see that further papers have been submitted to the Congress of the United States, being a letter by Mr. Bayard, with correspondence upon the subject, which he has brought down. As I have said, further correspondence will be brought down to this House, but nothing has been submitted to the United States, and nothing will be submitted to the Parliament of Great Britain, that will not be precisely the same as that submitted here. I have personally expressed my regret that the decision arrived at was not to furnish further information than these protocols contain, but I believe it is within the province of international commissioners to decide how far the public interest and the objects they have in common will be subserved by giving more or less extended information upon the subject of the deliberations which have taken place. I am unable to say more than that, and I do not think that there will be any deficiency of information; in fact, I may say, that more information has been submitted here than has been anywhere else, because at the time, when I supposed these protocols would contain a statement of all the proposals made on both sides and the replies, I stated to the House that the question of trade would be found to have been referred to, and in order to deal with that subject I was able to obtain the assent of my colleagues and of the American representatives to laying upon the Table of the House further information than is contained in the protocols, by giving all the proposals and the replies that had relation to anything which would touch the fiscal arrangements of the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would just ask the hon. gentleman when he is going to lay the letter he refers to on the Table? Of course I have seen the letter, but it has not been laid officially before us as yet.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated to the hon. gentleman that the correspondence was now being prepared to be brought down to the present time, and the letter will be contained in that correspondence. Further correspondence will also be laid before the House at an early date. This matter is in the hands of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has arranged to lay the correspondence before the House as early as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman tell us when he thinks we will get it—to-morrow or Saturday?

Mr. FOSTER. You mean those papers in connection with the general fisheries correspondence?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I particularly refer to is the papers the Minister of Finance refers to, including the full text of the letter from Secretary Bayard to himself.

Mr. FOSTER. Those, I suppose, will be included in the general correspondence which is being prepared, and which will be brought down as soon as possible.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is very indefinite.

Mr. FOSTER. No more satisfactory information can now be given. We cannot bring down the papers until we have the assent of the Governor General.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not necessary in the case of the letter of the hon. Secretary Bayard to the hon. the Minister of Finance. That was, as I understand, an unofficial letter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There would be no difficulty, if the hon. gentleman desired it, in laying that correspondence upon the Table of the House at once, and I will have great pleasure in doing it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose you can do that to-day or to-morrow?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To-morrow.

Mr. MITCHELL. What I imagine my inquisitive friends on this side want is to know the grounds which the hon. the Minister of Finance took before the Commission. What I said yesterday, and what my hon. friend took exception to, was, that the protocols are extremely barren and bald, as to the course which my hon. friend proposes to take. It is true that this protocol refers to the general disposition on the part of Canada to offer extended commercial and trade relations to the United States as a compensation for the consideration of the fisheries question. That was refused by the United States. They refused to consider, that until the rights of American citizens, under the Treaty of 1818, were considered and decided by the Commission. My hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, says that he pressed the matter day after day, and I have no doubt he did. No one will have any doubt—no matter on which side of the House he may sit—that he did the best he could for Canada, but what we find fault with is that we have so little information as to what he did. I do not know what these gentlemen who have preceded me on this side have in view, but what I have in view is that before we discuss the motion of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), we should know to what extent the proposition went, whether it referred to natural productions alone, or to some of these extensive manufactures which are carried on alike in the United States and in this country. That, I take it, is what my hon. friends on this side of the House want to get at. At all events, it is what I want to get at, and it is of vast importance to the House to have that information before we enter into a discussion of the question. I was in hopes yesterday that, while the protocols did not mention anything in regard to the trade relations, there might have been something in regard to the interchange of natural productions, of manufactured articles, or of only natural productions, or of only a limited extent of natural productions, but they seem to be framed in such a way as to cover everything generally.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MITCHELL. My hon. friend knows that the very question which is now agitating the country is that of more extended relations with the United States. There is one class of men, the manufacturers of this country, who desire to make the consumers pay what they choose by means of their rings and their combinations. There are others, and I am one of them, who desire to open the markets of this country in such a way as to get the cheapest products from abroad, and to throw their markets open to our products; and perhaps the hon. gentleman can quiet our minds by telling us what he did say in his argument, to what extent he went, whether he was prepared to open up the markets of Canada for the products of the United States, on condition that corresponding advantages were given to the manufacturers of Canada in the markets of the United States? Perhaps he could quiet all this enquiring turn of mind on this side of the House if he would tell us just to what extent he went. Of course, I do not know if diplomacy would permit him, but, if it would, it would be very satisfactory to us to know how far he went in his propositions towards the settlement of this question.

Mr. EDGAR. If the Finance Minister cannot give us the particulars of his proposal, perhaps he can give us, at all events, the date at which this proposal was made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The 3rd of December. I think the answer says the 3rd instant.

Mr. EDGAR. One date is the 30th ultimo, and the other the 3rd instant. I find in the protocols that there were meetings on the 30th November, and the 30th January, and also meetings on the 3rd December and 3rd February, so that this does not help us at all, and perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us what the date was.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The 30th referred to is the 30th November, and the 3rd is the 3rd December.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It will be seen that the Parliament of Canada stands in this matter in precisely the same position as the Senate of the United States. Of course it is a departure from the ancient practice in the negotiation of treaties, but it is in accordance with the modern tendency in England to the other portions of the Empire as well as in regard to Canada. It was adopted in connection with the South African Free States, and in that case the fullest information was communicated to Parliament, and no action was taken without the sanction of Parliament. In this case, it is necessary that Parliament should have the fullest information to enable it to take action on this matter, and, before asking for the assent of Parliament, before asking Parliament to consider the matters pending between the two countries, the hon. gentleman no doubt remembered that he was not only the representative of Great Britain, but was the representative of this country as well, and therefore he will understand that it is in his own interest, as well as in the interest of Parliament, that Parliament, before being called upon to ratify that treaty, should know what he has done on behalf of the people of this country. The hon. gentleman had there a certain official position. He has acted there on behalf of this country, from time to time, during a period extending over nearly three months. The hon. gentleman, it is clear, from correspondence which has been laid on the Table of this House, has departed, in the final conclusions at which he has arrived, from the position taken by the Government a little over a year ago. Why those concessions were made we would like to know. Why he has made unnecessary concessions we would like to know—whether it has resulted from the position taken by the Government that these concessions should be made without any adequate consideration; and that we can only know by knowing the communications which passed between him and the representatives of the United States. I apprehend that the Senate of the United States will have before it the whole of the proceedings of this conference. I have no doubt about that. If it is not so, that body will be placed in a different position from that which it has occupied for a hundred years past. It is a responsible body under the constitution for the discharge of a certain duty in the ratification of treaties. We are a responsible body in the growth of public opinion and in the exactions of the people we represent, to the same extent, although not formally in the same way, as the Senate of the United States; and we are entitled to have before us, before we are asked to pass upon what was done at Washington, the proceedings of that conference; and I trust that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues will see that we have an opportunity of carefully considering what was done at that conference before we are called upon to pass finally upon the treaty which was negotiated.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has not answered the question whether he would give us a little intimation of the arguments he used. I do not wish to press him, if he thinks that is contrary to practice.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid I will have to ask my hon. friend to wait until I have heard the motion from the other side of the House, and then he will probably have an opportunity of learning what my views are on the whole question.

ASSUMPTION OF TELEGRAPH LINES BY THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. DENISON moved :

That a Select Committee be appointed to enquire into the desirability of the Government acquiring all the electric telegraph lines in Canada, and that the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to hear such telegraph, railway companies and proprietors as may wish to be heard, by themselves, their counsels or agents, and to report to this House.

He said : In making this motion I would like to take the time of the House for a few minutes to explain it. The importance of this question first forced itself upon me when, within a year, we had an agitation in this country in favor of Commercial Union, started by a few strangers and possibly by a few Canadians. But the agitation was conducted chiefly by a person living in a foreign country, and who was at the same time the head of a large monopoly there—I refer to the Great North-Western Telegraph Company. We find that this gentleman, living in a foreign country, was enabled, by means of what are called dead-head telegrams and associated press despatches, to convey the idea all over Canada and abroad that the Canadian people were hungering for Commercial Union. I think, Mr. Speaker, the sequel has proved that these telegrams and reports which were sent broadcast throughout the land were untrue, because it has been shown where one or two gentlemen ventured to test public opinion in favor of the question, they were defeated when they went to the polls. The contrast was all the greater to me when I reflected that in Europe the telegraph system is everywhere under the control of the Government; I believe I am correct in saying that in every country in Europe the Government control the telegraph systems. I know that, in 1868, the telegraph system was controlled by the Governments in Belgium, Switzerland, Russia, Denmark, France, Austria, and also in Victoria and New South Wales. As the telegram is an instrument of conveying correspondence, it seems to me that since the Government take upon themselves the transmission of correspondence by letters, it is also right that they should assume the transmission of correspondence by telegram. As showing the importance of this question, I will read some extracts from an article that appeared recently in an American review in reference to the telegraph system :

"Its control over the press is, therefore, absolute. It has the power of life and death, for the telegraphic news is the vital breath of a daily newspaper. Such a power cannot exist without its exerting a pernicious influence on public affairs, and every observant public man has long perceived the demoralising influence of this powerful but subtle agency."

Again it says :

"The man who rules the associated press is master of the situation, for, if he has the ability to wield it, he has an instrument for shaping the opinion of millions, which, by the constancy, universality and rapidity of its action, defies competition."

Then it goes on to say :

"Because, in an era when public opinion is omnipotent, it can give, withhold or color the information which shapes that opinion at its pleasure, and the reputation of the ablest and purest public men may be fatally tarnished, in every town and village on the continent, by a midnight despatch."

I think, Mr. Speaker, that shows how important it is that this power should not be in the hands of a company—I might almost say, of an individual. Of course, the question comes up whether it will pay the Government to undertake the ownership of the telegraph system. In England, since 1870, the Government has controlled the telegraph system, and I find that up to 1885, when they had a shilling telegraph tariff, the system yielded a revenue; the rate was then reduced to sixpence, and since then there has been a considerable annual deficit. But I believe it is the general opinion there that, in time, even at that low rate, the amount realised will be sufficient to pay the interest on the capital invested. We find that in Belgium, in 1862, at the rate of one and a-half francs, the messages sent were 105,278. In 1865 the rate was reduced to one-half franc, and the next year the messages were 692,536; and in 1871 the number sent was 1,560,673. This increase was made not only by business men and merchants, but by all classes of the people. Of course, in a compact country like Belgium, where the distances are so small, the time saved by the telegram over the post is small, and is much less than it would be in Canada, where, from the Island of Prince Edward to Vancouver, some eight or ten days might be saved by the transmission of a telegram instead of a letter. The fact of the Government owning the telegraphs no doubt cause the business to increase, and it has been found in the old world that while the business increases, the expenditure does not increase in the same ratio. I have the figures for north Germany, Belgium and Holland. In north Germany the increase in messages was 259 per cent., while the increase of expenditure was 83 per cent. In Belgium the increase in messages was 252 per cent.; increase of expenditure, 61 per cent. In Holland the increase of messages was 152 per cent.; increase of expenditure, 62 per cent. In Denmark the increase of messages was 149 per cent.; increase of expenditure 38 per cent. There is another reason why I think it is desirable to have the telegraph system placed under the control of the Government. We find that we have now two companies besides some lines already owned by the Government, and if a person sends a telegram by the C. P. R. line to a station on the Great North-Western, he is obliged to pay a double rate, no matter how short the distance may be. That would be remedied by the change proposed in the present system. Before closing my remarks I desire to give the House the increases in England during recent years. The telegraphs were taken over by the Government in 1870, at which time the number of messages sent was six millions. The old companies' average charge was two shillings for a less number of words than at present. In 1876 the messages sent had increased to twenty millions. In 1875 the Government in England reduced the rate from one shilling to sixpence. In 1887, the last year for which I have a return, the number of messages was 50,243,639. I had hoped to be able to lay before the House figures showing the financial results of the Government acquisition of the telegraph system, but there is a difficulty in obtaining these figures as the business is divided into two heads, one commercial and the other foreign. I understand, however, from the gentleman who obtained the information for me in England, that the department hope soon to be able to have a good surplus, sufficient to pay dividend on capital.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman who has made this motion did well to bring the subject to the attention of this House and the country. I have no doubt that hon. members will feel obliged to the hon. gentleman for his researches into the subject. The hon. gentleman refers to the post office system, which is in the hands of the Government, and he assimilates, to a certain degree, the telegraph to the post office system, and thinks that the post office being in the hands of the Government it is proper that the telegraph system should also be in their hands. This question is one that has been called to my attention more than once, and in regard to which a good deal may be said on both sides. I may at once say that, although the Government have already studied the question and have had it before them, they do not think at present they are in a position to give effect to the suggestions of the hon. gentleman. Nevertheless, he has called the attention of Parliament to the matter. No doubt it will be discussed in the press and by the press, and also by public men who take a great interest in such questions, especially one of such magnitude requiring a very large sum to be voted by Parliament, if we were either to take one of the present lines of telegraph or to establish a Government line from one end of the country to the other. I have no doubt that the hon. gentleman, having attained the object he had in view in calling the attention of Parliament to the subject, will be satisfied with having done so, and withdraw the motion.

Motion withdrawn.

LAND VILLA POST OFFICE, MONTMAGNY.

Mr. CHOQUETTE moved for (Translation):

Copies of all papers, documents, petitions, &c., respecting the resignation of the postmaster of Land Villa, in the county of Montmagny, the appointment of another postmaster, and the change in the location of the post office.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw the special attention of the Government on the motion I am about to make, because in spite of many personal representations made by myself to the Post Office Department, and petitions sent in by tax-payers, the matter was not taken into consideration. This is the reason why I lay the matter before the House. This particular post office has been pretty well knocked about in different political storms, and it has shifted its residence already once or twice. What the interested parties wanted by their petitions, and what I myself desired, was that the post office should be replaced where it stood before. Formerly this post office lay in St. François parish, in the same county, and when my predecessor in this House took up his dwelling in St. Peter's parish, he caused the post office of St. François to be transferred thither, I might almost say for his personal interest. Since his departure, this post office has been carried a few acres further on, on another party's farm. The former postmaster had resigned, and a person, keeping a little shop at the place, made application for the post office. Contrary to the wishes of a large number of tax-payers of the parish, his request was granted, and the post office transferred a few acres further on, instead of being brought back to its former site, where there are mills, stores, and a business centre. The best proof I can advance is that formerly the post office paid its expenses, whereas in the place where it now stands, according even to the Postmaster General's report, the Government are the losers by the sum of $23.54 annually. The income of the office last year was $38.46, while the outlay stood at $62.00. I make no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that if this post office were returned to its original locality, it would fetch at least $100 a year, and instead of a deficiency and a perfectly useless post office, in nowise meeting the wants of the public in that portion of the parish, the Government would have a surplus and the post office some usefulness. In the petitions submitted to the department the name of a certain party was put forth as postmaster of the place. This man runs a mill, and if the appointment were made in pursuance of the petitions, the revenues of the office would be larger and its utility enhanced. Where it now stands, it were best to close it for two reasons—first, because it is useless, and next, because the Government sustain a yearly loss of $24. Of course, the sum is not great, but there are so many post offices throughout the country that the Government would lose quite a sum every year, if such a leakage occurred in each. Under the circumstances, I thought it best to lay the matter before the House and Government, with the view of a satisfactory solution, and I trust that justice will be done to the petitions which have been handed in. I hope that when the Government shall have looked over the papers which have lain a long time in the department, they will do the proper thing in the premises. Personally, I am indifferent to the matters, but I know that the tax payers of the locality, irrespective of party, have asked for the change, and that they have named in their petitions a party thoroughly qualified for the post. I feel certain that if the post office is removed to that spot, it will yield a considerable income and meet the wants of the residents.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As my hon. friend, the Postmaster General, is not as familiar with French as he is with English, I will reply for him by saying that it is possible the place chosen for the post office in question is not quite suitable, but that the Postmaster General is not aware of the fact. If representations have been laid before the department I am convinced that my colleague will attend to them fully, and do, in this instance, what he always does, give justice to all localities that are interested. The hon. member says that this post office has been knocked about by political waves and storms. Perhaps it is one of these waves that is now turning the mill. At all events, whether this be the case or not, the hon. gentleman may rest assured that the Postmaster General, now that his attention has been called to the subject, will see that the representations made to the Government are properly dealt with.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I had no intention of insinuating that the present incumbent of the post office does not do his duties, nor that the locality itself is unsuitable. I mean only that the site is not so favorable, because not meeting the views of the resident tax-payers. The hon. Postmaster General will be convinced of this himself on reading the petition, signed by persons of the two political parties indiscriminately, wherein they ask the removal of this post office, and point out, as well qualified to discharge the duties of postmaster the party mentioned in the text. I have no personal interest in the said locality, and have no hint to make against the present postmaster. I judge that he has done his duty, and that if he has not turned out more money it is because the post office does not afford more.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT COMMITTEE ON TRADE COMBINATIONS

Mr. BOYLE moved :

That the powers of the Select Committee appointed by this House to examine into and report upon the nature, extent and effect of certain combinations be extended so as to include the alleged combinations of Fire Insurance Companies doing business in Canada.

He said: I may explain that the object of this motion is to permit the committee appointed by this House to extend their enquiry to this very important matter. Most of the members of this House are aware of the very powerful and very arbitrary rules which exist amongst the insurance companies doing business in Canada. If the powers given to the committee appointed by this House are insufficient to include these companies in their enquiry, I think the House should remove the restriction. The committee, in taking stock of their powers, discovered that they were not able to undertake this enquiry, and I, therefore, move this resolution to enable them to do so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman deserves our thanks for his proposal to examine into this very important matter, but I would suggest to him that in view of its importance and in view of the very large amount of work that this committee will already have, that he would attain the end that he desires much better by having a special committee appointed for this subject itself. The hon. gentleman will see that, beyond all question, the investigation already assigned to the committee will probably occupy the greatest part of this Session, if not the whole of it, and I presume that the subjects first assigned will take precedence. If this motion carries, his enquiry can hardly be brought on until a late period, and evidently it is a very important enquiry. I would suggest to him that it deserves a separate committee for itself.

Mr. BOYLE. I have no objection to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The only reason why, perhaps, my motion might be more convenient is that witnesses examined on other subjects may possibly give evidence on this subject also, and without additional expense we might be able to reach the object in view. If the wisdom of the House thinks that a Special Committee would be better, I certainly would have no objection to amend my motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. Motion carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which way is the motion carried. Has the hon. gentleman consented?

Mr. SPEAKER. Carried as it is.

Motion agreed to.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—CAPITAL ACCOUNT.

Mr. JONES (Halifax) moved for :

Return giving details of the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway charged to capital account for the years 1879, 1880, 1881, 1882, 1883, 1884, 1885, 1886, 1887.

He said: In moving this motion it is my object to obtain, if possible, from the Department of Railways a correct account in detail of the expenditure of public money which has been charged to capital account during the years mentioned in the notice. The hon. the Minister of Railways will, no doubt, remember that a somewhat similar motion was made on a previous occasion, and that on more than one occasion during that Session I called the attention of the hon. gentleman to the advisability of complying with the Order of the House. The hon. gentleman was disposed to put it off from day to day, until a few days previous to the rising of the House, he brought down what he might just as well have left where it was. He brought down simply a statement giving the gross amount charged to capital account during the years mentioned in the notice. That was not what I was aiming at at all. I say, without reflecting on the hon. gentleman or his Department more than is necessary, that there is an impression in this country that a large amount of money has been charged to capital account on the Intercolonial Railway which ought to have gone to the ordinary expenses year by year; and I know that opinion is shared by many on both sides of politics in this country. I have had conversations with gentlemen who are strong supporters of the present Administration, and I have had statements from them respecting the administration of that department which, if true, would show that the Government in many cases have been disposed not to repair the rolling stock where the expenses would have to be charged to the ordinary working expenses of the year, but have broken up or disposed of that stock and have replaced it by new stock which they can charge to the capital account instead. I will give to the hon. Minister of Railways a statement of that in private, which I do not wish to make public, because it came from a source to which I attach a very great importance, and upon which I place very great reliance. It was from a gentleman an active supporter of the Government of which the hon. gentleman is a member. Under those circumstances I think it would be desirable if the hon. the Minister would at a very early date comply with the Order of the House and produce here, as he will be able to do, a return giving the detailed expenditure on all branches of the Intercolonial Railway during the years referred to in the notice of motion. It cannot be a very long account, and even if it is long we are entitled to have it because it will relieve the public mind, to a certain extent, if the Government can show that all the amount which has been charged to capital account during these years had a right to be charged to it. They should place us in possession of that before we discuss the railway accounts and before they are brought down. I hope the hon. the Minister of Railways will not delay, as he did here last year, in bringing down the return named in the scope of the motion, but will give us the full details as asked for correctly.

Mr. POPE. I do not know what was the wording of the hon. gentleman's motion last year. I notice this year that the wording of the motion is, that the return shall be brought down in detail.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And last year also.

Mr. POPE. I much prefer that should be the method adopted. I can say this to the hon. gentleman, in reference to the information which he says he has from somebody that seems to know so much about the railway, that not one engine has been sold for old iron or broken up, and a new engine bought and charged to capital account.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). And no cars?

Mr. POPE. And no cars either. If the hon. gentleman will look at the traffic accounts of that road he will see that they have more than doubled since 1876. He will also see that there must be a large amount of cars and a large amount of rolling stock added to the rolling stock, so as to be sufficient to meet this increase. The rolling stock required for this increase has been charged to capital account. A large amount of money has been expended on branches, and of course those branches have been charged to capital account, and that is why I would much rather bring the return down in detail, which will show the hon. gentleman and those who have given him this information that they are very much mistaken.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I promised the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I would give him, at the next meeting of the committee, the reason for the increase of $600 in the Finance Department at Winnipeg. I have made enquiry, and find that the increase is in consequence of changing the mode of payment of the officers there. They were allowed an additional sum for the increased cost of living, amounting to $900. That has been reduced to $600 by a readjustment of the salaries, so that there is really an actual saving of $300.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under what head did that extra allowance appear before?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose it was probably paid out of contingencies, but I will get the information.

Departmental Contingencies..... $199,250

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is an increase of $11,544.02. That arises from taking a vote for what is found to be the actual expenditure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that it is very much better that he should ask for $200,000, than that the vote should be habitually exceeded. But I would like to know from him, generally, how much of this vote really goes to extra clerks employed in the departments. Every now and then we hear that such-and-such a man has been employed and paid out of the contingencies, so that really there is a saving, but the contingencies appear to be increasing all the same. How much of this goes to pay extra clerks, and how many does the hon. gentleman suppose will be employed beyond the force of a thousand strong that I think we have already at headquarters?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will get that specific information and give it at the next meeting. The principal increase in this vote is in the Privy Council, to which the Department of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has been added.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Am I to understand that the same amount is practically taken from Legislation, for I do not think I find any corresponding decrease there?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That change has been made since last Session.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that the item of cab-hire and travelling expenses in connection with the Privy Council was pretty large last year. The First Minister had $1,900 for travelling expenses. Of course, I suppose it is necessary, when he goes on a mission in the performance of his duty as First Minister, that his expenses should be paid; but at the same time I think it is well that the House should have some explanation of this large item. I notice also that for cab-hire, the hon. gentleman got for himself $652, and that persons not named got $696—some $3,500 in all in connection with travelling expenses and cab-hire. This question of cab-hire has been before the House for several years, and I think it is time some understanding should be come to in regard to it. If the hon. First Minister finds that a salary of $3,000 a year and $1,000 for sessional allowance is not sufficient to enable him to pay his own cab-hire, let us increase his salary, and make it sufficient to enable him to do that. Then I would like to know how it is that such a large sum as $690 should be voted for cab-hire to persons not named, without any explanation being given to the House. This expenditure is growing from year to year, and I think some explanation should be given of it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think I cannot at this moment give a full explanation as to the amount of my cab-hire. I suppose it is because I am getting older, and cannot walk so much as I formerly could. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman's suggestion that all this expenditure for cab-hire might be avoided by increasing the salary of the Minister. I will go with him that far. I think my hon. friend who was my predecessor will tell him that with the obligations thrown on the Prime Minister, he cannot, unless he has private resources, keep horses and carriages, as he, no doubt, found himself. We are obliged to draw considerably on our private resources, from whatever source they come, in addition to what we get from the public in the way of salary. However, if the hon. gentleman would like to ascertain the items of this expenditure, I will get them. These items, I take it, are laid before the Auditor, and he is satisfied with the audit or he would not pass them. However, I am satisfied that the papers are before the Committee of Public Accounts, and the hon. gentleman may, if he thinks more convenient, have the vouchers for every quarter of a dollar that may have been paid for persons, named or unnamed, for cab-hire.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I am willing that the Premier should obtain as much as I got.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are talking of the doctrine of averages. You should take the average of my hon. friend. There is in the Department of Agriculture an increase of $5,000; what is that caused by?

Mr. CARLING. That is caused chiefly by the additional work relating to the Patent branch, the expenditure of which is more than paid for by the receipts from patents and trade marks. The receipts exceed the expenses by $13,000. This extra $5,000 is caused by the employment of extra clerks in the Patent branch.

Amount required to provide for the contingent expenses of the High Commissioner in London..... $2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think really the House is entitled to a good deal of explanation of this item. Is the hon. the Minister of Finance going to elect to be the Finance Minister of Canada or the High Commissioner of Canada, and when will he make up his mind? I have no doubt he will render good service in either capacity, but it does appear to me the hon. gentleman cannot be conveniently in both places at once. I know, and I think by this time he knows, that the office of Finance Minister of Canada is quite enough to occupy all the time, attention, and talents of any ordinary mortal, and I do not think that, industrious and able as he may be, he can at one and the same time efficiently discharge the duties of High Commissioner and Minister of Finance. Moreover, he will recollect that when the High Commissionership was created we were told it was a most important office, and that it was absolutely necessary in the interests of Canada we should have some sort of resident permanent ambassador at the Court of St. James to look after our interests. If that be so, and it was on that ground this office was created by statute, how can the First Minister, let alone the Minister of Finance, reconcile it with his conscience to keep that most important office practically vacant during all the period of time the Minister of Finance is attending to his duties here. I think we must press for some decision on the part of the hon. the Minister of Finance. He is very useful here, and I am bound to say that, although I differ from him in toto caelo as to his policy, I think he is much the best Minister of Finance I have come across in my time, on that side of the House, for a long period of years. He is entirely wrong as to his ends, but he has a very clear perception of the way to attain them, perhaps too clear for the public good sometimes. However that may be, and notwithstanding his great talents, that does not enable him to be at two places at once; and as it is imperatively necessary that we should have a Finance Minister, and imperatively necessary—as we have declared by statute it is—that we should have a High Commissioner, the hon. the First Minister and the hon. gentleman are bound to explain to the House how it is they have left that office vacant for such a long period of time.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I must tender my very sincere thanks to the hon. gentleman for the very great and undeserved compliment, for I feel it is quite undeserved, that he has been good enough to pay me across the floor of the House. I do not think I will have a great deal of difficulty in satisfying the House that no very great injury has been inflicted on the country by the saving of $10,000 during the past twelve months, owing to my having been charged with the performance of the duties of Minister of Finance and at the same time with the supervision of the office of the High Commissioner in London. I think I could satisfy the House without much difficulty that greater service has never been performed in connection with this office than I have been able to perform in that capacity, or in relation to the duties of that office, since this House met last Session. I can only say, that I believe in no period has the office of High Commissioner, or the connection with Her Majesty's Government, been of greater value in every possible way to Canada than it has been during the last recess of Parliament, when I was charged, on the other side of the Atlantic, with looking after the duties of that office as well as those of the Finance Department. I can only say to the hon. gentleman that he cannot be half as anxious as I am that I should be relieved of the double duties which have devolved upon me to a considerable extent for some time past. I feel my inadequacy, certainly, in every way to continue for any lengthened period duties so onerous as those which have been thrown upon me, but which, being thrown upon me, I have endeavored to discharge to the best of my ability in the interests of the country. The fact remains that although the duties of the office of High Commissioner have not been performed with the same satisfaction and advantage as they would have been, had there been a permanent officer all the time in London, yet, I think, from my intimate acquaintance with the public men of both the great parties in England, I have been enabled, although filling the office of Finance Minister at the same time, to perform very valuable and important services for the country in connection with the supervision of that office. I hope that my right hon. friend, the First Minister, may make such arrangements as will relieve me at a very early period from the double duties which have been placed upon my shoulders, but which, being called on to perform, I have performed to the best of my abilities.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman has spoken in very flattering terms of himself with reference to the discharge of the duties of High Commissioner, since he has practically abandoned the office to come to this side of the Atlantic. What the hon. gentleman has said may be true, but, at all events, it would perhaps have been less embarrassing to him and more satisfactory to the House if he had entrusted the First Minister with those handsome compliments which he has paid himself during the past five minutes. Now, we all very well remember the observations which were addressed to the House at the time it was proposed to create the office of High Commissioner. The hon. gentleman told the House at that time that it was absolutely necessary to have a Minister residing in London, that it was impossible that anyone residing on this side of the Atlantic could discharge the duties required of the High Commissioner; and the hon. gentleman told us that it would altogether relieve the Government from the necessity of sending one of its members yearly to the other side of the Atlantic to call the attention of the English Government to those important matters on which it was necessary that they should receive information from some one occupying a high position as Minister of the Crown or High Commissioner in London. The hon. gentleman at that time, acting as a Minister of the Crown, as head of the Administration, marked out the policy of the country. The hon. gentleman introduced to the House an Act in which he provided for the appointment of the High Commissioner, and pointed out what the High Commissioner's duty should be, and fixed the salary of the High Commissioner. Well, after someone else had discharged those duties for some time, the present Finance Minister was appointed to that position. The hon. gentleman may have discharged the duties very well. We, at all events, know what the expenses of the office have been, although we have not had laid before us the cogent evidence, which would have been highly satisfactory if it had been presented, for the eminent or important services which the hon. gentleman has performed. It is true that the hon. gentleman has recently acted as one of Her Majesty's representatives or Commissioners at Washington to negotiate the treaty which is now under consideration, but the hon. gentleman did not so act as High Commissioner in England. He received that special appointment quite as much as a member of the Government of Canada as the representative of Canada in London. There may be differences of opinion as to the advantages which the country has derived from the negotiation of that treaty, but this is very clear: that either the First Minister was wrong when he introduced that Bill in the opinions he expressed then, or the hon.

gentleman ought not to be here now. If the First Minister has found it necessary to the existence of his Government that the Finance Minister should have lent to that Government his very powerful support, in that case he ought not to have insisted upon the Finance Minister continuing to hold the office of High Commissioner in London. The hon. gentleman is bound, as much as anyone else in this country, to obey the law. In fact, he ought to set an example to the rest of the country, and, therefore, he ought to insist upon his colleague discharging the duties which the law imposes upon him; but, contrary to the law, contrary to the provisions of the law, and contrary to his own declaration, he is setting a very bad example to the country instead of a good one. The hon. gentleman who undertook to answer the enquiry made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), sat down without doing so. He was asked whether he proposed to continue in the office of High Commissioner or to retain the office of Finance Minister; and the hon. gentleman told the House that his duties were very onerous, that he felt he was scarcely equal to the task of holding the two offices, and that he would have to abandon one of them by-and-bye, but whether it was the office of High Commissioner or the office of Finance Minister that he was to abandon he did not inform us. I think that, after the hon. gentleman has taken the committee into his confidence, so far as to state that he intends to abandon one office or the other, he ought to have gone a step further and to have stated which office he would abandon. I think the hon. gentleman is not entitled to hold both these offices. The hon. gentleman is required, by the Act which makes him the High Commissioner, to reside in London. The hon. gentleman does not reside in London. The hon. gentleman is entitled as High Commissioner to draw a particular salary, which, if he was to draw it, disqualifies him not only from being Minister of Finance but from being a member of this House. Now, whether the hon. gentleman has drawn the salary of High Commissioner or the salary of Minister of Finance, I do not know, and I do not know that he knows. Of course he will say that he has drawn the salary of the office which subjects him to the least inconvenience; but the hon. gentleman, when he was at Washington, whether he was acting there more in his capacity as High Commissioner, or more as a Minister of the Crown, should have known in what capacity he was acting. He was not here to discharge his duties as Minister of the Crown, and we find that he is not prepared to submit to the House his Budget speech. Why not? Because he has not been here to discharge the duties of Minister of Finance, and is therefore not prepared to meet Parliament in the ordinary way. I say the present position of things is one which is highly censurable, one that this House ought not to sanction, one that the First Minister ought not to have permitted to exist; but, nevertheless, we believe, or we have been informed, that the First Minister informed his colleague a little more than a year ago that, unless he came to this country, all was lost. He came back, and, without abandoning the position of High Commissioner, he entered upon an active canvass in Nova Scotia, which, as far as I know, did not contribute very much to the discharge of those duties which he had been appointed to perform as High Commissioner. By his extraordinary activity and great energy, and not less by his extraordinary promises, he succeeded in getting a majority from his Province, and the hon. gentleman, in accordance with the requirements of political exigencies, is still here.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Yes, hon. gentlemen may say "hear, hear," but the hon. gentleman is not in London, he is not where the First Minister said his duties could only be performed, in London, and that he would be constantly there, that he would be in daily contact, if necessary, with the Colonial Secretary and other parties who might be connected with the commercial and other interests of this country. Well, Sir, is not the hon. gentleman well aware that it is impossible for him to discharge at the same time the duties of High Commissioner? I say we are entitled to know from the Government whether they have changed their views with regard to the importance of having a High Commissioner residing in London, for it is perfectly preposterous to talk about having a High Commissioner unless he resides where the law intended he should reside. If the hon. gentleman has discharged those duties in the highly efficient manner which he has spoken about to this House, he has done so while residing in this country, while engaged in the discharge of the duties of a Minister of the Crown, and if that be so, why does he continue to act as a Minister of the Crown while acting as High Commissioner? By his own confession, by his own observations addressed to the committee upon the efficient and important work which he has performed on behalf of the country during the past twelve months, he has shown conclusively that the First Minister was wrong in proposing to the House that there should be a High Commissioner appointed, and that he should reside in London.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell)

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. MILLS. Why, does the First Minister not know that his colleague has been in this country for the past fifteen months? or has the hon. gentleman, like Rip Van Winkle, been sleeping during the whole of that time?

Mr. POPE. I did not say "no."

Mr. MILLS. Well, some hon. gentleman said "no" from the Treasury benches. Like Lord Castlereagh, he has been airing his vocabulary, and does not exactly know what he did say. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that the committee are entitled to know what are the views of the Government upon this question. Do they propose to continue the office of High Commissioner, who was intended to reside in London, and whom they intend shall reside here in Canada? Do they propose that the exigencies of the public service shall adapt themselves to the exigency of party, and when it is necessary, in order to save the Government from defeat, that the hon. gentleman should come back from London, he is brought back; and when, as we are told by the hon. gentleman himself, as I understand him, the Government could not find anybody else to fill his place. The First Minister boasts that he has a large following in this House, he boasts that he has the majority of the country at his back. Well, that may be so; but if it is, what an extraordinary commentary it is upon the majority of the people of this country, when there is only one man, the Finance Minister, according to his own statement, who is competent to discharge the work of High Commissioner in London. The hon. gentleman is better in this country as High Commissioner than any other man the First Minister can find amongst his supporters, would be in London itself. Inconvenient as it may be, contrary as it may be to the policy which the First Minister has laid down for the country, that the High Commissioner should reside in London, yet we are told by the hon. gentleman that he has performed a most important service to the Government as High Commissioner while he has been on this side of the Atlantic, and that he would be delighted if the First Minister would find some one who would relieve him of his duties. But the First Minister has looked over his vast following, and amongst them all he has been unable to find a man to fill the place the hon. gentleman occupies, 3,000 miles away from the only place in which the First Minister told us any party could efficiently discharge the duties of the office.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I fully agree in the tribute which has been paid to the ability of the Finance Minister by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). I also fully and frankly accept his statement that the work of the office of High Commissioner was never more efficiently performed than during the year that has passed. But we must bear in mind that the hon. gentleman has performed other important duties during the past year than those already alluded to. It is something like fifteen months, if my memory serves me rightly, since he vacated the office of High Commissioner; during that time he has had to engage in two onerous election contests, and he has also spent three months as British plenipotentiary at Washington. Now, Mr. Chairman, if one man can discharge the office of Finance Minister during that space of time, and at the same time discharge all the duties of High Commissioner efficiently, the question will naturally arise in simple minds whether it would not be possible and profitable to abolish the office of High Commissioner altogether. Seeing these duties can be so efficiently performed from this side with all these other duties superadded, the question will be raised, and it will have to be answered: Why cannot the High Commissionership be abolished, saving to the country all the enormous expense connected therewith? It may be that it is not easy to find a man with the abilities of the hon. gentleman who fills the office of Finance Minister, but I think we may make the experiment, and as that hon. gentleman must at some time or other leave the office, whether by resignation or in the course of nature, we will hope that Providence will allow his mantle to fall on some other gentleman who can discharge those duties quite as efficiently.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the House is certainly entitled to know what the policy of the Government is. There is no doubt that this office should be dispensed with, or it should be filled. One of those two things should be done. If it be correct that the Minister of Finance, after discharging the duties of that department, is able, in the trifling portion of time which can remain to him, to discharge the duties of High Commissioner as well, then a very strong case has been made out for abolishing the High Commissionership, as my hon. friend has suggested. Before this vote is passed the Government ought certainly to tell the House what their policy is with respect to the High Commissionership.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was rather amused at hearing the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). I am going to appeal to the leader of the Opposition to keep order in his camp, and not allow two hon. gentlemen to war against each other, as they generally do in a polite way, certainly. I think the hon. member for Bothwell commenced by an attack on my hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, by saying that he has been praising himself. Well, as I understand it, the praise came from the hon. member who sits beside the hon. member for Bothwell, and knows more about these things than he does. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), stated that he believed that my hon. friend was the best Finance Minister he had seen, at all events, from this side of the House. He did not, of course, compare him with any Minister of Finance who might, perhaps, belong to the other side. That, of course, he was too modest to do. But there is one thing most extraordinary, and it is this: the utter reluctance of hon. gentlemen opposite, the party of Reform, to consent to any economy, or any saving of any kind. My hon. friend who sits near me enjoys the highly honorable and useful office of High Commissioner at a salary of $10,000 a year, besides the allowances which some hon. gentlemen have cavilled at so much from time to time. But, because he undertook to perform efficiently the duties of High Commissioner, while at the same time he acted as Finance Minister, saving the whole of the $10,000 to the country, and performing the duties of both offices for $7,000, the hon. gentleman says at once that this is an abuse. As Lord Palmerston used to say: "General professions of economy are the most popular things in the world, but the moment economy is exercised that moment it is the most unpopular step in the world." Hon. gentlemen opposite think it is unfortunate. Perhaps hon. gentlemen, looking at the early probability of their transfer to this side of the House, think it is a bad example to set that an hon. gentleman should consent to work for $7,000 when he might have drawn the whole $10,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He might not have drawn the whole $10,000.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is the position taken by the hon. gentlemen opposite. But the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says there is a good case made out for doing away with the office of High Commissioner. I think we formerly had Agents Generals in England—I think hon. gentlemen opposite appointed Agents Generals or an Agent General.

Mr. MACKENZIE. We never appointed an Agent General; we appointed a Superintendent of Immigration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, at all events, I think Mr. Jenkins styled himself Agent General. Everybody can remember that Mr. Jenkins signed himself that, and was so styled in his communications. My hon. friend beside me says it was on his door-plate.

"Exegi monumentum ære perennius."

My hon. friend near me says he was so economical that he actually charged the cost of the plate against the Government. If that had been done by my hon. friend (Sir Charles Tupper) it would have been charged against him as an unwarrantable waste of public funds. An Agent General or an agent was thought by both Governments in 1867 to be required in England, thereby doing only what other colonies, especially the Australian colonies, had been doing for many years; and the Imperial Government thought it was so important that they themselves appointed agents to represent the Crown colonies, so that every description of dependency should be represented in England. In consequence of the rising importance—perhaps the hon. gentlemen opposite will cavil at that—of the prestige and position of the Dominion of Canada over, we are proud enough to believe, every other dependency of the Crown, it was thought well to mark our progress and our position by changing the name of our agent to the High Commissioner for Canada. I do not know that hurt anybody; I do not know that our interests were injured by the change of the title from Agent General to High Commissioner. Sir Alexander Galt performed those duties for some time; financially, Sir John Rose performed them for some time, and when my friend and colleague was appointed High Commissioner there was a general consensus of opinion that we were sending a valuable man who would be able to perform the duties of that office. The only question is this: Were the duties well performed or not? The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has paid a compliment to my hon. friend, a compliment which we all believe to be deserved, but which the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) thinks it necessary to cavil at.

Mr. MILLS. No, I do not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or to sneer at.

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He insinuates—

Mr. MILLS. No.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—that which he, perhaps, does not care to assert openly, for it would look too much like a division of opinion between the two hon. gentlemen. But the hon. member for South Oxford paid a compliment in the manner in which my hon. friend has administered the office of Minister of Finance. The hon. member for Bothwell says he did not sneer at that; but he said my hon. friend cannot be a good Minister of Finance, for he has not performed his duty, that on the tenth day of the Session he has not made his Budget speech. He differed from the statement by the hon. member for South Oxford; he said my hon. friend could not be a good Finance Minister because he had not his Budget ready, he was not ready to make his Budget speech.

Mr. MILLS. I said nothing of the sort.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said my hon. friend was not able to perform his duty as Finance Minister because he was otherwise employed and could not get up his Budget speech. If that is not a censure I do not know what is. However, I will leave these little domestic quarrels or little domestic differences of opinion—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon for calling them quarrels—to be settled by themselves.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You are used to them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes. I have had a little experience in that way I admit, and I think I have got over them as successfully as he has done on some occasions. My hon. friend became Finance Minister. He waived the difference between $7,000 and $10,000. He was elected, and he sat in Parliament during the dead season of the year, giving considerable strength, considerable support and considerable comfort to myself, to his colleagues, to the country and to our friends on the Ministerial benches, and giving equal discomfort and disheartenment to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. During the dead season of the year he came in and gave us his valuable services, and earned then, as he has continued to earn, the compliments of hon. gentlemen opposite. As soon as the Session was over, after the Budget was made and the principles on which the taxation of the country was to be regulated were determined, the mere administration of the Department of Finance is a matter which does not call for the abilities of the political head of the department. The hon. gentleman knows that in the mere administration of the votes of Parliament the deputy head, Mr. Courtney, is the man to attend to it; and the hon. gentleman knows that in all cases of difficulty, in addition to there being a general reference to Council, there was a special reference to the Minister of Customs, whose department administers one of the largest sources of revenue. Perhaps the hon. gentleman opposite will object to that, because the Minister of Customs performed his duties and did not ask the difference between $7,000 and $10,000, although he was two Ministers rolled into one, performing both duties.

Mr. MILLS. He could not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. During the whole of the summer my hon. friend has performed his duties in England, more especially in regard to important financial arrangements connected with the credit of Canada, besides important continental duties. After performing those duties as agent—not as High Commissioner, for such a phrase would give offence to the hon. gentlemen opposite—during the whole of the summer, he came back in December or January, and he went back to his constituents for re-election and vindicated his right to a seat in this House, and his right to the continuance of that office, the duties of which the hon. gentleman says he is performing so ably. We have saved the money of the country, and I have no doubt that either my hon. friend or some other person will perform the duties, at the opening of the season, of High Commissioner for Canada in England. Whether I can spare my hon. friend from his present position of Minister of Finance and allow him to go back to England, depends a good deal on hon. gentlemen opposite. If they are very fierce in their attacks on us, if we become afraid of being overwhelmed by the superior ability of the hon. gentleman opposite, I may say to my hon. friend: I cannot spare you, I must keep you to fight those gentlemen. But if they are as mild as they have been at the commencement of the Session—with the exception of the hon. member for Bothwell, who is a party to himself—if things continue as pleasant as they have been hitherto, perhaps I may be able to spare my hon. friend. Do I understand the hon. gentlemen opposite desire, does the hon. member for Bothwell and does the hon. member for Middlesex desire it? He is not satisfied with this state of things and he cannot say: You must not have an agent at home, because his own party had agents at home. They never could do without agents at home. Therefore we must have an agent at home. The hon. gentleman has said that it is of more consequence to have a commissioner in England and a Finance Minister here, and to pay $10,000 there and $7,000 here, than to allow the hon. the Minister of Finance to do the duties as High Commissioner at a season when he is wanted, and at the same time remain here to be a terror to evil-doers and a praise to them that do well. The hon. gentleman who has spoken knows the good qualities of the Finance Minister best of any member sitting on that side of the House, and he knows his capacity and ability to fill the position.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. the Premier knows the force of the constitutional objection, and knows a good many other things too, but I do not know whether he has taken lessons in that kind of theatrical performance known as "gag," because I am bound to say that he has not given a proper explanation of this matter. Here is an important constitutional question raised by an hon. gentleman, and yet he treats it with the most absurd levity, and he talks about his economy in saving money by the union of both offices. Either we should have a High Commissioner according to the statute, or the office has become useless and unnecessary. Our contention is that the hon. the Minister of Finance constitutionally has no business and no right to hold those two offices together—no right whatever. To that point the hon. gentleman did not address himself at all, but he preferred to conjure up a difference which did not exist at all as between my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and myself. My hon. friend from Bothwell did not say one word in derogation of the way in which the Minister of Finance had discharged his duties. His remarks were directed to the fact, and the patent fact, that the Minister of Finance cannot discharge the duties of Finance Minister and High Commissioner at the same time. If the hon. the First Minister's statement to the House at a former time can be relied upon, questions of grave importance may arise in London during our Session, at which time it would be desirable to have a High Commissioner there. It is perfectly clear that he can by no possibility be there as the arrangement is at present. It is also contended that it is in violation of the clear purport of the Act which creates the High Commissioner, that the same man should hold both offices. Of course he cannot draw the salary of High Commissioner, because, as the hon. gentleman knows right well, that would disqualify him from sitting in Parliament, and subject him to a high penalty besides. Do not we recollect that the hon. the Minister of Finance had to have a special whitewashing indemnity Bill put through this House in order to save him from the penalties, and we remember when he could not vote in this House, although he spoke and sat in it, and on the occasion of every division that he had to retire to the gallery and look down on the hon. the Premier and his colleagues voting in support of himself. The hon. the First Minister was good enough to endeavor, as he has done very often, though unsuccessfully heretofore, and he may rest assured unsuccessfully on this occasion, too, to create some little animosity between my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and myself. He will be totally unsuccessful in that or in any similar attempt. We know that it is part of the hon. Minister's stock-in-trade to try and set hon. gentlemen on this side of the House by the ears. I remember once when I heard the hon. gentleman in the afternoon rise and compliment my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) on the breadth and statesmanlike nature of his views, and point out the contrast between them and the narrow-minded and pedantic views of my lamented friend, the late member for Chateaugay. I recollect hearing the First Minister, after returning from dinner the same night, compliment the late lamented member for Chateaugay on the breadth and statesmanlike nature of his views, which he described as in utter contradiction to the narrow pedantry of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie). I have known the hon. gentleman long and well, and I beg to assure him that no such little devices as these are likely to have the least effect on my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) or upon me. The hon. gentleman has not, as usual, told us one word as to his real intentions about this office of High Commissioner, nor has the Finance Minister told us whether he is going to elect to be Finance Minister or High Commissioner. I say it is unconstitutional in the highest degree for the hon. gentleman to hold both those offices. That is our point, and that point neither he nor the First Minister have ventured to meet in any way whatever.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can well remember that at the time the First Minister proposed we should have a High Commissioner at London, that he stated that the country would save such a very large amount of money in commissions, owing to the fact of having a High Commissioner in London, that the duties of our financial agents would be performed by him. I notice that last year we paid no less than $7,600 to Sir John Rose for commissions on account of transactions performed on behalf of this country, while at the same time we had a High Commissioner in London. I notice also that we have paid this year a very large amount on commission and interest to Baring Bros. & Co., about $17,811, and to Glen, Mills, Currie & Co. $16,398, in addition to a further large amount to Mr. Rose on commissions. If the High Commissioner is supposed to perform all the duties in connection with the financial transactions in London, and if it is possible for him to save the country these very large sums, it would be very much better for the country to have him in London than to have him here. If we are to continue paying this $34,000 in London on commissions only, because the Finance Minister of this country is not in London, it would be much better to have him there. It is rather singular that the hon. the First Minister has not been able to find a person whom he could place in the position of Finance Minister, and who would be able to discharge the duties properly. From my little experience of this House I can remember the very sickening exhibition made by his predecessor, with regard to the finances of the country, in the statement he delivered to this House. I do not wonder at all that the First Minister found it necessary to recall the hon. gentleman in order to discharge those duties. I can remember when we had the experience of his hon. colleague who sits behind him. I am sure his friends on that side of the House as well as on this, thought it desirable that some change should be made, and some man, better able to make a more intelligent explanation of the finances than he did on that occasion, selected. The First Minister only kept the hon. gentleman referred to one year in that position, when he removed him to a less important position and recalled the hon. gentleman who now fills the office. I also admit that the hon. the Finance Minister was recalled.

An hon. MEMBER. To carry the elections.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, for the twofold purpose.

Mr. BOWELL. And he did both well.

Mr. McMULLEN. I question very much if there is any man on that side of the House that could, with the same amount of force and sincerity, impose upon the country the enormous amount that he did impose in his last Budget speech by the increase of iron duties. I do not know that there is any other man who would have had daring enough to bring before this House a measure carrying with it such serious responsibilities to the consumers of iron in this country. Notwithstanding that fact he was equal to the occasion, and he laid this burden on the people of the country, who are now suffering from the results of the introduction of that policy of his last Session. There are one or two questions that have a right to be settled with regard to this matter. Either the High Commissionership is necessary or it is not necessary; and I say the country should not be called upon to pay the Minister of Finance his expenses across the Atlantic every now and then, all of which expenses connected with the positions which is filled by him are incurred. I find from the Public Accounts that the travelling expenses of the hon. gentleman have been paid in connection with the High Commissionership. If the hon. the First Minister intends to lead the House to understand that the hon. the Finance Minister is only drawing his salary as Finance Minister, he is mistaken. If he looks at the report he will find that the Minister of Finance has drawn money in connection with the High Commissionership at London. It is, therefore, unfair to attempt to give the impression to the House that he is only drawing money as Finance Minister and not as High Commissioner. As a matter of fact he is drawing money as both. The fact is that if the hon. gentleman were asked to explain the exact amount drawn as High Commissioner and as Minister of Finance, he would probably be unable to tell where one ceased and where the other began. But, occupying both offices, he has drawn a very large sum, and he has also drawn a great deal for travelling expenses. If the office of High Commissioner is at all necessary, and if we are going to save all the money that the hon. First Minister declared we would save by the establishment of that office, the sooner he fills it the better. Is it a fact, that, among the ranks of the hon. First Minister's followers, he cannot find a man of sufficient intelligence, ability, wisdom and sagacity to discharge the duties of High Commissioner in London? How is it that among all the bright geniuses he has in his ranks he cannot find one capable of performing the duties of Finance Minister? We admit that his last experiment in filling that office was a very deplorable and unfortunate one, but he should try again. Perhaps he has better material now than he had then. I hope the hon. First Minister will frankly state to the House what he intends to do. If the country is going to have the benefit of the hon. Finance Minister in the office of High Commissioner, we will promise him to cultivate that forbearance necessary to enable a new Finance Minister to get acquainted with the facts and figures connected with the finances of this country to enable him to discharge his duties, without pouncing on him too severely. But he should do one thing or the other. The hon. First Minister, when he asked us to assent to the appointment of the hon. Minister of Finance as High Commissioner, declared, with a great deal of gravity, that unless we did so the country would lose a great deal of money in paying commissions in London, and the expenses would be a great drain on our finances. But did that drain or those expenses stop? No; they went on the same as before. Sir John Rose drew a large amount of money last year, and I see his name in the list again this year.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is that possible ?

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, it is ; and if you look at the Auditor General's Report you will find it so. We sympathise with the hon. First Minister. We admit the difficulty which he has in finding anyone to fill the office of High Commissioner ; we admit that the hon. Finance Minister filled it with great ability ; and we admit that it is very difficult for him to find anyone among his followers to fill the office of Finance Minister. We admit, in view of the extravagance and profligacy with which the finances of the country are administered by hon. gentlemen opposite, that it is difficult to get a man who has brass enough and boldness enough to take that office. The hon. gentleman has a great many followers with plenty of those qualities, but I do not know that he has one man in whom they are combined to such an extent as they are in the hon. gentleman who now holds the office.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not intend to say very much on this matter, but I want to appeal to the hon. High Commissioner, if he is High Commissioner, or to the hon. Finance Minister if he is Finance Minister, or I appeal to him in both capacities, to act squarely and honestly before this country and select one position or the other. When the hon. gentleman was appointed High Commissioner everybody was pleased. The country had confidence in his ability, and I think his career on the other side of the Atlantic showed that a High Commissioner who had some skill and some knowledge of the interests of this country was of great service. I recollect that on one occasion when Canada was threatened with being scheduled against the importation of cattle into Great Britain, the hon. gentleman took the matter up, went down to Liverpool, went into the cattle yards, took off his coat, and, with that scientific and practical knowledge which he possesses, convinced the British Commissioners that it was unnecessary to schedule the cattle of Canada. We acknowledge the great service he has rendered to the country in many other ways ; but I hold that it is a disgrace to this House to have a man occupying the office of High Commissioner in London, where his residence is and where his duties lie, at the same time sitting here as Finance Minister. There is no man on that side of the House in whom I have as much confidence as the Finance Minister of Canada. I know his ability, I know his courage, his determination and his cheek, and I commend him for it. But, Sir, I do protest as an independent man against the Premier of this country trifling with the Constitution by appointing a man High Commissioner to-day, and, when it is necessary to bulldoze Nova Scotia in the general election, sending for my hon. friend to come out and use his influence to carry that Province. Sir, there is no man in Canada who could have done it but the hon. gentleman ; and if the right hon. First Minister occupies the position of Premier of this country to-day, he owes it to the man sitting on his right, who occupies the dual position of High Commissioner and Finance Minister. I say it is time this farce was at an end, and I ask, for the reputation of the hon. gentleman himself, that it should be brought to an end, for I am afraid that otherwise he will fall in the high esteem in which I have ever held him. I say it is an outrage on the part of the Premier of this House to perpetrate on this House and this country the act of keeping a man in two positions at the same time, with the functions of the one to perform on the other side of the Atlantic, and the functions of the other on this side. I hope we shall have a vote on this question, and I could not allow the occasion to pass without expressing my views on the course the Government are taking.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Mr. McMULLEN.

RETURN ORDERED.

Return showing the amount voted each Session since 1880 for subsidies to Railways ; also, the amount to each Province, and the amount that has been paid.—(Mr. Semple.)

ADJOURNMENT—L'ASSOMPTION ELECTION.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. LAURIER. I would ask if the writ for the election in the county of L'Assomption has been issued ?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has, and we have fixed the nomination for as early a day as we could.

Mr. LAURIER. What date ?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think the 3rd of next month will be the last day of voting. There has been no more than the legal delay.

Motion agreed to ; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 9th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 32) to incorporate the Dominion Plate Glass Insurance Company.—(Mr. Holton.)

Bill (No. 33) to amend the Act incorporating the Hereford Branch Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Hereford Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the South Norfolk Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

DEATH OF THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire whether the Government have received any positive information of the death of the Emperor of Germany ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have not received any positive information as a Government, but some of my colleagues and myself have received from the telegraph office a statement that the Emperor died this morning at half-past eight, and that the report was confirmed officially.

THE FISHERY TREATY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I promised the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that I would lay on the Table to-day the letter addressed to me by Mr. Bayard, and my answer.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to call the attention of the acting Premier to a rumor that is afloat, of an act which is somewhat at variance with the constitutional government of this country. It is that His Excellency the Governor General invited Messrs. Greenway and Martin, the reprerepresentatives of the Government of Manitoba who are at present here, to an interview with him in relation to the difficulties existing between that Province and the Dominion. Now, as I understand constitutional government, the business of the country is carried on by the Ministers, who are responsible to this House and to the people for the acts which pass under the name of the Government, and hence under the name of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen; and if it is true, and I believe it is, that by the invitation of the Governor those gentlemen have had an interview with him on these matters, I would like to know whether it was at the instance of the Government or at the instance of the Governor himself? If it was the latter, I should regret that, at the close of a long career, which has been satisfactory alike to the people and the Government, His Excellency should attempt to interfere with matters that pertain solely to his advisers, and for which they are responsible. Therefore, I would like to know whether the Governor has acted on behalf of his Government, or whether he has assumed a responsibility which, in my opinion, he has no right to assume?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I hope the hon. gentleman will renew his question when the hon. First Minister is here. The charge that the hon. gentleman makes, or supposes can be made, against His Excellency the Governor General, is one that should be met by the First Minister. For my own part, all I can say to the hon. gentleman is that we, as the responsible advisers of the Crown, are ready at all times to take the responsibilities of any act of the Governor General in matters of State; and His Excellency, to my knowledge, and I have no doubt to the knowledge of the House, has never exposed himself to be called to account for any interference that would not be in a constitutional way.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is not a question whether the Government assumed the responsibility of the acts of the Governor or not. The question I put is whether the Governor performed this act with the knowledge and at the request of the Government of the day, or whether he assumed it on his own mere motion. If the latter, I hold that he is interfering with matters with which he has no right to interfere under the Constitution. Now that the hon. First Minister has come in, I would repeat the question to him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say that I was not aware, and I do not know that any of my colleagues were aware, that His Excellency had sent for these two gentlemen to talk over public matters. I had not heard of it until just this moment, but I take exception to the doctrine that the Governor General or Her Majesty cannot talk to such people as she or he may choose.

Mr. LAURIER. If my hon. friend for Northumberland will allow me, I would take exception to what he has said. Whether Mr. Greenway, or any other member or members of the Manitoba Government, were invited by the Governor General, or by this Government, to meet His Excellency, is of little moment, as the Government are the official advisers of His Excellency, and must be held responsible in either case.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not object to holding them responsible for it. That was not the point. What I wanted to know was, whether His Excellency, on his own mere motion, did this, because, if he did, I hold he was wrong?

Mr. LAURIER. The Government are the parties responsible.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is another matter of some importance with which I think the House should be made acquainted before the Orders of the Day are called. It is this; I find in the Montreal Gazette the following:—

“NEWFOUNDLAND ASKED TO ENTER THE CONFEDERATION.

“DELEGATES TO VISIT OTTAWA.

“The Proposition Well Received and Likely to be Accepted by the Ancient Colony.

“HALIFAX, N.S., March 8.—[Special.]—The Halifax Herald will publish to-morrow a special cablegram from St. John's, Nfld., showing that practical steps have been taken to embrace the ancient colony of Newfoundland in the Canadian Confederation. The following correspondence was laid before the Newfoundland Legislature to-day:—

“The Governor General of Canada to the Governor of Newfoundland:

“March 6, 1888.

“It is considered by my Government that, if your Government approves, the time would be convenient for the discussion of the question of the admission of Newfoundland into the Federal Union, and that no difficulty would be likely to arise in arranging the terms. Under these circumstances could you send a deputation to Ottawa, with power to negotiate? In our opinion the deputation should represent the Opposition as well as the Ministerial party. As the Canadian Session has begun, and may be short, I would suggest the expediency of the deputation sailing by the steamer leaving on the 19th inst.

“The Governor of Newfoundland to the Governor General of Canada:

“March 7, 1888.

“I have received your telegram and laid it before my Ministers.

“The question is now being discussed among the parties, and your correspondent has no doubt but that a deputation will be sent.”

This appears in one of the numerous organs of the Government and I presume it to be correct. I think that as Parliament is in Session, before a communication of that kind should be sent to another colony the Parliament of Canada ought to have been taken into consultation on the subject. In so important a question as that of admitting a remote Province like Newfoundland into the Union, the Government should not have assumed the responsibility of acting as they appear to have done, without having taken the Parliament of Canada into their confidence, while that Parliament is in Session. I would like the right hon. the First Minister to say whether there is any truth in the statement or not.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is true; those negotiations have taken place.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then I think the House has been treated with scant courtesy, very scant courtesy, indeed—hon. gentlemen on that side as well as on this—by a matter of that importance being first made public through the medium of one of those paid hirelings of the hon. gentleman. I think it is utterly discourteous and unconstitutional, and it goes to show that true constitutional parliamentary government is becoming utterly unknown in Canada. We have a one-man power, we have an autocrat here to do as he pleases; and to all practical purposes, the people of Canada would be better off if they would send 130 or 140 proxies to the hon. gentleman, and thus save expense.

THE ONDERDONK ARBITRATION.

Mr. POPE. I was not in a position the other day to answer the question put by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), but I am happy to be able to do so now. The amount of the valuation of the rolling stock taken, under the terms of the contract, from the contractors of the western section of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia, is as follows:—

Eight locomotives and 185 platform cars	$199,535 00
Account for the transportation of the above from British Columbia to Chaudiere.	22,028 19
Account for the repairs of the above	4,016 92
Total	$225,570 11

Against that we have the following:—

Account against the C.P.R. for hire of the above.....	$41,590 00
Account against the C.P.R. for three platform cars destroyed in their service.....	2,265 00
Account against the C.P.R. for nine platform cars undelivered.....	6,795 00
Total.....	$50,650 00
Balance, being total cost.....	$174,920 11

Mr. DAVIES. Does that include the moneys paid to the Grand Trunk Railway as well as to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

THE FISHERIES CONFERENCE.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. the Finance Minister yesterday, in answer to an enquiry I made, informed us that the date of the proposal he made to the Commission at Washington, relating to trade matters, was the 3rd December. Among the papers he laid before the House there is a reply to that proposal by the American commissioners. I would ask the hon. gentleman to give us the date on which that reply was handed in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will do that.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY ACCOUNT.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. the Minister of Railways was to have brought down an answer to a part of my question touching the account of the Intercolonial Railway, which he was not able to answer the other day. He gave the receipts up to the 1st of March, and he said that in two or three days he hoped to be able to give the expenditure. Has he got that yet?

Mr. POPE. No, I have not. I do not remember that I said in two or three days, but I think I said as soon as I could.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does not the hon. gentleman get both earnings and expenses together?

Mr. POPE. Not necessarily, because the one takes longer to get than the other.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Payments to officers of the Post Office and Finance Departments for balancing and computing interest on depositors' accounts in Savings Banks. $3,100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the increase of $200 for?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was found that the amount required was a little larger than the appropriation. That item, as the hon. gentleman knows, is to pay the officers who are engaged in calculating the interest in the Post Office and Finance Departments.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I know that very well. What I want to know particularly is, are these practically extra payments for over hours' work?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because I have called attention more than once, and so have other members of this House, to the vicious practice of allowing men in the service of the Government to considerably augment their salaries by doing extra work. I do not know how far that goes in regard to this particular work, but I take it that all this money goes to increase the salary of the employes.

Mr. McLELAN. This involves a lot of extra work, and it is thought better that the clerks who are familiar with this work should continue to do it than that strangers should be called in for that purpose.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think it is quite evident that the Savings Bank system is likely to be continued in this country for some time to come, and I, therefore, think that the Civil Service Act should be changed so that the clerks should perform this duty without any extra pay. I find, for instance, that there are no less than 382 clerks in the employment of the several departments, who have drawn no less than $120,258 for extra services in connection with their respective duties. If it is considered that a clerk is not getting the amount of salary he should have, it would be better to amend the Act so as to include all these duties, because, when a clerk understands that, if he labors one or two hours after the regular hours, he is to be paid extra, the probability is that he would leave something over during his regular hours in order to get something to do by way of overtime. It is an inducement to clerks to put in extra time and not to perform their duties efficiently during the hours they are supposed to labor, and I think it is highly in the interest of the Civil Service that a change should be made. I find one case where a man who is getting $1,400 of salary receives $25 56 for calculating interest. Another man who is getting $300 as a salary receives $300 for calculating savings bank interest. Another man gets $1,400 as a salary, Mr. J. R. Smith, and he receives $33 for counting interest. I think, for a man who gets $1,400 salary it is a pretty small matter on his part to extort out of the people of this Dominion $33 for calculating interest in the department to which he belongs. The whole of this system is wrong, and the Government ought to amend the Civil Service Act and not leave this as a bribe which these men may extort for doing this because it is not within their regular hours.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It would be hardly right that I should allow the very strong language the hon. gentleman has used to go unanswered. There is no disposition to extort anything from the public Treasury, and to provide for the performance of this work in the ordinary way would add very largely to the public expenditure. It is found that a large number of these accounts have to be dealt with in a very short space of time, and the only persons who can deal with them efficiently are the officials who are upon a salary and upon whose time we have a claim for certain hours. By allowing these gentlemen who are familiar with the duties to perform these when this fresh press of work comes, and to be paid for the time they are occupied outside of the hours they are paid for in the ordinary discharge of their duties, the work is efficiently and quickly performed, and at a very great saving to the country. This has been explained again and again to the House, and I think the House has generally concurred in the wisdom of that expenditure. I quite admit that, under ordinary circumstances, the payment of clerks for time over and above their ordinary duties is an objectionable course, but it has been found that this is a case in which it is generally convenient, in the interests of the public service, and in point of time, and in regard to the discharge of the duties of the service, to make an exception, and I hope the House will not insist upon abandoning that course, because it would result in the necessity of appointing additional officers.

Mr. CASEY. The Minister of Finance is quite mistaken in supposing that the House has agreed to the system which is now in force at any time. There always has been objection to the system and there always will continue to be objection to the system. The Minister is also mistaken in saying that the abandonment of this plan would result in requiring the employment of extra men. They would be the same men. These men are now doing the work, and they are simply paid for extra hours. There is no increase in the number; there is only an increase in the expense. The only question is whether the employes in this department should not be compelled to perform this duty, which occurs, I believe, once a year,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Twice a year.

Mr. CASEY. Well, twice a year, without extra pay. It is well to compare their position with that of clerks in banks and loan companies, where similar duties have to be performed at certain times of the year. It is true that, in banks and loan companies and other financial institutions, and in merchants' offices, there are periods of the year when clerks are required to do extra work. Are those clerks paid extra for that? I am not engaged in that sort of business, but I know a great many bankers, and I never heard of any such payment being made, and I do not think it is necessary that it should be made in the Civil Service. The hon. Minister speaks as if we only hired these men for a certain number of hours per day. The hon. gentleman is wrong. Their whole time is hired and paid for by the Government. There are certain hours fixed for them as a general rule, no doubt, but their whole time is at the disposal of the Government; and, if they object to that, they can resign. From a legal, as well as from a common sense point of view they are subject to perform extra duties in the same way as clerks in banks or other institutions, and my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. McMullen) is quite right in saying that the idea of paying them for over-hours is a vicious one, and there is a temptation in that for them to leave work undone in their ordinary hours. I do not say that every clerk would yield to that temptation, but there can be no doubt that it leaves temptation in the way of these clerks, and I have no doubt that the temptation in some cases has been effective and that work has been left undone during the hours for which the hon. Minister mistakenly says they are only paid for. But I cannot allow the item to pass without distinctly making the point that civil servants are not employed merely for so many hours, but their whole time belongs to the Government. I also object to the system of putting temptation in their way to leave their work undone, as is the practical effect under the present regulations.

Mr. McLELAN. I desire to say that there is not a staff in the Civil Service who work longer hours and more industriously than the staff connected with the Savings Bank branch of the Post Office Department.

Mr. CASEY. That can easily be.

Mr. McLELAN. There is not a week passes in which a large number of these men work over-hours, that is to say, longer hours than in any other branch of the service. That is especially the case about the 1st of January and the 1st of July, when there is an extra rush of work to get the accounts closed up and the balances struck in a very short time, work which cannot be done at any other period of the year than at those dates, and it is necessary that the clerks should work night and day in order to overtake the work. If we did not employ these both night and day, it would be necessary to bring in new men, and it would be very inconvenient for them to take up the books where these other men left off. Strangers who are not acquainted with the books cannot do as satisfactory work as those who are familiar with it. I think that on previous occasions the House has not taken exception to allowances to civil servants for doing over-work, and I do not see why an exception should be made in the present case.

Mr. CASEY. I think the hon. gentleman, like the most of us, was once in business for himself, and I would like to ask him when there was an occasional extra press of work, such as stock-taking, or balancing accounts, or anything of that sort, did he resort to either of these two alternatives—did he employ outsiders, or did he pay his clerks for working overtime?

Mr. McLELAN. I paid them extra.

Mr. CASEY. Then the hon. gentleman is much more generous than any of his colleagues whom I have come across. But if he paid his clerks extra for working overtime, in stock-taking, or in any of those pinches that occur in the course of business, he does more than any business man is in the habit of doing that I am acquainted with—at least very few do so. But the point is that neither one of the alternatives need be adopted—neither outsiders need be employed, nor need the clerks be paid extra for over-work, because their whole time belongs to the Government. If it is thought that the salaries are not sufficient, they can either resign—and I think the Government would have no difficulty in finding others at the same salary—or the Government might increase their salaries, and a slight increase would amount to less than these extra and irregular payments. Both of the hon. Ministers who have spoken have made a great point out of the awkwardness of bringing in outsiders. Now, if I am not misled by the item itself, this is merely a question of making up interest on deposits. I do not see why any able outside accountant, if it was necessary to employ one, should not be as well able to make up depositors' accounts as a clerk of the department. No special knowledge is required to calculate interest on deposits.

Amount required for salaries of Board of Examiners and other expenses in connection with the Civil Service Act..... $7,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason of this increase of $500?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is caused by the increase in the number of applicants for examination, which necessitates a larger amount of printing and other contingencies. There is no increase in the number of employes. I may mention that the greatest portion of the expenditure for that service is covered by moneys that come back to the Treasury in the way of fees.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the amount of fees received?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think it was, last year, over $3,000. There were over 1,200 examinations.

Mr. CASEY. Could the hon. gentleman tell us to what extent the number of examinations have increased over the preceding year?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I cannot answer the question at the moment, but I know there has been a very large increase in the number of examinations, and it has been reported to me that this increase has necessitated a corresponding increase in the amount for printing and other contingencies.

Mr. DAVIES. Why does the hon. gentleman ask such a large sum when, of the sum voted last year, $1,500 were not required? There does not seem to be any sense in asking for a couple of thousand more than the actual expenditure. Last year, of the amount voted, $5,415, $1,584 was not used.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I have received from the examiners a demand for this grant; it is a very small increase over the ordinary expenditure. But if, as my hon. friend says, $1,500 remain unexpended of last year's vote, certainly a smaller sum than here asked for would seem to suffice.

Consequently I ask that the item be suspended until I enquire into it.

Mr. MILLS. I would like to ask the hon. Secretary of State what number of the 1,200 who were examined have received appointments? It would be well for the House to know just what number of offices are becoming vacant, and the number who are yearly coming into positions.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That report has been put before the House.

Mr. MILLS. If the number of those who are examined is greatly in excess of the number of vacancies, that might be a reason for increasing the difficulties of the examination.

Miscellaneous Justice, including North-West Territories..... $20,000

Mr. LAURIER. What does the hon. Minister understand by Miscellaneous Justice? That seems to be a very vague term to apply to the administration of justice.

Mr. THOMPSON. It refers to the excellent system of justice we administer. The items refer principally to the administration of justice in the North-West, witnesses' fees and all expenditures of that character in connection with the court houses, and everything connected with the administration of justice in the North-West not paid by the municipalities or by the provincial authorities.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think there is an item of expenditure which requires a little explanation. I observe an item in the Public Accounts in connection with the investigation of charges against Judge Travis. I think, as a very great number of statements have been made of a very varied and contradictory character about that officer, the Minister ought, on this occasion, to put the House in possession of the reasons for and results of that investigation. I understand Judge Travis is no longer in the service.

Mr. THOMPSON. He is no longer in the service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have seen some very remarkable letters over the signature of Mr. Travis, if I am not mistaken, reflecting greatly on the Minister of Justice himself. Those I do not propose, at this instance, to bring into controversy, but I should like to have from the Minister a succinct statement of the reasons of Mr. Travis's suspension or removal, or whatever it has been.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman, perhaps, does not remember that I laid on the Table of the House last Session the report of Judge Taylor, the Commissioner who made the investigation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think it has been printed.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was laid on the Table in response to a motion made by some hon. gentleman opposite. The report which was made by Judge Taylor, now Chief Justice of Manitoba, was that it was undesirable that Mr. Travis should continue to exercise the functions of stipendiary magistrate in the judicial district which had been assigned to him. The opinion of Judge Taylor, from the evidence taken before him,—and the evidence was very voluminous at the enquiry which he made,—and the opinion of myself and my colleagues as well, I think, was that the evidence not only justified the report which the commissioner made but precluded the Government from recommending the appointment of Mr. Travis to the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories. The hon. gentleman will remember, when I recall it to him, that shortly after the investigation was ordered the North-West Territories Judicial Act came into operation, the effect of which was that the various stipendiary magistracies of the North-West were abolished, and a Supreme Court was organised in their place. Mr. Travis passed from office as a stipendiary magistrate by virtue of the operation of that Act, and the Act under which he was appointed provided that the retiring allowances in such cases should apply to all stipendiary magistrates of the Territories. Subsequently the report was made by Judge Taylor, and the only question that had to be dealt with in regard to Mr. Travis was, whether he should be appointed to the Bench of the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories or not; and he was not appointed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What pension is Mr. Travis receiving?

Mr. THOMPSON. $720 or $730, I think.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then we got off comparatively cheaply. He was appointed two or three years ago, if my memory serves me, and in a couple of years he was found to be unfit for the delicate and important position in which he was placed. He is, then, superannuated and becomes a permanent charge on the ratepayers of the Dominion. His unfitness has been reported on by a distinguished judge, who is now Chief Justice of Manitoba. It does look as if there was considerable carelessness exercised in the selection of Mr. Travis for an appointment of that description.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has not heard the explanation I made, which was that Mr. Travis passed out of office by the reason of the abolition of his office; and by the statute under which he was appointed he was entitled under those circumstances to superannuation, and the superannuation was calculated at the ordinary rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I quite understand the modus operandi by which he had his head cut off. My point was that very great carelessness had been made in making the appointment, if within a couple of years after Mr. Travis' appointment it was necessary to call upon him to resign.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The House has not yet been informed on the point which the hon. member for South Oxford has brought under notice. The Minister of Justice says there was very voluminous evidence submitted before Judge Taylor; and I observe that $500 or $600 have been paid for transcribing that evidence. The evidence has not yet been laid before the House, and even if it was individual members would hardly be able to master it unless it was printed; but the House would like to know from the Minister what were the grounds of Mr. Travis' practical dismissal, for that is what it amounted to. Technically his position was abolished by the Judicature Act of the North-West Territories, but under ordinary circumstances he would have been appointed to another judicial position fixed by the same Act, and we understand he was not appointed because of some malfeasance or improper conduct in office. We would like to know from the Minister of Justice, who says he formed a strong opinion on the case which was shared by his colleagues, the grounds considered sufficient to justify the Government in not recommending Mr. Travis for promotion.

Mr. THOMPSON. To state with any degree of fullness, or in any such way that the hon. gentleman would be satisfied with the explanation, would be difficult, considering that the charges have been investigated by a judge receiving evidence which probably covers a thousand pages. But I will state briefly, that in the opinion of the commissioner who made the enquiry, and certainly in my own opinion, Mr. Travis exceeded his jurisdiction in administering his office in the District of Calgary, that he exceeded that jurisdiction very greatly to the disadvantage of good order and of good government in the Territories. As regards the particular instances in which he exceeded that jurisdiction, one of them was in relation to the press of the particular district in which he exercised his office. Hon. gentlemen may remember that the judge's conduct was made the subject of comment and observation in this House shortly after it was announced, and I did the best I could, with the information at my command, to induce the House to suspend judgment, which was disposed to be exceedingly unfavorable to the magistrate. The investigation subsequently disclosed all the particulars of the transactions, and certainly led me to consider that the judge not only exceeded his jurisdiction, but that he had done so in a manner, and in instances, which caused it to be very undesirable to allow his conduct to pass without marked censure. The testimony taken at the investigation shows the judge to have exceeded his authority—that the judge's view as to his authority and as to his duty was so clearly erroneous and out of keeping with the modern view as to judicial rights, that it was unfit and intolerable that a person holding those views and exercising such authority should continue to hold his office. The particular instance in regard to the press was that Mr. Travis caused the imprisonment of a newspaper proprietor or editor who had chosen to question his actions and the accuracy of his decision. Another instance in which I think he entirely exceeded his authority was his suspension of a legal gentleman from practising at the bar of his court. The reason assigned for doing so was that this particular gentleman had attended a public meeting, called an indignation meeting, and at that meeting had expressed an opinion unfavorable to the judge and the proceedings he had taken in regard to the newspaper editor a few days before; and upon the gentleman taking his seat in court the magistrate ordered him to rise, and announced to him that he was suspended from practice, I think for two years, and banished "to the milder climate of Manitoba." There were instances also of the judge having otherwise exceeded his jurisdiction in a manner unfavorable to the administration of the law in his district. The most notable of those, other than the one I have mentioned, was the case in which he dealt with the municipal corporation of the town of Calgary. In that instance the affairs of the municipality were being conducted by a mayor and town council, and the magistrate formed the opinion that the mayor and town council were too favorable to the persons who were engaged in the liquor traffic in the town of Calgary. A petition was presented to him (it is alleged at his own instance, but that, however, has not been well established) indicating that those persons had, in relation to the election then about to be held, committed corrupt practices. The corrupt practices consisted merely of this: The mayor and town council were at the time revising the electoral list; the election was about to be held and they added, in the exercise of their judgment as to who were entitled to be on the list, a large number of persons to the electoral list. I think they added them irregularly and improperly, but the magistrate had no more to do with that question than I had. They were a committee to do this, authorised by law and subject to no control by him; but he not only undertook to review the decision as to the revision of their list, but he pronounced it to be a corrupt practice in relation to an election which had not come off, unseated the mayor and town council, disqualified them for a period of years, and imposed heavy fines upon them. At a subsequent period an election having been held to supply the vacancy he had thus caused by disqualifying the town council, in one or two instances, if not more (the hon. gentleman will understand I am speaking necessarily from memory, and have not referred to the papers for some months past), the candidates whom he had unseated and disqualified were returned by overwhelming majorities, and he repeated his judgment of unseating and disqualification, sent for the return of the returning officer, and with his own hand declared the persons who had been overwhelmingly beaten to be duly returned in the election, and seated them as town councillors. The matter was carried on with such a degree of violence, as might be anticipated, that the mere idea of law and authority in his district was associated with ridicule, and it was conceived that the magistrate did not possess the idea of the duties of his office, of the powers of his office, or of the mode of conducting his office, which a person should possess in order to be appointed to the new court of the North-West Territories.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am only astonished that after the statement made by the Minister that this worthy gentleman, Judge Travis, has not been appointed returning officer in general for this Dominion.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Not having had the advantage of reading the evidence or the report that the Minister of Justice refers to, I cannot attempt to challenge the correctness of the judgment he formed. I am very glad he made the statement he has made, however, for a number of reasons; firstly, because I think the removal of a man holding the judicial position he held, and the reasons for his removal, should always be communicated to Parliament in an authoritative statement; and, secondly, because I think they have important bearing upon the action which certain judges in other parts of the Dominion are now taking. I rejoice to see that it will become known generally throughout the Dominion that when judges attempt arbitrarily to punish those who practice before them, or those who make adverse comments upon judgments which they deliver, that those judges will find a power stronger than themselves, who will overrule them and may, perhaps, in a certain sense punish them. Mr. Travis, I am sorry, committed the offences, if we may term them such, or the errors which the Minister of Justice referred to. He was known when he practised at the bar of New Brunswick, as a painstaking and learned lawyer, and it was considered that he would distinguish himself in his judicial career. I shall call the attention of the Minister of Justice—now that he has spoken his views upon the exercise by judges of the power to punish for contempt, and characterised the exercise of that power in Mr. Travis' case as the exercise of a somewhat antiquated power—I would call his attention to the fact that in the eastern portion of the Dominion, the judges are about to exercise a power somewhat similar, in the case of a newspaper published in the town of Moncton. It will be remembered that some time ago an election took place in the county of Westmoreland, and that one of the judges of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, when applied to fix a day for the election petition, was asked specially to fix that day within the six months, for fear some question might be raised as to his jurisdiction, if he placed it beyond the six months. That judge, after considering, refused to fix the day within the six months; or rather, at first he did fix it, and changed his mind afterwards and fixed it beyond the six months. After the time for the trial had been fixed beyond the six months, when the day arrived the gentleman who had been elected to the seat, through his counsel, applied to set aside the whole proceedings on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction, and this same judge who had very deliberately refused to fix the time within the six months, and had placed it beyond the six months, turned round and joined in the judgment of the court declaring that his own action had been extra-judicial and beyond his power, and that no trial of it could take place. Well, such an extraordinary state of things, in the case of the same judge within a very short space of time, resulting in the prevention of the investigation into that election petition altogether and in depriving the candidate and the electorate of Westmoreland of the power of testing whether that election had been carried correctly or not, naturally enough formed the subject of public comment. One of the newspapers published in that town called attention to it in pretty vigorous and strong language. I may say the circumstances justified the use of very strong language. Unexplained, the circumstances were such as, in my humble judgment, a newspaper would have failed to discharge its duty if it had not called public attention to them. We find now the extraordinary spectacle that, in this nineteenth century, the old antiquated notions which some judges possess, as the Minister of Justice has said prevail, and that they are furbishing up their old armour so that this unfortunate man, who had the temerity to call attention to the extraordinary change of views of that learned judge, is now dragged before the Supreme Court of New Brunswick and threatened with fine and imprisonment for daring to make any comment on the conduct of this august individual. After what has been said by the Minister of Justice I trust those judges will learn that they are not above the law, and that their attempt to burnish their antiquated weapons, which may be necessary under some extreme circumstances, is now unadvisable; and that at the present day, unless in extraordinary cases, those judges will learn that if they do so they will incur the displeasure of the Minister of Justice and this High Court of Parliament. I, myself, shall look with no small degree of interest upon the action of the Supreme Court in attempting to punish an editor who had the temerity to express his honest conviction upon the most extraordinary conduct and most extraordinary change of opinion on the part of a learned judge. I think that the remarks of the Minister of Justice with reference to the punishment by Mr. Travis of the men who offended against his dignity ought very well to be applied to a judge who attempts to punish this newspaper editor in the Town of Moncton for daring to comment on Mr. Justice Fraser's conduct. It is curious that analogies can be found in an eastern Province for some of the acts for which Mr. Justice Travis was punished. It seems that he was foolish enough to interfere with a matter which he had no right to interfere with, that is, with the lists for the election of municipal councillors in the town of Calgary. I remember that, a year ago, a learned judge, to whom was committed, by law, the duty of determining when and where there should be a recount in a certain county in New Brunswick, in the exercise of his proper and legitimate jurisdiction ordered a recount, when his hand was stayed by a judge of the Supreme Court of New Brunswick, who issued a writ of prohibition, and thus prevented the law from taking its course. The result was an arbitrary, improper, illegal and unjustifiable return, made by a partisan returning officer, who I had hoped would be punished by the law, but who has, so far, escaped. That return was allowed to stand, and the member was returned to this House, and sat here nearly the whole Session, although he had no more right to sit here than one of the messengers. This shows that Mr. Justice Travis was not alone in usurping this extraordinary power of interfering in elections. In that case, too, some of the newspapers, shocked at the attempt made by a judge of the Supreme Court to interfere with the jurisdiction of a County Court judge, published some comments on the action of that learned judge, and those gentlemen were dragged before this tribunal and punished for what was alleged to be a contempt of court. The Minister of Justice tells us, in so many words, that this antiquated idea of punishing the press, because they express opinions on the judgments of the bench, will not be supported by the powers that be; and we are in hopes that he will not be satisfied with punishing Mr. Justice Travis only, but will also eke out even-handed justice and punish those judges in the Province of New Brunswick who acted in the same way as Mr. Justice Travis.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Mr. THOMPSON. I will not, of course, discuss the particular cases the hon. gentleman has called attention to, principally because I have not sufficient acquaintance with the details of them to be able, with any degree of confidence, to discuss them; but, unless I am very much misled by the information I have in regard to those cases in the eastern Provinces, they differ in the widest possible degree from the cases that have called for executive action in the North-West.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the hon. Minister of Justice ought to have enquired into the conduct of Judge Tuck, in the Province of New Brunswick. As a judge of the Supreme Court, he had no right whatever to interfere with the County Court judge in the discharge of his duties. The law authorised Judge Steadman to make a recount when proper application was made to him. He appointed a particular time for that recount, and was proceeding to discharge his duties when a writ of prohibition was issued by Judge Tuck which prevented him making that recount. Now, I say, that the result of that action was that a man was fraudulently returned to this House by a returning officer, and was permitted to retain a seat here during an entire Session. And Judge Tuck, who was guilty of this high-handed and illegal proceeding, ventured to commit the editors of two newspapers who had adversely criticised his conduct. Now, however violent those criticisms may have been, they were far less injurious to the public interest than the arbitrary and illegal conduct of the judge; and it seems to me to be of the utmost importance that the Minister of Justice should make enquiries into the matter, and that the result of those enquiries should be submitted to this House.

Mr. LANDRY. I do not think it right to let pass entirely unanswered what has been advanced by the hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House. I am not in a position at present to detail to the House exactly what did take place, but I may make it my business before many days to do so, because I feel that hon. gentlemen opposite have not accurately stated the position of affairs in New Brunswick in the comments they have made. When the hon. member who has just taken his seat says that the conduct of Mr. Justice Tuck was high-handed and illegal, I am not prepared to say positively that he is wrong, though I might express the opinion that he is wrong. But I would say this much, that it appears to me that the proper place to have that question tested was in the Court of Appeal of New Brunswick, on an appeal as to whether the issue of that writ of prohibition was wrong. If it was wrong, it could have been righted there; and if that court was not able to give a satisfactory decision, the question could have been appealed to a still higher court. The hon. gentleman should have remembered this, if he did not, that the application which was made for a recount was not an ordinary application for a recount. It was made on a return of a member by acclamation, and where the record showed no original count. As the matter stood, the returning officer had made a return, not that the votes had been counted, but that there was only one candidate put in nomination, and, therefore, that the candidate returned as elected, was elected, not by the ballots given, but by acclamation, there being nobody else in the field.

Mr. MACKENZIE. A vote was taken.

Mr. LANDRY. That may be; but I am merely speaking of the record as it appeared. The record was that the returning officer returned a man as elected as being the only one in nomination. Therefore, when the learned judge was asked to make a recount, when upon the record itself there had been no count, it appears to me there might be some justification for another judge, on application made on the record, to issue the writ of prohibition. I think it would be somewhat presumptuous on my part to express as strong an opinion as the hon. gentleman who last spoke, that the action of Mr. Justice Tuck was entirely illegal or legal; but I make these remarks to show that the position of affairs was not properly explained by the hon. member for Bothwell, if he remembered it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think my hon. friend has not correctly stated the facts of this case. He has forgotten that a vote took place, and the deputy returning officers returned the ballots; and those ballots were what the judge of the county court was to recount. If my hon. friend will look at the Act, he will find that Judge Steadman had no alternative but to proceed in the manner in which he did proceed. In any case in which the County Court judge has a right to count the ballots he can only count them under the circumstances set forth in the law, and if a judge of the Supreme Court, or any other court, can interfere with him, that is practically doing away with the law. The courts in the Province of Ontario have expressly declared that neither a mandamus nor a writ of prohibition will lie in a case like this, and the three judges who gave that decision have occupied the position of Chief Justices of the High Court of Justice of Ontario. I do think that in an amendment to an election law, this should be clearly and distinctly defined, because it seems to me if a judge of the Supreme Court can issue a writ of prohibition against a County Court judge, there is nothing to prevent his issuing one against any returning officer or other person at any election.

Mr. LANDRY. I had not overlooked the fact that there had actually been a count, but what I said was that the gentleman returned was not returned as having been counted in by the returning officer, and, therefore, the judge had no jurisdiction in having a recount, when in the record itself there was no count, although, in point of fact, there may have been a count before that.

Mr. WELDON. When application is made to him, the judge is bound to have a recount. The returning officer attended with his ballot boxes, but received the information that he was not to deliver them to Judge Steadman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). In this particular case the same returning officer had appointed deputies, and fixed the polling places. The polls were held, the ballots were marked, the ballot boxes were returned and the ballots were counted, and the hon. gentleman knows well the returning officer had no right to constitute himself an election court to try the validity of his own proceedings. The present Master of the Rolls, in a very recent and important case in England, decided that when a returning officer had decided to hold a poll it was not open to him to question the validity of his own proceedings. He acted ministerially, his duty was at an end, and all he had to do was to count the polls and declare the party who received the majority of votes the candidate elect. The hon. gentleman knows that the whole proceeding after the election was, in every way, a most violent interference with the right of election; and when the party who was wronged called upon the county judge to count the ballots, he was in the exercise of his rights, he was acting within the provision of the law, and the judge was violently and illegally interfered with by a judge of the Supreme Court, through the improper issue of a writ of prohibition. I think that that is a very proper subject of enquiry by the hon. Minister of Justice.

Mr. McNEILL. I do not at all rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate or entering into a legal discussion, which I do not consider myself qualified to do. But I do wish for myself, individually, to protest as strongly as I can against the doctrine which is being laid down by hon. gentlemen opposite—and I do not care by whom it is laid down—that it would be for the advantage of the commonwealth of Canada that judges should be criticised freely in the discharge of their functions by the public press. I think anything more mischievous could scarcely be imagined. I think that it is absolutely essential that the judges should, in order to carry out the difficult and delicate duties which they have to perform, have the support of public opinion; and I am satisfied that nothing could be more detrimental to the administration of justice in this country than that the conduct of judges should be criticised frequently by the public press in this country. There is a remedy by which we can punish a judge if he discharges his duties in such a way as to make him unfit for holding the office to which he has been appointed, and so long as a judge is held to be fit to be a judge, he ought to be sustained by public opinion; and so soon as he is unfit to hold that position, he ought to be removed. But I am satisfied that if we lay down the principle that the judges in the discharge of their duties shall be subject to open criticism at the hands of the press of the country, we shall strike a fatal blow at the best and truest administration of justice in Canada. The hon. the member for Bothwell has referred to a recent decision of the Master of Rolls in England. I would ask him whether it is the practice in England to review in the public press the decisions of judges upon the bench. He knows as well as I that that is not the practice, and that where a judge in England is improperly criticised by the press, the same remedy is pursued there as has been pursued in the case referred to by the hon. member for Queen's.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A subject of very great interest and importance has arisen incidentally which is, perhaps, worthy of a little discussion. There is no doubt there is a medium in all these things; there is no doubt whatever that the press, if it should abuse its rights and privileges by making improper criticisms on the action of any judge, would do a great injury to society, as the hon. gentleman remarks; but, on the other hand, I do not think that we can afford to allow the idea to go abroad that the judiciary of Canada are to be entitled to be above criticism in the public press or elsewhere. On the contrary, my impression is that the judges require to be reminded, from time to time, that they are mere mortals. Being myself a layman, I am not, perhaps, imbued with the necessary amount of reverence for high judicial functionaries with which the legal profession would desire in some cases to inspire us. I must tell my hon. friend that I know, as a matter of course, that impeachment, no matter how thoroughly a judge may deserve to be dismissed, is an extremely difficult, an extremely expensive, and an extremely unusual proceeding; and although I have a high respect on the whole for the judiciary of my native Province, I know there have been several men on the bench who ought long ago to have been dismissed from it. There are more instances than one, two, three or four, and it has been found enormously difficult to obtain any justice or satisfaction against these men. Of course, it would be most invidious to go into particulars, and I am not going to do so, but I do not think we should lay down the doctrine that a judge, no matter how high and great, is to hold himself above criticism. I think that the old world and somewhat feudal idea that the judges are great beings whom no newspaper is to presume to criticise, is not a safe one—that it might tend, in a very great degree, to the abuse of justice; and I think if the hon. gentleman will look carefully over the English papers, he will see that a great latitude of criticism is indulged in not unfrequently by the press with respect to the English judges. But the main fact remains, as my hon. friend has stated, that the hon. the Minister of Justice has laid down a very important principle, and it is rather desirable, as my hon. friend for Prince Edward Island stated, that that principle should be extended. The powers of the judges in dealing with responsible and fair criticism on their conduct should be sharply looked after by this House and the Minister of Justice, when they attempt to exercise those powers. There have been some curious cases in this country, and I dare say the hon. gentleman may remember one or two, in which the late lamented George Brown was concerned, in which the judges did not find it convenient to proceed, although opinions were tolerably freely expressed as to their conduct. I think there are not a few cases in which some considerable oppression has been exercised by some judges under this very old world rule of contempt of court, and it would be better to circumscribe the rule than allow the idea to go abroad that we are to sustain the judges in everything they do.

Mr. McNEILL. I did not intend to imply that the judges should be entirely free from criticism in the press, but I did intend to imply that the criticisms in the press should be guarded very closely indeed. And that it was not a fair thing to accuse the judges of having simply used some old rusty weapon because they had called to task those who had criticised them, not in the manner which the hon. gentleman has referred to, but in a very violent and a very improper manner. If there is criticism of the judges in England, and I have not said there is not such criticism, that is of a very different character from that which we have had under discussion here to-day.

Mr. WOOD (Westmoreland). I do not propose to continue the discussion, but I wish to say a word in regard to the statements which have been made by the hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), in reference to the conduct of Judge Fraser, in reference to the Westmoreland election case. I think the remarks of that hon. gentleman were not justified by the conduct of the judge on that occasion, and I think, if he had known what actually transpired, he would not have made the remarks which he has made. I am not fully informed of the facts myself, and, as I do not belong to the legal profession, I am not as well able to discuss the question as the hon. gentleman, but, as I understand, what took place was as follows:—In fixing the day for the election trial, a day in the month of December was named. This was objected to by the counsel for Mr. Emerson, the petitioner in the trial, and a day in November—I do not remember the exact date—was afterwards suggested and agreed upon. This was done with the concurrence of the petitioner's counsel, as I understand. At all events, that is shown from the fact that there is a provision in the law that, if the day is not fixed within the six months' limit mentioned in the law, it is quite competent for the petitioner's counsel to apply to the judge and have an extension of the time. The fact that he did not make this application, that he concurred in having the date fixed without making the application, shows that he did not consider it necessary, but that he considered the day fixed was a proper day or was within the limit of time fixed by the statute, and that, therefore, there was no need to apply for an extension. As to Judge Fraser, I will say that, as he freely admitted, and as I heard him myself admit in the court house in Dorchester afterwards, he was under the impression that the day fixed was within the limit of time fixed by the statute, but, when the question was raised afterwards before the full court, the full court decided, and he on further consideration was obliged to coincide with the opinion of all the other judges on the bench, that the day fixed was beyond the time allowed by the statute, and that, therefore, the trial could not take place. Under these circumstances, I think, when the reasons for Judge Fraser's conduct are understood by this House, hon. members will see that he was not censurable for the action he took. As to the action which is now pending against the editor of the Moncton Transcript, I can only say that the language used by that paper was very extreme and very disrespectful to the judge who tried that case, and was not only unjustifiable in view of the course of action which the judge had pursued, but was of a very extreme and abusive character; and I think, if my hon. friend will turn up some of the recent editions of that paper, he will find that the editor now admits this and says he used this language when he was much excited and that he has really apologised for the use of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not want to prolong the discussion, but I may say that the point I raised was not whether Mr. Justice Fraser was right in the first instance, or was right in the considered opinion he afterwards gave reversing his first judgment. All I was expressing an opinion about was that the facts were of such a character as to warrant and call upon the public press to make the comments it did on his conduct. It may be open to explanation, but I repudiate the idea that judges are above the law, that they are above public opinion, or that they are above criticism by the newspapers which give expression to public opinion. If a newspaper uses language which is calculated to frustrate the administration of justice, then I understand that it can be punished for so doing, but in this particular instance to which my hon. friend refers, the judge first fixed the date within the six months, afterwards changed it and tried to fix one beyond the six months; the petitioner's counsel said that would annul the whole thing, but the judge overruled the objection and said there was nothing in it and did so fix it, and when it came before the full court, he admitted that he had been wrong and that his action had destroyed the effect of the whole petition. It would not be in human nature if those who had so properly conducted the election without any corrupt practices, while the most corrupt practices possible had been used against them, should be defeated by the action of the judge and should hold their tongues. I raise my protest against the judges of this land raising themselves above public opinion and above the law, and against the idea that, in all cases where language is used which in their opinion affects their dignity, they can turn round and punish the press and send an editor to gaol. I do not think that any member of the House should defend such arbitrary action on the part of any judge unless he can show that his action was in order to prevent the proper administration of justice being carried out. In this case, the very opposite was the case. The judge, who had acted a most extraordinary and inexplicable part, as far as an outsider can see, found his action commented upon in a very severe manner by a newspaper, and he took that occasion to punish the editor for contempt.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think the inutility of discussing any particular case not directly connected with the vote is illustrated by this debate, inasmuch as my hon. friends from New Brunswick, who no doubt have had as much opportunity as my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), of making themselves acquainted with the facts of the case, are utterly at variance with him as to the particulars.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not say all the members from New Brunswick, but I mean those with whom I have had an opportunity of conferring with since the discussion began. They are not only at variance as to the steps which were taken in that election trial, but as to the nature of the comments which were made the subject of the contempt. Coming back to the general question, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says, there are various kinds of criticism, and I am not aware of any judge under the British system of jurisprudence who objects to criticism by the press if it be fair and honest criticism, and the test applied must be whether the criticism pronounced is fair and honest criticism, or whether it transcends the bounds of fair and honest criticism, and is of such a character as to bring the administration of justice into contempt. In the particular instance which is under discussion, I think there is no doubt that the criticism of the action of the magistrate at Calgary was a criticism which might have been published with perfect impunity in the United Kingdom in regard to any judge in that country. But my hon. friends opposite, in calling my attention to transactions which occurred in another end of the country, and in asking me, as the hon. member for South Oxford has done, to extend there the supervision over the administration of justice which he supposes I have exercised with regard to the North-West Territories, forget for the moment that I have no control whatever over the conduct of judges in the various Provinces of Canada. Those judges are quite at liberty to pronounce decisions which I may think totally unwarranted, and even if they exceed their jurisdiction to as great an extent as I think the stipendiary magistrate at Calgary did, I have no power to deal with them, and I am not justified even in expressing an opinion as to their conduct. In this particular instance, the office of the judge had ceased, and it was simply a question whether I could recommend him to the Executive as suitable not only to be replaced in an office of the same kind, but in a higher office in which he would have more important functions, and from which he could only be removed by Parliament.

Clerk, Stenographer, Exchequer Court $800

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A new office, I see.

Mr. THOMPSON. Under the Act of last Session there was simply a registrar appointed. It will no doubt be necessary to give him assistance, especially as the judges' duties call him to different parts of the country to exercise his functions. It is uncertain whether a clerk will be required and a stenographer, or a stenographer alone.

Contingencies and disbursements..... $5,000

Mr. DAVIES. What is meant by this $150 for books for judges.

Mr. LAURIER. I see another item at the bottom of the page for the purchase of law reports and text books, $1,500; whereas, in this item only $150 are asked for books for judges. What is the reason of the difference?

Mr. THOMPSON. The present item is for books for the immediate use of the judges in their chambers; the others are for the general library.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before we pass these items I desire to enquire from the Minister of Justice whether he is able to give the House any information as to an important question which has lately attracted the attention of the public, as it has of the hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, and that is: Whether it is the intention of the Government to recommend such increases to the salaries of the judges, especially in the Province of Ontario, as will enable them to obtain the services of the best men of the profession? Now, I believe I am speaking of a matter which is well known to both sides of the House, when I say that at the present moment, from various causes, there is a very general opinion, more particularly among the lawyers of Ontario, that at present you cannot get a first-class lawyer in that Province to go upon the bench. I do not want to make any reflection at all on the gentlemen who have accepted appointments under the Government, but I am stating what is a well-known fact. I believe that over and over again the present Government and the last Government endeavored to obtain the services of men who stood at the top of their profession, and they were unable to do so because the salaries we were able to offer them were not adequate to obtain first-class legal talent. I believe, also, that there have been cases, more than one, of gentlemen retiring from the bench and coming down into practice of the profession again, a thing which certainly has very grave inconvenience. Now, this is a question of great public importance, and I think that this is the best time for us to interrogate the Government and to obtain from them, if they have any scheme upon the subject, some idea of what they propose to do in order to grapple with a difficulty which is becoming a very grave one in my own Province, and possibly in other Provinces too. Perhaps I ought to apologise to my legal friends for venturing on their own province, but I don't believe they will take any very great umbrage to my suggestion.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I took occasion last year to call the attention of the House to this matter, and I am very glad the hon. member for South Oxford has done so now. I think it is not a question for the legal profession alone, by any means; it is much more a question for the general public whether the men who occupy the highest legal position should not be procured for the bench. It is the public at large who are interested in law-suits much more than the lawyers are, and it is they who are most concerned in having the administration of justice placed upon the highest footing. I would also say that the difficulty complained of arises with regard to County Court judges, and while it is important, as regards the greater interest of a smaller number, that the Supreme Court judges and the higher court judges should be men of eminence and ability, it is of equal importance to a greater number of persons, though, perhaps, in a smaller degree in each case, that the County Court judges and the junior County Court judges should also be men fully qualified and competent for the positions they hold. Now, the same difficulty arises with regard to them as arises with regard to those in the Superior Court, and I hope that when the Minister and the Government take this matter into their consideration, as I have no doubt they will feel bound to do, that they will consider the position of the County Court and junior judges as well as those of the higher courts.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Whatever complaint there may be among the profession in Ontario, I think that in the Lower Provinces, at all events, they have a very strong case to present to this House. I have always taken the ground, ever since I have had the honor of a seat in this House, that it is a very unjust thing to place the judges of the Supreme Courts of New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island in the invidious position of paying them only $1,000, when the judges in the larger Provinces, Quebec and Ontario, receive a very much larger amount. I know there is a very strong feeling on this point in the profession in my own Province, and I have been given to understand that the hon. Minister of Justice, during the time that he adorned the bench of Nova Scotia, prepared a very strong memorial to the Administration of that day, setting forth the position which he and his brother judges occupied in that respect. Now that the hon. gentleman is in a position to exercise his great influence and great ability, to give effect to his own recommendations, I hope that the Province from which he comes, and the other Provinces as well, will be relieved from the position in which they are now so unfavorably placed, not only with regard to the judges of the Supreme Court, but also with regard to the judges of the County Courts. We have County Court judges in Nova Scotia who only receive $2,400 a year. The county judge of Halifax has a very large business to attend to, the largest, I believe, of any in the Dominion; at all events, I believe more cases—I speak without professional knowledge, but from representations made to me—come before the county judge of Halifax than before any other county judge in the Dominion.

Mr. MACKENZIE. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). It has been represented to me that such is the case, and I believe it to be the fact, unless my hon. friend is aware of the number of cases heard by the different county judges, and in that event I would yield to his opinion. It has been represented to me that the business of Halifax is of that character which gives the County Court judge there more professional work than any judge in any part of the Dominion. Be that as it may, the work there is very extensive and very important, and while, for some reason or other, since the present Administration came into power the County Court judges of St. John has received an increase of salary, the salary of the County Court judge of Halifax has remained the same. There are some districts in the Province where the amount of business is naturally very small, and very different from those important and onerous duties that are thrown on the County Court judge in the city of Halifax. Now that the Minister of Justice is in a position, I repeat, to carry out the recommendations which he no doubt made, and which I am given to understand he made to the Government before he became a member of it, I hope, with the expression of opinion that has been given to-day from both sides of the House, the whole subject may be considered and the smaller Provinces relieved from the invidious position in which their judges stand under the present position of affairs.

Mr. WELSH. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has very properly expressed his opinion in regard to the remuneration and treatment of the judges in the Province of Nova Scotia. It brought to my mind the fact that the small Province to which I belong has been invariably treated worse than all. Talk about Nova Scotia. Nova Scotia has been treated like a prince, compared with the way Prince Edward Island has been treated. I find, in every department of the public service, Prince Edward Island is treated—in what manner shall I say?—by coercion. I have taken up some papers and have looked over them, and I find the pay of captains of mud-boats is greater than that of a captain of a Government steamer. I also see that an engineer on such a boat receives more pay than the captain. However, when the papers come down in answer to the motion I made, we can discuss the matter more fully. Let me say a word with respect to the judges of Prince Edward Island. We have as good legal talent there as in any Province, and we have a very fair example of it on the floor of this House, an example of which we are not ashamed, and that hon. gentleman would treat with contempt any offer made of the best office in the Island within the gift of the Dominion Government. I want to call the attention of the Government to the fact that they ought to pay men according to their ability and capacity, and not according to the size of the Province. The senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) has put the matter very fairly for Nova Scotia. I know men who have devoted their lives to law, and they are not treated as they should be. I, therefore, hope the Government will take the matter in hand, and see that fair average pay is given to the judges, according to their ability. As to lawyers, I consider time would be wasted in sympathising with them. It is well understood they are able to take care of themselves, and I will not say one word in their behalf.

Mr. DAVIN. I entirely concur in the opinion expressed on both sides of the House as to the inadequacy of the salaries of judges all over the Dominion of Canada. In regard to the salaries of the judges in the North-West Territories, I think that there the salaries are also inadequate. The sum of $4,000 a year for a judge in the North-West Territories is, I may say, just as deficient from the point of view of meeting all the claims on him and enabling him to live as a judge should live, as the same amount is in Prince Edward Island or in New Brunswick. There is also an invidious arrangement in regard to the judges in the North-West Territories, which I would press upon the attention of the Minister of Justice. The senior judge there is only paid the same amount as the other judges. The Chief Justice of Manitoba receives $5,000 a year, an utterly inadequate sum, I do not hesitate to say, for the chief justice of that Province. A chief justice in Winnipeg has more expenses to meet than a chief justice in Toronto, and the senior judge in the North-West Territories, who resides in the capital, and who is to all intents and purposes a chief, has to meet expenses connected with the dignity of his office that, in my opinion, should entitle him to a larger salary than the other judges. In regard to the general question, I did not intend to speak to it, nor do I intend now to deal with it, beyond expressing in a single sentence my own opinion. In regard to the important general question raised by the hon. member, and discussed so ably by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) and by the Minister of Justice, I may say this, as a man connected a little with law and a good deal with newspapers, that I have never known any instance, with the one exception which was dealt with here by the Minister of Justice, of a judge misusing the power of imprisonment for contempt. There are cases where newspapers have to comment on judgment of judges, and have to comment severely also on their judgments, and it is only right they should do so. It is in fact a protection to the public, and if the judges exercised their powers properly, it ought to be an assistance to them because their judgments will be expounded and enforced by the press and brought home to the popular conscience. If the press is allowed to pronounce upon a judgment that is correct and right, how can the press be prevented from questioning a judgment on the other hand if that judgment be wrong. I have seen cases in which the judges have been condemned and condemned, strongly too, by the press, but in language that was perfectly respectful. For my part I will undertake to say the very strongest possible things in regard to a judgment or in regard to judges; but I do not think there will be one gross expression or one expression that any man can object to in my language. I think that in the interest of justice, in the interests of the public it is most important that men exercising the functions of judges should be protected from that ribaldry which is sent broadcast over the press of this country and which makes a politician sometimes wish that he had the power of imprisoning for contempt. I only hope that the Minister of Justice will take into consideration the proposal to enhance the salaries of the judges, and I think, from what has happened here this afternoon, it must be perfectly clear to him that he will have the support of both sides of the House.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I desire to say a few words in reference to the salaries of the New Brunswick judges, speaking in the same line taken by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). I am perhaps the only barrister representing a New Brunswick constituency who is not in active practice, and I may be said to speak on this question in a perfectly disinterested way. On behalf of the New Brunswick bar I desire strongly to express the hope that the Minister will consider the proposition and listen to the suggestion made by so many eminent laymen in this House, to increase the salaries of the Supreme Court judges of New Brunswick to $5,000. I may be pardoned for reminding this House that the little Province has taken a very prominent part in the legal history of this country, and that it has given to the Supreme Court of Canada its Chief Justice. Anyone who is familiar with the New Brunswick Law Reports and who reads their judgments carefully, has no reason to be ashamed of the reputation of the bench of that Province. I know it is said that in New Brunswick the incomes of barristers are not so great as in some great cities in the upper Provinces, and therefore that it is more difficult in those upper Provinces to get a man of eminence sufficient to fill the position of judge without giving him a higher salary than in the lower Provinces. I do not believe in this argument. I think it is a matter of common justice between Province and Province to give to the choice and picked men of the Province of New Brunswick $5,000 a year, the same as to judges in the upper Provinces.

Mr. HAGGART. I trust I will be pardoned if I take an entirely different view to some of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on this subject. I am of opinion that the salaries of judges are sufficient. There is not in the rural constituencies a lawyer who would not be glad to accept the office of a County Court judge, and who does not think that the salaries and emoluments are large enough. The reason why, in my opinion, men of first-class legal talent cannot be got to fill the office of judge in the Superior Courts is, because of the centralisation of the different law courts in certain cities in the large Provinces, which offers facilities to lawyers for obtaining far larger sums and larger salaries than men of equal ability in almost every other walk of life. Another thing I have to complain about is this: Those lawyers do not wish to leave their large fees and large emoluments for the purpose of taking a position which, although perhaps more dignified, has not so much pay attached to it. I wish to offer a suggestion to the Minister of Justice on the difficulty of obtaining justice in this country on account of the number of courts. We have too many judges and too many administrators of justice in this country. One thing which ought, above all others, to be scientific in the law is the interpretation of a clause of an Act of Parliament or a statute. Perhaps a judge may differ from another in passing an opinion as to the evidence taken before him, and one may be mistaken in the character of a man. In the interpretation of a clause of an Act of Parliament it is different. A lawyer's education on this point ought to be scientific and mathematical. What do we see throughout this country? You may appeal to a judge in Ontario to get an interpretation upon a clause of an Act of Parliament. He gives one opinion. You appeal to the full court, and, as is the case to my own knowledge, they give an entirely different one. If you go from there to the Court of Appeal (there are three different tribunals in the Province), they will, perhaps, coincide with the court below them. You apply to the Supreme Court and they, perhaps, reverse their decision; and then you go to the Privy Council in England, and they reverse the decision of the Supreme Court in Canada. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice the reduction of those courts, and I think some arrangement should be made with the Provincial Legislatures for the reduction of those courts. Unless a man has a large fortune, or a large amount of money, it is almost impossible to get justice in this country, as the case is taken from one court to another in appeal. As I stated before, that which should be most scientific to the lawyers and judges is the interpretation of an Act. It is now impossible to get a consensus of opinion on any point of law in the different courts of the Province. I think the feeling throughout this country is that the number of courts is too numerous. If there were less facilities for a certain class in the community earning larger pay and getting larger fees, than equally clever and equally able men in other walks of life, there would be no difficulty to get first class men to fill the position of judges for the large salaries which we pay now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish my hon. friend would speak a little offener and bring this grave matter more to the attention of this law-ridden community, than he does. As to the matter on which he directed some considerable attention, the extraordinary difficulty of the courts interpreting an Act of Parliament, I would say that my friend is a pretty old member of the House, and has assisted in passing a great many of those Acts of Parliament; he knows how they are made, and he need not wonder if all the courts, not merely in British North America or the British Empire, but the world at large, should sometimes have extreme difficulty in finding out what those enactments mean. The way in which our legislation is conducted is as much productive of uncertainty, ambiguity, obscurity, and all manner of litigation as anything well could be. I think it will continue to be so until our mode of legislating and drawing Acts of Parliament is materially altered from the mode that now prevails. He has made a very interesting suggestion for a great moral reform in the administration of justice. I have not heard the First Minister or Minister of Justice say if they are prepared to make any statement as to the important practical question which I raised some time ago, on what they mean to do, on what I might almost call the strike that is initiated among lawyers in my own Province, as to the filling important judicial offices. I believe that every one here, not excepting my hon. friend who spoke last, will agree that it is of the vastest importance that we should have the very best legal talent in the community represented on the bench. As I said I do not wish to make any invidious remarks on the gentlemen that have been appointed,—very far from it, but I do know that there is a very strong opinion among the public in the Province of Ontario, and for aught I know in other places, that we are not able to get anything like the best class of lawyers to go on the bench. The administration of justice will suffer very much if you find that the bar are very decidedly stronger than the bench in any Province.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I have no doubt the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart) reflects the views of a large number of people of this country, and it is quite evident from the cheers he received at the conclusion of his speech that he reflects the views of no small number in this House. I think, however, that some of his objections are without foundation. He will find, on reference to the proceedings in the mother land, that appeals are just as frequent there from the judges of the court in the first instance as they are in this country. The complications of society are such that those appeals necessarily must arise. In many cases, owing to want of time or pressure of business, the view of a judge in the first instance may have been given in rather a hurried manner, without that consideration and reflection that is possible when the case is more fully argued and explained before the Court of Appeal. I do not think the public has very much to complain of in this country on that score, nor do I venture to express any opinion on the general subject as to whether the salaries of the judges in the larger Provinces are so low that they should be raised. But I do venture to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to the anomalous position in which the judges of Prince Edward Island have been placed for some years back, with regard to the great disparity that exists between their salaries and those of the judges of the other Provinces; and I am sure that if any change is to be made in the salaries of the judges, the hon. gentleman will see that that anomaly is removed. In the Province of British Columbia, the Chief Justice gets $5,820; the next judge, $4,850, and three puisné judges $4,000 each. In the Province of Manitoba the Chief Justice gets $5,000, and the other three judges $4,000 each. In the Province of Nova Scotia the Chief Justice gets $5,000, and the other judges $4,000 each. In the Province of New Brunswick the same rule prevails as in the Province of Nova Scotia. It is very curious that the salaries of the Prince Edward Island judges were placed a long way below those of the judges in the other Provinces. The Chief Justice there gets but $4,000, although he has to discharge the duties of a judge of the Vice-Admiralty Court besides his regular duties, and the puisné judges receive $3,000 each, whereas in every other part of the Dominion $4,000 is the minimum. Whether or not the salaries of the judges of Manitoba or British Columbia are too low, I do not know. I do not know anything of the social or other circumstances of those places; but there can be no justification in keeping the salaries of the judges in Prince Edward Island at the low rate at which they have been for such a long time. My hon. colleague says he has no interest in this matter, and as far as I am concerned I have no personal interest either; but I know that it is impossible for the judges to discharge their duties and live on the salaries they receive; and if they had not private incomes, they would not be where they are. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) referred to the case of the County Court judges. I am not going to express an opinion whether their salaries should be increased or not; but there are exceptional cases. I think the judges of metropolitan counties have a much larger quantity of work than those of outlying counties. The hon. member for Halifax said the judges in that city had the largest business in the Dominion of Canada. He may be right; I will not say positively that he is not; but if he looks into the matter, he will find that some of the judges come very close to them, and one of them is the judge for Queen's county. He determines an enormous mass of cases, increased by the fact of the cost of litigation in his court, and the fees having been made very low by the Local Legislature; and if any man deserves an increase, that man does. Now, representations have been made to the Government setting forth the facts in regard to the judges of Prince Edward Island, and I hope the Government will do fair and even-handed justice to them. I think it is sufficient merely to state the facts without enlarging upon them.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I am rather in sympathy with the principle for which my learned friend who has taken his seat, contends. I do not appreciate the reason for the invidious distinction which has been made in regard to the same office in the different Provinces in the Dominion. If the labors of the judiciary in one Province are lighter than in another, that is a reason for a smaller number of judges in the one case than in the other, but I think that the judges of the same relative rank who perform the same kind of duties in the same kind of courts, should be put more on a level, without regard to the Provinces in which they perform those duties. As some reason for this, I might mention that when the County Court jurisdiction was instituted, the salaries of the County Court judges in the different Provinces were made very nearly alike. Then, to take an illustration of the principle which this House will appreciate, there is no such distinction among the hon. gentlemen who compose the Cabinet. Hon. gentlemen coming from the Maritime Provinces are not given a smaller salary than those who come from the larger Provinces; and if the principle which is acted upon in regard to the Supreme Court judges is a sound one, I do not see why a similar distinction does not obtain in regard to the other officers who are paid out of the Consolidated Fund. I hope, therefore, that the Minister of Justice, in preparing the measure that has been alluded to to-day, will consider not merely the increase of salaries in particular Provinces, but a leveling up of the salaries of the judges in all the Provinces.

Mr. THOMPSON. I hope to introduce a Bill in connection with this subject in a few days, and until then I am not prepared to enter into a discussion of the various principles by which we may be guided.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I was going to say that what has been said in regard to the salaries of the judges of the different Provinces applies with equal force to the salaries of the

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Lieutenant Governors. I remember that, in 1867, when the scale of Lieutenant Governors' salaries was first fixed, I took exception to the difference made between the larger and smaller Provinces. For instance, compare the position in Halifax with the position in Toronto. Halifax is the headquarters of the Army and Navy, and heavy duties and responsibilities in the way of public entertainment are expected from the Lieutenant Governor in Halifax which do not always fall upon the Lieutenant Governors of some of the other Provinces; and while many Governors have been appointed in the past with ample private means, such candidates cannot always be secured; and I am sure of one thing, that no one who has filled the position of Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia since Confederation has been able to save anything out of his salary, if he has been able to live on it at all. I know from one who occupied that position a long time, that he had to draw on his private means for the expenses of that position; and I think that, at the time the Government are considering this question of the salaries of judges, they ought also to seriously consider whether the Lieutenant Governors of the various Provinces should not be placed in the same position as regards salary.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Has anything been done with regard to extending the jurisdiction of the Vice-Admiralty Court? Some years ago there was a correspondence between the Imperial and Dominion Governments on the subject, and I think it is important some steps should be taken to assimilate the jurisdiction of our Vice-Admiralty Court with that of the High Admiralty Court in England.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have had the promise of Her Majesty's Government, from year to year, that that subject should be legislated upon, and we must wait their action in the matter.

Kingston Penitentiary..... $118,629 85

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman had better state, generally, the reasons why he is asking for an increase of $7,000. Has the number of prisoners increased, or is it expected to increase?

Mr. THOMPSON. On page 26 the hon. gentleman will observe that the first increase is one of $50 in the salary of the accountant, which is a statutory increase. It is proposed to add $130 to the salary of the steward under these circumstances. At the earnest solicitation of the warden, and in consequence of the long and very valuable services of the steward, I consented to recommend an increase of $100, and the $30 is the increase provided under the Penitentiary Act of last Session. By reference to that Act, it will be seen that the steward is entitled to a maximum salary of $900, and from the $800, which I recommend to-day, his salary will be increased to $900, at the rate of $30 a year. The chief keeper receives an increase of $30, likewise a statutory increase; so with the $30 allowed for the schoolmaster. I may explain, in that connection, that there has not been a schoolmaster appointed. A vote has been taken from year to year, which, last year, was reduced to $500. The prison authorities have ascertained, from experience, that the most efficient mode of giving instruction is to allow four or five of the keepers, best qualified, to give instruction at a stated hour, and, inasmuch as this entails extra work, the $500 will be divided among them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It does appear to me that that is rather a doubtful practice. I should say that if there was one post in the penitentiary more than another to which it is desirable to appoint a man with special qualifications, it would be the somewhat difficult post of schoolmaster to the prisoners, and the practice of appointing half-a-dozen men in turn to act as school-master, is very dubious theoretically. I have not made any enquiry into the subject as to how this system would work, but it seems to me it is contrary to all our practical experience in ordinary educational matters. It would be well to consider it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I was inclined to take that view myself last year, and in reducing the vote to $500, it was my intention to recommend the appointment of a school-master, but I ascertained from the prison authorities that for reasons connected with the discipline of the institution, it is practically impossible to assemble the convicts, at the one time and have them taught by the one school-master. Each of these keepers has in charge a certain gang of men, and by taking the men under his control, at a certain hour, which happens to be the dinner hour of the keepers, he can give his gang the necessary school instruction. On the recommendation of the warden who has given the subject much consideration, I refrained from appointing a school-master, and the statutory increase necessary to provide instruction is divided among the keepers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You do not propose to divide $500 among five instructors?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, if the present system is continued.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a point on which I can see there may be convenience and a good deal of difference of opinion. I do not like to press my view unnecessarily, but if any good is to be done to these unfortunates in the way of reforming them, I think it would be really worth considering whether you would not do better by having a school-master and an assistant, instead of making this a kind of prize for some half-a-dozen guards. As the right hon. the First Minister has been Minister of Justice and knows the Kingston Penitentiary very well, as well as I do myself, I suppose the Minister of Justice has consulted with him on the subject. Has the First Minister any opinion on the point formed from his long experience?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can quite agree with the statement of the hon. the Minister of Justice. I can quite understand that one school-master cannot perform his duties for the whole of the convicts who are likely to receive instruction, which will consist principally in reading, writing and arithmetic. The keepers are pretty well educated men. They are superior men, and it seems to me that a keeper, having a certain number of men under his control, would be more fitted to give them the necessary instruction than one whom they only see occasionally, and for whose authority, therefore, they have not the same respect. It is quite clear that in a penitentiary like Kingston, if there is any large number seeking means of learning how to write and read, one school-master could not do the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The reason I put the question is this: Of course, I speak from memory and under correction, but my impression is that the great proportion of our convicts know how to read and write, which is not the case elsewhere, and that the intention, when this vote was taken, was that a school-master should be specially detailed to instruct the small minority who require special education. A man may be extremely well educated and very unqualified to act as school-master. His qualifications as a keeper has nothing at all to do with the special faculty of imparting instruction, and it was chiefly for that reason that I called attention to this matter. Of course, this is a matter which the Minister of Justice is extremely competent to look after, but I wish to impress upon him the necessity of considering it a little more. My reason is this: Here you are offering some five or six officers a considerable increase of pay, nearly equal to 20 per cent. on their present salaries. Now, we know well that all these gentlemen will all vote themselves perfectly qualified instructors for a smaller sum probably than $100 a year, and I doubt if on the whole the process will be found to work well, unless there are a larger number of uneducated men than I think there are in that prison.

Mr. THOMPSON. One hundred dollars has been added to the salary of the miller. He has been a good while in that prison and has a good deal of work to do, and he notified me that it would be impossible for him to continue in that employment unless he got an increase; and I believe he had a promise from my predecessor in office.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has that mill been a quite satisfactory operation? I never regarded the old mill as a very useful institution. I rather regarded it as a whim of poor Mr. Creighton's, and thought it was rather useless and a sort of fifth wheel to the economy of the penitentiary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it has been fairly successful, as far as I am in a position to speak of it. In regard to the increases of $60 to the various trade instructors, I propose that they shall stand in a somewhat better position than the ordinary keepers. At present the maximum for ordinary keepers is $600, but by the Act of last year it is provided that the maximum salary of trade instructors shall be $700. This is the increase of $30 for last year, and $30 for this, because no vote for that purpose was taken last year. The $30 for the shoemaker is also a statutory increase, but it is only $30 instead of $60 because he is a new appointee. The quarry trade instructor is in the same position. Then there are two statutory increases of $30 each. There is a provision for the appointment of two new guards at a smaller salary than the two who preceded them, though there appears to be a clerical error in the estimates as printed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the heavy charge for officers' uniforms come to be made?

Mr. THOMPSON. They are to have a summer uniform every year instead of once every two years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these uniforms made in the prison?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think so, but I am not positive.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a very heavy additional item for working expenses, $1,600; what does that represent?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is an additional sum for heating on account of the anticipated advance in the price of coal. There is an addition for gas. It is not anticipated that that will have to be used, as we are increasing to some extent the facility for supplying gas.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman, and the attention of the First Minister, to a fact which I can state of my own personal knowledge, that the manufacture of gas in the penitentiary in Kingston has become a nuisance of the very first quality to certain persons occupying residences adjacent to the institution. The First Minister knows what I refer to, the residence particularly of Mr. J. A. Allen. I am prepared to state of my own knowledge that many days last summer, and the summer before, it was impossible for anyone with any comfort to walk about Mr. Allen's grounds when the wind was in a certain quarter blowing from the penitentiary. It would be very undesirable to have a matter of that kind brought before the courts. I believe it has been brought to the attention of the Minister and of the First Minister, and I would ask whether they intend to abate the nuisance, or whether it will be tried before a court of law?

Mr. THOMPSON. I should be sorry if anything of that kind had to come before the courts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I can assure the hon. gentleman that the value of the property as a residential property will be wholly destroyed if no means are found of putting an end to the nuisance which is caused by the offensive smell of this gas if the wind sets, as it usually does there, from the south-west. I could bring fifty witnesses to prove that.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been informed by the officers that there is no more inconvenience caused by the gas-making operations in Kingston than is caused in any city by the manufacture of gas, and there cannot possibly be any inconvenience except perhaps once a week when the retorts are being cleaned out. However, as Mr. Allen disputes that, I have directed an examination to be made of the matter, and I will deal with it as soon as I have a report on the subject.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would it not be better in every way to introduce the electric light system? I think it would be more wholesome for the prisoners.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have directed the officers to see if that is possible or not. The reports previously indicated that it was a matter of very doubtful expediency, but I am having more full enquiries made, and I have been largely led to that course by this very complaint of Mr. Allen to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister has laid on the Table the very important letters to which I alluded, which passed between himself and Secretary Bayard. I suppose he will see that these are printed and placed in the hands of every member, and they should be printed in good large type.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, that is being printed.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 12th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

VACANCY.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a notification of a vacancy having occurred in the representation of the Electoral District of Missisquoi by the decease of George Claves, Esq., and that he had issued his warrant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

DEATH OF THE HON. MR. PLUMB.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no doubt every hon. member of this House will have been greatly shocked at the announcement of the unexpected decease of the hon. Speaker of the Senate. To those gentlemen who knew Mr. Plumb, it will be a sorrow without any alleviation. To those like myself and the gentlemen immediately surrounding me, who have known him intimately, his loss, I may say, is irretrievable. He sat in this House for some time, and took a very marked and distinguished position in the House; and those who knew him personally without reference to political divisions, must have admired his wonderful ability, his encyclopædic knowledge on every subject, and the readiness with which he communicated that knowledge. To those who sought him as a sure and certain source of information the feeling must be deep, aggravated under the circumstances by the fact that he had been presiding, not only last Session, but this Session, with great success and acceptance over the Chamber of which he was a member, and full, apparently, of life and hope. To me, I may say, the loss is irreparable, and I can say no more. Out of respect for the position he held, as the presiding officer of the co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, I move, Sir, that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. LAURIER. It becomes my duty under such circumstances to second the motion of the right hon. leader of the Government, made not only out of respect to the other branch of the Legislature, but also out of respect to the memory of the late lamented Mr. Plumb. I agree in everything that has been said by the right hon. gentleman as to the deceased gentleman. We who had the pleasure of sitting with him for many years, know that his loss must be a very great loss indeed to the right hon. gentleman and to his party generally. We knew him to be a hard fighter; at the same time, we knew him to be a fair opponent, who was ready to receive as much as he gave. But those, Sir, who knew Mr. Plumb only in public life did not know the whole man. Those who had the advantage of knowing him in private life will be ready to bear cheerful testimony that he was a most courteous gentleman, with most varied accomplishments and most charming conversational powers, and at all times a most agreeable companion.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 3:20 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 13th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 35) to enable the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway Company to run a ferry between Beecher Bay, in British Columbia, and a point on the Straits of Fuca, within the United States of America.—(Mr. Baker.)

Bill (No. 36) respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Curran.)

Bill (No. 37) respecting Lake Nipissing and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

Bill (No. 40) to extend the jurisdiction of the Maritime Court of Ontario.—(Mr. Charlton.)

PATENTS OF INVENTION.

Mr. CARLING moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 38) respecting Patents of Invention. He said: I propose to amend the Act by giving power to appoint a Deputy Commissioner of Patents. Under the present law the Deputy Minister of Agriculture is Deputy Minister of Patents, but the Patent branch has grown so large of late years that the Government deem it advisable some one should be at the head of that branch to take sole charge of it.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FERRIES.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 39) to amend the Act respecting Ferries, chapter 97 of the Revised Statutes of Canada.

Mr. LAURIER. Will the hon. gentleman explain the provisions of this Bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The object of the amendment is to make some alteration in the manner of dealing with ferries as it exists at present. Now, all ferries are licensed after competition, but in the Bill it is proposed that we should change that in regard to international ferries, so that they may be leased by Order in Council, and also that in regard to existing licenses when they expire, if the service has been satisfactorily performed and it is thought it should continue, the Governor General in Council may extend the time for a term not exceeding ten years. As to inter-provincial ferries, the limit will be made five years, and it is proposed that, in the case of all ferries which would run out their term under the old Act, if the work has been satisfactorily performed, the Governor in Council may extend the term for a period not exceeding five years, subject to the provisions of this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DEPUTY COMMISSIONER OF PATENTS.

Mr. CARLING moved that on Friday next the House go into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

That the Governor in Council may appoint a Deputy Commissioner of Patents of Invention, whose salary shall be _____ dollars per annum.

Mr. EDGAR. I suppose the hon. Minister does not intend to go on with that resolution until the Bill referring to the same subject is printed and distributed?

Mr. CARLING. No, I will not go on with the resolution until the Bill is distributed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before the Government Orders are called, I would suggest that it would be well, in order to give some work to the Committees, to call the Private Bills which are ready, read them a second time, and send them to the Committees.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to ask if the letters between Mr. Bayard and Sir Charles Tupper are printed yet? I think the Minister of Finance promised to have them printed and distributed on Monday, but they have not reached me yet.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I do not think they are printed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be a convenience if they could be printed, and perhaps the Minister will take a note of it.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I very much regret to see that the Minister of Finance is not in his place, and to hear that he is rather seriously indisposed. In order to prevent confusion, I should like to know whether that will interfere with the arrangement which was made to proceed with the debate to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may say, first, that we are very sorry that the Minister of Finance has been so unwell for a few days. We hope he may recover very soon, but it is not likely that he can be here to-morrow. Nevertheless, as that day was fixed, if the hon. gentleman wishes to proceed to-morrow, the Government will not object.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then we will proceed to-morrow, if you do not object.

MERCHANTS MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. CURRAN moved second reading of Bill (No. 11) to empower the Merchants Marine Insurance Company of Canada to relinquish its charter and to provide for the winding up of its affairs.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like the mover to give some explanation about this Bill. There is another hon. gentleman who, as well as myself, happens to be a director of this company. We have put a good deal of money into it, and he has informed me that he received no notice of this, and I have no recollection of receiving any notice of an intention to come to Parliament to ask powers to wind up the affairs of this company. I would like the mover of the Bill to make some explanations, or if he is not prepared to give them, he should let the Bill stand until we know what it is. Perhaps my co-directors want to say something about this.

Mr. SCARTH. I find, since speaking to the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, that this Bill is the substance of a resolution passed in 1881. I had forgotten the particulars on which this Bill is founded, and would like very much to have some explanation from the hon. member who is introducing it.

Mr. CURRAN. The Bill was placed in my hands in the usual way by the solicitors of the company, with the request that I should put it through, and the statement was made to me—and, in glancing over the Bill, I think my hon. friends will find the statement is correct—that every precaution has been taken to protect all the rights of all the parties concerned. There are special provisions made that all those rights should be taken care of, and a sum of money retained to cover such rights as may not be settled at the present time. I believe the Bill has been framed upon similar legislation introduced into the British House of Commons, and that in so far as the form of the Bill is concerned, and the protection that is given to all interested parties, it may be safely allowed to take its second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can only say that the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) and myself are directors of that company, and we have lost a good deal of money in it. This resolution which has been spoken of was passed to close up the company some seven years ago, not to come to Parliament. What the solicitor of the company has been doing with the moneys, that have been collected since then, I should like to know, and I think the Bill ought to stand until the solicitor is brought here, and we have an opportunity of knowing what the particular object is, what has been done with the money, and what position the company is in. For my part I have no recollection of receiving any notice of an intention of presenting a Bill to Parliament for winding up the company—I do not know whether the hon. member for Winnipeg has. I think, under these circumstances, two of the directors being present, that the solicitor of the company ought not to be allowed to bring in a Bill here without consulting the directors.

Mr. CURRAN. I am under the impression that my hon. friend is mistaken with regard to the directors not having been consulted. The hon. member for Winnipeg says that this is an old resolution, passed in 1881, which is being carried out now. At all events, all the objections of my hon. friend can be dealt with in committee. The Bill may be read the second time, and unless the hon. gentleman, and all other members of the committee, are perfectly satisfied that everything is straight and regular, the Bill will not be allowed to go through committee. I think my hon. friend should allow the second reading of the Bill, reserving to himself the right of exercising all his privileges in committee.

Mr. SCARTH. I have to corroborate what the hon. gentleman has just said, that the directors have never been consulted with regard to this Bill. I never knew anything about it until I heard the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Curran) bring it in. I think the Bill ought to be allowed to stand, at all events, until the directors are called together and consulted in the matter.

Mr. WELSH. I am very glad this matter has been ventilated a little. I think we cannot be too cautious in a matter of this kind. We do not know whether the Bill is wanted by the shareholders themselves, or whether it is promoted solely by the solicitor and the directors. Now, I have invariably remarked, when a petition is presented to Parliament for powers to wind up a company, that the interests of the shareholders are generally sacrificed. I suppose this matter is going before the Private Bills Committee; I will be there, and I shall insist upon a fuller statement of the affairs of this company before I sanction this Act.

Mr. EDGAR. I think this is a matter of large interest, and ought to be considered by this House before the Bill gets a second reading. I do not know whether the directors or the shareholders have concurred in it, but I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he has concurred in it? I would like to ask the mover of the Bill why this company does not come under the general Winding-up Companies' Act? because that Act provides fully for the winding-up of just such companies as this. That Act is respecting Insolvent Banks, Insurance Companies, Loan Companies, &c., and the term "Insurance Companies" covers all insurance, whether life, fire, marine, ocean or inland. Now, I do not think the Minister of Justice can have had this matter brought before his attention, or he would scarcely sanction private legislation for winding up a company unless some very special circumstances called for it. I do not think that this should be, as a matter of course, referred to the Committee of the House; I think we should settle the principle at this stage and hear the views of the Government as to whether this legislation ought to be allowed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If this Bill had passed through the Committee on Banking and Commerce and returned to the House, I could well understand what the hon. gentleman says. But the object of the reference to the committee is exactly for the purpose of investigating the Bill, to see whether injustice is done to any one, or whether this matter should not come under the general Act, or whether there are reasons for passing a special Act. We are not in a position, as a House, to go into that investigation, and that is the reason why we have appointed Standing Committees. I would suggest that, instead of discussing this matter now, we send the Bill to the Committee of Banking and Commerce, where it will be investigated, and where the members can consider this matter a great deal more carefully than we can do here. After going to that committee, in the course, I suppose, of seven or eight days, the Bill will come back here, and if there are still objections to it, we can consider them, and either amend the Bill or throw it out. But now I do not think we are in a position to deal with it, and I would certainly ask my hon. friend who objected to it in the first instance, to allow it to go to the committee.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) By reading the Bill a second time now, the House would practically assent to, and endorse its principle. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but there can be nothing passed upon or approved at the second reading, but the principle of the Bill. Then its details, the preamble, and everything of that kind, are referred to the Committee; but so far as the principle is concerned, we dispose of it here. The Committee on Banking and Commerce do not discuss the principle of the Bill after it is once passed upon by the House. Now, a very important point has been raised by my hon. friend behind me, and that is whether, in the face of the Act which covers cases of this kind, the Government should permit individual companies to come in and pass special Acts to wind these companies up, unless those companies are able to show good and sufficient reasons for so doing. If we pass this Bill, as a matter of course we assent to the principle that every company that comes here can get a special Act of incorporation for itself, and there are many reasons why that should not be so. The Winding up Companies' Act has carefully prepared provisions for the protection of the shareholders, but it does not at all follow that these private Acts, when brought in, have these provisions. Parliament has made general provisions in this Act for the benefit of shareholders. I happen to be a shareholder of this company, and I never heard of this Bill before, and never had an intimation that it was being introduced. I am in the same position as my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) and the hon. gentleman on the other side of the House; we have no knowledge of it, and do not know what it means. But on the larger question raised by the hon. gentleman behind me I think the Government should consider whether they are not endorsing fully the principle of the Bill by carrying the second reading.

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. I think the hon. gentleman has failed to draw the distinction between a private Bill and a public Bill. It is when a public Bill receives a second reading that it is considered that the principle has been adopted, but it is otherwise with respect to a private Bill. A private Bill receives its second reading pro forma and goes to a select committee, and there the first question before it is: "Shall the preamble be taken as proved?" and evidence is taken on that point. This very discussion shows the impossibility of considering the principle of the Bill on the second reading here. We cannot well hear witnesses to prove the preamble or the merits of the Bill, but they must be heard before the Select Standing Committee. It is for that reason that the second reading of a private Bill differs from the second reading of a public Bill; in the former case the principle of the Bill is not considered as adopted by the House when it passes the second reading until the committee has adopted the preamble, and if the preamble is not proved the Select Standing Committee reports back to the House that the preamble is not proven, and the Bill is not proceeded with. I think, therefore, it would be proper to allow the Bill to pass pro forma the second reading, and refer it to a Select Standing Committee where evidence would be given to show whether it is a proper Bill or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask a question with regard to a Bill, such, for example, as one to incorporate a railway company coming before the House. If the opinion of this House was that the railway was unnecessary, or objections of a financial or legal character were taken against the proposed enactment, or that they would interfere with other existing companies, or similar grounds, would not the principle of the Bill, it having passed the second reading, be sustained before the committee?

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. No.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has not been as much before the committee as I have. In reply to the Minister of Public Works I may say that although objections have been taken to the principle of a Bill, the Bill has been sustained, because it had passed its second reading and that the House had adopted the principle, not only for public Bills, but on Bills affecting corporations. I take exception to this Bill on grounds entirely different from those taken by the two hon. gentlemen who have spoken on that side of the House.

What I contend is this: Where parties occupying the position of directors, as the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth) and myself do, have received no notice of the intention to wind up the company, and a Bill for that purpose comes before this House, and this is the first intimation we have received in an official form, some further information should be given by the hon. member in charge of the Bill before the House is asked to pass the second reading. I suggest that the Bill should stand over, and the mover should inform the parties who have put the matter in his hands as to the objections that have been taken, and let them explain to at least two of the directors, who have lost a good deal of money by the company, what their objects are, and why our counsel was not asked before this important step in regard to the company's affairs was adopted. It is early in the Session yet, and we can get the solicitor of the company to explain to those two of the directors why the matter was not laid before them before such an important step was taken.

Mr. THOMPSON. No doubt the objections suggested by the other side of the House are very important, and I concur in the suggestion that when permission is asked to wind up the affairs of the company, not under the general winding-up Act, but under special provisions to be granted by Bill, this should only be allowed, as suggested by the hon. member for Queens, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), when special grounds are shown for making the exception, and I would expect them to be very well sustained before I would concur in the proposal. I am prepared to vote for the second reading of the Bill, so that the parties may show the special grounds; and it is only by reading the Bill the second time and sending it before the committee, that they can have an opportunity of doing so. They have otherwise no opportunity of presenting the explanations which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), says should be presented to the House before the Bill is assented to. He will see that the course he has suggested, that the Bill should stand over until the solicitor of the company come to Ottawa and satisfies two members of this House in regard to the matter, would be an entirely unsatisfactory practice. The solicitor might entirely satisfy them and not satisfy any other two members of the House, and still the House would be blocking the passage of the Bill, not on any ground of principle at all, but in order that individual members should be convinced by parties outside. I take it that in allowing the Bill to be read the second time we are doing nothing more than recognising the fact that the Bill complies with the Rules of the House, and has reached a stage when the parties who desire it to be passed may be heard in its favor. Until they urge very sufficient reasons indeed why they should obtain special legislation in reference to winding up, I for one will not agree to the Bill being passed; but when I vote for the second reading, I simply vote to allow the parties an opportunity to present such sufficient reasons which, I admit, it will be very difficult for them to sustain. All that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has said is, no doubt, strongly against the Bill, that is, that the assent of the present directors has not yet been obtained, that they have not been consulted, and that this Bill is being promoted upon a resolution passed six or eight years ago. As one of the members of the Committee on Banking and Commerce, these statements, if not satisfactorily explained, would induce me to vote against the Bill; but we simply send it to the committee in order that those difficulties may be removed if they can be removed, or, at all events, we give the promoters of the Bill an opportunity to remove them. It would be unreasonable to expect the hon. member in charge of a Bill in the House to carry a brief in support of it and make statements that the directors were consulted or were not, and on being met by counter-statements on the other side, make a further reply. It is only by giving the parties an opportunity to appear before the committee and give the explanations, that the House can arrive at a satisfactory conclusion in regard to the Bill. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the frequent practice is for private Bills to be rejected after they have gone to the committee, so that the principle of this Bill is not affirmed in any way that would bind the House by allowing it to pass the second reading.

Mr. MITCHELL. There is one feature in regard to which the Minister of Justice has drawn an unfair distinction. He says it would scarcely be proper to allow this Bill to be postponed to allow two members of the House to be consulted. It is not as a member of this House that I claim the right to be consulted, but as an investor in the company and one of its directors. No harm can be done by deferring the second reading of the Bill. It is not a matter for the general public so much as a domestic matter of the company itself, one interesting those who have put their money into the company, none of whom, with the exception of the solicitor of the company and another officer, have made money out of it. I want to know the authority of these parties to incur the expenditure connected with this Bill for the winding up of the company. I take exception to the course recommended by the Minister of Justice. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite are strong enough to do what they like; but we as a minority, and I as a minority, have rights, and they are personal rights, not as a member of this House I claim them, but as a private individual interested in the affairs of the company.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me that a false construction has been put on the remarks of my hon. friend. There is no question of principle involved in the matter; it is a question of opportunity. Two members of the House, shareholders in the company and directors, state that they are now aware for the first time of this application, and they never were consulted in regard to the Bill. They ask, not that the Bill be thrown out, but that the second reading be postponed in order to allow them to ascertain how far they can support the application or oppose it. It seems to me, under the circumstances, to be only fair and an act of justice to those two gentlemen who are shareholders and directors, to postpone the second reading until they have had an opportunity to examine into the matter, and see whether they are prepared to support or oppose the Bill. It is a question of courtesy, and, perhaps, also a question of justice, which the majority of the House should extend to the very fair application made by the member for Northumberland.

Mr. THOMPSON. As far as I am concerned I do not want to be understood, from what the hon. gentleman has just stated, as having misinterpreted the hon. member for Northumberland. His was not a request that the Bill should be stayed—

An hon. MEMBER. Yes, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is what I requested.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman has contradicted something I have not said. What I was about to say was that it was not a request by the hon. member for Northumberland that the Bill should stand over until he should enquire into the matter, but a request that it should stand over until the persons promoting the Bill should come to Ottawa and explain it to him. All I said in relation to that was, that the committee room was the most convenient place to have it not only explained, but proved to the satisfaction of the House that the Bill ought to pass. Of course I fully agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, that when any member of the House desires delay in regard to a private Bill, to enquire into its merits, there is no reason in the world why the Bill should be forced.

Mr. CURRAN. I have no objection that the Bill should stand.

Bill allowed to stand.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 8) to incorporate the Canada and Michigan Tunnel Company.—(Mr. Patterson, Essex.)

Bill (No. 9) respecting the Canada Southern and the Erie and Niagara Railway Companies.—(Mr. Ferguson, Welland.)

Bill (No. 14) to incorporate the Ontario Central Railway Company.—(Mr. Ward.)

Bill (No. 18) to amend the Acts relating to the Great Western and Lake Ontario Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Ferguson (Welland).)

Bill (No. 19) to incorporate the Collingwood and Bay of Quinté Railway Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Bill (No. 21) respecting the Port Arthur, Duluth and Western Railway Company.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Bill (No. 23) to reduce the capital stock of "La Banque Nationale."—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 33) to amend the Act incorporating the Hereford Branch Railway Company, and to change the name of the company to the Hereford Railway Company.—(Mr. Hall.)

Bill (No. 34) respecting the South Norfolk Railway Company.—(Mr. Tisdale.)

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SCARTH (in the absence of Mr. DALY) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 25) to confirm the charter of incorporation of the Great North-West Central Railway Company.

Mr. EDGAR. This is not an ordinary Bill at all, and I think the House is entitled to some explanation about it. It seems to be an Act to confirm an Order in Council which was passed about two years ago, incorporating this railway. Now, I think the House certainly ought to know, before they vote a second reading of this Bill, what is wrong with the Order in Council that it should require confirmation; how is it that an Order in Council passed under the special powers of an Act is not right; and in what particular does the House require to confirm that?

Mr. SCARTH. I moved the second reading of the Bill in consequence of the absence of my friend the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly), who is detained in Ontario. I am unable to give any explanation of it, but I suppose there is no objection that the Bill should stand.

Bill allowed to stand.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY AGREEMENTS.

Mr. SMALL moved second reading of (Bill No. 26) "to confirm a certain Agreement made between the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Canada Southern Railway Company and the London and Port Stanley Railway Company, and a certain Agreement made between the London and South-Eastern Railway Company and the Canada Southern Railway Company." He said: The object of the Bill is simply to confirm certain agreements entered into between those different lines of railway in relation to the running powers over the different roads.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

Mr. THOMPSON.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE—DEBATES TRANS-LATORS.

Mr. LAURIER. I desire to bring up now the question of privilege of which I have given notice.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon gentleman will allow me, I would state that I mentioned to him before we met that the papers which had been ordered to be printed had not yet been distributed. I understand that a number of members have received them, but I only received a copy about a quarter of an hour ago, and I know that my colleagues are in the same position. The hon. First Minister had no copy and had no opportunity of reading the papers. Under these circumstances I would ask the hon. gentleman to postpone his motion.

Mr. LAURIER. There must have been something wrong in the distribution, because the hon. gentlemen opposite seem to have been treated differently from us on this side of the House. We had the papers on Friday last.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I heard three or four of my colleagues say that they have not yet had a copy.

Mr. LAURIER. That is something for you to enquire into, Mr. Speaker, as there must be something wrong with your officers. But, of course, if the hon. gentleman is not ready now, I will not press the question. Would he say on what day he would be ready to discuss it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Say on Monday next, because another subject is set for to-morrow, and is to go on from day to day.

Mr. LAURIER. I am willing to take Monday if the other matter is then disposed of.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Salaries of Board of Examiners and other expenses in connection with the Civil Service Act..... $7,500

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I move that this item be reduced to $6,000. The mistake is due to the oversight of an officer who put another item for this one.

Mr. MULOCK. I believe the Act requires that these examinations shall be held at certain fixed periods, but I understand that a certain degree of irregularity or laxity is growing up in connection with them, and that examinations are occasionally held at other than the regular sessions. If that is the case, and I am aware that it is, it is a practice to be deprecated; and if the hon. the Secretary of State allows it to continue, he will soon have that branch of his department in hopeless confusion. I believe there are two examinations a year fixed by the Act, and I cannot see what cause can be made out to justify the holding of special examinations. Of course, it may happen that a candidate may stand well in the estimation of the Government, and may, perhaps, be an applicant for an office, and it may be desirable, in order to qualify him, to hold a special examination, such as took place in the month of March, 1837, immediately after the general elections. I believe it happens, in other branches of the service, that special examinations are held at times to serve special purposes. Such a case happened at the Royal Military College of Kingston. The effect of this sort of thing is to destroy the confidence of the public in the bond fides of these examinations. I would also call the attention of the hon. the Secretary of State to the fact, that there appears to be no regular period for making known the results of the examinations to the public, and there have been delays for many months. If the examiations are conducted on the merits, then I submit that the returns should be promptly made known to the public.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I am sure my hon. friend has not intentionally tried to mislead the House in regard to the work of the Board of Civil Service Examiners; but I can assure him that his information is wrong. There are two kinds of examinations. There are the preliminary and qualifying examinations for candidates who desire to enter the civil service. These are held by statute and Orders in Council at fixed periods twice a year, namely, in November and May; and they have been held at no other periods, and only after full advertisement—in fact, perhaps too much advertisement—in the public newspapers. The other examinations, for promotion, are those which have led my hon. friend into error. If he will look at the statute, he will see that the times for holding those examinations are regulated by Orders in Council, and are held at different times, according to the wants of the service. In two or three instances, owing to urgent wants of some of the departments, examinations have been held at other periods, but only on very urgent occasions. My hon. friend has spoken of examinations of the military school. I have not much to do with the military, and am, therefore, not competent to say anything with respect to those examinations. But I know that the civil service examiners have nothing at all to do with those of the military college. As regards the date of publication of the returns, that depends entirely on the number of examinations. I know that the board of examiners have always done their best to have the results published at as early a day as possible. In the case of examinations for promotion, it has been thought better to have these returns sent to the heads of each department. There is no need to publish them in the newspapers, as they only concern the administration of the departments. They are sent to the Council and kept secretly before the Council, and when promotions are made, they are made according to these reports.

Mr. MULLOCK. That is a very extraordinary course. I believe the hon. the Secretary of State has declared, what seems to me, to be a very improper system. Men present themselves for promotion; they may or may not have passed, but the Secretary of State keeps the results of their examination secret, until it may suit the Government to make them known.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The candidates are informed of the results of the examinations; they are informed as to whether they have passed or not, but their papers are not returned to them or published.

Mr. MULLOCK. I know a case in point where a candidate for promotion underwent an examination, and the result was withheld from him for nearly a year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think my hon. friend has been wrongly informed.

Mr. MULLOCK. No, I have not.

Mr. BOWELL. I know that the results are sometimes withheld for a long time, but not by the Government. There was one case in my department for promotion, in which the examination took place in Halifax, and it was some months before I could get the results myself from the examiners.

Mr. MULLOCK. Why was the delay?

Mr. BOWELL. The examiners said they had so many papers to investigate that they were unable to award the different marks within reasonable time. The delay was not due to any action on the part of the Government, and I simply give this as an individual case that came under my notice, and of which the hon. the Secretary of State had no information.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is each candidate for promotion entitled to be informed of the result of his examination as soon as the examiners have reported to the Government?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Yes, he is told whether he has passed or not, but he is not entitled to receive the different examination papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman, I think, agreed to inform us, when this item was under discussion a day or two ago, of the proportion of the 1,200 persons who passed the examination last year, who had received appointments.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said the results of all the examinations made during the past year were contained in a statement I put before the House some days ago. I have not the figures now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can you not state it from memory?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is one observation I feel disposed to make on this subject, and that is, that experience goes to show the time has come in Canada when we ought to introduce, in regard to appointments to the civil service, the English competitive system, as to the early stages; and the hon. gentleman has it in his power to earn the gratitude of future generations, if he cares for that, and of future civil servants, by introducing the competitive system for the early stages. I have great doubts myself as to how far you can apply the competitive system, after men have been once admitted to the service, but with due restrictions as to age, I think there is no doubt whatever that the experience of England shows conclusively that a very great improvement in every possible shape and form would be made by introducing the competitive system; and the immense number of persons, who, according to the hon. gentleman are applying for civil service positions, ranging up to 1,200, show that the Government have most admirable material, if only they will make use of it, for greatly improving and raising the standard of the whole service by that expedient.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I must say there is certainly something in the remarks of the hon. gentleman. The necessity of considering that question has forced itself upon the Government, and a measure dealing with it would certainly be expedient, considering the present number of persons holding certificates of examination, a number which has reached over 2,000. There is no doubt that it will be necessary either to suspend for some time the Government statute or devise some other system, so as to check an increase in the number of people holding certificates, and who, unfortunately, consider they are necessarily entitled to be appointed to the service. I think that is a great evil for them, and certainly not a comfort for the Government.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear the hon. the Secretary of State say that. It does him credit; and I think I am justified in hinting to him that if he requires any support in introducing a measure to establish a competitive system in the early stages, hon. gentlemen on this side will only be too happy, for once, to assist him.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I would be glad if hon. gentlemen opposite would do so, so that we could say for once they kept their promise.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think we ever promised support to the hon. gentleman before.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman says 2,000 persons are qualified to be employed in the public service. Do I understand him to say that when a vacancy occurs in the service it will be filled out of this 2,000? Supposing a vacany should occur in the custom house or post office at Ottawa or Montreal, would the person who would get that appointment be selected out of that 2,000?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. All those who by the Act are included in the civil service must submit to an examination before appointment. The outside service, as it is called, is not subject to the rules of the civil service, and to a large extent may not be subject to examination. In some of the departments—for instance, the Inland Revenue Department—there are special technical examinations.

Mr. MITCHELL. Take the case of a postmaster. Do postmasters in the outside service—for instance, at Ottawa, or Montreal, or Halifax—undergo the civil service examination before they are appointed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. If my hon. friend will look at the Act, he will find that postmasters are not subject to examination. Inspectors, collectors and others, he will find, on examining the Act, are not subject to examination. Those who must undergo it are mentioned in the schedule annexed to the Act.

Mr. MITCHELL. Of course I can look at the Act, but as we are not so conversant with it as hon. gentlemen who are paid to hold the positions they occupy, I ask the hon. gentleman in order to get the information in a brief way. I do not want to be referred to the Act. I understand the hon. gentleman now to state that a postmaster in the outside service does not require to undergo civil service examination before his appointment.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Some of them do and some of them do not. Sometimes, in regard to some unimportant position, if an examination is coming on in a few days or a few weeks, an appointment might be made subject to the examination which is coming on very shortly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman says some do and some do not. I will put a distinct, definite question to him. If a vacancy occurred in the post office in the city of Ottawa, would the candidate be required to go up for his examination before he was appointed?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. He is not obliged.

Mr. MITCHELL. Or in the post office in Montreal?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No, he is not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I should like the Minister to inform us what percentage of those who receive certificates obtain appointments each year. I understand that there are some two thousand who have received certificates; how many of these are appointed yearly? If it is only a small percentage, it seems to be a great waste of public money to go on paying $5,000 or $6,000 a year, examining young men for the civil service, when there are such a large number on the list at present who have not received appointments.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The examinations last year cost $5,184, and the receipts were about $2,500, so that the expense was not so very large. I do not know what the appointments were in each department.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not ask what appointments were made in each department, but what was the percentage of appointments altogether. Was it 10 per cent., or 20 per cent., or 50 per cent.?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I cannot say. I suppose there are a number of appointments in a year, but the number must vary in different years. I know that in my own department I had the sorrow, last year, of losing from the fever four or five employés in three months.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Would there be more than 100 appointed in a year?

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I should think more than that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But, if there are only 100, or even if you double that and say 200, and you have 2,000 qualified, what is the sense of continuing this expense for the examination of other candidates?

Mr. BAKER. What harm does it do?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The harm is the useless expense of $5,000 or $6,000 a year.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Those examinations, as the hon. gentleman may know, have become very severe examinations. They are found to be too severe, and I think, taking those who receive appointments during the year, and taking the money expended as between $2,500 and $3,000, in order to have good, well qualified officers when we want them, and having in this way a class of young men throughout the country possessed of a good commercial education, there is not much expenditure to object to.

Mr. CASEY. I think it is absurd for the hon. gentleman to say that the examination is too severe.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I did not say that.

Mr. CASEY. That is what the hon. gentleman said, whether he meant it or not.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I said that some said it was too severe.

Mr. CASEY. At any rate, we know that the examination is not severe. We find that there are 2,000 certified men who have passed the examination, and that is altogether in excess of the necessities of the Government, so that of itself shows that the examination is not at all too severe. I am glad the hon. Minister has recognised this difficulty at last. He will probably remember that, before he was a Minister in this House at all, this matter was discussed, and it was pointed out that this difficulty was likely to arise from an Act of this kind. Before he became a Minister here a Commission appointed by his colleagues had gone thoroughly into the question of the organisation of the civil service, had taken evidence in all parts of Canada, had come to ripe conclusions, and had laid a report before the House pointing out the weaknesses of the existing system, the necessity of adopting the principle of competition, and this difficulty which is now being spoken of must arise from all examinations which are merely of a qualifying nature. While the hon. gentleman's Bill was before the House, I, amongst others—and I was not by any means alone—pointed out that this very thing would arise which has arisen, that if the examinations were only of a qualifying nature, everyone who succeeded in passing them would consider himself entitled to a place in the service, and wait for a vacancy to occur, and that consequently a large number of young people all over the country would be waiting for dead men's shoes, would be waiting to get the place to which they thought they were entitled. I am glad to find that the Minister recognises the difficulty at last, and that he hints at the possibility of the Government adopting a real reform in the civil service. There is no doubt, as my hon. friend from Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says, that these results show that there are many young men and women who are qualified to take the places, who are eager to take the salaries, who are eager to take positions in the civil service, and that a great many of them possess a reasonable amount of education, as the Minister himself states. It seems clear that, with such a large class to draw upon, if the examinations were made really competitive, and if those who came out at the top of the list would be entitled to the positions, you might count on even a larger class of applicants, that you might count upon the class of school-teachers as well as a number of young men who are now studying for professions, and who might be tempted to try to obtain positions in the service. In speaking of this matter, I wish to do so without any political leanings. I brought the matter before the House long before the Minister came here, and while my own friends were in power, and I say that no Government, under the present system of patronage, can have the knowledge necessary to appoint the best men available to the service. The only method by which to get the best men obtainable for the service is a method which excludes the system of patronage altogether. It is well known that, under the present law, a man does not generally go up for examination unless he is previously recommended by a member, unless he has applied to a member for a position and has been told to go up for his examination. In the next place, he cannot get his position, after he has passed his examination, without patronage. Unless he is recommended by some member supporting the Government his certificate goes for nothing, so that patronage enters into the whole of the present system of admitting members to the civil service. Let us compare this with the British system, and we may admit, without derogation to our own dignity, that the people of Great Britain and Ireland have shown themselves to be as good business people as we are. There they manage this on business principles. All those who produce certificates of health and character are allowed to go up for a preliminary examination as they are here, and if they pass that preliminary examination, they are allowed to go on to the competitive examination; and from those who succeed in passing the competitive examination, the vacancies that occur during the year are filled, giving the man who comes out at the head of the list his first choice, and the others their choice in succession of the places vacant. The Premier of England has no power to appoint even messengers, and a great many places in the English service that are not considered here to belong to the civil service, are filled by this competitive system. It was put into operation primarily and tentatively, I think, in 1853, and there has never since that time been the slightest serious attempt to change the system. I think it is time that we, in Canada, took advantage of the experience gained by the people of the mother country. Now, within the last few years, what do we see? Even in the United States, the hot-bed of the patronage system, the country in which originated the system that to the victors belong the spoils—even in the United States they have a system of competitive examination for the civil service, not quite so thorough-going as that in England, but still a system which requires a man to pass a competitive examination and take a good stand before he has any reasonable chance of getting an appointment. Now, in the English system, the evil of having a lot of young people waiting, as I said, for dead men's shoes, is obviated in this way: Before each competitive examination is held, the Government, making a calculation of the number of places that are likely to become vacant during the year, publish that number broadcast; on the basis of that calculation the examination is held, and the parties who have succeeded in passing the competitive examination and who do not succeed in getting an appointment during that year, have no claim whatever upon the Government, and cannot obtain a position without going up afresh for another competitive examination. Under that system you have only one year at a time to deal with, and nobody is kept waiting after the termination of that year for a situation. Suppose the number of vacancies at first was 100, any man who finds himself lower than 100 on the list may as well make up his mind that he has no chance of getting a position, and he may look out for some other career. Men are ranked in the order of merit up to the average number of vacancies that occur during a year, and a great deal of trouble and annoyance is saved to those parties who know that they are precluded from all chance of getting a vacancy. I think that my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, in speaking of the expense of the scheme, did not merely consider the expense of holding the examination, but the expense to which the competitors are put, and among other things the loss of time on their part. I think the Minister ought to consider this point very seriously. He has had now seven years, at least, to digest the report presented to this House before he entered it, one of the most thorough and satisfactory reports, I think, ever presented in relation to the civil service of any country. With the assistance of that report, he should be able now to introduce a thorough Civil Service Reform Act, providing, among other things, for a competitive examination. Perhaps he will do so by next year, as he seems to have learned a great many things. I think he has found out this, among other things, that the possession of patronage is not, after all, an unmixed benefit to a Government or to its supporters. I know that those of us who, on this side of the House, were supporting a Government during five years, found out that patronage was by no means an unmixed benefit to the Government. For every friend you make in the disposition of patronage, you probably make half a-dozen enemies; and the Government or the members who cling tenaciously to the exercise of patronage are really injuring themselves as well as injuring the civil service, and doing an injustice to a great many young men well qualified to transact public business, and who want to have a chance to assist in the civil service. I claim that the country has a right to the services of men of all classes in conducting its affairs. It is the right of men of all parties to have a chance of obtaining a position in the civil service of a country. On these two principles, I shall contend strongly in the future, as I have done in the past, that whatever Government may be in power, whether Conservative or Reform, a change is greatly needed in our civil service system, approximating it more nearly to that of England.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not quite have a good opportunity to follow my hon. friend from South Oxford in the statement he made that the gentlemen on this side of the House—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I did not speak for this side of the House. I said the gentlemen with whom I was more especially connected.

Mr. MITCHELL. I understood you to speak for the gentlemen whom you represent, whom you more immediately control—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No; I did not say I controlled anybody.

Mr. MITCHELL. What did you say?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I said who usually act with me.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, the gentlemen who usually act with the hon. gentleman for South Oxford. He said it would be difficult to support a civil service measure based upon civil service examination such as this. Now, Sir, if there is any merit in a civil service examination at all, it is in the first stages alone. Looking at the results of the civil service examination since that law has been in existence, I must say that I have arrived at the conclusion that it is a useless piece of expense; it creates a class of officials and perpetuates sons of officials in the civil service, as a special class who look forward to no other future. We know that a large proportion of the sons of officials in the civil service are led to look forward, as their highest object in life, to a position in the civil service, and it ruins hundreds of them. There are many of them bright young fellows, who, if they would devote their energy to mechanical, mercantile, engineering and other pursuits, would succeed far better in life than by wasting so many years waiting for employment in the civil service. Perhaps in the course of next year there will be 15 or 20 vacancies where there will be hundreds of applicants. It has been a characteristic of the right hon. gentleman—I am sorry he is not here, perhaps some of his colleagues may convey to him my ideas; if they do not, the papers will—that ever since he came into office, in 1878, he has been pervaded with the desire to copy certain of what I call English fads, political fads, and one of them is this civil service institution. I believe it is calculated to injure the country, to cause a great deal of expense, to induce hundreds and thousands of our young men to look forward to employment in the civil service, destroying their prospects for other professions. In this way we are doing an injury to the country, and so far from agreeing with the idea that the Civil Service Act is going to do any good in the future, I think it is doing harm, and the sooner we wipe it off the statute-book the better for the country.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry my hon. friend has got the idea in his head that the present Civil Service Bill bears the remotest relation to the English Civil Service Bill. If he had listened to what I have been saying, he would have seen that I pointed out a great many glaring differences.

Mr. MITCHELL. I object to the principle.

Mr. CASEY. The principle of this Bill is totally different from the principle of the English Civil Service Act, and it is exactly because it is so different that it is expensive and useless. The principle of the English Civil Service Act is competitive, the principle of this Civil Service Act is simply a qualifying examination which everybody has to pass, and afterwards he has to have the old-fashioned political influence before he gets an appointment. I fully agree with the hon. gentleman in his strictures upon the present Act, that it is a perfect farce in the working, as I contended it would be when it was presented to the House. There has been no check at all upon patronage; men have been appointed from year to year in spite of the report of the examiners that the appointees had not passed the examinations. It is a perfect farce from beginning to end.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I, perhaps, did not quite understand the reply of the Secretary of State with reference to the observations made by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). My hon. friend drew attention to the fact that the Secretary of State had stated that some 2,000 persons had passed the civil service examination, of whom only a very small portion had received appointments. And he naturally asked the question, whether, until those persons who had passed the examination were absorbed into the civil service, the hon. gentleman thought it worth while to go on and incur the expenditure by an annual or semi-annual examination. I confess that I did not gather from the observations of the Secretary of State whether he was inclined to that view, or whether he intimated that it was the intention of the Government to go on with the examination of candidates, although so many as already qualified for vacancies that might occur. Again, I would ask the hon. gentleman whether the Government has endorsed the view which has been very generally expressed in this House, which was the view of the Government when they established the military college at Kingston, to give cadets of the military college the preference in all civil appointments. There you have a class of educated young gentlemen who have gone through a course of scientific study and who are eminently qualified for the various branches of the public service, for our railways, telegraphs and public works, as well as the civil service immediately connected with the departments here; and I know it was the object of the Government when that institution was established to endeavor to keep in the country as many of those young gentlemen as possible, young gentlemen who have been educated largely at the expense of the country. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the Government have arrived at any policy on that subject, or whether they propose to follow what I consider has been the erroneous policy since they came into power, of allowing the cadets of that very excellent institution to be distributed into other employments and to leave the country, and not have them immediately available in case of need? I think it is a point which should seriously engage the attention of the hon. Minister and of the Government. I feel very strongly upon this point, because I am satisfied that until we utilise the services of those young gentlemen, who have been educated largely at the expense of the Government, we will fail to realise the object for which that excellent institution was originated.

Mr. MITCHELL. Why not wipe it out?

Mr. BAKER. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) seemed to wax very warm and appeared to be highly indignant that I should put in an interrogatory as to what harm there could be in having 2,000 candidates who had already passed the civil service examination. I repeat to that hon. gentleman that I see no possible harm in it, and if there were 20,000 or 200,000 it would be all the better for the Dominion of Canada to day, because, as he knows, as I know, and as every hon. member knows, the best time for passing an examination under the Civil Service Act is when young fellows are young fellows and not when they have reached mature years, when it is exceedingly difficult to pass any examination whatever. If the hon. gentleman could show that the examination of a larger number of candidates increases in any degree the expenditure, then I think his remarks would be very fitting at this particular juncture, but if there are 20, 200 or 2,000 candidates for examination under the Civil Service Act, under the provision made in the Estimates for the examination, it would make no financial difference whatever. If, as the hon. gentleman knows, there are 2,000 persons who have passed the civil service examination, he, I dare say, of all members, would be the first to cry out if I sent a man from British Columbia to occupy a position in Charlottetown, P.E.I. He would say: This has nothing to do with you, this is not your territory or your patronage, and the holder of this particular position must be an Islander. And in that I think he is right. The harm of having a large number of candidates for civil service appointments I fail to see. If there is a question on which I feel a little warm it is on this matter of the civil service examinations, because a good deal of the future of the civil service of Canada depends upon the material we introduce into it at the earlier stages. I will now leave the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) to his own reflections, and direct my remarks for a few moments to the observations which fell from the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). I have listened with pleasure, as I always do, to the remarks which fell from the leader of the outside party, more particularly when he spoke in regard to the civil service; and I understood him to put to the Secretary of State the question as to whether persons entering the post offices of Montreal or Ottawa were required to pass the civil service examination. If I heard correctly the reply of the Secretary of State, it was that it would not be necessary. The hon. member for Northumberland might carry away the impression that, in order to obtain positions in those particular post offices, it was not necessary to pass the examinations. I have read the Civil Service Act, with its amendments and the rules and regulations made thereunder, very carefully; and if it is any information to the hon. member for Northumberland, I would state that so far as the city postmasters, or any postmaster, are concerned the provisions of the Civil Service Act of Canada do not apply. But if appointments are to be made to any position below that of city postmaster, the hon.

gentleman will find that every candidate who aspires to occupy a position of that nature will find it obligatory to pass the civil service qualifying examination.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am very much obliged for the information the hon. gentleman has given me. I can return the compliment and say that I always listen to the hon. gentleman with a great deal of pleasure, and particularly when he assumes the role of semi-Minister or Minister in futuro, because it is evident he is qualifying himself for that position. I may say with all sincerity that he would make a capital one, and although my recommendations would not carry much weight in that direction with the hon. gentlemen opposite, I think the sentiment of the House would support me, especially in regard to matters to which he had given attention and which he understood. I am glad the hon. gentleman has told us just what the law is, as the Secretary of State did not make it quite so clear as I desired. We have had it stated by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Baker) that for the higher positions, such as post-master of Montreal, who controls many thousands of dollars, no civil service examination is required. That, indeed, is not the particular kind of qualification needed; but if any clerk who may receive $300, $400, $500, $600 or $1,000 a year, desires to obtain a position in the post office, he must undergo civil service examination. In other words, the practical result is this: Take the case of Hamilton or Montreal, take the case of some of the British Columbia ports, take the case of the ports of the Maritime Provinces, it is not the civil service requirements that govern the qualifications of an appointee, it is that a man must be a present or past member of Parliament, and have supported the Administration of the day. That is the civil service qualification required in that case. I believe the same thing applies, as I understand the Minister of Customs to say, to the Customs Department. The collectors and the chief officers are exempt, while all subordinate officers are expected to pass this civil service examination. I ask any reasonable man what kind of a civil service system is that? I say it is a system that is promoted for the purpose of controlling political patronage and that it is not conducted in the public interest or with a view to secure efficiency, but that it is for the purpose of rewarding the rag-tag and bob-tail who support the Ministry in the House; that is what it is. It is a system that should be wiped away altogether. I am against this civil service examination business. We had just as good officers, and better officers I believe, when there was no civil service examination at all, than we have to-day. I think the selection of officers, because of their efficiency for positions in the civil service of this country, was much better before this fad of the English system, or this attempted imitation of the English system, which the hon. the Premier affects, was brought into force. As I said before, the sooner it is wiped off the Statute-book the better.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When the hon. gentleman from Victoria (Mr. Baker) rose to express his opinion on the civil service, I was prepared to listen with great respect to any opinion he might choose to offer upon the subject, because I knew he had given the matter a great deal of attention. I regret that the hon. gentleman resumed his seat without expressing any opinion whatever as to whether our extraordinary civil service system was a good one or not. The hon. gentleman ventured to say that he could not perceive any possible harm in the retention of the system.

Mr. BAKER. Pardon me, I did not say "in the retention of the system." I said "in having a large number of qualified candidates for positions in the civil service from whom to select."

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman questioned a few remarks I had made, for the purpose of showing that the retention of the system was not desirable. He was questioning that, and if he was doing anything he was arguing in favor of the retention of the system. He was either doing that or nothing at all. The hon. gentleman stated that he could not see any possible harm in the fact that there were two or three thousand candidates throughout this Dominion who had passed qualifying examinations and who were there waiting for their positions.

Mr. BAKER. No.

Mr. DAVIES. I understood the hon. gentleman to say that.

Mr. BAKER. I did not say so.

Mr. DAVIES. I understood him to say he could not conceive any objection to that.

Mr. BAKER. I did not say anything about it.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman asked, what harm was there in it. To my mind there is a great deal of harm in the fact that we have in the different Provinces in this Dominion a large number of young gentlemen who have passed the qualifying examination for the civil service, and who have reason to suppose, or who do suppose, that they may have a reasonable prospect of getting into the service, when, as a matter of fact, no prospect exists for them unless they have political influence. That, to my mind, is a system on which I cannot look with favor. I think it does a great deal of harm to the young men.

Mr. BAKER. I do not think it.

Mr. DAVIES. I do. I think it keeps a lot of young men who would otherwise devote their energy and talents to some other business, hanging on to the fringe of a Government "jackall," or Government supporter, in the hope that by so hanging on they would some day get an appointment. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) referred to our system as somewhat analogous to the English system. Our system is as different from the English system as chalk is from cheese. Our system is essentially a political one, and a young man, after passing his examination, has no hope of any appointment in the civil service unless he gets his application endorsed by a political supporter of the Government. It is a pure farce and nothing else. The entire system is different from the English.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say it paralleled the English system at all. All I contended was that it was an imitation of the English system to a certain extent, and that it failed in all the essential and proper conditions of the English system.

Mr. DAVIES. They have omitted to incorporate those portions of the English system which are good in themselves into our system. As I have said a half-dozen times, there are some things to be said in favor of the competitive system, especially with reference to the initiatory step in entering the civil service. Our system depends entirely upon politics and upon political patronage, and endeavors to hide that damping fact under the cloak of an examination. I say it is the worst system I know of. If it openly announced to the people that this examination is only a farce, intended only to deceive, and that they appoint men simply on political grounds, there might be something to be said for it. "To the victors belong the spoils" is an old American cry, and there is something to be said in its favor. But you attempt to lead the people to believe that the examination has something to do with appointments in the civil service, when, as a matter of fact, it has nothing to do with it whatever; for if a man does pass the examination he cannot get appointed except through political patronage. I endorse a great many of the remarks which fell from this side of the House. It is time our system was changed, but I do not expect the hon. the Secretary of State to do so until perhaps he may see that his friends are going out of power.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. My hon. friend seems to understand very little about our system of civil service examinations, and I think it will take more time than can be occupied by this debate to teach him what are the good effects of the Civil Service Act, so far as examinations are concerned. When the hon. gentleman has looked into the matter a little more, and does not try to make political capital out of this non-political matter, he will see that the civil service examination system has done a good deal of good. There is, no doubt, an inconvenience in the large number of candidates who have passed the examination, but this is the case in every profession, and in all parts of the world. The same thing has been said of the profession to which my hon. friend belongs, in the different Provinces, that there were too many candidates, too many students, too many lawyers. It is not reasonable nor fair to single out this inconvenience in the civil service system only. There is no doubt that there is a very large number of candidates offering themselves, and this, of course, should be cured one way or the other; but it is not correct to say that those two thousand young men are all waiting for positions in the civil service. I know a great number of young men who occupy other positions, and who think it is a pride for them to be holders of a certificate from the civil service examiners. I can also inform the hon. gentleman opposite that a number of people who have needed clerks, in banks, and other institutions, have asked me to recommend men who have passed the civil service examination, and I have always said that if a young man passes successfully the examination for the civil service, that he was an efficient young man, and one worthy of being employed in any commercial position. This is one particular in which the examination system has had a good effect. It is not because there are some inconveniences which have to be remedied, that it should be concluded immediately that the system is nothing but a political engine, and that there is nothing in it but bribery of members to secure positions for political protégés, as some of the hon. gentlemen have intimated.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman must not put words in my mouth. I said nothing about bribery at all. I said the system was purely political.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I alluded, in my last words, to the remark of one of the hon. gentleman's friends.

Mr. MITCHELL. Did the hon. gentleman, when he pointed this way, mean me? If so, I want to correct him.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I beg pardon of the leader of the outside party—

Mr. MITCHELL. If I understood you to mean me, I did not say that there was bribery of members. I said the selections were made from hangers-on to past members of Parliament, as a rule.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I heard what the hon. gentleman said; I do not care repeating his expressions, but I knew what it meant, and it meant what I have said.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.) The observations of the Secretary of State, as addressed to the committee with reference to the professions being overcrowded, does not at all apply to the condition of things that result from this examination system. Each one who serves an apprenticeship in an office, whether it be in a law office or some physician's office, expects to follow his profession as such. But what profession does any candidate fill who has passed a civil service examination? Is he admitted as a matter of course into the civil service? The hon. gentleman knows well that he has ten times as many candidates as he has places, and that therefore he is simply inviting a number of young men and women to come forward and offer themselves for examination without any prospect of their ever being employed in the public service. They are kept from engaging in legitimate pursuits, and are encouraged to live in a state of expectancy on account of this system which the hon. gentleman has introduced. The hon. gentleman has told us that he has been enabled to furnish to banks and other institutions of that sort a certain number of candidates who have been examined for the civil service. Well, Sir, I would very seriously object to the hon. gentleman extending his patronage not only to the whole of the civil service, but to the banking institutions of the country. If he wants to do justice to the candidates, let him publish the results of these examinations so that the public may see what is the exact standing of the candidates in every subject. Then the public will know whether the hon. gentleman and his colleagues are selecting the persons who are best qualified, or simply those who are able to pass, and he would also enable any institution requiring the services of such candidates, to select those of the best standing. In that way the success of the candidates in obtaining positions would depend on their capacities and attainments. But the position of things at the present time is very different. The civil service examinations, moreover, are not at all equal to the literary examinations of school teachers in almost every Province in the Dominion. If young men or young women wish to ascertain what their exact standing is, or to compare it with that of others seeking positions on the ground of their literary attainments, they will have a better opportunity of doing so by means of the examinations held in connection with the school boards than by means of the civil service examinations. The hon. gentleman's plan has not promoted the efficiency of the civil service. I believe the statement made by the hon. member for Northumberland is borne out by the facts, that the examinations have simply enabled the Government occasionally to put off some member of their party to whom they did not wish to give a position in the civil service, by saying to him: "You must take the examination." But if he has influence and friends ready to back him, his inability to pass the examination in no case stands in his way. The hon. gentleman admits to the public service at present many incompetent persons who have not passed the examinations. Thus expectations are excited which only lead to disappointment, and the Government have used the civil service examinations in the interest of their party, without the slightest regard to the benefits that might be derived from them by the public service.

Mr. CASEY. Before the item is carried, I feel tempted to make some further remarks in the line of the discussion which has gone before, but I will not do so just now. I want to bring up a new point which has not been discussed this year, although we discussed it two or three years ago—I mean the method of conducting the civil service examinations. The hon. member for North York and some others of us urged very strongly that instead of having a permanent staff of examiners, all highly paid, as at present, we should have only one or two civil service commissioners to superintend the work of examining applicants, and the examination papers made up from year to year by the ablest professors and teachers who could be obtained for the purpose, paying them a stated sum for making up the papers and examining the answers. Now, this discussion which we have had to-day will go abroad to the country, and those who aspire to places in the service will learn that there are two thousand ahead of them, and I hope the knowledge will be good for the country, by discouraging numbers of young people from coming up to these examinations. Suppose we have only three or four hundred candidates to be examined during the next year; what will be the result? Any reduction in the salaries of the civil service examiners? Not a dollar. Whether they have much or little to do, they will be paid their full salaries just the same. Now, I say that is not right. Two commissioners at most, to provide for the accident of one or the other being taken ill, could attend to all the business of the civil service commission as a commission, and the examination of the candidates should be carried on as it is done in every university and school in Canada, by outside parties for the time being. In the universities the professors do not examine their own students for degrees; but outside parties are engaged, and the highest amount paid to any examiner in the University of Toronto for making out papers and examining the answers, and rating the students according to their standing, is $400; and it is an infinitely more laborious piece of work than that of the civil service examiners, who are paid high salaries—I forget what their salaries are.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I think $600, and the Secretary $700 besides—I am not exactly sure.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. Minister does not even remember how much is paid to the commissioners under his own care. Perhaps it would be well for him, as he said to my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island, before he discusses the question of expenditure to ascertain the exact amount. By appointing one or two commissioners and making them independent of the Government, as they should be, and allowing them to engage outside men to make up the papers of candidates in the order of merit, we would save a lot of money and have a real and genuine examination. The examination held at present is very expensive, and, as my hon. friend from Bothwell said truly, it is not as severe as the examinations for school teachers—hardly more severe than the examination for admission to the grammar schools of Ontario. It does not show any considerable degree of education on the part of those who pass. It shows that they can read and write at dictation, and a few other little things, but why should we not get the very best men who are willing to come up for examination? Under a better system we should have many college graduates coming up for examination, and many well qualified young men, instead of those who do not feel themselves qualified for other positions. Why not adopt the competitive system, and get the very best men who are willing to go into the service? That is the substance of the English system, and I wish to differentiate that, as far as possible, from the miserable substitute for it called the civil service system of Canada. My hon. friend has laid before me the Auditor General's accounts, and I find that the Minister's memory, although he was not sure of it, was good. The secretary is paid $700, and the three examiners are paid $600 each. But the hon. gentleman is wrong in one respect, for I find that the same person is secretary and examiner. Mr. LeSueur draws $700 as secretary and $600 as examiner, and also draws I do not know how much out of the superannuation fund. Mr. DeCelles, another examiner, gets $700, although as joint-librarian his whole time and services, which, I admit, are valuable, are supposed to be given to the library. Mr. Thorburn is paid $600, Mr. Clark $575, and then there are sub-examiners in different places. I merely wish to object to the system of engaging a number of men as permanent examiners when one or two commissioners, with examiners chosen from professors and other qualified men, would do the whole business more efficiently and cheaper.

Mr. BURDETT. I think the Government are perfectly justified in appointing their own supporters to all vacant offices. I have no faith in any civil service examination, nor do I believe the leader of the Government ever makes the mistake of appointing his opponents to office. It was left to this side to make those mistakes; and if when they get into power again, they are going again to fill the vacant offices with Conservatives, they might as well remain out of power. For my part, if any vacancy should occur, and it should come within my control, I will take care to help those who helped me. That is the plain straight system, We made the mistake, when in power, of acting differently.

Mr. HAGGART. You made a good many mistakes.

Mr. BURDETT. Had we appointed to office our own friends when in power and let our enemies go by the board, we might be in power yet. What I maintain, in regard to the subject under discussion, is that there is no use in having competitive examinations. If the hon. the First Minister wished to fill vacancies with Liberals he would find them all qualified.

Mr. BOWELL. In their own estimation.

Mr. BURDETT. Well, that is worth something. But the point I wish to make is this, that there are too many civil servants, and I believe those who do the least work get the most pay. I believe in a party when in power appointing its friends to office and giving honest pay for honest work; but as the case stands, more men are employed than are necessary to do the work, and a great number are employed who do nothing but sign the pay roll.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And sometimes sign it twice.

Mr. BURDETT. I would also suggest the abolition of this system of superannuation and pensions. Let men understand, when they enter the civil service, how much money they are going to get, and let them provide out of their means for their old age as do other people in the country, and that system will be found the most healthy in the long run. I see no use for examinations. The party in power in any case appoint their own friends to office, and they will be very foolish if they do not. When the party on this side gets into power, they will appoint their friends, no matter what they say now, and if they do not they will have very few friends. I do not think it is at all dishonorable for men to engage in politics, or for a man to help a friend to obtain a political position; and I am of opinion that the young men who assist their friends to get into Parliament have a right to look to them in return for appointments when there are any going. Of course the basis of all appointments should be capability. The first question should be, is the applicant fit for the position? and then, if it be not possible to find a gentleman with sufficient requirements from our own ranks, appoint somebody from the other side. But, to spend two or three hours here discussing a principle which all parties carry out when in power, is, in my estimation, a useless expenditure of public time and money.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice that Mr. LeSueur is on the superannuation list. He was superannuated because he was supposed to be incapable of performing the duties that devolved upon him as a civil servant, yet now we see him performing the double service of secretary and examiner. As secretary, he draws $700, as examiner $600, and as a superannuated officer $1,024, making in all $2,324. According to the superannuation system in Ontario, under our school system, should a teacher who has been superannuated engage in any other business, his allowance is cut off, because it is evident that if he can earn his living there is no reason for giving him a superannuation allowance. The same system should rule here. Here is a man who has been superannuated on the ground of sickness and receives $1,024 out of the superannuation fund, yet we find him capable of filling two positions on an important board. It is evident from this alone, that the whole superannuation system is a farce.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary $95,654 79

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not aware that the Kingston item had been entirely disposed of, and I will take the liberty of asking the hon. the Minister of Justice what course he proposes to adopt as to the employment of the prisoners in the Kingston penitentiary, particularly with respect to public works in the vicinity of the prison?

Mr. THOMPSON. No great difficulty was found last year in finding employment for the convicts. The hon. gentleman is aware that the work of lock-making carried on in the penitentiary had ceased, and employment had to be found for 60 or 80 prisoners who had followed that occupation. Some of them have been taken into the trade shops, others have been employed on the farms, and work was found for the whole of them pretty satisfactorily last year. With regard to the policy that might be adopted concerning public works in Kingston, my own opinion, which I would be disposed to present to my colleagues, is that the labor of the convicts should be made available, as far as possible, on public works in the vicinity of the prison.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to enquire something in regard to an escape which took place from the Kingston penitentiary. I understand that, during the last year, there were two convicts who escaped in rather a peculiar way. I believe there was, or is, a steam yacht owned in connection with the penitentiary. I would like to know whether that yacht is the property of this Dominion or the property of the warden of the penitentiary? I would like to know whether those convicts who were employed on that steam yacht were so employed with the consent of the Minister of Justice, or whether the warden of the penitentiary has the right to take outside of the premises any convict he chooses for the purpose of his own convenience, or the convenience of his family, and to run the risk of their escaping in the way those two convicts escaped? We should have some explanation from the Minister of Justice in regard to that matter. I would like to know how these persons were engaged when they made their escape, for what purpose they were engaged, under whose direction they were so employed, and whether it was with the consent of the Minister of Justice or not?

Mr. THOMPSON. The steam yacht is the property of the Dominion. It is not for the convenience of the warden, but for the convenience of the prison, and it is found to be a very great convenience for the penitentiary. As to my having sanctioned the employment of these convicts, I had no particular knowledge of their being so employed, but I would not have hesitated to sanction the employment of any convicts whom the warden thought fit, in the exercise of his reasonable discretion, to be employed outside of the prison walls. All convicts who have short terms to serve, or who have proved themselves to be of good character, are trusted to a greater extent than those of a more questionable character. As to the escape referred to, I understand the facts to be that the convicts employed upon the yacht were thought to be perfectly reliable persons. The practice was to keep steam up in the yacht during the hours of the day when it was likely that she would be required to make a trip—a sufficient amount of steam to allow her to be got under way when necessary. These two convicts were employed at the time in making temporary repairs on the yacht. It happened that no guards were on board at the time, though they were in the vicinity, and these convicts quite unexpectedly, and very adroitly, got up steam and made their escape, although they were immediately fired upon, and one was probably hit, and they made their escape in that way.

Mr. MULLOCK. Is not this yacht used as a pleasure yacht by the warden and his family?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not. I am not prepared to say that my officer does not take pleasure in the performance of his duties, but this yacht is there for the use of the prison and is used in that way.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. gentleman say that this yacht had not been used for a pleasure tour on that day by the warden and his family, and that it was not only after they stepped ashore that these convicts made their escape?

Mr. THOMPSON. My information is to the contrary.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have information to the contrary, and I believe it is correct.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the information the Minister has is quite correct. I think the Minister will find on further enquiry that this was used as a pleasure yacht, and there is objection to prisoners being used in managing a steam yacht for the convenience of these gentlemen. No doubt, the yacht may be more used for legitimate purposes in the other way, but I do not think the information which the Minister has is quite correct. I remember that the matter was fully discussed in the Kingston papers at the time, and the statements made then were not the same as those which the Minister has been advised to make.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am speaking from very full reports made to me in consequence of my enquiries into this matter, and I hope no member of the House will be misled by statements which may appear in the newspapers as to what goes on within the prison walls. I do not think that this yacht was used for the pleasure of the warden, or that the convicts were employed for the pleasure of the warden.

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary $95,654 79

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The Minister ought to give us some information, as there is a large increase here over the amount voted last year, and over the expenditure of 1886-7.

Mr. THOMPSON. The increase in the salaries is the statutory increase authorised by the Act of last Session. The increase in the allowance for uniforms arises from the fact that, under the Penitentiary Act of last Session, we provided, for good reasons, that the officers should be given a winter and a summer suit every year, when previously they had only one every second year. There is an increase in the cost of maintenance largely because the coal contracted for is at an increased price over last year. The working expenses are increased by more than $600 by the enlargement of the prison and the rearrangement of the heating apparatus which necessitates the use of more fuel. There is an amount of $225 extra under working expenses for sleighs which it is found are required, and the miscellaneous expenses are increased by $100 for such matters as postage, telegrams and contingent expenses, such as expressage and so on.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see that the number of convicts estimated for in 1886-7 was more than the number estimated for in 1888-9, and you are asking a much larger amount for a smaller number of convicts. I am not able to say what was expended last year, but I think it is the duty of the Minister to come as near as possible to the probable expenditure. It is a vicious system that the Government should set apart a much larger amount than may be required for the expenditure of the year, as it may cause an extravagant outlay. When we see the enormous amount of money being expended in these various institutions, we are led to think that some extravagance is committed in the letting of contracts, or in other ways. Now, I see a large amount is taken for heating these buildings. Does the hon. member think the expenditure this year is going to be greater than in past years? I would like to know where he obtains the coal used there? Is it the anthracite, or does he use Nova Scotia coal?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not able, at this moment, to answer the hon. gentleman. I will tell him to-morrow, if he will be kind enough to wait.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I see here an item of $224 for duty upon coal, which would seem to indicate that it was anthracite coal. This is a matter that concerns the Postmaster General. He has plenty of coal in his Province, and according to his policy we ought to foster all home industries, and I would advise him to pay some attention to that. I see also a small item to pay for two gallons of brandy for plum-pudding on Christmas day. I know that the Minister of Justice is a strictly temperate man, and I would like to know what he thinks of this item. Does he not think that a large amount for flavoring plum-pudding for 325 convicts?

Mr. THOMPSON. I find it very difficult to answer that, because I never made a plum-pudding. An hon. gentleman beside me remarks that it depends a great deal on the size of the pudding. I think there was no doubt whatever that the brandy was used.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Nobody doubts that.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice in the Auditor General's report an item of $3,390.31 for gratuities. I would like to know from the Minister what is meant by these gratuities?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is a system regarding retiring penitentiary officers that those who are appointed by Order in Council and give their whole time to the work of the prison, are put on the superannuation list, and, when they retire from the public service, receive their ordinary superannuation under the Superannuation Act. With regard to all other officers, such as those appointed by the Minister himself, or by the warden, they simply receive a gratuity on retiring, calculated on the number of years' service; and, occasionally, under the regulations of the Treasury Board, when an officer dies, a gratuity equal to two months' salary is paid to his family.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I notice that in 1886-7 there were $182.58 expended for drugs and medicines. Could the Minister give us the details? That really seems a very large sum.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have not by me the details of that item, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that before a single dollar is allowed to be expended for drugs and medicines, a requisition for every article proposed to be purchased is sent to the department by the warden, and it is passed by the Minister. The requisition of the warden must also be accompanied by the requisition of the surgeon. We know that generally these drugs and medicines include almost everything that is required for the use of the hospital, including also hospital appliances of various kinds. Occasional articles which are required in the surgery have to be furnished, although they do not come strictly under the head of drugs and medicines, but they are only furnished on a requisition, and there is a voucher for every cent expended.

Mr. LAURIER. I would like to ask the Minister if he can give us any information as to the present management of the penitentiary at St. Vincent de Paul. The hon. gentleman is aware that for many years the administration of that institution was a disgrace to the country.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am glad to be able to state to the hon. gentleman that, under the new control, the prison has been entirely without reproach, so far as I have been able to ascertain. The hon. gentleman is well aware that the institution is subjected to such constant criticisms that any irregularities would certainly come under my observation, if any had occurred. Under the present management there has not been a single complaint on the part of the prisoners, the officers, or the outside public. During recess I took occasion to visit the prison, and so far as I was able to judge, it appeared to be conducted very satisfactorily indeed. During the late administration the principal cause of complaint was insubordination, and I know that that has been entirely removed.

Mr. LAURIER. I am very glad to hear it. There is no doubt at all that, according to the report of that institution made from time to time, a good deal of the evil which undoubtedly prevailed formerly arose from the insubordination of the inferior officers, and I am glad to learn that better discipline now prevails. May I ask who the deputy warden is now?

Mr. THOMPSON. Thomas McCarthy.

Mr. LAURIER. The former chief keeper?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice on page 65 of the Auditor General's report another item in connection with the penitentiaries, landau carriage, $675. I should like some information in regard to the item.

Mr. THOMPSON. As there was no carriage at the prison fit for use I authorised the warden to purchase one, a carriage sufficient to hold three or four persons.

Mr. MULLOCK. Where was it manufactured?

Mr. THOMPSON. It was bought second-hand.

Mr. McMULLEN. Is it not a rather expensive carriage to have around a place of this kind? A carriage for four or five persons, costing $675, is a rather expensive ornament to have around a penitentiary. The committee is entitled to know where it was manufactured, the contract price, or whether the work was given out at a fictitious price. It is an absurd price to pay for an article of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was not manufactured to order as I have said. The hon. gentleman is, perhaps, not aware that the penitentiary is a considerable distance from the railway station, and occasionally business requires that some of the officers should go to Montreal. The carriage has, therefore, to be strongly built, and must be substantial, and the one in question is not different from those in use at other penitentiaries.

Mr. McMULLEN. How many horses are kept around this place?

Mr. THOMPSON. I think six.

Mr. McMULLEN. I notice they have used 1,800 bushels of oats, one bushel a day for each horse. I really think these items deserve some explanation. It is our duty to ask these questions, for this item has grown enormously. The expenditure connected with the penitentiaries is rolling up every year. It is the duty of the Opposition to criticise every item, and to obtain information, not for themselves, but for the people of the country. Explanations should be given to the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should be very sorry if the hon. gentleman supposed I was unwilling to give explanations. I stated from memory the number of horses, and I think the statement is correct; but the oats are not used entirely for the horses. In some instances, they are seed oats, bought for the use of the farm.

Mr. McMULLEN. I understood the Minister to say that there was one vehicle around there.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I explained that we were taking a small sum, $215, for the purchase of a sleigh.

Mr. McMULLEN. There is also an item of $56 for repairs for buggy.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. In answer to the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), I understood the Minister to say that before any expenditures were incurred in connection with the penitentiary every care was taken that the articles ordered were required, and nothing more was obtained but what was required.

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps that is going further than I stated. I stated that I required the requisition both of the surgeon and the warden in connection with the supplies for the hospital.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) As I listened to the hon. gentleman's statement I remembered that last year a very interesting discussion took place in the House on the main item to which the hon. gentleman has referred, and I think hon. members were pretty well satisfied that, while the department at Ottawa was not to blame, under cover of drugs money had been expended for other purposes. I amused myself while the Minister was speaking in going over this year's report of the Auditor General, taking the cost of supplying the necessary medicines for convicts in the different penitentiaries. In Kingston, with 572 convicts, only $373 were spent for drugs, or 65 cts. a head. In St. Vincent de Paul, with 282 convicts, $498 were expended, or nearly $2 a head. In Dorchester, with 143 convicts, $271 were spent; but in Manitoba, where the trouble arose last year, and where it was satisfactorily proved to the minds of the majority of the House that there had been very gross irregularities, to put it very mildly, in the accounts of the officer of that penitentiary—in that penitentiary, with 85 convicts, $639 were spent for drugs. In British Columbia penitentiary, with 95 convicts, $263 were spent. The thing is so utterly ridiculous on its face that the statement made last year that the word "drugs" was used to cover up improper expenditures is true beyond a doubt. It seems ridiculous that while in Kingston the expenditure was 65 cts. a head, the expenditure in Manitoba penitentiary should be $8 per head. I assume, of course, that the Minister of Justice was correct in what he said respecting the requisitions of the medical man and the warden, but the facts are such as to warrant an investigation into that department, and if this is made it looks as if the hon. gentleman will find that the statement made last year, that there was gross and indefensible irregularities in the department, will be proved to be true.

Mr. THOMPSON. Statements like those made by the hon. gentleman were made two years ago and an investigation was held, and I know perfectly well that there were no such irregularities in connection with this item, either in the Manitoba penitentiary or anywhere else; and under the head of drugs there was nothing covered and concealed, and not one dollar of the public money was expended for anything outside of what was required for the use of the surgery and the hospital. It is quite a mistake for the hon. gentleman to take up the Auditor General's report and endeavor to make comparisons in this way, and say that the figures in Manitoba show $6 per head while the figures at Dorchester show $2. The fact is that those supplies are not laid in so as to cover the consumption for a single year, for as regards some of them a supply of medicines is kept on hand, many of which may not be used in the course of the year. I may remind the hon. gentleman that it was the year before last that these particular charges respecting irregularities in the purchase of medical supplies for Manitoba penitentiary were made, and the very unusually large charge for medical supplies there was brought forward, and I have discovered that nearly $500 of the amount included in the sum stated in the Auditor General's report as being for the year was for the settlement of an old account, some of the items of which had been in dispute, in consequence of which the whole account was kept in suspense. I have no hesitation in saying this: That a very much larger quantity of drugs and medicines has to be used and kept on hand in Manitoba penitentiary, comparing the number of prisoners there with the number in any other penitentiary, than is necessary elsewhere. Almost constantly we have Indians and persons in infirm health, and for whom prison life is exceedingly hard, confined in Manitoba penitentiary. We get there a class of prisoners we do not get in any other penitentiary in the Dominion, a number of whom require daily hospital treatment.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think the Minister's explanation as to the amount taken almost every year will be shown not to be correct, if we take the Auditor General's report for a number of years past, and the amount taken year in and year out. A similar amount has been taken each and every year during a number of years past. That being the case, and the same amount going each year for the purchase of drugs and medicines, it would appear to me that drugs and medicines are used for the purpose of covering up certain things that would not bear the light of day. I certainly hold the belief that the drugs and medicines required in Manitoba, to the extent which the Minister conveys the impression, have not been used for the purpose of reviving broken down Indians and convicts.

Mr. THOMPSON. Could the hon. gentleman reserve his remarks on Manitoba until to-morrow, and allow us to take the vote on St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, if he has no objection to that vote?

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am perfectly willing to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot allow that resolution to pass without making a few complimentary remarks to the Minister, in relation to one feature in the management of the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary: that was, the great consideration which he gave to the representation which I made to him about one of the convicts. The convict was an unfortunate negro boy who was in for twenty years. He was the man who at the time of the insurrection in the prison prevented the rebels from getting into the main building. I took it upon myself to represent to the Minister this fact, and I am pleased to say that he dealt with it with that consideration which I thought the case deserved, and on the recommendation of the hon. the Minister of Justice the Government took ten years from the convict's sentence of twenty years penal servitude.

Committee rose and reported progress.

REPORTS PRESENTED.

Report of the Department of Marine for the year 1887.—(Mr. Foster.)

Report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery for the year 1887.—(Mr. Chapleau.)

GOVERNMENT MEASURES.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have been in Session now for nearly a month, and the hon. the Prime Minister has not introduced any one of the Bills referred to in the Speech from the Throne. There are several important Bills promised; those in relation to the parliamentary elections, the Franchise Bill, and the Contested Elections Bill, which the hon. gentleman has informed us would be the subject of legislation this Session. I think it is only fair to us and only fair to the country that the Government should bring down the measures at once and that we should have an opportunity of carefully considering them and inviting the opinions of our constituents with reference to them. We are already dealing with the Estimates and those measures which the Government—the parties who enjoy the confidence of the country—measures by which the Government propose to deal with the grievances of the people of this country, are not yet presented to the House. It would be adhering to the constitutional principle that those measures should be in the hands of the members of this House now. I am sure if the Government desires to facilitate the work of the Session, they will see that we are put in possession of those measures at an early date. I have already called the attention of Parliament to the fact that, for the past fifty years, all important measures of the English Ministry have been submitted to Parliament during the first three weeks of the Session. That period already has passed in our case, and not one of those measures which the hon. the First Minister has promised in the speech of His Excellency are yet in the hands of the members.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We are not three weeks in Session yet.

Mr. LAURIER. Three weeks to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Three weeks to-day. The hon. gentleman will see that we don't count Thursday twice.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am quite sure that the Government is very anxious to bring down the measures, and I may point out that some of the measures have been already introduced. Those measures which have been spoken of in connection with the elections have not yet been brought down but they will be in a few days, and the country will have an opportunity of considering them. A very important measure which has been brought down is the Railway Bill. I think it is very likely that the Bill connected with the fisheries will be brought down as soon as Sir Charles Tupper is in his place. He is confined to his bed just now, but I hope he will be well in a day or two. The Minister of Justice will try to bring the Electoral Franchise Bill down in a few days.

THE LOBSTER INDUSTRY.

Mr. DAVIES. I wish to repeat my question to the Minister of Marine about the reports on the lobster fishery on which subject a great many enquiries are being made. When will they be brought down? It was stated a few days ago that they would be down in a few days.

Mr. FOSTER. They will be brought down on Thursday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 14th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

MANITOBA LAW.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 41) respecting the application of certain laws, therein mentioned, to the Province of Manitoba. He said: A question has arisen as to the applicability of a large portion of the modern law of England to the Province of Manitoba. Under a constitutional principle which is well established and widely known, the provisions of the statute law of the mother country extend to a colony as far as they are applicable down to the period when a Legislative Assembly is organised in the colony. The case of the Province of Manitoba has been somewhat peculiar. It existed as a mere territory under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company down to the date of the Order in Council which transferred it to the Dominion of Canada on the 15th July, 1870; and when the Legislature was organised, it was provided by a statute of that Legislature that the law of England, as far as it was capable of being applied to the colony as it existed on the 15th July, 1870, should be the law of the Province of Manitoba in regard to such matters as were within the control of the Provincial Legislature; but in other matters, such, for example, as the law of interest and the law relating to promissory notes, the statute of the Province would be ineffectual, and the question has arisen as to what portion of the English law is in force in regard to matters which have not been expressly legislated upon by the Dominion, and are outside of the jurisdiction of the Provincial Legislature. Doubts have arisen as to what portion of the English law is in force subsequent to 1870, the date of the charter of the Hudson's Bay Company. In that charter, the language is in substance that the company is authorised to establish courts of civil and criminal jurisdiction in its territory, and that these courts shall administer the laws of England, those being presumably and probably the laws which were then in force, so that the laws of England in regard to subsequent matters, such as promissory notes and interest, have been left without any application to the Province of Manitoba, or, at any rate, in the opinion of the jurists who have had to pronounce on the subject, that is the case. This Bill proposes to make applicable to the Province of Manitoba the English law which existed on the 15th July, 1870, and to make special provisions in relation to interest. The 3rd clause of the Bill provides that the 1st clause shall not apply to existing litigation, but, as to matters of interest, the law will apply to existing proceedings as well as to those which have not yet been commenced.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is a very necessary measure. There is no doubt of the correctness of the admissions made by the Minister of Justice that so far as the legislation of the Province of Manitoba is concerned, it could not affect any other rights than those that are within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Province. This territory, I have no doubt, was, historically, a portion of the territory ceded by France to Great Britain in 1764. The old maps that the commissioners at that time had before them, show that the whole country, as far west as the Rocky Mountains, was in the possession of France; in fact the later governors who were sent out by France to govern this country extended their jurisdiction over that territory, and at the time Canada was surrendered to Great Britain, there were French troops as well as French trading posts established in that country. The French Governor of Canada issued licenses for that country; and as soon as Canada was ceded to Great Britain, the whole country as far westward as the Mississippi River, and the whole country north of the Mississippi River, indefinitely westward as far as it was the property of the King of France, became a portion of the territories of the King of England; so that whether the common law of England would extend to that country at all, previous to 1764, is a matter of great doubt. Then the Minister of Justice knows that, according to the recognised rules of public law, whether the English law would be extended to that country, or the law of France, which was in force over the entire country at the time of the surrender, would depend upon the determination of the king himself. If he expressed no opinion upon the subject then, of course, the law which was in force prior to the conquest would continue to be in force after the conquest was consummated. I may say, however, that I believe that territory at the time of the surrender was a part of the territory of the King of France, and that subsequent to the Quebec Act, when Upper Canada was established in 1791, it was intended to be embraced, and was embraced as a part of the Province of Upper Canada. No doubt the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in dealing with the question as to the limits of the Province of Ontario, did not pretend to say that that territory now known as the Province of Ontario and the North-West Territory, was not included in the Province of Upper Canada when it was established; but the subsequent establishment there of a government by the Hudson's Bay Company, as a matter of fact, which was not contested, or actively opposed, by the Government of the Province of Ontario, led to the loss of the territories by the principle of acquiescence. So when they undertook to ascertain what were the western boundaries of Ontario, as they now exist, they declared that as the Province of Assiniboia did not extend eastward of the Winnipeg River, the Province of Ontario continues to hold the territory as far westward as it had been embraced in the old Province of Quebec under the Act of 1774. So that what particular law is in force in that country, apart from our legislative declaration, would be a matter of extreme doubt, whether it would be the old law of France, or the common law of England; and whether it was the law of England in 1774 or 1791, is also a matter of doubt. Therefore, it seems to me that the proposed legislation by the Minister of Justice is highly necessary to remove all doubt, and determine what law does govern the people in that country within the jurisdiction of the Parliament of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BAR AT PINETTE HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the bar at Pinette Harbor, Prince Edward Island, dredged during the coming summer?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am informed that there are about 10 feet of water over that bar at Pinette Harbor, in high water; and it is found that the bar is of rock. My chief engineer says that, before we undertake this, we must have a survey in order to ascertain all the facts.

WOOD ISLAND HARBOR.

Mr. WELSH asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have the dredging at Wood Island Harbor performed this year, so as to make that harbor available for shipping purposes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps the hon. gentleman knows that some years ago an attempt was made to dredge Wood Island Harbor, and the work was given up. I understand that it was likely to cost too much money. Since that time there have been many petitions to the same effect, but their request was refused for the same reason. It is not likely we could undertake this work unless stronger reasons are given for it than have yet been presented to us.

OVERLOADING OF VESSELS.

Mr. GUILLET asked, Is it the intention of the Government to introduce a measure to prevent the overloading of vessels trading on our inland waters?

Mr. FOSTER. In reply to that question, I would say that the matter is engaging the attention of the Government at the present time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

COMPENSATION TO GENERAL STRANGE.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, Whether the Government have compensated, or intend to compensate General Strange, for the loss of his pension derived from the British Government during the period while General Strange was engaged in assisting to suppress the rebellion in the North-West?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman I beg to state that Major General Strange, from the 28th of March to the 17th September, 1885, 174 days, received $2,117. It is not the intention of the Government to compensate Major General Strange for the loss of his pension.

HADLOW COVE PIER.

Mr. GUAY asked Whether the Government have taken into consideration, since last Session, the petitions of the inhabitants of St. David, L'Auberivière and of St. Telesphore, asking for an extension of the Government pier at Hadlow Cove to deep water? If so, is it their intention to have the work commenced at an early date?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have had this question examined by my officers in order to ascertain if we had any public works of the kind at L'Auberivière. The wharf which is there is the property of a private individual, and the petitions which have been presented here have for object the lengthening of this wharf so as to make it the terminus of a ferry communication between the two shores. I regret to have to inform the hon. gentleman that this is a purely local matter, outside the jurisdiction of this Government.

CHARLES LEDUC.

Mr. DESSAINT asked, Whether Charles Leduc, Esquire, of Hull, is employed in the Civil Service? If he is, since when has he been employed, in what office, what is the nature of his duties, and what is his salary?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That gentleman is not employed in the Civil Service.

PREPARATION OF VACCINE.

Mr. Fiset asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to make a money grant to Dr. Edmond Gauvreau, of Quebec, in order to assist his establishment for the preparation of vaccine?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have to inform the hon. gentleman that it is not the intention of the Government.

TERMS OF UNION WITH PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government, during the present Session, to submit any proposition to Parliament with the view of meeting the complaints of the Government of Prince Edward Island respecting the alleged non-compliance by the Dominion Government with the Terms of Union respecting steam communication with that Province, or with reference to the suggestions for a settlement of the claims made upon the Dominion by Prince Edward Island, contained in Earl Granville's despatch to His Excellency the Governor General, dated 31st March, 1886?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is not the intention of the Government.

THE NORTHERN LIGHT.

Mr. DAVIES asked, Is it the intention of the Government to have another steamer built this season to assist the Northern Light in keeping up communication between Prince Edward Island and the mainland in the winter season? If not, how is it proposed that such communication shall be maintained during next winter, so as to comply with that article of the Terms of Union between Prince Edward Island and the Dominion, stipulating that an efficient steam service for the conveyance of mails and passengers is to be established and maintained between the Island and the Dominion, winter and summer, thus placing the Island in continuous communication with the Intercolonial Railway and the Railway system of the Dominion?

Mr. FOSTER. The subject-matter of the hon. gentleman's question is under consideration.

THE LAW OF LIBEL.

Mr. INNES asked, Is it the intention of the Government during the present Session to introduce a Bill to amend the Law of Libel?

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot answer the question more definitely to-day than to say that the subject is now being considered.

GREAT NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Were the applicants for the charter of the Great North-West Central Railway Company required by the Government to make a deposit prior to the granting thereof? If such deposit was required, what amount was demanded, and was the deposit made? If made, was it in money, in bank deposit receipts or cheques on a charter bank? If in cheques, whose cheques were given, on what bank, and were they duly marked as good or accepted by the bank?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The applicants for this charter were required to make a deposit prior to the granting thereof; $50,000 were required, and the deposit was made. It was made in bank deposit receipts and cheques; the cheques were given on the Union Bank of Lower Canada and were marked good.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Is the Government aware whether the Great North-West Central Railway Company have, since their incorporation on 22nd July, 1836, effected their permanent organisation by subscribing for $500,000 of stock and paying up 10 per cent. thereof?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. EDGAR asked, Have the incorporators named in the charter of the Great North-West Central Railway Company been changed by resignation or otherwise? And if changes have been made, who have taken the places of those who have gone out?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The incorporators named in the charter of this company have been changed; the name of R. J. Devlin has been submitted for that of C. T. Bate, who resigned.

COST OF CANADIAN RAILWAYS.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the nominal cost, as given to 1st January, 1888, of all railways in the Dominion of Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I must ask the hon. gentleman to repeat that question on another day.

THE FISHERIES TREATY—PAPERS.

Mr. DAVIES. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to direct the attention of the Government to an omission in the papers furnished to the House in connection with the fisheries conference that took place in Washington a short time ago between the two Governments. It will be remembered that a number of questions were asked from this side of the House as to the propositions made by the respective plenipotentiaries of each Government to the other, and after consultation had taken place several times in the House, it was understood that, in addition to the papers first submitted, there would be other papers containing—as we understood at least—a full account of all the several negotiations and propositions made on either side. Now, in the papers which were circulated and laid on the table of each member the other day, I find the only additional memorandum is a letter which Mr. Bayard wrote on 31st May to Sir Charles Tupper, and the answer of Sir Charles Tupper to Mr. Bayard; but in the propositions which appear to have been made by Sir Charles Tupper on the 3rd December, 1887, and the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries on the 7th December, it appears in the reply of the United States plenipotentiaries that, previous to Sir Charles submitting his proposal, they had submitted a proposal to him, and his proposition was a reply to that which emanated from them in the first instance. The House will see, by looking at the papers, that the United States plenipotentiaries commenced their reply as follows:—

Now, the proposal which was submitted by the United States plenipotentiaries, and on which Sir Charles Tupper made his proposition of December 3rd, has never yet been communicated to the House. The House will see how very important it is on the eve of the present discussion, and also in view of the discussion on the fisheries question, that hon. members should be placed in full possession of the proposals which emanated from the American plenipotentiaries as well as those which emanated from the Canadian commissioner. I call the attention of the First Minister to this point in the hope that we may have the proposal laid before the House at an early day.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that the absence of the Minister of Finance through illness prevents his giving a full answer to the hon. gentleman. I may say now that it was understood at the meeting of the conference that the results only should be embodied in the protocols. The same arrangement was made, I may say, at the time of the Washington Treaty; it was found absolutely necessary, from the political circumstances of the day, that this should be the case. No statement of what occurred during the negotiations can be submitted either to the Congress of the United States or the Parliament of Canada that has not been mutually agreed upon. Sir Charles obtained the consent of Mr. Bayard to the submission of the correspondence to which the hon. gentleman has referred. If any further papers are wanted, including the papers to which he now refers, Sir Charles, when he is able to resume his place in the House, which will be in a few days, will communicate with the British ambassador at Washington, and if Mr. Bayard consents, there will be no objection to the papers being brought down.

Mr. LAURIER. I submit that this statement is very disappointing and very unsatisfactory. This is contrary to all the precedents on which we have proceeded. I cannot do better than to refer the hon. gentleman to the Treaty of Washington itself, in which case the whole of the proceedings were brought down to the House and full information was communicated, not only to the members of this Legislature, but to all parties concerned and interested. Naturally in this legislation all parties concerned are interested, and it seems to me that the plenipotentiaries have pursued a different course from what has ever been pursued before. We have nothing but a summary of the protocols. It appears, however—and I take the statements of the hon. gentlemen themselves—that it was agreed upon by those plenipotentiaries that nothing but summaries of the protocols should be distributed to accompany the treaty. The hon. gentleman and his Government were kind enough some time ago to ask the assent of Mr. Bayard to have certain proposals which they made—which, rather, the plenipotentiaries had made—submitted to Parliament. It seems to me they might have asked the assent of Mr. Bayard to submit also the other proposals which were made on the part of the American plenipotentiaries. It certainly seems to me that it is not treating the House with that proper respect to which the House is entitled, to submit one part of those proposals and not the other. I think the House is entitled to everything that occurred, not only the proposals made by the British plenipotentiaries, but the proposals made by the American plenipotentiaries as well, all the more so because the proposals made by our plenipotentiaries are in answer to the proposals made by the American plenipotentiaries. Under such circumstances I hope that the hon. gentleman will follow the precedent which took place not more than three weeks ago, during the illness of Sir Charles Tupper. He, himself, communicated with Mr. Bayard to have his assent to this proposal being submitted to the House, and during the present unfortunate illness of the Minister of Finance I hope he will again ask the assent of Mr. Bayard to have the proposals of the American plenipotentiaries laid before us.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I can only say that if the doctrine of the hon. gentleman is maintained, it will be impossible ever to make a treaty with any country.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister will see, if he looks at the papers brought down, that when we were discussing the Treaty of Washington the various propositions made by the plenipotentiaries or joint high commissioners on each side were given to Parliament. It is true the arguments by which they were supported were not given, but the proposals themselves were given. Now, what objection does the hon. gentleman see to saying what the propositions were which the British commissioners submitted and what were the counter-propositions submitted by the commissioners of the United States. To submit the arguments that were presented in support of those propositions is one thing, to submit the propositions themselves is a totally different thing. It does seem to me that the hon. gentleman recognises the principle of responsible government; he admits that he and his Government are responsible to Parliament. Surely in vindication of this it is right that Parliament should know what was done by those acting on its behalf, and supposed to enjoy its confidence. It does seem to me that the proposition which the hon. gentleman now makes is one wholly different from that made in 1872, when we were put in possession of all the propositions and counter-propositions submitted before the joint high commission, and when we had also the Order in Council protesting against the course of the Imperial Government brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt, as full information was given in 1871 as could properly be given. I can assure the hon. gentleman that there was due discrimination observed at that time as to what was sent to Parliament and what was withheld.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is all very well in the interests of the Government for the gentleman who leads this House to make a statement of that kind, and to take upon himself to say that all has been given that can be given in the interests of the Government of the country.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so.
Mr. LAURIER.

Mr. MITCHELL. But if the treaty is complete and this House is asked, as Congress has been asked, to assent to it, this House as well as Congress has a right to the fullest information as to how those gentlemen arrived at the conclusions at which they have arrived. I find, on looking at the papers distributed to the members of this House the other day, that this proposition in relation to more extended commercial relations did not arise—as the organs of this Government have taken the credit of saying it did—with the representative of the Canadian Government, the present Minister of Finance (Sir Charles Tupper), but that it arose, first, so far as I can find them on the records of the papers, in a letter addressed by Mr. Bayard on the 31st of May to Sir Charles Tupper. This is the first evidence of any correspondence on the point which is laid before the House. One paragraph of this letter reads as follows:—

“It is evident that the commercial intercourse between the inhabitants of Canada and those of the United States has grown into too vast proportions to be exposed much longer to this wordy triangular duel, and more direct and responsible methods should be resorted to.”

In a previous part of this letter he goes on to point out the difficulties in which our colonial position places us in dealing with the neighboring country. He tells us the whole correspondence has to be made to England, and through England to the Governor General of this country and his Council; that all this matter has to be answered, first to England and then to the United States again before an answer can be got, and that unnecessary time and delay is taken up in that way. Mr. Bayard has evidently made a distinct proposition in relation to the manner in which this difficulty about the fishery troubles could be practically settled, and that he points out to be, first, more extended commercial intercourse between the two countries. Now, Sir, when the treaty is complete, and when a Bill has been laid before this House by the Government to ask this House to assent to that treaty, I hold it to be the right of this House—no matter what the convenience of the Cabinet may be to hide what they have done and refused to do—I hold it to be the right of this House that everything in the shape of a proposition which was made, whether from Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, or from Sir Charles Tupper, representing this Government, to the commissioners, should be laid before this House for our action, our consideration, and for the exercise of our judgment as to whether those gentlemen have done their duty or not. This position, I think, this House will sustain. I for one am not prepared to accept the ipse dixit of the hon. gentleman opposite, who says, in his judgment, it is not for the convenience of the Cabinet that only conclusions should be laid before us, and that the propositions upon which conclusions were not based should be ignored. I could understand, Sir, if he refused to lay the arguments before the House, although even there I think common candor to the people of Canada ought to dictate that the arguments, as well as the propositions, should be laid before Parliament; but without question the propositions ought to be laid on the Table, and I think it is the duty of this House to insist that the Government shall do so.

Mr. CASEY. The right hon. the Prime Minister does not seem to agree with the Minister of Finance in regard to what ought to be or what ought not to be brought down. He has told us that if the documents asked for were brought down it would be impossible to make a treaty with any country. His Minister of Finance told us, a few days ago, that he hoped, and expected, and intended, that those very papers should be brought down. Here is a difference of opinion between the chief and his first lieutenant. I think the right hon. the Premier should explain that difference, or else he must remain responsible for the utterances of his second in command, who offered and intended to bring those papers before the House. The right hon. gentleman says that even at the time of the Washington Treaty, although there was more brought down than now, that he did not tell us everything even then, and that he used his judgment as to what statements of fact should be brought down and what left behind. I find that this treaty is made specially subject to the action of this House. It is not proper that one party to the case—the Government who are on trial before this House—should be allowed to make their own case, and retain what suits them. It is evident that by submitting certain facts and retaining others a falsehood may practically be told to the House, and that the whole thing may be put in a false shape. In the case of the British Parliament it is quite different. A treaty does not come before that Parliament at all; but precedents that apply in England do not apply to this case. It is not necessary to tell the British Parliament everything that the Ministers have done in regard to a treaty, because Parliament is not asked to ratify that treaty. Here, by special agreement, we are asked to ratify this treaty, and we ought to know, and, if we have respect for ourselves we would know, before we ratify the treaty, what our representatives have done.

Mr. MULOCK. If I correctly understood the First Minister he has stated to the House that nothing further would be presented.

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish to call the hon. member's attention that there is now no question before the House, and therefore, the hon. member cannot make a speech. When the Orders of the Day are called, it has been the practice to allow questions to be put to Ministers about important public business, or about the conduct of the proceedings of the House, production of papers for example. But this must be confined to mere queries, and after the answer has been given no more remarks are allowed, and a fortiori, no discussion can take place at this stage, without a motion being made in the regular way. The hon. members are already out of order when they attempt to raise a debate now about the non-production of the papers mentioned by them.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. First Minister, if I understood him, has stated to the House that he will not give to the House or the country any further information on this subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I certainly said nothing of the kind.

Mr. MULOCK. I wish to know exactly what the hon. First Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MULOCK. Yes, I shall be glad if you will endeavor to press on the hon. gentleman to attend more to his correspondence. I think I am in order now in addressing the House, and in consequence of the low tone in which the hon. First Minister spoke, not having been able to hear him, I desire to know to what extent the House and the country are to be informed as to the proposals and counter-proposals which passed between the plenipotentiaries. I would like to know whether he proposes to live up to the agreement made by the hon. Finance Minister on the 1st of March last. The hon. Minister of Finance then stated, in order to procure an adjournment of a certain debate, that the formal protocols would contain every proposal and counter-proposal made at Washington, and he expressed his great surprise that the communications which had been forwarded by the protocolists did not contain those proposals and counter-proposals. If the hon. First Minister wishes to know what he said, I will refer him to Hansard, page 73:

"The question was, as I understood, practically settled when I left Washington, that the arguments were not to be embraced, that is to say, the reasoning upon the two sides would not be necessary; but it was a question as to how far the various papers put in, in support of the proposals or in opposition to the proposals, should form a part of the protocols; and when I was asked the question by telegraph to assent to the protocols being purely formal, I assumed and took it for granted that what was termed a formal protocol would contain the proposals and counter-proposals—that that, at all events, would be a part of it.

"Mr. MITCHELL. And the answer.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And I assented to it. Yes, the proposals and the answers. A proposal is put in and an answer is put in in relation to it; and I assumed that those protocols, what were termed formal protocols, would, at all events, contain the proposals and the replies on both sides."

That was the attitude taken by Sir Charles Tupper; that was what he considered would be laid before this House, and if the hon. First Minister or any other member of this Administration now proposes to give to the House less than the hon. Minister of Finance proposed to give, then they must be considering something other than the public interest. There cannot be an honest and full discussion of this question if the Government hold back part of the evidence. It must be clear to the mind of every man who read the letter of the 31st of May, 1887, from Mr. Bayard to Sir Charles Tupper, that the American Government courted larger trade relations between Canada and the United States, and it is perfectly evident that the failure on the part of our Government to promote those relations has been the outcome of the negotiations and correspondence, and, perhaps, debates as well. They have had the effect of militating against the highest interests of Canada. If there is nothing to conceal, why not bring down the whole record? If, however, the Government have something to conceal, if they have tied the hands of Sir Charles Tupper, or if the Imperial authorities have interfered with the negotiators, let Canada know it. We have a right to know whose interests were consulted—whether the doctrine of the First Minister of Canada first, Canada for the Canadians, was lived up to, or whether on this occasion, as on others, Imperial interests were preferred to those of Canada. For my part, I am sent here to represent the interests of Canada, and any Government at Ottawa who collude with other statesmen against the interests of Canada, are traitors to the country they represent. For these reasons, in order that this question may be discussed fully and fairly, I think they have a duty to perform, and they can only be trying to burk parliamentary enquiry by withholding what the hon. Finance Minister deemed to be due to Canada.

Mr. CASGRAIN. In withdrawing my motion to adjourn, I think the Premier is altogether in error in not carrying out the promise made by his plenipotentiary in this House. If he would give some good reason, pro bono publico, why those papers should be withheld, I would certainly yield, but he has not given any reason to justify the course he has now taken.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the object of the hon. the Minister of Fisheries, in bringing down these papers, is to show what had taken place in regard to the commercial relations between the two countries. Now, we find that whilst Sir Charles Tupper on the 13th December made a proposal, a very important matter is left out. The American reply is not fully before this House, because reference is made to the proposals submitted on the 30th, and it seems to me that in order to complete the papers, that document should be submitted as well as the proposals of Sir Charles Tupper.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that the hon. Minister of Fisheries is not in his place, so that this conversation would not have been called for. Sir Charles Tupper left Washington before the protocols were formally settled. They were settled there in the manner he told us, by agreement between the plenipotentiaries on both sides as to what should go to the public. As those who were not plenipotentiaries are not in the secret, we cannot say what portion has been omitted and what portion has been included in those protocols; but they were sent according to the arrangements made between the representatives of the two nations. Sir Charles Tupper has expressed his disappointment that they were not so full in statement as he thought they would be; and after the discussion which took place here, he telegraphed to Washington for permission to lay the statement and counter-statement, so far as it related to trade, before the House, and he got the consent of the plenipotentiaries on the other side. That was to have been communicated to this House. As regards the point now raised, there is a statement of another proposition. Well, I have no doubt Sir Charles Tupper will communicate and ask permission to get that also, but without permission it cannot be given.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT moved:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other, (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted).

That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

He said: I am not greatly given to indulging in conventional formalities, but it is not in the spirit of conventional formality that I say that I rise on this occasion to address this House, under a sense of grave and weighty responsibility. It is true that I am fortified and encouraged in bringing forward this motion by the knowledge that in so doing I only voice the opinions of the representatives of the Liberal party in this Parliament; and, furthermore, that I have every reason a man can have for believing that when I give utterance to their opinions, I also give utterance to the opinions of the vast majority of those who support us and of a very important section, to say the least of it, of those who, on other questions, have differed from us very widely. Were I called upon at present to produce evidence of that, I think it might be found in the fact that within a very few months, but not until after this question had been considerably agitated throughout the Dominion, we found the leading statesmen of the several Provincial Governments, who met at Quebec—all, I think, the more important Governments in Canada—uniting, without exception, in approving substantially of the proposition which I now submit to this House. Nevertheless, I cannot conceal from myself that this motion is one which is certain to raise issues of very great moment, not only to the people of Canada, but it may well be to other peoples also. There is no doubt that this motion is one which proposes, in some considerable degree, a new departure; there is no doubt whatever that if this proposition were assented to by the two countries chiefly concerned, very important changes would, beyond all question, take place in the mode of administering our public and commercial affairs, and therefore it is clear that this is a question which requires the most mature consideration and the most ample discussion at our hands. I am very glad indeed that the Government have recognised the importance of this matter, and I think it is to their credit that they raised no objection to my proposal to set apart a special day for its discussion, Mr. WELDON (St. John).

and also that the discussion once begun, it be carried on de die in diem. Sir, I believe it will be found that this is emphatically a question which will not go down; I believe it to be a question which must be faced; I believe that it is a question which, if it suits their purpose, hon. gentlemen opposite may, possibly, evade or delay, but on which, sooner or later, and in my judgment rather sooner than later, they will be required to take, and their friends in the House of Commons and out of it will be required to take, a distinct and plain stand. This is a case in which nature is too strong for us; and although it is my intention on the present occasion to abstain from alluding to a great many things which might theoretically strengthen my argument, but which would undoubtedly open the way to irrelevant discussion, still I think I may be pardoned in taking this opportunity for saying that we will all do well to remember that we are now discussing a problem which particularly affects the present interests of Canada to-day. We are not called upon to consider how or in what way we might have dealt with this proposal, had it been submitted to us under totally different conditions twenty, or even ten, years ago. The question is, what is best for the people of Canada in the year 1888, and not what may have been thought best for them in 1867 or in 1877. As for the charge of inconsistency, which has been levelled at some of us for supposed previous utterances on this question, I am in no wise concerned to waste time in justifying myself. Were I so disposed, it would be easy for me to show that I, at any rate, have been perfectly consistent to the root idea which underlies this whole proposition. But I do not intend to waste time over that. I may say this, however, that every man who has studied the subject, knows that I am simply speaking the truth when I say that within the last twenty years, or the last ten years, there have been very great economic and even social changes in the position of Canada, and that, therefore, it might very well be the case that propositions deserve discussion to-day which we would not have thought it prudent to discuss some ten or twenty years ago. Now, I propose to-day to confine myself chiefly to bringing the attention of this House and, so far as I can of the people of Canada, to certain patent and salient facts, which, I think, nobody who studies the matter is able to deny, and also to pointing out what appear to me the inevitable consequences which will result from those facts. I may differ from hon. gentlemen opposite on that point, but it appears to me it is idle to shut our eyes to these plain facts, and equally idle for us to say that our present position is in all respects satisfactory. I will take two facts alone which appear to me, and I think will appear to this House, to be of very great importance in this connection, and of which I have here as absolute evidence as it is possible for any man to have. I will take the movement of the population in this country in the last quarter of a century, beginning in the year 1861 and going down to the year 1886, which is the last moment for which I have absolutely accurate statistical information. What are these facts? Sir, they are facts which I state with pain. But I say that we have here incontestable evidence that in these twenty-five years, one in every four of the native born population of Canada has been compelled to seek a home in a foreign country, and that of all the immigrants whom we have imported at great cost, three out of four have been compelled to go low in the track of that fraction of the native born population. Now I say, no man who properly appreciates what these facts involve can deny that if I make good my case, if I am able to show this House that there is a great deal of substantial and a great deal of presumptive evidence to support it, if I can show this House that I am rather under than above the mark in making those statements, no man who understands what those facts mean, can doubt for one moment that I and those gentlemen who think with me are amply justified in saying this is a case which requires our most earnest and serious consideration. Now, I will take those two statements respectively, and, first of all, I address myself to the statement which I made and to which I think I heard some murmurs of dissent on the other side, that in the last five-and-twenty years Canada has lost one out of every four of her native born population. In the first place, I have here, if any hon. gentlemen desire that the authority be produced, the formal reports of the United States, which show that in the year 1860 there were 249,000 persons of Canadian birth in the United States; that in ten years they had grown to 490,000 souls, and that in 1880, there were 707,000 Canadians in the United States. Now, it must be remembered that this by no means represents the total exodus of our people, because, when you come to deal with such large numbers as these, you must allow for the death rate which prevailed in the twenty years from 1860 to 1880. That death rate, after careful examination, I believe to have been about 71,000 in the first decade, and 120,000 in the second, in all equal to 194,000. It is clear therefore, it is clear to demonstration, it is as clear as any fact can be, that between 1860 and 1880, from some cause or other, which it is not my present purpose to analyse, at least 650,000 Canadians found homes in the United States. Now, up to that point, we go upon absolutely certain ground. We have the United States returns backed in the strongest possible fashion by our own census returns, which I have under my hand. The question is, how many have we lost since then, how many have gone from this country to the United States in the interval between 1880 and 1886? Now, we have also here pretty clear evidence of the movement of population, at any rate in the great Province of Ontario. We know what the increase in the Province of Ontario, according to natural laws, should have been; we know what the increase in Ontario is. We know from these hon. gentlemen's own returns what a mass of immigrants they allege to have been poured into this country in those six years to which I have alluded; and we find in brief that, according to our municipal statistics, which are likely rather to err, as experience has shown, in increasing than in diminishing the apparent population, all Ontario in these six years has to show is an increase of 128,000 souls. We find a huge gap here. We find that in those six years the natural growth alone of Ontario ought to have been 250,000 souls. We find that, even if you take my estimate that out of every four immigrants you pay for and bring to this country, you keep but one, there is the strongest ground for believing that at least 80,000 souls should have been added to the Province from that source alone, and after deducting the 20,000 Ontarians, whom the returns from Manitoba and the North-West show to have settled in that country, you still find over 180,000 unaccounted for from that source alone. I need not appeal to this audience as to the fact that Ontario of necessity, putting out of question the North-West and Manitoba, always has and must absorb the vast bulk of our immigration. I think my hon. friends from Prince Edward Island, my hon. friends from Nova Scotia, my hon. friends from New Brunswick, and my hon. friends from the Province of Quebec, on both sides of this House, will all admit that no very large proportion of immigrants have settled in those respective Provinces within the last six years; and, if any of them doubt the statement or think I err in that, it is open to them now and here to correct me, and I challenge the correction. If we admit that, and I see no possible ground on which those positions can be disputed, you have this result: that, allowing a very moderate proportion for the emigration that we know is going on of native born Canadians from the other Provinces, at least 900,000 of our population are to-day inhabitants of the United States, and in all probability rather over than under 1,000,000. So I submit that the first statement that I have made is, up to the year 1880, absolutely true, and, as regards the period of six years which has since elapsed, is as nearly absolutely proved as it is possible at present for any such statement to be. More than that, you have only to look, if you dispute the United States statistics, to our own statistics, to our own census returns, to see, I regret to say, the strongest possible evidence of the substantial accuracy of my calculations. We find that, in 1861, the population in those Provinces which now form the Dominion of Canada was, as nearly as possible, 3,250,000 souls. We find that, in 1871, they had grown to 3,690,000, and in 1881, to 4,324,000 souls; while, if you like to take the four old Provinces, you find that they had in round numbers grown from 3,000,000 to 4,000,000 in a period of 20 years. Now, as our returns allege and profess to prove, we imported in those 20 years about 500,000 immigrants. I would like hon. gentlemen on both sides to compare for one moment the rate of progress manifested in those 20 years with the rate of progress manifested in the previous 20 years of our history. From 1841 to 1861, the old Province of Canada grew from 1,129,000 souls to 2,500,000. Thus the House will see that during the first 20 years, the growth of old Canada was at the rate of 115 per cent., while in these later 20 years it has shrunk to 30 per cent. Now I proceed to discuss the other position. I proceed to discuss not our success in what I deem a vastly more important matter, not our success in keeping our own people in our own territory, but our success in keeping the foreign immigration which, at vast cost, we have brought into this country. I made the statement a few minutes ago that, of the foreign population which we have brought in, three out of four have left this country and sought homes in the United States. I now proceed to give you the evidence, as I believe the incontrovertible evidence of the substantial accuracy of that statement, of its absolute accuracy for the first period of 20 years, and of its substantial accuracy for the last period of five or six years. I find that the foreign population in Canada in 1861 amounted to 665,000 souls, and that in 1881 that foreign population had shrunk to 570,000 souls. In other words, we lost 95,000 souls in those 20 years, although we had brought into the country during that interval 521,000 immigrants, according to the returns which have been laid on our Table by the hon. the Minister of Agriculture. Now, I will allow, as I did in the case of the emigrants to the United States from Canada, for a very large death rate. I will deduct 220,000 from the original foreign born population in Canada in 1861, and it is as clear as anything can be, that deducting 15,000 for settlers in British Columbia and Manitoba, of the 505,000 who remain, who came to this country in that interval, the uttermost who can by possibility have remained in Canada were 125,000, so that 380,000 had made Canada a mere place of transit at our expense. So there again you will find that up to 1881 the case is absolutely proven that we were unable to retain three out of four of all the multitude of immigrants that we brought to this country. How has it been in the interval between 1881 and 1886? Well, Sir, I find that in that interval 477,168 immigrants are alleged to have come to Canada as settlers I turn to the census returns of the North-West and Manitoba, and I find that the uttermost who can be accounted for there, amount to 25,000; so that there remain 452,000 to be accounted for still. I have just pointed out to this House that the great Province of Ontario, which has always absorbed the vast bulk of all the foreign immigrants, not merely does not show that it has absorbed 452,000 immigrants, but it shows that its total increase is barely one-half its natural increase. Again, I ask my hon. friends in the Maritime Provinces, again I ask my hon. friends in Quebec, do they suppose that any considerable proportion of this 452,000 can have strayed into Prince Edward Island, or New Brunswick, or Nova Scotia, or Quebec, without their knowledge? Is it not a patent fact that the vast bulk of these, if they are to be found at all, must be found in the Province of Ontario? And is it not a patent fact that if the increase of Ontario be no larger than I have stated, the vast bulk of these immigrants must, as I have said, have sought homes in the United States? There is, Sir, but one alternative to that—let hon. gentlemen take which one they choose. It is, of course, theoretically possible, though practically impossible, that these immigrants may have stayed in Ontario and have displaced an immensely larger number of the native population than I have supposed possible. But I do not think that argument is likely to be advanced in this discussion by any resident of Ontario. Now, Sir, I could bring forward numerous details all tending in a very high degree to corroborate these statements. I confine myself, for the present, to these two. I point out, Sir, that we, who are accused of misrepresenting the number of the people who have left this country, on the contrary, as the Hansard record will show, gravely under-estimated the loss of population in Manitoba and the North-West. At the worst, when we were accused of making most pessimistic statements, we never imagined for one moment that the population of the North-West and the population of Manitoba could have sunk to anything like the low ebb which these returns, lately laid on the Table, in 1885 and 1886, prove to have been the case. I will call the attention of the House to another significant fact. Time and again, knowing, as I well know, that the chiefs of the Roman Catholic clergy in the Province of Quebec were admirably well informed as to the movement of the Catholic population of that Province, time and again I have challenged hon. gentlemen opposite, if they ventured to dispute my statement on that point, to obtain from those reverend gentlemen a statement of what the real facts of the case were in regard to that population. Time and again that challenge was refused, and I say, therefore, that we have every ground that men can have for believing that, in the statement I have made, I am stating but the simple and literal truth. Now, Sir, as regards the bulk of these facts and figures, you may just as well contradict the multiplication table as contradict them. They are there, with the sign-manual of the hon. gentlemen opposite attached to them, and if they be inaccurate, on their heads, and not on mine, the blame must rest. Now, what has been done in this matter, up to the present moment, may be thus defined. First, I am sorry to say, they have attempted to break the force of these arguments by desperate misrepresentations, of which I will give this House a proof, drawn from their own official reports: Sir, I have beside me the returns of the Department of Agriculture, and I call the attention of the House to them. Those returns state that, in 1881, 22,001 settled in Manitoba and the North-West. They are particular, you will observe, up to the very last unit. In 1882, there were 58,751; in 1883, 42,722; in 1884, 24,440; in 1885, for reasons which I will not distress hon. gentlemen by referring to, it was reduced to 7,240. Now, Sir, such was the measure of success of the immigration policy of the Government, of their liberal land and railway policy, that they succeeded in inducing, so they state, 155,154 persons to settle in Manitoba and the North-West between 1881 and 1886. But, Sir, when we come to count noses by actual census, I am very sorry to say that the 155,154 settlers, duly certified to us by the Department of Agriculture, had shrunk into 43,000; 16,000 in the North-West, and 27,000 in Manitoba. There, Sir, are their own returns; there are their own facts; there, out of their own mouths, are the proofs that we under-estimated very gravely the extraordinary loss which their misgovernment has brought about in that country. I might add that—with respect to the 16,000 souls from Ontario and from foreign countries, whom alone they were able to settle in those magnificent Provinces in the North-West—there is clear evidence that at least one-third are supported by Government, are pensioners or employés of the Government, and are paid out of the taxes of the people of this country, and are in no proper sense or shape settlers at all. Then, Sir, beaten on that ground, they dare to tell us that this is of no consequence, that it is of no consequence to the people of Canada that they have lost, in 25 years, well nigh two millions of British subjects, one million of native born Canadians, and three-fourths of a million of British subjects whom they had induced to come to this country with the intention of settling here. Now, I have no desire to put a money value on my own countrymen, or upon the immigrants whom we bring to this country; but I will point out this, that if you are to accept the customary standard laid down in the United States, if you can venture to hold that every able-bodied man who comes to North America is worth, when he lands on the dock, $1,000 to the State, then, Sir, whatever may be the cause, the result of all this is that, in losing these 2,000,000 of people, we have lost 500,000 of able-bodied men, or thereabouts, and we have lost a sum equivalent, according to that calculation, to $500,000,000. Certainly had they been here, it is clear that both our debt and our taxes would have been substantially reduced, because we would have had so many more valuable settlers to share the burthen with us. But there is another argument brought forward by men who ought to know better. They tell us that we need take no concern of this, because substantially the same thing is going on in the great State of New York alongside of us. Sir, I demur to that argument. In the first place I may point out that when an American citizen leaves the State of New York for any reason, he generally does not leave the United States; he transfers himself from one part of his own country to another. Does the hon. gentleman suppose we are so ignorant as some of those hon. gentlemen appear to be of the history of North America? Do we not know that New York State was settled nearly 250 years ago—that in the days of William and Mary New York was a prosperous and important colony? Sir, the comparison is preposterous. We, when we lose anybody, and we know this to our cost, lose them, not to go to another part of the Dominion, but to transfer their allegiance to another country. Now, I take issue most strongly with those hon. gentlemen, that is to say, with those of them who, admitting my facts, venture to contend that this is a matter of no consequence. I say that even if we had under our control no territory beyond the four original Provinces of old Canada, this would be a serious calamity to us, because the four Provinces of old Canada, well administered, are abundantly capable of supporting a population two or three times as great as that they now contain. But when we remember that we have well nigh half a continent at our disposal, that the First Minister himself has stated in his place that we have 400,000 square miles, yet unoccupied, of the most fertile territory that the sun ever shone on, what shall I say of the folly of supposing that it is anything but a great misfortune, a great calamity, a great injury to the people of the country that so huge a portion not only of those who come to settle in Canada, but of those who belong to us, of those who are our own flesh and blood, our own kinsmen, have been obliged for lack of opportunity to leave Canada and seek a home elsewhere? I say that this is proof positive that we are in a state of retrogression. I say that, as regards the four old Provinces of Canada, our population is either in a stationary condition, relatively speaking, or, at all events, falls vastly short of increasing according to the laws of natural growth. And I say—although I am not going to enlarge on that subject at this present moment—that I have around me, I see on both sides of the House, if only hon. gentlemen will have the courage of their convictions and speak out what they know, many men intimately acquainted with the state of the agricultural population who could and who, before this debate closes, I hope will bear their testimony to the fact, that all over the four

Provinces there has been a very large and formidable reduction in the actual selling value of farm lands, and a still more formidable reduction in the price which farmers can obtain for the products they raise. Apply another test. If you choose to turn to the report of Trade and Navigation, which the Minister of Customs with commendable promptitude has laid on the Table, there you will find evidence which ought to convince this House that within the last 14 or 15 years, although there has been a considerable increase of population—though far inferior to that we ought to have had—there has been, and it is a noteworthy fact, a very large reduction in the total volume of trade. Here is the hon. gentleman's own blue book laid within these last few days on the Table of the House, and from that I see that in 1873, 15 years ago, the total volume of trade was $217,500,000, with a population of 3,750,000, that to-day with a population which hon. gentlemen opposite estimate, though incorrectly, at 4,800,000, our total volume of trade and exports is $202,000,000, being $15,000,000 less than it was 15 years ago, although we have 1,000,000 of people or thereabouts more. Sir, apply another test. I find, in 1873, the average per head of exports and imports amounted to $3 odd; according to the hon. gentleman's own statement the average per head of exports and imports to-day is $41.50; in other words, the total volume of trade measured per head, the proper way of measuring, has declined nearly 50 per cent. I will allow for the reduced values of certain of those articles, but no man can contend that there is not proof of very serious retrogression in this one of the most important of those indexes which, more than many of those which have sometimes been alluded to here, go to mark the progress of a nation's prosperity. But it would be unjust to hon. gentlemen opposite to suppose they have been idle all this time. They could not keep our people here, they could not keep the emigrants they brought in here, they could not raise the value of farm lands, nor the prices of farmers' products; but what they could do they did. In these twenty years they have trebled our debt, in these twenty years they have trebled our taxes, and when the Budget comes to be brought down I think the House will find that the liabilities of the people of this country are very far indeed from being fully measured even by our present enormous debt. Sir, again, I say for the moment, I suspend my remarks on their failure to create an important inter-provincial trade. That is a question which requires a little more discussion than it suits me to give it at present; and here again I ask my friends from the Maritime Provinces, when the time comes, to contribute for the information of the House their views as to the success which has attended our efforts to create a trade in that direction. Nor will I dwell just now further on the lamentable failure, after the expenditure of over $100,000,000 of public money, to produce any adequate settlement of the North-West. But I will say a word or two as to the utter failure to obtain any adequate return from our great public works. Sir, the Public Accounts are here, and those Public Accounts show that the people of Canada have expended well nigh $200,000,000 in the construction of railways and canals, and divers other improvements. Time was when we hoped those would give us something like an adequate return, directly or indirectly, but the time has now arrived when we find these expectations very bitterly disappointed. How now stands the case? I take the Public Accounts for 1887, and I find, all told, a charge of $3,970,000 for the expenses of operating those public works, and that is only the nominal charge. The real charge, if our accounts were kept as any other country on earth would keep them, would be nearer $4,500,000, or, at all events, $4,250,000 than $3,970,000. Well, Sir, what do we get as a return? We get a total income of $3,270,000. Not only do we not receive one farthing of interest on the outlay of $200,000,000, but there is a dead annual loss of $700,000 a year, not to speak of the various important items which, under our most vicious system of book-keeping are charged, to capital account. Sir, again I pass over the question of our failure to keep immigrants, and again I pass for the moment from the question of why it is that we in Canada, with 400,000 square miles of most fertile territory, cannot even keep our own people in our own country. But I have the right, the House and the country has the right, to ask: Why is this? Is it because of the severity of our climate? I think not. The climate of Canada is in part a rigorous one, but it is eminently healthy and calculated to develop a vigorous and thrifty offspring. Is it the fault of our soil? Why, has not this House echoed and re-echoed again with declarations of hon. gentlemen opposite, that no country on earth possesses a region of such unexcelled fertility as we possess.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I agree with my friends opposite to a great extent. Then, Sir, I ask: Is it the fault of the people? Well, in part it is the fault of our people for being too credulous and too trusting to the promises of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Anybody who knows how our people conduct themselves when they leave our shores; any one who knows what distinguished positions a large percentage of that million of Canadians, whose absence I deplore, have obtained in the neighboring republic; who knows that they have shown themselves able to fight, and compete with, aye and even to beat our American friends with their own weapons, anybody who knows that will say that it is hardly the fault of the people of Canada if those things are so. But I think we may ask, if it is not the fault of the climate, if it is not the fault of the soil, and if it is not the fault of the people, whose fault then can it be? What am I to say of the threatened collapse of our federal constitution which has become so patent and so manifest in these later days? Have we not seen, almost every year and day, the very fundamental principles upon which federation depends torn into fragments and afterwards pinned together with bribes, as in the case of Nova Scotia? Do we not know, and does not the hon. the First Minister know, if he thinks for a moment, and I trust that he may, and take a second and a wiser thought, that he runs the most imminent risk if he persists in the tyrannical course heretofore pursued by him towards the young and rising Province of Manitoba, that he will have the choice offered to him, to recede from the tyranny or see the Manitobans assert their just rights at any cost.

Mr. MITCHELL. A third rebellion, I suppose.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I trust not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope not too.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I believe and I hope that whatever the faults of the First Minister may be he will avoid that third and most fatal mistake. Sir, to a very great extent, as the enormous increase of our debt shows, we have during all this time been living on our credit, and a most mischievous policy it is. We may get temporary advantage from it, we may get temporary assistance, but every man knows, and more than all do men who have studied the early history of the United States know, that a young country in our position cannot pursue a more fatal course than to allow its debt to be increased with such unexampled rapidity as ours has been increased during the period to which I have alluded. Now what shall we say of the condition of that great interest upon which all other interests in this country depend? Who is there who does not know that there has been, within the last few years, an immense fall in the profits of our farmers, and at the same time a very great increase in the burdens laid upon them? Who does not know, who has studied the history of the world, that at the self-same moment that you are heaping burdens and burdens upon our farmers, at that self-same moment they are being exposed to a totally unexpected and most intense competition in the market which they have hitherto controlled? Who does not know, Sir, that if this kind of thing goes on, our population, at least our farming population, may perhaps exist, but it certainly cannot be said to live, at any rate, in anything like the comfort it has hitherto enjoyed. More than that, I say distinctly, that I do not believe, unless we put a speedy check to it, that this system can last very long. In twenty years we have trebled our debt, we have trebled our taxes, and we have added 30 per cent. to our population. Suppose we go on for another twenty years, or even for another ten years—and I can tell the House that there are very serious signs that, unless such a check as I spoke of is put on very speedily, we will go on in the same headlong, reckless course—why, Sir, in twenty years at the same rate of increase of population, and the same rate of increase of debt and taxation, we will find ourselves with a population of six millions and an annual taxation of ninety millions of dollars. If we pursue that course in the future we will have done nothing more by 1907 than we have succeeded in doing in the twenty years between 1867 and 1887.

Mr. MITCHELL. The money would be all gone before that time.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps so. Unhappily, all history shows that those evil precedents do not in the least prepare the way for better things. Even were the Government honestly disposed to amend their ways it is scarcely possible for them, under ordinary circumstances, to put a stop to this practice of intense, insane expense. More than that, they will do well to remember that if I am correct in the statement I have made (and I challenge the strictest scrutiny), if I am correct in saying that a million or thereabouts of the native born population of Canada have sought homes elsewhere, they must remember that the tendency of that exodus is altogether to increase. Who are the men who leave us? Everyone who pays attention to the character of that emigration knows that I am stating the simple literal fact when I say that, in a most unusual proportion, they are the very pick, and flower, and choicest portion of our population. Everybody knows, Sir, that the men who leave us are just the men whom wise statesmen would desire to retain in Canada. Now were our position such as that which formerly used to obtain between Scotland and England I would not complain so much, because if the same rule applied between ourselves and the United States as between Scotland and England we would still have the satisfaction of knowing that when our friends left us they went to swell the strength of the Empire, or the Dominion, as the case might be, in some other part of it. But, unfortunately, here the case is precisely the reverse. They are a double loss to us, because they go to swell the strength of our nearest neighbor, rival and competitor. Now, Sir, a matter for our consideration which, perhaps, is more important than all, is, what possible available remedies are there for such a state of things? So far as I can see these remedies are four. In the first place, I think that a very great improvement might be made by reforming our present most oppressive and unjust system of taxation. I say that an immense improvement might be made by so revising our constitution in the manner which we have pressed from this side of the House time and again, and in the manner which we have seen our friends—and not only our friends, but the friends of the Government—in conference assembled have lately likewise proposed; and by so altering the constitution that this tyrannical conduct on the part of the Federal authorities in attempting to trample on the rights and privileges of the Local Legislatures should be put an end to forever; and, on the other hand, (which is equally important), that this system of bribes, and of frequent and incessant forays made by various Provincial Governments on the Dominion Treasury, whenever they have been extravagant and got into a scrape, may likewise be put a stop to; and, for a third remedy, Sir, that this most mischievous railway monopoly which has barred our progress up to the present time, and which has barred the settlement and prosperity of north-western Manitoba, should likewise be disposed of. But most of all, and most important of all, do I believe would be the consequence of obtaining the arrangement which I ask the Government to try and obtain, by the resolution now in your hands, the obtaining of perfect free trade with the people of the United States. I say, Sir, that that is worth all the rest. Give us that and, railway monopolies will cease to vex and harass you; give us that, and the federal relations will speedily adjust themselves, as federal relations ought to do, and as federal relations were intended to do; give us that, and the sting would be taken out of those tariff combines and exactions, more particularly if the United States, as there is now good hope that it will do, proceeds to emancipate itself from the trade fetters it most foolishly put on. It may be said that this is an heroic remedy. Well, all I can say is that if it be, never in the history of this country, at any rate, was a heroic remedy more needed. Now, I am not disposed to go further with this proposition without being ready to show that it is in the highest degree advantageous to both countries. I am very sorry, for many reasons, that the hon. Minister of Finance is not in his place to-day; but I dare say the House will remember how, in a fine glow of patriotic enthusiasm, that hon. gentleman, about a year ago, went the length of declaring that, if we only knew it, we in Canada possess the best half of this continent. Well, I will not venture to go quite that length, but I will say that we are able, man for man, dollar for dollar, to give a full and perfect equivalent to the United States for all we ask them to give us. I desire that it should be so. I do not believe this proposition or any other proposition for mutual trade can be successfully carried out unless we are able to give as much as we get; and I say that while such trade would undoubtedly, in my judgment, enrich four or five million Canadians, quite as much enrichment would come to four or five million, or it may be to eight or ten million Americans. Sir, the advantages to Canada are very obvious, but I will come to those presently. In the meantime, I take this opportunity to point out that free trade with Canada would give to the United States an extremely valuable market at their very doors—that free trade with Canada would open up to American enterprise vast new areas, equal to at least a dozen new States; and, Sir, in such a case as I suppose, I have no doubt whatever that the growth of Canada would be so rapid that we should become within an extremely short time, in all probability, the most valuable customer the United States possessed.

Mr. HESSON. Hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Americans.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Hewers of wood and drawers of water! Sir, I have a better opinion, and I may say the Americans have a better opinion, of the ability and capacity of our fellow-countrymen than to suppose that they would consent to be hewers of wood and drawers of water. Does not my hon. friend, whose heart is better than his head in these matters—does he not know of his own experience that the Canadians who, unfortunately for us, leave this country, do not subside into hewers of wood and drawers of water on the other side of the border? Sir, as I have said, they take high places amongst the best citizens of the United States. Sir, we have, to say the least of it, enormous stores of raw material of great value to the industries of the United States, and these are very thoroughly appreciated, let me tell the hon. gentleman opposite, by American economists of very high degree. I have quoted the passage before—it may be said to be a hackneyed passage—but, nevertheless I will take the liberty of quoting again in this connection the language in which one of the most eminent living authorities on political economy, in North America, at any rate, and perhaps in the world, has described the advantages which Canada has to offer, if it is allowed to obtain free trade with the United States. This is the passage, Sir, and I make no apology for repeating it to a Canadian audience:

“North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and of the River St. Lawrence, and east of Lake Huron, south of the 45th parallel of latitude, and included mainly in the present Dominion of Canada, there is as fair a country as exists on the American continent, nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal, if not superior, as a whole, to those States in agricultural capability. It is the natural habitation on this continent of the combing-wool sheep. It is the land where grows the finest barley, which the brewing interest of the United States must have if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its annual export of eleven millions sterling of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest cattle, with qualities specially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections, and its climatic conditions, created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit to grow men. Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race; better than bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands run gold.”

Now, Sir, in all that you will find nothing of the vast virgin wheat fields of Manitoba; you will find nothing of the vast treasure troves which still exist scarcely scratched on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains, and west and north of our side of Lake Superior, and within the gorges of British Columbia. And, Sir, I could duplicate, nay I could produce twenty testimonies like this from Americans who know the value of Canada to the American people, in support of my contention that Canada most assuredly will be able to give a fair equivalent for all that, under my proposition, Canada is likely to ask the United States to give her. Does any hon. gentleman opposite choose to gainsay this proposition? Then, Sir, even as it is with all the absurdity of two hostile tariffs stretching for three thousand miles between these two countries, let hon. gentlemen consider what we do already in the way of mutual trade and intercourse. Of the $202,000,000 which represents our total volume of trade, over $80,000,000, in spite of all this foolish artificial legislation, or nearly one-half, and that the most profitable half, is with the United States. Sir, it is an interesting question, but it is a question on which I hardly dare to offer an opinion, if, with all these obstacles deliberately put in our way, such is the force of nature that it overleaps all these artificial obstacles and secures us a trade of over $80,000,000, what might we not obtain if perfect unrestricted free trade were obtained? I will venture to say that it is well within the bounds of possibility that, with unrestricted intercourse with the United States, that $80,000,000 might within a very few years swell to $300,000,000; and if any hon. gentleman thinks that an exaggerated or unreasonable statement, I advise him to look carefully at that remarkable portion of Mr. Nimmo's report of the Trade and Navigation Returns of the United States of 1884, in which he treats of the value of the United States internal trade, of which, on my hypothesis, Canada would share equally per capita. Sir, it is an extremely curious thing that Mr. Nimmo, who is a high authority on these matters, estimates the internal or inter-state trade of the United States at six or seven times the total volume of its export and import trade. Mr. Nimmo holds that the inter-state trade amounts to ten thousand millions of dollars. That is his calculation, not mine; and, Sir, if that were the case in 1883, when Mr. Nimmo wrote, you may depend upon it that the inter-state trade is vastly larger to-day; and if there be any sort of foundation for the statement he makes, then I, in naming $300,000,000 as the possible figure to which the trade of Canada with the United States might attain, am vastly within the mark. Sir, it appears to me that the House, in its anxiety to promote certain manufactures at home, has wholly and entirely lost sight of the enormous extent to which, under a better system, export and import trade have grown elsewhere. I took the trouble the other day to see how our export and import trade compared with the trade of Australasia—the Australian colonies and New Zealand. The facts are worthy the attention of the House, for whereas we have, according to these hon. gentlemen, 4,800,000 souls, and, according to my calculation, 4,600,000 souls, and whereas Australasia has 3,421,000 souls, I find the total export and import trade of Australasia amounted last year to £105,000,000 sterling (equal to $525,000,000, for a population of three and a half millions) against an export and import trade of $202,000,000 for our population of 4,600,000 or 4,800,000. Why, if our export and import trade compared per capita with that of Australasia, instead of being $200,000,000 it would be $730,000,000, according to the statement of hon. gentlemen opposite themselves. It is, I believe, scarcely necessary for me to insist on the enormous advantage which unrestricted trade with the United States would be to us. Who does not know that for an immense number of the products of the people of this country, the United States is not merely the best market, but substantially the only market. Now, I do not blame the Government much in that they have tried, at all hazards, to force trade among the various Provinces of this Dominion. I have always myself regarded it as very uphill work, about as profitable indeed as an attempt to make water run up hill, and the history of the Intercolonial Railway goes very far to show that I have been right in that contention. But I am going to give the House a curious practical test of the results which have attended the efforts made, I do not doubt, in all good faith, to promote inter-provincial trade among the several Provinces of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen know very well that where there is much trade between different states or countries, you have one very good practical test where the climate and conditions of life are the same, and that test is the intermixture which takes place among the various peoples trading together. Now, I have here the census returns for 1881, and I have to call the attention of this House to a few very simple facts which these returns expose. I find that, in 1881, there were of natives of Ontario, 105 settled in Prince Edward Island, 310 in New Brunswick, and 333 in Nova Scotia; in all 748 natives of Ontario, settled in the Maritime Provinces. I find much the same state of things in Quebec, with the exception of two counties which border on certain counties in New Brunswick, where the population on both sides are essentially of the same origin. I find, and it may interest hon. gentlemen to know it, that at that same hour and day there were, of persons of United States birth, 609 in Prince Edward Island, 5,108 in New Brunswick, 3,004 in Nova Scotia, or, in rough terms, about thirteen times as many natives of the United States in the Maritime Provinces as there are natives of Ontario. Lest any hon. gentleman should say that the natural course of immigration is westward, I took the trouble to go back a few years, and I found that, twenty five years ago, in 1861, when we were not confederated together, when we had no Intercolonial Railway, 7,600 natives of the Maritime Provinces had taken up their quarters in Ontario; while, in 1881, after fifteen years of Confederation, and after knowing more about us, I suppose, only 7,200 were found there. The number had positively been reduced by several hundreds. Take the census returns. Turn to the Province of Lower Canada, and you will see eight or ten large, populous counties with a population of 150,000 or 200,000 souls, and not one representative of my hon. friends from the Maritime Provinces is to be found there. It is almost phenomenal, and what is a very curious fact, which appears in the census returns, is that there was far more immigration from the Maritime Provinces to old Canada in the decade from 1851 to 1861 than from 1861 to 1881, in spite of the official connection. Is it not idle to deny such facts as these? Is it not idle to fight against such evidence? Must we not admit that, no matter how the Government may strive, no matter how the people may strive, you cannot establish any great inter-provincial trade from which any great profit can redound to the people of this country. What is the history of the Intercolonial Railway? It is contained here in our Public Accounts? We find that on the 30th of June, 1887, the Intercolonial Railway stood as an asset in the books of Canada for $46,431,000; we find that the total expenses of the Intercolonial Railway for that year were $2,808,000, and their total receipts $2,596,000. Not only did the Intercolonial Railway not pay one copper of interest on its cost, but there is an admitted loss of $231,000 in the running of that road for one single year, and a real loss, if we properly charge up the accounts, of $400,000 or $500,000; and in addition to that, every single year since I have had a seat in this House, a million dollars at least of extra expenditure has been charged to the capital account. Take the whole together, the interest and sinking fund, and they represent a dead annual loss of $2,070,000, and the loss on running it must at least be $400,000 or $500,000, while we spend a million dollars on capital account every year besides, which we will continue to do for many years yet to come. Do hon. gentlemen venture to tell us there is any hope of improvement here? Does the House remember that, a few weeks ago, I put the question across the floor as to the result of the first seven months' running? And does the House remember that for this current year 1888, the Intercolonial Railway has cost us in seven months just $340,000 more than we received from it? Just $340,000 dead loss on seven months running of the Intercolonial Railway; and I may add, as if that were not enough, that we have recently been called on to subsidise a so-called short line for the express purpose of cutting up and destroying the value of the same Intercolonial Railway which has cost us near $50,000,000, thus probably doubling the huge deficit that now exists. I think, Sir, that every hon. gentleman will admit I have shown conclusively that, do what you will, trade will seek, in spite of all your legislation, for its natural market. Who does not know, who dares deny, that the trade of Halifax naturally seeks Boston, that the trade of Toronto naturally seeks New York, that the trade of Winnipeg seeks St. Paul and the country south of it, and that the trade of Victoria naturally seeks San Francisco and the rest of the Pacific coast? There is an old saying, and I think a true saying in part, that trade follows the flag; but I tell this House that it is still more true that trade follows the people, and we have unhappily already sent out about two millions of missionaries to cultivate friendly trade relations with the United States. More than that, it is well to remember that great economic changes are in progress, that there has been a very material alteration in our position as regards the markets of the world. It is quite clear that, in older Canada, at any rate, grain production is on the wane, and that the only cereal which we can depend upon as likely to continue to be raised in large quantities is the article of barley, for which we have practically no market except in the United States. That is also true in a very high degree of the more important of our other agricultural productions, with, perhaps, the solitary exception of the important article of cheese. Now, I contend that for almost everything which our farmers have to sell, the United States, if only we had free and unrestricted trade with them, would afford us absolutely the best market; and I contend further that, besides being the best market, it is literally the only market for a great many important articles which we produce. See, in spite of all artificial obstacles, how huge a percentage of the total volume of our trade is the volume of our trade with the United States. Out of a total volume of trade of $202,000,000, the United States supply $83,000,000. Out of $31,000,000 of exports of our own produce, we sold to the United States last year over $36,000,000, or very nearly one-half. Out of a total of goods entered for consumption of $105,000,000, we bought $45,000,000 from the United States. And to come to details, which is necessary in order to lay the case fairly before the House, what do we find as to an enormous number of articles produced by agriculturists in this country? These figures are instructive in a very high degree. We find that—

Of 18,779 horses, the United States bought	18,225
443,000 sheep do do	363,000
116,000 cattle do do	45,000
$107,000 worth of poultry, the U.S. bought...	$99,000
$1,825,000 worth of eggs do ...	All.
$693,000 worth of hides do ...	$413,000
527,000 tons of coal do ...	494,000
140,000 tons of gypsum do ...	All.
Iron ore do ...	"
Salt that we sold do ...	"
Stone and marble that we sold do ...	"
$6,875,000 worth of fish that we sold do ...	$2,717,000
$20,485,000 worth of lumber do ...	$9,353,000
1,416,000 pounds of wool do ...	1,300,000
9,456,000 bushels of barley do ...	All.
$743,000 worth of hay do ...	$670,000
$439,000 worth of potatoes do ...	$328,000
$83,000 worth of general vegetables do ...	$75,000
$254,000 worth of miscellaneous agricultural products, the United States bought	$249,000

Without speaking of innumerable smaller articles, such as apples, flax and a great variety of other things; and, if the duties were once removed, no one who has ever been in Manitoba and the North-West but knows that the United States would become by all odds our best customer for a great deal of our high class wheat. Why, in the mere article of manufactures, the United States, out of a total of \$3,079,000, bought \$1,289,000 worth, and of miscellaneous articles the United States bought \$59,900 worth out of a total of \$644,000. There are two things to which I want to call the attention of all the members of this House. One is that, for very obvious reasons, our exports to the United States are largely undervalued. They do not at all fairly represent the amount we sell. So long as they maintain a high tariff, it is the obvious interest of every Canadian seller to underestimate the value of the articles he has to sell, and, as everyone knows, the thing is habitually and constantly done. In another respect it is very important that the House should know that in the case of an enormous number of the articles to which I have called specific attention, there is room for well nigh unlimited expansion. Given free trade, given unrestricted intercourse, and that trade might assume nearly unlimited proportions in regard to a great many of those articles; and these are two facts which should be borne in mind when we are considering the possible development of our American trade. Now, not only have I shown that, even fettered and thwarted and hampered as it is, our trade with the United States forms an immense proportion of our total trade with all the world, but I ask the House to consider what sort of a market it is that these resolutions of mine propose to open to the people of Canada. Why, look for one moment at the host of great and growing cities which stud our southern frontier alone—Chicago, Detroit, Cleveland, Buffalo, Boston and New York. Those cities which I have named, with their environs alone, contain a population of something like five millions of people who are the very best customers on the face of the earth. Consider how conveniently they are situated to our markets. There is hardly one of all those I have named which is more than twelve hours distant from a Canadian market. The Canadian seller might talk over a telephone with the American buyer in almost every one of those cities. Then look at our railway system. I speak more particularly of the railway system of the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Look at the huge sums we have expended upon it, and the small returns up to date which that large outlay has brought. The returns show that we have about 12,000 miles of railway all over the Dominion, a very large percentage of which is centred in Ontario and Quebec. These railways are alleged to have cost \$653,000,000, and, although I believe a considerable amount of that is water—as it is technically called—still I believe our system of railways represents an outlay, or at any rate would be worth about \$500,000,000. Now, to-day the gross earnings of those roads are put down at about \$33,000,000, the expense of operating them at over \$24,000,000, and it is known that the amount returned as the expense of operating them does not include all that ought properly to be charged to that account. That \$65,000,000 of nominal cost, therefore, does not to-day on the average pay $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the nominal expenditure. Give us unrestricted intercourse with the United States, and I tell you that, as far at all events as the central Provinces are concerned, you will double the gross earnings and treble or quadruple the net profits of these railways, and from a very poor property convert these vast amounts, which have been largely supplied from abroad, into a very good, paying, profitable investment, to the great advantage of the people of Canada as well as to that of the men who originally supplied the money. Then another point. Let us consider how our population is distributed. We all know the natural impediments which arise to inter-provincial trade. We all know how conveniently the Maritime Provinces, Manitoba and British Columbia are situated for trade with the United States; and how exceedingly inconveniently they are placed for trade with the central Provinces. I apprehend that no man on either side will dispute my position that to the Maritime Provinces, at any rate, to Manitoba, to the North-West Territory, to British Columbia, free and unrestricted trade with the United States is of the most enormous importance. But, Mr. Speaker, I am coming to the country I know best—old Canada, from Quebec to Sarnia—how is the population distributed there? Why, Sir, it is known to every man here that nineteen-twentieths of the population of these two great Provinces is so distributed that it is literally within five hours rail, on the average, of the American frontier. Then consider the advantages of such a market. Remember that it is one of the most rapidly growing markets in the world. Within the last twenty-five years the American market has grown from 30,000,000 to over 60,000,000 of consumers, and it has not stopped growing. In all human probability before the next census is taken in 1890, the statisticians of the United States compute that the population will have grown to something like 64,000,000 or 65,000,000. More than that, the population, especially the population of the great cities I have alluded to, is one of the very richest populations on the earth. There is no population in the world, keen bargainers though the Americans are, no doubt, with whom it is so desirable to establish free trade relations for the agriculturists of any country, as it is with the population of the great American cities. It is perfectly well known to all who are familiar with that people, that there are no markets, I repeat, on the face of the earth, where the man who has a first-rate article, particularly of food, to sell, is half so sure of obtaining a first-rate price for it, as in the United States. Nowhere have I known men who spend so lavishly on their own personal living and for their own personal comfort, as not only the great millionaires, but the great bulk of the population of the great cities of the United States. And these, Sir, are reasons which make it more and more desirable to us that we should obtain free and unrestricted intercourse with them, so that we can take advantage of the very great facilities which our natural position, in Ontario and Quebec more especially, gives us for trading with those great centres. They are at our very door. We do not require to make long journeys in order to make the personal acquaintance of our American customers. As I said before, we can literally talk to them by telephone. At the worst, a few hours' journey by rail will bring us face to face with them. We have no middlemen to fear in dealing with the United States. We can thoroughly understand the market, or it is our own fault if we do not. Every merchant, every man of business, knows what an enormous advantage it is to any country that the men who sell should understand thoroughly what the purchaser wants to buy. But, Sir, I do not know that it would be necessary for our people to give themselves the slightest trouble. I remember, and I dare say there are plenty of gentlemen who remember, what habitually took place under the old Reciprocity Treaty, during which Canada prospered more than she has ever done since. Why, Sir, when we had something approaching to free intercourse with the United States there was this curious peculiarity, that the buyer sought the seller and not the seller the buyer. It was a matter of everyday occurrence, particularly in the Province of Ontario, that our farmers, during the existence of the Reciprocity Treaty, were visited daily, and almost hourly, by American purchasers, who were ready to buy the apple off the tree, the crop on the ground, even the very unborn foal, if the farmer was willing to sell it. Again, I repeat that there is no market where a man who has got a good article to sell has anything like as good a chance of selling it as the American market. Sir, I have been taken to task on more than one occasion for venturing to say, what I now repeat, that in my poor judgment, one native born Canadian was worth more to this country than any half-dozen imported immigrants, and I say that without, in the slightest degree, desiring to reflect on the many good, worthy and industrious men who, in time past, have cast in their lot with us. My opinion always has been that as a taxpayer, and as a contributor to the development of the country, one native born Canadian is worth half a dozen of any other nationality. Sir, in the same way, one United States customer is worth to us in Canada, half a dozen English customers, and half a dozen dozen customers of any other nationality. And what is true of them to us, is true of us to them. I say that to the United States the trade of Canada is worth a great deal more than our present numbers would indicate; I say that our trade is worth that of many times such populations as those with which the Americans are now attempting to open up trade relations in Mexico, or in South America, or any other of those countries which extend below them, more especially if we prosper largely. Now, it is a curious thing—I do not know whether it has attracted the attention of any members of this House—that after all we have talked, after all we have said about the desirability of extending our trade with foreign countries, these same trade returns that I have here, go to show in a very remarkable way, that we have practically only two customers, after all said and done—and that one of these customers are the people of England and her colonies, and the other are the people of the United States. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen have considered the fact, but if they will look at the returns for 1887 they will see that of our own produce, Canada, in all, exported \$80,960,000, of which she sent to the United States, \$35,250,000; to Great Britain, \$38,750,000; to the British Colonies, about \$3,000,000, and to all the rest of the world, \$3,800,000—\$77,000,000 to the United States, to Great Britain and her colonies, and less than \$4,000,000 to all the rest of the world put together. In 1873, to show that this is no mere casual accident, I find that an identically similar state of things prevailed. Then our total exports amounted to \$76,500,000. The United States bought \$36,755,000; Great Britain bought \$31,421,000; the British Colonies bought \$3,953,000; all others put together bought \$4,500,000. So when we trace the course of our commerce down for these 15 years, we find that it is literally true, for practical purposes, that we have but two customers, as yet, of any importance in the world, one the United States and the other the people of Great Britain and her colonies. And what is true of exports is true likewise of imports. Take 1887; we imported a total for consumption of \$105,639,000 worth. We bought from the United States, \$45,107,000 worth; we bought from Great Britain, \$44,962,000. Of \$105,000,000 worth, \$90,000,000 were purchased from our two chief customers. In 1873 we imported \$127,000,000 worth, and of this we purchased \$47,750,000 worth from the United States, from Great Britain \$68,500,000 worth, or \$115,000,000 out of \$127,000,000. That I contend is a matter of first-rate importance, for this reason: I have shown the House, that, say what we will, we have but two great customers, Great Britain and the United States. One admits our productions without the slightest let or hindrance: we and all the nations of the world in common with us have a perfectly free entrance to British markets; in the other case, partly by our own doing and partly by the action of the United States, the most formidable artificial restrictions are imposed on our commerce. But still the fact remains that we have but those two customers. Which of the two is likely to be more important to us? Well, there is an easy test. Twenty years ago the British population was about 30,000,000 to-day the British population is about 35,000,000. Twenty or twenty-five years ago the American population was 30,000,000; to-day the American population is 60,000,000 or 61,000,000. Judge, then, for yourselves which of those two countries, situated as they are, is likely to afford the greatest possible benefit to Canadian trade.

It being six o'clock the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it will, I do not doubt, be a relief to the House, as it certainly is to myself, to be able to inform them that I do not think I will require to tax their attention with any great array of figures from this time out. I cannot but feel that I am indebted to both sides of the House for the uncommon patience with which they listened to the somewhat protracted array of statistics which it was my necessary duty to inflict upon them before dinner, Sir, when we separated I had just completed explaining to the House upon what grounds I based my statement relative to the movement of the population, on what grounds it was that I held that unrestricted trade with the United States would be likely to develop an enormous volume of trade between this country and that. I had also taken the opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the unfortunate failure, from causes which are patent to all of us, of our attempts to create any great inter-provincial trade; and I had pointed out a fact, which, I think, has not always been borne in mind, the great and growing character of the American market, and the plain and obvious fact that we in Canada, from our geographical position, are to a very great extent shut-in practically to two markets only, the markets of England and her colonies, and the markets of the United States. Now, Sir, it becomes my duty to consider, first of all, what classes of our population are likely to benefit by free and unrestricted trade with the United States; or possibly I should say, what classes of our population are not likely to be immensely benefited by free and unrestricted trade in that quarter. I will then have to consider the objections which have been urged from time to time in the press and elsewhere against propositions more or less analogous to that which I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and then I may have a few general remarks to make on the position in which we find ourselves to-day; but, as I have said, I trust to be able to spare the House for the most part from a repetition of those necessary but somewhat tedious statistics which occupied the major portion of the previous discussion. Sir, I think all the House will agree with me in saying that, whoever may or may not be benefited by this proposition, there can really be no ground for doubting that the whole great agricultural class from one end of the Dominion to the other will be enormous gainers if the markets of the United States are thrown open to them. I think, Sir, that no man will gainsay, least of all the gentlemen from the Maritime Provinces, that the fishermen of those Provinces will gain enormously from access to the United States markets. Surely no man will gainsay, and least of all my hon. friend beside me (Mr. Charlton), that the lumbermen of Canada, and all the vast interests connected with them, will gain enormously from access to the United States markets. The miners will gain enormously, the whole vast number of persons and the whole interests representing, as I have pointed out, $500,000,000 or $600,000,000 of capital, connected with the railroad and transportation service generally of this country, will also all gain enormously by free trade with the United States. Not only that, but besides all those great classes, collectively, representing the great producing classes of this Dominion, the vast majority of manufacturers who gain their living, practically, by ministering to and serving the classes I have named, must of necessity obtain great increase of prosperity if you increase the prosperity of the classes I have named. More than that, I believe, that although a great deal has been said—foolishly, I think—as to the risk the manufacturers of Canada will run in the event of our establishing unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, I believe that there are good grounds for saying that all manufacturers who deserve to flourish in Canada by reason of their pluck, and capital, and energy, will prosper likewise enormously if that great market be opened to them. It is due, I think, to the Mail newspaper to say that the energy and enterprise which that newspaper, in common with others, has displayed, in interviewing the great employers of labor throughout this country, has resulted, at least, in showing that those who stand highest in the opinion of the people as manufacturers are quite prepared, if you give them the United States market, to take their manufacturing existence in their hands, and that they have no doubt of the successful result. Who do the classes I have named represent, together with the classes who are dependent upon them? They represent nineteen-twentieths of the whole people of this country; I might with truth say ninety-nine-hundredths of the people of this country, and they will, beyond all dispute, be greatly benefited if you can obtain free and unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Now, another side of the question to be considered, is, who are the parties who are likely to lose if we establish free trade with the United States? I do not deny that when you introduce any great measure like this into a country that there will be considerable economic disturbance, and that some industries may be injured which we would like to preserve. That fact I do not deny. No great change ever has occurred or ever will occur without inconvenience in some way. No great change in machinery, for instance, can be introduced without rendering much existing machinery worthless, and without injuring a certain portion of the community, but I doubt if any great measure was ever proposed which was so little likely to injure those classes of the community whom the best minds in the community would desire to save, as this present one. I can see that certain interests will be injured, no doubt. I can see, for instance, that those worthy gentlemen whose proceedings are now being investigated by the committee presided over by the hon. member for West York (Mr. Wallace), those gentlemen who are, as I may say, pushing the protective doctrine to its legitimate development and evolution—I can well conceive that the combines and trusts will have their troubles considerably increased, even if they escape the hon. gentleman's committee, by free and unrestricted trade with the United States. I can conceive, I honestly confess, that there are other industries, not very numerous but important, and some of them possibly dear to hon. members of this House, which may be injuriously affected if this policy should be carried into practical effect. There can be no doubt of one thing and that is that if this policy be carried into effect it will mean, for a considerable time to come, the enforcement of a much needed economy. I see, for instance, that that devoted and most industrious band of public servants who act from time to time as missionaries on the Government's behalf in disputed elections, may suffer. They may be dismounted and obliged to go a-foot, and it may be barefoot too. I say also that there is a danger, and I do not wish to gainsay it, that the electioneering cornucopia may run dry, and that if you adopt the system it will enforce, in your own despite, a rigorous economy. You will have to carry your bye-elections, or not to carry them, as the case may be, without promises of piers, and harbours, and post offices, and railway grants. There is danger, and a serious danger, too, that the subscriptions of the manufacturers' association to certain peculiar funds will grow smaller by degrees and beautifully less and may vanish altogether. It is possible, and it is a serious thing, that our modern Demetrius, and the craftsmen which are with him, may find that their occupation is gone, and the worship of the great Goddess Monopoly brought to naught. It is possible that the trade profits and emoluments of that valuable class of men, known as practical politicians, may be very greatly interfered with. All those things I see are possible if this measure be put in force, and if, as I stated, strict economy become, as it inevitably will in such a case become, the order of the day. Now, I do not deny—I never have denied—that, looking at the way in which Government has been administered in this country for many a long day, those are grave and serious changes, almost of a revolutionary character, and I can well understand that the venerable leader and father of this House, like the Duke of Wellington on a similar occasion, may shake his reverend locks and murmur to himself that he does not see how the Queen's Government in Canada is going to be carried on any longer in his own peculiar fashion. Knowing as I do how excellently well affected this House has always shown itself to vested interests, it may be—having regard to the fact that although those interests are few, that they are very important and very dear to many hon. and estimable members—that the House may say that it is better that the vulgar ninety-nine-hundredths should go on and toil and moil, and, as the reports of the Labor Commission which so lately sat in Montreal show, may starve, and suffer, and die, for the benefit of those righteous men who earn cent. per cent. dividends, and who thereafter tithe the money to keep this best of all possible Governments in power. This, Sir, is a tolerably correct statement of the men, and of the classes, who profit, and who will lose, by unrestricted reciprocity and free trade with the United States. The House will remember, I dare say, how I showed that there is ground for expecting an unprecedented and enormous increase of the whole volume of our trade, from one end of this country to the other, enriching all save the classes that I have excepted. And now comes the question, what is it that forbids the bans? What are the objections? What are the reasons which can fairly be urged by any hon. gentleman against this proposition? If I am correct or even approximately correct in my views as to the benefits which would result to the people of Canada from the adoption of this policy, what are the objections which can be urged for the purpose of keeping asunder two countries which—I say it in no spirit of irreverence—God has joined for purposes of mutual benefit? Sir, I have heard some hon. gentlemen, or the organs of some hon. gentlemen, contend that, forsooth, however desirable this thing may be, the consequences of our own folly during the past ten or twenty years have been such that we cannot afford to have it; we will lose revenue—we have been bled so much that we cannot afford to be cured; for that is the argument. Sir, the ease is bad, I grant; but the case is not so bad as that. Put briefly their argument is this: they admit, or some of them admit, that this thing in itself, per se, would be very desirable; but they tell us that we cannot afford to lose the income which we derive from the customs duties that we now obtain from the American imports. Now, Sir, I do not suppose there is any man in Canada, certainly not one man on the floor of this House, who appreciates more thoroughly than I do, or who has declared from his place more emphatically than I, how very grievously the whole future of Canada has been injured, and damaged, and mortgaged by what I have repeatedly and justly described as the insane folly that has possessed the people and the Government of Canada in heaping up their debt and taxation at the moment when their great rival is reducing both. Sir, I am in the judgment of this House when I say that no man ever strove harder than did my hon. friend, Mr. Mackenzie, when he was Prime Minister of Canada, to put a check to that extravagance and folly, and his efforts were crowned with a good measure of success; and it is well to take this opportunity of reminding this House and the people of Canada that, if this be a desirable thing and if all that stands in our way is the financial difficulty, had Mr. Mackenzie's policy been maintained, and his Administration been continued in office, and had the people of Canada desired to make an alliance with the United States, there would have been no financial difficulty to grapple with. I say, and I speak with knowledge, that I could have done it had I been left in office. I say it would have been an easy task for an honest and intelligent Administration to have kept down the total expenditure of Canada to $26,000,000 or $27,000,000 at the uttermost, and the total taxation of Canada to $20,000,000 at the uttermost, and withal to have placed half a million of the best settlers in the world in Manitoba, to their great profit and ours. Now, Sir, I wish to face this question squarely and fairly. I do not, for my part at all, pretend to tell this House that if we obtain immediately free and unrestricted intercourse with the United States, there might not be some temporary inconvenience accruing to us in the matter of the revenue; but, Sir, I have this to point out: This proposition of mine does not involve the addition of one cent or one farthing to the burdens of the people, but much the contrary. We do not purpose, Sir, as some have proposed in discussing schemes for the future of Canada, to add many millions a year to our annual expenditure. We are not talking, Sir, at this present moment of raising $37,000,000 in place of $30,000,000. We are simply talking of raising $30,000,000, by a small alteration in the mode of taxation and by a readjustment of taxation in general. I repeat, it is possible, though not by any manner of means inevitable or necessary, that you may have to alter your mode of collection. It is not in the slightest degree necessary that you should add one penny to the total aggregate burdens of the people, but the contrary. Sir, allow me to say that this dread, whether it be real or pretended, of a possible recourse for revenue to direct taxation, has always struck me as a most exceedingly weak argument in a case like this. In the first place, Sir, non constat that you will require to have any direct taxation at all; let the House remember that. There is enormous room for judicious economy in our present administration of the affairs of this country. I do not say hon. gentlemen opposite can economise; but, Sir, I think I could put my hand on members of this House who could effect some economy. While we did economise, we got small thanks for it; but perhaps the people are wiser now. Nay, most assuredly the people are wiser now; and could we appeal to the people on a fair division of the constituencies, with honest returning officers and deputy returning officers, without the scale weighted against us with grants for piers, harbors and bridges and railway branches, and every form of political influence, then, Sir, I think hon. gentlemen opposite would find that the results—I speak for my own Province, at least—will be as correctly reflected in the Parliament at Ottawa as they are in the Parliament at Toronto. However, Sir, we will pass over a point on which I can hardly expect those hon. gentlemen to agree with me. I desire to point out that the fundamental fact, for fact it is, on which this whole argument is based, is this: Give us free and unrestricted intercourse with the United States, and by that act you enormously increase the whole income of the vast majority of the people of Canada. You will enable them, and as I believe almost instantaneously, almost within year and day, to buy a great quantity of goods which they cannot now buy, a large proportion of which will be dutiable goods; and by consequence there is good and sound ground, if you admit my preliminary fact to be true, for saying that it is altogether likely that the remaining taxes will yield quite as much as those we now have under our artificially restricted system. But bear in mind that no increase whatever is contemplated; all that is required is a simple re-adjustment. It is possible—we will admit for argument's sake—that the hon. gentlemen are right, and that my contention is wrong that the people will grow enormously richer and yet will not consume more dutiable goods, though I know of no case in which that case has occurred. We will suppose, for argument's sake, that we have to face this bugbear of direct taxation—direct taxation, be it remembered, not for all our revenue, but a trifling portion of it alone. Now, Sir, I have to call the attention of the House in that connection to certain important facts. First of all, no man who has paid any attention to this subject will, I think, dare to deny the fact, which I think is recognised by every political economist, that direct taxation properly levied takes a great deal less out of the pockets of the people than indirect taxation, most of all than indirect taxation, levied as our system of indirect taxation is levied now. Sir, I desire to say that, in my judgment, we ought not—I do not think that this Government would dare, I do not think any other Government would wish—to add by direct taxation one farthing or one penny to the taxes that now press most heavily on the agricultural classes, on the fishermen, on the miners, on the lumbermen, on all the great producing classes in this community. I shall be prepared to prove in some detail, at the proper place and time, that among the many faults with which our system abounds, perhaps the greatest is this: that under it the hard-working, industrious, thrifty man is taxed enormously out of proportion to his earnings; and I say that with a system of direct taxation, if you must have recourse to it (although I doubt greatly whether you need, with proper economy, have recourse to it), that crying injustice must be redressed, and the respectable, well-to-do, monied classes must be made to pay their fair proportion—no more should be asked—to the burdens of the country. This proportion they most assuredly do not contribute to-day, and never will, under a system of purely indirect taxation. Further, we should bear in mind, as these hon. gentlemen are so intensely desirous of copying English precedents, that it is the system of the mother country in a very high degree; and if that precedent be followed here two very good results will accrue. First of all, Sir, you will remove that crying injustice of which I spoke, and by which the poor man contributes out of all proportion to-day, out of his scanty means, to the support of our Government; and in the next place, you will produce this other admirable result, of giving all these respectable, well-to-do, monied men a keen practical interest in watching the public expenditure and checking extravagance. You will do more, if revenue must be got by that means—you will create a sound, wholesome, healthy public opinion, the want of which is so great an evil in Canada to-day. I dwell on that particularly, because I am aware that, at this very moment, there are certain persons, presumably in the interest of the hon. gentlemen opposite, who are losing no opportunity to impress upon the farmers of this country in particular, that if we get unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, the federal revenues will have to be raised by direct taxation, levied in the same way as the municipal taxes are to-day. I for one will protest to the uttermost of my power against any such injustice; I for one declare here, speaking on my responsibility in my place in Parliament, speaking with a knowledge of the subject, that our present system is monstrously unjust to the poor man and too favorable to the rich man, and that injustice ought to be redressed, not by adding to the burden of the farmer, the laborer, the artisan, the mechanic, the fisherman, the miner, the lumberman, but by removing the burdens from these and placing them upon the shoulders on which by right they ought to fall. It is almost too ridiculous. Here we are, here we have been, adding millions a year to the taxes of this country, and that without the slightest regard to the permanent welfare of the people; and we are told, forsooth, that although we may, without the least injury to the community, add many millions a year to our taxation, we must not alter the mode of collection one hair's breadth under penalty of producing the most terrible results. One is tempted to remember Oxenstein's old saying: "Quam parva sapientia mundus gubernatur." Why, if one-quarter of what I have heard be true, the pickings and stealings wrung from the people by half-a-dozen combines, would more than equal any sum which it may be necessary to raise by indirect taxation. Our sage economists, forsooth, are not frightened in the least at having run up our taxes in ten years from $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 nominally, really to $40,000,000. I say again if the results were less grave, it would be positively ridiculous that such an argument should be presented to us. What does it mean? We have been so wasteful, forsooth, that we cannot afford to become rich. Now, the argument and the motive of that argument, to my mind, cover a very transparent fallacy, a fallacy so transparent that in earlier life I would have thought it impossible for reasonably intelligent men to have been deluded by it. But I have lived and have learned.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have learned a good deal. It used to be said: "Surely, in vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird;" but as Mr. Lowell remarks in a rather celebrated political ditty of his:

"They did not know everything down in Judee."

And most assuredly when King Solomon penned the remark I have quoted, he had never made the acquaintance of that very remarkable biped the anser Canadensis Conservativus. Probably the creature was unknown in Palestine.

An hon. MEMBER. How do you know?

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An hon. gentleman asks me, how do I know? Well, I have not certainly had the advantage of living in the days of King Solomon, but I do know well enough the doctrine on which all naturalists agree, and that is, the wild fowl of that particular species always follow their leader; and I think we know that their leader's line of flight is not in the least degree likely to lead him towards the Holy Land; quite the contra-y. His natural instinct would lead him to lower latitudes and warmer climes—and take his faithful flock along with him—if you will pardon this little digression. There is another shaft in these gentlemen's quiver. Having proved to their own satisfaction, first of all, that Canada positively cannot afford to spend one dollar to gain a pound, having demonstrated that, according to the dictates of Canadian political economy, it is always more expensive to pay two cents cash for an article than four cents on credit, which is about the difference between direct and indirect taxation. These hon. gentlemen, the names of some of whom, to my certain knowledge were appended to a certain remarkable document, bearing date 1849, have been seized in their later days with an extraordinary paroxysm of loyalty; and to back their other startling propositions they lay down this other possible, if still more startling, proposition: If you make the Canadian people rich by free trade with the United States, if you make them more prosperous, happy and contented than they unfortunately are at present, there will be great danger to their loyalty. That is the position, in almost so many words. Has the hon. the First Minister been studying the political testament of that distinguished philanthropist, the late Cardinal Richelieu, and come to the conclusion that there is danger should the people wax fat and kick? If he has, he will do well to remember what occurred in France in 1788, after a century and a quarter's application of Cardinal Richelieu's maxims, and I warn him, if he perseveres in his course, he may find that here, in 1888, he is nearing the beginning of the end. I would not have alluded to this but that already across this House, time and again, there have been flung taunts to hon. gentlemen here, that we, forsooth, are disloyal because we desire to add greatly to the prosperity of Canada. I would have thought that those hon. gentlemen who ten years ago overrode all the protestations of Mr. Mackenzie and myself, when we pointed out to them that what they were doing was to adopt a policy which was a more servile imitation of the American policy, and which was in direct contradiction to the settled policy of the Empire. I say that these men would have done well, recollecting what occurred at that time, to have spared us all these disquisitions on the loyalty of the Opposition. Do we not recollect when we showed there was danger in the policy they adopted, how we were told that, if the so-called and mis-called National Policy was bad for British connection, so much the worse for British connection. These men have not hesitated to carry out a policy which has been largely responsible, in my judgment, for driving two millions of Her Majesty's North American subjects into exile, and which has risked the loss of all British North America to the Empire. It is time that we should clear our minds of cant on this subject. (I have, and I have as good a right as any hon. gentleman to say that I have, the interest of the Empire as much at heart as any man on that side of the House. I have considered, to the best of my opportunities and to the best of my ability, what policy in this crisis is the best in the real interests of the British Empire. I know that, in what I now say, I am but expressing the views of some of the ablest and highest of British statesmen, when I say that one great peril that threatens the British Empire to-day is the state of almost dangerous isolation into which she has come. What is her position to-day in the view of some of the ablest of her statesmen? It is that she has not a friend in one high class power in the world to-day. She is at enmity, more or less, with France by reason of her occupation of Egypt and her control of the Suez Canal; she cannot hope that Germany will raise her little finger in her behalf; she cannot expect any help from Austro-Hungary; and who does not know that the Indian taxpayer is even now groaning under the additional burdens imposed upon him for the purpose of checking an anticipated Russian attack on India? That is a dangerous position of isolation; and I say that there is but one first-class power in the world with whom England can make a firm and lasting alliance, and that is her and our kinsmen and friends on the other side of the border. I have always felt, and I have not hesitated to express it to English statesmen as well as on the floor of this House, that the real problem which to-day awaits the decision of England is how, in the first place, by fair and honorable means—and no other should be used—to conciliate the good-will of the people of the United States, and to repair that most atrocious blunder which was committed a hundred years ago, and which led to violent collision between the two great divisions of the English race. That is one problem, and there is another which is most closely connected and interwoven with it, to the solution of which I would desire to lend my humble aid, and that is to add to the conciliation of the good-will of the United States, the conciliation and pacification of Ireland; and those questions are closely woven together. In this project which we are now bringing forward, if you take a broad view of the whole situation, if you remember what Mr. Joseph Chamberlain has taken good care to din into our ears and into the ears of the Government opposite during his recent visit, if you remember that the interest of England in maintaining friendly relations with the United States is so vast and so great that it outweighs very many times the comparatively trifling profit which she can derive from our trade, then I think you will see there is good ground for the position which I take, and that is that, by entering into close commercial relations with the United States, by establishing a close and friendly intercourse with them, we will render to the Empire the greatest service that any colony or dependency ever rendered to the parent State. It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to be set up as an insuperable ground of objection, that, when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted trade with the United States, you must thereby, of necessity, discriminate against English manufactures and the manufactures of all other countries except the United States. Now, that is true. I admit that. More than that, I will admit that, primâ facie, what we propose to-day is a very unusual thing. I will admit—I am in no wise disposed to shrink from any argument which can be fairly advanced—I admit frankly that, when a semi-dependent state, proposes in one breath to tax the goods of the parent state and admit the goods of a foreign state free, while at the same time the parent state admits our goods and the goods of other countries free, and the foreign State taxes the goods of the parent state very heavily, it is a very unusual thing indeed. I grant that it is clean against all formulas. I admit that it appears to be reversing the action of 100 years ago when England lost half of this continent because she endeavored to tax their goods without giving them representation, and I admit that we are going a little far in the other direction in taxing her goods and not the goods of the people of the United States. I grant that this needs explanation, and I am prepared to say that I can give a full explanation why, in the interests of England itself, this thing should be done. I think I have stated the case as strongly as hon. gentlemen can well desire. Now, let us first of all look at the material results which will flow to England should this discrimination take place, and here let me say what is obvious to everyone who has given the subject a second thought, that, in our peculiar geographical position towards the United States, it is perfectly apparent that we cannot hope to gain free intercourse and unrestricted reciprocity with them without discriminating against the goods of other countries, unless and until the United States are prepared to go in for free trade with all the world, in which case our proposition would not be necessary. The thing, I grant, is of the essence of the bargain. I am not in the least degree desirous of concealing that fact, but, so far as the material side is concerned, the practical results of assimilating our tariff in certain points to the American tariff as against England have been immensely and I suspect purposely exaggerated.) In the first place, the House ought to remember that at this very day our tariff is pretty nearly as hostile to English manufactures as that of the United States—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Very nearly if not quite, but let me finish my sentence—and that there is very strong ground indeed, if things remain unchanged, for believing that in two or three years from this date our tariff will be much the more onerous of the two. Then it is well to bear in mind that, the tariff to the contrary notwithstanding, England has always managed to carry on a large trade with the United States, and especially with the northern portion of it. If I had the time at my disposal, I could advance very good reasons for believing that, suppose things remain exactly as they are, England would continue to have a trade relatively much larger with us than with the people of the United States, and, therefore, the absolute loss to them would be small. But I return again to the fundamental fact on which, as I said, this whole argument rests. There can be no doubt, I think, that if we succeed in getting unrestricted trade, we shall become much richer, and if we become much richer there is no doubt that we shall buy a much larger quantity of English goods than we do at present, though perhaps not in the same line. I believe that the result of England giving us a free hand in this matter, would be simply to make some little alteration in the character but not in the quantity of the goods she sells us, and that practically she would lose nothing in a material point of view. More than that, I know something of English manufacturers. I may say, by-the-bye, that this is a difficulty which it will be time enough to face when it arises. Our first business is to ascertain on what terms and conditions we can obtain unrestricted trade with the United States; when we know on what terms and conditions we can trade with them, then, perhaps this difficulty may arise, and that difficulty will have to be met. But I know something, as well as the hon. gentlemen, of English manufacturers, I know they are an eminently practical, hard-headed class of men. I know very well that English manufacturers, so long as their goods are excluded from North American markets, care precious little by whose name the ukase is signed which excludes them, whether it bears the name of Grover Cleveland, or Charles Tupper, or Mackenzie Bowell. Sir, you may depend upon it that English manufacturers, at any rate, are not to be caught with chaff. They understand that 80 per cent. duty on goods is 80 per cent. duty, whether it be imposed by an American Congress or a Canadian House of Commons, and they do not care very much who imposes it, so long as the duty is there. Sir, while I speak of these things as regards the mere material aspect of the case, in relation to English manufacturers, there are other arguments which the people of Canada may very justly use toward English statesmen and the English people. I say that the past history of this country supplies all Canadians, who care to study that history, with abundant arguments. Mr. Speaker, the position of Canada is exceptional, and in many important respects unique, so far as regards England. I am not going to dwell much on the fact that we are more than a colony, that we are a Dominion, charged with the responsibility of managing the affairs of half a continent, and entitled to claim for herself greater privileges and greater powers than should be granted to any ordinary colony. I do not dwell on that, but I will dwell a little on certain features in our past history which I contend give us a right to claim to be heard in this matter. Sir, England is the great colonising nation of modern times.

SIR RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

England has obtained colonies by exchange, by barter, by conquest, by direct purchase, by voluntary and involuntary settlement, and of all her hundred colonies, England has but one, and that is the premier Province of this Dominion, which was originally taken possession of, and has since been held by men who did not occupy or settle through any of the ordinary motives that induce men to forsake their native land and to give up their broad fields and pleasant homes for the purpose of maintaining their allegiance to the English flag. Sir, this question is being argued, to some extent, on the sentimental side, and I am ready for my friends there. To tell you a profound secret, Mr. Speaker, which I trust will not go outside the walls of this House, I have never been able exactly to understand the very deep obligation under which the people of Canada lay to England. In point of fact I rather think that the obligation is the other way. I do not think, Sir, that although we have cherished, I hope we will continue to cherish, the most friendly feeling toward the parent state, I do not think for my part, that we are under any deep debt of gratitude to English statesmen, that we owe them much, unless, perchance, it may be the duty, as Christian men, to forgive them for the atrocious blunders which have marked every treaty, or transaction, or negotiation that they have ever had with the United States where the interest of Canada were concerned, from the days of Benjamin Franklin to this hour, not excepting the first and second Treaty of Washington. I say there is no man here who does not know that, from the very first hour that the United Empire Loyalists took possession of Ontario and held it for the British Crown, down to this year 1888, there never has been a time except, perhaps, during the short paroxysm of the American Civil War, when the people could not have greatly benefited their material interests by throwing in their lot with the people on the other side. We have not chosen to do so, we do not now want to do so, we desire to maintain our autonomy. On that point, I am quite at one with some hon. gentlemen on the other side. But I say that, at this moment, a remarkable opportunity has presented itself in which a little skilful statesmanship and common honesty would enable us, at one and the same time, to obtain a great benefit for ourselves, and to render a most important service to the whole Empire, by aiding to reknit together those two great divisions of one race which were unfortunately sundered by the blunders and incompetence of English statesmen 100 years ago. Sir, if the hon. gentleman chooses, as I have said, to argue this matter on the ground of sentiment, all I can say is that a Canadian who understands and knows what his country's history means, will not find great difficulty in holding his own on these grounds. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think that in this matter, supposing that we dismiss all other considerations, and look on it as a pure matter of right, we have some right to follow the example of England herself. No man knows better than the hon. gentleman opposite that England has always adopted a very different rule and measure, in dealing with the United States, from that which she has adopted in dealing with any country under her crown. I dare say that English statesmen could bring forward good reasons for their departure from their ordinary custom in such cases. Now, I am not here to criticise her right to do what she has done, at any rate I am not now criticising the reasons for doing what she has done, but I say that England has not hesitated, as the English plenipotentiary the other day was good enough to tell us, to give up the admitted legal rights of Canada for the purpose of conciliating the good-will of the people of the United States. So be it. We may have to bow, probably we will have to bow. But by every parity of reasoning, we, under these circumstances, are justified in saying to England: We give up at your behest, for your benefit, and for the sake of the Empire, our admitted legal rights, now do you make us a little concession of your admitted legal rights in a matter in which we do not deny them, for your benefit and ours, and for the sake of conciliating the good-will of the American people. Sir, I said that was the lowest view. I believe that the great mass of Englishmen who have made investments in Canada, and notably in Canadian railways, would, like ourselves, be entirely satisfied if we carried out this proposition, and I believe that if all English investors in Canada were polled after having the case properly explained to them, they would go with us in saying that it was in the interests of England, that it was in the highest and largest sense for the interests of the Empire, that we should be permitted, if we desire to make such a bargain as this with the people of the United States. Sir, there is a third argument, which requires perhaps a little more consideration. We are asked when we make, or when we suggest that such a proposition be made, not by the right hon. gentleman opposite, who has maintained a most judicious reticence so far on this question, as far as I have noticed, but we are asked by some of his followers and myrmidons: What grounds have you for believing that, if you make this proposition, the people of the United States will agree? Well, Sir, what I have to say in answer to that is this: When two men are desirous of making a bargain, or when one man is desirous of making a bargain for his mutual benefit with another party, the time has come to enquire and negotiate on what terms and conditions a mutually advantageous bargain can be made. I say, moreover, that this is, in a pre-eminent degree, a matter for the two peoples of the United States and Canada. This is a thing which, if done at all, has got to be done in the broad light of day, not in dim diplomatic twilight. We know how the American Executive is constituted and how the American Congress is constituted. We know that this thing can only be done with the consent of Congress, and, practically, with the consent of the American people, and, therefore, it is that I have ventured to take, as I have said, the responsibility of bringing this matter forward on the floor of Parliament, because I know, and hon. gentlemen know, that it is not in their power to make an agreement, behind backs, with the American Executive which would be in any degree binding on the American people. More than that: I say the present moment is eminently in our favor on coming to the Americans with some such proposition as this, and I have good and fair proof of what I state. In the first place, everybody knows that an enormous reduction in the American tariff is imminent. Things have come to such a pass there that the people will insist on a very great reduction and alteration in their tariff. In the next place, we have got a very direct invitation, or, at all events, a very important expression of the good-will of the man who stands in the highest place to-day in the American republic, and who I trust for their sake will continue to enjoy the confidence of his countrymen for a second term. Sir, I note that President Cleveland in the recommendation which he addressed to Congress respecting the Fisheries Treaty after stating the advantages he thinks he has achieved, goes on to say:

"Our social and commercial intercourse with those populations who have been placed upon our borders and made forever our neighbors is made apparent by a list of the United States' common carriers, marine and inland, connecting their lines with Canada, which was returned by the Secretary-Treasury to the Senate on 7th February, in answer to a resolution of that body; and this is instructive as to the great volume of mutually profitable interchange which has come into existence during the last half century."

And then the President goes on to use these significant words, which coming from so high a source at such a time can be taken as nothing less than an invitation from the President of the United States to us to come forward and see on what terms we can negotiate for unrestricted reciprocity with them. Says President Cleveland:

"This intercourse is still but partially developed, and if the amicable enterprises and wholesome rivalry between the two populations be not obstructed, the promise of the future is full of the fruits of an unbounded prosperity on both sides of the border."

Sir, will any gentlemen here or elsewhere dare to maintain that when President Cleveland, in an official document of the highest importance, uses such terms as these with respect to intercourse with Canada, we, forsooth, should be debarred by any sense of dignity from responding to an invitation like that? I have another, not so formal, and yet even more important perhaps. I find that as long as a year ago, at a time when there was a danger of hostile collision between the two countries, Mr. Secretary Bayard, a man, as the First Minister knows, of the highest rank next to the President of the United States—a man who is virtually Premier of the President's Cabinet, a man whose name is honored and deservedly honored by friend and foe from one end of the United States to the other—I say that Mr. Bayard, the virtual Premier of the United States, wrote a year ago to Sir Charles Tupper in these terms:

"The immediate difficulty to be settled is found in the Treaty of 1818 between the United States and Great Britain, which has been questio vexata ever since it was concluded, and to-day is suffered to interfere with and seriously embarrass the good understanding of both countries in the important commercial relations and interests which have come into being since its ratification, and for the adjustment of which it is wholly inadequate as has been unhappily proved by the events of the past two years."

And then comes this important paragraph:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries. I say commercial because I do not propose to include, however indirectly, or by any intendment, however partial or oblique, the political relations of Canada and the United States, nor to effect the legislative independence of either country."

This is a just, a wise and a statesmanlike proposal from a man of the highest place and highest character in North America. Have we not seen within the last two weeks two distinguished members of Congress, Mr. Butlerworth and Mr. Hitt, both republicans, both opposed to the party of Mr. Bayard and President Cleveland, introducing Bills, one of which is substantially on the lines of the resolution I have placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, and the other which goes further than, I think, it would be judicious or wise to go, but both in the direction of free trade and unrestricted reciprocity with Canada. Looking at this communication which has been placed in your hands, and as to which something was said to-night, I cannot but fear that a grand opportunity was lost by the delay of the Government in not endeavoring to settle the fishery question a considerable time ago in accordance with Mr. Bayard's suggestion. Their unhappy procrastination and unhappy delay I fear has been the cause why this negotiation was put off till the eleventh hour, to the most unfavorable moment that could by any possibility be selected, just on the eve of a presidential election, when even a baby in arms in the United States almost could have told hon. gentlemen opposite that no Government in the United States was free to deal as it would wish with great commercial questions, but they are all made subservient to the political exigencies of the times. Now, we do not know what passed, we do not know, and we will not know, I am afraid, in time for this debate, what really passed between these negotiators. We have not got the information, but we have got enough to see that there were proposals and counter-proposals, but what followed is concealed from the Parliament of Canada, which has a good right to know. I for one must say that I attach no sort of importance whatever to the fact that when Sir Charles Tupper tabled—I beg pardon for speaking of him by name—the very vague proposition which he did table, he was told by the American negotiators that they were not authorised to deal with it. It was patent and apparent that they were not authorised to deal with it, and I beg to observe that, judging by their own action, the conduct of the Government had been so indiscreet in various ways as to render it excessively difficult, either for President Cleveland or his Cabinet, however favorable disposed they were—and I believe they were very favorably disposed to us—to render it very difficult for them to mix up the fishery question with our commercial relations at that date. You must remember that this matter had been publicly brought to the attention of the United States Congress, and that the Committee on Foreign Affairs, headed by Mr. Belmont, have declared :

“ That the motive and purpose have been plainly and openly avowed by Canada to be, first, the punishment of such vessels because the United States levies a duty on Canadian fish, not fresh, for immediate consumption, and, secondly, to coerce the United States to exempt such Canadian fish from all custom duties, and to enter into other new reciprocal customs relations with the Canadian Dominion and Newfoundland.”

And the Committee on Foreign Affairs went on to add : “ that this was a policy of threat and coercion, which should be instantly and summarily dealt with.” Under those circumstances it was absurd to say that anything could be deduced from the refusal of the American commissioners to discuss this question of reciprocal relations upon the very bald and brief memorandum furnished us by Sir Charles Tupper. I repeat one thing which I said before but it will bear repetition. It must always be remembered that Canada has a good deal to give as well as a good deal to get, and in making a bargain with the United States I for one would give very fair and full equivalents. I wish that the treaty should be perfectly and mutually beneficial, that for every dollar of profit we make they should make a dollar, and that for every Canadian who is benefited an American should be benefited likewise. It is on such a basis alone that a firm and permanent treaty of reciprocity, or a firm and permanent arrangement for free and unrestricted trade can be carried out. As I have said the people of the United States need new markets as well as we do. I do not contend, for it would be absurd to contend, that the thing is as important to them as it is to us. It is not as important to 60,000,000 to have the market of 5,000,000, as it is for 5,000,000 people to have the market of 60,000,000. That much is clear. But I do contend, Sir, that we have it in our power to give a full equivalent, and benefit quite as many Americans by this arrangement as Canadians will be benefited. I also say that this is emphatically one of those questions in which very nearly everything depends on how the question is presented to the various parties to the negotiation. You may approach this if you will in the spirit of statesmen, or you may approach it in the spirit of flunkys. It is a large question which demands a large treatment. Now, whatever the faults of England or English statesmen may be, I have always felt, I have always maintained, that England is essentially just, and that when England understands fairly and properly the grounds upon which we make this claim that England will, I believe, be prepared to concede it. As for the United States, I have no doubt that they have got their faults as we have got our faults, but with all their faults no man can have mixed much with the Americans without knowing that they are emphatically a great and a generous nation. I have heard one most foolish complaint and most foolish fear expressed, and I have heard that complaint made by men who ought to know better, the complaint that the people and the Government of the United States, forsooth, are not prepared to gush over or to rush into our arms or those of England at every pretty phrase. I do not blame them for that. As I have said I know something of the history of North America for the past one hundred years and something of the history of the dealings of England with the United States during that interval. Even during the last five and twenty years I say, that we have not always so acted as to warrant us in expecting that the Americans will rush at once into our arms whenever we propose a friendly treaty for arrangement with them, but I do say that if you go to the United States and make fair, just and reasonable propositions to them that there is every reason—and we have, in the statements of their highest statesmen, proof that we will be so received—there is every reason to believe that we will be fairly and honorably received, and that it is in our power to make a treaty which shall be mutually advantageous, honorable and profitable to both nations. I do not gush over the United States either. I admire the United States, but I am in no way disposed to cringe to them. I think I may remind the House that the only negotiation during the last one hundred years in which Canada obtained a tolerable equivalent for her concessions was the negotiation conducted at Halifax under the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie and my lamented friend Sir Albert Smith. I take no shame to admit, and I have said it before, that for many a year I have made it my deliberate purpose to do all that one man could do, all that any man honorably could do, to make friends as far as I could, and to cause my people and the English people to become friends once more with the people of the United States. Our position towards the people of the United States has been vastly changed within the last five and twenty years, and it is well that this House should remember that. Five and twenty years ago but a small proportion of her population were in the United States. To-day, Sir, the United States, in the most emphatic possible manner, are becoming literally flesh of our flesh and blood of our blood. I think my friends from the Maritime Provinces and Quebec probably can affirm my statement, when I say that I know whole counties, I know great regions in Canada where you cannot find one single solitary Canadian family which has not a son, or a daughter, or a brother, or a sister or some very near and dear relative now inhabiting the United States. We will best do honor to the United Empire Loyalist traditions if we in our degree contribute to bring those two great races together, and to repair in this way what I have always looked upon as the great blot upon English policy during the last century. Now, there is another side of this question. Suppose the hon. gentlemen entered into those negotiations in good faith, suppose they tried their best, and suppose the negotiation fails, well, all I can say is that I would advise the people of Canada in that case to set to work and put their house in order. If we go on as we are going now, our position will soon become intolerable as compared with the United States. I do not think that hon. gentlemen opposite have at all appreciated what the United States has done during the last dozen years. I do not think this House is at all aware of the fiscal position in which the United States stand to-day. I have here the last United States Treasury return, and what does it show? It shows, Sir, that the total expenditure of the United States, less sinking fund, was just $268,000,000, of which $35,500,000 came from miscellaneous receipts, and $233,000,000 was all they required to raise by direct taxation. Now, they collect $120,000,000 in round numbers by excise, and, therefore, all they require to raise by customs duties is a bare $114,000,000. Sir, it would be in the power of the United States Secretary of the Treasury, if Congress gave him the authority, to raise the whole of the customs revenue in either of these three ways. He might maintain the existing tax on sugar and impose a very small income tax indeed, and raise all the revenue he wanted; he might maintain the tax on sugar and impose a very small ad valorem duty and raise all the revenue he wanted; or he might maintain the present sugar tax and add specific duties on a very few articles and make the rest of his trade list free. Now, I would like to direct the attention of this House for a few moments to what might befall us if the United States adopted such a course. We have no less an authority than Mr. Joseph Chamberlain for saying that if the United States chose to reduce their tariff materially, they would become a most formidable competitor of England in the markets of the world; and if they could become a formidable competitor of England, what sort of a competitor would they be with our farmers and manufacturers under such circumstances—we heavily burdened with debt and the United States almost free? What, I should like to know, would the hon. gentlemen do in such a case? And it is a case which is imminent, a case which may occur at any moment? Will they go on and heap further taxes on the people? Do they think they could prevent a much more deplorable exodus than has occurred? Now, Sir, if the hon. gentlemen refuse to act—this is not a motion of want of confidence; they have not committed themselves, at least the First Minister has not, and I do not think his colleagues have committed themselves, against this special proposition—if they refuse to act, I ask them to consult their own Finance Minister as to whether I am not right, looking at the result of their fisheries negotiation, in saying that a most intense feeling of disappointment will pervade the whole of the Maritime Provinces at any rate. An intense feeling of disappointment, I know, will pervade a vast number of the farmers of Canada from one end of the Dominion to the other, and I think there will be a very great and bitter disappointment on the part of many of the inhabitants of Manitoba and probably also of British Columbia. Now, Sir, it must be borne in mind that our circumstances within a few years, not wholly by our own fault, not wholly by the fault of government, but in consequence of great economic changes which have been taking place of very great importance, have been materially changed. Then, it is notorious that our position, in comparison with that of the United States, has in twenty years been reversed, and reversed enormously to our detriment. Twenty years ago our taxes were one-third of the taxes of the United States; twenty years ago our debt was one-third of the debt of the United States. To-day, by the last returns I have here, our debt is two and a half times, as nearly as may be, greater per head than the debt of the United States; and the necessary taxes which the United States require to raise for the purpose of carrying on their government are one-third less than the necessary taxes the people of Canada require to pay. Then, Sir, the European market, to which we formerly looked, is dwindling for us, so far as we are concerned. We are exposed to intense competition from every part of the world. On the other hand the American market is growing with immense rapidity, and has become vastly richer to-day than it was a short time ago, while we are stationary and not even able to keep our own people, not to speak of the emigrants we bring here. As I said before, a great change in the United States is imminent, and it is our business to prepare to meet it. Sir, let me review our course for the last twenty years. Can hon. gentlemen opposite, with the Public Accounts in their hands, venture to deny that within twenty years our debt has trebled, having risen from $73,000,000 or $75,000,000 to $230,000,000, and that our taxes have trebled likewise, having risen from $11,500,000 to $30,000,000? And that does not at all represent the real increase of taxation. Can they deny, Sir, that there is proof, absolutely conclusive proof, as far as the greater part of the Dominion is concerned, that we have lost three emigrants out of every four that we brought here, and one in four of our own people? Can they deny that there has been an enormous reduction in the volume of trade, until the volume of trade to-day is nearly 50 per cent. per head less than it was in 1873? Can they deny that there has been a very great fall in the prices of the chief articles produced by our agriculturists, on whom we mainly depend? What shall I say of the immigration returns for the last six years? I have only got the municipal statistics of Ontario to go upon, but what a sorry story they have to tell us. I have the returns of every rural municipality and of every town and village of Ontario for the last six years, and what do I find? I find that of forty-four counties in Ontario, barely three have increased their rural population more than the natural growth of the population warrants; of the remainder, twenty-two are either stationary or have gained less than their natural growth; and nineteen have absolutely lost population. The total gain in the rural portion of Ontario, from 1881 to 1886, is about 13,000 souls on a rural population of over 1,100,000. In those six years we have gained about one-half of one per cent., according to the municipal statistics of Ontario. Of 206 towns and villages, 38 have increased in size more than their natural growth of population; 91 are stationary or have less than their natural growth, and 67 have lost population absolutely. 168 out of 206 have either lost absolutely in population or have grown less than the natural growth of population warrants. I need not go over the list of rural municipalities in detail, because they show precisely the same results; and I am sorry to say that I find, from information furnished me within the last few days by my esteemed friend Mr. Blue, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, that the record for the year 1887, is rather worse, if that be possible, than the records for the years that have preceded. What shall I say of the comparison between Manitoba and Dakota? Manitoba and Dakota started seventeen years ago on equal terms. Each had a white population 14,000 strong. In about ten years Dakota had added a little over 100,000 to its population; Manitoba had added a little over 50,000 to its population. In 1881, Dakota had 130,000; Manitoba had 65,000. Then, Sir, we began to spend the money of the public by tens of millions in making railroads and promoting immigration to Manitoba. In 1886, we find that after spending $100,000,000 of public money, and perhaps nearly half as much private funds, the population of Manitoba has grown but 30,000, and, according to the last statistics I have been able to obtain, in 1886, the population of Dakota considerably exceeds 500,000. They have added nearly 400,000 to their population within the last six years, while Manitoba has added but 30,000 according to the last census, after an expenditure of $100,000,000. Now, do you call that satisfactory? If you do not, then the time has come to search for some appropriate remedy. I say again that, rightly understood and fairly understood, the interests of Canada, and the United States, and the mother country are really identical; and that the time is come, and is not far distant, when, at any rate the best, the wisest, and the most intelligent men of all these countries will realise that if they do not realise it now. I am no annexationist and I do not propose to become one. I have no desire to see our country merged in the United States, and I can tell the House that after conferences with a good many distinguished Americans, I am well advised they do not particularly desire to add to their heavy responsibilities by seeing us politically incorporated with them. I have always held and declared that I regard annexation as undesirable. I have no more wish to see my country merge her existence in that of the great state to the south of us—although I admire much in the institutions of the latter—than I would have to merge my own individual existence in that of another man's, because I admire his abilities or envy his great estate. We have a plain duty to discharge. We are, some of us, Privy Counsellors, and it is our bounden duty to advise Her Majesty the Queen of Canada in the true interests of the people of Canada, whatever those may be. That may carry us far. To a very considerable extent the choice lies with the people of Canada, to decide whether they shall continue to fulfil the somewhat ignoble office that they now fulfil, of being practically, and in fact, a sort of hostage to the United States for the good behavior of England, or whether they will rise equal to the situation and become a link of union and amity between the two great English races. Which is the safer, which is the more honorable, which is the wiser, which is the more statesmanlike policy? I have abstained of set purpose from alluding to the fishery question, except in a most cursory way. I do not wish to animadvert on the conduct of the English plenipotentiaries in that matter, but I may take this opportunity of pointing out to the House, and the First Minister and his friends, that they can produce no argument to warrant them in asking the people of Canada to ratify that treaty, except practically this great argument that it is, in a high degree, the interest of the Empire to conciliate the good-will of the people of the United States by all fair and honorable means. And that very argument which they will doubtless bring to induce this House to consent to the treaty, applies with equal force to my contention that it is in the highest degree for the interest of the Empire that we, on our side, should endeavor, through the very proposition I now submit, to knit Canada and the United States together in a closer and more friendly alliance. We must rise above the craving for precedents, so dear to a certain order of legal mind. We are in a new world, and we own half a continent in it. It may be that there is no precedent to fit our case. My proposal is new and so is our situation, and, Sir, I have to say if there is no precedent to fit, it is our business to make one. Hon. gentlemen may contend that the views I express are not those held, by the majority of the people, at any rate as they are represented on the floor of this House; but if these hon. gentlemen could make up their minds, for once, to depart from their precedents—and if there ever was a case in which we would be warranted in departing from precedents it is this—and would dare to submit this question to the plebiscitum of the people, they know, and I know that the answer would be decisively in its favor. They know that an overwhelming majority of the people would be at our backs in demanding that no reasonable effort should be spared to obtain free trade with the United States; and if it were possible that this plebiscitum should be voted on by every native-born Canadian in North America, we would roll up a larger majority in its favor than has ever yet been recorded in our annals on any vote of any kind whatever. I do not say, and it is false to assert that I have ever said, that Canada has not made any progress during the past twenty years. I admit considerable progress has been made in certain directions. But what I contend for is this: that the progress has been partial, inadequate, far below what the natural resources of our country would warrant. It is also far below what we made ourselves in the twenty years before 1861, and as much below what the United States made in the first twenty years of their existence, when their population was equal to ours. I am quite willing to grant that a few towns have grown and prospered within the past few years, but I say it is none the less true that over many wide areas in this country our population is stationary and even retrograde. It is none the less true that from one end of Canada to the other, the value of farm lands is less to-day than it was six, seven or eight years ago; it is none the less true that the value of farm products is enormously lowered, and that our farmers are exposed to a far more intense competition than they have hitherto experienced. Great new forces are coming into existence, the full effect of which we are only beginning to feel. There is danger lest Canada, so far as regards our native born population, should sink into a mere residuum, a country from which the best and most intelligent of our people are fleeing, not by hundreds or by thousands, but by millions. Then as to foreign immigrants,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

if these statistics can be relied upon, it is clear that we are at the same time becoming a mere dumping ground for the refuse of those whom we import into this country. It is quite clear we are not growing up towards the light, and I hold it to be a very miserable symptom of our political growth, that there should exist here this craving to hang on to our mother's apron strings. Under such circumstances, it is our bounden duty to ascertain, at the earliest moment we can, what are the views of the people of the United States on this great question. This is not a question of etiquette. We have here, to all intents and purposes, the invitation of the President, and of the virtual Premier of the United States, to go and treat with them on fair and equal terms; and if it were a question of etiquette, the hon. gentleman is a Shakesperian student, and he knows that "nice customs courtesy to mighty kings." If two peoples desire to have a great boon like this, they need not stand on little paltry questions as to which shall make the first advance. If we fail, it will then be time to consider the situation anew. But I repeat that our real interests are those of England, and the United States are perfectly identical, and will be substantially furthered by this proposition. In conclusion let me say that I hope that, in this discussion, on both sides of the House, every man who speaks will remember that he is here as a Canadian representative, that he is here as a trustee of a certain section of the Canadian people, that our business here, all that warrants us in being here, is for the purpose of discussing the welfare of Canada, and I hope that we will be spared certain stale and tawdry hypocrisies of which we have heard too much. I have the greatest possible respect for genuine loyalty and for genuine loyalists wherever I may meet them. Even if they are sometimes a little wooden-headed and perverse, the thing is good in itself that I can excuse a good deal, but there is a certain class of loyalty, and there is a certain class of loyalists to whom I cannot extend any consideration at all. I must say that I have not much respect for 35 per cent. tariff protection loyalty, or for 35 per cent. tariff protection loyalists; and I think, if the right hon. gentleman will permit me to say so, that the First Minister showed that he appreciated correctly that class of loyalty and of loyalists in the famous parable he delivered a few years ago, wherein he compared himself—it is his comparison, not mine—to a monkey who had stolen into a farmer's orchard and was shaking down the apples for the benefit of the herd of swine that were grunting and gormandising below. England can take care of herself, as England has shown many a time and oft. If the English Cabinet, when this matter is fully represented to them, as it ought to be, see fit to object, it will be time enough for us to take up the question. In discussing it, I admit that all men who think that this will hurt Canada either morally or materially—because I do not desire to keep the question down to the mere ground of material interest—have good and fair grounds for expressing their views, but I say that none else should be heard on any pretext in this House, and I say that the worst foe of British connection is the man who would attempt to stifle discussion on that ground. More than that, I say what every one who has thought on the subject must know and feel to be true, that, in many important respects, our position is anomalous and transitional. No one supposed, when we came together in this Confederation, stretching over half a continent, that we were to remain semi-dependent forever. We are growing in stature, not as fast as hon. gentlemen say, but still we are growing, and we are entitled to a larger measure of responsibilities and to a larger measure of rights. One thing is clear, that everyone, as I have said, who thinks twice on the subject knows and feels, that things are not satisfactory for us in many ways. Why, even the Imperial Federationists know this. They do not know exactly what they want, I grant; they know still less how they are to get it, I grant; but they know that there is a want and a lack in our present relations, and they desire to fill it. I have looked at that question long and often, and, as far as Canada is concerned, I see no way out for them, I see no way of our becoming a valuable member of a British Federation save only on one consideration, and that is that you broaden your base and take care that you unite yourselves with the United States in the bonds of a firm and friendly alliance which is not likely to be broken, and there is no way in which that is more likely to be done than by greatly increasing and promoting the trade between the two countries. In mutual advantage and benefit the surest bond of union will be found to exist, and I believe that Mr. Goldwin Smith was eminently right in saying that it was an idle and silly delusion to say that either England or the United States profited by the great struggle of the last century, that it was a thousand pities that the violent collision took place, and I know that not only Goldwin Smith expressed those views, but that they were held by the greatest and best of the Americans of that day, by men like George Washington himself, by men like Alexander Hamilton, by men even like the Adams, though they had strong republican leanings; that they were held by many of the best thinkers of the last century; and that these are the views which are held by the best and wisest Americans of the present time, and those were substantially the views, as their correspondence and records exist to prove, which were held by our own United Empire Loyalist forefathers, who did not desire to see Great Britain tax the colonies for her own benefit, but did desire to testify to the great and grand idea of a united British Empire and a united British people all over North America. It is idle for any human being to rise up and tell this House that, when we have lost a number equal to half the whole population that now remains, things are satisfactory with us. There is not another country, except perhaps Ireland, that has sustained so heavy a bleeding as we have done during the last few years. I say the time has come when Canada may justly claim the right to make her own commercial treaties. I say it is for the interest of the Empire that she should have that right. These things at any rate are perfectly clear. It is quite clear to any one who will carefully study those trade returns and will study the figures which I submitted before recess, that the United States market, if it were only made free, is worth more than twice over to Canada than of all the rest of the world put together. It is perfectly clear that it is the only market open to us for a great amount of our own productions. It is perfectly clear to me—it may not be to hon. gentlemen opposite—that our position relatively to the United States may become intolerable, and that there is need of present action in this regard. If we do nothing, and the United States act wisely, we may prepare—farmers and manufacturers alike—for a very severe competition, for a great and increasing exodus, and for very great and increasing dissatisfaction among our various Provinces. I must not be misunderstood. I do not say that there are no other expedients possible for us, but what I do say is that the expedient I now propose for the consideration of the House is the surest, the simplest, and the easiest expedient open to us; that it commends itself in a very high degree to the instincts of our people, as has been unmistakably shown; that it is in itself a fair, just and reasonable proposition; that it is best for us, best for the whole Empire, best for our kinsmen and neighbors on the other side of the line; and, believing that that it is so, I beg to move the resolution of which I have given notice.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Speaker, I have frequently listened to the greater part of the hon. gentleman's speech, delivered here this evening, but I confess that on no former occasion have I heard him deliver it with greater weakness, if he will allow me that expression, than he has done to-night. During the earlier part of his speech, the hon. gentleman dwelt almost exclusively upon the statement that this country has not been progressing. The old story of loss of population, the old story of loss of trade, the old story that we are not progressing as we ought, was repeated ad nauseam. It appeared so well to please him that, although he dropped it from time to time in order to go on with the subject which is more particularly before us, the House will remember that he invariably fell back upon the same old statement, the same old Jeremiads of ruin and decay for this country. Sir, I cannot do better than give to the hon. gentleman the advice which the leading organ of his own party gave him, and gave to this country—if, indeed, the Toronto Globe may now be called the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite. Only a few weeks ago the Globe said:

“Distrust all figures professing to show that Canada has retrograded instead of advancing. Eschew association with the teachers of despair. Old men who, with worn-out powers, assert that national suicide is the only course to national salvation, may be excused by considerations of their senility, but young men who echo their doleful refrain can never seem otherwise than contemptible.”

These, Mr. Speaker, are not the words of a Tory newspaper, or of a Tory public man; they are the advice given to the young men of the country by the leading organ of hon. gentlemen opposite, and I commend them as the best possible answer to the statements that we have heard to-night. I think we have a right to complain, also, that the hon. gentleman was not as distinct as could be desired in his statement of what his resolution really means—whether it is commercial union that we are to have, or whether it is unrestricted reciprocity, which would leave us free to deal with other nations as we thought proper. That was not very definitely stated by the hon. gentleman, unless, indeed, we take one sentence in which he suggested that the position taken by Mr. Hitt, a member of Congress, embodied principles which went rather further than he would desire to go. But, Sir, what is it that has led to the sudden discovery of this panacea for the ills of Canada? What is it that has brought us, in this Session of Parliament, to discuss a question of this kind as the only course which offers to us any assurance for the future well-being of Canada? We can remember that, although the question of a Reciprocity Treaty is an old one, so far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, and so far as any public man in Canada, having the responsibility of a public man upon him, is concerned, until the last few months, we never heard of this question of commercial union, or the question of unrestricted reciprocity, as a remedy for the ills which are alleged to exist. Sir, all the statements made by the hon. gentleman against the policy of the Government were made over and over again before the last elections—aye, I may say that before the elections which preceded the last, all these statements were made. When we came to the last election, the two parties faced the electorate, nominally at any rate, upon distinct issues. The late leader of the Liberal party went through Ontario and delivered speeches which, for elaborateness of preparation, for devotion to detail, have, perhaps, never been exceeded by the speeches delivered by any other public man in Canada. They form a volume which I hold in my hand. And yet, Mr. Speaker, what will hon. gentlemen say when I tell them that in the whole of these speeches, the only reference to reciprocity is embodied in two single lines of type, delivered, first at Welland, and next, if I mistake not, at Malvern. The hon. gentlemen pledged themselves, through their leader, to a particular course in the last elections. I have the pledges here, and it is worth while reading them, delivered by their late leader. He delivered them, remember, not as an ordinary citizen, but as the leader of the party, speaking for the party, declaring himself to be authorised to speak for the party, and what did he say?

"I spoke in 1882, I spoke a few weeks ago in Toronto, I speak now as the leader of the party, expounding on all questions of principle, not merely my individual views, but the common sense, as I understand it, of the great body of the party, the general lines upon which the party, as a whole, would act, if entrusted, as they will soon be, with power."

They were not entrusted with power, and they are now acting upon different principles from those which they pledged themselves to the people of this country they would act upon, if they were entrusted with power. He went on to say:

"What I have said, and am about to say, on all questions of principle, you may then take as authoritative, to whatever extent a leader has authority, and so far from there being divergence, I can assure you that there is, in my belief, a general concurrence of sentiment between us, including Sir Richard Cartwright, whom I name only because our adversaries delight to represent him as holding other views."

Then, Sir, what more did he say?

"We have no longer a large surplus to dispense of. We have a large deficit and a greatly increased scale of expenditure to meet, and it is clearer than ever that a very high scale of taxation must be retained, and that manufacturers have nothing to fear. I then declared that any re-adjustment should be effected with due regard to the legitimate interests of all concerned. In that phrase, 'all concerned,' I hope no one will object to my including, as I do, the general public. In any re-adjustment I maintain that we should look especially to such reduction of expenditure as may allow of a reduction of taxation, to the lightening of sectional taxes; to the lightening of taxation upon the prime necessities of life, and upon the raw materials of manufacture, to a more equitable arrangement of the taxes which now bear unfairly upon the poor as compared with the rich, to a taxation of luxuries just so high as will not thwart our object by greatly checking consumption, to the curbing of monopolies of production in cases where, by combination or otherwise, the tariff allows an undue and exorbitant profit to be exacted from consumers, and to the effort—a most important point—to promote reciprocal trade with our neighbors to the south."

And that, Mr. Speaker, is the only reference in this whole book setting forth the policy of the Liberal party—that is the only reference whatever to the question of reciprocity. I notice that hon. gentlemen opposite smile; I notice that they think they have something because the term reciprocity is used here; but how do they reconcile this principle of reciprocity, if it be unrestricted reciprocity that was meant, with the promise that the manufacturers have nothing to fear, with the promise that the tariff cannot be materially reduced, with the promise that our large expenditures will require a high tariff to be maintained, while their policy to-day as announced is that the tariff is to be abolished altogether, in so far as the trade between our neighbors, our great competitors, and ourselves are concerned. I find the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blake) went on further to say:

"No man, I care not how convinced an advocate of absolutely free trade for Canada he may be, has yet suggested, no man I believe can suggest, a practicable plan whereby our great revenue needs can be met, otherwise than by the continued imposition of very high duties on goods similar to those we make or can make within our bounds; or on the raw materials. I invite the most ardent free trader in public life to present a plausible solution of this problem; and I contend that he is bound to do so before he talks of free trade as practicable in Canada. I have not believed it soluble in my day; and any chance of its solubility, if any chance there were, has been destroyed by the vast increase of our yearly charge, and by the other conditions which have been created. The thing is removed from the domain of practical politics."

And yet within a little over one year from the day when that speech was delivered and that pledge made, as indicating what would be the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, if their anticipations had been realised, and they had occupied these Treasury benches, we have a three and-a-half hours' speech delivered in this House for the purpose of showing us that free trade is not only practical but is absolutely essential if this country is to escape the ruin which threatens it. I might go on quoting other passages from that speech, but I will not detain the House longer. I might point out where the hon. gentleman declared that the idea of direct taxation was absurd, was not even to be thought of, and could not be thought of in connection with our affairs in Canada; but I have read enough to show that in assuming the position which hon. gentlemen opposite have taken to-night, they have entirely changed their position from that which they occupied when appealing to the people a little over a year ago, and I think they are bound to show that our condition has so changed since that time as to justify that remarkable change of position on their part. One might speculate, but of course we will not do it, that it is not so much the interests of the country as the necessities of the party that have caused this change. They had been taunted by their own friends, as well as by their political opponents, as being a party without a policy. They had been taunted with being a party of negations without any positive idea to submit for the acceptance of the people, and as they were beaten at two elections and as bye-election after bye-election gave the same record and the people showed their confidence in the policy represented by this Government, hon. gentlemen opposite have made up their minds that something new is required, and they submit a policy, not a policy which this Government could carry out if they would, not a policy which those hon. gentlemen could carry out if they were on this side of the House, but a policy dependent upon the action of a foreign Government without whose consent nothing could be done. So that after nearly ten years of Opposition, after ten years of groping after something through which they might appeal to the people, hon. gentlemen have come down to a policy which is a safe one for them because they could not adopt it if they were on the Treasury benches, and the adoption of which depends entirely on the action of a foreign Government. They have come with a policy for the United States for the acceptance of the people of Canada. That is the position in which we find hon. gentlemen to-day. Sir, this question of reciprocity is an old question. Both political parties in Canada have been in favor of it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Both parties have been in favor of reciprocal trade in the natural productions of this country; both parties have been in favor of reciprocal trade, in so far as that reciprocal trade can be carried out, having regard to the great industrial interests of this country. What has been the history of negotiations in the direction of reciprocity? The Treaty of 1854, commonly known as the Elgin Treaty, was, if I mistake not, negotiated under the direction of the Liberal-Conservative party, the McNabb-Morin Government being in power at that time. The treaty was denounced at the very first moment it could be denounced by the United States. From that day to this, this Government, both parties I may say in Canada, have been ready to enter into negotiations for a fair interchange of the commodities of the two countries. In 1874, the late Government sent Mr. George Brown to Washington, and he and Mr. Fish drafted a treaty, which was going to be, in the opinion of every one who favored it, of great advantage to Canada. What was the fate of it? It dealt not only with the natural productions of the country, but also with a considerable line of manufactures. It went even further than that: it ensured the Americans the use of our great public works. It went further than that: it obliged the people of Canada to build a new canal, commonly known as the Caughnawaga Canal, which would give easy access for the lumber of the west to the American market. And yet, in spite of the great advantages to be given to the United States by that treaty, in spite of the fact that it went as far as the people of this country could possibly go in negotiations of that kind, what was the result of it? Why, it was simply hung up in the Senate, denied even the courtesy of a reference to the ordinary committee, and from that day to this all efforts to get a Reciprocity Treaty with the United States have failed. What was the position of the hon. gentleman at that time? Why, I find that the hon. gentleman who has addressed the House at such great length to-night, when addressing a meeting in Charlottetown, dealt with this subject. He said:

"They say we must have reciprocity, and we cannot live without it as a Dominion. I take exception to that statement. While reciprocity is desirable, we are not in such a state of subjection to the United States that we cannot live without it. We have men and ships, and 'will carry the war into Africa.' We will find new markets for ourselves, and cut them out. There is nothing better calculated to prevent the bringing about of reciprocity than to tell the Americans we cannot live without them. It would induce them to believe that they had the power to drive us to their own terms."

I shall not make other quotations as I might make them to show that this was the current of public opinion in this country at that time. I do not quote this with the object of putting the hon. gentleman in contradiction to himself. I quote it as I might quote extracts from the leading organ of that party at the same time, to show what was the current of public opinion then, which was that, having made every effort that we possibly could make to secure reciprocal free trade with our friends on the other side of the line, so far as we could do it consistently with the interests, and welfare, and revenue requirement of this country, we ought to go on and develop our own interests and our own destiny in our own fashion. Now what did this Government do? Under the Act of 1879—an Act which embodied the mandate of the people at that time—commonly known as the National Policy Act, we incorporated a clause which gave to the Governor General in Council the power practically of entering into a reciprocal treaty for the free interchange of products between this country and the United States. That Act is on the Statute-book to-day, and it remains there an authority to the Government, whenever the United States will show any disposition to meet us, to enter into freer trade relations with them in so far as we can do. I think I may fairly say, therefore, that our record in the past, at any rate, is such that the people of Canada can say to our friends on the other side of the line: "We are ready to consider the question whenever you shall signify your decision for such consideration; we are ready to consider with you the best means of promoting the free interchange of such products in this country as we can exchange with you, having regard to our great interests;" and until the people of the United States are so ready, the history of the past clearly shows that the true policy of Canada is to act upon the principle laid down by the hon. gentleman himself in the extract which I have just quoted, that is, to work out our own destiny in our own way. This question, however, of Commercial Union or of unrestricted reciprocity—the latter term being apparently a modification of the former principle—is not altogether a new one. In 1871, I had myself the privilege of being present at a meeting of the National Board of Trade of the United States, in the city of St. Louis, and on that occasion the chairman of the Canadian delegation, the late Hon. John Young, consented to a scheme for unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union. But there is this fact to be remembered in connection with that: Mr. Young, as everyone knows, was in favor of the separation of this country from the mother country, in order that we might enter into such an arrangement. He took the ground at St. Louis, as he did in the city of Montreal, and in the press when he discussed this question, that without independence we could not enter into arrangements of this kind, and that, therefore, as precedent to such an arrangement and for the purpose of bringing about such arrangement, the true interests of Canada lay in her separation from the mother country. Did any public man in Canada, having the responsibility of a public man upon him, sanction that view at that time? No. Although Mr. Young was a prominent Liberal, although he was a strong supporter of the Liberal party, although he was a man of great influence, who had been a Minister of the Crown, the Toronto Globe, then edited by the late Hon. George Brown, denounced him and denounced his proposition as utterly opposed to the best interests of this country and as impossible of fulfilment, except on terms of annexation itself. That was the position taken at that time in connection with this question. What is meant by this question of commercial union? I take the opinions of those who may fairly be assumed to be, at any rate, the best authorities upon that subject. We would never have heard of it, apparently so at any rate, had not Mr. Erastus Wiman, a gentleman of great influence and of great ability in the United States, a Canadian by birth and I believe still a Canadian by allegiance, took it into his head, having plenty of leisure on his hands, to come to Canada and carve out a policy for the people of this country. He did the constituency of Cardwell, which I have the honor to represent here, the kindness to make his first début on that question there, and from that day to this he has, in the press and in public meetings, said a great deal upon this subject, so that he has come to be recognised, if not the leader of the Liberal party at least the leader of this particular policy of the Liberal party. It seems to me that in any discussion of the question in this country we should know precisely what is contemplated by this scheme. Now what does Mr. Wiman say? Writing to the American press on this subject he says:

"That by the operation of a uniform continental tariff equal in height to that always prevailing in the United States, the goods and merchandise of all foreign countries, including Great Britain, would be discriminated against in favor of American manufactures."

Then, Sir, in a letter which he addressed to the Mail, or rather in a speech which he delivered in Detroit and reported in the Mail, he said:

"That as against all the rest of the world the same rates of duty should be collected by Canada as are now levied by the United States, while between those two countries of North America the customs line should be completely obliterated, in other words, the proposition is that around the whole continent of North America the customs line should exist and have precisely a uniform height."

Now, what does that involve? I take a leading newspaper of the western States, and the Chicago Times I think may be considered the leading newspaper of the western States, as giving a statement of what that really involves. Here is what the Times says:

"This proposition implies a complete surrender by the Dominion Parliament to the American Congress of all control of the principal source of the Dominion revenue—the tariff. Whatever it may please the American Congress to do regarding the tariff the Dominion must forthwith accept. The people of the Dominion would have neither a vote nor a voice in Washington under the proposed Commercial Union."

Then, Sir, the same paper says further:

"Not only would our Congress prescribe and change at pleasure the taxes exacted from the people of Canada, but our executive officers and our courts would make all the rulings and decisions affecting rates for the Dominion as well as for the United States."

Again I will quote another extract from the same paper:

"If the Dominion will take our tariff laws as they are, and as Congress may choose to modify them, and as our Treasury Department and courts may construe them, well and good. This country may agree to such an arrangement as that, but it will never agree to accept the Dominion laws, or to put the whole business of tariff-making out of Congress, or into the hands of some joint high commission. Unless, therefore, the Dominion is prepared to make a complete and unconditional surrender of all control over its own tariff, and accept whatever tariff our own Congress may choose to enact from time to time, the scheme of Commercial Union, in the sense in which that phrase is used, is entirely out of the question."

But, Mr. Speaker, I have an extract from a speech by a gentleman whose opinion on this subject is, perhaps, to us in this House, of still more importance, because he speaks with the responsibility of a Canadian public man, and a leading and distinguished member of his own party. I refer to the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who, at Jarvis, during the Haldimand election, delivered a speech in which he declared for Commercial Union. What the hon. gentleman said, I will admit, differs in some respects from the suggestion or hint of the hon. gentleman who has spoken to us to-night; but I think we have a right to assume that a speech delivered so recently, and by a gentleman occupying so distinguished a position as the hon. member for North Norfolk must be held to embody, at any rate, the views of a considerable section of his party. He said :

"It was simply a customs union between two or more independent states where a common tariff and excise laws were adopted, and the revenue collected, after deducting expenses of collection, was divided among the participants upon the basis of population, or any other basis that might be agreed upon, while all trade restrictions between them were removed. The application of the principle between Canada and the United States would require that the two countries should have the same excise rates and the same tariff upon imports from all other countries; that the revenue thus collected in both countries should be divided upon conditions hereafter to be arranged; that the customs line between the two countries from ocean to ocean should be removed, and that trade between Canada and the States should be in every respect as free and untrammelled as trade between the different States of the American Union was at the present moment."

That is a statement of the case as submitted by the hon. member for North Norfolk, and I am bound to say—and I think this honorable House will agree with me—that in directness and clearness of statement it is far preferable to the speech to which we have listened to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford. Then, Sir, we have a still more important authority in this case—the authority on whose support and assistance hon. gentlemen depend for the realisation of their hopes. What is it that is proposed in Congress to-day. Mr. Butterworth introduced a Bill, and that Bill was submitted to the proper committee of the House of Representatives; but, although we are not in the secrets of that committee, although we do not know what was done there or how it happened, what we do know is that Mr. Hitt afterwards introduced a resolution to the House of Representatives which was submitted to the same committee, and that Mr. Butterworth telegraphed a practical abandonment of his own scheme and the adoption of the scheme embodied in the resolution of Mr. Hitt. I have not the resolution itself, but here is a Washington despatch giving the substance of it:—

"WASHINGTON, 5th March.

"In the House of Representatives to-day Congressman Hitt introduced a joint resolution for the promotion of Commercial Union with Canada. It was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It provides that when it shall be duly certified to the President that the Government of the Dominion of Canada has declared a desire to establish Commercial Union with the United States, having a uniform revenue system, like internal taxes to be collected, and like import duties to be imposed on articles brought into either country from other nations, and no duties upon trade between the United States and Canada, he shall appoint three commissioners to meet those who may be likewise designated to represent the Government of Canada to prepare a plan for the assimilation of the import duties and internal revenue taxes of the two countries, and an equitable division of receipts under Commercial Union, and said commissioners shall report to the President, who shall lay the report before Congress."

Now, that is the only proposal before the Congress of the United States to-day, and I think we have a right, therefore, to ask hon. gentlemen whether they are prepared to accept that proposal, or if they are not, why they should, in view of the past history of this question, trifle with the time of Parliament in discussing this matter. Now, Sir, this does not mean unrestricted reciprocity, because Mr. Hitt, in a letter to the press says:

"The tariff would have to be the same in Canada and the United States, or there would be infinite fraud and disturbance of trade."

So that you will see that upon that question Mr. Hitt speaks with no uncertain sound, and that the only proposition which comes from anybody in the United States is a proposition for a union or a reciprocity different, I take it, from that which is embodied in this resolution, although the same as that which, up to the time the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar), wrote his letter to Mr. Wiman, was accepted by hon. gentlemen opposite, including the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk. The change came suddenly. The hon. member for West Ontario—the power behind the throne under the late leader, and I assume the power behind the throne under the present leader as well, if we may judge of the wonderful effect of that letter—wrote to Mr. Wiman, to say that the people of Canada were so enamored of the term "custom houses," that they loved the existence of the custom house so much, that the proposal which suggested the abolition of the custom houses along the line would not likely meet with general support in Canada; and, therefore, he suggested that we should have all the advantages of Commercial Union plus the expense of keeping up the line of custom houses between the two countries; and that is the proposal we have here. Now, Mr. Speaker, what does this proposition which is submitted to us involve? In the first place, I take it that it involves, as I think I have shown, similar customs duties to those imposed by the United States against all other countries in the world except the United States; and I take it, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has said, that that practically means separation from the mother country. Now, I am not going to raise the loyalty cry in any sense whatever. I accept the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman that we should deal with this question from the standpoint of our own interests, that we should deal with it as it affects Canada; and I do not feel disposed, therefore, at this time to raise the general question of loyalty to the mother country, and the danger and ingratitude involved in the separation from the mother country. But I think it is important, when we are discussing the question, that the facts should be stated, and let the people draw their own inference and their conclusion from those facts. For anyone seriously to pretend that this country should remain connected with the mother country, after adopting a principle by which we became commercially a portion of a foreign nation, and charged against the mother country the same duties that foreign nation charged, seems to me to ask people to believe that which no reasonable person can very well believe. So that we must take the proposition as meaning separation from the mother country. I doubt very much whether a high spirited people like the people of Canada would be mean enough to accept a continuance of the connection under such conditions as would be involved in that arrangement, even if the mother country were generous enough to consent to it. Then, Sir, it affects our finances seriously; and I think you will agree with me, that, having regard to the fact that the hon. member who has addressed us at so great length to-night is an ex-Finance Minister, whose specialty it is to deal with finance, the House has reason to complain that upon that branch of the subject he was not very distinct nor very clear. Now, Sir, let us look for a moment at how we stand financially to-day. Our expenditure for the fiscal year of 1887, amounted to $35,658,000. Of this,

The charges on debt amounted to.....	$ 9,970,671
Subsidies to Provinces	4,169,341
Sinking fund.....	1,592,952
Collection of revenue.....	8,375,926
Total.....	$24,108,890

Now, I think the House will agree with me that these are charges that no Commercial Union, no unrestricted reciprocity, would enable us to escape. They are the fixed charges of the country, and cannot be got rid of in any way whatever. Then we have the charges for other expenses, a little over $11,500,000. How are these met? Civil Government, $1,211,850. It may be, if hon. gentlemen opposite were on this side, they might possibly take a few hundred dollars off that, or they might not. I think it will be found on examination, especially if you look at the Estimates, for instance, of this year, where hardly an increase has taken place except the ordinary statutory increase, that the expenditure under this head cannot very well be reduced. Administration of Justice, $675,114. That is an item which cannot be reduced. Fisheries, the protections and bounties to fishermen, $415,443. I do not know whether hon. gentlemen opposite will abandon protection to the fisheries or the system of bounties to fishermen; but unless they do so that item cannot be reduced. Then there is the expenditure on the Indians in the North-West Territories, $1,201,301, and in view of the fact that the only complaint we have from hon. gentlemen opposite is that we permit the Indians to starve, that we do not give them enough food, and, therefore, do not expend enough on them, I do not think that is an item that can very well be reduced. Legislation costs us $977,502. That cannot be reduced. Militia, $1,193,692; Lighthouse and Coast Service, $572,811; Mounted Police, $781,644; Penitentiaries, $311,267; and Public Works rather under $2,133,315—or in all $9,395,759. And I think I may fairly say that by no process of economy, even if the hon. gentlemen, with their cheese-paring methods, were on this side of the House, could these amounts be materially reduced, or at any rate so reduced as in the slightest degree to affect the general question of the application of this policy for carrying on the government of the country. How do we meet these expenses to-day? We have a revenue altogether of $35,754,993, of which the Customs yielded $21,377,800, leaving a balance from other sources of $13,376,193. On the imports we get from the United States to day the duty amounts to $7,299,591, so that we have a revenue, from Customs duties on imports from other countries, of $15,079,209, and adding to this the revenue from other sources, which, as I have stated, amounts to a little over $13,250,000, we have a total of $28,455,402, irrespective of the duties on American imports. The deficit, therefore, if we gave up the revenue from the imports from the United States, which we would have, on our present expenditure and present general receipts, would amount to very nearly $7,250,000. That, I take it, must be made up by direct taxation. It is quite clear, as I have pointed out, that we cannot, if we are to carry on the government of the country and proceed with the public improvements necessary to develop the country, do with a less expenditure than that which we have to-day; so that if we give up this amount that we receive from Customs duties on the imports from the United States, we will have the large deficit to meet of $7,300,000. But that is not all. That is assuming that all our imports from other countries would come in as they come in to-day. That is assuming we would still have English goods coming by the St. Lawrence or landing at Boston or New York and coming here in bond. Can anyone pretend to say that would be the result? Immediately we would find the overwhelming proportion of the goods we now receive from Great Britain would be displaced by goods of a similar character manufactured in the United States, and we would find, not that we lost simply the $7,300,000 which we now derive from Customs duty on imports from the United States, but also at least one-half of the Customs duties that we receive from goods imported from England. I venture to say it would be very much more than one-half, and that practically we would surrender the whole of our Customs revenue. But that is not all. We would find also that the large importing trade of Canada would be transferred from the St. Lawrence, where a great part of it is done to-day, to American ports. We would actually by this process destroy the great trade by the St. Lawrence, which, I believe, both sides in this House desire to see built up. Gentlemen may say that if our duties were somewhat lower than those of the United States, that British goods for consumption in the western States would come by the St. Lawrence. I do not think this hope would be realised. Why should ships come by the St. Lawrence, why should goods take that route and pay us large duties, and then again pay the American duties when entering the western States, when they could go to the American ports, pay duties there and be scattered through the United States, while we would receive goods of American manufacture in their place? There would be really no motive for these goods coming by the St. Lawrence at all, and thus we would destroy not only the manufacturing industries of the country, but another trade as well, which is too seldom thought of when we are dealing with the question of the trade interests of the country, and that is the great distributing trade of the country. You would find, Sir, American merchants in their great cities all along the border becoming the distributors to the retailers of the Dominion, thus verifying the statement made by prominent Americans in support of Commercial Union, that the effect would be to place American goods direct from the American warehouse into the retail stores all over the Dominion. A great injury would thus be done to the importing and distributing trade of Canada. How are we going to make up this revenue? The hon. gentleman does not seem to feel very much alarmed at direct taxation. He thinks direct taxation is more readily collected, and costs less, and is more equitable in its distribution, than the system of taxation which we now have by means of Customs duties. I will not burden this debate by a general discussion of that question, although I think I could show, and that without much difficulty, that the people who would suffer, relatively, the most from the system of direct taxation are those very poor people in whom the hon. gentleman affects to be so much interested. What did we see a short time ago in the city of Toronto, when the publication was made of the assessed incomes of a number of the wealthy people of that city? We saw that the poor man, with his income of $500 or $600 a year, was assessed to the full amount; but in regard to the millionaire with his $10,000 or $50,000 a year, no assessor would think of putting him down for that, and he was put at $5,000 or $6,000 or, perhaps, $10,000 a year. And, as with incomes, so with real property. If you go into any of our large cities, you will find that the poor man's house can be easily assessed at its full value; but, if you take the rich man's house, which has cost him $50,000 or $100,000, with its almost park-like lawns around it, you will find that it is assessed at one-third or one-fourth of its value, for no assessor would think of putting it down at its full value. That is known to every one who has watched the record of the assessment rolls. So this system of direct taxation, instead of being one which would relieve the poor of an excessive burden, would really impose upon the poor far more than their proper proportion of taxation. Under the present system, the poor man can get on practically without any taxation at all. Our taxes are largely upon luxuries. It is the wealthy, under the present system, who pay the large proportion, because it is upon the expensive goods that the larger proportion of the taxation of the country is levied, while a poor man can sit down and look over what he eats and what he wears, and see what he pays for it, and can ascertain the fact for his comfort that the taxation he pays is practically nil in this happy country of ours. Nor can we adopt the principle of Excise duties, in relation to which I think, if I read the resolution of the hon. gentleman aright, he proposes a special exception. We cannot put on extra duties of Excise, for this reason: that there is a limit beyond which you cannot go in Excise duties. You must have regard, in the imposition of these duties, particularly in this country, where for between three and four thousand miles our territory adjoins our neighbors on the other side, to the duties imposed by them and the general cost of the article in order to know what amount of Excise duty is collectable under any system you may adopt, and therefore we are restricted even in the matter of Excise duties. We would have to adopt direct taxation. No other means could possibly be adopted. Of course, there is one way in which we might reduce our expenditures to some extent.

We spend to-day some four million dollars on provincial subsidies. The hon. gentleman opposite referred to the action of the Quebec conference, the members of which, in a lapse of excessive candour, he described as his friends, correcting himself immediately afterwards; and he referred to the resolutions passed by that conference as if they were the embodiment of the wisdom of this country, as I believe they are to be the embodiment of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. But they do not contemplate a reduction in the matter of subsidies. On the contrary, the very thing which will commend them to some of the Provinces is that resolution which proposes largely to increase the subsidies. It is true that the hon. gentleman, after speaking of these resolutions as the embodiment of wisdom, said that this Commercial Union would prevent absolutely an increase of the expenses of the country, but if we are to reduce the expenditure, if we are to resort to direct taxation, I think the people of this country will at once say that it would be little less than absurd that the Dominion Government, the central authority, should impose direct taxation through the machinery of municipal government—because there is hardly any other way in which to do it—in order to distribute a portion of the proceeds back again to the Provinces. I am not going to say whether we ought to do away with provincial subsidies or not. The hon. gentleman in a former Session of Parliament, did suggest that he believed it would be for the interests of Canada if the provincial subsidies were done away with altogether. I leave him on that subject to make his account with his hon. friends on that side from the other Provinces, and I think he will find some difficulty in convincing them that that would be a wise system to adopt in Canada. So you see, by the adoption of this policy, we are to find ourselves reduced to a system of direct taxation by which we are to levy at least $15,000,000 to make up for the loss in Customs duties which the adoption of this system of so-called unrestricted reciprocity or Commercial Union would impose upon us. Now, what is Canada to gain as a return for this sacrifice, because, after all, this is a business matter, and ought to be discussed as a business proposition. What are we to gain for this sacrifice? We give up a large portion of our revenue, we sacrifice our distributing trade, we sacrifice or we risk the sacrificing of the manufacturing interests of the country. What are we to get in return for all this? Hon. gentlemen tell us we are to get an enlarged market in the United States. I suppose it is really the enlarged market which is the chief advantage proposed. The market which is to be opened in this country for our friends on the other side is their side of the subject. Our side is that we are to get an enlarged market in the United States. How do we stand in regard to that matter at present? Let us look at our exports to the United States and to Great Britain. Our exports to the United States amount to $32,273,033, and to Great Britain they amount to $38,714,331. Here are the figures as presented by the Canadian returns:

Produce of	To United States.	To Great Britain.
The mine.....	$3,085,431	$ 477,722
Fisheries.....	2,717,509	1,704,190
Forest.....	9,353,506	9,445,491
Animals.....	7,291,369	16,315,474
Agriculture.....	7,966,249	9,438,408
Manufactures.....	1,289,052	1,270,162
Miscellaneous.....	569,918	62,884
Totals.....	$32,273,033	$38,714,331

I will deal simply with the exports to United States, and if we examine the figures, we will find this result: Of the $9,353,506 worth of the products of the forest, $1,600,000 enters free under the present system, and the duty on the remaining portion is proposed to be remitted by the Tariff Bill now before Congress. Of the exports of the mine, coal amounts to about $1,252,867; gold quartz to $1,017,401; gypsum, crude, to about $165,497; copper ore, $181,010; iron ore, $71,930; stone and marble, $69,300; making the total of $2,754,009. Coal, as the hon. gentlemen know, over a million dollars worth of it, in fact nearly the whole export of coal to the United States goes from the coal fields of Vancouver Island to the markets of the United States on the Pacific coast, chiefly to San Francisco. Now, the question of duty on that might be an important matter, but I am inclined to think in that case we may accept the general view which hon. gentlemen opposite, in former controversies on the National Policy, have impressed on us, namely, that it is the consumer who pays the duty. Of the fisheries, $2,717,000, no less than $1,130,000 worth is already admitted free, so that the advantages of a free market, undoubtedly very great, may be, after all, over-estimated. Everyone who has watched the progress of the fisheries and the fishing trade during the last two years in our Maritime Provinces, knows that there has never been—I think I am within the mark in saying—there has never been in the history of the Maritime Provinces more profitable fishing than that which occurred during the last year or two. Now we find in regard to the fisheries that new markets are being opened up all the time. Here, for instance, is what the Halifax Chamber of Commerce said upon this subject on 7th March, only a few days ago:

“ Now that we have been for a time in sole possession of our fisheries, we are realising more than ever their very great value. The product of our fisheries is stated at about twenty millions of dollars. Of this great industry Nova Scotia is credited with at least one-half of the whole. While the available consuming population is rapidly increasing, a single square mile cannot be added to these productive grounds, the product of which must, in the very nature of things, continue to increase in value. Their accessibility, productiveness and extent place them before us as the most valuable in the world. The markets of the world are wide enough if properly cultivated for all we catch for export, with an ever-increasing demand. Our merchants seem fairly alive to the value of these more distant markets and each year ought to find them more capable of utilising them. Let us then be alive to the great value of this source of wealth and employment, quite satisfied, while in full possession of our own, to allow our neighbors across the line the full possession of their own, and get ready, should they come to a just and equitable view of the whole premises, to meet them in a Reciprocity Treaty of friendly commerce worthy of the two most advanced nations of the world, and members at the same time of one great family.”

Now, Sir, you will see that the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax, thoroughly familiar with the position of the fisheries, recognise that they have, under the present conditions, opportunities for the profitable employment of those fisheries, and that they look forward to them as a great source of wealth, and believe that other large markets may be opened for them, even if the United States should, unfortunately, continue the policy which they have adopted in the past. Now, of animals and their produce, we exported $7,291,369, and of these there were already free of duty $2,669,628, leaving a little over four millions and a quarter subject to duty; and the exports of the products of the farm reached $7,400,777. With a view of ascertaining the duty which we pay on our exports, I take the American trade returns, because they give the exact amount of duty paid upon the exports of Canada into that country. The imports into the United States from Canada in 1887, which were subject to duty, amounted to $15,997,113. I have taken the details of $24,000,000 of this sum; the others were very small amounts, and in the hurry I did not go into them. But upon $24,000,000 of exports, the duty paid was $4,715,464, or on the whole exports from Canada into the United States, the duty paid was about $5,000,000. Unrestricted reciprocity would remove that, so that as a mere matter of bargain, as a mere matter of profit and loss, we would receive about $5,000,000, assuming, of course, that the exporter pays the duty, that the producer pays the duty, which is rather strange doctrine, coming from hon. gentlemen opposite, in view of the discussions we have had in the past. But assuming that the producer pays the duty, we save $5,000,000, and for that we would sacrifice the duties on American goods coming into Canada, amounting to over seven millions and a quarter. It is a new doctrine that we are to give up seven and a quarter million dollars in order that we may get five millions in return. Now, Sir, it is impossible, in the discussion of this question, to avoid some reference of what is going on in the Congress of the United States. A Bill, as hon. gentlemen know, has been submitted to Congress, putting on the free list a large number of articles which are now subject to duty. The articles that would be exempt from duty, and the present extent of our exports of these articles, are as follows:—

Lumber.....	$7,829,811
Flax.....	298,079
Tin plates.....	222
Copper ore.....	188,329
Potatoes.....	329,163
Beans and peas.....	556,430
Wool.....	356,284

In all, $9,800,000 worth of exports from Canada to the United States, out of the $25,000,000 that are now paying duty, would be exempt from duties if that Bill passed. Now, the amount of the duty on the articles which would be remitted if that Bill passes, amounts to $2,778,964. As to the balance of the articles, this fact ought to be remembered, that our trade with the United States is a trade of competition and not a trade of exchange. The articles that would go into the United States are articles which are largely produced by the people of that country. When the hon. gentleman tells us that we are to give up a market of 5,000,000 for a market of 60,000,000 of people, he ought also in fairness, to tell us that we give up our market of 5,000,000 for a market of 60,000,000 which is already so fully occupied that precisely the same articles we export to them, they actually are exporting a larger amount of their surplus to other countries. No one, therefore, can say that this is a market open to us in the sense in which hon. gentlemen use that term. The distinction between competition and exchange in matters of trade cannot be too strongly emphasised. We would thus find that the balance which we would receive, supposing that the Bill now before Congress passes, from duty on the balance of the articles, would amount to $2,780,000, and for the remission of that amount the people of Canada, as I have said, are expected to give up $7,300,000. We are in addition to risk the transfer of our import trade to United States ports, we are to introduce discriminating rates against Great Britain and to disturb our entire fiscal and industrial system, for the hon. gentleman himself admits that that would be the immediate result at all events, whatever might be the ultimate result of the adoption of this principle of unrestricted reciprocity. A few words as to the question of this large market, because that, after all, is the one argument produced to induce us to accept this principle. First, as to manufactures. I am relieved considerably from the necessity of dealing with this question by the admission of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that the effect would be certainly to injure many of the manufactures of Canada. Is it in the interests of this country that we should injure those manufactures? What have the manufacturers of this country done that an injury of this kind, proposed to be inflicted on them, should be treated as a matter not only of no consequence but as a matter that actually should be received with considerable self-complacency by Parliament? True, it is said that the effect would be to induce us to do as is done in the United States, to adopt special classes of manufactures, that with the large market of 65,000,000 to supply instead of 5,000,000, manufacturers would adopt special lines, and having adopted those special lines, on the whole the manufacturing interests of this country would be promoted rather than retarded, after, of course the immediate disturbance has passed away, which the hon. gentleman admits is inevitable. But the adoption of those special lines involves a change of our manufactures altogether, the introduction of new machinery, the introduction of new capital; and I will ask any hon. gentleman whether he thinks any man would be so foolish as to invest large capital in Canada for special lines of manufactures in the hope that we might thereby get a market in the United States as well as in Canada, when by simply crossing the line he could secure for all time a market of 60,000,000 at all events, and for the time being the market of Canada as well. Remember that this reciprocity arrangement is not to be—I do not so understand it—a permanent arrangement, I mean an absolutely permanent arrangement. It will be a time treaty, and everyone knows that in a time treaty there will always be the termination of the treaty in the view of any man who is proposing to invest a single dollar in industries which may be affected by its conditions. They will look at the past. They will remember that every treaty that we have had with the United States has been denounced the very moment the terms of the treaty permitted it. More than that. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says we are still to remain an independent community on this continent, that is independent so far as political connection with the United States is concerned, and we are still to remain connected with the mother country. The hon. gentleman disavows any desire that we should separate from the mother country. There is, therefore, still the contingency which constantly must arise between nations of disagreement and rupture, and a rupture of friendly relations, as everybody knows, ends a treaty, so that the manufacturer who is going to invest his money, having regard to this market of 65,000,000, would stop to consider the contingency of a disagreement arising between the two nations, stopping trade and leaving him with all his investment he had made for a trade with 65,000,000 of people and only a market of 5,000,000 in which he could employ it. He would go, I say, to the other side of the line if he had the business capacity, the business foresight, and business enterprise which manufacturers are generally acknowledged to possess. So much for the manufacturers and for the wholesale merchants whose distributing trade would be affected by such a treaty. But we are told the farmers are the men who are going to gain largely by this treaty. We are told, and told truthfully, that they are the great majority of the people of Canada, that they are the people whose interests, if we could be shown that they were to be materially affected, ought to govern and supersede all other considerations in connection with the legislation of this Parliament. What is the fact in regard to them? Why not more than 10 per cent. of the entire products of Canada go to the United States. I hear an hon. gentleman behind me, who is thoroughly familiar with this subject, say that not more than 5 per cent. goes to the United States, but I place the quantity at 10 per cent.

Mr. WELSH. More than 20 per cent. goes.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The overwhelming proportion is consumed in Canada. I think I may fairly say that $360,000,000 worth is consumed in Canada out of some $400,000,000 worth, the entire production of the farms in Canada. So that the interests of the farmer are to be advanced, not by improving the market for his 10 per cent., but by improving the market for the overwhelming quantity he sells at home, by causing an improvement of the home market. That is the true policy with regard to the interests of the farmer in Canada. How is the home market to be improved? All will admit that it is by building up urban populations that the home market is improved to the farmer. Has that been going on during the last few years? Look at the city of Toronto. The hon. gentleman says one or two of our towns have made progress. I say that all the important towns of Canada have made progress. Take the city of Toronto, whose assessed value in six years has increased $42,000,000, and there are very few cities in the United States that can be said to have shown greater relative progress during the same time. Take the city of Montreal. Its assessed value in one single year has increased $7,500,000, and that increased assessed value represents a largely increased population, a largely increased consuming population, consuming the products of the farmers of the country. The same progress substantially, though perhaps not absolutely, may be said to have characterised all the great centres of Canada. Now, what is the condition of the farmers at this moment? The hon. gentleman has told us they are in a very desperate condition, that the cost of farm lands has gone down, that the cost of farm produce has gone down; and he proposes to increase the price of farm land and increase the cost of the various products by destroying the manufacturing interests of Canada, by compelling us to resort to direct taxation, by stopping public works of every kind, because that is part of the hon. gentleman's policy; he proposes to increase the value of farm lands and of farm products by doing this, in order that he may obtain reciprocal free trade or rather unrestricted reciprocity, with the United States. Now I will take some figures from an authority which can hardly be said to be an unfavorable authority, at any rate to hon. gentlemen opposite. The figures are given in the report of Mr. Blue. Mr. Blue, as is well known, has developed into somewhat of a politician, and he is to-day I believe, an ardent advocate of Commercial Union. Although it is none of my business, and I have no right to interfere with the officer of another Government, I am bound to say that, having regard to the fact that he is the statistician of the Government that he has to give figures and returns on those very important matters to the people of Ontario, as a whole, irrespective of politics, I think greater confidence might be reposed in him if it were not known—I do not mean to say, recollect, that he has misstated any figures—but greater confidence would be bestowed upon him if it were not known that he is interested in a movement which will be promoted by showing that the interests of the farmers are failing, and that their profits are disappearing. But I take his figures, which cannot be regarded as unfavorable figures by hon. gentlemen opposite. Ontario, according to Mr. Blue contains 22,000,000 acres of farm land occupied, of which 10,940,000 are cleared, 8,670,000 wood lands, and acreage in field crops 7,403,000, and in orchards and gardens 186,616, the remainder being occupied by barns, buildings and minor crops. The total acreage of the Province in wheat (fall and spring) was 1,464,000 in 1886, and the product that year (it was less last year), was 27,900,000 bushels. The average price of farm land according to Mr. Blue in 1886 was $29.78 per acre, and that instead of being a reduction of price was actually, according to Mr. Blue again, 22 cents per acre above the average in the years from 1882 to 1886. That is the statement made by Mr. Blue. The average value of the farm buildings was $344 per acre, and the increase of 69 cents per acre over the average of 1882 and 1886. The average value of farming implements was $2.32 per acre, or 21 cents increase over the average from 1882 to 1886. The value of the live stock was 37 cents per acre above the five years' average. I think that those figures at any rate do not show that the values in the hands of the farmers are decreasing, as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) would have led us to believe in his speech. We have here a very large increase in farm lands, buildings, stock and agricultural implements. We have on those an average increase of $1.50 an acre in 1886 over the average of the preceding five years, or an aggregate increase of $30,000,000 in the pockets of the farmers of Ontario in 1886 over the average of the previous five years. That is not by any means an evidence of that poverty of which we hear so much from hon. gentlemen opposite. But they have told us and will probably tell us that those farms are all mortgaged, that the farmers are hopelessly in debt, and that, therefore, on that account they find that the burden of paying the interest on their debt, having regard to the prices that they are now getting for their products, is a burden which is intolerable to them, although how they are going to get out of that by unrestricted reciprocity I have not yet been able to discover. I think I will be able to show before I get through that this policy would send them to the wrong market to get relief of that kind. Now, there are sixty-five loan and building societies who make reports to the Finance Department of Canada. The loans represented by these companies who report to the Finance Department represent between $80,000,000 and $85,000,000. The value of property from 1880 to 1883, according to those reports, in the Provinces of Canada, increased $32,000,000. The value of mortgages on property increased $18,000,000. Between 1883 and 1886 the value of property again increased, curiously enough, $32,000,000, while the value of mortgages on property increased $12,000,000. In 1880, the default through the non-payment of interest or principal was about 8 per cent. of the whole. In 1886 the default was reduced to four seven-tenths per cent., and in 1887 the condition of things was even better. I take two companies as an illustration, because recently they have held their meetings and have made their statements. The Canadian Company held its annual meeting in London, England, since the beginning of the present year. From the report of the remarks of the chairman I take the following:—

"The chairman referred to two facts, first, that the company had reduced their rate of interest one per cent. because other companies were offering money at reduced rates; and, secondly, that the proceeds obtained last year (1887) from the sale of lands in Canada were 25 per cent. higher than the value in December, 1886."

Those were the actual sales, forced sales I presume some of them, as well as sales not forced, but of land falling as the result of foreclosure into the hands of the loan company. The North of Scotland Canadian Mortgage Company also held its meeting since the beginning of the new year:

"The chairman referred to the falling off in interest received in 1887 on mortgages in Canada. That is explained by the fact that a very considerable number of the mortgages made three or four years ago at a higher rate of interest have fallen in and the money has been lent out at the much less rate of interest current now."

They also report:

"The amount of real estate fallen into the hands of the company through foreclosure was but £8,000 out of £800,000 the company had invested, or only about one per cent."

Yet hon. gentlemen, in the face of those facts—facts which ought to be open to them if they were anxious to say something good of the country—tell us that the farmers of Canada have nothing but ruin staring them in the face. The rate of interest has fallen within the last six years at least two per cent., or a saving to the mortgagors in the operations of loan companies of a million and a half of dollars in a year. The value of farms has increased, money is cheaper, and defaults are 70 per cent. less than five years ago. The savings of the farmers are increasing rapidly, and the loan companies are vying with each other to make loans on farm land. That is the position of things in Canada in relation to the farmers of the country. Now, hon. gentlemen tell us that the farmers will be better off if they went to the States. Happily for us, we have the record of the farmers in the States. They will be, I have no doubt, interesting. I think I can say this with perfect truth, that on the face of God's earth there are not to-day a body of men, take them on an average, who are as well to do as the farmers of Ontario at the present time. Now, Sir, I take the report for the State of New York, right alongside of us, a wealthy State, with a large urban population and great cities which can afford immediate markets for the ordinary products of the land. This report is from the Washington Department of Agriculture, and the following reference is made to the farmers in New York. It is an official report made to Congress and it says:

"On the whole farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago. There are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged which would not now sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to the depreciation of the farming lands, which on an average is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of buildings and other improvements, owing to this shrinkage."

In the United States generally the value of farm stock is declining in exact proportion to the increase in the number. The statistician of the Washington Bureau of Agriculture says:

"The decline of value in horses, mules and cattle has been in progress for two years. It averages 3 per cent. for horses and mules, 8 per cent. in cattle, 11 per cent. in sheep and 15 per cent. in swine. While numbers have increased except of sheep in two years past the aggregate valuation of farm animals is less by something over $100,000,000."

During the same two years in which in the United States there was a decrease in value of farm stock to the above amount, notwithstanding the increase in numbers, Ontario had an increase in the number, excepting sheep and swine, and in the value of the live stock on her farms, to the amount of $8,250,000. In the United States it is estimated that in ten States, including such generally reputed wealthy States as Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, &c., the total value of the farm products is $1,000,000,000, and that one-half of the farms are mortgaged. These produce $500,000,000 in value; of this $230,000,000 goes to pay interest, leaving $261,000,000 to support 886,000 farmers and their families, or $294 a year. These are the official records published at Washington for the information of the American Government and Congress, and I think they go to show that if the farmers of Canada want to improve their condition, it is not to the United States that they will have to go, because these farmers of Michigan and Illinois have all the advantages of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity—all the advantages which hon. gentlemen opposite promise to the people of Canada, if they will only accept their panacea for the ills under which we are laboring. Now, what is the condition of the farmers of Canada. I take the statement of Prof. Wm. Brown, of the Ontario Agricultural College, an institution under the control of the Local Government of Ontario. He says:

"The average farmer of the Province of Ontario is doing well, is actually making money. He has by his own admission to our statistical department during the past five years been receiving a total crop value of $1,925, say $2,000 from all sources; this is the first proof and admission doubted by no one."

So that I think, Mr. Speaker, in the face of these facts and figures, which are official on both sides of the line—from the officers of the Ontario Government, so far as Ontario is concerned, and from the officers of the American Government, so far as the United States is concerned—we may fairly say that the farmers of Canada find nothing to envy in the position of their neighbors on the other side of the line.

An hon. MEMBER. Why do they go there then?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Now, Sir, I will give the hon. gentleman an extract from a newspaper from which I have already quoted, I think the leading newspaper in the western States, the Chicago Times, in regard to the condition of the farmers in those States:

"Farm mortgages are swallowing up millions of acres of land in southern and western States and Territories. The syndicates that loan money at from 1 to 3 per cent. per month are mainly made up of Scotch, English and New England capitalists, who have their agents throughout the south and west. These mortgages are falling due, and soon an immense number of southern and western farms will be in the hands of foreign mortgagees. It is said that $200,000,000 has been loaned on farm mortgages in the south-west; in Kansas, $20,000,000, and nearly as much in Nebraska. The Territories are covered with mortgages on new farms not yet patented. In some of them the law has permitted outrageous interest, so that the farm mortgage business has grown into immense proportions. In many land districts half of the settlers borrow money at high interest to pay the small price required by the Government on proving up. This is leading to widespread disaster. The object of the pre-emption law is perverted. Eastern and foreign capitalists get the land with such improvements as the settler has put upon it. The settler loses all by reason of the exorbitant interest he is compelled to pay."

An hon. gentleman on the other side asks me why farmers leave Canada to go to the western States. One reason is precisely such speeches as we have heard to-night. The farmers of Canada, listening to the statements of the hon. gentleman, who speaks as an ex-Minister of Finance, and whose statements the public have a right to assume, at any rate, ought to be taken as exact, finding that their condition is bad, and that in the United States everything is couleur de rose, have gone, many of them, to the United States. But I know what is going on in Dakota to-day, and I tell the hon. gentlemen that as they have been compelled to realise that time has been their great enemy in the past, so they will find in the future that Canadians who have been entrapped into going to Dakota by statements made by hon. gentlemen opposite, are now beginning to come back to Canada, so that at this moment the movement of population, instead of being from the north to the south, is from the south to the north.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Tell us about Canadians who invest in Texas ranches.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman desires to insult any members of this House, perhaps if enquiries were made into some of his own investments—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have made no investments in the United States.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). We are told of this enormous passage of population from Canada to the United States. It is quite true there are Canadians in the United States, just as it is quite true that there are Americans in Canada. It is quite true that in Canada, as in the eastern States, there has been a movement of population westward. Up to quite recently we had no North-West of our own where those people could go to. They are beginning to go there now. We have in this House to-day representatives from those Territories, who I venture to say will give the hon. gentleman his answer with regard to them, probably before this debate is ended. But what is the fact with regard to the movement of population? I take the New England States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Vermont, New Hampshire, Connecticut, and Maine, and what do we find? That in 50 years the increase in the population of those States has been 2,056,309, that is from 1,953,717 to a little over 4,000,000, while in Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island, during the same period, the population has increased from 1,065,215 to 4,142,951, or an increase of 3,087,736. Canada, which started fifty years ago with a population of 1,000,000 less than that of the New England States, which, I think, hon. gentlemen will admit with me stand relatively under very much the same conditions as we do, finds itself at the end of the fifty years with a population of 140,000 more than they. Yet hon. gentlemen opposite contend that the people of this country are leaving because they cannot make a living. Now, there is another question, and that is the question of the prices which are paid for products in the two countries. Mr. Wiman, as I have said before, did my constituency the honor of visiting it on the 1st July last, and making his first speech there on Commercial Union in Canada. I regret very much I was not able to be present, not for the purpose of replying to him, but of joining with my constituents in extending to Mr. Wiman, and the distinguished American who accompanied him, a courteous welcome to the county. In that speech Mr. Wiman, speaking to the farmers, made some statements, of which we have heard the like to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford. He told the farmers of Cardwell that he knew a good many people in the city of New York, who live at the magnificent rate of millionaires, and to whom the question of what they pay for the articles they put on their tables was a matter of no consequence. For "broilers," he said, a term which I find a good many people knew nothing about, for broilers they would pay three dollars a pair, and for the finest class of butter 60 cents a pound, and so on with a number of articles, leaving the impression upon the minds of the people he was addressing that if they had only Commercial Union, they would find themselves supplying broilers to the tables of millionaires and also supplying fancy articles of butter. We have had statements of that kind to-night from the hon. member for South Oxford. Were they fair statements? Did he take the trouble before making them, to examine the prices of ordinary articles of the farm in the towns of the United States and Canada and make a comparison? I do not think he did. Now, what is the fact. After reading Mr. Wiman's speech I had the curiosity to compare the markets, on the first of July, of Buffalo and Toronto with each other; and curiously enough, as to the majority of these ordinary articles, the price was higher in Toronto, although the farmers of Albany and the surrounding district were in much closer proximity to the wealthy millionaires upon whose tables broilers, &c., were used, than were the farmers of Toronto. On the 9th of this month, taking the prices of ordinary articles upon the market of Buffalo and Toronto, I find they compare as follows:—

	TORONTO.		BUFFALO.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Oats, per bushel	0 44 to	0 45	0 39 to	0 40
Hay, per ton	14 00 to	16 00	12 00 to	14 00
Potatoes, per bag	1 00 to	1 10	0 85 to	0 90
Butter, choice, per lb	0 20 to	0 21	0 22 to	0 24
do fair to good, per lb.....	0 15 to	0 18	0 18 to	0 20
Turkeys, per lb	0 12 to	0 13	0 10 to	0 12
Chickens, per lb.....	0 12 to	0 13	0 10 to	0 12
Geese, per lb	0 10 to	0 10½	0 07 to	0 10
Apples, per brl.....	1 75 to	2 60	1 25 to	2 50
Onions, per bag	1 50 to	2 00	1 25 to	1 50
Turnips do	0 40 to	0 50	0 40 to	0 50
Carrots do	0 50 to	0 60	0 55 to	0 65

So that hon. gentlemen will see that in relation to these ordinary articles which the farmers produce and carry to the market of Buffalo on the one side and of Toronto on the other, the farmer in the vicinity of Toronto is better off on the whole, although the farmer in the vicinity of Buffalo has unrestricted reciprocity with the other parts of the American Union, although he has, in fact, Commercial Union. How do the prices in Toronto and Milwaukee compare? I have not examined the figures myself, but have taken them from the New York Witness, which, I presume, is a good authority. They compare as follows:—

	TORONTO.		MILWAUKEE.
	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.	$ cts.
Wheat.....	0 73 to	0 83½	0 60 to	0 70
Oats	0 45 to	0 47	0 32 to	0 38
Barley	0 70 to	0 82	0 60 to	0 68
Live hogs.....	5 00 to	5 80	4 60 to	4 60
Cattle.....	2 56 to	4 50	2 50 to	4 00
Eggs	0 22 to	0 30	0 17 to	0 18
Butter	0 18 to	0 25	0 18 to	0 20

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell).

These are simply the ordinary market prices paid directly to the farmer, showing one reason, I fancy, why the official statistician for the Province of Ontario can report a so much more favorable condition of affairs to farmers of that Province than the official statistics of the United States can record with reference to the farmers of the latter. I will not detain the House longer. As I said in commencing, the people of this country have always been and are still ready to enter into the freest commercial relations with our neighbors, consistent with the great policy of developing our own industries. I protest against the character of speeches such as that to which we have listened to-night. If hon. gentlemen opposite have sat on that side for ten years, they owe that fact chiefly to just such speeches as the one we have just heard from the hon. member for South Oxford. They mistake the temper of the people of Canada, they mistake the temper of the electors of this country, if they imagine that those electors will tolerate this perpetual depreciation of the country itself; and I cannot, in this sense, do better than to offer as a heritage to hon. gentlemen opposite, and through them to the country the words of a former leader of the Liberal party, a great leader, who, whatever difference of opinion may have existed as to his methods and opinions upon some questions was at least a sincere and devoted Canadian and loyalist—I allude to the late Hon. George Brown. I cannot do better in concluding my remarks than to quote his words:

A heritage, it seems to me,
Well worth our while to hold in fee.

"Neither politically nor commercially does Canada need to change her position to secure a high degree of prosperity. In all that conduces to personal comfort and happiness, in the steady development of home and foreign trade, in the extension of public enterprise, in the flourishing condition of our farmers, and in the unlimited scope for the employment of a vast population, Canada has all that a nation can desire."

Mr. DAVIES moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. McMULLEN. I should like to ask what effort the Postmaster General has made to expedite the delivery of mails. From Monday last there has not been a mail which has arrived here from west of Toronto, and this is Wednesday. Has anything been done in this matter?

Mr. McLELAN. There has been a blockade on several of the railways in consequence of the snowstorm.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am aware of that, but what I want to know is whether the Minister has made any effort to get the mails forwarded.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 15th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

COST OF RAILWAYS IN CANADA.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT asked, What is the nominal cost, as given to 1st January, 1888, of all railways in the Dominion of Canada?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have made enquiries in order to get a return to this question, but I am informed that this information can only be given to the 1st of July, 1887. The figures that are given to me to that date are as follows:—The subscribed capital is $716,970,950, and the paid up capital is $678,182,769.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The paid up capital?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the House will permit me, I rather think the hon. gentleman has been a little misinformed on that subject. It is scarcely possible that it can amount to as much, because, exclusive of paid up capital, there would be a huge charge for bonds and other matters of that kind. However, it is vastly above the figures I named, so that it does not hurt my argument. But I think the hon. gentleman will find that there has been an error in the statement. It might, probably, be as well to have it correct. I know the details myself pretty well in the railway statistics, and if the hon. gentleman will compare these details, he will see that it is scarcely within the limits of possibility that there should have been $678,000,000 of capital paid up. The total cost may have amounted to that.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I do not know. I communicated with the chief engineer of railways, Mr. Schreiber, and these are the figures he sent me yesterday.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON LABOR.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether the Government have received any complaint, whether verbal or written, respecting the conduct of the chairman or of any member of the Royal Commission on Labor, in the discharge of his official duties; and if so, what is the nature of such complaint?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman, I have to say that no complaint has been received in regard to this matter.

DEPOSITIONS TAKEN BY THE LABOR COMMISSION

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL asked, Whether the Government received from the chairman of the Royal Commission on Labor, an application for authority to furnish to parties interested duly certified copies of the depositions taken by the said Commission; and if so, what authorisation did they receive?

Mr. BOWELL. Application was made by some parties to the Commission for the evidence here mentioned. The Government declined to permit the evidence to be given to any interested party until it had been reported to the Government.

LEGAL TENDER IN GOLD.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, 1. Is it the intention of the Government to compel the banks to keep a requisite reserve—that is, a fixed percentage of circulation and deposit? 2. To abolish the present dual legal tender making American gold the sole legal tender? 3. Is the Government aware that by refusing to redeem the legal tender notes in American gold (whilst holding plenty) a grievous burden is imposed upon the community—exchange on New York being forced to a premium sufficient to recoup for the loss sustained by the remittance of British gold?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole question of banks and the banking system is now under the consideration of the Government, and I presume will also come under the consideration of the House of Commons. Hon. gentlemen know that the bank charters expire in 1890, and in the meantime the whole subject will be fully studied with a view to consider the whole question of our banking and commerce.

Mr. MITCHELL. The right hon. gentleman will notice that this enquiry refers more particularly to the action of the Government, than to the banks.

BOUNDARY BETWEEN ALASKA AND CANADA.

Mr. CHARLTON asked, Whether, in consequence of the discovery of gold on the upper waters of the Yukon River, and the growing importance of having the boundary between Alaska and the Dominion of Canada defined, steps have been taken to secure an early location of the same by joint action and agreement of the United States and Canada?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Communications have been going on between the United States and Her Majesty's Government, and also with Canada, with a view, if possible, of settling by agreement the boundary between Alaska and Canada.

COST OF THE NORTH-WEST REBELLION.

Mr. MULOCK asked, What is the total amount of money disbursed by the Government in consequence of the North-West rebellion?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the absence of the hon. Minister of Militia, I would say to the hon. gentleman that the question involves a number of accounts in several departments. If the hon. gentleman will allow it to stand as a notice for a return, the return will be brought down at once, and the same for the next question.

VENTILATION OF THE CHAMBER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that on this side of the House my hon. friend beside me, and myself in particular, are exposed to a very heavy draught. It is all fair that the Opposition should be kept in the cold shades, but I object to being kept in a draught, and I hope the Minister of Public Works, who is responsible for this building, will endeavor to take some steps so as to prevent this very serious inconvenience. It is not quite fair that a man should be required to make a long speech here with a draught striking on him.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is perfectly right, and we on this side of the House have felt the draught as well. The attention of the chief architect of the department has been called to this. He has examined the building, and some defects in the windows have been remedied; but the constant opening of the doors in the chamber and the opening of doors leading to the galleries, some of which are occasionally left open, make it very difficult not to have draughts. Of course, hon. gentlemen opposite will understand that we do not want to treat them, in that respect at all events, different from ourselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope the Minister will take the matter into his consideration, as it is a very serious annoyance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to direct attention to one feature, which is, that it is impossible to get fresh air without having a current of air when it comes in. If we put an end to draughts we will sit in a very injurious atmosphere, and while I admit that the matter is very difficult to regulate, it will be better I think to have the fresh air.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You wish to honor them drafts.

REPORT.

Civil Service List of Canada, on the 1st July, 1887, pursuant to section 59 of "The Civil Service Act."—(Mr. Chapleau.)

MESSAGE FROM HIS EXCELLENCY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANDSDOWN.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I acknowledge with thanks the loyal Address you have voted in answer to the Speech with which I opened the session.

I receive with satisfaction your assurance that your earnest and careful attention will be given to the important measures which are to be submitted for your consideration.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Ottawa, 13th March, 1888.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps, at an early date, to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Mr. Speaker, I am sure it is felt on both sides of the House that no question of more importance could engage its attention at the present time than that embodied in the resolution submitted by my hon. friend for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). It is a matter of deep regret that upon the present occasion above all others the hon. Minister of Finance is unable, through sickness, to take part in our deliberations. It would have been to those on this side of the House a great pleasure to have heard him in reply to the speech which was delivered by the mover of this resolution. Whether he would have taken the course that the gentleman who took his place adopted or not, I am not prepared to say; but his intimate knowledge of public affairs, his special knowledge of the wants of the Maritime Provinces of this Dominion, and the knowledge he has gained while acting as one of Her Majesty's plenipotentiaries in the late Fisheries conference, would, I am sure, have qualified him to have grappled with the very large and important question before us in a manner in which I may say, without any disrespect to the hon. gentleman opposite, he failed to do. Sir, the hon. gentleman who opened the debate opened it in a speech which I think is admitted on all sides to have been equal to the occasion. He recognised not only the importance but the gravity of the issues which were contained in the resolution he submitted, and I think it will be admitted that for power, ability and eloquence this House has seldom listened to a more able exposition of the commercial relations of Canada and other countries. I do not think that the hon. gentleman, who replied to the hon. member for South Oxford, did fully appreciate the arguments which were advanced by the mover. It struck me that the hon. gentleman delivered a speech which had been prepared for a different occasion. He seemed to me for a long time to be barking up the wrong tree; he seemed, either wilfully or otherwise, not to have recognised the proposition submitted in the resolution, which is in writing and which seems to be very clear and unambiguous, and the hon. gentleman discussed at great length a proposition for Commercial Union and advanced certain objections to that proposition which to his mind seemed to be insuperable. I should like to know whether the hon. Minister of Finance, if he had been here, would have endorsed the line of argument taken by the hon. gentleman. I am not so sure that the Premier himself, before this debate is over, will be prepared thoroughly to endorse that line of argument. If he does he will have to go back upon his past record in some respects, to go back on it very seriously; and I am rather inclined to think that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) went further, perhaps, than his brief warranted. He started out with the assertion that the resolution embodied a new panacea for the solution of Canada's difficulties. He endeavored to lead the House to believe that the advocacy of freer and better and larger commercial relations with the United States was a new plank in the platform of the Liberal party, forgetting that so long as that party has been a party the desire to obtain freer, better and wider commercial relations with the United States has been one of the principal planks in its platform. Why, he surely could not have remembered that when my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was Premier, negotiations were entered into between his Government and that of the United States, which resulted in a draft treaty being agreed to for enlarged commercial relations with that country, not confined to the natural products of the country, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) would like our treaties to be confined, but extending far and beyond that, and embracing in addition to our natural productions a large number of manufactured articles. Does he forget, too, that in the years 1884 and 1885 the Liberal party proposed in this House a resolution on each occasion, asking the endorsement of the House to the proposition that it was the duty of the Government for the time being to move in the direction of obtaining extended trade relations with the United States? Does he forget on that occasion, the last occasion, that the resolution declared that:

"In view of the early termination of the fisheries articles of the Treaty of Washington, this House is of opinion the negotiations should be opened with the United States of America, as well as for the renewal of reciprocal privileges accorded by that treaty to American citizens and British subjects respectively, as for the opening up of additional reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States; and that in the conduct of negotiations, Canada should be directly represented."

In the face of these propositions how can the hon. gentleman have the hardihood to assert that the proposition now before the House, submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford, is a new proposition and affords a new panacea for the difficulties of Canada? The hon. gentleman referred at some length, at undue and unnecessary length I think, to the speech delivered by Mr. Blake at Malvern, a year ago, and he started out with a declaration that that speech did not lay down any platform such as that which we have embodied in the resolution here. But before the hon. member finished his quotation he was obliged to read the words, "that one of the planks in the platform of the Liberal party was to obtain reciprocal trade with the United States of America." The hon. gentleman objected that Mr. Blake, upon that occasion, did not enlarge upon that plank; did not treat his hearers to three or four pages of arguments in favor of it; but Mr. Blake was then laying down what the platform of the Liberal party was, and it would take, I think, even an abler and more eloquent gentleman than Mr. Blake to exhaust all the arguments in favor of the numerous propositions which he was advancing on behalf of the Liberal party and which he thought the country ought to accept. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman went further. He fairly glorified in the fact that on that occasion Mr. Blake admitted that such had been the extravagance of the Government which had charge of the administration of affairs in this country for the last eight or ten years, and such were the permanent heavy charges that they have added on to Canada, that the taxation and the expenditure now had to be kept up to a very much larger sum than they ought to be, and much beyond what the Liberal party had hoped to reduce them. He gloried in that fact, Sir. He, a Minister of the Crown, knew that the expenditure and the taxation had been increased by the political party to which he gave in his adhesion, and that he was one of those who had, by their reckless extravagance, increased the taxation by a sum nearly up to $11,000,000, bringing the affairs of this country to such a pass that the fixed expenditure was such that Mr. Blake was not able to promise as much reduction in the tariff as he would like to have promised. The hon. gentleman gloried in that state of affairs, and said that this showed that the Reform party had gone back on their free trade principles. It shows nothing of the kind. The Reform party have not gone back on their desire for free trade principles, or on their desire to extend to Canada those free trade principles as far as it is possible to extend them. But the Reform party cannot ignore the fact that eight or ten years of reckless misgovernment and extravagance have landed this country in such a financial state that it was impossible to apply free trade principles as fully, and as freely, and as strongly as they would like to do. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, in his speech—which I may say was more remarkable for its omissions than for what it did contain—did not grapple or attempt to grapple with the statesmanlike propositions which had been advanced by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman in proposing his motion did not seek to hide the fact that the new departure, if accepted, would be surrounded with a great many difficulties. We know, Sir, that you cannot have a change in our foreign trade relations, to the large extent that is proposed here, without that change largely affecting our internal commerce and traffic. This, no doubt, would involve us in a great many difficulties; but, Sir, it is the duty of statesmen to meet those difficulties, and my hon. friend, I think, laid down the lines on which he would proceed, and he argued at great length, taking up each difficulty, one after the other, and showed how they could be met. I did not hear the hon. the Minister of Interior attempt to answer any of those arguments. I did not hear him reply to the facts upon which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) based his proposition. Let me recall the attention of the House to a few of those facts. I will not detain the House very long, nor enlarge upon them. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made the assertion here—with all the experience he had gained as a former Finance Minister, and in connection with the responsible position which he holds as financial critic of this side of the House—that if the policy pursued by the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) when in power had been pursued to this day, there would be at least a saving of $10,000,000 in the taxation of the country, and instead of the pitiful increase we have of 40,000 people in Manitoba and the North-West, that country which we looked to a few years ago as the salvation almost of this Dominion, there would be at least half a million people there to-day. Did the Minister of Interior attempt to deny any one of those propositions? He did not. A reference to the Public Accounts will show that to-day the taxation of this country is eleven or twelve million dollars more than it was when Mr. Mackenzie went out of power; and the hon. gentleman knows by the returns which he and his colleagues have brought down that, so far from there being one tithe or one-twentieth of the number of people in the North-West that they predicted there would be there, there is a pitiful 40,000 of an increase in population since Mr. Mackenzie went out of power. That statement was one deserving of serious attention. If the statement is based on truth it requires an answer, if it is true and the remedy which the hon. gentleman proposes under the circumstances which now exist is not a correct one, the hon. the Minister of the Interior himself ought to have proposed some other remedy. But what is the remedy he proposed? And after a two hours' speech he has no remedy at all. The policy of increasing taxation and extravagance is to go on year after year until, Sir, in the near future, when the people's backs can bear the burden no longer, some constitutional or unconstitutional change must take place to give them relief. Then, Sir, there was another statement of fact which the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) brought to the notice of the House. He had mentioned it before, but it is an important fact and will bear repetition again. It was that between 1881 and 1886, while we had spent $2,000,000 in bringing emigrants into this country, and while we have brought 477,000 emigrants here, there were but 25,000 of those settlers in the North-West and Manitoba, and that 452,000 of the immigrants brought into this country, at a very large expense to the public exchequer, had left this country after they came here. Why did they leave? The hon. gentleman knows, and his colleagues know, that those emigrants came to a country as fine as the sun shines upon. Whether you go to the Maritime Provinces, possessing the richest fisheries in the world, mines which cannot be surpassed in any part of the world, agricultural lands capable of feeding thousands and hundreds of thousands more people than at present occupy them, whether he goes to the fertile region of Ontario, the valley of the St. Lawrence, or the great, rich plains of the North-West, he must see that in Canada we have natural advantages which cannot be surpassed by any country on this side of the Atlantic. And when he was asked to say why the hundreds of thousands of people brought here at the public expense, after they had come and surveyed the land, had left the country and joined a foreign power, the hon. gentleman was silent and passed it by without comment. Perhaps he was discreet, Sir, perhaps he would have had to acknowledge that the extravagance and the taxation which now bears so heavily on the people of this country had frightened them away; and the only answer he could give was the pitiful, childish answer that those immigrants—whom I will undertake to say not one in a thousand has ever read a political speech—were frightened out of the country through remarks made from hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. Sir, it is true that the Government, some years ago, when they paid a large sum of money for some wonderful books to circulate among the emigrants who came into this country, circulated books printed in English among Germans and people of other nationalities who could not speak the English language. I do not think, Sir, that they ever took the trouble to submit to any of those foreign immigrants, the speeches of my hon. friend, which was said to be so lugubrious, amongst people whom I undertake to say could not read English at all. What took them away? Was it because the country was not as good a country as they were led to believe? The hon. gentleman knows it is not so. It was not because our country did not possess the advantages which they expected to find when they came here; but it was because the country has been cursed with an extravagant, and I will say it, a corrupt Government—a Government that has not sought primarily to develop the North-West so much as it has sought, by reckless and extravagant expenditure, to maintain itself in power and to line the pockets of its hangers-on. The hon. gentleman, Sir, did not grapple with the statement made with reference to the debt and taxation of this country, as compared with the debt and taxation of the country south of us. We know that if immigrants come to this country, whether the hard-headed canny Scotch from Scotland, or shrewd Irish or English people, and begin to compare its advantages with those of the neighboring country, they will at once see that Canada possesses a great many natural advantages over the United States; but, Sir, if they find that while we have been rolling up our debt and taxation at a rate unparalleled in the history of any British colony, the people to the south have been reducing theirs in an inverse ratio, I think those shrewd people will say: We prefer going to the country that is reducing its expenditure and taxation rather than to a new country which is rolling up both at the rate Canada is. We learn that, twenty years ago, our debt per head was not one-third of the debt per head of the United States, whereas today it is two and a-half times as great, and that at the same period our necessary taxation was one-third that of the United States, whereas to-day it is 50 per cent. higher than theirs. If these are not facts, and if the hon. member for South Oxford overstated them in any way, then it was the duty of the hon. gentleman who replied to him to deny their truthfulness or expose the exaggeration. But the hon. gentleman gave no answer because he knew he could not give it; he gave no answer because he could not question the accuracy of the facts stated. Now, Sir, the hon. member for South Oxford stated as a reason why we should seek to extend our commercial relations with other countries, that we had attempted to build up a large inter-provincial trade, and that this attempt, although it may have been conceived with the best motives, had not been successful. He stated why, but he did not give all the reasons. We have built an Intercolonial Railway at a cost of nearly $50,000,000; we have tried to build up an inter-provincial commerce between the Maritime Provinces and Ontario, and between Ontario and the great West, and yet, after spending many millions of dollars, our attempt has been a comparative failure; and why? For one reason, that the circumstances of the different Provinces are such that there never can be a very large inter-provincial trade between them. The natural market of the group of Provinces, known as the Maritime Provinces, lies to the south of them in the New England States; and you may attempt to fight against geography, you may build all the railroads you like, but the results of a practical experience of twenty years have shown that while you may dam back the trade a little, and prevent the people of the Maritime Provinces from trading with the people with whom they ought to have natural trade relations, you cannot force their trade into an unnatural channel. Have you succeeded in your attempt to do so? What trade is there to-day between the Maritime Provinces and the upper Provinces of the Dominion? How much oats, how much fish, how much of any of the natural products of the soil, or of the mine, or of the forest, do we send you? You carry the products of the mine almost for nothing over the Intercolonial Railway, in order to force this trade, but the result is that your Intercolonial Railway at the present time is sinking in working expenses, and outside of interest, on its cost, $300,000 or $400,000 a year. Then, Sir, the hon. gentlemen say, in reply to the statement, that the people are leaving the Maritime Provinces in large numbers every year: Ob, yes, but the people are going west. Well, Sir, we had the statement made yesterday that this is not the fact. The census returns are examined, and we find that there are, practically speaking, none of the Maritime people in the Province of Ontario, or in the Province of Quebec, and a very few in the Province of Manitoba. Where have they gone, then? To a country which hon. gentlemen term a foreign country—to the United States of America; and while the exodus from the eastern part of British North America has been to a foreign country, the people who leave the New England States go to the western States and remain in their own country. In Canada, owing to the want of the freer trade relations that we ought to possess, our people are driven, not to our own western prairies, where they might and would go, but to the south of the line. Do you suppose

if the people of Manitoba and the North-West Territories had not been hampered as they have been with the unnatural trade restrictions which you have placed upon them preventing them dealing with those who are their natural neighbors, and who are prepared to deal with them—to buy what they have to sell and to sell to them what they want to buy—do you suppose the country would not have been filled up with the hardy yeomen of the Maritime Provinces who have gone west during the past few years? These men do not leave British North America because they are disloyal to the flag. They are loyal to the flag, and they would prefer to live in Canada under their Sovereign if they were allowed to remain; but in order to build up monopolies, to enrich colonisation companies, to fill the pockets of political favorites, to make rich a few favorite manufacturers who contribute to your election funds—in order to do this, you place a damper on the trade relations that ought to exist between this country and the United States; and the result is that those people, not being able to find a place in this country where they could farm successfully and live, are driven across the border. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman did not grapple with any of those statements. This is a very large question, and there are very many points which a gentleman speaking on the Government side might be pardoned for overlooking; but there was a point mentioned by the hon. member for South Oxford which, I think, ought to have challenged a moment's attention from the hon. member for Cardwell. Why, Sir, he mentioned a fact, which has been repeated to-day, that over $300,000,000 has been locked up in railroads in this country. We have spent money with a lavish hand—public moneys which we have voted, and private moneys which have been invested—in railway enterprises in this country; and all for what? To give us better means of communication, for carrying away the surplus products of the land; and after you have built your railways at such an enormous cost, you place a barrier at the border, so that the trade may not be carried to the people who want to buy it. A more insane policy was never conceived. What has the hon. gentleman to say in reply to the natural demand which has gone up from every section of this country—from the farmers, the fishermen, the miners and all the producing classes of the country—for freer trade relations? The answer of the hon. gentleman to-day is the answer he gave this House and this country when I had the honor of first sitting in this House some years ago. He says we have placed our policy on the Statute-book; the people know, he says, we have made a statutory offer of exchange in natural products with the United States. Why, we know that statutory offer is a farce, and the hon. gentleman knows it was a farce and a blind from the day it was made. How many years has it been on the Statute-book? It has been there ever since the introduction of the National Policy. Has it ever evoked a responsive offer from the other side of the line? Never. The hon. gentleman talks of our offer to export to the United States all our natural products in return for the privilege of purchasing all their natural products. And what do we ever purchase of their products? Outside of the article of Indian corn, we purchase scarcely anything at all. The hon. gentleman knows, and his Government know, that they are merely playing with this question, when they tell the people they are willing to establish restricted reciprocity in the natural products of the two countries. I say there is no reciprocity in that offer. The hon. gentleman evaded the principle set down in the resolution; he set up a man of straw and then proceeded to knock him down. He discussed the question of Commercial Union at very great length. I was not aware that the question of Commercial Union was embodied in this resolution before the House. That question may come up for discussion in this House, and the speech which the hon. gentleman fired off at half-cock may then be appropriate, but it was utterly irrelevant on this occasion, and no answer to the proposition laid down or the arguments advanced in support of that proposition by my hon. friend for South Oxford. The policy of the Liberal party, the policy agreed upon and formulated by the hon. member for South Oxford, is contained in that resolution, and that is not the policy advocated at present by Mr. Erastus Wiman, and which the hon. gentleman took such pains to answer yesterday. The policy of Mr. Wiman is not the policy which is propounded here, and the hon. gentleman therefore wasted, in discussing it, a large part of the time of this House that he might profitably have employed in answering the arguments submitted on this side, were he able to do so. He declared that the resolution implied and involved the raising of our tariff as high as that of the United States. When and where did he learn that? It is not in the resolution; it was not declared to be his policy by the hon. gentleman who moved the resolution; it cannot be deduced from anything contained in that resolution. It is not the fact. The policy of unrestricted reciprocity does not imply at all that the tariff of this country, as against the world, shall be raised up to the tariff of the United States. The tariff of this country, if unrestricted reciprocity were carried to-morrow, would be just as this Parliament, which would retain supreme control over it, would choose to adopt. Therefore, when the hon. gentleman started out on his argument with the statement that unrestricted reciprocity involved the assimilation of our tariff with that of the United States, he made a statement which neither the resolution nor the argument advanced in support of the resolution justified. Then the hon. gentleman stated further that this proposition was going to destroy the trade of the St. Lawrence. Why will it destroy the trade of the St. Lawrence? If our tariff remains as it is to-day and the tariff of the United States remains as it is to-day, will not the trade, not only of Canada but the trade of the great western country belonging to the United States, naturally flow by the St. Lawrence. Will not the productions of that great western country flow from there down the St. Lawrence? What will restrict it? What will hamper it? Is not the St. Lawrence the natural channel which Providence intended for the traffic to and from that great western country. The hon. gentleman well knows it is, and therefore to make the bald assertion, without a single vestige of proof to support it, that our proposition will have the effect of destroying the trade of the St. Lawrence, is utterly absurd. But the hon. gentleman stated that we were a happy country, and that if there was one part of the National Policy of which he was more proud than another, it was that which related to the incidence of taxation. In this country, he said, under this unrestricted reciprocity policy, there must be direct taxation. That was also a bugbear of the hon. gentleman's own imagination; that was also a man of straw of his own making. That does not at all necessarily follow our proposition. It was not propounded as part of the policy necessarily by my hon. friend from South Huron. And it does not follow it must necessarily take place. But, he says, if there was one part of the policy he approved of, it was that part of the National Policy by which the incidence of taxation bear almost entirely upon the rich and not upon the poor. Why, the hon. gentleman knows—no man knows better—that the evil underlying the National Policy is that it bears more heavily upon the poor than upon the rich man. The specific duties upon articles imported bear more heavily upon the coarse articles consumed by the poor than upon the fine articles consumed by the rich. If the hon. gentleman will take the articles which enter into the necessary consumption of the ordinary workingman, say a man whose income amounts to $400 per year, and making first allowance for clothing, boots and shoes, he will find that for sugar, for groceries, for crockery and the little miscellaneous articles alone, the workingman, whose income is $400, pays not less than $35 to the revenue upon it.

Mr. BERGIN. Name the articles.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)—

Clothing	$16 50
Boots and shoes	4 50
Stoves	1 40
Sugar	5 00
Other groceries	2 80
Tools, crockery and miscellaneous	4 09
	$34 00

Let the hon. gentleman take the articles, and he will find it is true. When a poor man pays at that rate on the necessaries of life, for an hon. Minister of the experience of the hon. member for Cardwell to stand up in this House and say that a poor man's taxation is practically nil, is to insult the intelligence of this House and the country. But there is more than that. If the National Policy was intended to have, and if it has any effect at all, it should operate to exclude from this country those manufactures which, the hon. gentleman said, can be made in it. Therefore, the poor man, if he does not directly pay to the national exchequer, pays into the pockets of the manufacturers, and the latter have taken the best possible means of establishing that he shall pay to the uttermost farthing. We hear of combines made in every branch of manufacture which is protected by this National Policy. To-day we have these manufacturers combining in all branches of trade—for what? To mulct the poor man still more. But the hon. gentleman reached the climax when he came to speak with reference to what he called the doleful wail set up by the hon. member for South Oxford. It appears to me that these hon. gentlemen, or a few of them, believe it is the duty of a representative of the people to hide and cover up the truth. I contend, on the contrary, that it is the duty of a representative of the people to discover the truth, to lay bare the grievance, in order that he may discover and propose a remedy for the grievance, and I say that he is no loyal man to the people or to the country who desires to hide the grievances or the evils under which the country labors. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) pointed out that for the last few years there had been a wonderful depression in the agricultural interests of this country; that in this young country, whose agricultural prosperity ought to proceed, not by slow degrees but by leaps and bounds as it did years ago, the agricultural industry appeared now to be stricken by paralysis, and that stagnation appeared to be the order of the day; that, while a few years ago our agricultural population were able to increase their wealth to a marvellous degree, to lay the wheels of progress have been turned backwards, and we are retrograding rather than progressing. The hon. member, for Cardwell (Mr. White) replied to the hon. member, and, with that jaunty air which he assumes when he wants the House to imagine that he knows everything on every subject, he said the House need not be alarmed, that all this was wrong, and this new Daniel who had come to judgment said he had in his hands the proof of the position he took. He said that if there was one thing which he admitted, it was the truth of the statistics prepared by his friend, Mr. Blue, of Ontario, and he commended the enterprise of the Ontario Government in the preparation of those statistics, and he said, I am going to destroy the Goliath of the other side with a single stone from my sling, I, the young David of the House. How did he do that? He asked us to place, as he said he was prepared to place, the most implicit confidence in the statistics of Mr. Blue. He told us they showed that it was not true that Canada was not progressing, and that he would show from those statistics that, during a certain number of years which he mentioned, the agricultural wealth of Ontario had developed, and he rolled it under his tongue as a sweet morsel, to the extent of some thirty millions of dollars, and he asked us to fall down and worship the system which had produced such results. The hon. gentleman has acquired, perhaps from his having been a writer upon the daily press, a habit of jumping too hastily to hastily formed conclusions. He takes a bird's-eye view of certain statistics in the same way as he would if he were writing an article for the Montreal Gazette. But let us take the very statistics the hon. gentleman has referred to. I am prepared for the nonce to assume that they are accurate, and that they point out correctly the relative increase in the agricultural wealth of the Province of Ontario during the time when my hon. friend from East York presided over the destinies of this country, and when the policy promoted by him and the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was in force, and I am willing to compare that with the time during which the Government of which the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), who has his panacea for all the evils of the country, has been in power. What do I find by this blue-book which he vouches for?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yellow book.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yellow book, if you like. What do I find from this yellow book? What do I find as the result of the stone which he has picked out of it and slung to destroy the effect of the speech of the Goliath opposite to him? We find that in the year 1873, when the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) took charge of the administration of affairs in this country, the average value of real estate in Ontario amounted to $10.02 per acre. I ask, as a favor, the attention of my hon. friend the member for Cardwell to this statement. In the year 1873 the average acreable value of land in the rural district of Ontario was $10.02 per acre. I find that under the system of economy and prudence in the management of affairs, and keeping down the taxes of the country, and developing the resources of the country, practiced by the Government of that day, the value of real estate in the rural districts rose until, in 1878, it had reached the enormous sum of $18.14 per acre. Does the hon. gentleman know what that means? It means that in that period of time, about five years, the increase in value of the rural lands in the Province of Ontario amounted to $160,000,000. There are about 20,000,000 acres of land in Ontario, and, according to the statements contained in this book to which the hon. gentleman gives his adhesion, the increase has been that which I have stated, which cannot be paralleled in the history of any country on this side of the Atlantic. It is a record of which the Government of Ontario ought to be proud, and of which any Government which had the direction of the affairs of the country would have a right to be proud. Then we had the National Policy brought into operation, putting taxes on all the consumers. While the value was $18.14 per acre in 1878, nearly eight years ago, and in 1885, the last year I find recorded in this book which the hon. gentleman presents to the House as being undoubtedly true, I find that the acreable value had only gone up to $19.71, or an increase per acre of $1.57 in the seven years as against an increase of $8.12 per acre in the previous five years. There you see that $1.57 per acre represents the wonderful increase of $30,000,000 that the hon. gentleman speaks of, while $160,000,000 of increase took place in the five years when Mr. Mackenzie was in power. The hon. gentleman can take his pencil and see how much the ratio per cent. under the old régime was over the increase under the National Policy. I think it is just about 700 per cent., or that as nearly as possible. I have not a blackboard on which to make the calculation accurately, but if I am wrong he can correct it. I say that, in that statement, I have given an answer to the hour-and-a-half speech of the hon. gentleman. The statements which have been made from time to time by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, as to the lamentable fact that progress has been stayed by this policy in the greatest Province in this Dominion, are proved by the figures for the accuracy of which he himself has vouched; but, if that is the case in the Province of Ontario, it is ten times more the case in the Province, or in the part of the Dominion from which I come. Go back to 1873 or to a few years before that, and, as we have no statistics which reduce the question to a certainty of mathematical accuracy as we have here, I will appeal to the knowledge of fact possessed by every man from the Province from which I come, and from the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and what do they tell you? What will they tell you? Will they tell you that the agricultural interests have become wealthy during the past eight or nine years under the ægis and protection of the National Policy? Oh, no! Our agricultural industry is depressed, our farmers are living without hope; our young men, the bone and sinew of the country—

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

An hon. MEMBER. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman who says "no" must be speaking without any practical knowledge whatever. I think he comes from the Province of Nova Scotia. I can take him through county after county of Cape Breton from which the young men have fled, as from a plague, almost. I can take him to the Province of Prince Edward Island, and he will go through large districts where the young men, who ought to have remained at home to till the soil, and enrich the community, and make new homes for themselves, have abandoned that land and gone off to the United States; and I tell the hon. gentleman, that if it had not been for the returns of their earnings which these young men make yearly to their parents and their friends, the sad tale, as it stands to-day, would be ten times worse. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman wanted to show, to confirm his argument, that things are not so bad in Ontario as gentlemen on this side of the House have stated. I am not acquainted, personally, with the actual condition of affairs in Ontario, but I am acquainted with them in the Maritime Provinces. I give you my version; the deductions I draw from what I have seen, and know, and felt, and I give you from the blue-book the truth of what takes place there. The hon. gentleman says: "I will prove to you, from statistics of the United States, that the farmers are much more heavily mortgaged there than they are in Ontario; that the condition of the Ontario farmer, in respect to mortgages, is not half so bad as in some parts of the United States; that the exodus from Ontario is not so bad as it is from some of the States." How does he do it? The hon. gentleman takes the loan companies of Ontario and the lists of their mortgages, and he assumes that they form a fair statement of the mortgage debt upon the farms of Ontario. Well, I am informed by those who are conversant with the facts, that in a number of the largest counties of Ontario, the company's mortgage list does not show one-tenth of the mortgages that really exist upon the farms of the country. But with regard to the exodus question and the increase of agricultural wealth, with what States does the hon. gentleman compare the great Province of Ontario? He takes the State of Vermont and the State of New Hampshire, and one or two other States, that do not possess one-tenth of the fertility, that do not possess one-tenth of the natural resources of the great and rich Province of Ontario—not one-hundredth, as an hon. friend beside me says—the sterile, rocky districts of Vermont and New Hampshire, and he says that they have only progressed in a certain ratio, and if Ontario has kept up, she ought to be satisfied. Sir, is that the way for an hon. gentleman to talk who wants to hold up his country properly in the eyes of the world? He could not use more depreciatory language than to compare Ontario and New Hampshire, or the progress of Vermont and New Hampshire, with the progress of Ontario, or even of the Maritime Provinces. The natural resources of those States are not one-twentieth as great; and, therefore, while it is perfectly natural that young men should go from the rocks and the poor soil of Vermont and New Hampshire, to the richer soil of the western country, it is unnatural, and it is wrong, and it is owing to man's bad fiscal regulations, that the young men are driven from Ontario. What is natural in one case is artificial and unnatural in the other. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have referred to the hon. gentleman's speech at greater length, perhaps, than its importance justifies; but I think I have been enabled to show that one or two, at any rate, of his main propositions are utterly untenable. Now, I want to call the attention of the House for a very short time to the record of the Trade and Navigation Returns of this country, to ascertain whether the people should be satisfied with the continuance of the existing state of affairs. Is it true, or is it not true, that the people are satisfied? Is it true, or is it not true, that the people of the Maritime Provinces, or the people of Quebec, or the people of Ontario, or the people of the North-West, are satisfied that the present state of affairs should continue? The hon. member for Cardwell says they are. He says, I have nothing to offer you, we must go on as we are going, doubling the taxation, doubling the expenditure in so many years. We must depend on our own resources, and keep the present Government in power, and adopt no new-fangled schemes for the relief of the great mass of the people. There are just one or two prominent facts that I want to notice. I am aware they have been noticed before, but they are so important, in my opinion, that they will bear repeating. Sir, we were told a few years ago that there were few countries on the face of the globe that were increasing in prosperity in the same ratio as Canada; we were told that the best index to that increase of prosperity was to be found in our navigation returns; that a country which from year to year added tens of thousands to its exports, and consequently tens of thousands to its wealth, was an improving country, a country that would afford a welcome asylum to the over-taxed and over-burdened people of other parts of the world. Sir, it is true that for years and years the export trade of Canada did increase largely, did go up by leaps and bounds; but what do we find to-day under the blighting influence of the National Policy? Has that increase continued? Has our reasonable expectations in that regard been realised? In the year 1873, the exports of this country reached the sum of $39,789,000; in the year 1887 we find it stationary, hardly a dollar of increase in the surplus exports of our products—$39,000,000 in 1873, and $39,000,000 only in 1887. I say that fact, bold and bald as it is, ought to open our eyes, and calls for more serious treatment than it has received at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite. It shows us that our affairs are not in the satisfactory condition they would lead us to believe. It shows us we must find some remedy other than that we now possess. What have we been doing during all this time? Why have we reason to expect that our surplus products for export should be largely increased? Not only because of the richness of our soil, not only because of the inexhaustible nature of our fisheries, and our mines, and our forests, but because we have been borrowing, for a number of years past, largely in the money markets of the world, and bringing millions of dollars here and spending them in developing the resources of the country. This policy of rapid construction of railways, of rapid construction of public works, and the expenditure of millions of borrowed money, has gone on from year to year, and it has circulated an enormous amount of money among the people, and has created in some places an apparent prosperity. But this expenditure is about ceasing now.

We have danced right merrily and now we must pay the piper. I think the more prudent on the Government side have long ago come to the conclusion that we cannot go on borrowing as we have done in the past, unless we can show that our wealth is increasing in such a degree as to justify us in believing we will be fairly able to bear the burdens which increased borrowing places upon us. Let us look at our great wealth producing interests and see how we can develop and promote them. The hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) stated, in his address yesterday, that we should not be so concerned about foreign markets. He said: You must remember that after all is said and done, the home market is the great market for the people; he said that while the value of our whole products reached $100,000,000—I think those are the correct figures, although I am only speaking from memory—only about 10 per cent. of the products were exported. Assuming his statement to be true, does it at all follow from it that the foreign market which purchases the $10,000,000 of surplus products we export is not of vital importance to us? Why, the hon. gentleman ought to know, the hon. gentleman does know, I venture to say—if he does not he has not learned one of the elementary principles of political economy—that it is the foreign market which controls the price we get for our products. Sir, if you want to know the price of oats, or wheat, or any of the products, a surplus of which we send abroad, you must look at the foreign markets which determine the price. It is the English market that determines the price of oats and the price of wheat, and, in fact, it is the market abroad which receives the surplus that determines the price of our products at home. The hon. gentleman knows that, and, therefore, the price we obtain for the portion of our products we consume depends on the foreign market. The quantity we keep at home and sell in the home market is regulated entirely by the price we get abroad, and the price we get abroad is, therefore, of vital importance. Now, let us compare the exports of to-day; and what do we find them to be? We find that out of total exports of $80,000,000 from this country, there were $3,805,000 products of the soil, $6,875,000 of the fisheries, $20,484,000 of the forest, $21,247,000 animals and their products, $3,000,000 odd for manufactures, and $644,000 for miscellaneous, which, together with short returns of exports to the United States from our inland towns, makes a total of $80,000,000. What fact does this convey to any thinking man? Compare the wonderful amount of exports of surplus products from the farm, from the forest, from the fisheries and from the mines, with the tawdry and paltry amount of manufactures we export, and then you can judge of the real relative importance of those industries to our people. A paltry $3,000,000 worth of manufactures are exported from Canada, a sum less by hundreds of thousands than we exported from the country before the National Policy ever was introduced; and yet we are asked to sacrifice the interests of the people, who produce and export $75,000,000 worth of products, in order to bolster and build up and make wealthy that class which exported $3,000,000 worth. I hold that the farming community and those interested in the lumber interest, and the other interests I have mentioned, deserve more serious attention at the hands of this Parliament than the handful of people who are engaged in manufactures here, of which they export only $3,000,000 worth. We cannot consume these products. Those $80,000,000 worth of products we export we cannot consume here, that is evident. We must have a market for those products. You have developed as far as you can our trade by building the Intercolonial and other railways. You have endeavored to force on the Maritime Provinces as much of your surplus products as you can. You have forced upon the Province of Quebec all the coal from the Maritime Provinces you can force by carrying it almost for nothing. You have forced trade wherever possible, and after all is said and done you have $77,000,000 worth of the products of the mine, forest, land and sea to export abroad. Now, where does it go? We find there are two great countries which consume the large proportion of it. We can almost put out of sight, in considering this question, those other countries of the world which, a few years ago, some of the statesmen supposed would become great purchasers of our surplus products. We find that Great Britain took $38,000,000 of our surplus products, and the United States took $35,000,000 worth. So, then, it is to those two countries that we must look for the sale of those products. Let us analyse just a little further those surplus products and find where they go. We find that of the products of the mine, of the value of $3,800,000, the United States took over $3,000,000 worth. It is true you have restricted the trade as much as possible. It is true that by building up barriers on this side and maintaining barriers on that, the statesmen of both countries have prevented the trade from reaching one-half of what it might have been; but even to-day, with all the restrictions, with all that men can do to stop the flow of traffic between the two countries, the surplus products of the mine are practically purchased by our neighbors in the great American Republic. So it is with regard to our fisheries. Of a total value of $6,800,000 exported, the United States took nearly $3,000,000 worth; and be it remembered that is the only market to which we are able to send those $3,000,000 worth of products. We have no other market in the world for our mackerel except the United States, and we have no other market for our fresh fish. That is our market and our sole market, and it is well known to all who have studied the question, that you are hampering and destroying, as far as it is in the power of man to do, those great industries to which I have referred, by unnatural restrictions. Why, Sir, of the exports of our forests the United States takes $9,000,000; of animals and their products, $7,291,000; agricultural products outside of that, $7,966,248; and manufactures, $1,250,000. Therefore, without wearying the House and going into some details—details which have been given by my hon. friend, but which I have looked up and which are unnecessary to repeat—we find, Sir, that to the south of us lies one country which, next to Great Britain, takes all the surplus products we have to sell. Now, Sir, the question is whether it is desirable or whether it is not desirable that we should remove all artificial barriers which interrupt the freest interchange of the surplus products of this country with the surplus products of the country south of us. What would be the effect if we did this? Why, Sir, the effects of the old Reciprocity Treaty, all confined as they were to natural products, have never been forgotten by the people of the Maritime Provinces. I do not know whether they were as profitable to the Provinces of Ontario and Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Well, then, if they were, the people of Quebec and Ontario must have as warm a heart for the return of those good old times as we have in the Maritime Provinces. It is true that, under that old Reciprocity Treaty, to which I wish to call attention, the profits, benefits, and advantages were not confined to the Dominion of Canada. I do not claim that we possessed greater advantages under it than the United States. I mean to say that under the treaty the United States benefited largely, and I mean to say that the figures show that, so far as the balance of trade is concerned, was largely in their favor. We bought from them and they bought from us during the period the Reciprocity Treaty was in force. And, Sir, I would just call the attention of the House for a few moments to the marvellous strides which the trade of this country received at the time when the annual products of both countries were allowed to flow free between the Dominion of

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

Canada and the nation to the south of us. I find, Sir, on looking up the returns, that before the Reciprocity Treaty came into force the entire traffic between Canada and the United States was very small. In 1845 it was $8,000,000, in 1846 $9,000,000, in 1847 it increased to $10,000,000, in 1848 to $12,000,000, in 1850 to $15,000,000, and in 1851 to $18,000,000—slow, up-hill progress, but all the progress that could be made under the system of government and under the restrictions to trade which then existed. I find that in the year last before the Reciprocity Treaty, 1853, that the entire trade between the Provinces that now comprise the Dominion of Canada and the United States of America was $20,000,000. I find, Sir, the first year after that treaty took place that the trade bounded up from $20,000,000 to $33,000,000, that two years afterwards it had gone up to $42,000,000, that two years after that, in 1857, to $46,000,000, in 1859 it had gone up to $49,000,000, in 1863 to $55,000,000, in 1864 to $57,000,000, in 1865 to $71,000,000, and in 1866 it had reached the tremendous figures of $84,000,000. There is no stop, there is no halt. The producing power of this country was tested to its utmost, and it was equal to the demand made upon it; and our fishermen, our farmers, and our lumbermen poured out their surplus products to the American market, and wealth rolled back upon them. I see opposite to me men who know the truth of what I am speaking. I would recall their attention to the time when in every creek in the Maritime Provinces the smaller vessels came there laden with the products we required from the farms and the looms of the United States, and returned again with everything that our farmers, from their surplus products, had to sell. We had not one article to sell which they were not willing to buy, and to buy at a profitable rate. Wealth rolled in upon the country, as can be seen from the figures which the total trade returns of the country shows during that time. What has been the consequence since, Sir? During that period of time the figures are large, the total interchange of traffic between the Dominion of Canada and the United States reached the immense and unparalleled figures of $670,000,000. It is almost inconceivable—an amount which one can hardly grasp—but such are the facts as shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns, and what was it that we purchased from the United States during that time? We purchased $150,000,000 worth of farm products, $8,500,000 worth of timber, $24,000,000 worth of miscellaneous goods and $151,000,000 worth of general merchandise. We purchased it because it was for our advantage to purchase it, and we would not have purchased it unless it were so. We made money by the purchase, and we made money by the sale to the people of the United States of the millions of dollars I have mentioned, bringing back those millions in return. What is the consequence of the repeal of that treaty? It had no sooner been repealed than the traffic fell from $84,000,000 to $57,000,000, a falling off in one year of nearly $30,000,000. In the year following it was $56,000,000. In 1869, two years afterwards, it remained at $56,000,000. It struggled up and ascended steadily from that time until in the year 1878 it reached $89,000,000, but to-day, Sir, we find it has gone back again to $82,000,000. We find during the period of the Reciprocity Treaty, not only by the personal experience which every gentleman who remembers can bring to bear upon it, but by the statistics contained in our blue-books as well, that it is proved beyond a doubt that the period of the Reciprocity Treaty was a period of unparalleled prosperity for Canada, whilst at the same time it was a period during which the United States reaped great gain from traffic with us. It was not a one-sided treaty. As hon. gentlemen opposite say, we are not going as beggars to the United States, we are not a poor country, we are a great country with great capabilities.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, hon. gentlemen opposite sometimes think that they possess all the loyalty and all the love of country on their side of the House. I can tell them that we are as proud of our country and have as great a knowledge of its capabilities as they have, but we want to make it a country fit for us to live in ourselves and for our sons afterwards. We want to see its capabilities developed and not dwarfed by the politicians of the country; we want to see the restrictions upon that development removed; we want to see the trade of the country untrammelled; we do not want to see the whole interests of this great and growing Dominion sacrificed to the interests of a few who have put their money in the manufactures of the country. Do you say in answer to that, as the hon. gentleman said yesterday: "I am perfectly willing that there should be a return to that old system." I dare say you may be, I dare say that you are, but the hon. gentleman knows that it is crying for the moon. He has eight or ten years' experience of his offer, and he knows it will never be granted. I have already dwelt on that question. He knows he may keep the statutory offer there for ever and it will evoke no response from the people of the United States, because it is not, and we have no hesitation in saying it is not, a fair offer of reciprocal trade. It is asking too much from them and giving too little from us. The hon. gentleman introduced the National Policy in this country. He boasts that it received the endorsement of the majority of the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, "hear, hear," says my hon. friend; does he know why?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I will tell him why. Does he know the ground upon which the people of the Maritime Provinces were asked, by the man who possesses as much power in the Government, if not more, than its chief, to adopt that policy?

An hon. MEMBER. Oh, oh!

Mr. DAVIES The hon. member laughs. I will repeat the question, and, before he laughs, he had better hear what I say. I was going to ask, does he dare to think that a people trained up in the principle of free trade, as the people of the Maritime Provinces had been, a people knowing and believing in the benefits of free trade, could have been got to listen to a proposal to reverse the system under which they had grown prosperous, and introduce a protective system simply because it was protective? No, you could not; you would not have polled a corporal's guard. But you came to them under false pretences; you said to them: We ask you to adopt the National Policy—in order that it may give benefits to you? Not at all. Did you try to prove that it would be in itself a benefit? No, but you told them it would be a means of obtaining that which they were all striving for—it would be a means of obtaining reciprocal trade with the United States. That is how you carried your National Policy in 1873. You carried it under false pretences. Sir Charles Tupper came to the city of Charlottetown, which I have now the honor to represent, and in the most emphatic terms pledged his word that what he was seeking was not an increase of taxation to build up manufactures, but it was to obtain that which was the greatest blessing the Maritime Provinces would ever have—it was to obtain reciprocity, and that was the only way they could get it. The people took him at his word, they voted for the National Policy; they were sold; and to-day they are farther off from reciprocity than ever. The less the hon. gentleman says about the election the better. We know how it was carried. Take the Province where they did not spend money, where they did not pour it out in bribery—take the Province from which I come, and what is your answer? What was the issue on which my hon. friends and myself appealed to the people of that Province? The issue was reciprocity with the United States and the best means to obtain it; and we appealed to them to return a party to power who were in sympathy with that policy, and who were determined to do all that lay in their power to obtain it, and the people answered by sending a unanimous delegation for that purpose. It is true, Sir, in some of the other Provinces, where you poured out the Government money like water, where you bought the people with their own money, the results were not the same as with us; but you know that if you had not made the promises with regard to railways in the adjoining Province of Nova Scotia, if you had not poured out the money as you did for the construction of public works, you would hardly have had a corporal's guard to back up the hon. Finance Minister. His own personal qualities and his long public life might possibly have insured his return, but I doubt that he would have had a corporal's guard to back him in the House. Why do I believe it? Because the interests of the people of Nova Scotia are identical with those of the people of Prince Edward Island, and the untrammelled vote in the one Province shows what the untrammelled vote would have been in the other.

Sr JOHN A. MACDONALD. What a corrupt lot the people must be to be bought up in this way.

Sr RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, our Public Accounts show it. Why, they offered themselves to us, but Mr. Blake was too honest to buy them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Now, we are not singular—it would be unnatural if we were—in feeling and predicting the great benefits which would accrue to this country from reciprocal trade with the United States. I do not know what the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government may say to-day; I do not know what his views are now; but I know, Sir, that he shares the general belief that the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty was a great calamity to this country. In 1865, when he was negotiating for a renewal of that treaty, he put into a State document which he forwarded to the English Government a declaration of his own that the repeal of that treaty was a "great calamity" to Canada; and he went further—further, I think, than was necessary. He almost warned the British Government that unless that treaty was renewed in some form or other the loyalty of the people might be undermined. The hon. gentleman said at that time in a Minute of Council:

"Under the beneficent operation of the system of self-government which the later policy of the mother country has accorded to Canada, in common with the other colonies possessing representative institutions, combined with the advantages secured by the Reciprocity Treaty, of an unrestricted commerce with our nearest neighbors in the natural productions of the two countries, all agitation for organic changes has ceased, all dissatisfaction with the existing political relations of the Provinces has wholly disappeared."

There had been dissatisfaction among some of those politically associated with the right hon. gentleman until we obtained access to our natural markets in the United States; but the dissatisfaction, he says, has ceased.

"Although the commissioners would grossly misrepresent their countrymen if they were to affirm that their loyalty to their Sovereign would be diminished in the slightest degree by the withdrawal, through the unfriendly action of a foreign Government, of more commercial privileges, however valuable these might be deemed; they think they cannot err in directing the attention of the enlightened statesmen who wield the destinies of the great Empire, of which it is the proudest boast of Canadians that their country forms a part, to the connection which is usually found to exist between the material prosperity and the political contentment of a people, for in doing so they feel that they are appealing to the highest motives that can actuate patriotic statesmen—the desire to perpetuate a Dominion founded on the affectionate allegiance of a prosperous and contented people."

Statesmanlike words, those, Sir. The hon. gentleman tells the Home Government: I do not want to say that our loyalty depends altogether upon our obtaining and maintaining free commercial relations with the people of the United States, but such is always the case, and unless the people are content, and unless the people are prosperous, you may look out for some disloyalty. Contentment and loyalty are handmaidens. Discontent is the parent of disloyalty. He warns the British Government that unless some steps are taken the loyalty of the people will be undermined. And the hon. gentleman at that time, I have no doubt, was honest in his desire to bring about a renewal of that treaty under which we have prospered so much. But, Sir, at that time, if I am not incorrect, the hon. gentleman caused propositions to be made to the States which would have horror-stricken the hon. member for Cardwell—not propositions for an exchange of natural products alone, but propositions for the assimilation of the tariffs of the two countries. If the Hon. George Brown was correct in a statement he made in a speech delivered by him in 1865, negotiations were then on foot for a renewal of reciprocity with the United States. I wonder if the hon. gentleman will leave the Government when he discovers that his leader is heterodox on that point. We have not yet heard from the hon. the First Minister, but perhaps he may yet throw over the hon. member for Cardwell. He may yet approve of the resolution introduced, because, as I have shown, it does not go any further than the right hon. gentleman was willing to go when he was seeking a renewal of these treaty relations in 1865, when he declared that the abrogation of the treaty would be a great national calamity.

Mr. SPROULE. Did he make a treaty?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But I find that these negotiations went still further. In 1879, the hon. gentleman again opened negotiations with the people of the United States for a renewal of that treaty; and I hope the hon. member for Cardwell will not be horror-stricken when he learns that again, in 1869—I state this on the authority of the late Hon. George Brown—propositions were made a second time for the assimilation of the tariff of the two countries. I refer to the speech which the Hon. George Brown delivered in the Senate in 1875, in which he stated:

“In 1869, formal negotiations were entered into with the American Government, and the project of a treaty was presented for discussion. The negotiations continued from July, 1869, to March, 1870. The project included the cession for a term of years of our fisheries to the United States, the enlargement and enjoyment of our canals, the free enjoyment of the navigation of the St. Lawrence, the assimilation of our customs and excise duties, and some other propositions.”

Is the hon. member for Cardwell willing to resign, and leave a gentleman who has proved himself so disloyal as the First Minister did when he made those propositions? I have here the speech of the Hon. Mr. Huntington, who is now dead and gone, and whose silvery voice used to ring through this Chamber. In that speech Mr. Huntington stated he was aware from a person who could give him authoritative information, that such a projet of treaty had been signed by the Hon. John Rose and the Secretary of the United States Treasury. That statement will be found in Mr. Huntington's speech of March 16th, 1870. Mr. Huntington said:

“I know something about the memorandum entered into by the contracting parties in regard to the preliminary negotiations, and I have my information from sources which I believe to be reliable and trustworthy. And I say that in the preliminary negotiations between Hon. Mr. Rose and Mr. Secretary Fish, it was agreed that the manufactures of both countries should be admitted duty free, and hon. gentlemen cannot deny it.”

There is the statement, Sir, and I will go further. I will challenge the right hon. the First Minister to bring down the documents, if he dares deny the authoritative statement made by Mr. Huntington and by the Hon. Geo. Brown, who were both members of the Privy Council, and who both stated they had their information from the highest source. The hon. member for Cardwell has said that this proposition of ours involves an assimilation of the customs and excise duties, and is, therefore, a disloyal proposition. But the same proposition was made by his leader. Is the hon. gentleman prepared to justify his leader or to denounce him as disloyal?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I would say that, several times in his speech, he has put words into my mouth which I never uttered. What I said was that a differential duty against England was disloyal to the mother country and inconsistent with our position.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I ask the hon. gentleman: Is not the proposition for differential duties just as much involved in the proposal of his leader, which I have just stated? If the hon. gentleman doubts what I say, let him turn his attention to the Order in Council which was adopted, and which was signed by Sir John Rose. On the 3rd September, 1868, at the very time when the right for the Dominion of Canada to discriminate in any way against the mother country was challenged, and when Sir John Rose penned a Minute of Council which was approved by the other members of the Cabinet, affirming our right to discriminate whenever we pleased against the mother land, why was that document signed? Why did the Government of that day contend that the Dominion of Canada had the right, if it chose, to discriminate against the manufactures of the mother country? Simply because the Government were then engaged in endeavoring to carry out a treaty which had that discrimination for one of its objects. I am not going to read this document at length, but I call the attention of those that wish to peruse it, to the document itself. It is to be found in No. 47 of the Sessional Papers for 1869. Sir John Rose, after devoting the first part of the minute to the assertion of the right of one Province to discriminate in favor of another Province against English goods, because Prince Edward Island was not then part of the Dominion—and the question was raised whether the Dominion had the right to discriminate in favor of Prince Edward Island as against Great Britain—after disposing of that minor question, Sir John Rose then grappled with the second objection. He said:

“The second point as stated by His Grace, viz: ‘The exclusive favor which substantially or, at all events, apparently might be conferred on the United States, if the clause providing for the admission of certain products of that country, in the event of certain contingencies, should come into operation,’ and which His Grace is pleased to say: ‘he fears could not be acceded to,’ raises a question of such deep import to the people of this Dominion, that the undersigned deems it in his duty to advert to the course which has hitherto been pursued by Her Majesty's Government with reference to it, in the conviction that further consideration will lead His Grace to withdraw the objections which by anticipation have been advanced.”

He then goes on to discuss the peculiar position in which Canada and the United States stand with regard to each other, and shows that it is for their mutual interest to exchange certain articles on reciprocal terms:

“The peculiar position in which Canada and the United States stand to each other makes it for their mutual interest to exchange certain articles on reciprocal terms.

“The truth of this proposition has never been denied by Her Majesty's Government, but, on the contrary, their influence has been invariably exercised in furtherance of such reciprocal arrangements.

“The consideration of the subject continued to be repeatedly pressed on the American Government between that day and the year 1864.

“In the latter year the treaty known as the Reciprocity Treaty was finally concluded, admitting certain natural products of each country free into the other without any qualification as to the differential or discriminating character of its provisions.”

He then goes on to say:

“In 1885, the delegates from Canada, who visited England for the purpose of conferring with Her Majesty's Government on various important matters affecting the interests of the Dominion, were again assured that Sir Frederick Bruce, Her Majesty's representative at Washington, had received instructions to negotiate for a renewal of the treaty, and to act in concert with the Government of Canada to that end.

“It thus appears that the principle of establishing special trade relations on reciprocal terms between Canada and the United States has been formally recognised and approved by Her Majesty's Government since 1848."

And having thus successfully, as he thinks, refuted the objection taken by His Grace, we have the subsequent statement made by the gentleman to whom I have referred, that they endeavored to negotiate with the United States for the assimilation of the customs and excise duties of the two countries, which necessarily involved differential duties against the mother country. I think I have fairly proved that proposition. Then we had a new departure in 1878. We had the National Policy introduced, and there was an end of all propositions of that kind. Hon. gentlemen will see that it is not only in the statements made by leading and eloquent members of the then Opposition, which afterwards became the Government, that they were enabled to carry out that proposition of the National Policy, but that they placed upon the face of their proposition a statement which was to the effect that the National Policy ought to be adopted, not for any intrinsic value in the proposition itself, but because it would lead up to reciprocity of trade with the United States. Let me read the proposition which was made by the hon. the First Minister at that time. After reciting that it is desirable to adopt a national policy, the resolution goes on:

"That such a policy will retain in Canada thousands of our fellow-countrymen now obliged to expatriate themselves in search of the employment denied them at home, will restore prosperity to our struggling industries, now so sadly depressed, will prevent Canada from being made a sacrifice market, will encourage and develop an active inter-provincial trade, and moving (as it ought to do) in the direction of reciprocity of tariffs with our neighbors, so far as the various interests of Canada may demand, will greatly tend to procure for this country—"

What?

"Eventually a reciprocity of trade."

That is what you were leading up to, or what you said you were leading up to, and what you deluded the people of the country into believing you were leading up to, and that is why you carried your National Policy. But I contend that that policy has been a failure. It has not led to reciprocity of trade. On the contrary, it has had a most unfortunate effect on our commercial connection with the United States. It can hardly be believed that four and a half millions of people in this country can convert sixty millions of people in the great country to the south of us to our views by any threat of forcing them into trade relations. The proposition was absurd from the start, and now you are further away than you were at the time the National Policy was first instituted from the end you proposed to gain. What do we find now? Bringing the matter down to the present day, we find that the fishery embroglio has brought together the plenipotentiaries of Great Britain and the United States to try and solve the disputes which had become so serious that, as Mr. Bayard expresses it, unless they were satisfactorily solved, they might result in war. No other meaning can be attached to his language. What do we find to-day? We find that the leader of the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) who spoke yesterday, the Finance Minister (Sir Charles Tupper), goes to Washington, and does he, in answer to Mr. Bayard's proposition, use the language of the hon. member for Cardwell, and say offensively to the people of the United States: "You have our proposition and we can go no further than we have expressed in the statute?" Sir Charles Tupper, I hope, is too great a lover of his country to take that course; and I hope he treated this question of trade relations in a different way. We are not the suppliants in this case. We are not sacrificing any question of honor. Mr. Bayard, that great statesman, writes to Sir Charles Tupper, in May, 1877:

"I am confident we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

I think this Parliament may thank its stars that the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) was not sent to Washington to answer that proposition of Mr. Bayard, and to tell him that the one and only way of settling the commercial relations of the two countries was by the United States accepting our statutory offer. Sir Charles Tupper tells Mr. Bayard that he coincides fully with him:

"I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries."

None of your pottifogging propositions as included in the resolution of 1878, but a broad and statesmanlike plan of settling the entire commercial relations of the two countries, or, as my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) puts it, unrestricted interchange of the natural and manufactured articles of the two countries. That is paraphrasing the language used by Secretary Bayard and re-echoed by Sir Charles Tupper, and, if my interpretation is correct, we are not going further to-day than Sir Charles Tupper has gone in his reply to the note of Secretary Bayard. Now we have that great country holding out the right hand of fellowship, and, through its Secretary of State, inviting us to declare what we believe to be the broad and liberal and comprehensive measures which should be adopted. It is known that the American commissioners refused to accept the offer Sir Charles Tupper made to treat in regard to the commercial relations of the two countries, and it is known why they refused. Those commissioners had not the power to deal with that matter, and it is known that the Congress of the United States is most jealous of interference by the representatives of the President with its supreme control over the commercial relations of that country. It is well known that they desire to maintain intact their right to regulate the tariff of the country as they see best; and so we see to-day in that great body members proposing, one a scheme known as Commercial Union, and another a proposition known as Unrestricted Reciprocity, which is as akin to ours as it can be. Thus, we have the leading men on both sides, in their respective Legislatures, taking a common-sense view of this great question which is being talked over at every fire-side on both sides of the line, and is of the utmost importance to the people of this Dominion. We have now an opportunity of declaring whether we are in earnest in desiring broad, liberal and comprehensive trade measures with the United States, or whether we are dangling this before the eyes of the people for political purposes. It has come down to that, and those who to-day vote a negative to the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) will be voting against the proposition which I believe a very large majority of the people of the United States are prepared to accept, if they see a desire on this side of the line to meet them half-way. There have been a few objections raised to this proposition, and my hon. friend has answered some of them. I will not touch upon the ground he has occupied. The hon. gentleman opposite says this will discriminate against Great Britain. Necessarily it must to some extent, but we cannot help that. But this discrimination is not half as great as it is generally supposed. In fact we have a right to discriminate; the question is, is it in our interest to discriminate or not?

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the point.

Mr. DAVIES. That is the point. I say while we are loyal to England and loyal to the English flag, we are here representing the Canadian people in our Legislature. We are not now in swaddling clothes. The time has gone by when the legislation of this country is to be moulded to suit the interests of the English manufacturer. The legislation of this country must be moulded to suit the interest of the Canadian producer and the Canadian consumer. I remember well reading the other day that in 1859 objections were taken by the then Colonial Secretary to the financial scheme introduced by Sir Alexander T. Galt, then Finance Minister of Canada, on the ground that it worked injuriously to the interest of the British manufacturer, and in that far-off time, Sir Alexander Galt, with the prescience of a true statesman, recognising the importance of Canadian interests, told him he was sorry it was so, but the interests of the Canadian people must be paramount to the interests of the British manufacturer. Sir, the words of that statesman—for I think I may fairly call him a statesman, I think he is entitled to that name—may be quoted by me on this occasion. Sir Alexander Galt, in reply to the dispatch from His Grace the Duke of Newcastle, protesting against the enactment of the new Canadian tariff, moved to that protest by certain manufacturers of Sheffield, wrote :

"I must distinctly affirm the right of the Canadian Legislature to adjust the taxation of the people in the way they deem best, even if it should unfortunately happen to meet the disapproval of the Imperial Ministry. Her Majesty cannot be advised to disallow such acts unless her advisers are prepared to assume the administration of the affairs of the colony, irrespective of the views of the inhabitants."

That was the language of Sir Alexander T. Galt. We are a free people, we have control over our fiscal legislation, we know what is best for our own interests, we have power to deal with them, and if that power is to be superseded by some other persons, they must come here and take the responsibility of governing this country. But, Sir, having the power, how are we going to discriminate? As a matter of fact we have exercised that power already. Hon. gentlemen may say that they did not intend to do it, but I say that the practical effect of the incidence of the tariff, as it bears upon English goods and upon American goods, is to discriminate largely against the English. What do we find to-day? We find that there are $25,766,273 of dutiable goods imported from Great Britain, and $9,195,960 of free goods, making the total imports from Great Britain, $14,962,233. Upon that sum you charge a duty of $9,318,920, or as nearly as possible, 21 per cent. upon English imported goods. I find, Sir, that in the same year—I am now speaking of 1887—we imported $31,570,609 of dutiable goods from the States, and $14,536,457 of free goods from the same country, making a total of $45,107,066 from the United States. Upon those goods you exacted a duty of $7,263,194, or a shade over 16 per cent. So that while you are levying upon the total English importations a duty of 21 per cent., you are levying upon the total imports from the United States a duty of only 16 per cent.: you have discriminated, practically, to the extent of over 4 per cent. I am not complaining about it; it may be in the interests of Canada that you should do so, and if it is in the interests of Canada, I am prepared to defend the discrimination. But, Sir, no question has ever been raised on this side of the House, no question has ever been raised outside, that that involved the loyalty of the Administration. You are legislating in the interests of those you represent, and you would be false and recreant to the people you represent if you did not do so. Whether it bears harshly or not upon a particular class in Britain, is not the question which we ought to have in view. But I say that, practically, the effect will not amount to much. We will continue to buy largely from Great Britain of those classes of goods we now buy. I say we will do more. I say that no man who recollects the prosperity of the people of Canada under the old treaty can doubt that the prosperity of the people will, if a new treaty is made, based upon the proposition of my hon. friend from South Oxford, be duplicated. We know that the people will be in a position to purchase two dollars for one dollar they now purchase of English goods, and if that is so, I say that the result will be rather beneficial than otherwise to the English manufacturer. There is a very large class of goods you buy from England that you must continue to buy, even if trade becomes free between us and the States. The United States does not enter in competition with England in those classes of goods. Why, you see the United States to-day with a tariff 10 per cent. higher than ours, and they purchase in the English market over $150,000,000 yearly of English manufactured goods. Sir, if we had our lower tariff to-day and free trade with the States, we would still continue to import from England all those classes of goods which the Americans now find it to be their interest to import, in spite of their high tariff and others besides. I believe myself that our importation of English goods under the new era of prosperity which would be inaugurated, would be largely in excess of what it is to-day, and I believe, therefore, that, practically, the English manufacturer would be benefited instead of injured. I acknowledge that the proposition has on the face of it an element of discrimination, but I say that if it is in favor of the Canadian people, I, for one, am prepared to accept the responsibility of my vote. It may be said that there will be a loss of revenue. We know there will be a loss of revenue, and I think my hon. friend pointed out pretty clearly how he proposes to meet that loss of revenue. He proposes to meet it by following on the lines, in one respect, that have been advocated in this House for a number of years back. We say the pruning-knife must be applied to the expenditure. This matter must be dealt with vigorously, heroic measures of retrenchment must be adopted; and I think this side of the House, if entrusted with the administration of affairs, is prepared to adopt heroic measures of retrenchment. If this country could be governed as it was by my hon. friend from East York, when $23,000,000 sufficed to carry on the affairs of the country, instead of $36,000,000 that are now required, I think we would have no difficulty in meeting the loss of revenue. I say the first article in our creed is heroic retrenchment in the public expenditure. I say more than that: if our importations from England are, as I believe they will be, largely in excess of what they are now, your revenue will proportionately increase, and if there is a small deficiency, we will be prepared, I have no doubt, to meet it, and the people will be prepared to make it up cheerfully when the time comes. Now, Sir, there is an element in this question which affects the people of the Maritime Provinces more than it does the people of western Canada. When the treaty negotiated by the late George Brown was presented to the country, it was found that he had obtained a very great boon for the people of the Maritime Provinces—the right to register colonial built ships in the United States. That, Sir, is a very great boon, and coupled with that, I venture to express the hope that one of the conditions referred to in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford—if his proposition is ever formulated into a treaty—will be that, in addition to the right to register our vessels in the United States and the reciprocal right of the United States to register their vessels in our country, we shall also have the privilege of the coasting trade of the United States. Sir, unrestricted reciprocity will be a boon to the whole country—it will be a great boon to Ontario, a great boon to Quebec, a great boon to Manitoba, a great boon to the Maritime Provinces; but if, along with it, we can have the coasting trade and the right to register our colonial built ships in the United States, why, Sir, who will dare to fix bounds to the prosperity which will encircle those Maritime Provinces. Our shipping trade, which at one time was a very prosperous trade, has gone down; it is melancholy to look at the figures. I find away back in 1877 we built 100,000 tons of shipping in the Maritime Provinces of the Dominion; to-day we are building but 23,000. In 1877 the whole Dominion built 127,000 tons shipping. In 1887 but 27,000, or a deficiency of 100,000 tons in ten years. Give us the right to register our ships in the United States, and in the Provinces of Quebec, and Nova Scotia, and New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island, we can build hundreds of ships suitable for the coasting trade which will then go into service between the Provinces and the United States. We can do it, and we can do it profitably, for we have the money, the timber, the brawny arms, and intelligence and experience gained by many years of ship building, and we have the cheap labor and the sailors to man the ships afterwards. I doubt if there is any condition you can attach to this scheme of unrestricted reciprocity which will be of greater advantage to the whole Maritime Provinces, and to the Province of Quebec in addition, than this which I have mentioned, and which I venture to hope will form one of the conditions of reciprocity, conferring upon both countries respectively the right to register their ships in the other country, the right to register Canadian vessels in the United States, and the right to register American vessels in Canada. Sir, we now have arrived, as it were, at the parting of the ways. We must make our choice between two policies. We have, on the one hand, the National Policy, with a statutory offer which we know has not been accepted, and will not be accepted; we have, on the other hand, a broad, statesmanlike proposition submitted here for throwing down the barriers of trade and opening up unrestricted reciprocity between two countries. We have offered to us the choice between stagnation in our trade, as I am sorry to say it at present exists, and that prosperity which advanced by leaps and bounds under the old treaty and which will be renewed under the new. We have a controversy here, and we have to make our choice between legislation, on the one hand, for the classes and legislation, on the other hand, for the masses—legislation which has built up, as the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White) pointed out, two or three large cities, which is making the assessed value of Toronto and Montreal very much larger than it was years ago, but which is doing so at the expense of other portions of the same Provinces. You are building up the cities at the expense of the country. The totality of your wealth is not increasing. Sir, we are as loyal as you are; but we are not loyal in one quarter only, but we are loyal to the flag, loyal to the Canadian flag, loyal to the people we represent. Sir, I say it is not loyalty, but disloyalty, on the part of any member of this House if he shrinks from adopting measures which will be for our own interest and the interests of our people, for fear they would be disapproved of by a small section of manufacturers, either English or Canadian. Sir, I am not afraid our manufacturers will go to the wall. There are certain classes of manufactures which will go to the wall—those manufactures which exist only because they are bolstered up by this false system of the National Policy. Some of them may go; but when I see such men as millionaire Gibson, who owns one of the largest cotton factories in the Dominion of Canada, declaring openly that he courts unrestricted reciprocity because it will give a larger market, and that he is not afraid to compete with manufacturers to the south of us, I cannot join in the wail that free trade will destroy our manufactures. "I believe," he says, "I have money enough and brains enough, and our people are intelligent enough to enable us to compete successfully with those who are manufacturing cotton to the south. Give me the market—that is what I want." And hundreds are echoing the same cry. You cannot take up a copy of the Mail newspaper, which has devoted itself to this particular branch of the subject, without seeing that in all parts of the Dominion manufacturers are coming forward and declaring—what? Declaring they are going to be ruined, as the hon. member for Cardwell says? No. They are declaring they are ready to accept the situation, to join hands with the great agricultural, mining and lumbering interests of the Dominion and go in for this unrestricted reciprocity of trade, which will make prosperity shine over this Dominion like a sunbeam. Sir, I tell hon. gentlemen that this question has eaten too deeply into the hearts of the people to be disposed of with a single speech or a single phrase. The people have learned by experience. The hon. member for Cardwell spoke last night about time, and I tell him that time is on our side. The social forces and conditions of the country are on our side, they are working for us, and all of our debates and divisions here will not stop the onward flow of public opinion which is being created at every fireside in this Dominion on this question. Sir, we tender the people a flag of which we are not ashamed, a flag upon which is inscribed, "Unrestricted Trade with the United States." Hon. gentlemen know that this sentiment will find an echo in the heart of every man who has attained manhood's estate, and remembers what reciprocity brought us in the past; it will find an echo in the heart of every young man who to-day is in despair whether he should remain in this country or go abroad to help build up a foreign one; it will find an echo in the heart of the bread-winner who finds it hard enough to earn sufficient to buy his daily bread, much less to put by a little for a rainy day; and we throw this flag to the breeze, confident that it will be carried by the united hands of the people of the several Provinces of the Dominion to a glorious, if not to a speedy victory.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in the course of his speech last night, made use of an expression something like this: That in the discussion of this question we should approach it as statesmen and not as flunkys. I have been a little curious to know if the hon. gentleman were to undertake to put himself and his lieutenant, who has so bravely spoken just now, in one or other of these categories, in which he would place them. It would not be in harmony with his own self-respect that he should put himself or his friend in the second, and it would not be for me certainly to attempt to make the classification. It is for this House, and it is for the country after the House, from the speeches that were made and the arguments with which the proposition was attempted to be furthered, to say as to whether the proposition that was made was, in the first place, a statesmanlike proposition, and in the second place, whether it was furthered by statesmanlike arguments. I quite appreciate what has been said by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat as to the importance of this question. I do not think the House has yet got hold of the tremendously grave nature of the issue, if it be really a serious issue, which is embodied in this proposition, and I think the House and the country may be a little excused for doubting at the present time whether it is really a serious issue or not. Hon. gentlemen opposite have had within the last ten years so many issues, they have gone from one to the other with such a surprising versatility, and such a wonderful celerity, that they have become a sort of Chinese puzzle to the community at large, and when they spring a brand new issue within a few months upon Parliament and upon the people, Parliament and the people are quite excusable if they hold their breath for a little and watch in patience as to whether those gentlemen are in earnest, and whether it is worth while taking up the fight in a real spirit or not. If this, however, be a real and serious issue, it is a tremendous one, because it involves a very great deal. It involves, in the first place, the almost complete diversion of the trade of this country, and a change of methods of transport with reference thereto; I speak particularly with regard to the import trade. Hon. gentlemen may talk as they please, but there will be a certain diversion of trade outside of the United States which comes into this country, if such a proposition as this be carried. It seems to me to be plain, and to go without reasoning, that there will be a very large and almost complete diversion of trade if this proposition be carried. It involves, also, a commercial severance between Canada and Great Britain, as well as outside countries with which we have been carrying on trade. But, in speaking of this commercial severance, I speak of it particularly with reference to our mother country. I think it goes without saying that, if this proposition be accepted, it involves a separation—a commercial separation—at first large, and tending to become continually larger and wider, between this country and Great Britain, and it involves, in the very wake and current of that commercial severance, a political severance as well. It may be a longer time or a shorter time in coming, but I hold it as a fact, indisputable, that the warmest and the fullest current of blood to-day that flows through the country is its commercial blood, and that along the current of its commercial life will flow the social current, will flow the sympathy of feeling, will flow, eventually, the political current of the people. If we commence to-day by opening a channel which involves, at first, a commercial severance between us and the mother country, as that channel broadens and widens—and, if the rosy and imaginative pictures that have been drawn here of the great extension of commerce which would take place between us and the United States be true, it must grow and widen—I say, in proportion as it does so grow and widen there must inevitably come a wider and deeper severance, politically, between us and the mother country. More than that, it involves an almost total loss of our customs revenue. That point has been disputed, and it is a question which we may debate. I hold that no person in this House will pretend to deny that it involves a considerable disturbance of our customs duties.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not necessarily one cent.

Mr. FOSTER. On the very item of goods that we bring from the United States we drop at once seven millions of dollars, and a little better, of duty. We will buy from the United States in the main, and if the proposition of my hon. friend works itself out as it is supposed by him it will, we will buy more increasingly from the United States, and in proportion as the current of trade sets in that direction we shall buy less and less from outside countries when we have those discriminating duties between ourselves and outside countries. This, therefore, would involve a continual diminution in the customs contribution, which is now so very large a part of our revenue. It involves also the establishment of a new method of taxation, a method of taxation which is totally at variance with the wont of the people of Canada, and which, I believe, will be found to be at variance with the wishes of the people of Canada. It is totally impossible for the government of this country to be carried on without a very large annual contribution in the way of duties of some kind. As my hon. friend last night showed, it is impossible to raise excise duties beyond a certain amount, and the bulk of that which is necessary to carry on the wants of the services of this country, with their increased and continuous extension, must be got from customs duties; or if not from customs duties, it must be raised by this new method of taxation of which I have spoken—direct taxation. Again, and lastly, this proposition involves the probable destruction of a large proportion of our industries, which, in Canada, since 1878 until to-day, by the mandate of the people three times given and never revoked, it has been the sacred trust and duty of this Government and this Parliament to establish and maintain. Since the election of 1887 hon. gentlemen have sprung this new proposition upon the House and upon the country. How dare they, in the light of members responsible to the constituencies that sent them here, spring such a proposition as that, and demand for it any other weight than their own individual opinions? They, Sir, have offered to the country a proposition which would, in a great degree, disturb the existing taxation and the purposes for which that taxation largely existed, namely, to raise a revenue with a view towards the establishment and maintenance of the great industries of this country. If ever a party went to the country pledged not to make any great disturbance in this respect, it was the party opposite. If they owe any fealty to their chief of the time gone by; if they have any respect for him as their acknowledged and most applauded leader, they should remember that they went to the country pledged not to disturb this to any large extent, and, with the echoes of their own leader sounding in their ears, and with his own words echoed by themselves upon every platform, they said: "If you please, gentlemen electors, to return us to power, if you wish the manufacturing interests fairly conserved, very well, we will not disturb them, at least, to any great extent, nor will we materially disturb existing taxation." Now, Sir, when an acknowledged and idolized finance leader of a great party in this country comes before the country and before Parliament under those peculiar conditions with the mandate of the people behind him, and, against the verdict of the people which was freshly given only a few months before, puts before the country and before Parliament so bold, so revolutionary and so novel a proposition, he should have good reasons for it. And this is a proposition not only put before the country which it will most directly affect, but which exposes its whole hand without reserve to the country which must be a party to the carrying of this proposition. When a man comes with such a proposition, so bold and revolutionary, it is necessary that he should give us the closest possible reasoning, the most irrefragable proofs, and lead us irresistibly to the most irrevocable conclusions before he can demand that the people who are sent here by their constituents should give their adhesion to this change and to this proposition. Now, Sir, I leave the hon. gentleman with his speech of three or four hours in length to the calm judgment of this Parliament, and to the calmer judgment of the country behind this Parliament. I do not propose that his speech shall be judged, it cannot be judged, in the laudatory manner in which it was referred to by his lieutenant who spoke this afternoon, but in cold blood. When the people sit down with intelligence, coolness and calmness in their own homes, descended as they are from a country which they have been proud to own as their mother land, feeling between them and the old Islands beyond the sea, the invisible but strong cords of patriotism and love of ancestry and love of national glory twining about their hearts, and look at this question as citizens of a country that they have been led to believe has become great and will become greater—that they have been led to believe has a great future before it if only in the spirit of union and patriotism they set themselves to assure it;—when the people of Canada, so intelligent, and under these circumstances come to read and consider and weigh that speech, I am willing to abide by the verdict, and I think the verdict will be that the case is not proven. The hon. gentleman's speech had something in it. It was full of a plentiful assumption of personal superiority, and had running through it a constant current of sneering contempt for anyone who should be unfortunate enough to disagree with him. It was full of such expressions as this: "It is perfectly clear that," "no man who thinks twice but what knows," "any person who is not wilfully ignorant must confess," and all that; and yet at the very heels of such assertions came statements which were perfectly involved and absurd—statements which any man who thought twice would indignantly and instantly reject, and the only ground for hoping that they would be ever entertained is that they come into some person's head who never thinks twice or never thinks at all. His speech was full of a wealth of assertion which was only equalled by the conspicuous poverty of fact that was found in it; and it had in it what I may call an immense vagueness, which offered a delightful excursion ground for the political adventurer, but which the prudent, staid and level-headed people of Canada, when they think it over, will, I venture to believe, lay aside to be taken in infinitesimally small doses along with their well-worn Gulliver's Travels and Baron Munchausen's exploits.

Mr. MITCHELL. Amen.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad that on this point my hon. friend from Northumberland piously agreed with me. But, Sir, while the speech of my hon. friend from South Oxford most inefficiently did that, it most efficiently did another thing. In that speech my hon. friend entirely eclipsed his hitherto unrivalled record as the murky-fingered painter of Canadian retrogression, hopelessness and despair. On the canvas upon which he drew he placed a picture which, honestly, if I believed to be true, would make me turn my back at once and forever upon Canada.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. FOSTER. It would actually, much as my hon. friend might regret it, lead me to turn my back on Canada and to write upon its portals: "Abandon all hope, ye who enter here." The only alleviation that there is to that side of the subject is this: that my hon. friend has established so wide a notoriety as a prophet of unrealised disaster and woe, that even under the very hues of his canvas and under the very sound of his lamentations, I have no doubt Canadians will still marry and be given in marriage.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And go to the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. Will build up homes, and continue to live happily within them, and will not be turned aside in the main from laying broad and deep the foundations of future prosperity.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. member for South Oxford, in the introduction of his resolution, and the hon. gentleman from Queen's, P.E.I., who spoke this afternoon, both agreed that the proposition before the House is an important one. They both agreed that it proposed a very considerable disturbance of the existing relations; they agreed that it was, in fact, a heroic remedy. Now, I think, before the House or the country is justified in accepting such a proposition, so denominated by its mover and its supporters, the burden of proof is placed upon those who introduced it and support it. The burden of proof is placed upon them to show clearly that, at the present time, a heroic remedy is necessary; that, taking the condition of the country now, in 1888, as compared with its condition in 1877, or in any year previous to 1877, a set of circumstances has arisen, almost suddenly arisen, which makes it necessary now to take a step that was never deemed necessary before, and that, therefore, this heroic remedy should be applied. Now, if the burden of proof must fall upon the hon. gentleman who introduced, and the hon. gentlemen who support the resolution, let us examine for a few moments the proofs by that test, and the facts brought forward in support of the contention that a heroic remedy is at the present time necessary. The first evidence adduced by my hon. friend from South Oxford was this: He says nature is too strong for us. Now, I suppose, by that expression he meant that the different Provinces of the Dominion are so constituted, first, with relation to themselves, and, secondly, with relation to countries in their vicinity, that it is impossible to combine them into a united country having satisfactory trade relations among the different Provinces which compose it. I understand him to mean that the geographical conditions of these different component parts of the Dominion are such that they fight continually against a unity of commerce and a unity of spirit in the Confederation, and that, in this fight, these geographical difficulties, that is nature, will prove too strong, and these component parts can, therefore, never be welded into a united whole. In the first place, I wish, in reference to that, to make this remark: I believe the hon. member for South Oxford is not a tyro in politics; I believe he is not unknown to the political history of this country; I believe he has been a more or less central figure in the party to which he has belonged for some fifteen or sixteen years. If, to-day, nature is too strong for us, as the hon. gentleman says, what must nature then have been in 1868? What must nature have been in 1873? And what must nature have been from 1873 to 1879? And what, in a less degree, must nature have been from 1879 up to the present? But we never before heard of the hon. gentleman introducing such a resolution as this, or anything akin to this; we have never heard of his proposing such a remedy as this, or anything akin to it, until this present year of grace of 1888, when the difficulties which nature has placed in our way have been, to a large extent, overcome by the energy and enterprise and wealth of the people. In 1868, the bald proposition was made to knit these different dependencies into a united country. The hon. member for South Oxford was a supporter of that idea; he was a supporter of that plan; he has continued to support it from 1868 to 1873.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). From 1864.

Mr. FOSTER. From 1864, then. He was in the Government, and a central figure in it, from 1873 to 1879. Has he just now arrived at this conclusion? What new light has been thrown that has brought him to the conclusion that nature is too strong for us? Why, Sir, it is the triumph of man to overcome the disabilities which nature throws in his way. It is the triumph of modern science, than which nothing has been more wonderful in the history of the world, to overcome geographical difficulties, to overcome the disabilities of distance, to overcome physical obstructions, and to overcome them in the interest of the unity of countries and in the interest of the spread of commerce. And it appears to me that if, in 1868, if in 1873, if in the years since then, the hon. gentleman did not feel that nature was so strong as to drive him to propose a heroic remedy, there is all the less reason to-day to adduce that as an argument, and an argument, as it seems to me, of an extraordinarily weak character. For between 1868 and this time, we have done what? We have introduced Provinces, that had no knowledge of each other, to each other; and they have become acquainted. We have completed great lines of water communication, than which no country possesses longer and better; we have built great lines of railway communication, which are channels and arteries for the commerce of this country, and which now extend from one side of the continent to the other, and in all these ways we have put nature at a minimum of disadvantage, compared to the maximum of disadvantage that she put us to in 1868. If it be true that we must never contend against nature, and that we must seek for our commerce channels that run in geographical lines, then the history of the world has been teaching us a wrong lesson. Nature was strong as between the eastern and the southern and western parts of the United States, by means of the almost illimitable distances that separated them. Man triumphed over nature, and spanned the prairies of the United States with constantly extending lines of commerce. Nature stood strong, and vast, and rugged between the two slopes of the United States, the western and the eastern slope, in the shape of a line of mountains that run down between these two sections. Modern science and modern enterprise tunnelled those mountains, modern science and modern enterprise overcame those difficulties, and has introduced a direct and intimate relation of commerce between the east and middle States of the United States and the western States, and between the eastern slope and the western slope. Science and enterprise have been at work in our own Dominion of Canada, and, whereas, the Rocky Mountain range stood there as an impassable barrier for many and many a year, between our eastern and our western slope, it has been tunnelled and science has surmounted the difficulty, to the wonder of the world, and to-day the life-blood of commerce flows not only from our Atlantic to our Pacific slope, but over that line which we have built, overcoming nature, the great east and the great west speak to each other and give to each other the message of increasing commerce. Time was when the Alps formed an impassable barrier between Italy and the rest of Europe, but they have been tunnelled, and German, and Italian, and European life flow together along that line which has been constructed by engineering skill. It is no argument to say that a country shall give over its attempt to build up a nationality because geographical difficulties and geographical distances are in the way. If there is one thing more than another which brings out and shows to the full the innate energy and power of a people, it is this action which is not only the proof of their present power, but the guarantee of their future greatness. It is that they will set themselves together in a united effort to overcome and to vanquish nature, and to rise in spite of that to national greatness and prosperity. That argument, therefore, is not a sufficient one to show that we should introduce this heroic method. The next argument which the hon. gentleman introduced was this: that we had no other natural market, and my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) reiterated that idea. What do they mean by a natural market? Is it not quite possible that this phrase should be used without meaning? What is the natural market for a country? Is it a geographical market? By no means. If that were true, the natural market for Great Britain would be France, which lies closest to it, as we all know, but we also know that there is not the same traffic between Great Britain and France as there is between Great Britain and countries which lie thousands and thousands of miles away. If that statement were true, Great Britain's trade would not have extended, as it has done, to India, to China, to Japan and to every country in the wide world. A natural market, it seems to me, is a market in which you can place things which are demanded by that country and which are not produced, or are not produced in sufficient quantity by that country. That is the natural market for your country, and so it comes to pass that the West Indies are more of a natural market for Halifax or for Nova Scotia than the Province of New Brunswick, which lies close beside them; and so it happens that countries which are the diameter of the world apart are more of a natural market than those which lie contiguous to each other. So it is not a sufficient proof that we should adopt this heroic remedy because the phrase expression is given vent to that we have no natural market, and that we need the United States for a natural market. Again, the loss of population was an argument advanced by the hon. gentleman. We must revolutionise the condition of this country, we must step out on an unknown plank, we must leave the ground upon which we have stood for years, we must burn the bridges and cut the connections which are dear to us, because there has been a movement of population in this country. I do not deny that there has been a movement of population. I do not deny that there is always a movement of population from older countries to new countries, and from the older parts of new countries to the newer parts. That is a world-wide fact, especially as far as the movement of population from Europe to America is concerned, and more especially in regard to the Anglo-Saxon race. My hon. friend was mathematically precise in his assertions. He brought down an exact statement that one out of four of the Canadian people is, as he unfortunately said, exiled to a foreign country, and that three out of four of the foreign people who come to this country land themselves in the country which lies to the south and west of us. Will you think of what followed that statement which was so precise, so mathematically certain, so definite in its proportions of one to four and three to four, in the way of argument, to prove its correctness? It needs simply for me to say, and the hon. gentlemen who heard the speech, or, if they did not hear it, who will read the speech will bear me out, that the argument was totally inadequate to the assertion and that the assertion remains unproved. But the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has more than that to do. He has to prove not only that there has been this movement of population, but that the heroic remedy which he proposes will stop that movement. The larger portion of the argument of last night and of to-day was totally irrelevant, and I shall not attempt to deal with it. Let those hon. gentlemen beat upon it until the anvil is beaten out by the hammer. It has nothing to do with the question unless you establish, in addition to that, that, if we adopt this proposal, that movement of population will cease. Will hon. gentlemen think for a moment why the movement of population takes place from older countries to newer? Will my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) think a little more on that question, a little hard thinking would not hurt him, will he ask himself why people leave Prince Edward Island for the west? He says it is not on account of the soil—granted; that it is not on account of the climate—granted; it is not on account of the laws under which we live and the flag under which we live—granted. Why, then, do they leave? They leave mainly for two reasons: one, because they seek industrial employment which shall bring them in a larger amount for their labor, and the other, to get on lands broader and freer so that they may be able to try their agricultural capacities on these larger lands. Those are the principal reasons why they leave the older portions of the country. Unfortunately there was a long period when Canada had no North-West, when she had no broad prairie country to which her children could go, but the United States of America had a broad prairie country, which was opened up by lines of railways, into which the surplus population and the adventurous population of the older States of America, looking for broader and freer privileges in regard to land, went and gradually settled. Into western New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois they went, further west as the lines of communication were opened up, and many of our own people went there, impelled by the same considerations and settled in the western States, and the germ always brings the accumulation, and the nucleus which was planted there drew upon those who remained. And, Sir, if Canada ever wished to keep her independent and prosperous course, it was of the first importance that she should have and open out for herself a country of broad lands, a country of prairie freedom, a country of those new conditions. Sir, it was eminently wise that the North-West should be added, and wiser still that it should be opened up, and all the wiser because of the keen competition which that country and Canada had to face in comparison with the United States of America. Now, Sir, we are in the position that when our people from the older Provinces wish broader and freer lands, they can go out into our own North-West, whither the great body of the people who go from our older sections to-day are turning their steps, and where they will make their homes under the same flag, and will still remain citizens of Canada. My honorable and philosophical friend shakes his head as though it were not so. Is it not more so than it was twenty years ago? Is it not more so than it was five years ago? Is it not more and more so each year? Let time have its sway, let the country open up, let the prosperous years repeat themselves, let the nucleus of population go in there from different countries, each calling back to its own home for a part of its own to come and join it under new conditions, and this country's future, with reference to that part of the subject, is as assured as the United States are assured with reference to themselves. The other section of the people went away because they wished to earn ready money, they went into the industrial centres in order to earn it. They found no industrial centres in Prince Edward Island. If after the farming season had passed, and they wanted to earn something for the crowded family, the quickest way they could find to earn it was to take boat and rail and go down to the manufacturing towns of Maine, to the manufacturing towns of New England, and earn their wages during the winter, coming back in the summer to work upon their farms. Canada was at a disadvantage in that respect, and the National Policy has nothing better to commend it to these people, and nothing better to give a strong hold among these people, than the fact that it is meeting successfully that need. Here and there in the different centres of our country, industrial institutions are springing up, manufacturing establishments are opening up, into which the young people of our own country who wish to earn ready money all the year, or at odd times, find a chance for employment, and a wage for their earning hour. These are the two chief causes that take people away, and these are the two that are being gradually and surely removed in our country. Now, I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. gentlemen here: Has there been a shadow of proof to substantiate the position that the moment you have unrestricted reciprocity, all this movement of population will cease, and we will have no more people going out of Canada into the western States? Not one jot or tittle of proof to that end has been furnished. I hold that it will be opposite. To-day there are many things that restrain a man when he thinks about going from his own country and making his home in another. There are sentimental conditions that bind him, and which he must break before he goes. One of the strongest sentimental conditions is the change from flag to flag. You may call it sentiment, and you may say what you like about mock patriotism, and mock loyalty, but it is a feeling down in the heart of every man that is worthy the name of man. Sir, the very moment you weaken those ties by the current of commercial inter-communication, by that consensus of feeling and tendency which follows the channel of commercial communication, leading one to believe that there is no difference between the countries, that one flag is about the same as the other, that it is to the interests of these people that they shall so look upon it, that moment you weaken those ties and you thereby leave the drift towards the other country easier, more certain and more frequent than it otherwise would be. That, I believe, will commend itself to the sober second thought of those who look carefully into this matter. Therefore, I conclude, in the first place, that the hon. gentleman is utterly wanting in proof that if this heroic remedy is adopted it will stop the egress of population, and, in the second place, that this country is taking the best possible means to stop that egress of population, and is being successful in the means it has taken.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It has increased double.

Mr. FOSTER. That reminds me of something. When the hon. gentleman from South Oxford and the hon. gentleman from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) were in the Government of this country, from 1873 to 1879, was there no exodus of population?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There were, on the average, 22,000 a year, and since then there have been, in some years, four times that number.

Mr. FOSTER. How wonderfully and mathematically precise my hon. friend is. He will not allow the palm to be taken from him by the mathematical precision of the hon. member for South Oxford. Though the hon. member for South Oxford is well inclined to put up with small things and make his figure 1 and 4, and 3 and 4, my hon. friend from Bothwell has a broader and wider mind, and runs up into the thousands. Was there not an egress of population from 1873 to 1879? Does not the country know that there was a heavy outgo of population in those years? Do not all our records teach it? The fact is, Sir, and I challenge proof to the contrary, that in those disastrous years the population that went out from this country, that was driven from it, was far larger than has gone out in as many years since. When my hon. friend from South Oxford was in the Government, when my hon. friend from Bothwell was in the Government, was there no need of a heroic remedy when the population was leaving us more rapidly than it is to-day? But to-day a heroic remedy is trotted out when hon. gentlemen, having failed on all other cries, wanted another fad to buoy them up. Now, Sir, the next argument that is given us why this heroic remedy should be brought in is, that there is a diminution in the valuation of farm lands and farm produce. Now, you will notice that my hon. friend from South Oxford last night adduced no proof to show that farm land was decreasing in value in this country more rapidly than in the country to the south of us. He adduced not a single tittle of proof to show that farm produce was bringing less in this country than in the United States. He simply made the bald and bold assertion that farm property and farm produce in this country were decreasing in value. My hon. friend from Cardwell (Mr. White) flatly and explicitly contradicted that statement of the depreciation in farm land in the Province of Ontario. My hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) said: Well, but they have not increased much. We are not on the point now as to how much they have increased. My hon. friend from South Oxford said that they were positively decreasing in value for a series of years, although the statistical record beside him went to show that they were not decreasing, but there was an increase, though slight, in the value. Will my hon. friend maintain the proposition that there are not causes, wider and broader than any he has mentioned here, to account for the depreciation in value—or, put it in another way, for the not so rapid increase in the value of farm produce in this age of the world compared with ten years ago, fifteen years ago, or twenty years ago? Can you find me an old country in the world in which farm lands are not in more or less difficulty from various causes? The difficulty is brought about by wide and varied economic forces at work now which were not at work before. But, Sir, will my friend maintain the proposition that the countries of the United States, situated as to age, situated as to geographical latitude and longitude much the same as we are situated, have not a greater diminution in values and a greater augmentation in difficulties by the way of debts and mortgages which surround them? Why, Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont and Connecticut have enjoyed the whole freedom of the United States, have had the whole advantage of commercial union, of unrestricted reciprocity, and yet you have only to take the records to show that the difficulties existing there, with respect to those lands, are greater, by far, than those which exist with regard to our own lands. Suppose my hon. friend proves that there is not a rapid rise in the values of lands in this country, does that prove that they would be more rapid if unrestricted reciprocity were the rule? Does that prove they would be more rapid if we had a wider channel of commercial intercourse—unrestricted reciprocity with the United States? That is what they must prove before they establish the proposition that the heroic remedy should be applied, founded upon this as a reason for its being applied. I desire in the next place to notice the statement which was made, that there has been a total reduction in the volume of trade, and that there is no inter-provincial trade in this country, and there cannot possibly be any. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was not ingenuous in that argument or in that statement. He did not state the whole truth, and he did not state it in the way it should be stated, in order to convey the impression that ought to be conveyed. He took the year 1873, an abnormal year, and he made the statement that the volume of trade is to-day less than it was in 1873, and he proves it by what? By simply taking the amount of foreign trade—the exports and imports. He said nothing with regard to the great decrease in the volume of that trade when he was in power from 1873 to 1879, when it went from $127,000,000 of imports for home consumption down to $72,000,000, when it went from $217,000,000 of total trade down to $153,000,000; and yet although there was this constant and fearful diminution of the volume of trade, measured as he measured it, there was no need then for the heroic remedy. There was no resolution then, embodied as a principle of government and carried out in practice, that we must have unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. No, wiser counsels prevailed then. Even though these hon. gentlemen, in their position as being in the Government, had wished for anything like that the solid common sense of the Premier at that time intervened between his party and such absurd nonsense as they seem to be guilty of, when once his leadership was taken from them. He made, as the Government which preceded him made, honest, straightforward and self-respecting proposals to the United States over and over again, and when he exhausted all that honorable proposal could make, with reference to the country in this matter of trade, and when some of his followers foolishly pressed on the hon. gentleman to enter into negotiations, again and again Mr. Mackenzie rose in his place in Parliament and said: No, I have made proposals, Canada has taken the initiative again and again, our proposals have been refused; now we will wait until the power to the south of us makes some proposition to us, which we will be prepared to consider and to entertain. But let me say something in support of my proposition that the whole truth was not stated. Does not my hon. friend know that the trade of a country is not to be measured by the sum of its imports plus the sum of its exports? Does he not know that it is not a fair comparative measurement to simply give the sum total of the exports and imports without going into the quality of the imports? My hon. friend knows that the great difference between the imports in his period and the imports since 1878 has been this: that while the imports then consisted of articles, not only natural articles but articles upon which all labor had been expended to make them perfect and complete in a foreign country, the cost of which was added to the natural cost and thus went to swell the sum total of the imports, to-day the exact opposite is the case in several of the most important particulars, and to-day a large quantity is brought in in the rough, in the less costly form, and it is worked up for the consumption of this country by the labor of our own people. Sir, in the former time ships went to the country of production for raw sugar. The raw product was taken to Great Britain, and British ships took the freights upon it. That sugar was carried on British railways to British refineries, and British railways had their profits. British workmen worked up the sugar, and the wages were paid to British people. Then it was put in cars and steamships and sent to St. John, Halifax or Montreal with the maximum of cost; and that, Sir, went into the figures upon which the total imports were based. That was the case with 90 per cent, if I mistake not, of the sugar consumed here. To-day of the whole sugar consumed in this country 96 per cent., if I mistake not, comes raw from the places where it is grown. It is brought into our own country, it is carried upon our own railways, worked up in our own refineries, and all the added cost put upon it goes into the pockets of our own people. That, of course, makes a vast difference. So it is with the cotton trade and the woollen trade and with a hundred and one other products, though in a less degree, but yet in some degree. The hon. member for South Oxford took care not to state this fact, but the people will take care to remember it and to ponder it well before they adopt the heroic remedy. Well, Sir, there is another question that is necessary to be put: If our trade is decreasing, how do you explain this fact? In 1875 the total registered tonnage entering into and out of the ports of this country, excluding coasting vessels always, was 9,537,000 tons, in 1876 it was 9,911,000 tons, in 1887 it was a little more than 14,000,000 tons. Did these vessels come in simply for pleasure; were they simply beating about upon the wild and yeasty waves making port now and then for the purpose of getting entered and cleared; or were they here on business and to carry on the commerce of the country? The latter evidently. From 1875 to 1879 the average tonnage of Canada, as I have explained, was 10,700,000 tons, the average tonnage from 1880 to 1887 was 13,700,000 tons, an increase of 3,000,000 a year on an average. What is all this doing? Take the railways. They are far more in number now than they were then; they have far more carrying capacity now than they had formerly, and the records as given in the railway statistics show an immense increase in the freight carried. That increase is something like this: In 1879 the tons of freight carried by railways in Canada were 8,000,000 odd, in 1886 they were nearly 16,000,000, almost double the amount of freight that was carried by our railways in 1879. What does this mean? Is this freight which is being simply carried down to one terminus, put on board some train and carried back to its starting point, to show the amount of freight carried, or is it real trade? Evidently the latter. My hon. friend's premises were wrong, and his contention was utterly futile, when he strove to make us believe that we should adopt a heroic remedy because of this alleged falling off in the volume of trade. He also says that we have no inter-provincial trade. Why, in relation to this, I can refer my Nova Scotia friends to one of their organs—I mean one of their human organs and not a newspaper organ. If there is any man who has raised a noise about himself in the Maritime Provinces, within the last three or four years, it has been Attorney General Longley, and Attorney General Longley's great fight with the Confederation, his great fight against "anti-continentalism," as he calls it is, that Nova Scotia for instance, is sending $12,000,000 a year to Ontario to pay for goods which come down to her. What does that mean?—inter-provincial trade I think. I will allow my friend to settle that with his friend Attorney General Longley. Well, Sir, is there no other proof of inter-provincial trade than that statement, because if there were none other I should not consider it altogether satisfactory; but I think there is. I find that the Intercolonial Railway carried 175,512 tons of coal in 1887, but that is by no means all the coal which comes from Nova Scotia to Quebec and to the edges of Ontario. Every season, as my hon. friend knows, there are lines of steamers carrying heavy coal freights from Cape Breton, and Sydney, and other places, in this direction. I think there is some inter-provincial trade here. Well, Sir, look again at the sugar trade. There was no inter-provincial trade in sugar in the olden times. I find that last year the Intercolonial Railway carried 143,998 barrels of sugar from the Halifax and Moncton refineries into those upper Provinces. I find that over three-quarters of a million of barrels of flour were carried on the Intercolonial Railway last year, a large proportion of which went to the Maritime Provinces. Why, Sir, my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island is aware of that when the Prince Edward Island Government presented a case against this Government on account of what they thought was a fair claim for compensation, because the communication with the main land had not been satisfactorily carried out, and when it was shown by a report to the Council, which has found its way into the public records, that the amount contributed in Customs by Prince Edward Island was comparatively small, that statement was met by the counter-statement that Prince Edward Island buys very largely from the other Provinces of Canada and consequently that her import figures are no criterion of the Customs upon the imports or of the amount she contributes in this way to the general revenue. To-day Prince Edward Island buys from Halifax, St. John and Montreal, and there is a large and increasing inter-provincial trade in that direction. I might carry this argument further and further, but I think I have stated enough to show that there is a volume of trade far above what was spoken of or what is shown by the simple addition of imports and exports which was relied upon by my friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Again I state he has failed to show the necessity for a heroic remedy by that argument which he has adduced. Those were mainly the arguments he placed before the House. He spoke about debts and taxes. Will he get rid of our debts if we become immersed in this unrestricted reciprocity arrangement? Shall we not have to pay our municipal debts as before? Shall we not have to pay our city debts as before, and shall we not have to pay our Provincial and Dominion debts as before? Shall we not have the costs and charges for government and improvements the same as before? It does not seem to me that there is any prospect of getting rid of them on account of bringing into operation this heroic remedy. Then, Sir, he states that there is no adequate return for public works. What does he mean by "adequate return?" Does he mean that because the great public works in Canada have not paid, in dollars and cents, a revenue, that, therefore, they have not made any adequate return to this great country in its development and extension? If he does, he means something with which I venture to think the majority of this House will not agree. I could quote to him a speech made by the Hon. G. W. Ross not more than two months ago, at a dinner in Toronto, when that gentleman most eloquently portrayed the prosperity of Canada before our illustrious visitor, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, at a banquet given in that city, and in which Mr. Ross pointed out with pride those great public works, our canals and our railways, which he declared were necessary to and a most invaluable factor in the prosperity and growth of this country, and which he was inclined to believe were a signal success. So much with reference to that. The last argument of all is that the federal constitution is about to collapse, but it is said that if you open up this channel of commerce and take commodities free across the border it will have some sort of a magic, subtle, decisive, and healthy effect, that the threatened collapse will be stayed, and the members which now appear to be disjointed will be healed and made sane and sound for all time to come. I venture to say, Sir, while reviewing all the arguments adduced by the hon. gentleman that he has not proved the necessity for his heroic remedy. On the contrary let hon. gentlemen look at the state of the country as it exists to-day. Was it ever in a sounder state in every way? If you look at its position you will see that the credit of Canada was never higher than it is to-day, when our four per cents reach the overtopping figure of 111, 111½ or 111¾.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. 113 now.

Mr. FOSTER. 113 now, my hon. friend informs me. Yes, Sir, if there was something radically wrong which needs this terrible heroic remedy, which needs this revolutionary plaster applied to it in the body politic of the Dominion of Canada, how is it that the wide awake financiers of the great money centres of the world consider the credit of Canada so good that her bonds are constantly appreciating in value and constantly sought after by them as collaterals, in stock and securities. There is another important feature in the case. The revenue of this country is improving. A few years ago when, because of certain reasons, there was a deficit for one or two years, there might have been some grounds for saying we needed a remedy. That has passed away, and to-day the revenue is more than meeting the ordinary expenditure of the country. Then again, Sir, the extraordinary public works are well provided for. Our canals and our great lines of railway, which have cost the country so many millions of dollars, are now completed. They are as good for fifty millions of people as they are for five millions, and it will not be necessary to undertake the extra expense of building those public works again. They need not be duplicated. Once built they stand for the use of the people of this country, though they be never so numerous or never so prosperous. The trade of this country has improved and is increasing daily; not only the foreign trade but the inter-provincial trade as well, and, after all, the true prosperity of the country depends more upon the variety and extent of this inter-provincial trade than it does on its foreign trade. The United States of America is one of the best examples of what I say. Again, the manufacturing interests of this country are in a better condition than they have ever been in the history of Canada. Time was, four or five years ago, when disasters were overtaking our manufacturing industries to a greater or less extent, and when there might have been some ground for claiming on that behalf the need of a heroic remedy. To-day our manufacturing industries are stable and sound, paying fair dividends to those who put money into them, as they should, and giving out their produce to the people at low prices, which, owing to the competition, it is right and natural that they should. There is nothing, then, in the state of the manufacturing industries of the country to call for heroic treatment. What about the business of the country? Have you watched the payments at the banks within the past few days? Have they not been satisfactory from Halifax to Victoria? Have you read the reports of the bank managers? Have they not given a good account of the business of the country? But appeal to your own experience: Is it not true that throughout Canada, from one end to the other, though there may be cases of difficulty here and there, as there always will be, the business of the country is on a stable, firm and sound foundation, and the people are satisfied with the prospects from a business point of view. Our soil is giving forth its good crops—abundant crops in some parts of the country—and the crop of this year has brought a fair average return. Taking all these things into consideration as the reverse of the picture which has been shown to us from the other side of the House, have we not good ground for saying that not only is the case of my hon. friend from South Oxford not proven, but that a strong case stands apparent before every hon. member for not disturbing the present relations, on the ground that under present conditions the country is fairly prosperous, and its future seems fairly well assured? Then, Sir, why this cry? I have noted the reason before: It is because hon. gentlemen opposite, having attempted to climb into power, by attaching themselves to this issue and that issue, to this sad and that sad, having made their bids to the people from unworthy motives and on unworthy grounds in many instances, have been shaken off from the skirts of the garments of the country, and find themselves to-day without a cry; and so they ring out again the old gospel of discontent, and appeal to the widest and strongest class we have in this country, hoping to raise and rouse the farming community into ferment, thinking thereby that they may gain votes in this House, and possibly become a majority instead of a minority in this country. But I have full faith in the intelligence of the farming community, that, if this question comes to be a serious question, to be fought out before them, and both sides of it are fully ventilated, the farmers of this country will hold themselves aloof from the bait held out to them, and will keep themselves to the connections they have to-day, well assured that by so doing their future will not be prejudiced, but, on the contrary, will be prosperous. Now, Sir, the next question that comes is this: The first thing my hon. friend and his supporters had to prove was that a heroic remedy of some kind is necessary. The next thing they would have to prove, if they had been successful in that (which they have not), is that this is the remedy. Now, will hon. gentlemen follow me for a single moment while I deal with the arguments which have been adduced to show that this remedy is the proper remedy. What are they? The hon. member for South Oxford said that this was the remedy and the only remedy. How long has he been of that opinion? As a political physician, how long has he been conducting his diagnosis, and at what particular period of time did it terminate in the conclusion that the remedy was unrestricted reciprocity, and not commercial union or free trade? Well, Sir, not long; for speeches are on record, delivered not many months ago, scarcely yet cold, in which hon. gentlemen opposite, not a few, but many of them, were out full fledged and in full blast in favor of commercial union and commercial union alone as the panacea. However, the diagnosis has gone on; the different physicians have consulted; they came to a conclusion a few days ago, and they believe now that this is the sole and sovereign remedy. What are the reasons given? The first reason is that it will help everybody and hurt nobody. That would be a very good reason if it were proved; but after the assertion should come proof, and so, although my hon. friend glibly asserted that it would help the fishermen, the miners, the lumbermen and the agriculturists and the manufacturers of pluck and brains, he utterly failed to give details of any kind to show the House and the country wherein it would help them or be a special benefit to them. The hon. gentleman said the only classes hurt by it would be: first, the combines; second, the civil service; third, the promoters of elections; and fourth, those who were anxious for piers and wharves and harbors. Now, was my hon. friend really serious? It is such advocacy as that which makes me doubt still whether they intend to make this a real issue, or whether they are not only playing with it to keep themselves in practice until the next eligible thing comes up. The hon. gentleman who says this question should be approached by us as by philosophers and statesmen and not flunkeys, makes the bold assertion that everybody in Canada would be helped except these four classes by this proposition being accepted; and yet a breath or two before he stated that it was a grave question, that it would cause great disturbance, that it was a large change of policy that would be serious in its consequences. Combines! If we have a combination in this Dominion of Canada, it is a Lilliput compared with one of the combinations on the other side, for instance the Standard oil combination. Why, Sir, I can just fancy, if it was this side of the House that was asking for a measure to stop combinations and we proposed as a remedy a union in commerce with the United States, how every file of papers published in the United States would be flashed around these seats, and editorial after editorial read to show that combinations in this country bore no comparison with those in the United States. If you wish to remedy combinations, this proposition would indeed be a case of the big fish eating up the little fish, for the small combinations we have here would be swallowed holus bolus by the large combinations on the other side; and what would happen? We to-day have in our hands a remedy for combinations in our own country in this Parliament, if a parliamentary remedy can be got. But if we put ourselves into the hands of a combination which octopus-like stretches its arms over a country, where we have no legislative jurisdiction, where is the remedy so far as we are concerned? And yet the hon. gentleman thinks fewer combinations would be had under unrestricted reciprocity. Does he propose to blot out the Civil Service if we have unrestricted reciprocity? Will we not need the public service of the country to be carried on, and so have a civil service? I say it seems to me the hon. gentleman is not yet really serious in his advocacy of this question. But if he were serious when he introduced it, something intervened between the time of the introduction of the measure and the time when, towards the end of his speech, he made that trivial assertion which took the seriousness out of him and out of his subject. Well, he says, as an additional reason in favor of his proposition, that the poor man in this country pays the highest taxation and that when we get reciprocity he will pay less taxation. Now the hon. gentleman attacks as monstrously unjust, and the hon. member for Queen's (P.E.I.) reiterated the same argument, and challenged proof to the contrary, the statement that the poor man does not pay the heavy weight of taxation in this country. But when the hon. gentleman was asked on this side to point out the articles on which the poor man paid his heavy tax, he let off an extra edition of the fireworks he always keeps on hand, but took great care to aim no straight bullet at the mark which was put before him. I challenge him now or any hon. gentleman on that side to go into particulars, and to prove, in the first place, that the poor man pays the weight of taxation; and to prove, in the second place, that if he does, unrestricted reciprocity will remove that weight in any measure. Look at the question as it stands. What does the poor man buy on which he pays this heavy taxation? Take, first, the fairly well-to-do class. Take, for instance, the farmer. On what does he pay taxes? Most articles that go into the food of his family, so far as their daily wants are concerned, is raised on his own farm, and on these articles he does not pay a cent of taxation. Then the large proportion of the clothing he and his family wear is made out of the products of his own farm or of this country, and no taxes paid. With him the luxuries he buys are the minimum whilst with the wealthy man the luxuries rise to the maximum, and in this country the practice is followed of putting the weight of taxation on the luxuries and taking it off the necessities. Oh, but my hon. friend says, there is the tariff on coarse woollens, and consequently the man who wears these woollens pays a heavy tax on every yard he uses. Does he? The farmer has sheep on his own farm, which he often shears himself, and whose wool he has often made up in the mill of his own locality, and his family wear the clothes thus manufactured. Where is the tax that is paid on these? The statement that the tax is paid in this case can only be affirmed on two grounds: First, that all the woollen clothing worn in this country is manufactured in large establishments, or else is imported; and second, that that which is manufactured in the large manufactories, notwithstanding the competition induced, pays the tariff that is put on the imported articles. But will that be remedied by unrestricted reciprocity, which is to open up a channel of trade between this country and the United States? How will the tax be taken off the woollens worn by the farmers, or the other materials he uses for his wear, since in the United States a heavier tax is imposed on these articles than is imposed here? We are asked to enter into commercial relations with a country which has a higher tariff than we have, and in the name of common sense I would ask how then are the taxes here to be lowered? The proposition falls to the ground of its own weight: first that the poor man pays the tax; and second, that the tax will be taken off if unrestricted reciprocity be the rule. But the hon. gentleman says it will suit Great Britain and the United States, and my hon. friend was not content with drawing a picture of this country in hues of the very blackness of despair, but he must needs have his fling at the mother country as well. And in these troublous times, when forces are at work which at any moment may create a great conflagration, the outcome of which no man can foresee, and when even the utterances of men in a Parliament of this kind, have their effect more or less in the wide world in which they are read, the hon. gentleman must go out of his way to taunt Great Britain with having no ally on the continent of Europe among the first-class powers. Sir, the position of Great Britain has been well-taken and well-maintained in the past. The institutions of Britain are, to-day, stronger than ever they were before; the power of the Anglo-Saxon race the wide world over, is as great as ever, while the spirit of their enterprise displayed around this whole globe of ours, and which strengthens and enobles the British power, taken collectively as a whole, has never been manifested to greater perfection than it is to-day. Great Britain will take good care to hold her proud position, and it was not manly or statesmanlike in the hon. gentleman, occupying the position he does, to question in this House her ability to retain the great influence she has always exercised in European affairs. But supposing Great Britain has no ally among the first-class powers in Europe, does the hon. gentleman propose to make for her an ally of the United States, and to embroil the United States in the European entanglements which affect Great Britain alone? Does he think that the United States, which have kept themselves religiously aloof from European entanglements, will make an alliance with Great Britain, and thus run the risk of involving themselves with Great Britain, in all the European complications that are liable to rise at any moment? What influence the great powers of reasoning of the hon. gentleman may have on the government of the United States in this respect, I cannot say, but judging from the specimens of his logic we have heard here within the last twenty-four hours, I am inclined to think his arguments will not stir the United States from the position they have hitherto maintained. What a fine method that would be of making an ally for the mother country, by putting ourselves in commercial union with the United States and raising a discriminating tariff wall against our mother land. The proposal does seem odd, though there may be some abstruse meaning in it that we cannot seize, but of which the hon. member for South Oxford is fully aware. But he says, we will not discriminate largely against Great Britain, and this afternoon, I think I heard him say that our trade with Great Britain would be actually improved. Just analyse that for a moment. Here are 5,000,000 of Canadians, here is an open channel of trade between Canada and the United States, and here is an hon. gentleman asserting that the trade between the two countries will grow to $300,000,000 a year. Now what will happen? Between the United States and this country, there will be no tariff, while between this country and Great Britain there is a tariff of fairly good proportions, say 22 or 25 per cent. We enter this commercial alliance. We create a trade between the two countries that will reach $300,000,000 a year; and then, when we grow rich and wax fat and sleek, the hon. gentleman says he will turn to our own mother country and import goods from her, on which we will pay the extra Customs duty, just for the sake of showing that in the long run our trade with Great Britain will not suffer. That is a most unreasonable proposition. The currents of trade, if they be free and advantageous to ourselves, will be kept for the sake of the advantages they offer, and it would be proved by the experiment, if the experiment should be ever unfortunately made, that our trade with Great Britain would dwindle to almost nothing, because the odds are against our trading with the country on whose goods we put a tariff of 25 per cent, as compared with a country between which and ourselves there is no tariff. But the hon. gentleman says, if we consider advisable to discriminate against Great Britain, we have the right to do so. We have our own interests and they are paramount, and that assertion was made still stronger to-day by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) Now, I have two or three links in a chain of reasoning that I would like the hon. gentlemen to follow, if I can clearly express it. The hon. member for South Oxford says: If it does discriminate against Great Britain, we have a right to do it, our own interests are paramount, which is equivalent to saying, on a fair interpretation, that, whenever the time comes that it is better for us to do thus, and so in commercial matters, we have a right to do so, and it is our duty to do so in our own interests; and he then makes the second assertion that we owe nothing to Great Britain but charity for the atrocious blundering she has been guilty of in regard to our interests. There is first the statement that we have nothing but our own interests to regard because they are paramount and secondly, there is the assertion that the paramount idea of our own interests has been overridden by Great Britain. And then the hon. gentleman goes on to clench all that by saying that there never was a time in her own history when Canada could not have bettered her condition by linking her interests with the United States of America. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, and I ask hon. gentlemen around these boards to tell me which is the most honorable position, that occupied by my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) or that occupied by my hon. friend from the City of St. John, N.B. (Mr. Ellis). I can imagine a colloquy in the corridors between my friend from St. John and my friend from South Oxford. My friend from St. John says: Sir Knight, you tell me that our own interests should be paramount? Yes. You tell me that we owe Great Britain nothing but charity, and very little of that? Yes. You tell me that there never was any time when Canada's interests would not have been better served by linking them with the United States of America? Yes. Then, why do you not say at once: Let us link our fortunes with the United States of America, and why do you not be as brave and honest about it as I am? The only difference between these two hon. gentlemen is—and it is to the credit of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis)—that he believes thus and so, and has the courage to express it, even though it may be unpalatable to the gentlemen around him and to the people among whom he lives, while my hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) contends and works in the same line, but he is afraid of outside opinion and gilds it over by saying Oh, no, I am not an annexationist, I do not believe in annexation. That is the only difference between them, and I think it is in favor of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Ellis) and I willingly give him the credit due. Then we are told as a reason why this is the peculiar and only remedy, that it will give the United States a great home market in Canada. The hon. gentleman believes in the doctrine of equivalents. He is superlatively honest, and he would not take anything without giving something in return, and he is perforce driven by his own innate spirit of right to maintain the argument that there will be equivalents, and one of those is that the United States will get a large home market in Canada. Let us reason that out. There are five millions of people in Canada. They buy all they are able to now. They buy that from certain persons now. My hon. friend from South Oxford says to the people of the United States.

Adopt this scheme, and you will get a largely extended home market in Canada. What will happen? If they get that home market, the people of Canada cannot buy more than they are able to. It will be simply a displacement, and the people of the United States, the merchants of the United States, will get what our merchants and our industrial centres now get. In what will they find a home market in this country? For their coal, in Nova Scotia? If they do, I ask my hon. friend whether he can find a market for American coal in Nova Scotia, without displacing an equal quantity of coal brought up from the mines in Nova Scotia, and, if he displaces Nova Scotia coal by American coal, I ask him what becomes of the men who, with drill, pick and lamp, earn that which supports their families and builds up their villages by mining the coal in the depths under the sea in the Province of Nova Scotia. They will only be able to obtain a market by displacing what is now provided by our own people, and, if they get a market in regard to manufactures, in regard to agricultural produce, in regard to sugar, they can only do it by displacing those who are now carrying on these trades as Canadians, who are improving Canadian industries, with profits to the Canadian people. The hon. gentleman adopts the dictum of Attorney General Longley, who says that, instead of getting ten or twelve million dollars' worth from Upper Canada, they will get it from the United States. The exporters in Boston and New York will gain, but what about the merchants and manufacturers of Halifax and the Lower Provinces, and what about the millers and wheat growers in the other Provinces? I have not the time to carry out this reasoning, but hon. gentlemen can carry it out for themselves, and they will come to the conclusion that in nearly every case every dollar's worth of goods obtained from the United States in the way of an increased home market in Canada will displace an equal amount which has come generally through Canadian channels. That is what the apostle of commercial union declares. Mr. Wiman lets out a great deal of the truth, and sometimes this truth gets to our ears. Speaking in Newark, N. J., he says:

"If new markets for relief of over-production, created by the stimulant of protection, can be made accessible" —

What does that mean? It means simply that the producing power of the United States is over and above what is necessary to furnish its own market, and can easily have a surplus to send into other countries and other markets. Where would it be sent? Into Canada, says he. To do what? To displace an equal amount now furnished by the woollen and cotton manufacturers of Canada — —"without disturbing in the slightest the perfect equilibrium of existing taxation, clearly it is the duty of the protectionist to secure these markets, not only because of the immediate outlet which they afford, but as an illustration of the benefits of his favorite policy. Further, if these new markets, secured by the protectionist without sacrifice, are got at the expense of a free trade nation, so much the better. This would be one of the results of commercial union. The total trade of Canada, a portion of the British Empire, is about $200,000,000. Two-thirds of it, it is supposed, can be secured by the United States, by simply lifting up the Customs line that now runs through the middle of the continent, and stretching it right around the continent. This would not only admit to more than half the continent all American manufacturers, but it would create in their favor, in one part of the British Empire, a discrimination against the manufacturers of another part of the British Empire. Can anything be more attractive to the average American protectionist than this advantage over the pauper labor of Europe?"

And Mr. Hitt, who has been glorified as one of the joint laborers in this heroic remedy which is to be applied by the hon. gentleman, states this a little more fully. In speaking to eastern men—and he is a western man—at a great banquet, he declared:

"We in the west would like you manufacturers of New England to have access to that great market of Canada. With a Reciprocity Treaty or, better still, Commercial Union, you will have the preference over English, French and German goods, and in two years' time after its adoption, goods from Yankee manufacturers will be in every retail store from Montreal to Victoria."

Well, that is perfectly right as a matter to be striven after by our friends in the United States. But it remains for us seriously to consider whether it is for our interest, as a country, that we should lay our industries at this particular time, open to that competition. But again he says that it would give us the United States market. Now, that was pretty well ventilated by my colleague last night, and I shall not traverse the ground made by him. I simply draw your attention to one of the sportively imaginative statements of the hon. member for South Oxford. He talked about our railways. He said we had long lines but they were not carrying much, but just let unrestricted reciprocity come into force, and our railways might carry more to the borders and less to the seaboard, and they would speedily quadruple freights and quadruple their earnings. Well, that is a rosy statement. Did he give one iota of proof which would lead us to believe that this would be the case? Has he not stated to this House as one of the attractive points of his programme that there are large American cities along the border, that our Provinces lie contiguous to these cities. But remark that if this project were carried out, you would only have a constant stream of traffic along our lines of railway from one of these countries into another. To-day, Sir, the great traffic of our railway consists in what it carries from points distant far in the west to points distant far in the east conversely from one Province to another Province; by this proposition you would cut off to, a large extent, that great long line of traffic, and you would substitute a cross traffic in which the lines of intercommunication would be changed out of their present course by running between this country and the United States in order to get to these great cities. So much for the rosy idea of quadrupling freights and earnings of the railways of this country. With these remarks I leave that branch of my subject, hoping that I have fairly well proved that this remedy which has been proposed is not the best thing for the people of Canada. There remains one question which I shall state briefly, and that is this: Is this a favorable time in which to make a proposition for closer relations between us and the United States? My hon. friend says yes, it is the happy, happy now? And he goes on to give his reasons why it is the happy now by saying that at present tariff reductions are imminent. How far are tariff reductions imminent, so far as we can see? They are imminent only so far as the Tariff Bill brought down by Mr. Mills of Texas is concerned. That, Sir, is the extreme limit to which the people of the United States who are most favorable to the reduction in the tariff, dare to go, thinking to carry with them the support of Congress and the Senate which is necessary for the measure. If you scan that measure carefully you will find that, though on some few things the tariff is reduced, on the whole it is left far above the present average tariff of the Dominion of Canada, so that the reduction of the tariff, imminent as he says, is not a very great reduction of the tariff at the best. But he says the President, in his message, invited trade negotiations. Now, that is not a sufficient statement to go to the country. It is a sufficient statement to go to Parliament, because this Parliament is well conversant with the difference in powers between the Executive in the United States and the Executive in this country. If the Cabinet of this country, through any one of its members, or through the Governor General, made a proposition, it would be bound to carry that proposition through, and the people would consider that the country was pledged because the Government staked its life upon it. But in the United States it is very different. The President and his executive officers are, in large measure, totally distinct from and outside of the Congress and Senate of the United States. They may make suggestions, they may send down messages, as they do from time to time, to be entirely ignored by the Congress and Senate, unless the feeling in those bodies is in their favor. Why, we had a President's message with reference to the fishery question, asking the United States' Senate to appoint a commission. It was sent down to that body, and the Senate rejected it by a vote of 35 to 10. So it is not indubitable proof that the United States is ready to meet trade propositions, because an invitation happens to be put in the President's message. Again, it was stated that Mr. Bayard's invitation to Sir Charles Tupper showed that they were ready for it. Mr. Bayard's invitation to Sir Charles Tupper was previous to the conference. When the conference came together then they were treating in a closer capacity, and the proposition was made by Sir Charles Tupper on behalf of the British Commissioners that they should approach this matter on the basis of a general commercial adjustment between the two countries, and to that Mr. Bayard and his co-plenipotentiaries gave a decisive and categorical answer in the negative, and did it, why? Because, they said, in the present condition of affairs, it would be impossible to carry it through Congress and the Senate, whose support is necessary to give it life. Could anything more clearly show that the public opinion of the United States is not ripe for a proposition of this kind? The hon. gentleman again says that another indication is Mr. Butterworth's Bill, and Mr. Hitt's Bill. I have not time to lay before you the documents that I have, to show you the fact that, for years, Bills and resolutions like Mr. Hitt's and Mr. Butterworth's, in all essential particulars, have been introduced over and over again in the Congress and in the Senate, and have never got further than a committee, or an adverse report from a committee. So these indications are not strong ones. He blames the Government, however, for having delayed to adjust the fishery question on Mr. Bayard's proposition until the presidential year. The Government of Canada delayed nothing. In 1865 they made a proposition, and the British Government made a proposition in their behalf, looking to a speedy conference between the two countries to undertake negotiations and settle this matter. That was pressed over and over again by Great Britain, and just so soon as the United States accepted the proposition, just so soon that proposition was taken advantage of by the British Government. But it was not delayed a single moment so far as Canada and Great Britain were concerned. It did happen to come off in the presidential year, and for that, my hon. friend finds fault with the Government. Yet he brings down a proposition asking Parliament to affirm a resolution in favor of a certain course, and instructing the Government, in this presidential year, here and now, to undertake negotiations with the United States in reference to that proposition. If a presidential year is bad in respect of the negotiation of one treaty, why it is not bad for another? Now, I would rather liken my hon. friend to Jove than to do him the discourtesy of likening him, as one of his supporters did this afternoon, to Goliath.

An hon. MEMBER. Not Goliath, but Jove.

Mr. FOSTER. The Jove of his party. But, likening him to Jove, we may well say that for once he has been found nodding. Now, Sir, having gone over these points, I beg simply to conclude by making one or two remarks with reference to a point which the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) brought up this afternoon. I am sorry he is not in his place in the House to hear my criticism. My hon. friend thought that the Minister of the Interior was somewhat confused last night in his speech, and that he forgot he was talking about unrestricted reciprocity, and broke off into saying something about commercial union. I think there was great excuse for some such confusion, if any such confusion existed. My hon. friend, no doubt, had two or three hon. gentlemen in his eye, and among them he had probably the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), and he was thinking about an utterance delivered by the hon. gentleman. Speaking at Charlotte-town before the Board of Trade, not many weeks ago, the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) made this statement:

"Under commercial union trade would flow freely between this country and the United States, as it now flows between the several States; while, as against the rest of the world there would be a uniform tariff, to be mutually agreed upon by the two countries comprised in the union. 'Unrestricted reciprocity' would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would retain the right to frame its own tariff as against the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent. tariff, while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal. To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent. An unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit us as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable."

Now, in what position does the hon. gentleman place himself? Is he an honest man, is he putting this question for honest purposes before this Parliament, or is he doing as he accuses us of doing, dangling a spangle before the eyes of the people? I will believe, in the first place, that he is an honest man, and that, when he took up the two lines of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity, he believed what he said, and he had good grounds for the belief, that the people of the United States, unless they were arrant fools, would never accept unrestricted reciprocity. Well, Sir, in what position, if he was an honest man at that time, is he placing himself now? He comes here and argues before this Parliament and asks this Parliament to adopt a measure, to show its whole hand, to go, as it were, the whole figure, to keep nothing back, to state out and out to the people of the United States: We will give you everything in exchange, if you will let us take everything into your country as an exchange; and yet, in the face of that, he says—to himself, of course—the United States will not accept such a proposition as that, they are not such arrant fools, and unless they were arrant fools, they would never take unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Sir, do you find any fault with any hon. gentleman on this side being slightly confused when he was looking into the eye of the hon. member who, not many weeks ago, made that statement, and has not disclaimed that statement to this day? Or, if it is true that he believes what he said here, is it not a reprehensible proceeding for a public man to attempt to put before Parliament and the country, and press to a solution a proposition, all the time believing that the neighboring power will never accept the proposition, but will certainly reject it unless they are arrant fools, which we know the people of the United States are not? There were one or two other statements made by the hon. member for Queen's to which I desire to refer, especially to one of those strong generalisations in which he is apt to indulge respecting the poverty of the people of Prince Edward Island. He goes on, turn by turn, till he reaches the climax, and the climax is this: That the people of Prince Edward Island, the farmers there especially, are living without hope—not only in Prince Edward Island, but in the Maritime Provinces—they are becoming poorer and poorer, losing hope and falling into despair. And yet I turn up the blue-books of the Dominion and look at the list which shows the earnings put into the Savings Bank of Prince Edward Island and what do I find? In 1874 they had a balance of $336,000 to their credit there, in 1879 it had climbed up to $420,000, to-day it is $2,200,000. There is a paltry increase of $34,000, in that halcyon period measured by the time when the hon. gentlemen opposite were in power in this country, and there is a massive saving of $1,750,000 which had been placed there by the poor people of Prince Edward Island in the time covered from 1880 to 1887; and yet they are living without hope, ready to plunge over into the fatal gulf of despair, they are entirely without aspiration and entirely without prospects for the future. Looking at these things it seems to me that the position which this Parliament may well take is something like this: The measure which has been proposed is a heroic measure according to the statement of the hon. gentleman who introduced it into this House. He has already failed to prove, in the first place, that a necessity for a heroic measure exists; in the second place, he has failed to prove that this is a measure which would be beneficial to Canada; and yet he asks this Government to leave the old and beaten policy and take this bantling of his own. On the other side you have the policy of the Government which from the first has been stable and has been proved. It has been this: To cultivate the most friendly relations between this country and the kindred people who live to the south of us, to seek in every way to have as fair and as free commercial relations as it is possible for the two peoples honorably to agree upon. There has not been a time since 1848 till to-day when the proposition has not stood out freely and fairly before the people of the United States something like this: Come and let us reason together and place our commercial and reciprocal relations on a fair and honorable basis for both of us. If ever those relations once established for a period have been broken, it has never been at the instance and wish of the Government or this Parliament, but always at the instance and wish of our cousins on the south of the border. Hon. gentlemen tell us that it is nothing, that an Act of Parliament stands on the Statute-book offering reciprocal trade between this country and the United States the moment the United States is willing to accept it. I take that statement and I say to hon. gentlemen opposite: Suppose the United States had put a clause in their Tariff Act saying, the very moment Canada makes natural products free the United States will make them free, would we not have a pressure which it would be totally impossible for us to resist? What can be a stronger expression of opinion than an Act of Parliament voicing the opinion of the people, which has stood before the people of the United States for some time? This stood before the people of the United States, and in all our relations there has been dominant in this Parliament and with this Government since it has been in power, the desire to have as free and extended and cordial relations as are possible in the interests of both countries. On the other hand we have felt, and the Government has introduced the policy which they carry out, that failing that, and if we cannot have extended reciprocal relations with the United States, the thing for us to do is to carve out a policy of our own which will stimulate industries in our own country, which will build up inter-provincial trade, which will give us a national standard of independence of our own, and which will put us on our feet in the future as it has contributed to our self-respect in the past. That policy is dear to the heart of the country. The fireworks let off about corruption and the way in which elections are carried on are very good for a slight blaze, but they go out soon, and a perfume remains which is not of the sweetest or most pleasant kind. The real facts of the case about the elections are that the people after the most thorough discussion were roused to look into this question, and after giving to the Government a mandate in 1878 to foster the industries of this country by means of a protective tariff, they enjoyed the benefits for four years, and when this Government went back to the people, the people renewed that mandate and enjoyed the benefits for another four years. The same people who in 1873 returned us into power, in 1887 sent this Government and the party which is with the Government back, with a strong stable majority, asking them and pledging them to preserve the interests which they had confided to their charge and the trust with which they had commissioned them in 1878 and in 1882. The Government feels, and the party feels, and the country in the main feels that this is the policy which is stable, fair, and honest. While at the same time we look after our own industries we are willing to meet every fair proposition that is made for extended trade relations with the people to the south of us. In this regard then and with those remarks I beg leave to move the following amendment:—

That Canada in the future as in the past is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various industries and interests of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and which has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of the people.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). Mr. Speaker, this I consider to be the most important question that has come before the people of the Dominion of Canada for many a day; and, Sir, as I belong to the agricultural community, and as I have always been opposed to the policy that has been adopted by the Government of this country, as a policy that has borne harder on the laboring classes, which I represent, than on any other class in the Dominion, I would not be performing my duty to my constituents were I to listen to this debate without lifting my voice in favor of the resolution which has been offered in this House by the Hon. Sir Richard John Cartwright, member of Parliament for the south riding of Oxford. I believe, Sir, that this resolution if carried into effect will do more to quiet the discontent that exists in Canada to-day than all the National Policies in existence. We have been asked, Sir, to show on this side of the House that the remedy we offer will put an end to the large amount of emigration going out of the country into the United States. I would ask the hon. gentleman opposite if the hon. leader of the Government in his famous speech at Parkhill did not attempt to prove that this would be the remedy when he stated as one of the reasons why the policy should be enforced, that he wanted to bring back to Canada the 500,000 of our own people in the workshops of the United States, and that by adopting a policy that would re-adjust the tariff and foster the industries that object would be attained, and the agricultural industry would be benefited, as we would be able to keep our own people at home to consume our own products. The hon. gentleman referred to a great many other blessings which would ensue from a reform of the tariff. Hon. gentlemen opposite must see before this time that the National Policy has entirely failed to confer the blessings which were promised to the people of this country. I would just say this in relation to what the First Minister has said, that what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. Since one policy has failed, since it has taken out of this country a great many more people than the policy that was followed by the Government of which the Hon. Mr. Mackenzie was the head, I hold that it is time we ought to have some change. We have been asked the reason why we bring up such a proposition as this, and why we ask for this redress under the present circumstances? My answer to this would be that the agricultural industry in this country is now in a very languishing condition, that the prices of our products are very low indeed, and that we are not receiving prices equal to what we had before the National Policy was adopted, compared with the prices received by the people on the other side of the line. We are paying a greater amount for the goods we consume than we would pay if it were not for this policy, and the agricultural community one might say is cut at both ends. The price of their produce is reduced and whatever they have to purchase they have to pay a larger price for. I will pass on very rapidly over a few of the statements made by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He tried to show that there was no danger of nature being too strong, and he went on to show how nature had been overcome between this Province and our Pacific Provinces, how it had been overcome between the United States and her Pacific provinces, and he argued that trade was not a geographical matter. But, Sir, in that trade between the United States and her Pacific Provinces there was no iron wall of protection between the Eastern and Western States, neither was there between the Eastern Provinces of the Dominion of Canada and her Pacific Provinces. I venture the statement that if Great Britain enforced such a policy towards the East Indies as the Government of Canada has adopted here, the trade of Great Britain in that country would never have attained to the position it has attained to at the present day. It was by such a course as we now ask for in the proposition laid before this House that the trade of that country has been promoted. I would just say that the very fact that Ontario sends $5,000,000 annually into the British market to-day, while it sends $22,800,000 into the markets of the United States, although there is a tariff of over 16 per cent. against us in the one case and a free market in the other, is proof positive that natural channels will be followed in spite of all the tariffs that can be framed. Another argument, which I was sorry to see the hon. Minister of Marine pass over as he did, was that relating to inter-provincial trade. I think the hon. member for South Oxford stated yesterday that $340,000 more had been spent on the Intercolonial Railway within the last seven months than the earnings of the railway amounted to, and I think I saw about a year ago the statement that the Intercolonial Railway cost in 12 months $160,000 more than it had earned, showing that the inter-provincial trade is not growing, but has decreased; and I was astonished that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries did not apply himself to this argument. He dealt a great deal more in what I may term blustering statements than in arguing the question. Now, Sir, we were told that there was as great a diminution in the population of some of the United States as there has been in this country. I do not believe any hon. gentleman opposite can rise and mention any State in the Union, similarly situated to Ontario, in which there has been as small a gain in population, as there has been in that Province. I have a statement here showing that in 1880 the population of Ontario was 1,683,883, and in 1884 1,754,044, a gain of 70,161, while the State of Michigan, situated similarly to Ontario, but not having as many natural advantages, during the same period gained 219,163. That State and the Province of Ontario are nearly equal in population, while in area and fertility the Province of Ontario far surpasses the State of Michigan. Then, Sir, we were told that the volume of trade was less in 1883 than it was in 1887. I have here a statement of the volume of trade between the United States and Canada during the years of the Reciprocity Treaty. I find that in 1873 the total volume of trade between the United States and Canada amounted to $93,915,716, while in 1886 it only amounted to $84,027,223. But going back to the year 1866, the year in which the Reciprocity Treaty ended, I find that the volume of trade between Canada and the United States in that year amounted to $84,685,361, or $600,000 more than it did in 1886, showing clearly that the trade of this country with the United States is not growing as it ought to. The farmers of this country can look back to the time of that Reciprocity Treaty from 1854 to 1866, and we can remember the great strides the country made at that time, and the prosperity that was enjoyed by every household in Canada, especially among the agricultural population; and we believe, Sir, that unless there is a remedy found for the present state of affairs in Canada there will be a severe strain put upon Confederation. To show what the feeling is in the County of Huron, to which I belong, I will just read a letter which I received yesterday from a friend in that county:

"I am pleased to learn that the Opposition are making unrestricted reciprocity with the United States one of the planks in their platform. I think it will be very popular. I also think that if we do not get something in that line before many years there will be a strong annexation party in this country, and I fear your correspondent will be added to that number."

Such is the feeling that pervades not merely the eastern and western Provinces of this country, but that is spreading rapidly among the agricultural population of the Province of Ontario. We are told that we pay no taxes on our own wool from which we make our own cloth. I can remember the statement by the hon. First Minister in his famous Parkhill speech, that if we had the National Policy all our own cloth would be made out of wool of our own raising. But I can tell him his prophesy has not been fulfilled, for whereas we imported in 1878 $8,000,000 worth of woollen goods, we imported in 1886 $11,000,000 worth. The effect of this on the agricultural population is, that we have to pay the whole duty even on the goods manufactured in Canada. In conversation a few days before I came to Ottawa with a large importer of dry goods from the British market, I put the question to him: "What is the effect of the tariff on goods manufactured in this country, and at what percentage can goods manufactured in Canada be purchased below goods manufactured in the English market?" His reply was that on goods purchased in Canada similar to the goods purchased in Scotland he had to pay the whole duty, that is, an average of 27 per cent. on a round lot of dry goods, which amounted to 33 per cent. to the consumer, and that the only margin left over the cost of the Canadian manufactured goods compared with the cost of the goods manufactured in Britain was something like 2 per cent., that is the cost of freight and insurance; so that the statement cannot be contradicted that we have to pay an amount equal to the duty, and that goes into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturers. Yet I do not believe that even the manufacturers have benefited to the extent that they might, because I believe very large amounts of money have been sunk in manufacturing industries for which there is not sufficient demand in this country. I will venture the statement that no large capitalist will ever come into this country and invest any large sum of money unless we have a larger market. Then the question comes, where are we to find this larger market? Because we find that our export of manufactured goods was some $1,300,000 less last year than it was in 1878. This shows that our manufactures are not keeping pace with the improvements which are going on in manufacturing in other countries, and that the National Policy has had the effect of destroying the market in other countries for Canadian manufactured goods. There has been a good deal said with respect to the decreased value of land in the Province of Ontario. I will say, as a farmer, that this is, perhaps, a subject with which I am better acquainted than many others, as I have had an opportunity of testing the value of lands in the County of Huron and in the County of Perth which very few farmers have had. I had the honor to be appointed twelve months ago to value the whole County of Perth for equalisation purposes. I went over it along with another gentleman and put a value on every lot of land there, and I can assure you, Sir, that the reduction in the value of land in that county amounts to 10 and 15 per cent., and in some cases more. I am certain that the same reduction has taken place in the County of Huron, to which I have the honor to belong. In that county we had in 1886, according to the latest reports, 2,600 people less than in 1878, showing plainly that the country is not prosperous. There are eight counties in Ontario which have 2,000 less population than they had in 1878; yet we are told that the country is in a healthy, prosperous and thriving condition. I would ask what is the cause of the hard times we have in Canada? I need not go further back than 1882, to show the decrease in the value of crops in the Province of Ontario. In Ontario, in 1882, the value of the crops of wheat, barley, oats, rye and peas was $89,682,065, but when we come to 1886 we find the value is shrunk to $58,000,683. Now, this is a very large reduction indeed, and a reduction for which we cannot entirely blame the Government, because there is no government in the world, in my opinion, that can remedy this, although we have been told by the First Minister in one of his famous speeches that the clerk of the weather was a good Conservative. In 1878 the right hon. gentleman said the clerk of the weather was on their side, and would give a good crop, because he knew the Conservatives were going into power. But if he was a good Conservative, he must, like all Conservatives, have overdone the matter, and has not since given us the fine sunshine and the great crops which it was predicted he would supply. If the right hon. gentleman had the power of obtaining all those blessings for us, what is the reason he has forgotten at this time to give the good crops, the clear skies, the good prices, the abundance of employment and the high wages, which, in 1878, he predicted would follow the advent of his party to power? Why has he allowed hundreds of thousands of the most promising youths of our native-born population to go and settle across the lines? There is another statement which the hon. gentleman made in that famous speech to which I have alluded, and that is, that it would not pay at that time to build mills in Canada, and the reason he gave was that they had a very small number of customers on this side, but that on the other side of the line they would have 40,000,000 consumers. If that argument held good then, it must hold doubly good to-day. Not only that, but we find that under the influence of the National Policy flour which has fallen, since 1881, only 90 cents per barrel in the United States, has fallen in the Dominion over $2 a barrel, so that no miller would be wise in building a mill in this country as long as the present condition of things, under which the value of produce and of labor has fallen so considerably, continues. Now, I will address myself a little further to the question of the crops. In 1886, the value of the crops was $31,361,982 less than it was in 1882. But I will go further and state that the value of the crop of 1887 is less still. According to the quarterly report of the Bureau of Industries issued in the month of August, we had 10,000,000 bushels of wheat less in 1887 than in 1886. We had 5,000,000 bushels less oats, 2,136,000 bushels less barley and 3,000,000 bushels less peas, and if you take these at the market prices, you will find a loss of $3,000,000 on the grain crop of 1887 as compared with that of 1882. That taken from the sum of $58,000,000, which was the value of the crop of 1882, reduces the crop of 1887 to a little over $45,000,000, or very little more than one-half the crop of 1882. Yet we are told we are prosperous; yet we are told that the most prosperous people in the world to-day are the farmers of Ontario. The hon. the Minister of the Interior told us that, but I can well remember that this gentleman's sympathies are not to any great extent with the farmers of the Dominion. I think he made a speech in Montreal at a banquet, and I was a little astonished at the statements he then made. He said he had always considered that the prosperity of the Dominion lay with the merchants of Canada, and the commercial travellers, the future merchants. Hon. gentlemen opposite ignore the great wealth producers of the Dominion, the agriculturists and the laborers. They ignore them entirely, and it appears this class is only here for the purpose of having a large amount of taxation imposed on it, without receiving in any shape whatever any corresponding benefit. But our loss does not stop there. We were told by the hon. the Minister of the Interior that horses and cattle in Ontario were on the increase. But in the report I received last August, we have 70,000 fewer cattle than in 1886, 214,700 fewer sheep, 25,305 fewer hogs, and yet we are the most prosperous people in the

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron.)

Dominion. But the effects of the National Policy do not stop here. I do not hold it responsible in every case, but I say it has reduced the prices of produce. The price of flour in the United States in 1881 was $5.60 per barrel, but in 1886 it had fallen to $4.60, a reduction of 97 cents, whereas the price in Montreal in 1881 was $5.64, against $3.56 in 1886, a reduction of $2.08. Take wheat, and you find that the price in the United States in 1881 was $1.11, against 87 cents in 1886, a reduction of 24 cents, whereas in Canada the price of wheat in 1881 was $1.33, against 85 cents in 1886, a reduction of 48 cents. Corn in the United States was 55 cents in 1881 and 49 cents in 1886, a reduction of 6 cents, whereas in Canada it was 46 cents in 1881 and 49 cents in 1886, a reduction of 17 cents. Thus we find that in Canada flour had fallen $2.08 against 97 cents in the United States, while wheat had fallen 48 cents in Canada against 24 cents in the United States, and corn had fallen 17 cents in Canada against 6 cents in the United States. If hon. gentlemen ask where I got this information, I can tell them that it was not from any wicked Grit or falsifying Reformer, but that the information is contained in a record which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture has put into the hands of every member of this House, and from that statement hon. gentlemen can see that we, the farmers of Ontario, have been robbed to a great extent by the National Policy. I was very happy to hear the Minister of the Interior state yesterday that in 1886 we raised 27,500,000 bushels of wheat in the Province of Ontario. It was a statement I had intended to make myself, and I now corroborate it. For what reason do I corroborate it? I corroborate it for the purpose of showing that half of that wheat would be consumed by the farmer and the other half would be put on the market, and that, as the price of the home market is regulated by the price we get for what we export, and as it was reduced 24 cents per bushel more than the price of wheat was reduced in the United States, if we take the half of that wheat at 13,500,000 bushels, we find that the Province of Ontario lost $3,310,763 on the price of that wheat during that season. Taking all this into consideration, is it to be wondered at that the farmers of Ontario are in a languishing condition? What is it that gives value to farming property? What is it that gives value to land? Is it not the value of what we raise? and, as the value of our grain has shrunk 50 per cent. since 1882, is it not reasonable to say that the value of land has shrunk also? I was surprised to hear the hon. Minister say that the value of farm property in Ontario had increased by $13,000,000 in 1886 over the value in 1885. His statement was in reality correct, but the hon. gentleman did not treat the subject fairly. He ought to have taken an average of a few years, and, if he had gone back to 1883 he would have found that in that year the land in the Province of Ontario was worth $654,693,035, and when he came to 1886 he would have found that the land was worth $643,009,828, or a reduction of $6,783,197 in the value of the land during that time. He would also have found that since 1883, 300,000 acres of land had been brought under the assessment rolls in the older counties of Ontario and 400,000 acres of land had been cleared. If you take the 300,000 acres at $29 an acre, you have $8,700,000, and if you take the 100,000 acres besides, which were cleared, at $20 an acre, which would not be an extravagant price, that would be $2,000,000, making a total of $10,700,000. This brings the reduction in the value of the land from the year 1883 to the year 1886 to $17,483,197, and that is exclusive of all the improvements that have gone on in all the other parts of the Province except upon these 400,000 acres cleared since 1883, and the 300,000 acres which have been placed upon the assessment roll. I hold, therefore, that we have suffered to a very large extent. Although it may be shown that in buildings we have increased the value to the amount of $20,717,637, I think I can show that those buildings and the implements for which we have paid to the extent of $7,000,000, are not really, though they may be nominally, the property of the farmer, as he is indebted for them, and is getting rapidly further in debt. Even now, I have not told the whole tale in regard to the farmers of Ontario and the burdens to which they are subjected, though some of them are of their own imposing. We have heard a good deal in respect to mortgages, and we had a very glowing account from the hon. Minister of the Interior, who told us what a great many companies had reported; but anyone who knows anything about borrowed money and mortgages in Ontario knows that there is a great deal of private funds lent among the farmers on first class mortgages, the farmers preferring to take private moneys to borrowing from the companies; and these are amounts of which the Government cannot know anything. I know that this practice exists to a great extent in the County of Huron and all over the Province of Ontario. The Insurance and Finance Chronicle of Montreal, in its January issue, values the land very much as the Bureau of Industries values it, at $300,000,000, but says that the land is mortgaged to the extent of $275,000,000, that 80 per cent. of the farms in Ontario are encumbered, and are encumbered to the extent of 43 per cent. of their value; count the loans at 6 per cent. on that amount, and you have $16,500,000 that the farmers of Ontario had to pay on mortgages this last year. We are told that money has been getting cheaper. I know nothing about that. I know that I act as a valuator for a number of individuals who are lending money and for one company that lends money in the locality from which I come, and I know that, while last fall I could get money easily for 5½ per cent., to-day I cannot get it for less than 7 per cent. Money is going up rapidly in price, and I have never known such a large amount of money placed on farms during the last 44 years of my residence in Ontario as was placed during the last fall and winter, which shows that the farmers are not in the same condition to-day as they have been since I came to the Province of Ontario, and that is a long time indeed. I would just state this with respect to the reduction in the number of cattle, that it simply shows that the farmers had not crops enough to pay their debts, and so had to sell some of their stock which should have been kept on their farms. In 1885 they sold an enormous number of cattle, more than they had been accustomed to sell—they sold 143,000 cattle during that year. Now, Sir, in 1887 there were 70,000 head of cattle in Ontario less than in 1886. The farmers are in a very bad condition indeed. I think the farmers are in the worst condition of any class of the population in the Province of Ontario. Now, let us examine the cost of running a farm of 100 acres in the Province of Ontario, and the revenue that can be got out of it. Sir, I have a statement by me which shows that the condition of the farmer is but little better, if any, than that of the day laborer who works for his daily bread. The total value of crops in 1886 was: grains, $58,000,683; corn, buckwheat, beans, hay, clover, potatoes and carrots, $52,763,943,—in all, $110,764,626. Then I estimate at $33,878,483 the products of animals and all other sources of revenue to the farmer—a sum almost equal to the value of the grain crops. It includes the value of root crops, grain crops, and everything except straw; so that the total revenue derived from farms in the Province of Ontario is $164,643,109. Now, how many farms are there in the Province of Ontario of 100 acres each, which is the average number of acres? We find there are 208,615. What is the revenue derived from one of those farms? I find that it will amount on the average to about $790, and no practical farmer who knows anything about the business will venture to say that an average farm in Ontario will produce any more revenue than that. Now, this average farm has about 50 acres of wood land and 50 acres cleared. In estimating the expense of carrying on this farm, we must have two men to do the work the year round. These have to board themselves, and they each receive about $250. Then there must be a team kept, with hay and grain at the market price. I put that at the low rate of 33 cents a day, or $120 a year. Then for seed, threshing, taxes, and all the other incidental expenses in connection with the farm, I have reckoned the low sum of $100. These sums together amount to $720, leaving a balance of only $70 to come into the hands of the farmer. This sum gives him an interest on his capital of less than 1½ per cent. He has nothing except that very small amount to keep up buildings and fences, to meet the wear and tear of his machinery, harnesses and implements. Now, that is a bad condition for the farmers of Ontario to be in. The hon. gentleman has taken his report from the Bureau of Industries, and I challenge him to go over the whole report and show that my statement is not correct. I have no fear that any hon. gentleman will be able to show anything of the kind. Now, Sir, what is the position of the manufacturers when compared with the farmers in the Province of Ontario? I have taken the figures from the census of 1881. I was happy to hear the Minister of Marine and Fisheries this afternoon say that the manufacturers of Canada were never in a better condition than they are in to-day. If that is true, the statement I am about to make is one that is more than favorable for them. I find that in the Dominion of Canada the capital invested in manufacturing industries in 1881 was $165,302,623; I find that the raw material amounted to $179,918,593, and the total produce from all these establishments amounted to $309,676,068. That sum had been increased in value by labor to the amount of $129,757,475. The sum that is to be deducted from this as having been paid for labor is $59,429,002. Now, the question comes: How many workmen were engaged in all the different industries of Canada in 1881? I find, first, that the number of manufacturers was 2,229, and the number of workmen was 254,935. I find that the average salary paid to men, women, boys and girls, was $233 a year. Next: How much did the manufacturer draw from each individual workman? The nice little sum of $276. In reality the manufacturers of Canada, after counting 10 per cent. for insurance and management, and 6 per cent. on capital invested, have left 38¼ per cent. of the total cost of product over materials. And yet the Minister of Marine and Fisheries stands up in this House and declares that the farmers of the Province of Ontario are the most prosperous class in the Dominion. I state that there is no other class in this country which puts forth the same amount of energy, industry and perseverance, and exercises the same amount of economy and receives such a small remuneration for their labor. And I warn the hon. gentleman opposite that the farmers of the Dominion have found that the promises made to them in 1878 have not been fulfilled, that we have no home market created, that we have not had better prices, that we have not had our population kept at home and that we have not had our produce consumed at home. There are certain things, however, that their policy has succeeded in doing. It has succeeded in driving the very best of our young men from the Dominion to seek homes across the line, it has succeeded in building up "rings" and "trusts" to an extent never known before, it has succeeded in compelling us to pay higher prices than in any country I know of for our manufactured goods; and although we are told that goods are cheaper to-day than they ever were in the history of the world, this same National Policy has deprived the farmers of the benefit of lower prices which should be secured to them by improved machinery and improved methods of manufacture. The National Policy has also succeeded in taking a very large amount of money out of the pockets of the farmers in the shape of taxation, much more than was promised before the Government went into power. They, in fact, promised that there would not be an increase of taxation, only a readjustment of taxation. Let us see what this readjustment of taxation, which the Government promised the farmers, together with all other classes of the community, has amounted to, and what effect it has had on the agricultural class. We were told by the hon. Finance Minister before hon. gentlemen opposite assumed the reins of power, that they would not require those large amounts of taxation needed by the Government of Mr. Mackenzie. His language was: "Inasmuch as we have ruled the country with smaller taxation in the past, we are prepared to rule it with smaller taxation in the future." The hon. First Minister said time and again there would not be an increase of taxation, only a readjustment of the tariff. What effect has that readjustment had? During the five years Mr. Mackenzie's Government was in power there was collected $93,565,768 in taxation, or $18,713,153 a year. During the last five years the present Government have collected $134,030,883, or an average of $26,810,176. This amounts to $8,097,023 per annum more than was collected by the Mackenzie Government, that is to say, in the last five years an additional sum of $40,485,115 was taken out of the pockets of the ratepayers. I hold that $30,000,000 of that should never have been collected, and if the Government had increased the annual expenditure by only $2,500,000 there would not have been a great deal of cause for complaint. But the evil has not ended there. In addition to that amount taken for taxation there has been a large amount taken out of the pockets of the people and placed in the hands of the manufacturers. Is it a wonder, under these circumstances, that there are stringent times in the Dominion, when there is such increase of taxation and burdens upon the people, because probably from twenty to thirty millions annually taken out of the taxpayers do not find their way into the public treasury. These are all causes of grave complaint against the present Government, and if the present condition of affairs continues for any length of time, such a sentiment will spring up that hon. gentlemen opposite will find it very difficult indeed to rule the country. Hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that the speeches of hon. members on this side of the House have driven the best of our population to a foreign country; but I tell them that if the advice given by hon. gentlemen on this side had been followed we would have had thousands of our own population at home more than we have to-day. We would have had the North-West more fully settled. What folly it is for the Government to spend $500,000 a year to bring immigrants into the country, and when they get them in the North-West impose 35 per cent taxes on the agricultural implements they use. That is a detriment to every farmer who goes there with means to get a fair start, for it means that he has to pay nearly $200 of duty on his implements. Let me repeat briefly a conversation I had during the summer with an implement agent at Brandon. He said he could go to the other side and purchase Deering binders for $100 each, but when he brought them to the Custom house they were valued at $130, the officer stating that he had received order from Ottawa to value them at that sum. This brought their cost up to $200 to the actual settler. When a farmer is compelled to pay $200 for an implement which he can purchase for $120 on the other side of the line, and when he has to pay 10 cents per bushel extra for the carriage of his wheat to market, he comes to think that loyalty should begin at home. When a man has to move, what difference does it make to him whether he goes across the line or not, whether he goes to the United States and lives among people of our own flesh and blood whose traditions are our traditions and whose ancestors were our ancestors, so long as he is going to place himself and his family in a better condition, which I hold they have done in most cases. It is not the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side, but the actions of one of the most extravagant Governments ever known that have caused this emigration. It is also owing to the Government establishing a railway monopoly in the North-West, and granting Government lands in such a manner that every alternate section is owned by a wealthy company. I was one of the first settlers in the County of Huron, and I know the hardships we endured in making roads and building schools, and I can, therefore, judge of the great hardships people must endure in the North-West when every alternate block is held by speculators, and especially when such land is not subject to taxation. These are the causes that have led to the depopulation of Canada. These are the causes that have sent our young men across the lines. Within a week of my leaving home to attend Parliament, a young man residing in the North-West came to my place and remained all night. He has been long enough there to perform his settlement duties, and he told me that unless the Government removed the restrictions on implements and allowed competition in railways he would never go back to that country to settle, because he was not going to spend his life and energy to put money in the pockets of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Such, Sir, has been the experience of almost every individual who went to our North-West. I could name individual after individual, and family after family from my iowntownship and county who went to the North-West to settle, but when they found the conditions under which they were to be placed they stepped across the line. Hence the State of Dakota has gained in population over 300,000 people, while the Province of Manitoba has only gained some 43,000. I hold that the Province of Manitoba has superior land and is superior in every shape to any of the States adjoining, but if the people had the same advantages under the Government of getting goods into the country they would be more prosperous and successful. I hold, Sir, that the Province of Ontario to-day is one of the fairest spots upon the face of the earth, and I do not see what is the reason that Province cannot succeed better and why her population has not increased more rapidly than it has. Let me read a statement from a gentleman who is well known to any person who has paid much attention to the public men on the other side. The statement is made by David A. Wells, and he says:

"North of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and the River St. Lawrence, east of Lake Huron, south of the 45th parallel, and included mainly within the present Province of Ontario there is as fair a country as exists on the North American continent; nearly as large in area as New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio combined, and equal if not superior to those States as a whole in its agricultural capacity. It is the natural habitation of the combing-wool sheep without a full, cheap and reliable supply of the wool, of which species the great worsted manufacturing industries of the country cannot prosper, or, we should rather say, exist. It is the land where grows the finest barley, which the brewing interests of the United States must have if it ever expects to rival Great Britain in its present annual export of over eleven millions of dollars worth of malt products. It raises and grazes the finest of cattle, with qualities especially desirable to make good the deterioration of stock in other sections; and its climatic conditions created by an almost encirclement of the great lakes, especially fit to grow men. Such a country is one of the greatest gifts of Providence to the human race; better than the bonanzas of silver or rivers whose sands contain gold."

I would ask, Sir, why the Province of Ontario, when it is the most fertile of all the Provinces, nay, when it is more fertile than any State in the Union, has not progressed more than it has? I have a statement which shows the average produce for five years of some of the best grain-growing States in the United States of America, and compares it with the produce of the Province of Ontario for the same period. I would just say, Sir, that this comparison has been made from the United States' records. Of fall wheat per acre, in nine of the best wheat growing States in the Union, the highest produce is in the State of Kansas, which yields 15½ bushels per acre; in the Province of Ontario the produce was 21 bushels per acre, $5\frac{1}{2}$ bushels more than in the best State of the Union. In spring wheat, out of five of the best producing States in the Union, the highest was Dakota, and it produced 14 bushels per acre; the produce of spring wheat in Ontario was 16 bushels per acre, or 2 bushels of spring wheat in advance of the best State on the other side. In barley, out of six States in the Union, the highest is $24\frac{1}{2}$ bushels per acre in Wisconsin, and in Ontario the produce was $26\frac{2}{10}$ bushels, or $2\frac{7}{10}$ bushels more than in the best State of the Union. In oats, out of twelve States Minnesota was the highest. The produce was $34\frac{3}{8}$ bushels per acre; while in Ontario the produce was $37\frac{1}{10}$ bushels, or $2\frac{3}{8}$ more than in any State of the Union. Now, Sir, we have a more fertile soil, we have a better agricultural and grazing country, and we are situated on the line of commerce to the seaboard; we have all the natural advantages that a Province could boast of, and there must be some cause why the Province of Ontario is not growing more rapidly than it does grow. I think the causes have been plainly pointed out to the Government of the day. It has been pointed out to them, that it is impossible for a country to prosper when we are taking such large sums of money out of the pockets of the people and placing them in the hands of a few favorites. Unless the Government adopt a different policy from that which they have pursued with reference to the Province of Ontario there will be developed such a sentiment of discontent that I cannot see where it will end. I believe myself that if a plebiscite were taken by ballot to-day in the Province of Ontario, as to whether we should remain a part and parcel of Confederation, or whether we should become independent or throw in our lot with the United States, the result might be different from what some people may think. I would not like to throw in my lot with the United States if I could help it. I left the land of my birth, and I look back to that country with feelings of respect. Canada is the land of my adoption. I spent my youth and manhood here, and I would not like to leave this country; but if the Government continue to treat the country as they have done, they will create such a spirit among the people that they will come to the conclusion that if we cannot get the markets of the United States opened to our produce, we will either have to go to the United States ourselves or ask admission to the Union. That is the sentiment I believe which prevails to-day. Hon. gentlemen may clap their hands or laugh, but they will find later on perhaps that that sentiment will be too strong for them, as the sentiment is too strong that has been developed in Manitoba. I was just thinking, Sir, when I saw two gentlemen sitting in this Chamber—a deputation from Manitoba to the Government to see if they could arrange terms of peace in that Province with the Government at Ottawa—that the impression prevails that the Government has imposed on that Province and upon the North-West such conditions that it has become a question whether or not the Province of Manitoba is about to rise in its might and assert its right to manage its own business in its own way, and that perhaps Manitoba is not the only Province that will have to do that. Thanking the House very cordially for their kind and courteous attention to me while speaking, I now beg leave to resume my seat.

Mr. PORTER. The question now before the House, and embraced in the resolution proposed by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), is certainly one of the greatest consequence and of the utmost importance. It is a subject, Sir, large as our national life and wide as our future in all the ages to come. And, Sir, when we consider that question, and when we approach that question, we ought certainly to approach it as the hon. gentleman has recommended us to do, in the spirit of statesmen and philosophers. Sir, this question has been argued before this House in very many different ways, and all the different speeches bearing on this question have been presented to this House in eloquent and strenuous terms. For me, Sir, to go over the nature of the argument of the gentlemen who have preceded me, would certainly be futile and useless. However, I would crave the attention of this House while I address a few remarks in reference, more particularly, to the special subject of the last gentleman's discourse. It is claimed, Sir, that in this country the National Policy, which was indeed the great object of his attack, has been a detriment and injury to the farmers of this country. The hon. gentleman has presented that subject in every variety of view, and every form and every manner of way, in which it could be placed before this House, and the conclusion of all his arguments, and the summing up of all his speaking, was that the National Policy introduced in 1879, was detrimental to the farmers of this country. Sir, what does he propose to do in order to relieve the farmers of this country from the burdens they are bearing under this National Policy? He proposes the heroic remedy contained in the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford. He proposes that we should be relieved from the sufferings we experience from the National Policy by transferring us to a country where a higher National Policy prevails. Sir, that is a most extraordinary remedy; it is scarcely such a remedy as any reasonable man would think for a moment of prescribing. We are also reminded by hon. gentlemen opposite how very necessary it is in any discussion of this kind that we should know precisely the meaning of the terms we are using, so that there will be no danger of confounding or misunderstanding them. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., took to task members on this side of the House because, as he said, they were opposed to reciprocity. Sir, we are not opposed to reciprocity; we never have been; but unrestricted reciprocity and reciprocity are entirely different things. Reciprocity may mean a certain exchange of goods to such an extent as may be agreed upon, while unrestricted reciprocity means nothing more nor less than absolute free trade, without any restrictions of any sort, with the country with which we propose to enter into relations. It is just as well that that distinction should be borne in mind. We have been reminded by the hon. member for Queen's, and by the hon. gentleman who last spoke of the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854; and it is very strange that when hon. gentlemen opposite speak of the period from 1854 to 1866 they forget some important events which occurred during that period, and which undoubtedly had great influence on the prosperity enjoyed in this country at that time. They forget that, in 1854, when the treaty was about to come into operation, a great European war was going on; and I am old enough to remember, and I think the hon. gentleman who preceded me is also old enough to remember, that at that time the prices of the products of Canada were raised to a higher pitch than they have ever been since, and why? Because of reciprocity with the United States? No, Sir, it was simply because a great war was raging in a foreign land, and that that land required that we should raise the products necessary for its sustenance. More than that, to prove conclusively the truth of my statement, let me remind hon. gentlemen that at the conclusion of that great war there was such a tumble in prices, such wreck of fortunes, such a loss of gains in Canada, as is remembered to the present hour; and did the reciprocity of which we have heard so much prevent that dire evil falling on the people of Canada? No, Sir, it did not. There were other laws and other economic forces governing us besides the Reciprocity Treaty. Then, Sir, let me also call the attention of this House to another fact in reference to this question, that at that time Canada was awakening like a giant from slumber, and was beginning to put forth her natural energies and to realise the great possessions God had given her to develop and to transmit to posterity. She was beginning to construct long lines of railway; the Grand Trunk Railway was undertaken; and we know that millions of dollars were spent in the settled portions of the country. All that was an element in the prosperity of which we hear so much during reciprocity times. There was still another element in that prosperity which hon. gentlemen opposite leave out of consideration. We remember that in the year 1860, there were ominous sounds of conflict in the land to the south of us, and during the four years ensuing there waged in that great republic a war, fierce, lasting and desolating, and during that period the people, instead of being employed in the pursuits of peace and in the arts of industry and agriculture, were grasping each other's throat, and thrusting their bayonets through each other's hearts. What was the effect of that strife upon Canada? It was that we who were at peace with all the world, whose industries and trade were not disturbed or interrupted, were able to supply them with all the necessaries they required. So that when these gentlemen speak of the Reciprocity Treaty, I think in all fairness to the people of this country they should have stated these facts; because they are not at present on public platforms attempting to get votes. As men in council, desiring to arrive at the truth, they should neither express a false thing nor suppress a true thing, but they should give all the facts and all the reasons they know of bearing on the subject under discussion. I say these hon. gentlemen should bear in mind all these facts when they come to speak of the period from 1854 to 1866. Now, I have no doubt I have wearied the House with these remarks, because the facts I mention have no doubt often been heard before, but I think it is very necessary that they should be heard again in a discussion of this kind. Sir, the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, made the National Policy the principal point of attack, and, I must confess, the figures he brought before us were so numerous and so conflicting that it was almost impossible to follow him. I will, therefore, take a few points only. If the hon. gentleman had listened to the arguments of the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries this afternoon, he would have omitted one point at least which he brought before the House. He says we pay the whole duty on every article we consume. Now, the hon. gentleman is a farmer like myself. He knows that the greater part of the woolen goods he and his children wear are shorn from the sheep's backs, are taken to the mill and spun, and brought home and made up into clothing for himself and his family; and he knows that not one cent of taxation is paid on those goods. It was, therefore, not ingenuous in him to make the farmers believe that they had to pay duty on every article they wear. The hon. gentleman also said that goods manufactured in Canada are affected in their price by the price of the goods imported from foreign countries, and that the manufacturers charge more than they ought to do, and that the difference goes into their pockets. It is well known, Sir, that competition in trade undoubtedly reduces the prices of all articles, and it is only a short time ago, indeed, that the manufacturers in this country complained that over-production was causing them to sell at a great loss, so that articles could be bought for actually less than real cost price. But without dwelling on that subject at any length, I will simply touch on another point to which the hon. gentleman referred. In the course of his remarks he read a letter from a farmer in the county of Huron. The farmer congratulated the Liberal party, which has introduced this resolution, upon their policy, and declared that if such a policy as that was not embraced by this House, he would very probably become a citizen of the United States. Let me say this much: We have been asked to discuss this question without sentiment, and I am willing also to discuss it without sentiment. I believe it is a question of material progress to a very large extent; I believe it to be a question of material wealth to a very large extent; still, I am not ashamed to own that sentiment has a certain influence over my heart and thoughts. I believe in the fibre of every man, who is a manly man, sentiment certainly has a place, and we know from the world's history, we know from the history of the countries around us that sentiment has made nations brave and men successful. If we were to discuss this subject without sentiment, I believe we would discuss it without considering a most important element in the nation's welfare. I believe that we ought not to make sentiment the most prominent question, yet, after all, in the background of discussion there will remain always a something that will influence our decisions in a most important direction. However, I am willing to discuss this question without sentiment, and if the hon. member for South Huron is altogether devoid of sentiment, and for the sake of a few dollars would sell his allegiance to the United States, I believe that Canada is better without him. The hon. member who has just taken his seat has spoken of depreciation in the value of land. He has told us he was a valuator for a company, and that he had an opportunity of examining lands in the county of Perth and some other adjacent counties, and that values had decreased lately owing to the National Policy. In answer to that statement, I have here statistics taken from Mr. Blue's report and from the report of the Agricultural Commission of 1880, of which I believe the hon. gentleman was a member. From Mr. Blue's statistics, we learn that the average value of land per acre in the county of Huron, which I select as being the hon. gentleman's own county, and it is better to particularise—from Mr. Blue's report, we learn that the average value of land per acre in the county of Huron was in 1886, $51.49, with buildings thereon, the land being worth $41.28, and the buildings $10.21. From the report of the Agricultural Commission of 1880, I find the value of 100 acres of farm land in the county of Huron, taking the three classes, the first, second and third into which the Commission divide the land, and making an average price—I find from the report that for the whole county of Huron, the value of the farming land was in 1880 estimated to be worth $36.16 per acre, so that from 1880 to 1886 the land in question had increased $15.32 per acre in value. These facts and figures are taken from the statistics of hon. gentlemen's friends in Ontario, and I ask you, Sir, if they show any sign of depreciation in the value of landed property. Suppose we admit for the sake of argument that the land has depreciated, or rather that it has not risen in value, what do we find Mr. Blue saying? In his report of 1885, he says that the value of the land depends upon the value of the crops, and that when prices are low land is low. That is but a reasonable statement of facts in the mind of all impartial men. There is another test of the value of land, and that is the increase in the assessment values, as they appear from year to year in the reports of the municipalities. The assessment values of land in the county of Huron was:—

In 1875.....	$37 91
1876.....	38 76
1877.....	29 43
1878.....	29 54
1879.....	30 01
1880.....	30 01
1881.....	30 22
1882.....	31 07
1883.....	30 94
1884.....	31 42
1885.....	32 71

During the series of years, from 1875 to 1885, eleven years, the land was rising steadily in value, and it was rising steadily in value under the care and supervision of men who were interested in not going beyond its true value, lest the township would have to pay a little more taxes than it did before. These two facts show conclusively that the statement of the hon. gentleman and his friends as to the depreciation of land in the county of Huron, is not substantiated by the facts. It has been said to us repeatedly that the farmers are on the verge of starvation, that some of them are bereft of all hope in this world, whatever they will have in the world beyond. Other gentlemen may think that, although their condition is not so deplorable as this, their earnings are very trifling, indeed, compared with what they should be. Hon. gentlemen sometimes should remember that it is always well, in discussing a great question, to state exactly the facts, because when they do that there is no fear that any man can trip their statement. I find that an hon. gentleman on the Opposition benches last year, discussing the condition of the farmer, and who, in his blind fury was anxious to make a point against the Government in regard to the National Policy, adduced certain facts and statements to show how much the farmers had lost under the National Policy. In that statement I find a very healthy state of affairs indeed, and I think it shows that there is no necessity for the lamentations which the hon. gentlemen are making in regard to the terrible state of the farmers. I find that, in that discussion, the hon. member for East Huron (Mr. Macdonald) said that the average farmer in the county of Huron sold 200 bushels of wheat at 99 cents, $198; 150 bushels of barley at 68 cents, $102; 150 bushels of oats at 40 cents, $60; 75 bushels of peas at 67 cents, $50.75; 10 cwt. of dressed hogs at $7, $70; 10 dressed turkeys at $1.50, $15; 200 lbs. of butter at 19 cents, $38; 15 barrels of apples at $2.30 a barrel, $34.50; 50 dozen of eggs at 19 cents, $9.50; five tons of hay at $11, $55; 5 tons of straw at $8, $40; 50 lbs. of wool at 22 cents, $11; so that the whole of the articles which the average farmer sold, according to this hon. gentleman, on an average year from 1879 to 1887, was over $620 worth. I ask you to consider whether that is not a fair showing for the profits of a farm on an average number of years from 1879 to 1887. But the hon. gentleman did not complete his statement. If he undertook to state all the products from the farm, he should have gone further, and many hon. gentlemen are aware that the farmers in that county sell excellent horses, excellent cattle and excellent sheep, but the hon. gentleman never enumerated a single horse, or a single sheep, or a single fat beast. If we add those products to the others which he has given, we will then find that the average farmer in the county of Huron derives an income of nearly $900 per annum. I ask this House, or any hon. gentleman, if that is not a very fair showing indeed for an average farmer in the county of Huron to make. Perhaps I have not paid as much attention to the statements of the hon. gentleman opposite as they might deserve. I remember that in the county of Renfrew, when I was assisting in the election of an hon. gentleman who is now in this House, I quoted these statistics to show that the state of the country and the condition of the farmers in my own county was not as desperate as it might be. The hon. gentleman who replied to me said: "Why, it is absurd." I said: "My dear sir, the gentleman who uttered these words is the member for East Huron, a Reformer." He said: "I do not care what he is; the Reformers of East Huron have chosen a fool, and I think the people of West Huron have chosen another." Not only have I quoted this to show the condition of the farmers, but I may quote the words of Professor Brown in reference to the condition of the farmer. It is well known that that gentleman is in a position to understand the condition of the farmers of this country as well as any other man. His profession brings him into contact with them, his studies and his pursuits bring him in touch with them, and no doubt anything that affects their condition is known to him by a sort of magnetic or sympathetic influence, and this gentleman, drawing his facts and figures from Mr. Blue's report, sums up a letter, a long and able dissertation upon the condition of the farmer in these words, that he has no hesitation, after giving all the facts and combining them and showing the relation in which they stand to one another, in repeating: "That you, the farmers of Ontario, are not only doing well and making money, whether placed in the bank or in improvements or in mortgage, but you are all actually wealthy." That letter was attempted to be contradicted by men whose views it did not suit, and the professor again, on 3rd January, 1888, answered the statements, and in concluding he says: "If debiting and crediting can be stated on an average, I am of opinion that no class of farmers is so well off as those of Ontario." That is independent and professional evidence, and it is evidence given by a man who is thoroughly competent to understand what he speaks of. Another point to which I shall also direct the attention of hon. gentlemen for a short time is that of the mortgages on farm property. We heard a very doleful statement from the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) as to the burdens the farmers bear and the large amounts they pay to mortgage companies, and we are told that almost every farm in this country was burdened with a mortgage; but, before the hon. gentleman sat down, almost before he completed his sentence, he told us that the loan companies did not exactly show the amount of mortgages, because many farmers took first-class mortgages as good security. Is it not extraordinary that ruined farmers are able to lend money on mortgages? Where do they get the money? If they are ruined in order to keep up the pomp and splendor of manufacturers, where do they get the money? I think the farmers of Huron are well able to hold their own, and if there is a shiftless, or thriftless, or intemperate, or lazy man among them who cannot hold his own, they are quite willing to put their money upon his land. I may give a few moments also to a further consideration of some of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made. Amongst other things, he claims that unrestricted reciprocity would be of great benefit to the farmers of Canada—as all the others claim—by opening up a larger market, by placing within their reach the privilege of supplying the larger cities and populous communities along our southern border, and that thereby they might make a readier sale and receive a larger price. But, Sir, we know that Canada and many of the States south of us, produce agricultural products of the same class, and these latter to such an extent as to more than supply their own market. Therefore our products must seek the markets of the world where they may be disposed of at the best advantage. To assert that New York, Pennsylvania, Illinois, or any other State to the south of us, require for their own use our wheat, our oats, our peas, corn, beef or pork, is to mock the intelligence of our farmers. Now, let me call attention to a statement which the Minister of Marine and Fisheries also made in answer to the hon. gentleman, about our natural market. The hon. gentleman says that the United States is the natural market for the agricultural products of Canada. A natural market, as I take it may be defined as one that is either contiguous, co-terminus or adjacent. But it is one in which nature supplies either not at all, or to a very limited extent, the goods therein offered, and which are demanded and required by the people. Now, in which of these categories shall we place the United States? Shall we say that they do not produce breadstuffs, meats, and such like products at all; or shall we say that they do not produce them in such a rich abundance as to supply their own people? Sir, to make either assertion, in the face of the evidence that we only send to that country fifteen million dollars of agricultural products, and in face of the evidence of the commercial records of the United States, I say an assertion of that sort would be as absurd as it is false. We learn from the returns of the United States that the agricultural exports for the year ending 30th June, 1887, amounted to $484,500,000. Of this sum about $161,000,000 were breadstuff, $92,000,000 beef, pork, butter and cheese, and $9,000,000 were cattle and other products. Sir, I ask you is it possible that a country that produces these large quantities of agricultural products, really requires the products of Canada. Let me ask you to reflect on the innumerable bushels of grain and barrels of flour that leave the Atlantic ports of the United States for the hungry nations of Europe. Think also of the mountains of beef and pork which accompany this bread, and then how can any intelligent man say that the United States is a natural market for our surplus agricultural produce? No Sir, if we wish to dispose of these things we must go where they are required, and we shall find a market among these people who have outgrown the limits of their own food supply. To those countries must we look for the best customers of Canada. When the time comes, which is undoubtedly remote when the United States shall no longer export agricultural produce, or but to a very limited extent, then I acknowledge that we who live upon their borders may supply their wants with benefit to themselves and with profit to us. Until that time comes we must look to the populous nations of Europe, to them we must send our products, and from them receive the money or its equivalent, and in any case we must regard them as by nature destined to consume the fruits of our soil. The hon. gentleman also spoke of the movement of population, and this seems to be not only a stock argument, but a never failing source of melancholy regret on their part. The hon. member for South Oxford last night quoted the Scriptures, apparently for the sake of making a joke, but I thought he was very unfortunately placed, because the copy of the sacred book he possesses must be a mutilated copy; it begins with Exodus and ends with the lamentations of Jeremiah. Sir, in that book of his there is no gospel for Canada, there are no beatitudes for Canada, and it would seem that he was born, like the prophet of old, not to bless, but to curse. Sir, the exodus of Canada has been very well explained, and I think if men will lay aside party spirit and political bias, which sway their judgments oft-times, unintentionally, they must acknowledge that a movement of population is going on the world over. Some of these hon. gentlemen know well that in the old settled townships of the county I represent, there is a movement, not on account of the poverty of the people, not on account of the want of enterprise of the people, not on account of the sterility of the soil, but on account of the ambition of the younger men to go where they can find homes for themselves, free and untrammelled, where they can find an opportunity to commence the world in a life of adventure, like their fathers before them. It is nothing to be regretted as has been well remarked, heretofore we have not been able to utilise that spirit of adventure in our young men, because we had not in our possession the territory we required, and they drifted off, unfortunately for us, to the land of the Stars and Stripes. But while we regret the exodus of our young men, it is certainly a source of pride to every Canadian to know that though they have gone across the border, they have maintained the reputation of Canada for intelligence and trustworthiness. If we cannot keep them at home, we need not be ashamed of our export. If we raise the best wheat and the best horses in the world, we can also raise as good men, at least, as the United States. Sir, a remedy has been proposed for all the evils that afflict our country, more especially that afflict agriculture. It is a very drastic remedy, it is heroic treatment indeed. We were told, for example, the remedy would have the result of diminishing our revenue, and that by some possibility, although not admitted, direct taxation might be the consequence. The physician examined the patient, he made a diagnosis and found she was very ill, and in order to save her he bled her to death and then killed her by starvation. That is certainly most heroic treatment. If our revenues are to be taken from us, and then the little we have remaining is to go in the form of taxation that is heroic treatment unquestionably. I need not dwell on the question of manufacturing industries. I think it will be admitted by every hon. member, as it will be by every intelligent man in the Dominion, that no country can ever be a great country that is purely an agricultural one, but that every country to attain to the highest civilisation must possess a great variety of all the elements which occupy and employ the mind and intellect of man, every art, science and industrial pursuit. The finest, the most complete, the most artistic industries must be carried on before a country can attain to the eminence of a highly civilised country. I think, therefore, the importance and the necessity will be admitted of establishing industrial pursuits in this Canada of ours. Years ago we were nothing more than the clearers of the forest, then we were the pioneers who were clearing away the obstructions of nature; but now that these results have been accomplished and we have overcome the first difficulties in our way and we are about to lay the foundations of a great and, as I hope, a mighty empire, we should consider well and consider wisely by what possible means we can introduce all the varied branches of art, science and literature into the country, because by these means and these means alone shall we ever become a great nation. Wealth alone will not make us great, but wealth, arts, science and industry, and all the mechanical skill and enterprise which characterise the most advanced nations of men, they and they alone will make us great. I say, therefore, that these statesmen, especially the venerable leader of this House who nine years ago introduced a policy which had for its object that view and purpose, deserve the gratitude of the country not only now but for all time to come. If one could suppose that his wise scheme could miscarry, and the people of Canada declined to follow the plan which he had laid down for them, and the lines on which he desired them to go, yet I believe the time would come, if in a moment of excitement they were led away by the seductions of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they would recoil to the position they had already taken and reaffirm the verdict already made. If they were to do away with all those protections to the industries of the country and starve out our young industries, then I believe not many years would pass before they would be sorry they had so far forgotten themselves, and would recall the memories of those days of 1879, and wish again for one hour with the venerable statesman who now leads this House. We are told that the introduction of the National Policy has been the means of establishing large institutions in this country which derive vast sums of money from the people. If it be unwise and unjust, if it be dangerous to the state to form an establishment in this country, which by its command of an enormous capital is able to exercise its power to crush out its feebler rivals, I contend it is ten times more dangerous to the state to build up an institution of that kind in a foreign land over which we can have no control. No good can the people of Canada by any possibility derive, no compensation for the sense of injustice which our people will feel can be obtained, for the insuperable obstacles which must be placed in the way of men equally as enterprising and energetic, but not as wealthy, under an arrangement such as is proposed by hon. gentlemen opposite. When we contemplate what the present policy has done for us we have every reason to be assured that we are working upon the right lines, we have every reason to be confirmed in our opinion that the time is not far distant when we certainly shall reap the benefits of all our labors, and planning, and scheming for the welfare of Canada. But suppose we admit that we are led aside by the seductive tones of the gloomy knight from Oxford, that the darkness of the shadows overcloud the intellect, and we are led to vote for the resolution before the House, what then will take place? I contend that the passage of this resolution would retard Canada in mid-career, would have a tendency to destroy her industries, would reduce her capital, and would make us, although we aim to be something better, only producers of those raw materials which would be used in the manufactories and workshops of a foreign country, and Canada like ancient Bœotia would be famed for her fertile soil and the stupidity of her men. What true-hearted, patriotic Canadian can contemplate the melancholy picture of his country, under the auspices of the scheme which those gentlemen propose? He must hang his head in deep humiliation, he must feel the glow of shame burning in his face at the result which must inevitably happen. But to that keen and shrewd nation over the border into whose hands this resolution would certainly deliver us bound in brazen fetters, to those men I say our abject whining and cringing must be loathsome and disgusting. They themselves formulated a treaty of commerce between us which existed for twelve years, and which we were anxious to renew, and for twenty-two years they have refused to listen to the repeated requests of the Canadian people and Canadian Government. Canada wishes to trade upon fair terms and on a satisfactory basis with all the world, and when the people of the United States intimate their willingness to meet with us and discuss these matters, then we will meet them and discuss the whole question; but until that time comes, Canada must refuse to stand like a beggar, cap in hand, at the door of the cold and haughty republic. For these reasons, which I have imperfectly recounted, and because I believe that Canada's future depends upon her own efforts and her own wisdom and not on another's favor, I shall vote against the resolution of the hon. member for South Oxford.

Mr. DESSAINT. (Translation). Mr. Speaker, I regret having to speak at this late hour of the evening. I beg my hon. colleagues to forgive me if I take the floor at the beginning of a debate as important as that which is now holding the attention of this House. I do not act thus through ostentation but because, having to absent myself to-morrow on urgent business, I shall not enjoy the privilege of voting on the question at present submitted to us. Hence I seize this opportunity of expressing my views on the subject. As the representative of a wholly farming county, I think it urgent to express my opinion—an opinion which I believe to be shared by a large majority of the electors of my constituency on the question which is now stirring public opinion. I shall endeavor, Mr. Speaker, to do it as briefly as possible. The question set before us by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is of capital importance, involving the highest interests of the country. It has attracted widespread attention throughout the provinces and may entail the most momentous consequences. The proposition, which is not new in itself, and has already been admitted in principle in this country, tends to demand thorough reciprocity of our manufactured products and our natural produce with the United States. On the one hand, reciprocity is commended as calculated to give Canada great advantages in respect of her commercial relations with the United States. On the other hand, two objections are urged against it. In the first place, it is stated that a reciprocity treaty is impossible because the United States will have none of it, and, in proof, we are referred to the request made by Sir Charles Tupper, as plenipotentiary, during the late fisheries conferences at Washington. Secondly, I have heard it declared in this House, and the papers repeat, that reciprocity is not in the best interests of the country. Well, Mr. Speaker, I see here a contradiction in terms. If reciprocity is of no advantage to our country, why did Sir Charles Tupper plead for it? If, on the contrary, this reciprocity treaty is beneficial to Canada, why should gentlemen speaking with authority, Ministers of the Crown, in speeches learnedly prepared, and inspired with more or less good faith, come before us and say that we live in the best country of the world, that we are enjoying prosperity, and that, with the actual system of protection, there is nothing that we need further seek? I say, Sir, that this is a contradiction and that there is a lack of sequence in these means of defence. I believe that all those who have followed a little the course of events in this country, and who understand the relations which have existed and still exist between Canada and the United States, are blind in saying that a people like ours of 5,000,000 of inhabitants are not interested in having commercial relations with a nation like the United States, and its 60,000,000 of souls. The geography of the two countries demonstrates, on the contrary, that we are destined to have continual relations. And naturally, too, Canada has more interest in these relations to the United States than the United States have in relations with us. We are neighbors; it is only an imaginary line that separates us from the Atlantic to the Pacific Oceans. Shall it then be said that, because we are not the same nation, although having the same interests, we must keep up a barrier between us and transact no business together? I am of opinion that such would not be to the interest of the Canadian people, certainly not to the interest of the greater number—consisting of the farmers. My further opinion is that those who tell us we have no interest in cultivating business relations with the United States, are not sincere, but simply making political capital. The business relations are there to demonstrate the advantages which Canada would derive from a reciprocity treaty with our neighbors. Take the fluctuations of commerce in the first few years. I shall do this briefly, during three periods. The first period will be from 1821 to 1846. At that time we were under the yoke of England in regard to Commerce, under the complete tutelage of Great Britain, and had not the right, as a colony, to conclude treaties or even to make a tariff. Where was our commerce during that term? We had then no relations at all, or almost none, with the United States. True, the Canadian people were not as numerous as they are at present, but taking the number into consideration, let us see what commercial relations existed then:—From 1821 to 1846 the total of imports from the United States into the Provinces of British North America, including Newfoundland, were $90,124,195, and the exports $31,040,831. Thus for twenty-five years, we exported, on an average, the yearly worth of one million and a quarter dollars and, as I said, we had no reciprocity at that epoch, and were under the commercial wing of the mother country. In 1846, the ties binding us to the mother country were slackened a little, and we were enabled to have business dealings with the United States of a more direct character. Then there was a question between the statesmen of both countries to weave still closer business relations, and thence sprang the scheme of the first reciprocity treaty concluded in 1854. So early as 1847, public men on both sides of the line were busied with these commercial relations of which the importance was felt, while the reciprocal benefits which would accrue therefrom were well understood. The proposition remained in abeyance, however, till 1854. We may examine now the next period between 1854 and 1866, during which the reciprocity treaty was in force between the two countries. Take, first, since 1850—the imports and exports. The former stood at $6,594,860, and the latter at $1,951,159. In 1866, when the reciprocity treaty expired, the imports were $20,424,692 and the exports $34,770,261. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the conclusion that one would naturally draw from such figures? We are taught thereby that during this period of reciprocity we prospered at an astonishing rate, and the conclusion to be drawn is that if we had reciprocity still with the United States, the increase in our commerce would be proportionate to that which we enjoyed during the term just mentioned. The reciprocity treaty terminated on the 17th March, 1866. We may now enquire whether the progress of our commerce was in the same ratio in 1867? The imports of that year were $20,271,907 and the exports $25,583,800. In 1866, twenty years later, the imports were $35,770,150 and the exports $26,997,914. Indeed, Sir, the exports of 1866 were less considerably than those of 1866. In other words, twenty years previous, when we were under the terms of a reciprocity treaty, we exported upwards of $34,000,000, and twenty years later, in spite of the great prosperity of the country, about which we hear so much praise, we exported only the worth of $26,000,000, or $8,000,000 less than under the reciprocity system. Now, Sir, they who applaud the present state of things, who affirm that we are as well off as possible and who say that it is almost impossible to have more prosperity than that which we now enjoy, speak rather from the standpoint of the great capitalists who seem to work, not for the greater number, but for the lesser number, the manufacturers. We, as representatives of the people, it is not the smaller number that we must protect, but the mass of the population, and for my part, I say that if we had a reciprocity treaty as general as possible with the United States, the former class would find it to their great advantage. There are disadvantages, Mr. Speaker, which our farmers cannot overcome. Thus, in virtue of the tariff actually in force in the United States—a tariff of reprisals—our farmers cannot sell their produce without paying considerable duties, which all hon. members know as well as I. I shall cite a few points to show that our farmers require the disappearance of this barrier between Canada and the United States, in order that we may have easier relations with the United States. I speak more particularly for the farmer class, and the county which I have the honor of representing. It is almost exclusively agricultural. Kamouraska county produces in particular, annually, a large quantity of hay, potatoes, and grain of all kinds, and there is also a large trade in horses, cattle, sheep and other animals. I say nothing but what is known, and there is no use of concealing the facts, when I state that we are obliged to pay, at the American frontier, a duty of 20 per cent. on the horses which we sell; thus, when a farmer sells a horse to a trader for $100, the trader who takes it to the United States is obliged to give 20 per cent. duty. If he had not this duty of 20 per cent. to pay, instead of giving the farmer only $100 for his horse, he would pay him $120, that would make $20 to the good for our farmers if we had a reciprocity treaty with the Americans. It is the same, Mr. Speaker, for all the products of the farm, and in my county chiefly for hay and potatoes. A duty of 15 per cent. a bushel is put on potatoes, or a percentage of 39·58 per cent. It is the same for cheese on which we pay four cents per pound, that is, 30·14 per cent. So we pay also $2 on the ton of hay, or $2 for 100 bundles, which is 18·98 per cent. If tradesmen had not such duties to pay on passing the American border they might pay more to our Canadian farmers, and these farmers would profit thereby. I hold, then, that we should, first and foremost, protect the agricultural class. Even, it seems to me, the manufacturers would find their own advantage therein. Much protection has been demanded for the manufacturers; and, Mr. Speaker, after these several years in which they have worked their industries, these gentlemen ought to be in a position to cope with foreign manufacturers. We boast of the prosperity of our country; it is said that we are progressing in every respect. Yet I hold that, if there is any advance, it is only in the large cities, for unfortunately in our rural districts there has been hardly any growth. Look at the population of Kamouraska county. In 1871 it stood at 21,254 inhabitants, and in 1881 it had risen only to 22,181—an increment in a whole decade of no more than 927 souls. Take next the whole population of the Province of Quebec. In 1871 it figured at 1,191,116 inhabitants, and in 1881 it stood at 1,359,027, or an increase of only 167,511. Will it be said that this is a natural augmentation giving full and entire satisfaction? Certainly not. And what is the cause of this lack of increase? It is because our country places are losing their people every day. Every year, you may see one-quarter, or perhaps one-third of our population going into exile, in the direction of the United States. And why? Because they do not find protection enough in their own land; because they do not find sufficient manufactures to provide them with subsistence. This is a fact which is patent to everybody. We may boast of the wealth of our country as much as we like, but the proof of the contrary lies in the fact that, at this day, there are in the United States over a million of Canadians. I firmly believe that if we had the advantage of renewing commercial relations with the United States, we should see our friends from beyond the border return to their homes, to find work and earn the livelihood of their families. During the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) I overheard an observation from an hon. member on the other side of House, or, I should say, an insult launched in the face of every Canadian on the other side of line 45°. It was said that they who had migrated to the United States were no better than hewers of wood and drawers of water. This is a gratuitous injury, doing no credit to the person who uttered it, and showing the feeling which exists—I shall not say among all the members opposite—but among some of them, in regard to Canadians who have removed to the United States. Such expressions prove that the parties using them are not prepared to encourage the return of these exiles to their native land, and that they prefer to hurl insults at them. This is to be regretted. But in the name of those who dwell beyond the line, I affirm that it was wrong to speak so, inasmuch as those of our people who are in the United States are there through necessity, and that, if they have been forced to leave the country, it is because we have an Administration which does not allow them to make their living honorably therein. I hold, Mr. Speaker, that not only would reciprocity be advantageous to the farmer class, but that it would furthermore be beneficial to the development of almost all the resources which we possess. We say with reason that our country is blessed with great and manifold advantages. We have indeed very rich mines of all ores. But it must be confessed, Mr. Speaker, that capital is scanty in the Dominion of Canada, and if we had more extended commercial relations with the United States, I believe that the capital abounding there would flow into this country to co-operate in the working of our forests, our mines and all our other sources of latent wealth. One fact which happened in my county shows that it is owing to the lack of money if we do not always succeed, and that it is only through constant communication with a people as well-to-do as our neighbors that we shall arrive at the thrift which we all sigh for. We have in Kamouraska silex mountains, adapted for glass works, and we have also considerable strata of sand which could be employed in the manufacture of glass. A few years ago, a company was raised to work out this industry. But, as so often happens with enterprises of that class in this country, we were unable to succeed for want of means. Well, I repeat my belief that if we had a reciprocity treaty; if the American markets were thrown open to us; if we had the advantage of seeing Americans working our industries, it were a source of wealth for the country, and for the county which I represent. The chief objections made to reciprocity was that the programme should have been submitted to the electors, instead of the House. I do not regard the objection as a serious one, because there is question only of the manifestation of an opinion. Furthermore, the hon. gentlemen sitting on the other wing of the House have not always been so squeamish in their political career. When they established Confederation, they did not consult the people and they carried out their scheme in spite of the protests of the hon. members of the Left, in those days. And later, what did they do with their protection programme? When the hon. leader of the Government began setting his National Policy before the House, was it after consulting the people? No, Sir. It was during the first or second Session after the general elections that his project was adopted. Hence this objection is not serious, and even if it were, these hon. gentlemen should go back on themselves and remember that they were wrong in the past and that we are right at present. The second objection adduced is that it were a want of allegiance, nay, a case of treason, to make a reciprocity treaty with the United States, to the strong detriment of Great Britain. I deem that this objection is not serious either. When the hon. gentlemen on the other side put forth their protective tariff, they took no heed of the interests of Great Britain. They proclaimed in the press, in the House, and everywhere that their watchword was "Canada for Canadians." In other words, they gave out that they were making a tariff to protect Canadians, and not Britons. We are in the same predicament to-day. The question is to draft a reciprocity treaty, not to protect Great Britain, but to protect ourselves, and to foster commercial relations with our neighbors. The third objection urged is the only serious one specially handled by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) and by the other members of this side of the House who followed him. Verily, after the lesson of political economy given by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I hold it would be imprudent to venture on the difficult ground. The hon. gentleman's speech will remain as a monument in the parliamentary annals of this House, and I believe that the reasons he gave in answer to this objection are altogether triumphant. I shall take leave to add only a few words. We are asked where we shall find the revenue to replace the customs duties which are proposed to be abolished between Canada and the United States? In the first place, as it has been said in this House, the expenses which are now actually incurred ought to be lessened, because they are excessive. We spend $37,000,000 to $38,000,000 yearly, when with an outlay of $26,000,000 I think we could meet all the wants of the Administration. I remember that in 1878 the Hon. Mr. Tilley, then a member of this House, made a special charge against the Mackenzie Government for spending beyond $23,000,000; adding, that with such a sum he could manage the affairs of the country, and meet all necessary calls with an income of $23,000,000. What are the reasons of the increase since then? My opinion is that if the business of the country was well administered, instead of sinking millions to encourage companies ambitious to control the country, the whole wants of the Administration of the country could be supplied with $26,000,000. Now, with a reciprocity treaty, we should certainly have considerable increase in commerce, excise duties would be increased by the same token, and our customs duties with Great Britain and all other countries would remain the same as they are now. But let us suppose, for a moment, that the customs revenue could be insufficient to meet necessary and indispensable expenses. I am of opinion—although my experience does not go far in the matter—that means could be found to make good the outlay, not by levying an indirect tax on the Province, but by imposing duties which the wealthy would support. Thus, we have railway, telegraph, navigation and other companies doing the business of the country. Who would be the first to profit by reciprocity and our increments in business? Evidently, these railways, telegraph and navigation companies. I really believe that it would be proper, if there should be need, to impose a duty or tax on these corporations, as is now done in the Province of Quebec. There would probably be outcries. But who is responsible for the notion? It is due to the Conservatives of the Province of Quebec who passed a law levying a tax on all commercial corporations of the Province. And if I have been rightly informed, the plan had its origin here, in Ottawa. I believe it would prove a means of balancing our finances, and, at the same time, protecting the agricultural class, if those who draw the largest revenues were made to pay. But it is urged that the immediate introduction of a reciprocity treaty would produce a complete disturbance in business. Well, let the change be made gradual, as was done with the treaty of 1854 and as would have been the case in 1874, when negotiations were carried on between the late George Brown and the Government of the United States, for a renewal of the treaty. A treaty of that kind is not enforced at once, but a certain delay is allotted, one, two or three years, in order to prevent anything like a financial derangement. Finally we are told that the United States do not want a reciprocity treaty. Then, it is our business to take the first step forward. It will not do to cloak ourselves up in our dignity and exclaim: "We, a people of 5,000,000, have no business to hold out the hand to the United States, numbering 60,000,000. We are too proud for that." We must take the initiative, for the good reason that we have the most interest in the conclusion of such an instrument. Indeed, who drew the greatest profits out of the commercial relations during the existence of the treaty of 1854? Doubtless, Canadians. And the proof that the United States made nothing by it is that they demanded its abrogation. This is proof sufficient that we have more need of the reciprocity treaty than the United States. It follows that, if it is more to an advantage for us than for them, it is ours to make the start in that direction. It strikes me that those who pretend that we should not make the first advances are neither serious nor sincere. We have been told in this House that there is no more advantage to Canadians from a treaty of reciprocity than from the present system. If you find that a reciprocity treaty with the United States is not of sufficient advantage, say so honestly and frankly, and then we shall know where we stand. In my view, the interests of the country should be discussed with more loyalty and open-mindedness. We should thus learn from one another and reach some sort of an understanding. Mr. Speaker, I have lengthened my remarks rather more than I had proposed. I had no mind to debate the question, my meaning being simply to give an expression of my views. As I said at the beginning, as representing an agricultural county, I deem it to be in the general interest of the vast bulk of the population that we should bend all our efforts towards reaching an understanding with the United States. And if we attain the object of thorough business interchange with the United States, I am convinced that we shall see the dawn of universal thrift in the country, and more especially among the farming class. As I said before, I shall not have the opportunity of voting on this question, being called away by absolutely urgent business, but I thought it was only my duty to unfold my views on this subject, which will receive from me and from that portion of my constituents whom I have the honor of representing, the warmest approbation.

Mr. CHARLTON moved the adjournment of the debate.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before the adjournment of the debate I would wish to ask the leader of the Opposition whether there is any likelihood that the debate will be brought to an end to-morrow.

Mr. LAURIER. No, Mr. Speaker; as far as I can see there is no likelihood for the debate to be concluded to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Can we come to some agreement on both sides about closing the debate say on Tuesday if that would be convenient for members on both sides.

Mr. LAURIER. I think we can agree that there will be no division on Monday.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and the House adjourned at 12.30 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 16th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 42) to incorporate the Pontiac and Renfrew Railway Company.—(Mr. Bryson.)

Bill (No. 43) to amend the Act incorporating the Shuswap and Okanagan Railway Company.—(Mr. Mara.)

Bill (No. 44) respecting bonds of branch lines of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

Bill (No. 45) respecting the Ontario and Quebec Railway Company.—(Mr. Small.)

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to take the opportunity of enquiring of the First Minister if there is truth in the report which is circulated that the Crown Prince, the present Emperor of Germany, is deceased?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have no information on that point. I am happy to believe that it is an error.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I thought probably it was.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The report arose, I fancy, from the flags being hoisted half-mast high. They were so hoisted on the reception of a communication from the Home Government, to honor the obsequies of the late Emperor.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other, (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

Mr. DESSAINT.

And amendment of Mr. Foster:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending Trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1879 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker, the consideration of the question now before the House is a matter of great importance to this country, and it may truly be said that no question has been debated in this Chamber since the date of Confederation of as great importance as that now under consideration. It is a question, Sir, which has recently attracted a very large amount of attention in the country; it is a question which to-day occupies in the public mind a more prominent place than any other public question. It is also a question which has been discussed and considered for some months past not as a party question; it has been a political question indeed, but it was not a party question. Either of the great parties in this country were at liberty at any time to make this proposition a plank in their platform, or both of the great parties were at liberty to act in concert on this matter for the purpose of procuring what we believe would prove a very great boon to Canada. It is a question, Sir, that can only be said to have assumed the position of a party question, yesterday. It only assumed that position, Sir, when the Minister of Marine introduced his amendment to the motion made by my hon. friend at my right, declaring that in the opinion of this House reciprocity with the United States ought only be sought for upon conditions which would permit us to retain unimpaired the features of the National Policy, or, in other words, that it should only be sought for upon conditions that we are certain would be refused. That, Sir, makes a plain, square issue and makes the question a party question. My hon. friend from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has introduced his motion, declaring that unrestricted reciprocity between Canada and the United States would prove to be a boon that we are warranted in seeking to obtain; and the Government meets that proposal by a counter-proposition, declaring that we will not seek for it—that we will not accept reciprocity with the United States, except upon conditions which the Government and the people of that country have distinctly informed us, time and time again and for years past, were inadmissible, and conditions upon which they would not grant it. It now, Sir, becomes a party question, and it is the party question of the day. It will be a party question, in all probability, for some years in the future, and, Sir, in my belief it is a principle that is bound to triumph in this country. In my belief, the hope of this country is intimately connected with the triumph of this principle.

In considering this question it is well at all times to bear in mind our peculiar position, our peculiar environments and our surroundings upon this continent at the same time. No less than 65,000,000 of people speak the English tongue on this continent to-day, and that, at this moment, North America is the great seat of Anglo-Saxon power. Some weeks ago I stood upon the plains of Abraham and looked upon the inscription on that simple shaft erected to the memory of General Wolfe:

"Here died Wolfe victorious, September 17, 1759."

Well, Sir, 129 years have passed away since then, and the two and a half millions of English-speaking people that then dwelt upon this continent have increased to 65,000,000. When we come to make computations as to the probable increase in numbers and wealth of English speaking people on this continent, and are guided in these computations by the experience of the past, the result of such computations would lead one to doubt whether he were waking or dreaming. It is certain, Sir, that, in the near future, there will be 100,000,000 of English-speaking people on the continent of North America, and in all human probability that number will be living on this continent when we reach the year 1910. It is morally certain that there will be 65,000,000 people in the United States at the next census in 1890, as certain almost is it that there will be 80,000,000 people there in 1900, and that there will be 100,000,000 in 1910. Now, Sir, this being the case, and the fact being apparent that this continent is to be the grandest theatre of Anglo-Saxon achievements and development of Anglo-Saxon power, it becomes us to consider our position as Anglo Saxons living upon the continent of North America. We should approach the consideration of this question not in a partisan spirit; we should approach the consideration of this question with a view to the promotion of the best interests of this country. It is a question which, above all other questions, requires in its treatment and in its consideration the exercise of patriotic impulses and motives.

Mr. LANDRY. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. My hon. friend says "hear, hear." I hope, Sir, he will never lose sight of this sentiment when treating this question. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have forty-five Anglo-Saxon commonwealths and fifteen territorial organisations, besides the commonwealths upon this continent. Part of these are under one flag and part of them are under another, but they are to-day, and they will be in all the days of the future, intimately bound together. The fate of one will influence the fate of the other, and it is inevitable such will be the case. Their geographical situation is such that they must necessarily have commercial and social relations of the most intimate character, the one with the other.

Now, Sir, in dealing with the question of a proposed commercial treaty with the United States, we have to take into consideration—and we shall find that at every turn of the argument that view of the case will crop up—the relative public burdens resting on the two countries, the amount of the necessary taxation in one and in the other, the burden of debt resting on one and on the other, and the expenditure of one and of the other. We shall have to enter into a process of self-examination to ascertain exactly what our position relatively to that of the United States is. To state the case briefly, we commenced in 1867 with a net debt of $75,728,400; on the 1st of March last our debt amounted to $229,000,000, an increase of $153,600,000 in round numbers, or 203 per cent., while our population did not increase more than 40 per cent. The increase of our debt in that time has been five times more rapid than the increase of our population. We commenced in 1868 with an expenditure of $13,486,000, and last year our expenditure was $35,658,000—that of the preceding year was much higher. That was an increase of $22,000,000, or 164 per cent., an increase of expenditure four times more rapid than the increase of population. Our taxation from customs in 1868 was $8,578,000, and in 1887 it was $22,378,000, an increase of $13,800,000 or 160 per cent., an increase four times more rapid than the increase of population. Now, you will see that the increase in debt has outstripped the increase of population in a five-fold ratio, the increase of expenditure has outstripped the increase of population in a four-fold ratio, and the increase of taxation has outstripped the increase of population in a four-fold ratio; and the only period in the history of Canada when this course of things has not marked the administration of the affairs of this country, was during the administration of my hon. and most highly honored friend at my right (Mr. Mackenzie). Under his administration, though he was compelled, in order to carry out obligations incurred by his predecessors, to increase the debt of this country from 1874-5 to 1878-9, so that the burden of interest was increased $604,000, he diminished the taxation from customs from $15,351,000 in 1874-5 to $12-900,000 in 1878-9, a decrease in taxation of $3,451,000. Although the expenditure chargeable to consolidated fund increased in the same period, by a careful computation, almost exactly $352,000, the controllable expenditure was diminished by $1,782,000. I say, Sir, that period furnished the only instance in the history of Canada, since 1867, when the affairs of this country have been administered in other than a reckless manner, and a manner contrary to the dictates of economy and prudence.

Now, Sir, one result of this extravagance, and of other circumstances to which I shall shortly allude, is to be seen in the exodus of the population of this country. I am aware, Sir, that hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House seek to belittle this loss. I am aware that the accuracy of the statistics furnished by the United States is impugned by them. I am aware that they deny that any unusual movement in that direction has taken place in late years. The hon. Minister of Marine stated, yesterday, that no unusual movement of late had taken place. The hon. member for West Huron (Mr. Porter) stated that there was a movement to a certain extent, and that the movement from his section was of young men who went to find homes free and untrammelled and cheaper than they could find them in Ontario. While they do go for that purpose, the fact is capable of demonstration that the exodus from this country has been of an alarming character. No person can visit the United States and travel with his eyes open without becoming aware that in the northern States a great percentage of the population is native Canadian. The statistics furnished at Washington show that the immigration from British America to the United States amounted in 1870 to 490,000 souls. The census of 1880 returned 700,000 souls, and 930,000 odd children born in the United States of Canadian parents as then living in the United States; so that it is demonstrable that, at the present moment, not less than 2,000,000 people are living in the United States who would have had their homes in Canada but for the exodus which has taken place from this country to theirs. This exodus is intimately connected with the administration of affairs of this country. It is caused, to a large extent, by the serious burdens imposed on the people of the country. It is caused to a still larger extent by the delusive promises made on behalf of the National Policy, which the people of this country are aware have not been and cannot be fulfilled. That National Policy, which was adopted in 1879, promised to the farmers of Canada a market for all their productions. They have not secured it; but, on the contrary, instead of receiving higher prices, prices have continued steadily, and year by year, to decline. It promised to the farmers of Canada that American productions should be prevented from coming into competition with Canadian productions, by the duties imposed on the former. That also was a delusion and a snare. It promised that competition between manufacturers in Canada would lower the price of goods, and the truth is that to-day there is no civilised country in the world where the producer buys dearer and sells cheaper than he does in Canada.

Mr. HICKEY. It is not so; you cannot prove it either.

Mr. CHARLTON. It is so. In some cases goods may be absolutely somewhat lower in price than they were ten years ago; but there is no case in which goods are not relatively higher in consequence of the National Policy than they were then. There is no class of goods that it will not pay to smuggle into this country. There are no goods that are not sold in this country almost up to the limit at which similar goods could be imported with the duty paid; and I repeat that Canada, is of all civilised countries, the one where the great producing classes buy dear and sell cheap. That is the result of the National Policy, and one of the fruits of that policy is to drive from this country hundreds of thousands of its citizens. The hon. Minister of the Interior assured us the other night that the farmers of Ontario were in a happy condition. Well, Sir, I leave the farmers of Ontario to judge, and to say whether that is not entirely destitute of every element of truth, and whether it is not a cruel insult to that class of people. He proceeded to make a comparison between the prices obtainable for certain productions of the soil in Buffalo and in Toronto, and he succeeded in making a comparison in some articles that was favorable to Canada. Now, since the year 1879, when the National Policy went into operation, there never has been a time, in my opinion, which is based upon the market reports, when agricultural productions of all kinds were not rated higher in price in the United States markets than in the corresponding Canadian markets, until the past summer, autumn and winter, when, for the first time since the National Policy was adopted, it has been possible to make a comparison that would be favorable to Canada in a few lines of agricultural productions. And what was the cause of this? It was because last year we had an unprecedented drought in Ontario, which dried up our pastures and caused the country to have a deficient crop; and, as a result of that disaster, potatoes were imported from Manitoba, and Ontario became, instead of a producing country with a surplus to sell, a consuming country which had to purchase supplies of various kinds in order to meet its wants. Under these conditions, for a short time in the history of Ontario, prices were higher in some lines there than in the corresponding markets of the United States, and the hon. gentleman paraded before this House certain facts which were due solely to a great agricultural disaster, and upon these facts he felicitated himself on the unduly prosperous condition of the country.

Although, perhaps, it is not exactly germane to the case, I will allude to the statement made by the hon. the Minister of the Interior, with regard to the burdens resting upon the farmers in the western States. The hon. gentleman seems to have conceived that the Chicago Times is an authority of greater value than any statistical report in the country, and he quoted an extract from that paper stating that mortgages in the western States were placed at from 1 to 3 per cent. per month, and that the land in that country was rapidly being swallowed up by capitalists through the foreclosure of mortgages. Now, whether the hon. gentleman was aware of it or not, no statement could have been wider of the truth, and so far as it may have any bearing upon the question under discussion now, I pronounce it to be entirely unfounded. I know, from personal experience and observation, that 6 and 7 per cent. per annum on good mortgage security, is considered a satisfactory rate in the States of Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota and Missouri, and that only do high rates prevail in some of the newer Territories, where the security to be considered is of a less solid character. The fact is, there is a plethora of capital in the United States which is seeking investment, at low rates, in any portion of the country where satisfactory security can be obtained, and the statement of the hon. gentleman that 3 per cent. a month is charged on good mortgage security is utterly unfounded, even if it does emanate from that paper, which has been called the Satanic press of Chicago, the Chicago Times.

Another result of the policy of this Government is found at the present moment in the condition of our North-West. My hon. friend told us the other night that many Canadians had been entrapped into going to Dakota. Well, I do not know of any individual in this Dominion who has more effectually aided in entrapping Canadians into Dakota than the Minister of the Interior. I do not know of any cause that has operated more effectually to produce immigration to Dakota than the regulations of the Department of the Interior. True, they have been modified somewhat, and for the better, under the administration of my hon. friend. True, they were very much worse under his predecessor, but still those regulations to-day—and I wish that I may be able to impress this fact on the mind of my hon. friend—are of a character to aid most efficiently in entrapping Canadians into Dakota, because they are less liberal than the land regulations of the United States. They are less liberal with reference to homestead grants; they are less liberal as regards the prices of land. They charge as much again for land south of the Canadian Pacific Railway as is charged in the United States for land similarly situated. They charge 75 cents per acre more for land north of the Canadian Pacific Railway than is charged for similar lands in the United States; and these charges have operated most powerfully in diverting emigration from the Canadian North-West to the new Territories of the American Union. Another influence that has operated to entrap Canadians into Dakota is the National Policy, which bears with unjust severity upon the people of our North-West. It is a policy which imposes upon them heavy taxation on the implements they introduce into that country, it is a policy which, while on the one hand taxing them mercilessly, denies them on the other hand the means for securing the transmission of the grain that lies piled up in millions of bushels along the Canadian Pacific Railway at the present moment. I visited Manitoba lately, and was informed there that the duty on agricultural implements often amounted to over 50 per cent. of their actual cost, under the regulations of the department. Steam threshers and mowing machines introduced at the boundary line at their actual cost, are revalued; their value is increased, and the purchaser obliged to pay a duty of 50 per cent. or more on their cost. These things—these regulations with regard to land, and the operation of the National Policy in the North-West, are what have driven Canadians into Dakota and Minnesota, and have led to there being more Canadians to-day in the single Territory of Dakota than there are in Manitoba and all the Territories in the North-West.

So much for this diagnosis of the Canadian case. Now, to come to a direct consideration of the question under discussion, I wish to draw the attention of my hon. friends opposite to one most significant fact. The question of commercial or unrestricted reciprocity has been under consideration in the country for some time, and a great number of the farmers' institutes of Ontario, forty out of sixty, have pronounced unequivocally and by overwhelming majorities in favor of this principle embodied in the resolution now before the House. I hold a list in my hand of these institutes, but it is hardly necessary for me to take up the time of the House by reading it at the present moment. I have attended the meetings of some of those institutes, and have found that, in all cases, the sentiment in favor of commercial union or unrestricted reciprocity was of a most pronounced character, and I have found that this sentiment is by no means confined within party lines. The president of one of the institutes, a meeting of which I attended, was a Reformer. He took the platform in opposition to the principle of unrestricted reciprocity, in reply to the arguments I made in its behalf. I had the privilege of the closing reply, and the vote that was taken showed there were only three present, in the whole meeting, who were opposed to the principle of unrestricted reciprocity. The people feel instinctively that a change is required. They feel that our interests require us to obtain closer trade relations with the United States, and that every impediment placed in the way of trade with that country is an impediment that reacts upon all the great producing classes of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said a few moments ago, our relative position in the matter of taxation, our relative position in the matter of expenditure and in the matter of debt, to that of the United States is a practical question of the utmost importance to the people of this country. It is a question that will become more and more important to us. It is a question which has a most important bearing upon the welfare of this country, because we have an intelligent people in this Dominion from whom it is impossible to conceal the true condition of affairs, a people who can come to a conclusion themselves as to the meaning of our debt burden, which is two and a-half times greater than that of the United States, per capita, a people who can calculate for themselves what the increase of expenditure four times more rapidly than the increase of population means, a people who know, in fact, that the course the country is pursuing is one which threatens the gravest disaster; and when they compare the condition of this country with that of the United States, they are induced in thousands of cases to abandon Canada and go to that country. In view of that condition of affairs, I want to point out what the disparity in the burdens of the two countries is, and I do that in order to enforce the argument which I wish to impress upon the House, that the time has come for retrenchment and economy. On the 1st March, this present month, the gross debt of the United States amounted to $1,202,454,714; the net debt amounted to $1,092,927,581, deducting from the gross debt the principal and interest due from the Pacific roads, less their sinking funds. The gross per capita charge in the United States was $20.04, and the net per capita charge $18.22. But the argument which will probably be advanced is that this is not a fair comparison, and that it is necessary, in order to make the comparison a fair one, to add to the debt of the United States the debt of the various States, because, while we grant subsidies to our Provinces, the general Government of the United States does not. If we accept that as a correct statement, and include the debts of the States, funded and unfunded, which amounted in 1887 to $228,347,462, less $50,753,312 sinking funds and assets convertible into cash, or net debt amounting to $177,589,150, we find that the net debt, federal and state all included, on the 1st March last, was $1,270,516,446, or a per capita charge of $21.18. Now, what is ours? On the basis of four and three-quarter millions of inhabitants, which, I presume, are as many as will be claimed, we find that our net debt of $229,409,430 is equal to a per capita charge of $48.29, or two and one-third times as much as the total indebtedness of the United States, federal and state. That is a grave state of affairs. It involves taxing this people two and one-third times as much as the people of the United States are taxed. No, it is even heavier, because, while the 3 per cents. in that country are at a premium, in this country the 3 per cents. are at a discount. Our credit is not as good, and the relative ability to meet the indebtedness is in the ratio of about two and one-half in Canada to one in the United States. Last year, the Government of the United States reduced the national debt by $103,471,097, and the State debts were reduced by $15,260,986, while we increased our indebtedness and made our position worse than it had been at the opening of the year. If we come to the question of customs, we find that last year we raised by customs duties the amount of $22,469,705, which is a per capita charge of $4.73. In the United States they raised the amount of $217,286,893, or $3.62 per capita. But of that $217,000,000 they applied $103,471,097 towards the extinguishment of their national debt, leaving a net taxation from customs applicable to expenditure of $113,815,796, or a per capita charge of $1.90 against a charge of $4.73 a head in Canada. Under that condition of things, with an actual taxation from customs nearly three times as great as that in the neighboring country, what is likely to be the inevitable result? Is it not time to call a halt in this country and to cease this reckless course of extravagance, this piling up of our debt mountains high, this rushing the country at railroad speed into expenditure, which must lead to financial destruction. The expenditure of the United States did not reach the present expenditure of Canada till that country had more than 20,000,000 inhabitants. The United States never owed more than half of our present debt until it had 32,000,000 inhabitants, except during two years, 1816 and 1817, just after the conclusion of the war with England, when its debt was a trifle more than half our present debt. The practical difficulty between any commissioners appointed between this country and the United States to arrange for reciprocal trade would be this very question, that to arrange an assimilation of our tariffs it would be necessary to do away with the disparity which exists between the two countries as to the revenue required from taxation to meet the expenditure of the two countries. We need to-day to raise almost as much again per head as they to meet our current expenses, and the disparity in this respect is growing every year as we drift wider and wider apart in the matter of debt burden which is resting upon the people. It is undeniable that our progress for the last twenty years has been slow. It is undeniable that it has been slow as compared with the progress of the United States during that period of their national existence which corresponds with ours during the last twenty years. In 1790, that country had a population of 3,900,000. In 1810, twenty years later, its population had increased to 7,250,000. During all that time, it is estimated that the accession to the population from immigration did not reach 140,000 souls. Now, have we as satisfactory an exhibit to present as that? We would have had, if we had not lost two million people—one million who left us and their progeny who would have been with us if we had not lost that population. We do not present so favorable a record as that by two or three million souls. Is this progress, this unsatisfactory rate of progress that we have made, due to inferiority of race? No, it is not. The hon. member from Huron (Mr. Porter) very truthfully said last night that our emigrants to the United States maintained the reputation of Canada wherever they went. So they do. There is not an element in the population of the United States more progressive, more highly esteemed, more successful than the native Canadians who are in that country. We are losing the life-blood of this young country, we are losing the most energetic of our population, who are going to swell the resources, to swell the wealth and increase the might of that great power which has already some 60,000,000 of population. We can only regret that we have not those men here. We can only deplore the circumstances which have led them away from our soil, but we can seek to arrest the course which has led to this. Is it due to lack of natural resources? There is scarcely a country in the world which is more abundantly blessed by Providence and nature than ours. Its fisheries, its timber, its minerals, its agricultural lands, the boundless prairies of the west, show that this country was designed by Providence to be the home of millions of men and to become a great and wealthy power, and it is failing to reach the destiny which Providence and nature designed to give it, not because of a lack of natural resources, but through the lack of men to develop those resources, who have been driven from the country, to a great extent, by the stupidity of the Government of the day. What is the remedy for this state of things? We require various things—honesty in the administration of the country, economy, retrenchment, and we require access to our natural markets; we require continental free trade, and without continental free trade, without access to the markets of 60,000,000 of people to the south of us, we cannot progress satisfactorily. Our geographical affinities are not with the nations across the Atlantic, but with the kindred commonwealth to the south of us. The Maritime Provinces have followed the dictates of nature and geography; they export their potatoes, their fish, their lumber, their coal and their various other productions to the seaboard cities of the Atlantic, and they bring back from those cities such articles as they may be able to buy at advantage in that country. It is their natural trade. Geographical affinities say they shall trade in that direction, and it is only artificial barriers that prevent their carrying on a lucrative trade with those seaboard cities. Ontario and Quebec, that lie right alongside the great markets of the American Union, the great centres of population and wealth; alongside the State of New York, with nearly 6,000,000 of inhabitants within its borders, and the great metropolis of this continent, possessing three times the wealth of the whole Dominion of Canada—there is our natural market. Geographical affinities say we should trade there. Our railway lines lead to that country, everything invites us to trade there except tariffs, which prevent our availing ourselves of the advantage that nature designed we should reap. Manitoba is naturally a portion of the Mississippi valley, and would naturally trade with St. Paul, and Minneapolis, and Chicago, and St. Louis, and to debar Manitoba and the North-West from access to those great markets, and the shortest routes to the great markets of the east, is burdening them with restrictions not calculated to promote their interests. British Columbia, with its timber, its fish and its coal, finds her natural markets down on the Pacific coast, in Oregon, in California; are the most natural markets that Province can seek or obtain; but the hostile tariffs between the two countries forbid British Columbia to enjoy the advantages that nature designs she should reap from commercial transactions with those Pacific States.

What is the character, Mr. Speaker, of the United States domestic commerce? It is a commerce enormous in its magnitude and varied in its character. The country possesses almost every kind of climate, almost every kind of soil, almost every production of nature, and the commercial transactions between the several States of that nation are so enormous that they would be scarcely credited, if they were stated in detail. Now, we are shut out from that commerce, we are debarred from participating in that trade which has contributed to the so rapid advancement of that country. In order to participate in that trade, we must have access to those markets, and when we do have access to those markets, then we will move along side by side in the steps of progress, abreast of these American States, progressing as rapidly as they do, and unless we do obtain that access to our natural markets, we shall be cribbed, cabined and confined by the restrictions placed upon us here. Now, as I stated a few moments ago, we have 5,000,000 of people, in round numbers, in the Dominion; there are, speaking within limits, 60,000,000 in the United States. There will be 65,000,000 in a few years hence, and 80,000,000 before the end of this century. Now, this people, who will amount to 100,000,000 in 1910, this nation is to-day the richest nation in the world. The actual value of its property is $58,000,000,000; that of Great Britain, $48,000,000,000. The wealth of the United States is $10,000,000,000 greater than that of the United Kingdom. The earnings of the people of the United States last year were $1,050,000,000; the earnings of the people of the United Kingdom were $280,000,000 less; the earnings of the people of France $350,000,000 less, and the earnings of the people of the German Empire over $400,000,000 less than the people of the United States. Well, if this great nation, right at our doors, with more wealth than any other nation, with nearly twice the population of the United Kingdom, and with its prospective growth—if there is anything that can compensate us for the loss of access to the markets of that nation, I would like to be informed what that thing is. I do not believe anything can compensate this country for the loss of access to the markets of that country. The hon. member for Haron (Mr. Porter) told us, last night that we should be sorry if we proceeded to starve our infant industries. I suppose the hon. gentleman proceeded upon the assertion that we are creating those infant industries in order to furnish a home market for the produce of the soil in this country. Well, if that is his object, I can explain to him how he can obtain a short road to that result. The United States have been engaged for twenty-five years in developing a home market. They have now a greater manufacturing interest than any other nation in the world. The United States is the great manufacturing nation of the world; it exceeds England. According to the census of 1880, the productions of the manufactures of the United States were $5,369,000,000; in 1882, the productions of the manufactures of England were $4,092,000,000. The United States, in 1880, produced $1,279,000,000 more manufactures than Great Britain did in 1882. Now, if it is desirable to have a market, if it is desirable to foster our infant industries at a great cost for the time being in order to create a market for the future, is it not more desirable to take a short cut to a market already created, created at a great cost, and created through the operation, if my hon. friend's theory is correct, of a protective tariff during twenty-five years, a market which produces more goods in a year than the manufactures of England do. I say is it not desirable to obtain access to that market by a short cut, rather than to spend years in a futile endeavor to create a market here which never can equal in importance the market already created and opened to us there? Now, Sir, the practical question is: how shall we reach this market? The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries told us last night that we had given the United States the strongest invitation to reciprocity that could be given. He asks: what can be a stronger invitation to reciprocity than our standing offer of 1879? Now, the hon. gentleman is Minister of Fisheries, and I wonder, Sir, if he is not sufficiently astute as a fisherman to change his bait when he is fishing for nine years without getting a nibble. This offer has been standing since 1879—an inducement so strong, he says, that we could not make it stronger; and yet, time and again, the Americans have spurned the offer, they have told us they would not consider it, that they would not 'bite,' and we may keep the offer standing until doomsday without their ever considering it. Sir, the hon. gentleman is attempting to mislead the country when he asserts that we have made an offer as strong as can be made, inviting the American people to reciprocal trade relations. They know that our offer is not a desirable one; we have made an offer that we know they will not accept; and the hon. gentleman is not—well, I won't use the word I was going to use—the hon. gentleman is taking a course in this matter that is not calculated to give the country a proper impression as to the course this Government is pursuing. This Government is not seeking reciprocity, this Government does not want reciprocity, except on inadmissible terms; it will not take reciprocity on such terms as it can be obtained, and that is made perfectly apparent by the motion made by the hon. gentleman, pitting the National Policy against unrestricted reciprocity. Yes, Mr. Speaker, the gauntlet thrown down we have taken up, the challenge given we accept, and we will fight the issue out before the people of this country upon that line alone.

Mr. HESSON. You will have a good time of it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, we will have a good time of it, and the hon. gentleman from Perth may have a little participation in that good time. Now, Sir, this is a matter that requires careful consideration. If this celebrated standing offer that we have had on our Statute-book for nine years is not acceptable to the United States, it is our duty to ascertain what the Americans demand. Will they grant reciprocity on any terms whatever? It is our duty to ascertain how that case is, how we are to meet them? What probability is there of achieving success under any circumstances whatever? We have indications which point most unmistakably to the conclusion that reciprocal trade with the United States can be obtained. We have the letter of Mr. Bayard, we have the declarations of many public men in the United States. We have the introduction of two Bills, one by Mr. Butterworth and one by Mr. Hitt, the one corresponding in its essential features with the proposal we have under discussion now; the other, that by Mr. Hitt, proposing an arrangement equal to commercial union. We have the fact that the last named Bill was reported yesterday unanimously. I am led to believe that the great mass of American public men will look favorably upon the consideration of any proposal that involves the granting of reciprocal trade arrangements with Canada upon a basis which will not be, like the old Reciprocity Treaty, chiefly advantageous to one side. They simply ask in this arrangement that their own interests should be considered as well as ours, that the arrangements should not be exclusively advantageous to one side but mutually advantageous to both, and as honest men I do not think we would feel disposed to ask more.

In his speech the other night the Minister of Interior was good enough to quote a certain statement made by myself in Haldimand in definition of what constitutes commercial union. I do not know that I would have alluded to the subject but for that reference made by the Minister of Interior. He told us that commercial union meant—and the hon. gentleman will correct me if I do injustice to him in the statement—the same duties to be collected against the outside world in Canada as were now collected in the United States. That was the distinct statement made by the Minister of Interior—that commercial union simply meant the adoption by Canada of the present tariff of the United States. If the hon. gentleman made that statement deliberately understanding what he did mean, he either did not understand what commercial union meant or he made a statement calculated to mislead the country. No advocate of commercial union, either in Canada or the United States, assumes or proposes that the present tariff of the United States is to be adopted by either one country or the other. No advocate of commercial union assumes that an arrangement will be made that does not involve a re-arrangement of the tariff, an arrangement satisfactory to both powers and consented to by both powers, and neither one power or the other is obliged to enter into an arrangement for commercial union unless the arrangement is satisfactory—it must be made satisfactory, and it does not imply that the present tariff of the United States will be adopted as the tariff to be levied under commercial union.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Will the hon. gentleman allow me. I understand him to say that I implied that the proposition was that the present tariff of the United States was to be adopted as commercial union. I did not so state and did not so imply. What I did state was this: I inferred from the statement of the hon. gentleman that whatever was the tariff of the United States, that would be the tariff of Canada; that is to say, we would have the same tariff, whatever that tariff might be, against all other countries, with free trade as between these two countries. Is that the proposition now before the House by hon. gentlemen?

Mr. CHARLTON. No, it is not. I was led to discuss that question from the fact that the hon. Minister had alluded to it; and if he would add that the tariff would be one consented to by Canada and acceptable to Canada, then he would have made a fair statement of the case.

Mr. BOWELL. It would be against the rest of the world, would it not?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. By mutual agreement.

Mr. CHARLTON. I might as well define what I understand commercial union to mean. The definition read by the Minister of Interior, quoted from the speech made by me in Haldimand, is exactly what I do understand commercial union to mean. I understand commercial union to mean an arrangement between two or more powers or as many more as choose to join—for in the commercial union of Germany embraced all the German States—an arrangement made between two or more countries whereby they adopt a common tariff and common excise laws, abolish all commercial restrictions between themselves, abolish all customs lines between themselves, collect a revenue at any point where the goods may be entered from any country not a member of the union; throw that whole revenue into one common fund and divide that fund, after taking out the cost of collection, either upon the basis of a per capita division or upon such other division or upon such other basis as may be mutually agreed upon by the contracting parties.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I do not desire to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but perhaps he will go further and state whether that is the proposition now before the House by the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has been told most distinctly, and it has been stated a dozen times on this side of the House, that it is not the proposition. I can add that the hon. gentleman and his followers must have been even more stupid, if that is possible, than is usually the case.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am not so uncharitable as my hon. friend. I do not accuse the hon. gentleman of stupidity, but he evidently believes that the country is stupid and that he can mislead the people upon this question by dragging a red herring across the trail. So much for the question of commercial union arising indirectly on this question, owing to the remarks made by the Minister of Interior.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CHARLTON. Some hon. gentlemen say "Oh, oh," as if this was a question we would not dare to discuss. I am ready to discuss this question, I am not afraid of it. It is not, however, the question under discussion. The resolution under the consideration of the House is a resolution with regard to unrestricted reciprocity; but that is only a means of arriving at commercial relations between two countries that may be arrived at in some other way. We have adopted that because we consider it preferable to the others simply for that and for no other reason. With respect to unrestricted reciprocity, let us define what we understand that to mean. We understand—at least I understand by unrestricted reciprocity—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh!

Mr. CHARLTON. I do not profess to speak for the world and for all men, I speak for myself. I understand by unrestricted reciprocity an arrangement that would admit into the United States all the natural productions of Canada, all the manufactured productions of Canada, all the productions of Canada of any nature, character or name whatever, free of duty; an arrangement which would reciprocally admit into Canada all the productions of the United States of the same character; that we leave the United States free to impose such duties as they choose upon the productions of other countries imported into that country; that we leave Canada free to do the same thing, and raise its revenue from import duties in such a way as it may choose, on such scale of duties as it may choose to impose, leaving both countries perfectly free to carry out its own arrangements except in so far as reciprocal trade between the two countries is concerned in the productions of the two countries. I do not know whether that is sufficiently definite for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Is that your proposition?

Mr. CHARLTON. Yes, as I understand it.

Mr. BOWELL. Do you include articles produced in the United States and not produced in Canada vice versa.

Mr. CHARLTON. Certainly. The United States produces a good many articles that we do not, and we produce some that they do not. The arrangement contemplates a perfect reciprocal trade, a reciprocal trade that admits all the products of one country into the other. Now, I would ask, Mr. Speaker, can reciprocity, the question which we are discussing, be considered a mere theoretical question? Do we know anything about the operation of this system? We know that in 1787 thirteen States comprising then the American Union entered into an arrangement which was practically equivalent to reciprocal trade between those States. Those States, it is true, existed under a Federal Union, but each one of those States, and all the States subsequently admitted to the American Union, retained their distinct autonomy. Each State retained control over its criminal code and its civil code, and, in fact, the jurisdiction of their Legislatures is much wider than the jurisdiction of the Legislatures of the Provinces of this Dominion. They were thirteen nations then—they are thirty-eight nations now, banded together for certain common purposes; and those thirty-eight nations, commencing with thirteen, have existed and progressed since 1787 with unrestricted trade existing between all these States. What is the result of that unrestricted reciprocity? In 1884, as my hon. friend at my right informed the House, the internal commerce of that country, according to Mr. Nimmo, amounted to \$10,000,000,000. Last year the internal commerce, it is estimated, amounted to \$11,500,000,000, based upon the increase of tonnage transported upon the railways of that country. Now, Sir, how does that compare with the total commerce carried by the total shipping of the world, exclusive of the United States? Do you suppose it equals the sea-going commercial transactions of England, France, Germany and all the Maritime States of Christendom, excluding the United States? Sir, the commerce of all those countries last year amounted to \$4,213,000,000 as against \$11,500,000,000 in the United States. The internal commerce of the United States in reality had two and a-half times the volume of the entire commerce by shipping of all the nations of the world, leaving out the United States. That is an astounding statement. Including England, including every country except the United States, this latter country last year had a vastly greater volume of commerce than all the others. 149,000 miles of railway have moved last year 482,245,000 tons of freight. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance informed us last night we had moved the same year in Canada 16,000,000 tons, or one-thirtieth part of the freight moved upon the railways of the United States. The amount of freight moved by the shipping by all the nations of the world, exclusive of the United States, was 92,432,000 tons, which is less than one-quarter the freight moved on American railways. The earnings of the United States railways were \$82,000,000 last year; the earnings of all the shipping of the world, leaving out the shipping of the United States, amounted to \$535,000,000; the railways of the United States earned on freight \$287,000,000 more last year than all the shipping of the world, excepting the shipping of the United States. Those facts enable us to form some dim conception of the vast volume of that commerce created by one hundred years' experience of the system of reciprocity between the commonwealths composing that great confederation. Do you think, Mr. Speaker, that a tariff would be tolerated between the eastern groups of those States and any of the other groups, or between the middle group or any of the other groups, or between the southern or Pacific groups? Do you think that a tariff would be permitted by the States of the Union to exist between any one of those groups? No, Sir, it would be detrimental to their interests, and never would be permitted. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, in what does this great northern group, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, and embracing all the Provinces and Territories of the Dominion—in what respect, geographical or natural, this northern group differs from either the southern, the middle, the western, the eastern or the Pacific group of the great American confederation? Geographically we are the same, our interests are exactly the same as theirs, and to debar us from that continental trade enjoyed by all those States is to inflict upon us the same injuries that would be inflicted upon any one of those groups of States, if they had not their internal commercial relations with their sister States. I repeat, Sir, that our interests in this great continental group of Anglo-Saxon commonwealths are identical with the interests of every group of commonwealths in this great constellation, and that to debar the States which comprise this Dominion from free access to the markets of the country south of us is just as detrimental to our interests as would be the attempt, which would be resisted by every State in the Union, to place any particular State under similar disabilities to those which are forced upon us. Reciprocity, Sir, is not a mere theory; it has worked the most beneficent results in that great country, it has been chiefly instrumental in increasing the population from 3,900,000 to 61,000,000, and it has produced those astounding results in trade and commerce which I have laid before the House. It has made that country the wealthiest and most powerful nation in the world, a nation which in 1862 contained but a little more than one-half the population and considerably less than one-half the wealth it does to-day. It enabled that country to place in the field two and a-half millions of armed men and to incur an expenditure of \$6,000,000,000, which is nearly wiped out to-day. Now, notwithstanding natural laws, and notwithstanding artificial restrictions, I say that natural laws do assert themselves. When those artificial restrictions were temporarily removed, to a partial extent, in the period extending between 1854 and 1865, the increase in the commerce of this country with the United States, as explained by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) yesterday, was prodigious. The total trade of Canada with the United States ran up from \$20,000,000 in 1854 to \$84,000,000 in 1865. Since the restrictions have been reimposed that trade has fallen back, and after a lapse of twenty-four years the total trade between Canada and the United States is some \$2,000,000 less than it was in 1865, showing the beneficent results produced by reciprocity and the opposite result by restricted trade measures. Mr. Speaker, if we were to adopt unrestricted reciprocity we would probably have the same ratio of increase in our trade with the United States, and if unrestricted reciprocity went into operation this year, by the year 1900 our trade with the United States would be \$325,000,000 with the same ratio of increase. You must bear in mind, Sir, that the proposition before this House contemplates the throwing off of all shackles which existed during the Reciprocity Treaty. That was only a partial reciprocity treaty, a reciprocity treaty merely in natural products; but now the proposition we are discussing contemplates the admission of all the products of both countries, and there is no reason, Sir, for supposing that, under the operation of such a treaty, commerce between the United States and Canada would not equal \$500,000,000 in the year of our Lord 1900. Notwithstanding the restrictions imposed upon trade, there is still a great amount of trade transacted between those two countries. Last year, of the total amount of imports into Canada, 42 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. came from the United States, of the total amount of exports from this country 42 per cent. of all went to the United States. We are importing from the United States \$45,000,000, in round numbers, and exporting \$37,000,000, with the result that the volume of trade inward is 42 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the whole, and outward 42 per cent. of all our trade, as I have said.

Now, I shall come to the consideration, Mr. Speaker, of the most practical part of this question, the one that interests the great producing classes of Canada, and I would proceed to the consideration of this branch of the question by asking, what do we sell to the people of the United States? We sell them horses, cattle, sheep, peas, and on those articles a duty of 20 per cent. is levied. We sell them fish, and by the United States returns, the duty on fish last year was 21 $\frac{7}{2}$ per cent. We sell them barley, rye, oats, and buckwheat, and the duty on each of these articles is 10 cents a bushel. We sell them potatoes, on which the duty is 15 cents per bushel. We sell them hops, on which the duty is eight cents a pound. We sell them wool, on which the duty is 10 cents a pound; hay, on which the duty is \$2 a ton; lumber, on which the duty is \$2 per 1,000; butter, on which the duty is four cents a pound; iron ore, on which the duty is 75 cents per ton; coal, on which the duty is 75 cents per ton; and salt, on which the duty is 12 cents per cwt. in bags, and six cents per cwt. in bulk. We sell them all these articles and many more. The American statistics are not kept as well as ours—I am sure my hon. friend the Minister of Customs will be glad to hear that—and it is impossible to ascertain from them with exactness the amount of duties collected on Canadian imports last year or any preceding year. They give the amount in mass, but do not distinguish countries as we do in our statistics, and there has been no change in their practice in that respect since 1820. But we can arrive with a fair degree of accuracy at the amount of duty paid to the American Government on Canadian imports, and that amount was, last year, in all about \$5,500,000. Now, the practical question that interests the people of this country above all others is, who pays this duty? If it can be shown that the American consumer pays the duty—that for these articles which we export to the United States we get just as much as we would if no duty was imposed, I think one reason we urge for adopting unrestricted reciprocity would cease to exist; but if it can be shown that in the majority of cases the prices we received for these various articles is just so much less than it would be by the amount of the duty, then we have a very practical interest in the question. Now, we will consider this question first, in the light of the farmer's case, next in that of the fisherman's, next in that of the lumberman's, and then in that of the miner's. I will trouble you with a few figures, showing the quantities of articles imported from Canada into the United States last year, because this is a very important point, and I wish to attempt to demonstrate the position I take. I give the quantities of certain articles imported, and I compare the volume of those imports with the production of the same articles in the United States, as shown in the census of 1880, except that in the case of barley I take the production of 1886, as I was able to obtain that:

Article.	Quantity.	Rate of duty.	Duty paid.	United States production.
Barley.....	9,437,717 bush.	10 cts.	$943,771	63,000,000 bush.
Beans.....	197,764 "	10 "	20,860
Pease.....	405,358 "	20 "	86,268
Wheat.....	341,508 "	20 "	68,300	459,483,137 "
Malt.....	182,176 "	20 "	34,435	18,273,102 "
Potatoes.....	1,276,809 "	15 "	191,520	169,458,589 "
Hay.....	69,450 tons	$2	138,900	35,205,712 tons

Article.	Quantity.	Rate of duty.	Duty paid.	United States production.
Horses.....	18,225	20 p. c.	$442,867	10,357,498
Cattle.....	45,765	20 "	177,551	35,925,461
Sheep.....	363,046	20 "	191,896	85,192,074
Wool.....	1,297,867 lbs.	10 "	129,798	155,681,751 lbs.

These figures show that we sold them one bushel of barley to every seven they produced; one bushel of wheat to every 1,200 bushels they produced; one bushel of malt to every 100 bushels they produced; one bushel of potatoes to every 130 bushels they produced; one ton of hay to every 500 tons they produced; one horse to every 600 they raised, one head of cattle to every 700 head they raised, one sheep to every 100 they raised, and one pound of wool to every 130 they produced. I do not think any one will say that the removal of the duties charged by the United States on these articles which we sold to them, would have the effect of reducing the price of their own productions. I do not think you can convince the common-sense yeomanry of this country that it would, because they know that the volume of our exports to the United States is so small, compared with the volume of the United States productions, that the imposition of the duty has little or no effect on the price in that country. Upon these articles which I have enumerated there was collected, last year, \$2,500,000 of duties; and in addition to the articles I have named, we sold them buckwheat, rye, oats, turnips, vegetables, hops, flaxseed, seeds, poultry, butter, cheese, mutton, meats, &c., &c. The duties paid on all the articles sold by the farmers of Canada in the United States last year amounted to no less than \$3,000,000, and the proportion these articles bear to the total quantity in the United States is infinitely small. It is preposterous to suppose that the removal of the duty from these articles, the quantity of which is so small compared with the total raised in that country, would seriously affect the prices of the bulk of these goods produced in the United States. Then with regard to the fishermen's case. Last year we exported to the United States fish to the amount of \$2,717,509, the duty on which, estimating it at an average of 20 per cent., which is 1 $\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. less than the rate given in the United States returns, was \$543,500. Now, the United States production of fish in the same year amounted to \$13,041,053. We sold them therefore one-sixteenth of the quantity of fish they consumed, and they themselves produced fifteen sixteenths. It will hardly be maintained that the removal of the 20 per cent. duty on one-sixteenth of the entire product would affect to any appreciable extent the value of the remaining fifteen-sixteenths. With regard to the lumbermen's case: we sold to the United States last year 508,304,000 feet of plank boards and joists, the duty on which amounted to \$1,016,608. In addition we sold to the United States lath, hardwood, lumber, deals, spruce lumber, deal ends, pickets, staves, shingles, &c., and I have no doubt that the total amount of duty collected in that country on the product of our forests reached \$1,200,000. While we sold to the United States that quantity of lumber, they produced themselves, according to the census of 1880, 18,000,000,000, and the production last year was undoubtedly much greater. Our exports to them, therefore, averaged but one thirty sixth part of their total produce of lumber. I do not think that the removal of the duty on our small percentage of one thirty-sixth would greatly affect the price of the balance, and the result is that we pay a good part of the duty on the lumber we export. Let us look at the miners' case. Last year we sold to the United States 404,042 tons of coal, on which the duty collected amounted to \$303,032, and the production in 1880 in the United States—a production which has since largely increased—was 7,480,426 tons of coal. Last year it must have reached 10,000,000 tons. I doubt very much whether the removal of the duty of 400,000 tons would seriously affect the price of 10,000,- 000 tons. Of iron ore we sold last year to the United States, 23,385 tons, and the United States produce, in 1880, was 7,064,829. Last year no doubt the production in that country reached 10,000,000 tons. The trade in iron ore last year from the Lake Superior ports was of vast volume, reaching a value of over \$30,000,000. It employed over one-third of the total tonnage on the lakes. You could go to Erie, Cleveland, Ashtabula or Buffalo, and in each port you would find vast fleets of ore-carrying vessels. The business was one of enormous magnitude, and one which conferred great advantages on the commercial community of all the States bordering on the upper lakes; and while the volume of that trade amounted to several million tons in these ports, we have to show on this side this paltry figure of 23,000 tons as the total export of our ore to the United States. And this in face of the fact that there is lying at Coes Mine, at the head of the Ontario and Central Road, over 30,000 tons of iron ore, which have been lying there for the last two years. We have on the Canadian side an enormous quantity of ore of the best quality, and but for the restriction placed on the trade, our export would amount to millions of tons annually; it would give employment to thousands of men and millions of capital and furnish traffic to new railway lines. Instead of that, we have, owing to the restriction imposed on our export trade, but the beggarly show to make of 23,385 tons shipped to the United States. We pay the duty on what little we do send. If we did not, we would send to the United States vastly more, because there would be an enormous demand for it, and the quality of our ore being superior to what is obtained in the States for certain purposes. Let the restriction imposed on our exports of ore be removed, and an enormous demand for it will spring up. Turning to the article of copper ore, I find that last year we sold 5,267 tons to our neighbors. We have an enormous quantity of this ore on our shores, but the duty of 2½ cents per lb. on the yield of copper effectually bars the trade. Of salt, last year we sold to the United States 106,385 cwt., while the United States production in 1880 was 29,805,293 cwt. Our salt obtained the small sale it did in spite of the duty, and solely on its merits, because it is of a superior quality, and if the duty were removed it would force its way into American consumption. But for the duty an enormous trade would spring up in the salt districts of Lake Huron. One of the best demonstrations of an increase in trade, which will be sure to follow the removal of the duties, is furnished by the trade in eggs. In 1870, our export to the United States amounted to \$14,000, in 1878 it reached \$631,204, and in 1887, \$1,821,364. That little item has grown to be one of the most important articles of export in Canada, simply because the duty was removed on the importation of eggs into the United States. So much for the question of who pays the duty upon what we export to the United States. I repeat that, in my opinion, the volume of our exports to that country is so insignificant in comparison with the vast bulk of the production of that country, that the duty imposed is simply extracted from the prices received by the producer in this country.

Our import trade with the Americans last year amounted to $45,107,066 of their productions. What did we buy? We bought cotton goods, coal, furniture, tools, implements, machinery, hardware, books, coal oil, manufactured brass, cotton, tobacco, hides, &c., and the duty on these imports amounted to $7,299,591. To what extent did the duty on these articles enhance the cost to the consumer? Did he get them for the additional cost of $7,290,000, being the amount of the duty? What would they have cost, in other words, had the duties not being imposed? This brings out one of the objectionable features of indirect taxation that I am about to demonstrate. Every dollar imposed by this Government in the shape of duty means an enhanced cost to the consumer of $1.50. The $1 of duty is added to the cost of the article by the wholesale dealer when he receives the article in his store. Then he proceeds to figure up his profit on the cost of that article, and assesses his profit, not on the cost in the invoice, but on the cost with the duty added, which is part of what he pays for the goods. If, therefore, his profit be 20 per cent., that article goes to the retail merchant, costing him $1.20 more than it would have cost him had there been no duty. The retail merchant, when he places the article upon his shelf, figures his profit of 25 per cent. on the total cost of the article, so that he adds 25 per cent. on $1.20—not on a dollar—and the consumer has to pay the profit in each case on the duty, as well as on the invoice price of the goods. I maintain, therefore, that every dollar of duty levied by the Government implies a loss to the consumer of $1.50, unless the wholesale dealer's profit is less than 20 per cent., and the retail dealer's less than 25 per cent.

Mr. BOWELL. Except in the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. In all countries. I am demonstrating that the duty of $7,299,000 levied upon our importations from the United States last year, meant more than an enhanced cost to the consumer to the extent of the duty alone. It meant an additional tax of 50 per cent. on the duty imposed. Our imports from the United States last year of goods not manufactured—perhaps the hon. the Minister of Customs will correct if I am wrong—amounted, in round figures, to $21,000,000; our imports of coal, corn, hides, tobacco, settlers' effects, alone being $15,200,000. The imports of manufactured goods, if that statement be correct, would amount to $24,000,000, on which this duty of $7,299,591 was imposed. Now, the question is, who paid the duty? It may be said that if we claim that the duty on exports from Canada is paid by the producer in Canada, we must admit that on imports from the United States into Canada the American producer must pay the duty. But the cases are not analogous. While we export to the United States an amount of our productions which is scarcely felt in their market, we buy from the United States an amount which is equal to $1 in every $223 produced in that country, because the production in the United States, in 1880, was $5,369,579,191, and our imports amounted to about $24,000,000. So, if that trade was destroyed, if we bought nothing from them, it would make very little difference in the volume of their business or in the prices asked in the country. If this theory is correct, and I contend it is, and I believe that the thinking, practical classes of people in this country will see that it is, then the loss to Canada from duties which are imposed on the exports from this country, and on the imports into this country, amounts, in regard to the producing classes of this country, to at least $15,000,000 a year. In addition to that, there is another feature to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. For every shipment from Canada to the United States, no matter how insignificant the amount may be, the shipper must obtain a consular certificate, and that involves trouble and cost. In every entry made at custom houses in the United States, the shipper must run the risk of seizure and trouble with the custom house authorities, and that feature of the trade deters a great number of men who would be buyers and operators in the market from engaging in the business at all, and it deprives this country of the advantage of competition to a marked extent, it deprives us of a class of men who would be our most valuable dealers and would pay the best prices for our productions, but on this account they will not come to this market at all. If either of these bought a drove of horses or a herd of cattle and entered them at a custom house in the United States, and it was claimed that the entry was under the amount of the proper value, and the animals were detained there, and the dealer had to summon witnesses to prove that his entry was correct, it is clear that vexation, detention and cost would prove a serious matter, and my practical knowledge of this matter warrants me in saying that in consequence of the tariff we lose half as much from the lack of competition in regard to our commodities as we do on the duties which have to be paid on those commodities. If we lose $5,500,000 in duties, we probably lose $3,000,000 a year by the lack of competition, by the repelling of these competitors who would otherwise engage in the trade, by the custom house restrictions. We lose something else besides this. We not only lose the benefit of the competition we would have but for the absurd restrictions upon trade, but we lose the great benefit, which we cannot estimate, which would accrue to this country from the increase of trade. If our trade with the United States last year was $82,000,000, and if the adoption of this policy would run it up in twelve years to $300,000,000, what amount are we losing? The loss is greater in that direction than the loss from duties or the loss from want of competition, and we can scarcely measure or compute the loss which Canada sustains through the duties which are imposed, and through the regulations which hamper the interchange of commodities between the two countries. I will conclude this branch of my subject by saying that unrestricted reciprocity would, beyond all question, benefit the farmer, that it would benefit the fisherman, that it would benefit the lumberman, that it would benefit the mine owner, that it would benefit the laborer, and, of the 287,000 people in Canada who were given by the census as belonging to the industrial classes, the great majority were blacksmiths, carpenters, shoemakers, masons, bakers, brickmakers, and so forth, all of whom would be benefited by this arrangement. In fact, it would benefit ninety-nine out of every hundred in this Dominion. In fact, it would benefit all except the rings and the combines and the pet industries which have been fostered and pampered by this Government, and have been permitted by unjust legislation to prey upon their fellow-citizens. I have no doubt that the adoption of this policy would increase the value of farm property in a few years by at least 30 per cent. I have no doubt that it would increase the value of mine property beyond computation. I have no doubt that it would increase the value of the timber lands in this Dominion by at least 50 per cent. I believe the adoption of this policy would stop emigration, that it would bring back to us a portion of the million Canadians whom we have lost through emigration to the United States. I believe it would lead to a rapid increase of wealth, and would be in every respect an unmixed blessing to the vast majority of the people of Canada.

Now, I propose to consider the question as to whether unrestricted reciprocity would injure the only remaining class that I have not alluded to, I mean our manufacturers. I have no doubt that a change as radical as this would be would unsettle some lines of business. I have no doubt that it might prove injurious to some manufactures. Common fairness compels me to say that I believe this might be the case, but I believe that the result of this policy, the average outcome of it, would be the conferring of great advantages on the manufacturing class as a whole of this Dominion, and I shall proceed to give to the House the reasons I have for this belief. There is no doubt that its adoption would rout the combines. It would rout the sugar combine and the cotton combine, and all those other combines that our friends on the other side of the House have felt compelled to have a committee to deal with.

Mr. HESSON. Have they not combines on the other side?

Mr. CHARLTON. I think they have, but they are about to strangle them there, while here they are the result of the hon. gentleman's own policy, they are his own offspring, and he would hardly attempt to deal with them in that way.

Hon. Mr. MACKENZIE. It would be infanticide.

Mr. CHARLTON. An hon. gentleman says it would be infanticide, but these combines are hardly infants, they are monsters. I would like to enquire, why our manufacturers in Canada cannot succeed. Are we a people of less intelligence, or of less enterprise, than the Americans? Are we unable to compete with them in an open race in a fair field, with no favor shown? We will hardly admit that. Have we not as cheap labor as they have, and have we not as cheap capital as they have? I hold that we have, and I hold that in any industry in Canada that was adapted to the country, that was a natural industry, we could compete with the Americans, and I believe that opening the markets of 60,000,000 people to our manufactures would lead to a vast increase in the manufacturing operations of this Dominion. We have unrivalled facilities in this country for the manufacture of boots and shoes. We have hemlock bark enough to take all the hides on the continent, and the cheap labor to convert the leather into boots and shoes for the million. We have also unrivalled opportunities for engaging in manufactures of wood, and millions of dollars could be profitably employed in that direction. The various productions of wood in the United States employ over $100,000,000 of capital. We have great advantages in this country for the production of a superior quality of tweeds, of blankets and of woollen goods of various kinds. We raise the best combing wools on this continent, which is a branch that could be indefinitely extended if we had access to the markets of the United States. We have great advantages for the manufacture of paper and of wood pulp. We have the forests, we have the raw material in abundance, and this might become a very important branch of manufacture in Canada if we had the market of the United States open to us for the sale of these articles. We have unlimited opportunities for engaging in the business of manufacturing charcoal iron. We have the ore, we have the forests to convert into charcoal, and the Americans are nearly destitute of that necessary article in their business, and the producing of charcoal iron might, and would speedily be transferred to Canada if the restrictions upon trade between the two countries were removed. We have great advantages for engaging in the business of fish canning. We might do almost all that business for the continent. We could supply 65,000,000 of people with canned fish and productions of our fisheries. I do not need to dwell upon the various means of manufacturing for which this country is peculiarly adapted. I repeat that wherever there was found a line of manufacturing for which Canada was adapted, a great expansion in that particular business would speedily follow the adoption of reciprocity with the United States. Now, a dread seems to possess some of our friends that it would be in the highest degree dangerous to come into competition with the manufacturing establishments, and with the great aggregations of wealth, in the older manufacturing States like Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania. It is apprehended that great danger would lie in the fact that while our own establishments are comparatively weak, while we have no great aggregations of capital such as exist in those States, we would be brought into competition with enormous establishments, with vast capital, with unlimited resources and with perfected processes. Well, there may be something in this. At first sight it would seem, Mr. Speaker, that this was a serious objection and it occurred to me that some light might be thrown upon this matter by looking into the statistics of the progress of manufacturing in the newer States of the American Union, States similarly situated with Ontario and our Provinces. Well, I investigated the manufacturing returns of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and California, and I expected to find in those new States, the most of which have only been settled recently, that the comparison between them, and the older States would be unfavorable to the newer States, and I was surprised to find that such was not the case. Now, the increase of the productions of manufactures in the Dominion from 1871 to 1881 was 88,000,000, equal to an increase of 40 per cent. The following table shows the increase between those dates, in Ontario and several States of the Union, with the percentage:—

Ontario :—1871	$114,706,000
1881	157,989,000
Increase	43,283,000	= 38 per cent.
Ohio :—1870	$269,713,000
1880	348,298,000
Increase	78,585,000	= 30 per cent.
Indiana :—1870	$108,617,000
1880	148,006,000
Increase	39,389,000	= 36 per cent.
Michigan :—1870	$ 91,716,000
1880	150,715,000
Increase	59,999,000	= 59 per cent.
Illinois :—1870	$205,620,000
1880	414,864,000
Increase	209,244,000	= 101 per cent.
Wisconsin :—1870	$ 77,214,000
1880	128,255,000
Increase	51,041,000	= 67 per cent.
Minnesota :—1870	$ 23,110,000
1880	76,065,000
Increase	52,955,000	= 228 per cent.
Iowa :—1870	$ 46,534,000
1880	70,045,000
Increase	24,511,000	= 52 per cent.

New Jersey :—1870	$169,237,000
1880	254,380,000
Increase	85,143,000	= 50 per cent.
Pennsylvania :—1870	$711,894,000
1880	744,818,000
Increase	32,924,000	= 4½ per cent.

So, Sir, we find that in the eight western States I have mentioned, in the period between 1870 and 1880, the increase in the manufactured products was $561,000,000, or an average of 62 per cent., against the increase in the Dominion of 40 per cent., and an increase in Ontario of 38 per cent. Then, taking the old manufacturing States which produce more than one-half the goods produced in the whole Union, the States of Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania, I find that the increase during the same period was $515,000,000, or about $50,000,000 less than in the eight new States I have mentioned, and that the ratio of increase was 21·6 per cent., against 64 per cent. in the new States. This is a striking result, and it demonstrates that the ratio of increase in manufacturing is more than as rapid again in those new States, and the newer they are the more rapid the increase; the most rapid increase was in Minnesota, 228 per cent., the increase in Illinois was over 100 per cent., and in California over 74 per cent. Now, Sir, is there anything in the condition of Ontario, or in the condition of this Dominion, that exposes us to a more relentless competition with those old manufacturing centres than those new States were exposed to? Are we not as capable of making progress as these western States in the establishment, development and growth of manufacture? I hold that we are, and when I examined the statistics with regard to the growth and development of manufactures in the cities of the west, I was again struck with the wonderful result I discovered. The following table shows the value of manufactured productions, in 1880, in the principal cities of the west:—

Mr. CHARLTON.

Buffalo manufactures, 1880	$ 42,937,000
Detroit do	30,181,000
Cincinnati do	105,258,000
Cleveland do	48,604,000
Louisville do	35,423,000
Chicago do	249,022,000
Milwaukee do	43,473,000
St. Louis do	114,333,000
San Francisco do	77,824,000

Statistics show that the ratio of increase is many times more rapid in these cities of the west than it is in the older cities of the east. In view of these facts, I think that we are needlessly alarmed, that there is no ground for the alarm that exists in the minds of some men, that the manufacturers of the Dominion are not capable of competing with those old manufacturing centres in the eastern States. The results in the western States give the lie to such an assertion. We may disabuse our minds of any fears as to our abilities to compete with those centres and to successfully maintain and sustain our manufacturing interests. The fact of it is, Mr. Speaker, that our manufacturers, as well as our lumbermen, our farmers, our fishermen and mine owners, need the blessings of continental free trade. They need a wider market. They are confined here to a market of 5,000,000 of people. They need the adoption of a policy that will break down the barriers and open to their access 60,000,000 of customers more, and there can be no doubt that they would derive vast advantages from the removal of those restrictions.

So much, Sir, for the question as regards the benefits that are to be realised by this country from unrestricted free trade. As I said at the commencement, this is a question which requires candid treatment, it is a question which requires fair treatment. It would be dishonest, it would be criminal on the part of any public man discussing this question, to seek to delude or mislead the people of this country. They have a right to demand of every patriotic citizen that he shall, at least, state what he believes to be true; and in discussing this question, Mr. Speaker, I would scorn to adopt a policy that was calculated to deceive my countrymen, for the purpose of securing a transient political advantage. Now, I propose, Sir, to examine candidly all the objections, so far as I am aware, that are urged against this proposal of unrestricted reciprocity. First of all, it is urged that it is disloyal. Well, Sir, to whom is it disloyal? It may be disloyal to Manchester, it may be disloyal to Birmingham, but is it disloyal to Canada? That is the question that concerns us. We are not charged with the guardianship of the interests of Manchester, of Birmingham, of England; we are charged with the guardianship of the interests of Canada. If we do not guard those interests expressly given to us, they will not be guarded. Time and again our interests have been given away to advance Imperial interests, and it is our business to guard our own interests; and if this policy is loyalty to Canada, if it is calculated to promote the interests of Canada, that is as far as I care to enquire with respect to the question of loyalty. Now, there are 4,750,000 people in Canada. What are they? They are British subjects, and they are just as much entitled to consideration as 4,750,000 British subjects in England. How many British subjects in England are there who can possibly be affected by this proposed change? We imported from England last year $44,496,000 worth of goods. Suppose they were all the products of manufactures, suppose they were all the productions of the skilled labor of England, how many men would it take to produce that amount of goods? I stated, in reading over the development of manufactures in the western States, that in 1880 Milwaukee produced $43,473,000 worth of goods, within a fraction of the entire amount we import from England. How many inhabitants had that city? It had 115,000; and I venture to say that not one-half were engaged in manufacturing. How many people does it take to produce the $44,496,000 worth of goods we import from England? In 1880, according to the returns, the production in the United States was $1,950 per head for each man, woman and child engaged as factory operatives in that country. Upon this basis the production of that amount of goods means the employment of 25,000 operatives, it means that at the very outside 75,000 people in England are dependent upon the production of the goods that have been exported to Canada and sold in this country. And we are asked to do what? We are asked to place in one scale the interests of 75,000 people in England and in the other scale the interests of 4,750,000 people in Canada, and to decide that the claims of the 75,000 people shall out-weigh the claims of the 4,750,000. That is the kind of loyalty in this connection. I do not care for that kind of loyalty. I am engaged in looking after the interests of my constituents, and I care a great deal more for them than for nabobs in Manchester. What do you suppose is the amount of profits derived from this business in England? It may be $4,000,000 or $5,000,000, or even a little more. How much British capital is invested in Canada? I am told there is $560,000,000 invested. Now, the interests of those men who have made investments in Canada are intimately connected with the prosperity of this country, and even admitting that we were to sacrifice the interests of those people engaged in manufactures, would we not be benefited? How much money is there invested in England to produce the goods sent to Canada. The investment, at the outside, of $30,000,000 will produce that amount of $44,000,000 worth of goods. The ratio in the United States, in 1880, was $2,790 of capital to $5,369 of products, nearly two of products to one of capital; and it is a liberal estimate to say that $30,000,000 of capital invested in England is all that is invested to produce the goods sent to Canada. Place in one scale the men having $30,000,000 of capital engaged in producing goods sent to this country, and place in the other scale the interests of English investors in this country to the extent of $560,000,000, besides the interests of all the people of this Dominion, and we are asked to say that we will consider the interests of the owners of $30,000,000 of capital invested in manufactures paramount to the interests of the other class who have invested $560,000,000 here, besides the capital of the people of this country. That is not the kind of loyalty I intend to stand by or advocate. It is assumed upon this hypothesis on which I have been dealing with this question, that unrestricted reciprocity would abolish imports from England. It will do nothing of the kind. It may temporarily check those imports, but the increased prosperity which will be sure to be given to this country will lead to increased trade.

It has ever been so and ever will be so, and the result will be that in a very few years, instead of abolishing English trade, there will be a large increase of English imports into Canada. I can remember the time, Mr. Speaker, when hon. gentlemen opposite were not so superloyal. I can remember when we were discussing the National Policy, and when it was urged that that policy was a disloyal one as regards England, that it threatened British connection, those hon. gentlemen said: "So much the worse for British connection." I rather suspect the motive which prompts hon. gentlemen opposite on this occasion to make such a leading cry of this cry of loyalty.

There is another feature of this case to which I might be permitted to allude most briefly in connection with the charge of disloyalty. I believe it is a matter of interest to the whole Anglo-Saxon race, to every English-speaking man, whether he may be in America, or the United Kingdom, or Australia, or New Zealand, or the Cape of Good Hope, or Hindostan, or wherever he may be on the face of this broad earth, for they are scattered over the whole face of it—I believe it is the interest of every English-speaking man that friendly relations should exist between the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon family. I believe that any policy that will draw closer the bonds that connect the United States and England, that will increase the cordiality existing between those two great powers, that will have a tendency to bring those two powers to act in concert and in alliance, is a policy that should receive the commendation and the support of every man, not only in Canada, but in every English-speaking country in the world. I do not need to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that no question is likely to arise—no question for many years, except the Alabama question, has arisen between England and the United States, threatening to dis-sever the amicable relations between those two countries—that has not had some connection with Canada. The fisheries dispute—we cannot say it ceases to exist—which so lately was an ominous question, threatening the relations between those two countries, was purely a Canadian one; and if we adopt any policy that brings Canada and the United States into closer commercial relations, and removes the danger of friction between this country and the United States, we adopt a policy that is likely to lead to that result which we consider so desirable, the drawing closer together of these two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race, I believe that a powerful argument in favor of unrestricted reciprocity can be founded upon that view of the case. I believe we would be justified in entering into negotiations and seeking to draw these two peoples closer together, closer in commercial and closer in social intercourse, if no other consideration had weight in the premises.

So much for the disloyalty objection. Now, the next objection urged to this proposed arrangement is that it would lead to annexation.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I hear somebody say, "hear, hear." What does that objection admit—what does it tacitly, inferentially admit? It admits that it would be such a splendid thing we would want more of it, that it would work so well we would not be satisfied with a half measure but would go the entire distance.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I say that it admits that it would be a good thing. Perhaps it would; but it would not be a good thing to the extent of bringing about annexation. It would have a direct tendency, on the contrary, to prevent annexation.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHARLTON. I repeat it—it would have a direct tendency to prevent annexation. I remember when I was a boy that the annexation sentiment in this country was rampant. I remember a manifesto issued in 1849 signed by hundreds of prominent Conservatives in this Dominion, and it put the arguments in favor of annexation with great power and force. I know, Sir, that annexation was debated and discussed, and that the great mass of the people in that section of the country in which I live believed in it. What was the cause of it? Was it because they considered the political institutions of the United States superior to those of Canada? No, Sir, I think not. It was because they desired freer commercial relations with the United States and that they saw in annexation the only mode of obtaining it.

Mr. BOWELL. It had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. CHARLTON. It had everything to do with it, and I will show you how it had to do with it. In 1854, when we got freer commercial relations with the States, annexation died out. We never heard of it again while reciprocity continued. It was not a desire for annexation on political grounds, but the sentiment was created by the desire to obtain free commercial intercourse with the United States, and by that desire alone. Now, Sir, we have an annexation sentiment today, and it is growing in this country, and it is growing because of the mismanagement, the recklessness, and the extravagance, and the corruption of the party in power. If there is any one thing that actuates the public mind and that has a tendency to spread this annexation sentiment in Canada, it is the desire that is felt by the farmers, and lumbermen, and other producing classes of this country to obtain free trade with the United States. It is that, Sir. It is not because they do not believe that our political institutions in Canada, if honestly managed, are not as good as those of the United States, for, Sir, nine out of every ten of the people of Canada believe our institutions are better, as they have a right to believe. It is the desire for unrestricted commercial relations that promotes the sentiment in favor of annexation. Now, Sir, you secure an arrangement by which we can obtain unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and you will find, as a result of that arrangement, that agitation for annexation will die out completely. This would be the inevitable result of such a policy, and it is the way to put an end to the annexation agitation altogether in this country if we can have through a commercial treaty all the material advantages that can result from annexation.

So much for that objection. Then there is another objection made, and so far as I have heard it made, it is made by Conservatives and advocates of the National Policy, and it is this: that it would be a bad thing, because it would prevent our getting as good terms for annexation in the future when we want it as we otherwise could. Well, Mr. Speaker, all I have to say to that is, that it may be an objection that will have weight with some friends on the opposite side. We are not looking for terms of that kind and the objection has no weight with us.

Then, Sir, another objection urged is: "Well, we cannot get it and there is no use talking about it, and besides it would not be dignified to ask for it." That is what our friend from Huron (Mr. Porter) said the other night. He said that our abject whining and cringing must be disgusting to the Americans, as they had refused overtures for free trade. Sir, it is not abject whining, it is not cringing to come openly and boldly like a candid, truthful, man and say to another: "I believe that we can make an arrangement mutually advantageous, and I approach you with a proposition for an arrangement which I believe will be advantageous to both of us." What do those gentlemen want? What would they ask? Would they ask that 60,000,000 in the United States should come to 5,000,000 in Canada, because it would not be dignified for 5,000,000 to go to 60,000,000? They must indeed have an extraordinary sense of their dignity when this would stand in their way. I do not see anything undignified or improper in either one of those peoples making proposals to the other. If we complete any arrangements which we, on this side, conceive could be effected to our advantage, it is neither undignified nor improper, on the contrary, it is in the highest degree dignified, to make approaches to our neighbors and lay before them what we believe to be the reasons that ought to actuate and influence us in entering into an arrangement for our mutual advantage and benefit. But, Sir, whether we can get it or not there is one thing we can do, and that is we can try. This word "can't" is a word that is not made use of very much by energetic business men. The way to ascertain whether you can do a thing or not is not to say, "I can't do it, and I won't try to do it." The way to do it is to go like men and to try and do it, and see what the chances are. If you fail to accomplish it you cannot accuse yourself for having been false to your own interests, and for not having made the attempt. But, Sir, there is another reason which will not warrant any man, who is acquainted with the chances of success, in saying or admitting that we cannot do it. We are warranted in believing that the Americans are ready to make a fair and equitable arrangement. We have, in fact, official assurance from the State Department of the United States that such is the case. We have assurances from public men of that country that such is the case. We are, in point of fact, invited to make our proposition, and we are decidedly assured that this proposition, if reasonable, will be favorably entertained.

Then, the next objection made is, that we cannot make a treaty on advantageous terms. Well, Mr. Speaker, we never need make a treaty that we do not consent to, and we never need consent to a treaty that is not satisfactory; and we never can tell whether we can make a satisfactory treaty or not until we have made the trial.

Then, the next objection is a very important objection. It is, that this arrangement will not yield us enough revenue. Now, Sir, I do not know whether I had better examine into this question on the basis of both a proposal for unrestricted reciprocity and on the theoretical basis also of commercial union, or not, for as a theoretical disquisition it might be interesting to take up the question on the basis of commercial union. However, Sir, I will proceed to show what would be the probable outcome if we made the arrangement contemplated by the resolution now before the House—unrestricted reciprocity. It would be admitted, I presume, that we would sacrifice the duties upon American importations, amounting last year in round numbers to $7,300,000, the total revenue from excise and customs last year being $28,087,000; deduct from this the collection of dutiable imports from the United States and it leaves a balance of $21,388,000, which would be the revenue with the loss of the American duties. Now, Sir, in 1880 our revenue from customs and excise was $18,479,000. On this basis I have named, admitting the loss of $7,300,000, we would still have a revenue of $2,909,000 more than we had in 1880. Our revenue in 1881 was $23,942,000, and upon the basis I have mentioned our revenue would be $2,545,000 short of the amount of revenue collected in 1881. Now, Sir, the revenue in 1881 was $2,000,000 higher than the revenue in 1878 and the expenditure in 1881 was actually greater than this country was warranted in making or is warranted in making today. The question, Sir, is, can we under this arrangement go back to the scale of expenditure that existed in 1881? If we can do that, Sir, if we admit that we lose from our revenue $7,300,000, and if we admit it is not possible to readjust our tariff, and that it is not possible to supplement that loss by increased revenue from other sources which undoubtedly it is possible to do, if we admit that for the sake of argument, we are still warranted in saying that it is possible to go back to the expenditure of 1881 and that we would have revenue enough without any change in our tariff even with unrestricted reciprocity. Now, would it be possible for us to effect retrenchments? We who have run up our expenditure from $13,486,000 in 1868 to $35,658,000 in 1887; we who have increased our expenditure on an average four times as fast every year as the population has increased, is it possible to retrench in this country? Well, Sir, if it is not possible to retrench, it is not possible to avert ruin; if it is not possible to retrench, the country has got to go to the dogs; if it is not possible to retrench in this country, we may as well give up the case—the whole case. Now, I hold that it is possible. I will tell you where you might effect some retrenchment. You might abolish that sum of all political villainies, the Franchise Act, and you would save $400,000 at one stroke, and you would also save your character, and your consciences would be clearer. You might get along with a little less expenditure on public works and buildings. I believe that in the United States, with all its wealth, there are about 86 cities only where they have public post offices. They only give post offices to large commercial cities such as New York and Buffalo.

Mr. FOSTER. How much do they take to build one post office?

Mr. CHARLTON. It does not matter. They have a good deal of money, and they have to build larger ones, because they do not build any in small towns. They do not go into the business of building little $6,000 post offices in small villages as bribes to the people; they have not got as low in the scale of humanity as that. Well we might save very largely in the expenditure on public works and buildings; we might cut it all off, the whole thing, lock, stock and barrel. We could save by abolishing the vicious system of superannuation.

Mr. BOWELL. How much?

Mr. CHARLTON. It amounts to between $200,000 and $300,000 now. We could save on railway subsidies, and avoid the enactment of such little scenes as occurred in No. 8 a few years ago. We could save by putting an end to that system of bribery which consists in giving grants to useless railway lines of $3,200 a mile. We could cut off the whole thing with advantage to our treasury, advantage to our morals, advantage to our charter, and advantage to our hopes in the future, not only in this world, but in the world to come. We have been spending millions of dollars for the purpose of carrying immigrants to the United States through this country, and we could cut off the whole of that appropriation with advantage to the public.

Mr. LISTER. What would the newspapers do without that?

Mr. CHARLTON. That is a question I cannot answer; I am afraid some of them would rat. Then, Sir, we could reduce somewhat, I think, the cost of the civil service. We have a great many incumbents in the service of this country who are most valuable officers, who, in fact, are underpaid, and we have a great many whose services are not worth a shilling a year—a great many useless appendages; and I venture to say that a business man could take charge of the departments of the civil service of this country, administer them on business principles, increase their efficiency 20 per cent., and reduce their cost 65 per cent. Then, if we had amicable relations with our neighbors, we could reduce the cost of the militia system by $1,000,000 a year, and what we might spend beyond that would be mostly wasted. We could reduce the cost of legislation.

If it became necessary to revise our system, I think we could do with one member to represent 40,000 instead of 20,000; we could get along with half the number of members in this House; and as for the Senate, we might get along with any number you could name from half-a-dozen to sixteen, as it is only a little junta of very little use. We could get along with a reduction of the mail subsidies, and then my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who has been fishing these nine years for reciprocity without changing the bait on his hook, could dispense with most of the fisheries appropriation—

Mr. FOSTER. I have a good bait.

Mr. CHARLTON. Not bait enough to get a nibble. He caught a gudgeon at Washington, and it was the only thing he got. Yes, it is possible to reduce our expenses by the entire loss we sustain from the American duties. We could reduce our expenses $7,000,000 a year, with advantage to ourselves, advantage to our morals, and advantage to the taxpayer, and have a better Government than we have to-day. We could do it by cutting off the means of corruption which the Government employs, and so lavishly uses, in the management of this country at present. And then you must bear in mind that whatever policy increases the prosperity of this country will increase the tax-paying resources of the people. Whatever policy increases the wealth and population of this country will inevitably increase the imports; the man who has an ample income will consume more goods than a man who is straitened in his circumstances; and if we can make the great producing classes of this country prosperous, and at the same time vastly increase their numbers, we need have no fears of the revenue more than, perhaps, a temporary derangement of one or two years while we are getting ready to cut down our expenses. As I said before, I estimate the saving to the producing classes of this country, in the mere matter of duty, at $15,000,000 a year. I also estimate that a vast amount is lost in destroying competition for the purchase of the goods we export to the United States; and a further sum is lost in placing an extinguisher on the growth of the population in this country. Suppose it was necessary to resort to direct taxation, the necessity of which I deny; but suppose for argument that it should be necessary, here is a policy by which we propose to save to the people of this country directly $15,000,000, and indirectly as much more. The question is, can the people of Canada afford to give three or four dollars for thirty dollars? Can they afford, for the sake of gaining advantages amounting to from $15,000,000 to $30,000,000 a year, direct and indirect, to submit to a direct taxation of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000 a year temporarily? I should say that if the necessity existed, the people would cheerfully submit to the imposition; but the necessity does not exist. It would be, in short, a godsend to the country if we were compelled to retrench—to lop off many of these expenses which are neither for the good, nor the honor, nor the prosperity of the people of the Dominion.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Bill (No. 37) respecting the Lake Nipissing and James' Bay Railway Company.—(Mr. Cockburn.)

KINCARDINE HARBOR TOLLS

Mr. ROWAND moved second reading of Bill (No. 30) to authorise the town of Kincardine, in the county of Bruce, to impose and collect certain tolls at the harbor in the said town.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Will the hon. gentleman give some explanation of the purport of this Bill?

Mr. ROWAND. I understand the object to be to renew the power of the town of Kincardine to impose certain tolls.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Debate on the proposed resolution of Sir Richard Cartwright and the amendment of Mr. Foster, resumed.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must apologise for the length of time I have occupied in discussing the resolution before the House. My excuse is that it is a large question, and I do not know that I could have shortened the time very much without failing to deal with some of the questions which I thought were essential to the discussion. I hope the House will not judge me to have been guilty of wasting its time, and I shall not trespass very much longer upon its patience in connection with this discussion. When you left the Chair at six o'clock, I was engaged in discussing the question whether the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity would leave Canada in a position where a sufficient amount of revenue could be secured to meet our actual necessities and wants, and I was endeavoring to point out the absolute necessity that rests upon this country, entirely apart from all considerations in connection with unrestricted reciprocity, to curtail its expenditure and diminish its expenses. I had pointed out, during the afternoon, the fact that we are in many respects competitors with the United States. We, as well as that country, offer homes for immigrants; we, as well as that country, expect to promote our growth by attracting to our shores people from the continent of Europe, and, in order to enter upon this race with any prospects of success, it is necessary that we should not be handicapped by expenses of administration and burdens of debt greatly in excess of those resting upon the shoulders of the people of the United States; and for this reason I now repeat what I said before that it is in the highest degree essential to the prosperity of Canada that we should retrench our expenses. I find, after deducting from the taxation of the United States the amount applied by them to the extinguishment of their public debt, that our duties of customs and excise exceeded those of the United States last year by $2.15 per head. We raised $6.03 per head, and the United States $3.88 per head, aside from the amount which they applied to extinguishing the public debt. We must bear in mind also that the United States are called upon to provide for certain expenses from which we are free. They have their diplomatic and consular expenses to provide for as a nation, and the only thing in this line for which we have to provide is the cost of the High Commissioner in London. Then they have to provide for an army and a navy. Last year, they expended on their pension list, $75,029,000; upon the army, $33,561,000; and upon the navy, $15,141,000. Our expenses on similar items were, $102,000 for pensions, $1,974,000 for the militia and mounted police, and $205,000 for ocean and river service, making a total of $2,281,000 as against $123,721,000 in the United States. To have made our expenditure on these services equal to theirs in proportion to population, we should have expended $9,419,000 more than we did, and yet our taxation from customs and excise, applied to current expenditure, is $2.15 per capita more than theirs. Whatever light we look upon this question in, we must be impressed with the necessity which rests upon this country to bring down its expenses somewhere in the region of those of the United States, ever bearing in mind that that great country is our competitor and will continue to be our competitor, that we lie side by side with it, and that, if we are to secure immigration and to people our great wastes, we must offer inducements to the population of the old world nearly, if not quite, equal to those which are offered by the United States.

In considering the objections that are raised to unrestricted reciprocity, I shall next refer to the seventh objection, which is the assertion that is made, that it will ruin our manufactures. I will refer to this briefly, because I have already referred to it in discussing the question whether our manufactures are likely to be able to compete with those of the United States, if trade restrictions are removed. I have pointed out my belief, and I think with reason, that our manufactures are able to compete with theirs, but even if they were not, I say the country would not be warranted in foregoing the advantages which would be derived from unrestricted reciprocity in order to promote the interests of so small a fraction of the people of this Dominion as those engaged in manufactures. Even if the manufacturing industries of Canada would be obliterated by the removal of these restrictions, which is not the case, still the great mass of the people of Canada would be benefited, and we would be acting in conformity with the principle that we should adopt the course which will do the greatest good to the greatest number.

The next objection made is that this would injure our shipping interest. I deny emphatically that unrestricted reciprocity would have any such effect. Those familiar with the shipping on the great lakes are aware that Canadian shipping on those lakes is not worth within 30 or 40 per cent. as much as American shipping, because Canadian vessels are debarred from the most profitable trade on these lakes, which is the coasting trade. A Canadian vessel cannot clear from Chicago for Buffalo, or from Chicago for any other American port on the lakes, and is debarred from transporting ore, which amounts to a trade of several millions of dollars per annum, from Lake Superior to the lower ports. In fact, Canadian boats are debarred from the most lucrative trade on the lakes; and, if we had reciprocity, it would open to them a business from which they are entirely precluded now. On the sea coast the case is the same. The most profitable trade is the coasting trade, from which we are now entirely excluded, and in that matter we would derive enormous advantages from the adoption of reciprocity.

The next objection is one which was raised by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and it is an objection which has had great weight with some portion of the mercantile classes in the large cities. That is, that the adoption of unrestricted reciprocity would injure the wholesale trade in this country, that it would put an end to the distribution of supplies to the retail dealers scattered throughout the country by leaving them free to make their purchases in the great marts of the United States. I do not know, but I apprehend that this objection, like most of the others, would be found to be nearly if not entirely groundless. I am not able to say definitely and with certainty what the effect might be on the wholesale trade, but I wish to point out the result in this regard in the American markets themselves. If the result were to be in Canada to compel or to lead all retail dealers to buy in New York, that ought to be the result now in the United States, where no trade restrictions exist. But that is not the result in the United States. The cities of Buffalo, Cleveland, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul, Omaha, San Francisco, St. Louis, Nashville, New Orleans—all these and many other natural centres seem to supply almost exclusively the country adjacent to them with the goods required. Scarcely a retail merchant in a thousand goes east to New York from the west of Chicago to buy goods, and it is found to their convenience, and to their advantage, to go to a wholesale market quite near to them rather than go to a distant one. The character of the trade now is to buy frequently, to sort up, as merchants term it, to buy in small quantities, and keep their stocks complete. In doing this it is not to their advantage to go to a distant and expensive market. The course of trade leads them to buy either of travellers or to send in their orders themselves, and the result in the United States is, that the wholesale trade of that country is distributed among the various commercial centres scattered over that country, and these commercial centres supply almost exclusively the retail trade of the country adjacent. Well, if the same rule would hold good in Canada in the case of unrestricted reciprocity, trade would not be removed from the actual commercial centres where it is now. The trade of New York and the trade of Chicago, to a considerable extent, consists in the supply of jobbing houses, jobbing sales, sales to large wholesale mercantile establishments in the interior, and a great number of these extensive New York houses would not care to be troubled with the small business of a great number of small retail houses; they would rather sell to jobbers direct than to supply these houses. And I think for these reasons that the fears entertained by the wholesale trade in Canada that the business would centre in New York, are entirely groundless.

The next objection made is this: We are quite prepared to take reciprocity, we are anxious to get it, we have been ready at all times, and we are ready now, to have reciprocity in natural products. Mr. Speaker, I can say truthfully that we also are ready for that. If it were possible to secure reciprocity in natural products, I would be in favor not only of having a standing offer to that effect on our Statute-book, but I would be in favor of publishing that offer in every city of the United States, of putting it upon every door post; I would be in favor of making that offer known by placing a circular before every voter in the United States, if we could secure reciprocity upon the terms upon which the hon. gentlemen are willing to take reciprocity. But we cannot get it, it is futile and useless to talk about it, and when they say: Oh, we are willing to take reciprocity on such and such terms, it is equivalent to saying: We will not have reciprocity and do not want it—because they only propose to take it on such terms as they know they cannot get it. What is the arrangement these gentlemen would be glad to make? The arrangement they would like to make would be an arrangement that could not be called an equitable one as far as the United States are concerned. The Reciprocity Treaty which was in existence from 1854 to 1865 was largely to the advantage of Canada. We sold to the United States everything that we could desire to sell to them, but they could sell to us very little that they had to give us in exchange for the produce we sold to them. They were called upon to pay us largely in gold for the production of our farms, our forests, our mines and fisheries. Now, they said, that is not a fair system of trade. If we are to buy the products of your labor, we want to have the privilege of giving you in exchange the products of our labor. It is reasonable that they should have that privilege, and it is for that reason we cannot get a renewal of that treaty. It is for that reason we must admit the products of their labor into this country, in return for the privilege we ask of them to have the products of our labor admitted into theirs.

The last objection I shall refer to to-night is, that we can get something better. We do not need to look for this at all, it is said; it is all useless to talk of reciprocity when we can easily secure an arrangement that will be infinitely better to Canada. What is it? Why, we can secure Imperial Federation, and that will be infinitely better, it is asserted, for the interests of this Dominion than unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Well, Sir, what is implied by Imperial Federation? What do the advocates of that scheme in Canada propose to secure? Why, they propose to secure, on the part of Great Britain, the imposition of differential duties in favor of the colonies; they propose that England shall impose duties upon raw materials, upon food, upon lumber, upon wool, and upon all the raw materials that are imported into that country from all nations except the colonies. Well, does any sane man suppose that England is going to return to the corn law system? Does any man suppose that England will impose duties upon any raw material whatever for the benefit of her colonies? I think it is preposterous to suppose it. I do not think any party in England would venture to make such a proposition, and the scheme of Imperial Federation is not only not within the range of probability, but it is not within the range of possibility, as understood by the advocates of the scheme who propose it as an arrangement preferable to securing unrestricted reciprocity with the United States.

Now, Sir, I am through with dealing with the objections raised to the consummation of this scheme. I think that I have met these objections fairly; that I have stated them to the House without withholding any argument that can be raised against the scheme. I have striven to deal with this question in the spirit of fairness. I believe that it is in the interest of the party to advocate this matter and deal with it in that spirit. I believe that the case is so strong that we have but to state the arguments, have but to state fairly the advantages that would flow from the scheme, have but to meet fairly the objections that are raised, and to state reasons why they do not lie, in order to convince any candid and unprejudiced mind that what this country needs, that what will conduce to the prosperity of this country, above all things else, is the very thing that the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford declares would be beneficial to Canada. When this debate commenced, I confess I had my doubts whether this issue would be placed fairly before the people of this country. I was afraid there might be something kept back in connection with these fishery negotiations. I felt that it might be possible that the eminent gentleman who occupies the position of Finance Minister, and who was also one of the British Commissioners at Washington, might spring upon us during this debate, some document which would give color to the claim that he had actually attempted to get reciprocity on a basis fair and equitable to both peoples, and that we might be placed in a position where it would be difficult to combat a cunningly framed argument of this kind. But, Sir, fortunately for the party on this side, fortunately, perhaps, for the party on the other side, fortunately for the country certainly, the issue is a distinctly defined and sharply drawn issue. When the Government amendment was placed in your hands last night, there was no longer any doubt as to the character of the issue. It is a clearly defined issue between unrestricted reciprocity and the National Policy of this country, nothing more and nothing less. That resolution says :

"Canada, in the future as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending trade relations with the United States, in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion, which was adopted in 1879, and has since received, in so marked a manner, the sanction and approval of its people."

In other words, the Government of this country is in favor of obtaining reciprocity upon unobtainable terms, and upon unobtainable terms only; they do not wish to obtain reciprocity on any other terms, except such terms as they know are not acceptable. That is the analysis of the position of the Government with regard to this question. They are not in favor of reciprocity upon any conditions on which reciprocity can be obtained. They consider the National Policy, that gigantic failure which has produced national disaster, as preferable to unrestricted reciprocity, and they prefer to go on increasing our debt, piling up taxation, sending thousands of our citizens from our country, and doing without the blessings of continental free trade—they prefer to pursue this line and continue the National Policy rather than to impair any portion of that policy by seeking continental free trade. That is the issue. I am glad the issue is so squarely defined. I may say for myself, and I think, for the party on this side of the House, that we shall be glad to meet the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House upon this issue. The country cannot misunderstand it. Men may take a position honestly on either one side or the other, and no doubt hon. gentlemen opposite have honest convictions on that side of the question, as we certainly have on the other. We will put the issue before that great jury, the people, and will leave it to that jury to settle the question which so intimately affects their own well-being and prosperity.

An hon. MEMBER. You may change your mind before another election.

Mr. CHARLTON. I must thank the House for the very great courtesy with which hon. members have listened to me. I have to promise the House, moreover, that the occasions will be very rare when I shall trespass on its patience so far as I have done on this occasion. I am happy to say, in conclusion, that I believe this country has great resources. I believe this country is destined by Providence to have a grand future, and that consummation can only be thwarted by its own folly and mismanagement. But I believe our autonomy cannot be preserved if we go on in the way we have been going. I believe that to persevere in the course we have been pursuing for some years past, to follow that course for a very few years more, would entail irretrievable ruin upon the Dominion. I believe our path is beset with difficulties, and I am sorry to say that the greater number of those difficulties are of our own creating. We have created them, we must bear the consequences of having created them, and we can only remove them by energetic methods, only by subjecting ourselves to the very unpleasant experience of retrenchment, of economy, of dismissal of officers, and of reducing the expenses of government. It was said by Artemus Ward that Brigham Young was a very much married man. We are a very much officered nation. We have in every department of the Government at least two officers where we require one; it is the case in the civil service, it is the case in this House. We have custom house officers, excise officers, weights and measures officers, you can scarcely count the number of officers in the pay of the Government, and one-half of them are useless officers. As I said before recess, a business man, or business men organising this Government on business principles, could carry on the public business with greater efficiency at very much less cost than is now incurred. We have, in addition to maintaining that great number of officers, got into the habit of adopting very corrupt methods.

Mr. HESSON. Hear, hear—on that side.

Mr. CHARLTON. That is the innocent side. I was down the other day in the county of Prince Edward. I found there a gentleman, late a member of this House, now thank Heaven a member of this House, who had been unseated for what? Because an indiscreet friend had paid a drunken loafer, who voted against the Reform candidate, on the night subsequent to the election a dollar to get rid of his importunities.

Mr. BOWELL. That was only one charge.

Mr. CHARLTON. That was the most serious case and all the other charges were withdrawn. He was unseated on that charge. Now, what did I find going on in that county? The Dominion Government were dangling promises, in the shape of bribes, to the extent of thousands of dollars before the electors. I found the inhabitants of Picton were promised a new post office; and a gentleman who was in the way of the regularly nominated candidate had, as I understood, and it can be denied if it is not true, been promised that he would receive a good snug sum for the site for the post office if he retired from the contest. I see it is not denied.

Mr. BOWELL. Does the hon. gentleman mean to assert that the Government made the promise?

Mr. CHARLTON. The Government, I understand, sent an emissary, and I understood he had made the promise?

Mr. BOWELL. There is not one word of truth in it.

Mr. CHARLTON. Then I should like to know what means were used to retire Mr. McCuaig. There were some means used.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not in his secrets, so I cannot tell you.

Mr. CHARLTON. I found in addition to the post office promised to Picton that the people were to have the harbor channel deepened,—

Mr. BOWELL. No.

Mr. CHARLTON—And a bridge was to be built from Prince Edward across the Bay of Quinté to Belleville, and an extensive marsh was to be drained and a channel was to be dredged out—all these things were to be done if the people of Prince Edward county would return a supporter of the Government. Those were the influences used there. They were told that they could not have one cent if they did not return a supporter of the Government, that they could not have a new post office, the harbor deepened, the marsh dredged, or the bridge built. These methods I condemn. They are having a most ruinous and demoralising effect on the voters of the country. The Government are increasing expenses uselessly, and it is time the people turned out of office men who resorted to those methods, and many worse, at the expense of the taxpayers.

Mr. HESSON. Explain the Glengarry case.

Mr. CHARLTON. When the courts give their decision the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) will be enlightened on that matter.

Mr. BOWELL. Then you will tell us it is the case of a drunken loafer.

An hon. MEMBER. He was spending his own money anyway.

Mr. CHARLTON. In addition to those methods pursued by the Government in elections we have the costly mistakes that the Government have made. No less than $42,000,000 were expended on the Intercolonial, and the Government has since been engaged in spending more millions to destroy that property by building the Short Line. Then there was the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway; and there are whispers now that that portion of the road from Sudbury Junction to Port Arthur is to be abandoned. It might as well be abandoned, but we have expended tens of millions of dollars on its construction. Of our total debt of $29,000,000 no less than $80,000,000 were thrown away on the different mistakes made by the Government. We have this wildly extravagant expenditure, this mountain of debt, this terrible drain of the exodus, and we stand to-day a young nation in shackles, borne down by this mountain weight placed on its energies and progress, it is time the incubus was removed. The hour is not yet too late, but the hour may speedily come when it may be too late, and to remove this incubus requires courage and requires determination. The evils that confront us are of the gravest character. We cannot remove them merely by willing that it should be done, but we must make an effort and it must be a great effort too:

"Write upon your doors the saying wise and old,
Be bold, be bold, and everywhere be bold;
Be not too bold, but better the excess than the defect,
Better the more than the less;
Better like Hector on the field to die,
Than like a perfumed Paris turn and fly."

And the resolution, Mr. Speaker, which has been placed in your hands by my hon. friend to my right (Sir Richard Cartwright) points the way to extricate this country from these difficulties. The admission of Canada to participation in the commercial and business advantages arising from unrestricted reciprocity would mark the commencement of a new epoch in our history. Combined with retrenchment and economy, in the management of public affairs, it will stay the tide of humanity now ebbing from our shores; it would bring back again armies of those who have left us, it would bring in capital, it would incite enterprise, and it would make of this country that great nation which the bountiful gifts and the boundless resources that nature has placed in its possession will enable it to become.

Mr. DAVIN. Mr. Speaker, I have listened, Sir, with great pleasure to the speech of my hon. friend. That speech, in which he has gone over the whole ground, from his point of view, has occupied him nearly three hours, and I must ask the indulgence, not only of my friends but the indulgence of the gentlemen on the opposite side of the House while I attempt to answer this veteran parliamentarian. In rising to reply to my hon. friend, whom I met in 1882 on other fields of fight, I am conscious how arduous is the task which is before me, for he is cunning in fence and a great master of figures and details. Now, Sir, I confess I was struck by the fact that on this occasion, as on so many other occasions, the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they come to deal with the affairs of Canada, with its present and its future, ring the changes on the old set of bells. My hon. friend tells us that this question is to go before the electorate on the next occasion, and he, I suppose, anticipates winning on this horse. Well, Sir, all I have to say to him is this, that we have very recently come from fighting the battle along the whole line, and in great part the same issue that is raised here to-night, the issue raised the other night by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) was before the country and has been before the country on three successive occasions, and the electorate have given their verdict on it with no uncertain sound. I am glad, Sir, that my hon. friend is so well pleased with the definiteness of the conduct of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Conservative party. In the conclusion of his speech he said he was delighted that the question had been put so fairly and squarely, and with no ambiguity from this side. But what do we find on the other side?

Under which king are you fighting? What horse are you to win on? Is it the horse of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), or is it that which the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) has just trotted on to the field? Oh, I will not say he is either foundered or spavined; I will not say that. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in his speech, said:

"It has been made a grave ground, it has been attempted to set up as an extraordinary ground for objection, that when you propose to enter into a treaty for unrestricted trade with the United States you must thereby of necessity discriminate against English manufacturers and manufacturers of all other countries except the United States. Now that is true; I admit that."

What did the hon. gentleman the member for Norfolk say to-night, when my friend the Minister of the Interior asked him what he meant by unrestricted reciprocity? He told us that he meant by unrestricted reciprocity—I have his words here—"leaving the customs duties of each country free." Now, which is your policy? Is it the unrestricted reciprocity of the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), who says that you are to let all the goods of the United States, whether they are such goods as are produced in Canada or not, in here free, and that the United States should let all the goods of Canada in free, and that we are to have our respective tariffs or the plan of the member for South Oxford? Which is it? We have the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) here now, and he ought to get up and tell us. He ought to enable me to pronounce the same eulogy on him, and on his party, for honesty and fairness and definiteness that the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) pronounced on our amendment to the motion made by the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). Sir, when I heard the ex-Finance Minister speaking the other night, and also when I heard my hon. friend who spoke last, I could not help being struck by the similarity between their demeanor and the doctor in Le Malade Imaginaire. When the doctor is dismissed he gets into a fearful temper, and threatens the unfortunate patient with destruction. You were physicians for five years, you were the doctors of this country, you had the prescribing for this country, and the country found, to use the elegant language of my friend a moment ago, that under your treatment it was going to the dogs. It dismissed you. The country dismissed you, and instantly you became angry. You declared that the country was in a terrible condition, and ever since that you have been ringing changes on these lacrimose and lugubrious statements, but the country has gone forward in spite of you; and I do not think, Sir, it is very likely that the discharged doctors will be taken back. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken seemed, in fact, to be conscious of the similarity between him and the doctor in Molière's famous comedy, for he said: "I will make a diagnosis of the case." Why, Sir, they have been making a diagnosis of the case for some years, and not only have they made a diagnosis but a prognosis as well. Their diagnosis was wrong, and their prognosis has proved at fault, for, as I have said, the patient is flourishing. Now, Sir, I shall endeavor to refer to all or most of the points made by my hon. friend. He lays down very properly the proposition—and it is the only proposition that has been laid down on that side since the commencement of this debate that will bear discussion—he lays down the proposition that the proposal which we are here discussing is one that intimately concerns the well-being of Canada. Yes, indeed, Sir, it intimately concerns her well-being, whether we adopt the views of those gentlemen, or whether we go on in the path of progress and expansion, confident in our future, and with that boldness, which, in the language of Longfellow, my hon. friend has enliterated. Why, Sir, that is what we have done; we have been bold, but not too bold; we have had faith in the country, but those gentlemen would have us go forward with a timid step, and in such a tentative manner that the very danger of annexation, which hangs on the mind of some people when discussing this question—but which never hangs on my mind, for I have the utmost faith in Canada—would be imminent. If we had gone on in the way they wanted us to go, annexation would have been inevitable. So that is a proposition that I entirely endorse. Some of the other propositions that have been made I could not endorse, because as I will show as I go on, there is scarcely a proposition made by hon. gentlemen opposite that has not a major premise which, when stated, shows not only that the syllogism is fallacious, but that it is ridiculous. The hon. member said we should look at our environment, and I have no objection to look at the environment of Canada. I have no objection to look at what Canada is, at her resources, her surroundings, her opportunities; and the more I look at them the more confident I become in her future. Then the hon. gentleman referred to the growth of the United States. He told us he would compare the burdens of the two countries, and he took for his argument, I think, very fallaciously the per capita comparison, just as he has concluded his speech with a per capita comparison; and as the reasoning of himself and his friends on this subject is always fallacious so when they have recourse to facts, which is very seldom, they nearly always misstate the case. The hon. gentleman made the statement that our taxation amounted to $6 and a fraction per head, and he stated that that was something like $3 and a fraction more than the taxation of the United States.

Mr. CHARLTON. No.

Mr. DAVIN. Well, what did you say?

Mr. CHARLTON. I stated that the taxation of this country from customs and excise was $6.03 per head, if I remember rightly, and that that was $2.16 more than was expended in the United States from customs and excise, aside from the amount paid on their debt.

Mr. DAVIN. Is that a fair comparison? Well, the hon. gentleman spoke very low at the time, and I did not catch accurately what he said; but I caught what he said in the beginning of his speech. The taxation of Canada in 1886 was $25,226,15³/₄, or $5.26 per head, while the total taxation in the United States was $309,819,19⁹/₁₀, or $5.28 per head, 2 cents in favor of Canada. But, Sir, it would never do for any hon. gentleman opposite when speaking of the condition and prospects of Canada, to bring forward a fact that would be in Canada's favor. When the hon. gentleman comes to make a comparison of Canada with the United States—with a country that is highly organized and that is nearly a hundred years older than Canada, what is the major premise, to talk in the language of logicians—and the hon. gentleman who brought forward this question is a ripe scholar—what is the major premise in his mind? Why, that a confederation which commenced its career some twenty years ago, with a population to-day, according to him, of only 4,700,000 people ought to make as good a showing as a federation of 60,000,000 that commenced its career a hundred years ago. That is his major premise, and the moment you state it, it sounds ridiculous and the whole argument disappears. The true comparison—and then, of course, you have to take into account the age of Canada—would be Canada's population plus her organized wealth, plus her incoherent wealth, and the population of the United States plus her incoherent wealth and her organized wealth, and then allow for the difference in the age of the countries. Of course, we could not for one minute think that the organized wealth of Canada would compare with the organized wealth of the United States—that would be perfectly absurd; but the incoherent wealth of Canada—the wealth of British Columbia in its mines, the wealth of our vast, rich prairies in the North-West, with its millions of wheat fields, the undeveloped wealth of our fisheries, timber and various other resources—will compare advantageously with that of the United States; in fact, we have more undeveloped resources than the United States. Therefore, the comparison when made properly is a comparison that tends to the advantage of Canada. Then the hon. gentleman made a comparison as to population, and tried to make out that Canada has not progressed as rapidly in population as the United States. In fact, he took the tone that is always taken by the leaders of his party, that we are not doing well, that we are going back, that ruin is staring us in the face, that, to use his words, we are going to the dogs, but that everything is halcyon and progressive and satisfactory in the United States. I am sorry the hon. gentleman is not in his place, because I would like to read to him a few sentences, not spoken by a member of the party of which I happen to be a member; but I will read them for the edification of the party opposite, and, meanwhile, I will conceal the name of the man who uttered them until I come to the close. This is what he says:

"The statistics show that the exports of Canada per capita were greater than those of the United States, and her per capita imports are also greater than our own. Her per capita railway mileage is about the same as those of the United States. Her growth of population from the date of our Declaration of Independence up to the present day has been equal to our own, ours at that date being about 3,000,000, and hers being less than 300,000

"The records of her criminal courts show that she has a smaller percentage of crime than we have. She is the only country in the world whose national debt is not a war debt, with the exception of two or three millions expended in putting down the recent Riel rebellion. The whole of her debt has been incurred in the development of her internal improvements. In addition to her line of railway, extending from the Atlantic to the Pacific, her Government is subsidising a fast line of steamships to ply between Halifax and Liverpool, and the Imperial Government has agreed to subsidise a line to run between Vancouver, Yokohama, Hong Kong, and Australia. A company has been organized to lay an ocean cable from Vancouver, via Sandwich Islands, to Yokohama, Hong Kong, and Australia. An Atlantic ocean cable is to be owned by the same company which owns the Pacific cables.

"Thus her great railway, by means of the steamships which will ply between Halifax and Liverpool in connection with it, and the Pacific line subsidised by the English Government, which will also run in connection with it, will have both under its control. Its railways are reaching out for the carrying trade of the two hemispheres. Not only this, but the transcontinental telegraph system and both the Atlantic and Pacific cables, of which I have spoken, will be under the control and owned by her railways.

"These are not visions of the future. Most of them are realities of to-day. Already we can step into the most luxurious car which runs on this continent at Vancouver, on the waters of the Pacific, and ride continuously in it for a distance of 3,700 miles until you reach Halifax, on the Atlantic. This country has also a great inland water way from the mouth of the St. Lawrence, in the Atlantic, to the head of Lake Superior, and all her own, except the locks at Sault Ste. Marie.

"These great lines of commerce traverse broad stretches of our own country, will tap almost every important centre of trade on our northern border, and are now stretching their arms across the State of Maine to the seaboard, south to St. Paul, and the vast interests that centre in these grand transcontinental lines that are knit together by them, invite to other fields of conquest this side of the great lakes, until Portland, Oregon, St. Paul, Chicago, Buffalo, New York, and San Francisco pay tribute to these interests and share in their wonderful growth and development; and it may astonish some present to know that to-day the Dominion Government has subsidised, and is now subsidising, a railway in connection with this vast system across the State of Maine, to shorten the route to the cities of the eastern seaboard.

"Look for a moment to the unlimited resources of that country, with her great lakes and rivers, and forests; with her natural storehouses of gold and silver, of coal, iron, copper, and lead. Her pastoral and agricultural resources are unlimited, and 1,600 miles north-west of St. Paul we find actually the great wheat fields of this continent, and which, when fully developed, will not only equal, but far surpass the great Odessa region in Russia, and 40,000 square miles of coal underlie this same territory."

I need hardly tell you it is not a Canadian Reformer that speaks; it certainly is not a Canadian Reformer who has a seat in this House. The gentleman who speaks is Mr. S. J. Ritchie, of Ackron, Ohio. That is the way an American, a highly instructed American, looks at our resources, and I am only sorry that a countryman of his is not present to hear what he said. If my hon. friend who spoke last were here, I am sure that would edify him; and I was rather surprised that my hon. friend did not wax a little conscious of the parent source whence he draws his life blood and say something in reply to one of his leaders, who, last night, sneered at immigrants, for, after all, the hon. gentleman is, like myself, an immigrant. The hon. gentleman spoke of the exodus. That was almost the first thing he took up, just as did the hon. member for South Oxford, when introducing his resolution. That hon. gentleman indeed, had so much to say about the exodus that he was almost through his speech before I became aware that he was discussing the tariff. I thought at first it was an immigration speech that the hon. gentleman was delivering; in fact, I thought he had got hold of a manuscript copy of a pamphlet which the hon. the Minister of Agriculture was likely to publish on immigration questions, and had misconstrued it, and misquoted it here. Hon. gentlemen opposite talk of the exodus. These pessimists derive great consolation from the exodus, forgetting entirely that nothing was more natural than that there should have been a large emigration from this country to the United States, as I shall show. Sir, in a moment. A great deal of that emigration to the United States took place before our Canadian Pacific Railway was built. We have in Canada, I am glad to say, a most highly organised system of education; in fact our educational appliances are in advance of our position in many ways. Our educational appliances are in advance of our organised society, and perhaps are in some respects misdirected, and the result is there has always been in Canada a large number of highly educated men, men educated at our normal schools, chiefly at the Government expense, who, when they do not find in Canada scope for that kind of activity for which their training fits them, turn naturally to a country in which city communities are larger and more numerous than here. In the United States a similar movement is visible. What takes place here, happens in the eastern States. Yet we do not hear of the New England States being destroyed because there is a large emigration from them to the western States. The fact is, that the line of emigration goes not on lines of longitude, but on lines of latitude. It goes from east to west, and it was natural, when we had no Pacific railway, that this emigration, on which hon. gentlemen opposite dilate at such length, should have taken place. Emigration from the eastern States is still going on. I have here a report of the Governor of Dakota, in which he says:

"Early in the spring a large colony of settlers coming direct from Vermont and New England points located in Hangar county, about 25 miles south of the Northern Pacific."

And the Governor of New Mexico tells how another colony went from the New England States. I do not believe, Sir, that if you were to enter into any legislative body in these States, you would find gentlemen standing up and declaring they were going to the dogs because the more energetic and restless spirits, persons who could not find scope for their abilities at home, took Horace Greeley's advice to go west. The argument that because a portion of our population has gone to the States, there must be something wrong, has been stretched beyond all reason. Did no one leave for the United States when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power? Did no migration take place to the States from Canada then? Did no migration take place before they came into power? Why, Sir, this thing has been going on for twenty-five years, and so long as we have in our brains the restless, aggressive, and enterprising pioneer blood of the Norman, Gael and Saxon, so long shall we find this emigration taking place. The hon. gentleman then proceeded to deal with the North-West. He seemed to think that the North-West was in a very bad way, and would be greatly benefited by unrestricted reciprocity. Well, one of the first consequences of that policy would be that the American ranchemen who are now at their wits' end to know where to get food for their vast herds, would come across the lines and swamp our ranches. Do you suppose they would leave any money in this country or do anything to develop this country? They would not. In ten years, our vast grazing areas of the west would be eaten clean off, and these people would have sent the money they made out of the cattle to the States, to go into the pockets of the millionaire ranchemen living in New York, Chicago and St. Louis. That is what would take place in that part of the country under unrestricted reciprocity. Then, when the hon. gentleman went to the North-West, he dealt with the progress of population, and, of course, could see nothing but darkness and despair. But what are the facts? Manitoba, in 1870, had a population of 18,995, including Indians. Manitoba was admitted into Confederation on the 15th July, 1870, and what her population would have been to-day, if the policy of the right hon. the First Minister had been carried out, and the Canadian Pacific Railway built in accordance with the agreement made in 1873, it is impossible to say, but it is certain that the province would have a very much larger population than it has. Nearly ten years elapsed before the railway was built, and since the railway has been completed not quite ten years have passed. What are the facts? The census of 1886 showed a population of 108,640, and the census of 1881 a population of 65,954, or an increase in five years of over 60 per cent., and that notwithstanding the reaction from the boom of 1882-83. In the same period the occupied dwellings increased 86 per cent. Let us compare that with the hon. gentleman's favorite Dakota, with the territory that he can never mention without breaking into pæans of joy. In 1860 that territory had a population of 4,837. In ten years it had only reached 14,181, or an increase of less than 10,000. In 1880 its population was 135,177, so that their favorite territory had not done much better than Manitoba. Washington Territory, in 1878, had a population of 50,154, and, in 1883, a population of 92,508. In five years it increased only 42,354, while Manitoba in the same time increased 44,686. British Columbia has greatly increased its population in the same period. In ten years it ran its population from 36,247 up to 49,459. It only got the railway about three years ago, and now it is calculated that it has 60,000; and with that progress and with the extraordinary attractions of the Province of British Columbia, with its mining wealth, with its farming attractions, with its fisheries, there cannot be the least doubt that that Province will go ahead with giant strides. Take Utah again. It has three lines of railway, and from 1882 to 1887 immigrants only increased 11,074, and its present population is 196,500. Montana, those who would boom it say has a population of 130,000, and last year had a population of 120,000, but I am assured that the population is really not above that of Manitoba, and it has three lines of railway. New Mexico in 1860 had a population of 27,000, and in 1870 of 91,870, being a gain in ten years of 4,840. In 1880, after an active era of railway construction, it had a population of 119,565. Idaho again had a population of 32,610 in 1880, and now it is estimated that its population is about 90,000. Arizona was shown by the census of 1880 to have a population of 40,000, and now the population is estimated at 80,000. It has three lines of railway. Now I do not think that a comparison with those territories reflects any discredit on the progress made by Manitoba or the North-West Territory. My hon. friend, when speaking of the North-West Territory and of Manitoba, spoke about Minneapolis, and Milwaukee, and St. Paul, and said that our settlers should have access to those markets. Why, if our settlers had access to those markets in the unpatriotic sense he means, if you break down the wall, if you break down the tariff, if you take away the protection, if you destroy the policy of the Conservative party, which I can assure the country can only be maintained as long as its friends are maintained, what will happen? All chance of Winnipeg becoming the Chicago of the west will disappear, and whether Winnipeg or some other city is to attain that eminent position, there can be no doubt whatever that the time must come when we shall have, west of Lake Superior, a great commercial city like Chicago; but there is no chance of it, if you destroy the tariff. Milwaukee, Minneapolis, St. Paul—these will be the markets to which the people of Manitoba and the North-West will go, and what will happen then to our farmers? They will not have a home market. They will not have what we find in Winnipeg to-day, and what will soon be in every town along the line, manufacturing energies and manufacturing industries, and the mouths to be satisfied and the stomachs to be fed which manufacturing industries produce. Now, speaking of Dakota, I read something of what a United States gentleman said. I am going to read something from the Globe for hon. gentlemen. I am sure it will prove most edifying. It used to be the bible of the Reform party. Whether it retains that rank at present or not I really do not know, but at one time it held a very eminent position as the organ of that party. The Globe sent a correspondent into Dakota. Probably the Globe told the correspondent to go into Dakota in order to get facts, booming facts for these districts for hon. gentleman opposite, facts probably to be used in this debate. I do not know, but here we have the special correspondence of the Globe, and this is what the special correspondent of the Globe says:

"I made it my first business to enquire into the existence of the so-called exodus of disappointed Canadians, or newly arrived immigrants into the United States; and as the result I have no hesitation in saying that such an exodus does not exist. From the Custom house officials and old residents on both sides, I learn that for some years there was a regular emigration of this kind; but last year no person crossed southward to settle, except a few so-called 'beats,' who left Canada per force, and for Canada's good, and even these were counter-balanced by a similar number of persons who had got on the wrong side of the American law, and were obliged to begin life again in Canada. For some time past there has been no movement of immigrants in either direction. How, then, it may be asked, is the undoubtedly more rapid population of Dakota, and especially the large number of Canadians, settled in it to be explained? In this way, before the Canada Pacific Railway reached Manitoba, a few years ago it was impossible for any settler to get there except by way of the American railways through Chicago and St. Paul, and then by team or water up the Red River into Canada. Manitoba, of course, was to these intending settlers little but a name; and along the whole line of their journey, from St. Paul northward, they were waylaid by American officials and dealers in real estate, who described to them in extravagant terms, the Arctic climate of Manitoba, and the distances and difficulties of the journey that remained, and so induced the majority of them, without difficulty, to remain and take up land before crossing the boundary. Since it is now easier to reach Manitoba than to reach Dakota, these influences have, of course, ceased to be effective, and Manitoba is undoubtedly filling up faster than either of the American States at the present day. I have spoken several times of the indebtedness of the farming class—"

I hope the hon. gentleman who spoke last night, the hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) is in his place, because I am sure this will interest him. I listened with great pleasure to his speech. It illustrated what I have often heard, that farmers are constitutional grumblers; but, when I marked the vigor of his language, and saw how admirably he could state his case, I knew that we had in him a fine specimen of the settlers and yeomen that Scotland gives us, and, notwithstanding his lugubrious view of the situation, I believe him to be a successful man and to be surrounded by successful men. Now, I ask his attention. I know it will do him good. In case the glance he took into the abyss of misery, the caldron of unhappiness that hon. gentlemen there brew, should have disagreed with him, this will certainly act as a salve to his wounded feelings:

"I have spoken several times of the indebtedness of the farming class, and although this is a matter in which it is everybody's interest to suppress the facts on both sides of the boundary, I have many reasons to believe that the Dakota farmer is very much worse off in this respect, and that almost without exception, he is the prey of a shark-like class of jobbing money lenders of which I neither saw nor heard of an example in Manitoba. Certainly there is nothing half so significant or unpleasant there as the printed list I saw posted up in the elevator at Gretna, a list of 100 farmers on whose machines one machine company, (if I remember right, a threshing machine company, of Racine, Wisconsin) have chattel mortgages."

These are the friends of the hon. member for North Norfolk, the cheapness of whose machines, and the delicacy of whose commercial transactions he is never tired of eulogising.

"This was a warning to every one, especially the elevator proprietors, not to purchase the crops of these men, as they were mortgaged to the above company, and side by side with it was the warning of the elevator people, that they would prosecute for fraud any mortgaged farmer attempting to sell them his crops, as these crops could, of course, be distrained upon by the mortgagor. Thirty per cent., too, several people assured me, was a common rate of interest exacted by the money lenders. In one case I was even told of a loan renewed at the rate of 70 per cent."

My hon. friend the Minister of the Interior was able to quote the Globe the other night as really coming round to the side of Canada, and I am glad to be able to quote the Globe to-night as doing some justice to Manitoba and the North-West, and some justice, also, to the pet territory of hon. gentlemen opposite. Now, Sir, as I told the House, I had the pleasure on several occasions in 1882, of hearing, and meeting, and fighting the hon. member for North Norfolk. And, Sir, he is a gentleman of great logical power, he is a very able man, he is full of statistics, he is so full of them that he sometimes misquotes them. He is not always accurate. He stated here to night: "There has never been a time when the prices of agricultural products were not higher on the other side of the line"—in Chicago, I think he said—"than on this side." Now, he made a similar statement in 1882 at Tilsonburg when I was fighting him in Norfolk. It was at Tilsonburg he made the statement that on the very day he was speaking the price of wheat was higher in Chicago than in Toronto. That was on the 29th May, and the quotations in the Toronto papers the following morning sent up from Chicago were to this effect: Chicago, spring wheat, $1.23½ to $1.25½. Toronto, spring wheat, $1.33 to $1.37, or a difference in favor of Toronto of 9½ cents to 11½ cents. On that occasion he said: "And it has always been so since that policy became operative"—meaning the National Policy. Sir, very frequently since then, the price of wheat in Toronto has been ahead of the price in Chicago. So much for my hon. friend's accuracy. He also spoke about Dakota and Manitoba, and the North-West farmers being greatly injured because they have to pay too much for their machinery. Why, Sir, my hon. friend the member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) when speaking last session on this topic, dismissed, by facts, statements of that kind. I was up in Winnipeg in 1879. I know something of what the price of machinery was at that time, and I can assure the House that instead of the price of machinery having gone up the price of machinery has gone down. So the statement is entirely erroneous that the farmer in Manitoba or the farmer in the North-West has to pay more in consequence of the National Policy. My hon. friend, at this period of his speech, stopped, and he thanked God that we had an intelligent people. Well, Sir, I am thankful, also, that we have an intelligent people, because if we had not an intelligent people, I am afraid the views of hon. gentlemen opposite now being put forward, might be put into practice disastrously for this country. The hon. gentleman also reverted frequently to the exports and imports, and to the inter-state trade of the United States. We admit that they are a rich and a prosperous people. I have stated that the question is not whether five millions are as rich as sixty millions, but whether we are better developing the country on our own lines than if we were to jump into the maw of the United States. That is the question. He asks: Have we a satisfactory exhibit? I should say we have. Having talked in this way of Canada, without having shown that the patient is suffering, like a doctor who should come to a perfectly healthy individual saying: Oh, you are very bad, you have this and you have that—he prescribes, and what is the remedy? He says: Honesty, economy, retrenchment, access to our natural markets. Well, Sir, at the next election we can discuss honesty and retrenchment, but it is more germane to the question now before the House to discuss the subject of access to our so-called natural markets. There is, I find, a remarkable consistency, after all, in the Reform party. I have in my hand here a speech made at New Glasgow, N.S., in August, 1881, by the ex-leader of the Opposition, a man whom I am sorry this House has even temporarily lost, because no one, whether he is opposed to the hon. gentleman, or whether he is a supporter or a friend of his, can doubt his ability, or fail to see what a gap he must leave in any assembly. Mr. Blake, speaking at New Glasgow, said:

“Your natural channel of trade is with the neighboring Republic. Your exports will find the best market there, and your imports should come from there.”

That is the remedy! We are to seek our market in the United States, we are to get our imports from the United States! The hon. member for North Norfolk says that our geographical position is of such a sort that we cannot do other than seek our imports from there and send our exports there, if we want to succeed. A great deal more is made of our geographical position than is warranted. In the first place, the argument from geographical position is greatly discounted by the fact that we live in an age of railways and telegraphs. That makes all the difference in the world. It has made a difference in the sites of towns; it is no longer absolutely necessary to choose a river bank for the site of a town. Again, the telegraphs have brought places nearer each other. British Columbia was almost an infinite distance from the Maritime Provinces before the era of railways and telegraphs. It would be impossible to cross the Rocky Mountains with any sense of national connection if there were not railways and telegraphs. But if there is any force in that argument let me call the attention of the House to this: that the argument tells as much against the United States as it tells against Canada. Does not the United States stretch across the length and breadth of the continent? Has it not the Rocky Mountains? Has it not a vast stretch of barren territory, too—I use the language of the hon. member who introduced the motion—separating one part of it from another? And if we are to go to geography for arguments against national development, why the geographical features of North America would suggest, not one vast federation, according to the utopian dream of some people, but three great republics or empires, one on the shores of the Atlantic, one on the shores of the Pacific, and one in the centre, with its outlet to the sea in the Gulf of Mexico, and probably one north with its outlet in Hudson Bay. That is the division, if you are going to follow geography. But it is too late; it is as absurd for a young nation like ours to go thinking over what might have been as it is for a man to do so. A man of twenty-five or thirty may think that if his education had been directed into different channels he might have had advantages that he had not obtained and matters might have been different with him; but a man brooding over the past is a very foolish man. The only thing over which we have any control is the present and the future; that is the only thing on which our wills can make any impact, and if we are sensible men it is the only thing with which we will busy ourselves. So it is with a nation. It is useless to think about these geographical features. It is all very well for a student, in his library, who is not engaged in governing the country, to sit there and discuss difficulties of this or of the other kind, and say that a geographical difficulty exists here and a geographical difficulty exists there, and that certain laws will operate in this way and certain laws in the other. But for us here, who are practical men, the question is, and it is behind this whole matter, shall we, to use the language of hon. gentlemen opposite, throw up the sponge, or shall five millions of men, the chief elements of whom belong to the greatest nations of the world, nations that could stand up to any nation that ever existed, whether these five millions, with the vast wealth of Canada, with its millions of acres of fertile lands, with its mines, its lakes, its rivers, are to develop this country, or whether they are to shrink from the task on account of the bug-bears raised by a student in his library about geographical difficulties? Too much altogether has been made of that. Geographical difficulties indeed! Why the French-Canadians, with some of whom I have the pleasure of sitting side by side in this House, did not shrink from the greatest possible difficulties, and in the land whence I come, in the North West, say it is true of the whole of Canada,

Roll mingling with their fame for ever.”

It is absurd to suppose that the descendants of those men, to suppose that French-Canadians, that descendants of the Anglo-Saxons, that descendants of the Celts in this House and in the country, that five millions of men, with such antecedents, with the opportunities we have, should shrink from the noble task of building up a great nation; because that is my hope, and if I did not cherish it I would throw up the sponge at once and would not care to live here—

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. DAVIN. But I say “yes.” I was not sure that it was an hon. member, but I thought that it was another species that interrupted me. Canada is described as having length without breadth, as an eel-skin, as a few miles of fruitful and fertile territory stretching along the boundary line. But the real facts are thus set forth by a well-known authority, Mr. Watson Griffin:—

“About 100 miles north of the great lakes is a belt of rocky country, the greater part of which is of little value for agricultural purposes; but there are rich mines, vast areas of timber and valuable fisheries, and grasses grow with such luxuriance that it must become some day one of the greatest stock-raising countries in the world. This region extends northward to the height of land, the water-shed separating the waters flowing into the great lakes from those flowing into Hudson Bay. On the other side of the height of land a fertile, well-wooded country slopes down to the Hudson Bay. The rivers all rise in the neighborhood of the rocky section. If it were as smooth and fertile as other parts of the country it would soon be stripped of timber near the sources of the rivers, and the country would be subject to floods such as those which have devastated Ohio and other sections of the United States owing to the destruction of forests. But the Ontario Government, having wisely recognised the necessity of preserving the forests—can easily keep that region at the sources of the rivers always well-timbered. The mines and the fisheries can be developed, lumbering can be carried on under the supervision of a government forestry bureau, and stock raisers can avail themselves of the succulent grasses. North of that narrow strip are millions of acres of fertile farm lands. The country between the height of land and Hudson Bay only requires a railway to develop it, and a railway has already been chartered. According to the reports of Professor Bell and other well known scientists there are immense deposits of iron and anthracite coal side by side along the rivers emptying into James' Bay. The distance from Toronto to James' Bay via the Northern Pacific Junction and James' Bay railways will be 575 miles. When the railway to James' Bay is completed anthracite coal will be brought from the northern mines to the people of southern Ontario. Near the city of Ottawa is a mountain of the finest iron in the world. The coal mines of the James' Bay region will be connected by railway with Ottawa, and also with the rich iron mines on the north shore of Lake Superior, less than 300 miles away. South of the anthracite coal region are enormous beds of lignite coal, peat and porcelain or China clay of superior quality.”

Canada has breadth as well as length, and if they will only pay half the attention to the capacities that Canada possesses which they do to the United States they will be able to grow as enthusiastic about their own country. This year has brought painfully before us the superior advantages of Canada: painfully I say, because there was a loss of life on the part of many American citizens in that great blizzard which visited the American North-West. Our whole Dominion lies north of the cyclone belt. Three-fourths of the land adapted to the production of wheat is in Canada, and Mr. Wiman, one of the inspirers of this movement, in fact he is the Coryphæus of the movement, tells us that we have two hours more sunshine in the North-West than they have in the land below the line, and that under these circumstances he says that we have great advantages for wheat growing. The hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) dwelt on the inter-state trade of the United States as enormous, and he seemed to think it was a fair thing on his part to compare the inter-state trade of the United States with the export trade of other countries. But, Sir, when he compares the inter-state trade of the United States with its own export trade he will know, what he would have known had he compared as he might—although our statistics, I am sorry to say, are not in a first rate condition—but if he takes Mr. Blue's report for the Ontario Government, and Mr. Blackeby's report to Sir Leonard Tilley in 1885, he will see that the internal trade of Canada is enormously greater than its export or import trade. How come the United States to have this great inter-state trade? How come they to have the home market that he lauds so much? It is, Sir, because of that very protection that he wants us to forego. He does not seem to have observed for one minute that when he was pouring on the States all the applause that he could, about their development and internal wealth, that this only shows that the policy of the United States, which Alexander Hamilton and Madison and Webster, from one time to another advocated, was the true one, and, I may say, the policy that the hon. gentleman himself would fain advocate because he believes in protection. Well, Sir, what does his argument prove? It proves that if we want to become a great nation, if we want to develop our resources in such a manner that the internal trade shall be a great factor in our life, we must imitate the United States and pursue the same policy of protection. What did one of the Cobden tracts say in regard to the United States some years ago?

"It is our guarantee that if America will put down monopolising manufactures, when our election time comes we will lay Manchester and Sheffield alongside Indiana and Illinois, the finest States of the Union. These artisans and these mechanics will manufacture for them and they may grow food for us."

Now, Sir, we know very well that it does not make much matter, from the point of view of helping an industry, what form protection takes. It is well known that a time came in the history of England when actually free trade was the surest way of protecting its manufactures, and that the way to give protection to those manufactures was to open the doors to cheap food. The fact that manufactures are more advanced, are richer and are more highly organised in any State than in another is sufficient protection. If we adopt the course suggested by the hon. gentleman what will happen? Our manufacturers will be placed in competition with the manufacturers of the United States, who are protected as compared with our own manufacturers, not only by the fact that a great deal of what articles they deal in are patented, but by the fact that the United States manufacturers are richer, are more highly organised, and that they are in fact long come to maturity, while our manufacturers are only in an adolescent stage. The result would be to place us in the position sketched out in the Cobden Club Paper. That policy would bring St. Paul and Minneapolis and eastern cities of the United States into that relation to our country that they would manufacture for us and we should grow food for them. I will show you by-and-bye the market that those gentlemen think is so valuable is a treacherous one, and there is no guarantee whatever that the demand will continue for the class of articles that we export to the United States. Mr. Hitt is a United States statesman who takes much interest in our affairs, and he is of course in favor of commercial union. Indeed, I think judging by the speech of my hon. friend the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that he, too, is in favor of commercial union.

Mr. BOWELL. Of course he is.

Mr. DAVIN. In an interesting speech, which I remember reading, the hon. gentleman said that "whatever the Liberal party would do he was determined to stand by commercial union, and he nailed his colors to the mast." What do we find here to-night? His colors are not nailed to the mast. He has hauled them down. I am sure that the ship is just the same, but he has given her another coat of paint and put a different name on the prow, and the hon. gentleman sits in the poop with the sails flapping against the mast waiting for a breeze. But, Sir, the breeze is not to be coaxed by any such metamorphosis as the ship has undergone. The hon. gentleman, for a man so well informed in figures, is sometimes very reckless in his statements. He said that the treaty should not be like the old reciprocity treaty, which, he thought, was all on the one side. He declares that that was a one-sided treaty, that it was a jugg-handled treaty, and the advantage was on the side of Canada. I have here in my hand the treaty and Mr. Brown's statements in regard to what took place, and the figures, Sir, are irrefragable; I have tested them by authentic sources. It is impossible they should be wrong, because they would have been exposed at once. This is a memorandum by Sir Edward Thornton, K.C.B., and the Hon. George Brown on the commercial relations past and present of the British North American Provinces with the United States of America. I find from this that in the thirteen years of the operation of the reciprocity Treaty the Provinces purchased from the Republic, according to the United States returns, commodities to the value of $346,180,264, and the Republic purchased from the Provinces $325,726,520, leaving a gross cash balance in favor of the United States of $20,454,246. But the balance was, in fact, much larger, the memorandum contending that during the first ten years it was $62,013,545 in favor of the Republic. According to the official returns of the British Provinces, the gold balance in favor of the Republic on the transactions of thirteen years during which the provinces purchased from the United States to the amount of $363,188,088, and the Republic from the provinces $267,612,131, showing on an international traffic of $630,800,218 a gold balance in favor of our neighbours of $95,575,957. Yet the hon. gentleman tells us that the treaty was, in its operation, all on the side of Canada! In speaking of that treaty I confess I thought the hon. gentleman was a little disingenuous; I do not use the word offensively, as he knows well, because it is not in my nature to say anything offensive of anyone. He spoke of the enormous volume of trade during the continuance of that treaty, and how much Canada gained by it. There was an enormous trade done between Canada and the United States at that time; but, Sir, the hon. gentleman never told the House—I do not suppose he would treat his constituents in the same way—what is one of the conditions of a true view of the case, that during a part of that time the Grand Trunk Railway was building, that a great war had gone on below the line, that millions of people were taken from the factory and workshop to the battle field, and that therefore the people of the United States had to go where best they could for their goods. I think when these things are taken into account, it will probably be found that instead of $20,000,000—to take their own returns—being in favor of the United States in ten years under a treaty of that sort, under ordinary and normal circumstances there would be a far larger sum. The hon. gentleman spoke about the market of the United States for Canada, and it seems to me that there is a great fallacy in the way hon. gentlemen speak about the market. To revert again to the language of logicians, that is what is called the fallacy of division; it is distributing one term in one premise, and leaving it undistributed in another. It is assuming that what would be good for one man or one set of men in a country would be good for all men in that country. The hon. gentleman refers to our export of horses, rye, barley, oats and what not, to the United States, and he argues with curious inconsistency that when we import from the United States we pay all the duty on what we import, and when we export to the United States we pay all the duty on what we export. Well, Sir, that is a most extraordinary state of things. It revolutionises political economy. But the hon. gentleman who is leading in this debate said the other night that “nice customs court’sy to great kings,” and I suppose such heaven-born geniuses can revolutionise political economy and overturn the laws of exchange. But, I am inclined to think that that is a mistake. The Hon. James Young, who is a prominent member of the Reform party, and an exceedingly able and honest man, says it is perfectly absurd to say that we pay the duty on the horses that we send across the line. Now, Sir, dealing with this question of the market, I will ask the House to bear with me while I bring before them the relative markets that we have. Our aggregate imports and exports from 1873 to 1887 inclusive, were as follows:—

Aggregate imports and exports.....	$2,864,000,000
Trade with United Kingdom.....	$1,243,000,000
do United States.....	$1,230,000,000
do other countries.....	398,000,000
do countries other than United States.....	$1,638,000,000

Our aggregate exports for the same period were:

Aggregate exports.....	$1,305,000,000
To United Kingdom.....	650,000,000
United States.....	$529,000,000
Other countries.....	126,000,000
Countries other than United States.....	$ 776,000,000

Our total exports for 1887, including amount returned short at United States ports, were:

Exclusive of coin and bullion.....	$89,510,242
Inclusive.....	89,575,811
Coin and bullion.....	$ 5,569
To United Kingdom.....	$44,571,946
Other parts of Empire.....	3,446,810
Total, British Empire.....	$48,018,656
To United States.....	$37,660,199
Other foreign countries.....	3,836,956
Total, foreign countries.....	$41,497,155
Total countries, other than United States.....	$51,855,612

The percentages for 1887 were:

United Kingdom.....	42·8 per cent.
Other British countries.....	3·8 do
Total, British Empire.....	53·6 do
United States.....	42·1 do
Other foreign countries.....	4·3 do
Foreign countries.....	46·4 do
Countries, other than United States.....	57·9 do

Now, our imports for 1887 were:

Total imports.....	$112,892,236
From the United Kingdom.....	$ 44,962,233
do other British countries.....	1,704,200
Total from the British Empire.....	$ 46,666,438
From the United States.....	$ 45,107,068
do other foreign countries.....	13,865,919
Total from foreign countries.....	$ 58,972,985
Total from countries other than the United States....	60,532,362
Our aggregate trade.....	202,408,047

The percentages on home consumption for 1887 are as follows:—

United Kingdom.....	42·6 per cent.
Other British countries.....	1·6 do
Total British Empire.....	42·2 do
United States.....	42·8 do
Other foreign countries.....	13·1 do
Foreign countries.....	55·9 do
Countries other than the United States.....	57·3 do

Our aggregate trade for 1887 was as follows:—

Total aggregate.....	$202,408,047
With United Kingdom.....	$ 89,534,079
do other British countries.....	5,151,010
do British Empire.....	$ 94,685,089
do United States.....	$ 82,767,265
do other foreign countries.....	17,702,886
do all foreign countries.....	$100,470,150
do countries other than United States.....	$112,387,974

The percentages for 1887 were:

United Kingdom.....	44·2 per cent.
Other British countries.....	2·5 do
British Empire.....	46·7 do
United States.....	40·9 do
Other foreign countries.....	8·8 do
Total foreign.....	49·7 do
Countries, other than United States.....	55·5 do

It will be seen that our trade with countries other than the United States, that our trade with the British Empire, is an exceedingly valuable trade; and as the hon. gentleman specified the goods we exported to the United States, I will ask his attention to tables that have been prepared by Mr. McGoun, of Montreal, for 1885. I found in testing them that they were perfectly correct, and that about the same ratio of figures would apply to last year, and therefore I make no scruple of adopting them. The first table, like those that follow, shows the principal free exports for 1885, from Canada to the United States, of all articles entered there in which exports to the United States amounted to $100,000 or over.

Principal free exports, 1885, Canada to United States (Canadian returns):

Fish—Cod, &c., dry salted.....	$ 641,000
Mackerel, pickled.....	625,000
Herring do.....	290,000
do smoked.....	133,000
Lobsters, canned.....	712,000
Salmon, fresh.....	223,000
Fresh, N.E.S.....	447,000
Eggs.....	1,826,000
Gold quartz (British Columbia).....	999,000
Hides, skins, furs.....	459,000
Bark for tanning.....	364,000
Firewood.....	316,000
Furs (undressed).....	185,000
Logs.....	143,000
Railway sleepers.....	142,000
	$7,805,000

Total free imports from Canada (United States returns), $12,642,000. Amongst these articles we find eggs, of which the hon. gentleman tried to make a great deal.

The second table is that of the chief exports of Canada to the United States of articles of which the United States export to the world at large exceeds the United States import from Canada; and I call the hon. gentleman's attention to this, because he stated that the question before us was a very important and critical one. He said nothing could be more solemn than the nature of the question we are discussing, and, therefore, I may assume that if I can prove to the hon. gentleman he is mistaken in the view he takes, he will show, by turning from unrestricted reciprocity, the same conscientiousness he has displayed in turning from commercial union, and we shall find him voting with the Conservative party and supporting what is really the affection of his innermost heart, a protection policy. I will take first the item of coal, of which the export from British Columbia to the United States amounts to $1,178,000, and the exports of the United States of coal reached in value $1,999,000. They must take our British Columbia coal whether they like it or not. Copper ore, we exported to the United States $245,000 worth, and the United States exported $1,739,000 worth. I call the attention of the House to that item, because the hon. gentleman, echoing Mr. Wiman, declared that if we had unrestricted reciprocity, any amount of copper ore would be sent from Canada to the United States, yet, as I have shown, the United States export copper ore to the value of $1,739,000. The same remark applies to iron ore. The hon. gentleman's dulcet utterances are still ringing in my ears, as he declared that we should send any amount of iron ore to the States, were his panacea applied. Well, we exported iron ore to the States to the value of $132,000, and the United States exported to the value of $12,891,000. Take horned cattle. Of horned cattle, we sent to the United States $1,411,000 worth, and the United States exported $12,906,000 worth. Hides, horns and skins, we exported to the extent of $459,000, and the United States exported $4,153,000 worth. Peas and beans, we exported to the United States to the value of $484,000, and the United States export of these articles reached the value of $522,000. Wheat, we sent to the United States $268,000 worth, and the United States exported $72,933,000 worth. Yet, that is the country where we are to obtain an enormous market for our farm products! Is the hon. gentleman aware that within the last ten years the development of wheat-growing in India has made such strides that in the English and the other European markets it threatens to expand even to the exclusion of United States wheat? Why, at a farmers' convention held a few months ago in Chicago, the probability was discussed of the time coming when not a bushel of wheat would be sent across the Atlantic. Only that I do not want to trouble the House with more statistics than are necessary to prove my case—and I have here the statistics showing the progress made in wheat-growing in India—I would enter more fully into this part of the question. Of rye, we sent the United States $150,000 worth and they exported $2,000,000 worth. In potatoes, our export to the United States reached the value of $108,000 as compared with an export from the United States of $265,000. I understand the soul of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), was troubled the other night in the matter of potatoes. Let me point out to the hon. gentleman that the United States export more potatoes than we send them, and therefore the glowing vision that rose before his imagination of any amount of potatoes going to the United States is born entirely of an uninstructed fancy. Of wood staves and headings, we sent to the United States $314,000 worth, and they exported $1,950,000 worth. Other lumber, we shipped to the United States to the value of $184,000, and the United States exported to the amount of $1,181,000. Household furniture, we exported to the United States to the value of $147,000 while the United States exported $2,128,000 worth. Of other wood manufactures, we sent across the line $221,000 worth, and the United States export was $1,590,000. The total export of all these articles to the United States from Canada amounted to $5,300,000, while the total exports of the United States to the rest of the world reached $119,248,000; and yet that is the market they say we are about to capture!

I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to another table which is still more instructive, and that is a statement of the articles that we export to the United States and of which the United States retain the whole or the greater part. Wood planks, we exported $6,956,000 worth, and the United States exported $6,570,000 worth. Laths and palings, we exported to the United States $220,000 worth, and they exported $48,000 worth. In shingles, our export amounted to $133,000, and the United States export reached $132,000. Barley we exported to the extent of $5,477,000, as against the United States export of $346,000. Of hay we exported to the United States $1,181,000 against their export of $204,000. Malt, we exported to the United States $230,000, and they exported none, and malt was one of the articles the hon. gentleman dwelt upon. Horses, we exported to the States $1,524,000 worth, and they exported $377,000 worth. Sheep, we sent to the States $773,000 worth, and the United States exported $512,000 worth. Wool, we exported to the United States $186,000 worth, and they exported $88,000 worth. The American returns show that their import trade with Canada in these articles I have just mentioned amounted, in 1885, to $17,575,000, while they exported to the value of $8,277,000. The total import—and I would call the hon. gentleman's attention to this—of these articles, according to the United States returns for 1885, was $20,509,000 worth, and according to the same returns our total export to them was $17,575,000. These are articles they must have and on which they must pay the duty. Now, these are the only things for which we could find a profitable market in the United States, and yet what is the fact? We sent them $17,500,000 worth out of the $20,000,000 which they imported, so that at present, even with the tariff, as it is, we control the only part of our trade with the United States which is really valuable to us. In regard to all the other things, in regard to things that we send them which they send away, what is to prevent Canadians, with the enterprise that the hon. gentleman said our manufacturers should have, with the energy which our manufacturers should have, and which I know they have, what is to prevent them finding out the markets themselves and keeping the profit in Canada which goes to the middleman in New York? The hon. gentleman asked in connection with this, who paid the duty? I have already pointed out the absurdity of saying that we pay all the duty on our exports to the States, and that we pay all the duty on our imports from the States. That is a very jug-handled affair. Some malign fairy must preside over the laws which govern exchange and strangely alter them, in order to give the hon. gentleman an argument, but I think I have shown that, when the hon. gentleman wants a fact to buttress up his argument, he takes the readiest way—he invents it; he falls back upon his invention for his facts, and I am bound to say that, in this respect, he is a man of great capacity. As to this statement about paying the duty, I have heard the hon. gentleman speak about so much being paid on horse shoe nails. I remember he made a speech when I met him in 1882, in which he declared that, if I wanted to shoe my horse, I was taxed something like 41 per cent. on the nails, and the hammer taxed 40 per cent that drove them in; that my penknife was taxed 4 ½ per cent.; that the sheets I slept in were taxed 30 per cent, and the blanket 70; shoes and hat each 30 per cent.; if I smoked a cigar, I was taxed 120 per cent. on that; and I found that he taxed me so much that at last I discovered that, in smoking cigars, and shoeing my horse, and getting wearing apparel, I was taxed many times beyond my income, which has always been a very moderate one. That was answered very practically in this House by my friend, Mr. Wigle, who is no longer here, I am sorry to say, and who is a loss to this House. From that gallery I heard him demonstrate the utter absurdity of this statement, that we paid the duty on all articles which appear in the tariff as dutiable if imported. The duty is paid on articles which pay Customs duty when they come in, but most of these articles do not come in; they are made in the country. The other day, when one of the hon. gentleman's friends was making a speech at a bye-election, he described how much was paid on wool which entered into the manufacture of garments. In fact, he diagnosed—I like that word “diagnosed” which the hon. gentleman gave us to-day, and I shall never forget it—he diagnosed the unfortunate situation of the people of Canada in that respect, and an old fellow who was there listening to him, and who had a wife who was handy at making clothes, took a pair of his unmentionables in his hand and said: “That wool was grown on my own sheep, the cloth was made at home, how much duty do I pay on that?” And the old fellow stroked his knee with the perfect satisfaction and confidence that he had overturned one of the Reform missionaries. I will read three or four lines, if it be only to recall the pleasant voice and the incisive logic of my friend Mr. Wigle. He says:

“Home competition brings down the price. But that is not the best of it. Without this National Policy, we would be compelled to get these hats in the United States; and the manufacturers of hats would have all that country to sell their hats in, and would bring their surplus here. Now, without this policy, we would have to pay that dollar. Where would it go to? Every man knows that it would go to the United States. The hatter would pay the dollar to the wholesale man, the wholesaler would pay it to the retailer, the retailer to the laborer, the laborer to the butcher, the butcher to the farmer, the farmer to the blacksmith, and the blacksmith to some one else, and every man whose hands that dollar went through would make from 10 to 25 per cent., and it would benefit thousands of people in the United States. Where would the hat be? In Canada, and in six months it would be worn out, then we would have neither hat nor money. I have a hat that was bought in London at the rate of $4.50 a dozen, or three York shillings a piece. That hat can be sold for 50 cents, giving a profit of 33½ per cent.; and the result is that, when that hat is worn out, the money is in the country, and the poor man can buy another with it. But the argument of the hon. gentleman is that the poor man has to pay this duty. Now, how is it? The poor man comes into a store where there is a hat for 50 cents, another for 75 cents, another for $1, and another for $1.25, all manufactured in Canada, but, if he wants a finer hat, he takes a fine wool hat on which duty has been paid; and I say that, if he buys a $4 hat, that is his business, and not the business of the Reform party of this country. The poor man is not compelled to buy that kind of a hat, but if he wants a hat like the one the leader of the Opposition wears, and he pays his $3 or $4 for it, that is his business and not the business of the Reform party. Now, Sir, we will come to the question of a particular kind of cloth. The hon. gentleman, when talking to the people of West Kent, told them that the poor class of people paid 50 per cent. on their cloths, while the rich man paid only 23 per cent. Well, I had occasion to go to a factory in West Kent, and I said: ‘I want a yard of your heaviest cloth.’ There is the piece of cloth I got.”

He held it up before the gaze of the Commons—

“It has a pound of wool in it, and I paid 50 cents a yard for it. It cost 30 cents to manufacture it. Now, I would like to know where is the 50 per cent. paid on that piece of cloth. I will promise the hon. gentleman that, if he or any of his supporters behind him—and there are a lot of merchants there—can stand up and show the House that there is 50 per cent. of duty paid on this kind of cloth, I will leave this side of the House, and go and support the hon. gentleman.”

I quote that because it is put in a more emphatic and a better way than I could put it. But I will also use the language of the Adam Smiths and the Bastiats in regard to this matter. What they lay down is that the moment you invest capital, it always displaces two capitals, and if you send the capital out of the country, you have only displaced one capital in your own country and have lost the money you have sent out; and there cannot be the least doubt on that head. In this connection the hon. gentleman referred to eggs, and he dealt in superlatives as the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) did. In fact, when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford, I was reminded of what Sydney Smith told the Yankees of his day, that they should avoid superlatives. Everything with him was enormous. And to-night the hon. gentleman told us that, if we had unrestricted reciprocity, our trade with the United States in ten years would amount to $300,000,000.

An hon. MEMBER. He said $500,000,000.

Mr. DAVIN. He said $500,000,000, did he? Oh, a couple of hundred millions are nothing to the hon. member. He does not give us the least ground for believing him when he says that. He merely makes the statement, just as it is enough for the ex-Finance Minister to make assertions. I read his speech at Ingersoll, I have it here, and in fact it would have saved the reporters a lot a trouble if, instead of taking down his speech the other night, they had cut out of the newspaper the speech delivered at Ingersoll and set it up, because it was the old Ingersoll speech over again. I have it here, and the ex-Finance Minister, whose demeanor shows how modest a man he is, thinks it is enough for him to say that there would be an enormous development, an extraordinary development of trade if this were done, and his first lieutenant in this matter takes the same course, and gives us his ipse dixit as to the wonderful progress that would be made. Now, he instanced the case of eggs. I will show him that his eggs are not what they are cracked up to be. Now, he says that under free trade between us and the United States, there would be an unlimited expansion. That is what his leader says in this matter, too, although on a priori grounds, it can be demonstrated that such a thing could not be. Suppose I take the market of the United States as represented by 100. He says you would have the market of 60,000,000. What does that mean? It would be a market of 60,000,000 plus the 5,000,000 in Canada. The size of a market is relative to the number of people who trade in it. If you have a market, say, of 100, and let there be ten persons coming to that market, of equal energy and equal push, there is one-tenth of the market for one of them, and therefore the size of the market is a relative thing. But when the hon. gentleman says that we would have a market of 60,000,000, and that our trade would go on with unlimited expansion, does he suppose that the energy of the people of the United States is to lie in abeyance during that time? Does he suppose that they are not going to come into our market? The honorable gentleman has used a most fallacious argument in this connection. He has taken the enormous product of the United States in one or two particulars, and he says: “Look at what we send them, or look at what we import. Do you suppose,” he says, “that is going to be a matter of any importance to people who export and import so much?” There he falls into the fallacy of regarding the people of the United States as a single person, he falls into the fallacy of attributing to the various minds that make up the trading community of the United States, a sentiment that would come into the mind of a single man if he were exporting or importing these enormous quantities. To that single man his proportion of the trade of Canada would be a very small thing. But the truth is that the markets of the United States, the merchants of the United States are made up of units, all of them looking where they can make a dollar, where they can plant a dollar which will produce the most profit to them. Of course, instead of their disregarding the Canadian market, we find gentlemen who are advocating this thing in Congress, pointing out the value of our market, pointing out that the result would be that from Halifax to Vancouver, in every shop and every store, they would see United States goods and United States machines. And so, Sir, there is the same fallacy in supposing that because one article may have made progress under free trade, every article will do so. It so happens that they need our eggs. I do not think they would need a large amount of our machinery, or a large amount of our furniture. I do not think they would need a large amount of those things which they export in 10's and 50's of millions.

But let us take the egg. The hon. gentleman declares that in twelve years we should have a trade worth 300,000,000 under free trade; I ask his attention to what took place in regard to eggs. In 1853, under free trade, we exported 13,413,744 dozens of eggs, to the tune of $2,251,304, or 17 cents a dozen. In 1886 we exported 12,702,883 dozens of eggs, to the tune of $1,728,032, or a decrease in those three years of over half a million dollars. So you see that the reasoning of the hon. gentleman does not go down to facts. He contents himself with saying: Oh, there will be an immense expansion; there will be an immense trade, and he talks as if it was to go on in mathematical progression. He says: Look at eggs. We do look at eggs, and they do not bear out what he says. I do not know what the eggs were that we exported, but I know that the eggs of the hon. member for North Norfolk are cracked; at all events I have cracked them now. I could show in other lines how variable, how treacherous is this market.

Now, Sir, on this occasion the hon. gentleman broke out into a tirade against combines in Canada. I hope the committee that my hon. friend (Mr. Wallace) has moved for will lead to the suppression of this evil, because combines on the part of traders or manufacturers with a view to keeping up the price of an article are an evil. I have heard of such things in Canada, and I hope that if there are such they will be dealt with vigorously and put down. But I would ask my hon. friend: Are there no combines in the United States? Everything is couleur de rose in the United States; there is nothing wrong in the United States. Although the hon. gentleman is a member of the Parliament of Canada, and aspires to be a Minister, I am glad to see that the sentiment of patriotism is so fervent within him that he can see nothing wrong in that great land. But he cannot expect us to look at things in that light. We are practical men here who must not look at things from the point of view of sentiment. We must look at them with close logic, with the responsibilities that attach to our position as members of Parliament, and such unsubstantial rhetoric as we have had from those hon. gentlemen on this question, cannot be allowed to weigh with us, and I know it will not weigh with the country. Then he says this new scheme will bring back part of the million of Canadians. Why does the hon. gentleman suppose if you had unrestricted reciprocity, that the merchant who is established in Chicago, or the professional man who is established in Chicago, or New York, or the western States, the farmer who has built there his house, the mechanic who has gone there—does any man suppose, does the hon. gentleman himself suppose, if he will be candid with me, that any portion of these 700,000, some of them Canadians, others, I believe the sons of Canadians, would come back to Canada? Why, it is a most absurd idea. Sir, I do not consider that we should perpetually mourn over the fact that the natural restlessness and the natural ambition of the races from which we spring, should assert themselves, and should lead to an occasional migration to the States. I have explained, however, that the conditions which led to any large migration, no longer exist. Then he asked the question, whether unrestricted reciprocity would injure our manufactures. He says: "I admit it would injure some lines of business." That itself is a very serious matter. The hon. gentleman admits that the proposal he makes here, which neither the hon. member for South Oxford nor himself has shown will confer the least benefit on Canada—for they have only said it will do this or the other, but they have not given us any solid ground on which to rest—will do serious injury to certain branches of business. That is a very important admission. But he says it would be advantageous to the majority. There is sitting near him an hon. member who is well acquainted with the trade of Canada, and he knows well that what I am going to say is true. He is perfectly familiar with the fact that when a manufacturer or merchant, but especially a manufacturer, is competing with a rival in business, two cents a ton in freight is a very important matter, especially when he is engaged in a struggle with a new competitor. We will suppose the line between the two countries wiped out, and that our manufacturers are face to face with the manufacturers of the United States, and that the American manufacturers are coming in here to seize and capture our market, then those manufacturers will do what a witness before a Parliamentary Committee of the House of Commons stated that English manufacturers had done, sell at a loss in order to capture the market, and, when they have crushed out competition, recoup themselves by selling goods at any prices they like. The hon. gentleman knows that under those circumstances a few cents a ton is an important matter. We will suppose that our manufacturers are face to face with this market of sixty millions and are trying to get into it. What do they find? They find that they have a longer haul than the American manufacturers in order to reach the market, a difference of two hundred or a hundred or fifty miles as the case may be; but supposing it is only fifty miles, we in the west know what a difference is made even by that distance. Not only so, but the Canadian manufacturers would be utterly unknown there, and would have to compete with old established rivals and make a character for themselves. They would in many cases be wholly shut out by patents. They would be handicapped from the word go, and would have none or very little chance with their rivals—one or two might succeed—while the American manufacturers, owing to their greater wealth, more highly organized industries, and the greater perfection of their "combines"—for they are not putting them down there as we are doing here—would be able to stalk victorious through our Canadian markets.

And our manufacturers destroyed where would our workmen be? Would they not swell the exodus?

But in this connection I must remind my hon. friend of a phrase that he used in a speech which I read with great interest—"that protected-to-death country, the United States." How very inconsistent it is that we should be asked to go into that protected-to-death country by free traders, the men who once followed the Hon. George Brown, who was once considered the Bright of Canada, who thought that the sun rose only over Manchester—that those men and the followers of Hon. Edward Blake should actually want Canada to go into that protected-to-death country. When speaking of paying the duty I should have mentioned another thing. If a citizen of Canada pays heavy taxation now, what would he have to pay if this country joined the United States, because by the same parity of reasoning you have to put on the duties, whether the system of the hon. member for South Oxford or that of the hon. member for Norfolk be adopted; if you take goods from the United States you have to add the duty in the United States port of entry. So an unfortunate Canadian would be taxed a great deal more under this régime that the hon. gentleman would fain introduce. But happily it is out of the question.

The hon. member dwelt on the great advantages we should possess if his proposals were carried out. He actually said that we could supply the whole sixty-five millions of people with canned fish, although they have large canned fish factories of their own. I am afraid we should not drive them out of that market. When asked the question as to whether we should not be brought into competition with such manufacturers as I have described, the hon. gentleman in order to get rid of it made a comparison, the fallacy of which I will show. He instanced Ohio, Indiana and California and some other States in their manufacturing progress. How is that progress in regard to manufactures made? Any man who knows anything about those States and Territories is aware that rich capitalists go in there from the eastern States and invest large sums and build great factories, and in some cases a large proportion of the profits goes to the eastern States. That is the way it is done, and we hope as Canadians that the same thing or something like it will take place here. But give us time—there is no need for such tremendous hurry. We will do the same thing in Canada, and indeed we have already started in the same way. In fact people are going into the North-West not only from the eastern Provinces but from England and France and are investing large sums.

Then the hon. gentleman dealt with the objections that might be raised to the proposition. The first objection to which he referred was that of loyalty, and he declared that he was as loyal as any one, but his loyalty was to Canada. I will say here that there is no man living whose heart beats with more pride than does mine at the sight of the British flag; but my first duty is to Canada too, the first duty of all of us is to Canada, and it is because that is our first duty that we supported a protective policy. If we were thinking more of England than of Canada we would never have imposed protective duties because we knew there were a great number of people in England who did not approve of that policy, who even resented the tariff we adopted. The hon. gentlemen talk about their loyalty! I have here a speech delivered by the ex-Finance Minister at Ingersoll, and in it he speaks of the subject of loyalty in a very strong manner. He says, that for his part England does not take much interest in Canada, and he does not see why we should trouble ourselves so very much about England. Let me say about this matter of loyalty that it is not merely a sentiment, and I hope there is not a man in this House that would sneer at sentiment—it is a most practical thing, our loyalty to England. If we were to make such a treaty as those gentlemen would have us make with the United States, what would happen? It would have to be inaugurated by Congress according to the constitution of the United States, for the third power given under the clause of the constitution which deals with this declares that only Congress can regulate such a matter. Congress cannot merely inaugurate but it can modify a treaty, and as Mr. Hitt the other day said: "If we do not like the treaty or if we find it act unfairly we can change it." What is the meaning of "change it?" Does it not mean to go back on it after probably doing any amount of damage to Canada? and after we had overturned a system under which we are prospering? The people of the United States would put the interpretation of power upon any arrangement we might make with them, and then, Sir, we should not be in the position that we are to-day. When the hon. member for Cumberland and the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain went down to Washington, if they made a treaty binding Canada how should we feel in regard to it? Why, we know well, that in regard to any instrument that the United States authorities had put their seals to, and that the plenipotentiaries representing Canada and England had put their seals to also, that the lion of England would look on and see that it was observed. Then, Sir, we should find that loyalty was a practical thing.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Yes, "hear, hear." That lion is as powerful and as strong as ever he was and in any arrangement that we may make, as long as we are true to our position as members of a great Empire, we have the power of England to see that we are not handicapped and that our agreement is carried out by the other side. But, Sir, suppose the agreement is made, and we have a reciprocity treaty arranged to suit the Americans but with our own duties on the seaboard. What will be the result? We have admitted the United States manufacturers free, we have discriminated against England, we have discriminated against our fellow colonists of the Empire, and we have discriminated against the whole world in favor of the United States, and the United States after a few years says to us: "We see you have the advantage,"—as I admit we might have an advantage in a certain direction under that plan—"you must put up your tariff to the same height as ours." We might say: "This is not in the agreement;" but they will tell us: "Congress is going to take that course and you will have to follow suit." And suppose Congress does insist, can we go to England and ask her to help us to make the people of America carry out the agreement? Would not England say: "You have repudiated me, you have discriminated against me, how can you ask me to help you to do this thing?" We then should be abandoned and by either the arrangement which the member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton), or the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), proposes, we should put ourselves in chancery, and be like a rabbit in a wild cat's claw. Is that a position that my French-Canadian friends, or the other members of this House, would wish to place themselves in? I have before me the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) at Ingersoll, to which I have already referred. I once spoke in Ingersoll and I know what a hot-bed of liberalism it is, but I notice that in all that speech where he deals with this question completely, and where he lays down what the possibilities would be, he does not receive a single cheer. I state here that I do not believe that on this question the Reform party of Canada will follow the hon. gentlemen opposite in the disloyal course they are taking.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIN. Well the next election will tell you, as the bye-elections have told you, about commercial union. What is the difference between commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity? It is the difference between tweedle-dum and tweedle-dee, and so far as there is a difference it is against Canada, for we should lose our part of the pool. The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) goes from the disloyal cry to annexation and he does not think his policy would lead to annexation, but at Ingersoll his leader said, speaking of the danger of annexation: "There is a risk I cannot overlook, but it is a choice of risks, and our present position is anything but one of stable equilibrium." The hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) says that "those who say it would bring about annexation only admit that annexation would be a very fine thing, and that having got so much of reciprocity we then would be most anxious to go in for annexation." Sir, I have shown you that if we went in for unrestricted reciprocity we should be in such a position that the wolf might continue to complain that the lamb troubles the stream, and the complaint would have more the character of a menace than it can have to-day. Any one who has given attention to political economy knows that you cannot, in regard to any article of import or export, make a tariff that can last for five, or four, or two years even. In anything so delicate as the exchanges between countries, the most skilful arrangement of tariffs will be coarse and clumsy, and, therefore, we never can be certain that changes may not have to be made. If we once took this step which is proposed, we should simply be helpless in the hands of Americans. What should we do under such circumstances? Why, Sir, every year we should have to send delegates to Washington to wait in the lobbies there to get their orders to bring back to this House. The Parliament of Canada, which is now as free as any Parliament that exists in the world, and the next Parliament in importance of English-speaking men to the Parliament which meets at Westminster, that Parliament which has looked forward to such great things for this country, would have to send down its delegates to the lobbies and treat with fair and unfair lobbyists until Congress had decided what our fate should be. Very naturally, if this were the case, we would say: "Let us get rid of this, anything is better than this state of things," and we would be ready to go in for annexation. Then about the "better terms," which my friend from Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) said certain Conservatives expected some years hence. I do not think I need deal with that. No Conservative, I fancy, looks forward in that way, and if he did he would not be worthy of the name of a Conservative, and not worthy of the name of a Canadian either.

The hon. gentleman then dealt with the question of revenue, and I am bound to say that he dealt with it in a very gingerly manner. He pointed out that we should lose right off over $7,000,000. And if it happened as Mr. Blake said it should be, that we got all our imports from the States and sent our exports there, where would our revenue be? Should we get the same amount on our customs? We should have to go in for direct taxation, which the hon. gentleman says he does not fear. Well, as the hon. Minister of the Interior pointed out, there is no taxation the incidence of which is so unfair. An income tax is very unfairly collected, it depends so much on the honesty of the men on whom it is imposed. The hon. gentleman says he does not fear it, but I venture to say the people of the country, and especially the people with small known incomes, do

He talked about the danger to our shipping. Why, Sir, of course our shipping would disappear, if we got all or the bulk of our imports from the United States. Imports and exports have to pretty nearly balance each other; you have to pay for imports with exports, and if we are going to trade with the United States, all our business would have to be done over lines of railway and not in ships, and so our shipping would disappear. Then, Sir, he alluded to Imperial Federation. Well, I do not think Imperial Federation is up here. If it were, one might be inclined to say something on it; but I have no desire to go outside the record.

Now, Sir, I will call the attention of the House to a view of this question that has not yet been touched on. It is admitted by the hon. member for South Oxford and the hon. member for North Norfolk, that there would be a danger of annexation. I have never been afraid of annexation, for this reason, that I know very well that the United States have no desire to commit the blunder of forcibly attempting to annex the people of Canada. In the first place, they would fail; and in the next place, if they succeeded they would have a more unmanageable Ireland on their hands, and other elements of discord and disruption that are working in their midst at the present moment, would make themselves felt. There is an important question that bears on this subject. If a sensible man were going to make a new departure, he would ask himself, is it likely to have the element of permanence? Can we be certain that the future of the United States is assured? Are there no clouds upon the horizon? Prof. Gilliam and Judge Tourgée have written books showing the enormous growth of the black population of the South. They have shown that ten years hence there will be eight black republics on the hands of the United States. They have shown that the negroes are increasing at a ratio far greater than the increase of the whites from immigration and from natural increase, and calculate that in 1900, the very period at which the imagination of my hon. friend the member for North Norfolk fired, the blacks, who were six millions in 1880 in the southern States, will then be twelve millions; in 1920, 24,000,000; in 1940, 48,000,000; in 1960, 96,000,000, and in 1980, 192,000,000.

Mr. DAVIN.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh! oh!

Mr. DAVIN. Hon. gentlemen may laugh and say "oh" to that; but if they will take the trouble to read those books, written by some of the first men in the United States, and if they will give so humble and so illiterate a person as myself some credit for appreciating an argument of the kind, it will probably be as creditable to their intelligence as any utterances of that sort that they may indulge in. I say, Sir, under those circumstances, with an element in the United States calculated to give rise to disturbance, an element no counterpart of which exists in Canada, with the black population increasing at a ratio that menaces the future of the republic, it would be a most monstrous thing on the part of Canada to throw in her lot with the United States. And, Sir, let us make no concealment of this. The real issue, the issue underneath this movement, the important issue, is: Shall we take a step that will land Canada in the United States and make this country part and parcel of the republic? There is not a man of any reflection in the country who does not know that that is the real issue, and the reason hon. gentlemen are so intent on saying it is not the issue is because they know that the young men of Canada—aye, and the old men too—the men of the Reform party—the greater part of them, no less than those of the Conservative party—for, as in Israel of old, there are seven thousand that have not bowed the knee to Baal—are loyal to Canada and have faith in Canada's future. When I read originally the speeches made by my friend Mr. Goldwin Smith, by Mr. Wiman, by my friend the Hon. Wm. Macdougall, about all that this thing would do for Canada, I was amazed; and when I heard the hon. member for South Oxford the other night dilate on the enormous progress, the vast expansion, that would take place if his policy were carried out, it reminded me of one of those blood-curdling incidents of the old German ballads, where we see a young maid dressed in bridal robes, full of hope, full of life and splendor and joy, but the bridegroom proves to be a skeleton, and the marriage couch the cold earth. These gentlemen come and talk to Canada, to this young nation, of untold wealth, of unmeasured prosperity, of delusive progress, of intoxicating dreams; and what do they ask her to do in order to attain all this? To shiver her solid existing prosperity—to realise aggrandisement by extinction—to live a fuller life by walking into her tomb. But, Sir, I tell these preposterous propagandists of a contemptible pessimism, who whine out that Canada is doomed,

"The grave's not dug where traitor hands shall lay In fearful haste her murdered corse away."

No, Sir, Canada's future is secure. She is still young; but the day of maturity is at hand; and centuries hence, when the historian shall have marked with a pen of indelible scorn the character of this movement, her heart will be strong, her life vigorous, she will go forward in ever-expanding progress, beauty's ensign purple on her lips and on her cheeks, and the day remote beyond human ken when death's pale flag will be advanced there.

Mr. LAVERGNE. Mr. Speaker, this is certainly the most important question that has been discussed in this Parliament since Confederation, and it would be presumption on my part to attempt to add any arguments in support of reciprocity after the eloquent and elaborate speeches which we have had the pleasure of hearing from several members of this House. But, Sir, the reasons which have been urged in support of the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford apply so forcibly to the Province of Quebec that I think many voices should be heard from that quarter. It is thought in certain sections of the country that the Province of Quebec did not take any interest in that matter. Even a zealous advocate of reciprocity wrote a pamphlet in which he asserted that the present attitude of the Province of Quebec is one of isolation, and went on to say that, if isolation in commerce would make a people great, then the destiny of the Province of Quebec, in her present frame of mind, was one of superlative greatness. I must say at once that this opinion is entirely incorrect. It was no doubt asserted in good faith, and for that very reason it becomes the more necessary to repudiate it as damaging to the cause of reciprocity as well as to the Province of Quebec. In no class of the people there, does any such desire of isolation exist, either politically or commercially. A friend of mine, a fierce Tory, was telling me some time ago that he would favor political annexation to the United States, because he felt himself lost in the Province of Quebec among the French Canadians. I can say this for my countrymen, that they do not think they are lost in Canada, although they are surrounded by an English population, and if it were a bad thing to be so surrounded, they would not think it much worse whether the surrounding people were called American or British, and they would consider it a great blessing if closer relations of some kind were effected with the United States which would bring in prosperity to their homes. I do not say this to express any desire to sever our political connection with Great Britain. I am an admirer of British rule. I do not think we could have a better form of government than the one we now enjoy. One single reform would make that Government a model one, and that reform would be commercial independence. If we had that freedom we would have nothing to envy anybody. Yet we must not be blind to the truth. We must see things as they are. The time when the very name of the United States was a bugbear in some parts of the Province of Quebec has gone by. At that time it was thought a sin to think of closer relations with our neighbors, but since then the sinners have become so numerous that we have had to strike that sin off our list. There is not perhaps one family out of ten in French Canada, which has not one or more of its members now residing in the United States, and I can say without exaggeration that there is nearly one-third of the whole French-Canadian population now residing in the United States, some permanently and some temporarily. These people know well all the advantages that would be derived from closer relations with that country. It is there they go for money when they are penniless. It is with American money they pay off the mortgages on their farms, and I can say this, that there has been in some parts of the Eastern townships of Quebec so much money sent by Canadians from the neighboring Republic that it reduced the rate of interest. Twelve or 15 years ago, it was a common thing to see money lent at 10 or 12 per cent. on mortgages. Now 8 per cent. is a very heavy rate. I must also say that in some of these localities the agricultural interest is in such a state of depression, particularly in places where the farms are not very good that one-half of the farms would have been abandoned by this time, if the United States were not there as a place of reserve in days of need. Under these conditions, it is impossible that the Province of Quebec should have any desire to remain isolated from the other Provinces. On the contrary, that province is quite ready to help in any movement tending to improve its condition, and in support of this statement I might mention, without looking further back than a few months ago, that at the Provincial Conference held in Quebec, and from where the idea sprung, unrestricted reciprocity with the United States was recommended by the representatives of the Quebec Government as well as by the leading men of most of the other Provinces. Now, before speaking of the advantages which would result from reciprocity, I cannot help answering one great objection which is made against that policy. It is said by the adversaries of reciprocity that it will discriminate unfairly against Great Britain. I cannot, for one moment, admit this. I am sure that if we had that reciprocity, it would stimulate our business to such an extent that before many years we would do far more business with Great Britain than we do now. Yet supposing that assertion be true, we can fairly reply that England does not discriminate in our favor. England treats us just as she treats every nation on the face of the earth, and it would not be in her interest to discriminate in our favor. In support of this proposition, we might well use the argument which has been used by the First Minister, when discussing a policy which was improperly called the National Policy. "As a self-governing people," he said, "we have a right to consult our own interests first." This argument will be conclusive of itself, but there are many illustrations of its force. Let us recall to memory some of the events of the past, and we will see that the motive power of politics in this country has always been self interest. We, in Quebec, are not in the same position as the other Provinces of Confederation, and I speak more from the Quebec point of view than from the general point of view. In 1760, when Canada was conquered by England, was it through a motive of love, was it through any kindly feeling that Canada was taken away from French domination and made an English colony? Surely it was then self interest that dictated England's policy. After that we were governed several years by military rule. Surely that rule was not inflicted on us through a motive of justice, but purely through self interest. Whether rightly or wrongly, it was thought to be in the interest of the conqueror to deal in that way with the conquered. I do not mean this as a grievance, but I say it tends to prove my theory. After that again, in 1774, when the standard of rebellion was raised among our neighbors, England thought fit to deal with us more fairly, and we were then granted the Quebec Act. We were given back our French civil law, and we were exempted from the test oath. It was surely again interest that dictated such a policy. It was the fear of seeing us join the rebellion. It might be said that in our history there are some exceptions, but those exceptions will only confirm the rule. At the same time, when the twelve States sent delegates to their first Congress in Philadelphia, what was their first move? They passed resolutions remonstrating, in virulent tone, with the Imperial Government for the beginning of freedom which had been granted to this country. It was not in their interest that they did that, and it was soon after proved, and they immediately afterwards understood it themselves. A very little word thoughtlessly spoken prevented us from joining them. Shortly after, they voted three addresses, one to the King, one to the people of Great Britain justifying the action they had taken, and a third to the Canadians. In that address they expressed very different views than those contained in their resolutions. They offered us as many privileges and advantages as has been granted us by England, and in that they acted according to their interest, but it was too late. I might say that all and every important event of our history will prove that the motive power of politics in this country has always been interest. We have fought for years for rights which have been admitted to be just and legitimate. We have fought for British rights and they were granted to us. England yielded to our just demand when she thought it was her interest to do so, when it was seen that the game was a very expensive one. I do not say those things to recriminate. I do not suppose that we would have been treated any better by any other nation on the face of the globe, but I say that this theory is a common axiom of common sense. I admit that for fifty years we have been most fairly treated. We have enjoyed great freedom, and under no other flag than the British flag would we have had better treatment, and I do not deny that we owe gratitude to England, but in a case of interest like this, our debt of gratitude is not so enormous that we should sacrifice our own interest, not even for England but for a certain number of her manufactures. It is a very strange argument to hear the hon. gentlemen on the other side not saying that reciprocity would be bad for Canada, but that it would be bad for England. It appears that we are very rich, and that we must toil for poor England. As I have heard here in this House, not only loyalty but charity begins at home. Now, before enumerating [some of the advantages which I think would result from reciprocity, I think I should answer a few of the other objections which have been made to the motion presented by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). The hon. gentleman who preceded me began his brilliant address by a long citation from one Mr. Ritchie of Ohio, and that Mr. Ritchie, it appears, knows our country very well. He made a very brilliant exposition of our wealth, of our natural resources, of our mines, our beautiful rivers, in fact, of all our natural wealth he made the most brilliant picture; but I would have been most happy to hear that citation continued up to the end, to hear the conclusion of that citation, and I would have been very much surprised if Mr. Ritchie did not conclude that this immense wealth, these immense resources wanted to be developed, and that the best way of developing these immense resources was by the way of reciprocity or commercial union. There can be no doubt that this gentleman made this brilliant exposition with an end and with a desire, and what desire could it have been if not a desire of participating in those immense resources. Now, we are told, that we are a young country. I will admit that, as far as growth is concerned, we are a very young country, but as far as age is concerned, we are not so much younger than the country adjacent to us. The hon. gentleman had the advantage of being born in a country far more important than this, and perhaps we have over him the advantage of knowing the history of this country a little further back, and, if I have been well taught, and I think I have been correctly taught in that fact, I think this country was settled over three hundred years ago and not one hundred years ago. We have been also told that it is not true that we pay duty on all importations and pay duty on all exportations, and the proof in support of that is that it is against all the principles of political economy. I could not see any conclusions arrived at by the hon. gentleman. Yet, if the hon. gentleman was here, I would relate to him something which occurred in my county, and to my personal knowledge. One of my present constituents, in 1878, was a great Conservative, a great admirer of the Conservative policy, and endorsed protection. That man happened to be a farmer and a cattle dealer. He endorsed that policy, and made a great deal of noise in his parish, and perhaps he made conquests of electors for his party. In 1882, after having driven his cattle to the United States at different times, he began to think that policy was not as sound as he thought at the beginning. He began to find out and was able to make out who it was that was paying the duty. In 1882 he voted, but he did not brag any more. He did not say anything. In 1885 there was a local election in that county, and mixing up both Governments, holding both Administrations, which were both Conservative, responsible for their faults, he did not vote at all. Then he began to understand that it was the farmers who were paying the duty on the cattle he was driving to the United States. In 1887 he was one of my strong supporters. I will not follow the hon. gentleman on all the grounds he has gone through. He has taken us from the Hudson Bay to the Gulf of Mexico. Certainly he has displayed a vast amount of knowledge, and I can say that I have admired his brilliant expositions, but owing to my own deficiency, owing, perhaps, to my not understanding his language, which is not my own, I could not see the bearing of all he said. Now, I have heard an hon. member of this House speak of inconsistency. Although the hon. gentleman for Assiniboia (Mr. Davin) is not present at this moment,

Mr. LAVERGNE.

I wish to remark that citing speeches made ten or fifteen years ago are no great answer to serious arguments. If we were to argue on that line, I would have to ask the hon. member if he always held the same opinions he does now of the administration of the right hon. gentleman. Now, Sir, it has been said that we are in a very prosperous condition, and, therefore, we do not need a change. In support of that argument we have had extracts read from a speech of the Hon. George Brown, made ten or fifteen years ago. I do not say that I share the opinions of that gentleman at that time, but I say that speeches made ten or fifteen years ago are no answer to arguments made to-day. Now, I come to the real point at issue—would it be to our interest to have reciprocity? Perhaps it has been thought that I was not friendly towards England and was aiming at some change in our political position, in the beginning of my remarks. That was far from my object. I sincerely believe that if we wished for a political change in this country, we could find no better mode of bringing it about than by maintaining our present trade relations with the United States. It is to be remembered that in the Province of Quebec, French-Canadians do not hold the same sentiments of attachment to England as English-Canadians. We all admit that we owe a debt of gratitude to England, but we know very well that in this question there is not the same feeling in the Province of Quebec as may exist in the other Provinces. If our present trade relations continue for 25 years, not only will one-third of our population be found in the States, as at present, but the majority will be there. There will be a temptation for them who are not of a British origin, who do not make such a great difference between Americans and Englishmen, there would be a temptation for them to say that they would just as well like to have Washington for their headquarters as London. Would it not be a temptation for them to say that they saw more convenience, and, perhaps, more advantage, in having their metropolis at Washington than across the ocean? I do not say that we have any such desire, I do not say that we even think of annexation, but I say that if the present situation continues for a long time, certainly there will be temptation toward a political change. If we are true patriots, if we desire the Provinces to remain united, we should adopt some means to prevent the disintegration of this Dominion. I say, Sir, that the best means of obtaining such a result is to improve our trade relations by commercial reciprocity with the United States. Certainly we cannot say that the National Policy has been a success in this country; I cannot say it has been a success in the Province of Quebec. In the city of Montreal, perhaps, some new industries have been established, and perhaps in a few other places; but I would not say that even in the city of Quebec the manufacturing industries have been promoted by protection. There are natural industries in the city of Quebec that live by themselves, they are established on solid foundations, and reciprocity would not affect them in any way. There are also, perhaps, a few manufactures in the city of St. Hyacinthe, and I know that my hon. friend who represents that county will support the motion of the hon. member for South Oxford. But, Sir, where are the manufactures in the rural constituencies of the Province of Quebec. When that policy was inaugurated we were promised that it would not only benefit Montreal, that it would not only benefit three or four cities in the Province of Quebec, but it was to benefit the whole Province. Where is the increase of population? Where is the decrease in the immigration of our countrymen? There is none. Where are the promised industries in the rural constituencies? There are none. I say the situation is worse than it was ten years ago. The people naturally look for a change in order to better their actual position. This agitation was commenced in the Province of Ontario, and it has not been carried to the same extent in Quebec. Yet the echos of that agitation have reached us, it has reached all the Canadian homes, it has reached all the fathers who have seen more than half of their families leaving their home for the neighboring republic. I have visited a certain number of localities in my constituency, and when I have spoken of reciprocity, I have pleased the people immensely. They recollect the prosperity we enjoyed when we had a partial measure of reciprocity before. They know that reciprocity means about 20 per cent. increase in the value of their products; they know that if they have horses, cattle, oats, potatoes, poultry, hay, lumber, to sell, they will get for all these articles at least 20 per cent. more. They know it from experience. Now, Sir, it is said that farmers do not pay anything of that taxation in the way of duty. I think it is easy to show that they pay an enormous taxation. I will only give an example on that point. I will take the counties near the St. Lawrence River—Champlain, Montmagny, Berthier and Laprairie—in which counties the people produce a large quantity of hay. It is not unusual for some farmers to sell as much as 100 tons of hay in a year. Many of the farmers in the Province of Quebec have sold their hay in the United States, in fact it may be said that the hay of the Province generally goes to the States. A farmer who ships a hundred tons of hay has to pay a duty of $100. If a farmer, sends a horse there worth $100 he has to pay $20; on $200 worth of cattle he is compelled to pay $40. If he sells three hundred bushels of potatoes, which is not an excessive quantity, the duty will amount to $45. Let me say here that the farmers understand who has to pay the duty. I will not say more on the point, except that I am satisfied that a farmer of average circumstances will pay $300 a year duties on products shipped to the United States. Our geographical position also impells us to the adoption of this policy. Grant that our facilities of commerce are equal to the demand, although I do not think that they are at the present time, for neither the Canadian Pacific Railway nor the Intercolonial answer the demands of commerce, the people of the Maritime Provinces could not trade with any advantage with the people of the North West or British Columbia, and not even with the people of Ontario. I might go further, and say that although there is plenty of flour to be purchased in Ontario, yet in spite of the tariff wall erected, the Province of Quebec, not further back than 1886, brought over $400,000 worth of flour in the United States, paying a duty of $51,000. On some occasions Quebec has not been able to raise sufficient breadstuffs for her people, and on those occasions she has found it more advantageous to deal with the States than with the neighboring Province of Ontario. Is it not, moreover, a fact that Ontario buys a large quantity of coal from the State of Pennsylvania? It will be unnecessary for me to discuss at length the interests of the fishermen in this question, for they have able advocates here; yet I may say that the fishermen of the Maritime Provinces find it more advantageous to deal with the New England States, and the Americans are their best customers even in spite of a tariff of 30 per cent. In regard to the lumber interests, we have heard the statement of gentlemen of experience and who are engaged in that business, and while it will be needless for me to go over the ground again, I may remark that the farmers of Quebec are highly interested because they have yet large tracts of forest, and when they clear their lands they have to destroy good timber, and if they could obtain a fair return for the timber they would be largely benefited. The adoption of such a policy as is proposed might, perhaps, be disadvantageous to the manufacturers of Montreal, and perhaps to two or three small places, but the majority of the people, the great bulk of the people, would derive immense benefit from such a policy. It seems now as if this country is to be administered for the benefit of a small minority of its inhabitants. Everybody will admit that if the rural portion of the country were in a prosperous condition, if the farmers were prosperous, the laborers and mechanics who live among them would also be prosperous; and if all those classes were prosperous, certainly the country merchants would be prosperous, and if they were prosperous surely the city and wholesale merchants would also be prosperous. Thus the whole country would immensely benefit by the introduction of such a policy. I am satisfied that the objections made to this proposition will disappear if the right hon. gentleman who leads the Government chose to advocate such a measure, and not one out of 25 of his supporters would fail to follow him, in fact they would all fall into line very quickly. The Premier would earn the gratitude of almost the whole people of Canada if he were to confer such a boon on this country. I go further, and say that in regard to political power—and we are not interested in saying this—if the hon. gentleman would advocate that cause and carried it to a successful conclusion he would secure power for himself and his friends for the remainder of his life, which I hope will be a long one. But even supposing it had not that result, but that his friends and supporters who are the manufacturers and monopolists of the country should turn against him and forget past favors, suppose that they should not support him any longer, which is most improbable and almost impossible, nevertheless the carrying of such a policy to a successful conclusion would be a glorious ending to his career. The hon. gentleman would certainly acquire a name and fame unequalled in this country. And, Sir, he would follow an example which he need not disdain. He would follow the example of another Tory—an English Tory—whose name is cherished in the old country, he would follow the example of Sir Robert Peel. When the corn laws were abolished in 1846 by the Imperial Parliament. Sir Robert Peel uttered some memorable words to which I will draw the attention of the hon. gentleman, Sir Robert Peel said at that time:

“I shall leave a name execrated I know by every monopolist who will maintain protection for his own individual benefit, but it may be that I shall leave a name sometimes breathed with expressions of good will in the abodes of those whose lot it is to labor and to earn their daily bread by the sweat of their brow; when they shall recruit their exhausted strength with abundant and untaxed food, the sweeter, because it is in no longer leavened by a sense of injustice.”

Those noble words have not found any echo on the Treasury benches of this House for ten years, yet, Sir, it is better late than never. Now, Sir, I will answer to another objection which is made. It is said, and truly said, that we cannot make that treaty alone. It is said that we have to obtain the consent of the other contracting party, but I may say this that there are in the neighboring country some advocates of this proposition, and that we should not for a moment be discouraged if we meet with some difficulties, because we are assured that this cause which we now advocate will be beneficial to both countries and it ought to carry victory in the end. If we do not succeed as soon as we would like to, yet we will triumph in the end if we are like the men of the Corn Law League in England. If we work with patriotism for the good of this country, if we work with the same energy as men like the Cobdens, the Brights, the Villiers and others have worked when they decided they would have free trade in England; if we work as those men did we are sure to carry victory, and, Sir, if we do not carry victory to-day, and if our present efforts result only in a simple expression of opinion, yet it still be a step—a great step—in the right direction.

Mr. McNEILL moved the adjournment of the debate. Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to; and House adjourned at 11:55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 19th March, 1888.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a certificate of the election and return of Henry Corby, Esq., for the Electoral District of the West Riding of the County of Hastings.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 46) to amend the Acts relating to the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Scarth.)

FOOD ADULTERATION ACT.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 47) to amend the Adulteration Act, chapter one hundred and seven of the Revised Statutes of Canada. He said: This alteration is chiefly in consequence of a ruling by Judge Dugas, of Montreal, that baking powder is not an article of food. Some baking powders are positively injurious, and prosecutions to prevent their sale cannot be successful without this amendment. It would also enable samples to be taken in wholesale stores of chicory, pepper dust, and other adulterants, and, perhaps, lead to preventing their sale. The object of this amendment is to qualify as analysts before the courts the members of the examining board who are appointed by the Government to examine as to the qualifications of applicants for the position of public analysts. The present examiners are Dr. Girdwood, Professor Marsan and the chief analyst, and it seems only reasonable that their position should in no respect be inferior to that of the candidates who may pass their examination. The assistants to the chief analyst appointed by the Government must undergo the same examination as the public analysts, and they are equally well qualified to appear in court and give evidence. This amendment authorises Council to appoint special collectors in addition to those indicated by the Act. The latter being generally resident where the samples are collected, are well known to vendors of food, &c., in the same place, and may not succeed in getting fair samples of the goods actually sold. Should Council appoint special inspectors, they would travel over such a wide area that they would not be readily recognisable. This alteration is for the purpose of effecting a division of labor in examining the various samples collected; for as drugs and fertilisers are so numerous and varied that it is impossible for any one analyst to keep himself informed regarding the composition and adulterations of all of them, and to be thoroughly practiced and skilful in their examination. New methods for this are being continually proposed and adopted, and new literature is continually being published regarding the various branches. If it were made possible for each analyst to confine his reading, his analyses and researches to one department of the science, he would become much more skilful and experienced in it than his fellows, and his word would have the greater value. There are eight public analysts, besides the chief analyst and his two assistants. This staff might be made much more efficient by each member of it having his attention confined to the examination of only a certain class of the substances referred to in the Act, and it is to make this possible that the amendment has been framed. There are many substances liable to adulteration which are not included under foods, drugs and fertilisers. Soap, soda and white lead may be mentioned as instances of such articles which might be subjected to inspection as soon as any Order in Council issued to that effect.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 48) further to amend the law respecting Procedure in Criminal Cases. He said: Last Session an Act was passed making final the decisions of the courts of this country in criminal matters, and it has been considered expedient to define more exactly and precisely than was done by that Act that the provision pertains to appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council. The present Bill, therefore, merely amends the short Act adopted last Session by introducing these words:

No appeal shall be brought in any criminal case from any judgment or authority or order of any court in Canada to any Court of Appeal by which in the United Kingdom appeals or petitions to Her Majesty in Council may be heard.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LIABILITY OF CARRIERS BY WATER.

Mr. MADILL moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 49) to amend the Act respecting the liability of Carriers by Water. He said: The Bill is one in the interests of the settlers on islands and coasts depending upon common carriers by water for mails, provisions and supplies. It is introduced for the purpose of preventing common carriers from refusing to carry the freights, provisions and supplies along the routes, and land passengers at the advertised rates, and imposing a penalty for any infraction of the rules or any discrimination against the settlers.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS REGARDING PUBLIC PAPERS.

Mr. TROW. Before the Orders of the Day are read, I wish to make a suggestion in reference to the unusual demands which are made throughout the country for copies of Hansard. I think there is scarcely any member of the House who has not received applications for copies of the Debates containing the interesting debate which is now in progress. I question whether there has been a debate since Confederation which has attracted more attention throughout the Dominion. The distributor has received communications from members of Congress and others in the United States, asking for copies of the Debates; and I think that while the type is standing, very reasonable terms could be made with the printer for an extra number of copies for distribution. The whole country is interested in this debate, and I hope the Minister who has charge of the matter will allow a few more thousand copies to be printed for circulation. It is utterly impossible to supply at present the number of people who are applying daily, not merely for the speeches on one side, but those on both sides. It might be well to have the whole of the speeches compiled at the close of the debate in pamphlet form.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to enquire of the Government when some further papers, which seem to be exceedingly important in connection with the Fishery Treaty, are going to be brought before the House? I have in my hand what purports to be a copy of some papers which have been laid before the British Parliament by the British Government; and among them I find a very important document which I do not think this Parliament has seen yet. It is the instructions of Lord Salisbury to the commissioners. We have already had laid before the House the powers from the British Government to the plenipotentiaries; but I find there was issued on the same date, the 24th October last, very important instructions from Lord Salisbury to the commissioners. You will remember that the powers which were laid before the House referred to the plenipotentiaries' dealings with "all or any questions relating to rights of fishery," "and any other questions which may arise which the respective plenipotentiaries may be authorised by their Government to consider and adjust." Now, there is nothing in the papers which have been so far laid before the House, to show that the plenipotentiaries were authorised to consider or adjust anything but the matters relating to the rights of the fisheries. However, I find from these instructions of Lord Salisbury that there were special powers given to the commissioners outside of the fishery question. Here is one clause of these instructions:

"Whilst I have judged it advisable thus, in the first place, to refer to the question of the fisheries of the Atlantic coast, it is not the wish of Her Majesty's Government that the discussions of the plenipotentiaries should necessarily be confined to that point alone; but full liberty is given to you to enter upon the consideration of any questions which may bear upon the issues involved, and to discuss and treat for any equivalents, whether by means of tariff concessions or otherwise, which the United States plenipotentiaries may be authorised to consider as a means of settlement."

Now, it must be apparent how very important this document is to the discussion of the very question which is now before Parliament, and I am sure it is a great slight cast upon this Parliament by the Government and those entrusted —

Mr. SPEAKER. I wish the hon. gentleman to limit himself to his question, stating what papers he wants and what importance these papers are for the conduct of the business of this House. I have already drawn the attention of hon. members to the fact that these questions ought not to be made the occasion of a speech, and I must see that the rule is respected.

Mr. EDGAR. I bow to your decision, Sir. I only wish to point out that whereas those matters have been laid before the English Parliament, they should at the earliest moment be laid before this House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. If the hon. gentleman had limited himself to that remark, I would have answered him at once. The attention of the First Minister will be called to the hon. gentleman's remarks as soon as he comes in.

Mr. LAURIER. My hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Trow) made recently a suggestion which I think we ought to carry out, with regard to a larger publication of this debate. There is no doubt a very large demand for further copies of the speeches in this debate on reciprocity. I do not know that the Government can do anything, but it would be well to call the attention of the Debates Committee to this matter, and suggest that they might see their way to have a larger number of copies printed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As the hon. gentleman has said, this matter is not in the hands of the Government, and this Parliament had decided before that a certain number of the debates should be printed each day and distributed. The debate on this subject was not foreseen, and the House did, therefore, not see fit to order an additional number of copies. The debate has now gone on for three days, and I suppose a complete edition would be required. Of course, if the Printing Committee think proper to move in the matter, they may take it up at the next sitting.

Mr. TROW. I understand the type is not distributed, and, consequently, the whole debate can be put in print again at a very reasonable figure, which it could not be after the type is distributed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The attention of the Committee is called to it, and no doubt they will take the matter up.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) With the kind permission of the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate (Mr. McNeill), I wish to make a short personal explanation with reference to the charge brought against me by the hon. gentleman who followed me in this debate (Mr. Foster), concerning my action upon the resolution before the House. I had not the opportunity of hearing the speech of the hon. the Minister of Marine (Mr. Foster), as I was not in the House when it was delivered, nor did I see the report of his speech until Saturday. Otherwise I would have taken opportunity to make my explanation before this. In his remarks, the hon. gentleman charged me with having, in this House, advocated the resolution submitted by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), although a few months ago I had denounced, in the most severe terms, the policy it embodies. The hon. gentleman made this charge, based on a quotation from a newspaper report, assuming the report to be correct, and argued from this that I could not be sincere or honest in the opinions I have expressed in this House. I desire to say that there is no foundation whatever for the charge made by the hon. gentleman. I desire to say that the remarks I made in this House in support of the resolution of my hon. friend for South Oxford, are not at all at variance with the position I took and the remarks I made before the Charlottetown Board of Trade.

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman is in order if he is speaking to the amendment before the House, but otherwise he is not.

Mr. DAVIES. I am speaking with the kind permission of the hon. gentleman who moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. BOWELL. My hon. friend, Mr. McNeill, has no power to give that permission, and I maintain the hon. gentleman is not in order unless he is speaking to the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a personal explanation I am making.

Mr. BOWELL. It is not. It is an answer to a speech delivered in reply to the hon. gentleman, and the hon. gentleman is now combatting the argument presented to this House by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. SPEAKER. These personal explanations are usually allowed, because they partake of the nature of questions of privilege. If an hon. member rises to deny that he made certain statements imputed to him during a debate, he is allowed to do so, but he ought to limit himself to a formal denial. He must not proceed to deliver a speech on the subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would have taken the opportunity, which is often taken by hon. gentlemen, of rising to make an explanation when the Orders of the Day were called, but I understood from your remarks, Sir, the other day that such was not considered to be the proper course; and I am not going to take up any time and my hon. friend has kindly given way to me.

Mr. McNEILL. I simply understood my hon. friend to say that he wished to make merely a personal explanation.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is right. I desire simply to make a personal explanation that I had not previously the opportunity of making, with reference to the very serious charge brought up against me of inconsistency by the hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. That hon. gentleman, quoting from a summary report of the proceedings before the Charlottetown Board of Trade, which appeared in a Conservative paper, and in which I am set down as having said, that unrestricted reciprocity is impracticable and impossible, and that the Americans were not such arrant fools as to grant it, and taking this report as correct, proceeded to ask what weight, could be attached to any arguments I might use in this House in favor of unrestricted reciprocity, after that statement I had made before the Board of Trade of Charlottetown, a few months ago denouncing any such policy. The hon. gentleman said:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade—"

Mr. FOSTER. I never said that.

Mr. DAVIES. I am reading the quotation which the hon. gentleman read.

Mr. FOSTER. Why did you not say so?

Mr. DAVIES. That is what I intended to convey. I was reading the quotation on which the hon. gentleman based his statement:

"Unrestricted reciprocity would differ from commercial union in this respect: that while under it there would be perfectly free trade between the two countries, each country would retain the right to frame its own tariff as against the rest of the world. Canada, for instance, might have a 25 per cent. tariff, while that of the United States might be one of 35 per cent. The immediate consequence would be that imports to the United States, instead of being carried to the great ports of the United States, would be taken to the States by way of Montreal. To this the States, whose people are not arrant fools, would never consent. An unrestricted reciprocity, although it would suit us as well as commercial union, was, therefore, impracticable."

That was the quotation. Now, I did not make use of such language as is here reported. I used that language with a very strongly pronounced and distinct qualification, which was clearly understood when I stated it. The board of trade were discussing several proposals for obtaining free trade relations with the United States. Some were in favor of commercial union, and some in favor of the scheme known as unrestricted reciprocity. A portion expressed their desire to have the freest trade relations between Canada and the United States that could be obtained, similar to the freedom of trade which existed between State and State, so that there should be no custom houses on the border, and that not only the United States goods should be passed free, but that all goods, whether they were manufactured in Canada or in the United States or abroad, should be passed free. These same people wished also to retain, if possible, in the hands of Canada the right to maintain our tariff and to regulate it as we pleased. In answer to that, I told them that such a scheme of unrestricted reciprocity was impracticable and impossible, that if Canada retains a tariff of 25 per cent., and the United States a tariff of 35 per cent., and you have no custom houses between the two countries, the whole of the importations will naturally come into that part of the country which has the least tariff, and that the country to the south of us which has the higher tariff would not be such arrant fools as to assent to any such arrangement.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) That is cheered. That is common sense and plain fact, and what I said then I repeat in this House, and I say that the proposition which we have now before us is not that proposition.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Go on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I hardly think, Mr. Speaker, that this interruption is quite fair.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Go on.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I say that the proposition which is now before the House, made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), does not contain the only objection and the fatal objection which I then pointed out, and which I said would render the scheme impracticable, and I simply desire in closing to say that, before the Charlottetown Board of Trade, I moved a resolution at the close of the debate which shows pretty clearly what I intended, what I was understood to say, and what I did say, although, in the Conservative paper from which my hon. friend quotes, I am not as fully reported as I ought to have been. I moved:
Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.)

"That this board warmly approves of reciprocal free trade with the United States on the broadest possible basis, including the abolition of the restriction on the coasting trade and the transfer of vessel property, and embracing the concession to the Americans of the common right with our fishermen to use our fisheries."

That was the statement I made there, and the statement which I repeat again.

Mr. FOSTER. I have only to thank the hon. gentleman for calling my attention to this, and for the lucid explanation he has made of his own words. I do not think it requires any more remarks from me.

RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

House resumed adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Sir Richard Cartwright:

That it is highly desirable that the largest possible freedom of commercial intercourse should obtain between the Dominion of Canada and the United States, and that it is expedient that all articles manufactured in, or the natural products of either of the said countries should be admitted free of duty into the ports of the other, (articles subject to duties of excise or of internal revenue alone excepted). That it is further expedient that the Government of the Dominion should take steps at an early date to ascertain on what terms and conditions arrangements can be effected with the United States for the purpose of securing full and unrestricted reciprocity of trade therewith.

And the motion of Mr. Foster in amendment:

That Canada in the future, as in the past, is desirous of cultivating and extending Trade relations with the United States in so far as they may not conflict with the policy of fostering the various interests and industries of the Dominion which was adopted in 1870 and has since received in so marked a manner the sanction and approval of its people.

Mr. McNEILL. As I understand that many hon. members desire to take part in this debate, I shall endeavor to make the remarks I desire to make to the House as short as possible. In the first instance, I think we may all feel satisfied to know that, for once in the history of this Parliament at least, all parties in this House are agreed upon one point—the Liberal-Conservative party on this side of the House; the Rouge party, which I hope I may say without offence, is more particularly represented by the courteous and eloquent and able gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House; the Grit party, led by the hon. gentleman the member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright); the Parti-National, marshalled under the baton of the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot); the Politico-Philosophical party, if I may so express it, of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); the Insular party, so solid and firm in its allegiance to the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Davies); the party of Pure Political Principle, so worthily led by the hon. member for West Ontario (Mr. Edgar); the party of Detraction, of which, alas, the great leader fell in the general engagement of last year, but which is properly represented by his old supporter and lieutenant, the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton); the party of Political Morality, that great party which two Sessions ago so many hon. members opposite sought to lead that I should not then have dared to discriminate among them, but which I think I may, without offence to any one else, say, is now in this House under the worthy command of the hon. member for Gleggarry (Mr. Purcell) and his not less distinguished friend the hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Cook); and last, but not least, the great party of one, which my hon. friend, the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), delights to call the Third party, but which I think most hon. members of this House would call the first party, because I am sure my hon. friend himself would admit that he, at all events, would call it a No. 1 party. We may congratulate ourselves that all these great parties are united upon one subject, are agreed upon one point, that it would be greatly to the advantage of Canada if we could obtain freer commercial relations, freer trade relations with the United States. For years past, the people of the United States have kept up a great tariff wall against us. Over and over again we have entreated them to take it down, and they have just as often refused. And why have they so refused? The hon. member who moved this resolution (Sir Richard Cartwright) has told us. He has told us that they so refused to take down that tariff wall because they wished to punish the people of Canada. He has told us so in these words—he repeated the same statement before this House—but this is what he said at Ingersoll:

“We know that the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854 was abolished not so much because it was injurious to the United States, for on the whole both parties profited by it, as because they wanted to punish us for the sympathy some of us had displayed with the South during the rebellion.”

It is true that the people of Canada—and we would have supposed, perhaps, that they were within their rights in sympathising with whomsoever they pleased—it is true that the people of Canada did sympathise at that time with the weaker side, and I think it is a somewhat interesting little bit of information that we now have from the hon. gentleman who asks us to hand ourselves over, body and bones, to the tender mercies of those same people, that the people of Canada were deliberately punished by those people because they ventured to sympathise with the South in their struggle for independence, I think, Sir, that is a little bit of information which the voters of Canada may very well mark, learn and inwardly digest. But I believe the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct in his information. At the same time I wish to call attention to the fact that this is not the only reason why this great tariff wall has been upbuilt against us. It is not merely for the purpose of punishing the people of Canada; it is also for the purpose of coercing the people of Canada. It is a matter of history that this treaty was abrogated by the United States, this great tariff wall was raised up against the people of this country, for the purpose of coercing the people of Canada into annexation. Now, lest any hon. member on the other side of the House ventures to controvert that statement, I will take occasion to read from the utterance of the great apostle of this movement, Mr. Wiman, and you will see that he endorses what I have said. After alluding to the U. E. Loyalists, he says:

“I have alluded to them because there is a tendency in the American mind to feel that isolation and the refusal to admit Canada to the privileges of the market of the United States, will have the effect of forcing them into a humble position as applicants for a political alliance. Doubtless the repeal of the Reciprocity Treaty in 1868 was largely influenced by this consideration.”

Then, in answer, apparently, by anticipation, to observations which have since been put forward, by hon. gentlemen opposite, he goes on to say:

“But it had an effect entirely contrary—”

You will observe, these hon. gentlemen tell us that it is having that effect, and that so soon as we do away with trade restrictions, this annexation feeling, which they allege to exist in the country, will subside. He goes on:

“But it had an effect entirely contrary to that which was expected, and to-day there is not in the wide world a country more loyal in its sentiments than is Canada to British connection.”

Now, these are the statements of Mr. Wiman on that point, and I venture to think that it is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the bearing of this fact upon the discussion which is now proceeding in this House. I think it is essential that every hon. member in this House should bear in view the fact that this tariff has been imposed against the people of Canada by the United States, partly to punish them, and partly to coerce them into annexation. Mr. Wiman, as I have said, tells us that there are people in the United States who still hope to succeed in their attempt to coerce the people of Canada into annexation by these means, and hon. gentlemen opposite encourage these people in that opinion; hon. gentlemen opposite tell these people that if they only continue to maintain this tariff against the people of Canada, they will succeed in their end and object, and coerce us into annexation. We have heard that statement from almost every hon. member who has addressed this House during this debate. Mr. Speaker, I venture to think that the men of Canada are not made of such slight elements. I challenge hon. gentlemen opposite to bring this statement to the test of fact. I challenge them to take any constituency in the Province of Ontario—they may select a favorable occasion for the election—and bring out their candidate on the annexation platform, and try out the question before the people. No, Sir, they will not accept that challenge. But I do not want to be misunderstood; I do not want hon. gentlemen to think that I suggest to them to risk the loss of a seat in this honorable House by any such trial as this. No, what I propose to them is that they should select the most favorable constituency in Ontario, and endeavor to elect their candidate on the annexation platform for the high office of pound-keeper, and I venture to tell them that they cannot do it and they know it well.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. Who is talking annexation?

Mr. McNEILL. But it would seem that hon. gentlemen are desirous of educating their party up to the annexation standpoint. Every speech that has been delivered from that side of the House heretofore, in this debate, bears upon the face of it, the signs and tokens of such a desire.

Mr. SOMERVILLE. It is not so.

Mr. McNEILL. The hon. gentleman says it is not so. The hon. gentleman who moved this resolution told the people of Canada that Great Britain was but little able to help them; he told us that Great Britain was isolated, friendless and alone. Sir, I do not intend to discuss that question with the hon. gentleman now, it is rather a large issue. But I will do the hon. gentleman the justice to say that I believe he was fully persuaded of the accuracy of what he said, or he would not have made that statement. Well, all I have to observe on the subject is that his having made that statement, believing it to be true, shows that he has given very superficial consideration to the subject. What did the hon. gentleman tell us next? He told us that the people of Canada were under no obligation to England. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if the people of Canada do not owe to Great Britain their existence to-day as a great and free people. I would like to ask him if they do not owe all their rights and privileges as freemen to Great Britain. But, Sir, I will not answer the hon. gentleman in any words of my own; I will answer him in the words of a Canadian whose name, I am ashamed to say, at the present moment, I forget:

“Britain bore us in her flank,
Britain nursed us at our birth,
Britain reared us to our rank,
Mid the nations of the earth.”

“In the hour of fear and dread,
In the gathering of the storm,
Britain raised above our head,
Her broad shield and stalwart arm.”

“Stand, Canadians, firmly stand,
Round the flag of fatherland!”

But, Sir, I prefer to leave the statement of the hon. gentleman to be determined upon by the great universal conscience of the people of Canada. And then having so far paved the way the hon. gentleman went a step forward and he told us that we would be better off if we cast in our lot with the people of the United States. That was not anything in the nature of a proposition for annexation—Oh, no! nothing of the kind; that was not leading up to annexation, as the hon. gentleman says; but he told us that, nevertheless. He took care, however, Mr. Speaker, to guard himself against the indignation of the people of this country by immediately adding that he did not want to cast in his lot with the people of the United States. My hon. friend who addressed the House a moment ago, if I mistake not, had some enthusiastic utterances in his speech somewhat tending in the same direction; and the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) had a passage in his speech in which he drew a glowing picture of what would happen when the two British peoples of this continent were united together. That has nothing to do with annexation either. The hon. member for South Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us that for his part he thought it would make little difference on which side of the line a man happened to reside, for the people were one and the same. And that also has nothing at all to do with annexation. The hon. gentleman who spoke last in the debate, the hon. member for Drummond and Arthabaska (Mr. Lavergne) drew attention to the fact, and seemed to dwell with special unction upon it, that Washington was on this side of the Atlantic and that London was on the other side of the Atlantic, and he said that the people of Canada might think that perhaps the nearer metropolis was the more convenient of the two. But he, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. gentleman who led this debate, took care to guard himself immediately by saying that he hoped they would not do anything of the kind. Now, I do not wish to be misunderstood. I do not wish to be understood as alleging that any of these gentlemen desire annexation; but I do wish distinctly to say, that their speeches show that they are well aware, and they are pressed down with the consciousness that if we adopt the policy which they suggest, we run an enormous risk of annexation, and they endeavor to minimise the evils of annexation which they know in their hearts the vast, the overwhelming majority of their own supporters utterly disapprove. But Sir, if there be any direct proof of the statement I have just made required, I have it here. My hon. friend who addressed the House with such eloquence on Friday night referred to this statement, but I wish, with the kind permission of the House, to read again the ominous words addressed by the hon. member for South Oxford to the people of Ingersoll last October. He said:

"There is no doubt whatever in my mind, also, that we cannot overlook the risk that does undoubtedly arise, that increased commercial intercourse with the United States may strengthen the hands of those who desire to see our political system absorbed in theirs."

And he further goes on to say:

"I have no hesitation in saying, frankly, that if the United States are willing to deal with us on equitable terms the advantages to both countries, and especially to us, are so great that scarcely any sacrifice is too severe to secure them. I am as averse as any man can be to annexation, or to resign our political independence, but I cannot shut my eyes to the facts. We have greatly misused our advantages, we have been foolish in our expenditures, we have no means of satisfying the just demands of large portions of the Dominion, except through such an arrangement as commercial union."

You see, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman at that time used the expression "commercial union" as synonymous with that of unrestricted reciprocity. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think we have got the situation clear. This is just where we stand, and the people have for some time suspected it. This tariff is kept up against the people of this country, partly to punish them for daring to sympathise with the South in their struggle for independence, partly to coerce them into annexation, and the hon. gentleman opposite who moved this resolution has himself told us that we run an enormous risk if we adopt his own policy of putting into the hands of the United States the power to coerce us into annexation. That, I say, is just where we stand, and the people of the country have suspected it for some time. Now, Sir, they are fully agreed with Mr. Mowat, the Premier of this Province, when he says that British connection has been for Canada unmixed good; but they are not at all sure that the immersion of 5,000,000 of the people of Canada in 55,000,000 or 60,000,000 of the people of the United States would mean anything else than the submersion, the hopeless and absolute submersion of Canadian interests, and they are at the same time perfectly satisfied that for very many reasons indeed it would be anything in the world but unmixed good. And, therefore, they do not sympathise with this movement to the degree in which we have been informed they do by hon. gentlemen opposite. But there is another reason why they do not sympathise with this movement. They are weak enough to have some respect for that altogether illogical and indefensible thing called sentiment, and they carry that weakness so far as actually to prefer their own country to the United States, and to prefer the members of their own family to foreigners, all of which is pure sentiment and, therefore, foolishness; but we must simply take matters as we find them. The people of Canada are, in my opinion, growing very suspicious indeed of this movement which has so strangely been inaugurated by persons in the United States, a new and entirely unheard-of movement on their part, urging Canada to enter into closer trade relations with them—I say they look upon that movement with some degree of suspicion, because they found that in the first shape it took that of commercial union—that has now been abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite and repudiated by them—the people found that it was, in point of fact, simply a thinly disguised attempt upon the part of those persons in the United States to accomplish, by "slyly climbing into the branches," what the people of the United States have themselves told us they had failed to accomplish by violently shaking the tree: in other words, Sir, they have come to the conclusion that this movement in favor of commercial union was simply an attempt on the part of the people of the United States to obtain the mastery and control of our trade, commerce and finances. Therefore, while they have always been ready and while they are ready now, as the Statute-book shows, to enter into arrangements pointing towards more intimate commercial dealings with the people of the United States, they look upon this particular movement in favor of it with a very great deal of suspicion indeed, having already as they conceive discovered under it a dangerous conspiracy against the commercial and the political independence of Canada. Now, Sir, the people of Canada are, I believe, perfectly ready to enter into a fair bargain with the people of the United States for reciprocal trading relations with them, but I think they are very unwilling to enter into a bargain with the people of the United States which shall be an unfair bargain for Canada, and they are still more unwilling to enter into an arrangement which shall be dictated exclusively by the people of the United States, and the terms and conditions of which shall be arranged exclusively for the benefit of that people. The last bargain of this kind which we had with the United States was, it seems to me, a pretty fair bargain for them. My hon. friend told us on Friday night that that bargain resulted to them in a balance of trade to the extent of more than $20,000,000. Those figures which my hon. friend quoted were the American figures, but the figures given by the Hon. George Brown were not "twenty millions and a little over" but ninety-five millions and a half. The Hon. George Brown maintained that the United States had had the advantage in that bargain to the extent of $95,500,000. Now, the probability is that the truth in this case, as usual, is to be found in the mean between those extremes. But, at all events, I think we must see that that was a pretty fair bargain for the people of the United States. They had a pretty good share of whatever was to be gained by that transaction, and so much was it so, that we find that the people of Nova Scotia and the people of New Brunswick considered that the United States had got very much the better of that bargain, and they complained of its pressing upon themselves unduly. Now, then, what do we find to-day? We find that the people of the United States tell us plainly that they will not enter into any such arrangement with us again; they tell us plainly that that bargain was far too favorable for us, and that it was not favorable enough for them. I think that the people of Canada, at all events, have got pretty fair warning, and that warning from the people of the United States themselves, who tell us that the bargain which gave them an advantage to the extent of from twenty to ninety-five millions of dollars was not nearly favorable enough for them and was far too favorable for us. It seems to me, therefore, that the people of Canada may very readily see that if they are to have closer trade relations with the United States they must expect to pay pretty dear for their whistle. But, Sir, we are told that there is one class of the people of Canada who are to be enormously benefited by the bargain. The bargain calls upon us to give up our protective policy. The people of Canada require protection against the United States just as much as the people of the United States ever required protection against England. No people ever required protection for their young industries more than the people of Canada do to-day, but we are told that we are to give that protection up as a portion of the bargain. We are told that at least one class of the community will benefit, and that class the one to which I have had the honor to belong ever since I came to Canada, sixteen years ago—the farming class; and more especially the Ontario farmers are, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, to be benefited by this arrangement. Now, Sir, if I am not wearying the House, if I am not taking up too much time I would—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. McNEILL—I would just like to investigate for a moment the statement that the Ontario farmer is to be so enormously benefited by free interchange of farming produce with the people of the United States. Before I do so I will say, with the permission of the House, just one word in reference to the Canadian farmers generally. We have heard a great deal from the other side of the House about the desperate condition of indigence to which the Ontario farmers have been reduced, and in support of that assertion we have heard a great deal of the alleged fact that farming lands in Canada have deteriorated in value. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to make one observation with regard to that argument, and that is, that it is entirely beside the question. The mere fact that the values of farming lands have deteriorated, has nothing whatever to do with the question. It is perfectly well known, Sir, that owing to the vastly increased area of land throughout the world which has recently been brought under cultivation, and owing to the enormously increased means of communication, and the facilities for carrying the goods of the farm to the farming markets of the world, those markets have been overstocked in comparison to the condition in which they were a very few years ago. And, Sir, it is apparent that by reason of this there has been a depreciation in farming values just as, under similar circumstances, there would be a depreciation in manufacturing values; and when hon. gentlemen opposite tell us that in Canada we have in this matter the experience of all the rest of the world, I should like to know what it proves. It does not advance their case one iota. In this connection, Sir, we must remember that the farming lands of free trade England have depreciated to such an extent in the same time that the depreciation in the value of the farming lands of Canada—if there be any—is absolutely comparatively nothing. Although, in England we should have expected that the very opposite would be the case, because the supply of land is so limited and the demand is so great there. If hon. gentlemen wish to advance their case, if they want to make a point in this connection they must go on to show that the depreciation in value of Canadian lands has been greater in proportion than the depreciation in the other farming lands of the world, and they must show further that the farmer of Canada is in a worse position than the farmer in other parts of the world. It is very well known, Sir, to every hon. member of this House, that they have made no such attempt. It is very well known, to every hon. member of this House, that they have not attempted to grapple with the facts and figures adduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, and laid before the country by him some time ago, and adduced by my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior, and by my hon. friend who moved the address—facts and figures which prove conclusively and irrefutably that the condition of the farmer of Canada is vastly better, vastly more sound, than that of his neighbor in the United States. And, Sir, when we remember what the condition of the farmer is in free trade England, the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite becomes simply laughable, for the condition of the English farmer is pitiable in the extreme. But, Sir, to return to the point from which I diverted, what would the Ontario farmer gain, and what would he give, if we had a free exchange of farm products with the people of the United States? In the first place, Sir, I may say that when the people of the United States ask us to open our markets to them, and to expose our producers—I now speak of manufacturers and farmers alike—to all the weight and strain of competition with the accumulated wealth and resources of the fifty-five or sixty millions of people in the United States, they ask us, Sir, to do what, under similar circumstances, they never would have done themselves. They ask us to pursue a policy the very reverse of that which they have themselves pursued with such conspicuous success. And, Sir, if we had this free trade with the United States, the first thing that would stare the Ontario farmer in the face would be the fact that he had lost his home market by the closing down of our manufactories; and I think the Ontario farmer will begin now to see the value of the home market, from the statements that have been made with regard to the value of the home market in the United States—a home market which has been built up by the adoption of the very policy there which we have urged should be adopted here. But I was about to ask, what would the Ontario farmer gain, and what would he give? In the first place, Sir, we should have free entry for three of our staple products—our horses, our sheep and our barley. Those are the three principal products for which we should obtain a better market in the United States. And what should we give, Sir, in return? We should give to the people of the United States a free entry into our markets for their wheat, their coarse grains, their western corn, and their western pork. Now, I should like to ask hon. members if it is so very clear that the Ontario farmer would gain a great deal by that transaction? They had free entry for their wheat before, and I wonder if hon. members of this House have realised exactly what that amounted to. I confess I did not do so until I commenced to study the figures; but what I found in them positively startled me, Mr. Speaker. I found that during the five years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy we had imported into Canada from the United States, for home consumption, $31,000,000 worth of their wheat, whereas during the last five years, since the National Policy has been introduced, we imported only some $1,100,000 worth. In other words, the Ontario farmer has had the difference, $33,000,000, paid into his pocket for his own wheat sold in his own market, and he has thereby at the least saved the cost of transporting that wheat to the sea-board and then taking it across the Atlantic. And, Sir, if hon. members will only study the prices of wheat in Chicago and in Toronto respectively, they will find that the Ontario farmer gained a great deal more than that. But that is not all, I find, referring to the same periods, that in the last five years compared with the previous five years the Ontario farmer has had the advantage, so far as coarse grains and other breadstuffs are concerned, to the extent of $11,000,000. And, Sir, if we remember that, during those five years immediately preceding the National Policy, the quantity of coarse grains consumed in this country was very small indeed, compared with that which is consumed in the feeding of stock to-day, we shall see that this represents in a very small degree the advantage we have gained in this respect from the National Policy. Hon. gentlemen will remember the way in which the price of oats used to be brought down with a rush by the sending of American cheap oats into our market. And those who grew peas for sale a few years immediately preceding the introduction of the National Policy and immediately after, will know that the price of peas advanced under that policy very much indeed. And now, Sir, what about western pork? We all know that the market of the Canadian farmer for his pork was, prior to the introduction of the National Policy, depressed to the last degree. In one of those terrible years, 1878 or 1879, I knew very well an Ontario farmer who had to sell his pork for $2.50 per hundred. Now, free trade in farm produce means the free entry into our markets of western pork, and I want to know whether the destruction of the home market for pork will in any degree be compensated to the Ontario farmer by the greatly advanced price that he is going to obtain for those early spring chickens, you know, which he is to rear in the snows of January and February, to compete in the New York market with the fowls raised in the warmer latitudes of the United States. Now, Sir, just let us see the avalanche which hangs over the home market for Canadian pork to-day. The year before last, according to the last figures I have got, they exported, of bacon, $25,000,000; of ham, $5,250,000; of fresh pork, $4,400,000, and of salt pork, $20,750,000 worth. That points to a competition which the Ontario farmer may expect to meet when we have free trade in farm produce. And, Sir, he will have something more; he will have the advantage of seeing our markets flooded with oleomargarine, and butterine and bogus butter, and bogus butter oil. He will have these to his heart's content, to compete with the genuine butter manufactured by the wives, daughters and sisters of our Canadian farmers. More than that, he will have to compete in his own market with the cheaply-fed, with the corn-fed cattle of the United States; and more than that, he will find, in order to assist him in that competition, that his own cattle will be scheduled with the cattle of the United States and excluded from the markets of the mother country. Now, I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me that if the trade in farm produce would be to the advantage of the Ontario farmer—and I do not say that it might not—at all events, it would by no means be an unmixed blessing; and I think they will further agree with me when I say that if, for the privilege of introducing the produce of our farms into his market, we give the American the privilege of introducing the produce of his farm into ours, we shall have given him a very fair equivalent. Now, the question that the people of Canada have to ask themselves is: are they prepared to give a great deal more? The policy proposed to us demands that we shall give a great deal more. It demands that we shall admit American manufactures free; and that, in the opinion of the enormous majority of the manufacturers of this country, who are best able to judge, means practically, to a great extent, the annihilation of the manufacturing industries of this country, and the consequent destruction of the home market of the Ontario farmer. Are you prepared to throw that into the bargain too? But that is not the bargain, because we have to give something more; we have to lose seven millions of dollars directly, and millions of dollars indirectly, and we have to throw that into the bargain too. But that does not even yet represent the bargain. We have to do more, Sir; we have to give up the right to regulate our own tariff to suit our own needs; and the needs of a young country like Canada in that respect are, as we have been taught by the people of the United States themselves, very different indeed from the needs of an old-established and wealthy community like theirs. It is demanded of us that we shall exactly assimilate our tariff to theirs, and that, by their own admission, would be incalculably to the injury of a young country like Canada. We may ask, who is to regulate the tariff when changes require to be made? The hon. the Minister of the Interior has told us. The Americans themselves have told us through their newspapers, that their tariff is to be regulated by Congress; but I will waive that argument, and I will assume that they give us some kind of fair play and some representation in the body which is to regulate that tariff. What will that representation be? They are fifty-five or sixty million people, and we are five million people. If they should give us representation according to our population, in what condition would we be when those questions arise, which conflicting interests would certainly cause to arise, between the one party and the other? I say we should be in a helpless and hopeless condition of impotence and humiliation; we should be obliged to take whatever our good masters were kind enough to dole out to us. We have to throw that into the bargain, too. Sir, it is no bargain; it is national degradation and abject surrender. I say that, under such circumstances, our position would be absolutely unendurable; with our own hands we should have placed their heels upon our necks, and with our own suffrages we should have voted away our own independence. But that is not yet the bargain. We are told that, in order to carry out the terms of this precious contract, we must also discriminate in favor of American goods against the goods of the mother country: in other words, we are to sacrifice our sentiments and throw that sacrifice into the bargain, too. We are to cast down—aye, in scorn and derision to cast down—the impulses of the noblest element of humanity. Strike out sentiment from the nature of man, and, Sir, you at once dethrone and degrade him to the level of the brute creation. Where is the dividing line to be found, if it is not at sentiment? It is not at appetite, it is not at instinct, it is not even at reason. It is only to be found in the appreciation of the ethically beautiful, the great and the good. There alone is to be found the argument from nature for the existence of the human soul. There alone is to be found the argument from nature for our hopes of immortality. What, Sir, I would ask are these thoughts too deep for words which vainly beat about like sweet imprisoned birds in the dark cottage they inhabit? In the most sublime passage in English literature, the great master has compared these unutterable yearnings to the music of the spheres. He makes Lorenzo say:

“ Look how the floor of Heaven
Is thick inlaid with patines of bright gold.
There is not the smallest orb which thou behold'st,
But in his motion like an angel sings,
Still choiring to the young-eyed cherubim;
But, whilst this muddy vesture of decay
Doth grossly close it in, we cannot hear it.—

I would ask, what is that divine harmony? Is it sheer, unadulterated greed of gain? What is a good, a true, a noble man? Is he not a man who is actuated by good, and true, and noble sentiments and who lives up to them? The sentiment of Canada speaks out trumpet-tongued against the policy that is proposed to us by the hon. gentleman, and we are coolly requested to degrade, and to depress, and to stifle the highest impulses of our people, in order that that precious policy may be carried into effect. But, Sir, no. Why, we are told that is not the case. We are told, forsooth, that it will be to the advantage of the mother country to run the risk of the disruption of her Empire, because at some day—God only knows when—the people of Canada will become vastly better customers of hers than they ever were before. Well, all I can say with regard to that is, that the people of Canada are customers of the mother country to the extent per head of the population of $3.84, and the people of the United States are customers of the mother country to the extent of $1.83 per head of their population; and hon. gentlemen can decide the force of the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite for themselves. But, for my own part, speaking for myself, I say that this is “the most unkindest cut of all,” for it simply amounts to an attempt to betray the mother country with a kiss. But I would ask, why it is that we are called upon to commit this deed of imperishable infamy? The hon. gentleman gives you a reason. He tells you it is because we are broken, bankrupt, and going head over heels to destruction. Fortunately, the people of Canada can decide that question for themselves, without reference either to the hon. gentleman who makes the assertion or to any hon. member on this side of the House. They can decide that question for themselves by reference to men whose business it is to study the financial status of nations; men who do not care three straws whether it is the Hon. Edward Blake, or Mr. Laurier, or Sir Richard Cartwright, or Sir John A. Macdonald who has control of the destinies of this country; men who look at this from a purely business point of view; men who look at this matter with the cold, calculating eye of the man of the world who is trying to make money out of it. And what is their verdict? What is the verdict of the financiers of the world on this matter? Their verdict is, that the hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken. They not only do not agree with the hon. gentleman, but they say that the very reverse of what the hon. gentleman has said is the fact, and they back their opinion with their money, by lending us their money on terms which are much more favorable than those on which money was ever lent to Canada before. But we have another reason offered why we should follow out this precious policy, and what is it? I have referred to it once before, but I think it ought to be referred to in this House. This is the reason given to us by Mr. Wiman why we should adopt this policy. He says:

“When one recalls the 5,000 miles of coast line fishing privileges possessed by Canada, the limitless forests of timber, greatly needed by the United States, the exhaustless hills of iron ore, the copper, nickel and other minerals, the mountains of phosphates, the miles and miles of coal in close proximity to eastern manufacturing centres and western needs, the infinite variety of riches which God in His Providence has placed in these regions for the good of all mankind; and when one recalls that for the most part these are lying silent, dormant and dead, it needs only to turn and look into the earnest faces of the great nation on the borders of Canada to realise that the good Providence has also provided a people whose high mission it is to take these vast riches and most gratefully enjoy His bounty.”

That is the reason given to us by Mr. Wiman. Sir, the policy of the Liberal Conservative party, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman who has made the name of Canada famous throughout the world, has been a policy of construction, a policy of building up, a policy of binding together. The right hon. gentleman has sought to provide the people of Canada with the means of developing the vast resources of their country; the right hon. gentleman has sought also to soothe local jealousies, and to assuage old-time animosities; he has sought to teach the people of this country that the interests of races, and creeds, and industries, and classes, and Provinces are first and foremost of all Canadian interests; he has sought, in short, to build up a great Canadian nationality in North America, a nationality which shall at the same time be as truly and as thoroughly an integral part of the great British nation as the Welsh, or the Irish, or the Scotch, or the English nationality is. Surely that is a great and noble policy. Surely every true Canadian ought to strive to help it on. And the chief corner-stone of that policy has been the provision by which it is attempted to arrange that the Canadian manufacturer, the Canadian farmer—that Canadian industry, in fact, shall have the benefit of its own Canadian market; the provision that seeks to arrange, so far as possible at least, that the money which is paid for goods consumed in Canada shall not be conveyed out of Canada to the impoverishment of the country, but, as far as possible, shall remain in the country, to be re-invested in native industry and still further develop the resources of the country. Unrestricted reciprocity means blotting out, as with a sponge, all we have gained under that policy; it means, in the opinion of many men best able to judge, the transference of the commerce and the trade of the cities of Canada to the cities of the United States; it means the domination of our trade and commerce by the United States, the loss of our commercial and of our financial independence, and, in short, the subjugation of Canada by that people. And it means more still. It means, in my opinion at least, without one shadow or shade of doubt, the severance of those ties which unite us to the mother country and bind our Empire together. I would ask the French Canadian members of this House if they are prepared to support such a policy as that, if they think, that, under the new condition of things which would grow up under that policy, their own peculiar rights and privileges would be so very much more secure than they are to-day; and of the members of this House, irrespective of race, or class, or creed—aye, or of party too—I would ask, are you prepared to hold your grip upon your own Canada and to continue to develop her vast latent resources with the same courage and energy in the future as you have displayed in the past, and which in the last few years has won for you the admiration—yes, I may say without exaggeration, the wonder—of the civilised world? Are you prepared to join hands with those whose high policy it is to build up a Canadian nationality in North America, and at the same time to preserve and, if possible, consolidate the world-wide Empire to which we are heirs? Are you prepared, in the future as in the past, to take your stand, in sunshine and through storm, by the old land and the old flag, or, on the other hand, are you prepared to cast in your lot with those who, in the columns of their newspaper press, are, day by day, writing down British institutions, and deliberately and scandalously misrepresenting all that England does?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; never!

Mr. McNEILL. Are you prepared, at their instance, and by their advice, in craven fear, at the very moment of splendid victory, to surrender to the pressure of a policy which Canada has not only so long successfully resisted, but which, with native iron-energy and genius, she has converted into an instrument for her own good? Are you prepared, at the very moment when victory folds her pinions upon your banners, to haul down the flag of Canadian nationality and of Imperial fame and power? Are you prepared, at the instance of these men and by their advice, to lend a helping hand in the dismemberment of your own Empire?

Several hon. MEMBERS. Never, never!

Mr. McNEILL. Are you prepared even to risk it, as the hon. gentleman tells us you must do if you adopt his policy? Are the Commons of Canada prepared to do all this or to risk all this in order that the great nation on your southern border may, in the simple and graphic words of Mr. Wiman:

"Take—"

"Take," Mr. Speaker,—

"—the vast riches of our own native land, and most gratefully enjoy them."

What the Commons of Canada will do, Sir, I am well assured, and if hon. gentlemen opposite, not content with that verdict, dare to do as they now propose, dare to submit to the judgment of the people of this country a policy so unworthy, so suicidal and so base, right sure am I that from every city and town, from every hamlet and county, they will have for answer, swift and clear:

"Confound their politics;
Frustrate their knavish tricks;
On thee our hopes we fix,
God save the Queen."

Mr. JONES (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, the principle involved in the resolution now under the consideration of this House is so far-reaching in its character, and fraught with such tremendous interests to the future welfare of this country, that I do not feel inclined to let it go to a division without asking the attention of the House for a very short time while I offer a few observations on the subject. I feel under a considerable difficulty at rising to speak at this period of the debate, because the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me from this side of the Chamber, have submitted to the consideration of the House and the country a proposition so broad, so statesmanlike, in the interests of this country, that the Chinese-wall-of-protection party on the other side, eloquent and argumentative as their speeches have been, from their own standpoint, have been wholly unable to gainsay the position we have taken. The hon. gentlemen who have spoken from the commencement of this debate, on our side of the House, have submitted a proposition, and have proclaimed correctly the condition of this country to be such, and its financial position such, as call for the immediate consideration of this Parliament, and the consideration of the people outside of it. Now, Sir, hon. gentlemen, in the early part of this debate, quoted speeches which had been made by hon. gentlemen on this side on previous occasions. They endeavored to make out that some hon. gentlemen on this side had been inconsistent in their utterances, and that the policy which they advocate now was not in accordance with the policy which they had advocated, individually, on other occasions. One of those gentlemen, my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies), has answered for himself to-day. He has shown this House that his speech, taken in its plain and literal meaning, from beginning to end, was not capable of the interpretation which the hon. Minister of Marine chose to put upon it. And I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen will endeavor, before this debate is over, to make quotations from observations of mine. I hope they will do so. However, I may spare them the necessity of that, Mr. Speaker, because I intend to give this House, before I resume my seat, the benefit, if benefit it may be, of the opinions which I have expressed with regard to our relations with the United States for a very considerable number of years past. Now, Sir, we have, in this present position, an entirely new departure. We have here a question which has never yet been formally submitted to the consideration of the people. It has been an abstract question; it has been one which people's minds may have dwelt on, but it has never been deliberately submitted for the consideration of the people. And how are we met? We are met with the cry that it is disloyal to the old country. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat indulged us with that cry to a considerable extent, and closed his speech by an appeal to the sentimental aspect of this question, and stating the strength of that sentiment in the hearts of the people of Canada to-day. Sir, I agree with the hon. gentleman that there is a great deal in sentiment. I agree with the hon. gentleman that great deeds and great sufferings have been undergone for the sake of mere sentiment. But, Sir, if sentiment stands between us and our necessities to-day, our duty to Canada points to the course we should take in the interests of Canada. Sir, sitting here as one of the representatives of this Dominion, I am prepared, for my part, to say, let us consider the interests of Canada first. That, Mr. Speaker, has been the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, that has been the policy of the right hon. gentleman in times gone by.

Mr. McNEILL.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is now.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). That was the policy laid down by the right hon. gentleman in that Minute of Council quoted by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) the other day, when the right hon. gentleman declared that the only way to make the people of Canada contented in their present position was to make them prosperous; and no one knew better than he did that if there was prosperity in this country from one end to the other, the people were satisfied and contented with their political position. But, as has been shown, if the true interests of a country were suffering, if the people saw on the other side of the line a market which would take all of their surplus productions, if they saw that market closed by a Chinese wall against them, in consequence of the action of this Government, then I say that the time would come for the people of Canada to look around and make overtures, as this resolution invites us to make, to the large, friendly, and powerful people to the south, and ask them if some modus vivendi may not be arrived at whereby we two English-speaking races on this continent may be able to exchange our products to our mutual advantage. I say, at the outset of this discussion, that I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen on the other side pointing out all the disadvantages that are going to arise to the Dominion under the operation of such an Act. I am glad to hear that for this reason: because the friends of this measure—and we have friends on the other side of the border—will be able to show the people of the United States that there is at least a division of opinion on this side of the border. If there was only one view of the question taken in this Chamber, if every member in the House and every man in the country would cordially accept the views advanced by the hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, why, the friends of that measure, and I believe they are growing in the United States, would not have the advantage of pointing out there was a division of opinion on the other side of the border as well. I hold that this is a matter which, while largely in the interests of Canada, is largely in the interests of the people of the United States as well. It is to their interest—

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES. An hon. gentleman says "hear, hear." Does the hon. gentleman, in any of his dealings with his fellow-man, expect to have all the advantage on his own side? Why, is it a policy that no far-reaching statesmanship ever for one moment contemplates or desires. We desire, if we go to the United States, to say to them: Here we come offering you a trade which is to your advantage to accept, and which during the time you had it under the operation of the Reciprocity Treaty proved to be such, and now with our enlarged commercial system, our increased number of railways, our increased population in Canada—and in the United States as well—we believe it will be a measure for our mutual benefit, and so, come, let us trade together. Why, the Minister of Finance when at Washington the other day made this proposition. I regret he is not here. How do we now know that the Minister of Finance did not make a proposal similar to that called for in the resolution before the House? We know he proposed a resolution there in the interests of extended commerce; and now we find a resolution brought down here under the direction of the leader of this House calling for a Chinese-wall policy of protection against the United States. Well, Sir, it appears to me that if the Minister of Finance were here to-day he would have either to explain his policy, or the leader of the Government would have to explain his. We seem to have a Mikado and Tycoon in this matter, and I would like to hear whether the policy of the Tycoon at Washington can be reconciled with the policy of the Mikado in the House of Commons to-day. The hon. gentleman who resumed his seat a few moments ago said that the Americans were trying to coerce us in consequence of the hostile position we assumed during the Southern War. The hon. gentleman, I have no doubt, thought he was right in the evidence he offered; but if the hon. gentleman had occupied a seat in this House from 1874 to 1878, during the time the National Policy was first discussed in this Chamber, and subsequently over the country, the hon. gentleman would have remembered the speeches made by his leader, by the Finance Minister, by every Tory member in this House, to the effect that we are going to teach the United States their position. We were not going to allow them to have the advantage of our market, we were not going to allow them to make this a slaughter market for their products, and we were going to impose a tariff and a National Policy against the United States which was going to bring the United States to their senses in a very short time. I contend that those utterances of our public men on that occasion in this House, and afterwards in the country, did more than any other line of policy ever adopted, more than the National Policy itself, to embitter the public sentiment of the United States, the minds of the leading statesmen in Congress, against the people of this country who were gulled by such an utterance as that. And when, unfortunately for the interests of Canada, the Government came into power and had an opportunity to carry out their policy, they carried it out to the fullest extent; they carried it out with the boast that they were going to reduce our imports and trade with the United States, they were going to increase our trade with Great Britain and were going to teach the United States the fact that we could get along without them. The absurdity of that was seen from the beginning, the absurdity of that has been felt by every business man, and by every farmer, and by every man who has any acquaintance with the position of affairs in this country. We are living alongside of the people of the United States who want what we have to sell; they take, and they are the only people who will take, and who can take, what we have to dispose of, and we have to send them our products minus the duty which was imposed in consequence of the threatenings of the Tory party of this country. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, indulged occasionally in poetical quotations. I followed him with a great deal of interest, and if he had confined himself to poetical quotations I am sure, in many respects, his statements would have been more accurate and more interesting to the House. The hon. gentleman indulged in a quotation from an unknown author, and as if to show how easy it was to descend from the sublime to the ridiculous, he first came down to the level of pork, and then by two or three steps at once, to oleomargarine. I thought, Sir, that the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue must have apprehended what the hon. gentleman was going to say when he walked over and took his seat alongside of him during the discussion; and if the hon. the Minister of Inland Revenue could have only had the opportunity of giving him a wink and a caution, he would have said: "My good friend do not touch oleomargarine because, remember, that only a few years ago I brought in a Bill to enable oleomargarine to be imported and manufactured in this country." It was only on account of this strong feeling in this House that on motion of my hon. friend from Brant (Mr. Paterson) who sits beside me, the permission of the hon. Minister of Inland Revenue was changed so as to prevent its manufacture and introduction into this country. Leaving aside the hon. gentleman's conclusion with regard to our duty and our loyalty towards England, and I would not have a great deal to answer. But, Sir, I would ask the hon. gentleman for one moment to refer back to the Journals of the House in 1867, and he will find that the party which he follows to-day, and the leader which he serves under to-day, who was leader of the House and Government on that occasion, in the very first Address from the Throne, which he put into the mouth of the Governor General to deliver to this Parliament, he caused it to contain these words: "I congratulate you on the legislative sanction which has been given by the Imperial Parliament to the Act of Union under the provisions of which we are now assembled and which has laid the foundation of a new nationality." What does a "new nationality" mean, Mr. Speaker? Does it not mean the severance from the old country, and could it mean anything else? A "new nationality" meant nothing less. It meant the independence which those gentlemen had been speaking about, during the whole political campaign that preceded the Act of Union, from every hustings in the Dominion of Canada, when public men stated publicly, that when we had attained our present position henceforth we were going to assume the duties and the aspect of a new country. I repeat again that on the very first occasion on which this House met after Confederation the hon. the leader of the Government put into the mouth of the Governor General those memorable words that "we inaugurated a new nationality." That, Sir, was the object of the Union, as stated at its very inception. The hon. gentleman who spoke so eloquently, with regard to our duty towards the old country, would do well I think, Sir, if he would ask his hon. colleagues to explain their meaning, when, at the very first opportunity they had of meeting the representatives of Canada under the new system of government, they announced to them, as the policy of the Administration, that they were going to adopt a new nationality. Sir, it ill becomes any of those gentlemen to endeavor to brand hon. members on this side of the House, and to argue that we are endeavoring to lead the people away from the old country. They themselves were the first; their leader, their Government, and the leader of the present Government was the first to indicate to the people of this country at large that we had made up our minds to adopt a new nationality, which meant severance from the old country. Now, Sir, what did the hon. gentleman, with regard to this question, say? In addition to the charges they make against us of being unfair to the country, he said that we have not been able to prove that this policy would be of advantage to our farmers, our fishermen, and our various industries. Now, Sir, this question, as I said before, a very few years ago, was not in the position which it is to-day. We were not aware then what the position of the question would be in the United States. To-day, what do we see? We see a broad invitation from that distinguished man Mr. Bayard, the American Secretary of State, to Sir Charles Tupper, asking him to "come and discuss the questions in a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations between the two Empires." That invitation is the same as coming from the head of the Government, and, indeed, we had previously received almost a similar invitation from the head of the Government himself. This coming from the Premier, so to say, of the United States—the leader of the Cabinet, was an emphatic declaration on the part of the people of the United States, so far as the Government were concerned, that, in their judgment, the time had arrived when this question could be properly considered with Canada. Sir Charles Tupper, the hon. the Minister of Finance, who has since been in Washington, made a most cordial reply to this invitation. He did not intimate any desire on the part of Canada not to enter into the relations, but he says: "I entirely agree in your statement that we both seek to obtain a just and permanent settlement and that there is but one way to procure it, and that is by a straightforward treatment, on a liberal and statesmanlike plan, of the entire commercial relations of the two countries." Here, Sir, we have then the whole case before us. We have since seen a resolution introduced into Congress by Mr. Butterworth and, subsequently, by Mr. Hitt, and we have seen the public expression of opinion from public men in the United States with regard to this measure, and we believe to-day that they are watching with a great deal of interest the discussions that take place in this House. The hon. gentleman has quoted occasionally from Mr. Wiman. Now, Mr. Wiman, I have no doubt, has given considerable attention to this question, and Mr. Wiman's idea would be quite in accord with the policy now under consideration here. He says:

"The second plan of unrestricted reciprocity to which in your letters you referred would be a most admirable arrangement, and next to the old Reciprocity Treaty would be most acceptable no doubt throughout Canada. It is as you say that the extension of the plan as laid down in the Treaty of 1874, urged by General Grant on the part of the United States, and by the Honorable George Brown on the part of Canada. Had this negotiation been successful no Act in General Grant's Administration would have paralleled it in importance and beneficial results to the United States; while this consummation as a result of Mr. Brown's efforts would have added a lustre to a name already famous in Canada that would have been international in its scope."

Then, Sir, he goes on to say:

"The conclusion, therefore, is that while the first plan in the foregoing list—the old Reciprocity Treaty—is impossible, the second that of unrestricted reciprocity is possible only by the early and prompt action of the Canadian Government, speaking on behalf of the people, and making at once the necessary propositions from which the knowledge of the fact, I believe, could be promptly carried through in view of the agitation and interest which has been excited on the question here. If no such action is taken by the representatives of the Canadian Government it is impossible to conceive that the American Congress could be induced to initiate a move of this limited character."

Now, Sir, you will find by this that Mr. Wiman, who has given a great deal of attention to this subject, had come to the conclusion that unrestricted reciprocity, such as we are advocating to-day, was entirely in accordance with the sentiment in the United States and would find acceptance there. This question of our relations with the United States as I have said before has been considered at various places and has been spoken to by myself, and as I may be misquoted, or partially quoted by the hon. gentlemen who follow me, I will read what I said in the House last year while that question was under consideration:

"In regard to the treaty I think it very undesirable that here or elsewhere any expressions of opinion should be given as to the great desirability or necessity of a treaty with the United States. Shortly after the treaty expired there was a meeting held at the Chamber of Commerce, Halifax, when a resolution was moved calling on the Government to take immediate steps to renew it. On that occasion I said I thought that while it was well known throughout this country that our people were anxious for a renewal of the Reciprocity Treaty on equal terms, it was not wise or judicious that we should publish to the world from every commercial standpoint the opinions we entertained on that subject. I am aware this expression of mine was quoted against me on a recent political occasion in my own Province, but I expressed it there in the same sense in which I would express it here, because I believe the Government, recognising their responsibility in dealing with a matter of such importance, would be freer to act on behalf of our country if there was not brought to bear from the other side expressions of opinion from our own people that we could not live or prosper without trade relations with that country."

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

I took the precaution of adopting that policy for this very reason: I did not wish to say anything that might be used against us by those in the United States who are opposed to a reciprocity treaty with us, in any future negotiations which might take place. I remember very well the speeches which were delivered in this House, on the Washington Treaty, by the hon. leader of the Government and the hon. Minister of Finance. I remember those hon. gentlemen standing in their places and pointing out the great advantages that we were gaining under that treaty—pointing out that under it we were gaining everything and giving up nothing; and the speeches of those hon. gentlemen were quoted entirely in the American case submitted to the Halifax Commission. And while I did not suppose that my speeches would have so much importance in the eyes of the public as the speeches of gentlemen who occupy the high position those hon. gentlemen occupied at that time, and still occupy, I was unwilling that any member of this House should make use of any language which American negotiators might throw up against us whenever we came to negotiate with them. Shortly after that I was interviewed by the Boston Globe, which was very anxious to know what we, in Nova Scotia, thought in regard to this matter. In that interview I said:

"I was a member of a government, and belong to a party that has always desired the closest commercial relations with the United States, and I do not hesitate to say that, if our party came into power to-morrow, our first object would be, so far as consistent with our financial obligations, to place our trade relations with our neighbors across the border on the freest and broadest basis possible. I do not believe in commercial union. Neither country, I believe, would agree to it; but if the tariff of both countries could be reconsidered I think a way would be found by which we might trade with our neighbors, who are our natural customers, on a much more liberal and extended basis than we do at present. I believe that a great deal of bad feeling was engendered in the minds of the people of the United States, and in the minds of her leading statesmen, by the constant cry that was kept up by the Tory party of the Dominion during the time that the Liberal Government was in power, that they (the Tories) by pursuing a policy of retaliation would force trade concessions from the Americans. The Liberals of this country never desired such a policy. They desired the freest trade relations consistent with revenue requirements, believing that the more intimate our commercial intercourse was the better feeling it would engender among the population of the two countries."

"We cannot forget that we have a large interest in the New England States particularly. Their factories are operated largely by Nova Scotians, their fishing fleet is largely manned by our own hardy sons, and the number of people from Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island who have made their homes in their towns and villages it would be difficult to ascertain."

I was also interviewed by the Chicago Times, which reported the interview as follows:—

"Hon. A. G. Jones, M.P., largely engaged in the West Indies and fish trades, has been watching with considerable interest the discussion of the question in the United States. Public opinion in Canada would be likely to shape itself in response to action that may be taken in the United States. The people of the Maritime Provinces would favor reciprocity in the limited sense, or a broader measure like commercial union, if that is found practicable. 'Our commercial interests are with the United States, and not with Canada,' Mr. Jones said. 'We have no binding trade interests between the east and west of Canada, and are ready to extend our commercial relations with any country that will take our products.' If the United States Government were disposed to favor unrestricted reciprocity with Canada, Mr. Jones thinks no great difficulty would be experienced in adjusting details of the arrangement to the satisfaction of both parties. It is argued that free trade with the United States would be discrimination against the mother country, but Mr. Jones believes no opposition need be feared from that quarter. England knows that the surest way to make Canada contented with her political status as a portion of the Empire is to make her people prosperous. That would undoubtedly be the case under unrestricted free trade with the United States. 'I look on the proposition with moderate favor,' Mr. Jones said, in conclusion, 'and am prepared to discuss it for the best interests of the country. It has not yet been made a party question.'"

Now, Sir, these are the opinions which I have expressed on this measure up to the present time, and therefore I feel perfectly free to-day in coming here and giving my allegiance to the policy set forth in the statements I have read. But, Sir, we have heard from hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House—and they have endeavored to propagate the idea in their papers—that the policy of the Liberal party to-day, the policy of unrestricted reciprocity, means direct taxation, the withdrawal of Provincial subsidies, the withdrawal of subsidies to various railways in the country. Sir, I take entire and immediate exception to that statement. There is no such plank in the platform of the Liberal party to-day; there is no necessity for any of these results in the arrangement we advocate for the approval of this country. We must come here and discuss this question in a fair and honest spirit, neither overstating nor understating the case, and I am prepared to say that we should probably lose a small amount of revenue under such an arrangement; but we should be able to economise in certain unnecessary expenses to the extent of a few millions. And, then, Sir, above all, instead of having our people in the condition we find them in to-day from one end of this Dominion to the other, instead of finding their resources crippled, their energies hampered, their farms mortgaged, and looking with hopelessness to the future, we should have a contented and prosperous people, a people with money in their pockets, and we know what it means when people have money in their pockets, for they spend it, and the very man who spends one dollar to-day, would, under such a condition of affairs, be able to spend three or four dollars to-morrow. Therefore, I look without the slightest apprehension to the change involved in the proposition before the House. If it involved anything approaching direct taxation, I should say, stay your hand; for I should say that this country could not under any system of government adopt direct taxation. Although it might be the most economical, if people understood it, they have not been educated up to the great economical fact that direct taxation would be the cheapest system they could adopt. And, therefore, you have to accept public opinion as it is. No party in this country would stand twenty-four hours, if they went to the people with direct taxation on their banners.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I am glad to hear hon. gentlemen opposite agree with me. Therefore, I take this exception at the outset, because I deny most emphatically that any such result can possibly be involved in the adoption of the policy which we recommend to-day. Now, Sir, the hon. gentleman may say that it would be unfair to the country to discriminate against her with regard to the United States. Why, is it not equally unfair to discriminate against the British manufacturer, in so far as the principle and the sentiment are concerned, in favor of the Canadian manufacturer? There is discrimination against the British manufacturer. His goods cannot come in owing to it, and if they do not come in under one condition of affairs, they will not under another; and so far as the logic and the sense is concerned, it is just as unfair for this Government, under the National Policy, to discriminate against the English manufacturer, by high protective duties, in favor of the people of Canada, as it would be under other circumstances to discriminate against him in favor of the people of the United States. The hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries the other night dealt at considerable length upon the advantages of our inter-provincial trade, which has arisen out of our present political condition. To fortify his opinion, the hon. gentleman quoted an observation made by the Attorney General of Nova Scotia. I thought, as the hon. gentleman made that quotation, he might have had sufficient respect for himself, as a member of the Dominion Government, to have avoided the sneer he indulged in when speaking of the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, who is not here to answer for himself, by saying that he was a man who had made a great deal of noise about himself the last two or three years. If the hon. gentleman were to meet the Attorney General for Nova Scotia in debate, I have no doubt the Attorney General would be able to hold his own, and in his absence it is not very statesmanlike on the part of a member of this Government to attempt to belittle a member of the Local Government. Had the hon. gentleman quoted the Hon. Mr. Longley fairly, he would have had this advantage: that I would not be in a position to make the retort which it is in my power to make to-day. We very often find hon. gentlemen opposite making quotations from the speeches of hon. gentlemen on this side, without giving us the entire quotation, but only giving us that portion, which taken by itself, bears out the impression they endeavor to create. They are careful not to give the fair and literal meaning of what was said. Now, what did Mr. Longley say at the banquet at Boston? He said:

"God and nature never destined that Nova Scotia and Ontario should trade together. We trade with Ontario, to be sure. Their drummers permeate our country, and sell, $10,000,000 of goods annually, and we pay for them almost wholly in hard cash. Where do we get the money? We get it from the people of the United States."

Now, if the Minister of Marine and Fisheries had finished the quotation by giving us that part of it, he would have done Mr. Longley the justice, to which Mr. Longley was entitled. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries said that a large trade had been growing up between the east and the west. Let us see in what that trade consists. He says there is a large amount of sugar brought over the Intercolonial Railway. Well, there is, I admit, a very considerable quantity of sugar coming over the Intercolonial Railway, but when we find every year an annual deficiency of $100,000 to $200,000 in the working of the Intercolonial Railway, when we see $8,000,000 to $10,000,000 charged yearly as capital account to the Intercolonial Railway, half of which should go to current expenses, I ask, is it any great advantage after all to force this trade at the expense it involves. The hon. gentleman says that coal is brought over the Intercolonial Railway. Coal is brought from a certain county represented by the hon. the Minister of Finance, and we have the statement, in reply to my enquiry, and which the hon. the Minister of Railways had the frankness to put in his annual report, as explaining increased expenditure and diminished receipts, we have the statement that every pound of that coal carried over the Intercolonial Railway was carried at a dead loss. Is that the way to promote trade in this country, by making such a sacrifice? Hon. gentlemen, familiar with this business, are aware that when we come to put a rate of three-tenths of a cent per mile on coal, that involves a loss to the country of a very extensive character. I have been told by gentlemen familiar with the business, and whom I consider as high authority, that about three-quarters of a cent per mile is the minimum rate in the United States, which, it is considered, will compensate for working expenses; so that when we come to cutting that rate down to three-tenths of a cent per mile, it is forcing trade at a very heavy expense, which the taxpayers have to bear. The hon. gentleman says that about three-quarters of a million barrels of flour are carried over the railway. There again the National Policy comes into play. If we were clear of the National Policy to-day, we would not require to carry flour over the Intercolonial Railway at a loss, because I suppose it hardly pays—at all events it does not more than pay—running expenses. What would we do without the National Policy? Why our national trade is with the United States; our little fishing vessels could, in twenty-four hours, take the product of their industry and toil to the United States; if we had access to those markets, and exchange them for flour, which they would bring back free of duty and land at our own doors. Having got rid of what the late Hon. Joseph Howe called "the curse of a Canadian corn law," like the corn law which the people of England got rid of half a century ago, the people of the Maritime Provinces would not to-day be paying 50 cents more for their flour than they would if all the restrictions imposed by the National Policy were swept away, and they had free access to the markets of the United States. I say there is not a single article which we get from Ontario, or which Ontario or Quebec gets from the Lower Provinces, that could not be got on much more favorable terms if it were permitted by the operation of the tariff. There is not a single article that we get from the Upper Provinces that we could not get better from England or the United States, if the tariff permitted us, or if we were back in the condition we were in the happy days gone by. Hon. gentlemen say that a trade is being built up, but they are forcing it at frightful expense; and I say, emphatically, that a time in the history of this country will come when different opinions will prevail, when the people will see that their interests do not lie in the policy which is advocated to-day. When that time does come, there will be a fearful retribution and a shaking of dry bones amongst those manufactures which are fostered by the policy of to-day. The Liberal party would be unworthy of its standing in this country, unworthy of its principles and its traditions, if it did not, when it had the opportunity, wipe away the condition of affairs which I have pointed out, under which the present Government are forcing trade one way, and that at an expense to the country and at a great cost and burden to the consumers. We find that, in addition to being prevented from getting articles from our neighbors, and from the old country, which we desire to get, as a whole, under the operation of this tariff, for the benefit of a few manufacturers who can subscribe large sums for election expenses, we pay very much larger sums for everything we consume than we should do under other circumstances. Gentlemen here and elsewhere have pointed out, and have taken advantage of the country in this respect, that, as they say, for the last three or four years the people should consider how cheap sugar has been, how cheap cottons have been, how cheap other articles have been during that time. We do not deny that these articles have been cheap during the last three or four years, but they have been cheap all the world over. The over-productions have been immense. The over-production of sugar has been enormous, and the improvement in machinery and the increase of mills has brought the cotton industry down to the finest possible point. But we lose all the advantage of this. Prices have gone down of late, and we have not had the advantage of it; and why? Because we are cursed by a policy which takes 25 per cent., 30 per cent., 40 and 50 per cent. out of us for the benefit of the manufacturers in order that they may have more money to subscribe for their party. I was surprised to hear the hon. gentleman ask what more did the taxpayers pay to-day than they did before the National Policy? I will only take one article. If the Minister of Marine had been at the meeting of the Combines Committee the other day, he would have heard a question and an answer given there which would have satisfied him, I think, that we pay more at least than we would under other circumstances. The question was asked of one of the sugar dealers: How much does granulated sugar cost in England? His answer was, 16s. 6d. per 112 lbs. He was asked what that was a pound, and the answer was 3½ cents. He was asked what was the price in Montreal from the refiners to-day, and the reply was 6½ cents per pound. Only in that one article of sugar there is a difference of 3½ cents per pound, and that principle permeates every manufactured article, every article that every man is obliged to consume and requires for the use of his family in this country. Imagine what 3½ cents per pound of sugar means. It means from $7.50 to $8 a barrel. In the production of a refinery like the Canada Refinery in Montreal of 1,000 barrels a day, the gain to them and the loss to us is $7,500 per day. If you take that principle and apply it to every manufactured article in this country, hon. gentlemen can easily see that the argument adduced by my hon. friend from Queen's (Mr. Davies) the other day, pointing out the increased cost of living under these circumstances, was amply justified. But that is not all. The difficulty under the present condition of affairs is this: We have certain articles to dispose of wherewith we purchase our needed requirements. The farmer has his wheat and his grain, his horses and sheep, and the various articles that he cultivates and raises; the fisherman, after his hard toil, has his fish, and the lumberman has his lumber; but where does it all go? It goes to the United States, and, when it goes there, to the only market which will take it, it is met with this heavy duty, which they have to take off the product of their industry, and they have that much less when they come back to Nova Scotia with which to buy all these articles which are protected, which are raised up here for the benefit of the manufacturers, but which those people cannot do without. They cannot buy in the United States. They can only take their product there, no matter what it may be or how small it may be, and bring back the price here and invest it in articles such as this sugar at $7.50 a barrel more than it should be. Is there any wonder that there is a mortgage of 43 per cent. on the farms of Ontario? The farmers of this country have been living, but they have not been prospering, and they have hardly known what was the matter with them, but they are realising now the condition of affairs which has taken from them the legitimate product of their industry; and I venture to say that there is a fearful reckoning coming in the near future, when these men realise the impression that they were getting these articles cheap and that they could not be produced any cheaper. I remember when the Postmaster General delivered a speech in his own county, when I had the honor of meeting him on an occasion which, I am sorry to say, did not have the desired effect. He was pointing out to his people there that the cause of all this cheap sugar, and cheap cotton, and cheap iron was the National Policy, was because the duties were so high, was because they had taken the duties up from 15 per cent. under our régime to 25 and 30 per cent. There was a little country lad sitting up in the gallery, and he said: "Well, Mr. McLellan, double the duties again, and we will get them just so much cheaper." It was a reasonable answer, and just such a one as the hon. gentleman might have expected.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. JONES. When the House rose I was endeavoring to show that there had been a certain amount of inter-colonial trade as the result of Confederation, but it had been forced at a cost which was detrimental to the best interests of the country. I shall now proceed to deal with a statement made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who said that we had failed to show that the National Policy had injured the interests of the fishermen and the miners. I will take our coal interests in the first place, and I do not know that I could produce to this House a better or a higher authority than Mr. Lithgow, of Halifax, a gentleman who is accepted in Nova Scotia as the mouthpiece of the coal interest in that Province. Now, when the duties were imposed on foreign coal, accompanied by the increase in the tariff, Mr. Lithgow took a correct view of the situation, according to my view, and, I think, according to the views of reasonable business men. But I will let Mr. Lithgow speak for himself. Writing on this subject at that very time, he said:

"Anyone acquainted with the wants of a colliery in Nova Scotia will tell you that the new tariff about doubles the duties payable under the old tariff, and that the duties now imposed on colliery plant and supplies average more than the duty levied on imported coal and coke. When I think how the National Policy proposed to foster our mining interests, of Mr. Tilley's proposing to impose such a duty as would give to home industry the home market, and then think of what it and he have done for the coal mines, I—well—better not write my feelings lest the Philistines rejoice. My conviction is the Cape Breton collieries are much worse off under the new than under the old tariff. They cannot now get any more for their coal; they cannot now put their coal into Ontario; they have now to pay twice as much duty as before. Messrs Redpath & Drummond, I will venture to say, make more profit within one year under the new tariff than all the Cape Breton collieries will under ten years, aye, or fifty years' protection the new tariff affords them. The Spring Hill and Pictou collieries, by means of subsidies, in the way of low railway freights, will be able to send coal into Canada, but the Cape Breton collieries, which cannot be thus favored, are in a worse position than before.'

Mr. TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman tell me the date of that letter, 1879?

Mr. JONES. Yes, I suppose it was shortly after 1879. Since then we have put 10 cents on coal more than in 1879. But if Mr. Lithgow, who, I repeat, was considered a good authority at that time, says that the duties now imposed on colliery plant and supplies average more than the duty levied on coal and coke, it is evident that 10 cents will not benefit them to any appreciable extent. Then again, since that time the duty on anthracite has been removed, which has placed them still further in an unfavorable position. Then, Sir, take the Londonderry mines. The Londonderry mines, in the county of Colchester, were established under a Nova Scotia 10 per cent. tariff. They manufactured iron there for many years. They were fairly successful for a certain time, but the moment we came into Confederation, and all these heavy duties and charges were imposed, the result was that that mine, to my great regret, became embarrassed, and it passed into the hands of a large company. It went on from year to year, and finally became bankrupt again. A year or two ago it passed into the hands of a second or third company, and I hope sincerely with better success. Still, the past history of that undertaking will serve to show how those interests have been benefited in Nova Scotia. So, if the hon. gentleman did not understand how the National Policy had failed to benefit our fishermen, I think he is hardly the man who should be at the head of that important department. And if he cannot see how the absence from freedom of exchange and from liberty to dispose of the products of their fisheries in the only market that requires them, and how, handicapped with heavy duties, these people have to send their produce to that market, at no matter what cost, I think the hon. gentleman has lived a good many years in vain. I see it was stated recently by Mr. Wiman, at a banquet in Montreal, and I have not seen his statement questioned, though I have not had the time myself to verify it from public documents, that from the expiration of the first Reciprocity Treaty, down to the present moment, the products of Canada have paid 100 million dollars into the American Treasury. Now, Sir, is it any wonder that the farmers and other interests of this country are suffering if, during that time, such a large amount has been paid by them on the products of their industry, and while they have been compelled to use that market as the only one open to them? The hon. member for Huron (Mr. McMillan) told us the other night, that the farms valued at $300,000,000 were mortgaged to the extent of $275,000,000, on an average 43 per cent., and 6 per cent. interest on the mortgages imposes an annual obligation of $16,500,000. I say, Sir, this is a most startling statement. I regret that it cannot be questioned. I should have been delighted to have heard some hon. gentleman opposite show that the hon. member for Huron had overstated his case. When that hon. gentleman produced these figures, taken from the official documents of the country, and when no hon. gentleman opposite, up to the present time, has been able to contradict that statement, I say that we are brought face to face with a condition of affairs in this country which is of a most startling character. If the farmers of that fine Province of Ontario, with its excellent climate, have been brought, after so many years under the National Policy, to the verge of bankruptcy, as described by the hon. member for Huron, I say the time has arrived when every well-wisher of this country, with a sincere desire of benefiting that large interest, should endeavor to discover some means of amelioration, whereby the products and industries of that large class of our people may in some way be relieved. Sir, if that statement is borne out, as I have no doubt it will be, by the realities of their position, the farmers of Ontario have the matter in their own hands; and I have full confidence that when this matter comes to be presented to them, and when they see on the other side of the line a market for their produce, in which it will bring as much as American produce itself—because our produce is a small affair compared with the productions of that great country, as was shown by the hon. member for Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) the other night—I say I have confidence that when the farmers of Ontario come to discuss this matter in their own homes, and over their own firesides, they will, at no very distant day, take it into their own hands and teach these Chinese-wall-protection-men on the other side of the House, these men who want to build up "rings" and foster "combines" that wring from the farmers their very last cent—I say I have confidence enough in the intelligence of the farmers of Ontario and of the Dominion at large to believe that these men will be taught a lesson that will be of a very surprising character. The policy and extravagance of our Government, which has taken on an average for the last ten years from eight to ten millions of dollars out of the people more than the actual necessities required, has been another important factor in this question. We were told, in 1878, by Sir Leonard Tilley in St. John, by the Finance Minister, and by the leader of the present Government, that we were spending too much money when we spent $23,000,000. The people were told that if they turned out the Government and replaced the Conservatives in power, they would be able to administer the affairs of the Government for a smaller amount. And what have we seen? When the people took hon. gentleman opposite at their word and placed them in power, the annual expenditure went up year by year by leaps and bounds until he has reached nearly $40,000,000 during the past year. We have now before us Estimates for $35,000,000, which, no doubt, will be increased by the Supplementary Estimates to $38,000,000 and probably $40,000,000. I say hon. gentlemen opposite have taken from eight to ten millions more out of the consumers of the country than the necessities of the case required, and when you come to add that amount to the $100,000,000 which have been taken out of the producers by payments on products sent to the United States, I repeat, is it a wonder that the farmers of Ontario are driven to the money-lenders for their daily wants? Is it any wonder that the farmers and fishermen, and in fact those engaged in every industry in Canada, except a few bloated manufacturers and combines, are laboring at the present moment under such severe depression? Badly as we are off undoubtedly, in the Maritime Provinces I am happy to say that I do not think the farmers there are in the same bad position.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I say I do not think they are, for this reason: We have a variety of resources in the Province of Nova Scotia, which, perhaps, no other Province in the Dominion possesses. We have not only our farming industry, but we have our fishing, and coal, and lumbering, and shipping industries, and our farmers are all, to a certain extent, more or less interested in one or more of those industries. Then, again, we have in parts of the Province of Nova Scotia a very large fruit industry which has grown up with the old country, and which has brought hundreds of thousands of dollars into our Province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

M. JONES (Halifax). Yes. What has the National Policy to do with that? Those products are not consumed in Canada. When Providence, in its wisdom, has given us good crops in these directions, where do we find our markets? We find them in England or in the United States; and, therefore, it is that I believe the farmers in Nova Scotia are not in the same position to the same extent as are farmers in Ontario. They have lived, but they have not prospered. There is a great difference between making a daily living, comfortable though it may be, and prospering, as honest, and industrious, and hard working, and intelligent men should. In a country like ours the farmers should not only live but they should prosper, and if you take from them by placing heavy taxes on the products of their industry, while they live they cannot make any accumulations for their old age. These may not see the direct effect, and many a man is, day by day, wondering why he does not do better, and why the present times are so different to the old times when we had reciprocity with the United States. The farmer raises as many potatoes and as many cattle, he catches more fish, and yet he is compelled to ask himself the question, after a year's hard toil is over: Why are we in a different position to-day from what we were during the time the Reciprocity Treaty was in operation? The result is obvious. During reciprocity he had access to the American market, and everything rushed to that market. Our potatoes found a market in the States—there is no other market for them. The potatoes of Prince Edward Island, which is one of their chief crops, found a market there—there is no other market for them. At the present moment those potatoes are taxed 15 cents a bushel. If you estimate that an acre will produce from 200 bushels to 400 bushels, you will find, taking the lowest calculation, 200 bushels, that the duty or incumbrance placed on every acre of land cultivated in potatoes in Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, amounts to $30. Sweep away the present tariff and give us unrestricted reciprocity with the United States, and what would be the result? Why, our farming industry and our farm lands would go up with a bound; every man and every farmer would know that he could put in a crop and cultivate his land, because that large country alongside of us afforded a boundless market for his enterprise. He would know that that country could take whatever he had to dispose of, and his farm would immediately improve to the extent of $30 per acre. Take the farmers of Ontario. It is not very far out of the way to say that Ontario farms do not produce over eighteen bushels of wheat to the acre, on the average, say twenty bushels if you like. The whole value of one acre of wheat in Ontario would not amount to as much as a farmer in Nova Scotia, or Prince Edward Island, or New Brunswick, would save on the duty on potatoes sent to the United States. It must always be remembered that we have no other market for those products. Canada, as we call it in the Lower Provinces, for we call it Canada still and always will, takes no part of our products; it takes nothing from the Lower Provinces in the shape of natural products for it has its own. The West Indies take our potatoes only to a very small extent, only a few cargoes, nothing in proportion to the annual product. They don't go to England, because England sends them out, sometimes, to the United States themselves; and here we are alongside of the markets that want them, and we send them there, send them no matter what the duty may be. I do not like to repeat that here, as it might be repeated against our case when argued elsewhere, but I do repeat here, Mr. Speaker, in the interest of our farmers that if the duty was 30 cents a bushel, and it only gave the farmers of the Maritime Provinces 5 cents a bushel, or even 2 cents a bushel, they are compelled to send their goods to this market. Under such a condition of affairs, when it is a matter of life or death to them, I say, Sir, with all the responsibility that belongs to the statement, that there is only one issue before us down there and that is either reciprocity or repeal. I say, Sir, that Nova Scotia when we had an opportunity and untrammelled by all the influence, and corrupt influence of a corrupt Government—I say, Sir, when we had a legitimate expression of public opinion in Nova Scotia, and when we went before the people of Nova Scotia under a proper Franchise Act, not being controlled by returning officers or corrupt revising barristers, the honest opinion of the people of Nova Scotia was in favor of repeal. If there is anything that is going to make them contented with the Union to-day, it is to make them feel that the people here, who are responsible for the policy of the country at the present momentous time, are laboring to secure them a market which will open to them a channel by which they may realise the fruits of their industry. I say, and I repeat it again, that there is only one course open to them, and I say it here as I have said it before in my own county and elsewhere, there is only one question for us in the Maritime Provinces to-day—that is reciprocity or repeal. If you do not choose to labor to give us unrestricted reciprocity with the United States that feeling of repeal which is latent to-day will spring up again in all its force.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is dead long ago.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says "hear, hear."

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). He said repeal was dead and buried long ago.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). It is dead.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman will find out in his own county, if he ventures to follow his party to the extent which his approval would appear to indicate; he will find, if he goes to the electors of Nova Scotia at no distant date, what the public sentiment is on that particular point. I listened to the hon. gentleman from Bruce (Mr. McNeill) this afternoon, when he referred to this question. He taunted us to go to the country and obtain an expression of opinion on the policy we advocate. Sir, we are not in a position to go to the country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). What I say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are not in a position to advise or control a dissolution of this House, but, Sir, the hon. gentleman and his friends are in that position, and let them dare to go to the country; let them if they dare go to the country on this question of unrestricted reciprocity.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish for one moment to explain to the hon. gentleman. I did not suggest he ought to go to the country in that sense. I suggested he ought to take a favorable opportunity for holding an election for the office of poundkeeper upon the annexation platform.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I suppose the hon. gentleman, under those circumstances, is prepared to be the candidate. I say, Sir, when the hon. gentleman who is challenging this side of the House with temerity and desired us to open a constituency and try the question of unrestricted reciprocity, that one constituency would do no good. Let him and his friends dissolve this House and go to the country, and then we will see a corporal's guard, scarcely, of those honorable, patriotic gentlemen who are willing to suffer for their country but do not seem disposed to die for their country. Now, Sir, the hon. member for Cardwell

(Mr. White) said that Montreal and Toronto were very prosperous. I am glad to hear it, and it is only natural that it should be so. I am glad to hear it, I repeat, as I am always glad to hear of any part of the Dominion or any other place being prosperous. But, Sir, it is very easy of explanation. We know that since this Government has been in power, within the last ten years, they have added within a fraction of one hundred million dollars to the gross public debt of this country. We know that they have taken from eighty to one hundred million dollars more than they ought to have done out of the taxpayers of this country by the iniquitous National Policy. We know, Sir, that those two large sums of money going into circulation, and that Montreal and Toronto being the centres of commerce in the east and west of the old Provinces of Canada, must naturally have a great share of the advantage. We know, Sir, that those large centres of commerce attract the largest amount of capital, and the property which had been distributed through the Dominion, by means of those expenditures of from one hundred and eighty to two hundred million dollars, has borne its fruit and those cities have been advanced. They have been advanced in no other way; they have been advanced at the cost of the whole of the rest of the Dominion; and just as long as those large cities go on and prosper in this way the rural districts will suffer to that extent. But, Sir, have they improved as much as it would appear from this statement. I notice that, at a public meeting of the Board of Trade called at Montreal the other day, Mr. Drummond, that eminent sugar refiner of Montreal, who is the president, delivered an address, which I think the hon. gentlemen opposite would find very instructive if they read it. The speech was with reference to the Government assuming the debt of the Harbor Commission in Montreal. I do not propose offering an opinion upon the assumption of that debt, but I will say this much, Mr. Speaker, that it would have been a much more legitimate appropriation of the public funds of this country to cheapen the harbor in Montreal and reduce the expense attending the imports and exports of that large centre of commerce, than to have given the large sum of money they did give to a member of their administration to build up a rival railway to the Intercolonial, which is owned by the Government of the country. Now, Sir, what did Mr. Drummond say?

"In opening the meeting he spoke in a manner that was little short of mutinous to his friends at Ottawa. Hitherto, he said, the impression had prevailed that Montreal would come out all right, no matter what happened; but now there was no use mincing matters, and it must be stated openly that this city had arrived at a crisis in its history. The charges in the harbor of Montreal were three or four times as great as those in the port of New York, and whilst the exports of the country had gone on increasing enormously during the last ten years the trade of Montreal had remained almost stationary. Montrealers had for years been amusing themselves in discussing plans for remedying the evil, but nothing really had been done, and, to-day, they were forced to acknowledge that Montreal was not in a position to compete with American ports. Outward exports were taking the route by way of New York, because carriage alone was charged and all dues were abolished. This was not a Montreal question, but a national question, and it was gratifying to find that over one hundred members of the House of Commons had pledged their support to it."

It evidently seemed that they had done a little log-rolling around the House, and had secured the promised support of one hundred members of the House of Commons,—

"The time had arrived for plain speaking. The port of Montreal was hastening with rapid strides to a condition of bankruptcy."

This is one of the cities which has been so highly favored by the National Policy. And Mr. Drummond continues:

"The income of the harbor commissioners was not sufficient to carry on the ordinary routine work of the port, and the inevitable result of bankruptcy or repudiation was close at hand, unless the Government took immediate action."

Now, whether Mr. Drummond was right or wrong, that statement on the face of it does not convey the couleur de rose aspect of the prosperity of Montreal, which hon. gentlemen on the other side seem so desirous to make out. Hon. gentlemen have stated during this debate that this policy was going to injure the manufacturers. I need not go into that branch of the question, because my hon. friends who preceded me have dealt with that question in such an exhaustive manner that it is completely unanswerable. Let me take one or two illustrations. It is evident, if the public prints can be relied on, that the Ontario manufacturers are not all of that opinion. We have seen from day to day statements made by Ontario manufacturers that they are not apprehensive of the result of unrestricted reciprocity; and these are men with a knowledge of their business, with ample capacity and industry. I say that wherever a manufactory was established under proper management previous to the introduction of the National Policy, it has succeeded, if not to the great extent of late years, to a sufficient extent to yield a fair return on the capital invested. My hon. friend the other night quoted also Mr. Gibson, one of the oldest and most enterprising business men of the Province of New Brunswick, who has built up a large cotton mill in that Province. He was interviewed on this question, and what was his answer? He said: "So far from my dreading unrestricted reciprocity, or apprehending any difficulty in connection with my industry from it, I should feel gratified because it would open up to me a market of 65,000,000 people, instead of 4,500,000 as at present;" and Mr. Gibson is a man whose judgment as a business man is relied on more than that of almost any other man in the Province of New Brunswick, and, I may say, in the Province of Nova Scotia as well. He was able to gauge the condition of his Province so well that, when the question was put to him, he was ready to answer at once and emphatically that, so far from his apprehending anything disadvantageous to his cotton industry, unrestricted reciprocity was just what he desired to see carried into effect. Then, I am informed by an hon. member of this House that, the other day, one of the proprietors of the new sugar refinery to be built in Montreal, in conversation, said: "We are putting in all our machinery of the most improved pattern, and are building our refinery according to the most improved methods, and if the unrestricted policy prevails, and we have a market in the United States, then, instead of having our market overcrowded every little while, we shall be able to compete successfully in all the border and western States with the American refiners." Does anyone doubt a statement like that? Why should not our refineries in the Lower Provinces, and in Montreal as well, be able to do a large portion of the business in the American border States? Our climate is good, our labor is cheap, our coal is cheap, and we have capital for our enterprises, and instead of these large refining industries every little while being brought to a dead stop by orders from the head centre, or being limited in their production by orders to produce only so many barrels a day, so that a great many men are thrown out of employment—instead of having that condition of affairs, which will grow worse with the advent of another refinery to compete with them in the market, all these things would be changed, and they would have a constant market which would enable them to keep their enterprises going and give ample employment to their men all the year round. That is a consideration which may not have occurred to those less familiar than I am with that branch of trade. The refining industry of this country would be one of the first to reap the advantage of unrestricted reciprocity. I have said that we have cheap labor. Can anyone doubt that after the exposure made in the city of Quebec, the other day, before the Labor Commission? I noticed by a paper published here that the last statement made there gave the startling fact that mill hands in the city of Quebec could only get 35 cents a day, and that women were laboring in the match factories of Quebec for 15 cents a day. Is it any wonder that the people emigrate to the United States? Is it any wonder that these people should be dissatisfied? Why, one of our Nova Scotian or Canadian girls, who goes to the United States as a domestic servant, is able to earn from $14 to $20 a month with her board, while a poor girl in the Province of Quebec, who, perhaps, cannot leave her home, is laboring there for $3.50 a month and paying her board. If there is anything to show that we would be able to compete in the matter of labor with the people of the United States, it would be that startling fact which was revealed before the Labor Commission the other day. Now, Sir, I will give you a statement with regard to the general condition of affairs in the Province of Nova Scotia, made in a letter written by a gentleman in Halifax, who worked as hard as any man in that city to defeat me in 1878, and succeeded. This gentleman has more small properties in the city of Halifax, and controls more investments, than any other man in that city to-day. I refer to Mr. James Thompson. Some one having stated that the value of property would not decrease in Halifax, Mr. Thompson wrote as follows:—

"I saw in the report of a meeting of the Chamber of Commerce a few days since that one of the merchants of this city had asserted that the real estate of the Province had increased at least 50 per cent. since Confederation. I was somewhat surprised at the statement, and am anxious to know from what sources the facts are derived which would warrant such a conclusion.

"Some years since I took the trouble to get the amount of the assessment rolls of some of the counties of this Province, and arrived at an entirely opposite conclusion. Taking four leading counties, representing the four of our leading industries—Cape Breton as representing the coal mining interest; Antigonish as representing the farming interest; Hants as representing the ship-building interest, and Queen's as representing the lumbering interest, and we will find that the assessment rolls amounted in 1863 to $11,316,000, while in 1884—at the time he was writing—they had decreased to less than $3,000,000."

That is the effect it had with us, and since that time I may say that, so far from having improved in value, their value has become less and less from day to day, until, in the city of Halifax, at least, it is almost impossible to sell property at all. I notice in a St. John paper to-day the advertisements of property to be disposed of at public auction, and the auctioneer puts at the foot of the advertisements this notice: "Any bid will be accepted that will more than pay for the taxes and the water rates." Well, we have had a large amount of property sold for taxes in Halifax. At one time last year, there were some two hundred or three hundred properties advertised for sale under the sheriff's hammer, and on one occasion a valuable wharf property, which had a few years ago been sold for $40,000, only realised just one half that amount. You can go through the streets of Halifax, from one end of the city to the other, and I do not hesitate to say that, on enquiry, you will find that since our free trade with the United States was put an end to, the value of property in the city of Halifax has fallen more than 50 per cent. A condition of affairs equally disastrous exists in other parts of the Provinces. Now, I come to the fishermen. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries must be very unqualified to fill the position he holds, if he does not know more about the interests of our fishermen and the way unrestricted reciprocity would benefit them than he was disposed to admit the other night. Perhaps the hon. gentleman in the receipt of his $7,000 a year, hardly understands the hardships and toil which our fishermen go through from year to year. Is he aware that, at one or two o'clock in the morning, these men rise from their beds, light their candles, cook their frugal meals, and go out in their small boats miles from the land, encountering heavy weather, in cold and rainy seasons, and come back in the afternoon with the product of their day's labor—may be a few barrels of mackerel or herring or a few quintals of codfish? What are they to do with their harvest? These men know when they catch the mackerel, that their only market is in the United States; they know that only a few of the fish go to the West Indies; they know that every mackerel caught along the Atlantic coast, in the Province of Nova Scotia, of a valuable character—what we call our fat mackerel—must go to the United States, even if the duty were $10 a barrel. These fish do not go to the old Provinces of Canada, they do not go to England, they cannot go to the West Indies, because being fat they will not keep in that hot climate; so that every barrel of mackerel, no matter what the duty may be, and no matter if it brings only a net return of one or two dollars a barrel, must go to the United States or be thrown overboard or allowed to rot. I hold in my hand the statement of a vessel which, in 1885, the year after the Reciprocity Treaty was terminated, landed 800 barrels of mackerel in the port of Boston. That may seem a large amount to any one not familiar with the question, and it is a large amount, far above the average. These men, under ordinary circumstances, would have been able to realise a very fair return, but when they went to the United States and had to pay the duty of $2 a barrel, what was the result? From their hard labor, from the 15th June to the 30th October, in rain and shine, in calm and storm, exposed to all the inclemency of that boisterous Atlantic coast, these hardy fishermen only realised, after all that long, hard summer's toil and labor, the paltry sum of $30 a piece. Can such a condition of affairs be allowed to exist while a remedy is possible? Can such a condition of affairs be allowed to remain, if there is within sight a possible arrangement which will open a market to the product of these hardy men? The Government would be unworthy of the position they occupy if they did not strain every effort, if they did not use every possible influence to open this market. I am not sanguine that we are going to convince any hon. gentleman on the other side. I know how strong is their party allegiance, I know that they will follow their leader, and that we cannot expect to convert them; but I know that we have an intelligent constituency behind every one of them, and it is to those men we are appealing. It is to the intelligent constituencies that we are addressing our observations to-day, and it is possible that some Robert Peel may come out from the ranks of the Tory party to carry a great measure as that illustrious statesman did the great measure of the abolition of the corn laws of England. It may be that some shaft, some argument, may go forth, which will reach the hearts and the convictions of some leader on that side, who, when he sees the momentous interests involved in a trade with 65,000,000 people alongside of us, and sees that by his efforts he may forward a scheme which is going to make two great peoples to a certain extent one, which is going to allay a great deal of the acrimony and disputes which have prevailed for years past, which is going to do a service and not a disservice to the old country, who, when he realises that England and America are the two greatest countries, and may together bid defiance to the world, and that a peaceful alliance with the United States in our trade relations, and a peaceful settlement of the Irish question, which, I am proud to say I have always advocated, and which I believe to be nearer accomplishment to-day than it ever was at any time in the history of that country,—are now, more than ever, desirable,—who, when he sees the immediate possibility of bringing these two great nations together in peaceful alliance and harmonious working, a great Anglo-Saxon race, will not be untrue to his own judgment, will not be faithless to his duty, and allow his prejudices to control him, but will give this matter the consideration we have a right to expect from every hon. gentleman here. What is the position of these fishermen to-day? $500,000 per year is what the fishermen of this country, under the present policy of restriction, pay to the revenue of the United States; that is when they have a fair catch. All that would be changed, and the $500,000 would go into the pockets of our own fishermen.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

M. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman says no, but he is not sufficiently familiar, possibly, with that branch of the subject to know. As pointed out by the hon. member for Norfolk the other day, that, while we catch a certain quantity of fish, the Americans catch a much larger quantity. The price of these articles is settled by what the Americans produce themselves; and the quantity which we send, which is small to them but great to us, will go there and will not affect the price in their market, and we will obtain the same value. Does anyone suppose that the fishing industry of this country is to remain in the position we find it to-day? Does any hon. member desire that it shall always be kept in the same condition, that there shall be no further development of that great industry which a benign Providence has placed within our reach? What is the use of developing it to any further extent if we have no market? What is the use of our people making efforts to build new vessels, to send out new crews and to catch more fish, if we have no market for them? The market of the United States is the only market we can ever look to, to successfully develop, to any extent, that great fishing industry along our shores. Looking at its position to-day, it is a matter of life or death to them down on the shore. One hon. gentleman quoted a statement from the Halifax Chamber of Commerce to show that the fishing industry was fairly profitable. What was said was not very committal one way or the other. They said that the prices were low in the early part of the season, but that, as they had advanced considerably later in the season, the result of the year's fishery had been fairly successful. How was that brought about? If the hon. gentleman had known this fact, perhaps he would not have given this the prominence he did. In the early part of the season fish were very low. Then we found that we had hardly a good catch. That was not, however, the important factor. The fisheries in St. Pierre-Miquelon, which had been so much reduced the previous year, in spite of the ruinous bounty of 10 francs per quintal, were still further reduced, and they did not send out one-half of the number they sent out the previous year, and so reduced the catch of the previous season. The catch in Newfoundland was short, and it was almost a failure in Labrador; and then came the news that the great Norwegian fishery, one of the largest in the world, counted by millions, had been a failure to a very great extent. When all this was known in the consuming markets of Europe and elsewhere, of course there was an advance in fish, and our men to that extent realised an advantage; but we cannot hope to expect, and we do not desire to see any such condition of affairs again. However, if it had not been for that condition of affairs, had it not been for the failure in all these places to which I have referred, the fishing interest in Nova Scotia would have been a very poor affair last year. But what had it been for the few years previous? If the hon. gentleman had been really interested in that question, he would have known that in the three previous years, instead of that industry being productive at all, the men had barely made a living. Prices were so low, while the catches were large, and the United States markets were closed to them, that our own people, as well as those in Newfoundland, reduced their outfit and their catches as well. But, give us access to the United States market, give us access to the fifty or sixty millions of people alongside of us, then our fishing industry, with the millions and millions which are involved in it, would go forward with leaps and bounds, and there would be such an increase in that branch of commerce as would give wealth to that part of the country. The hon. gentleman asked us what was a natural market? And he said that France, if nearness was to be considered, was a more natural market for England than some of the distant places with which England had much greater commercial relations. The hon. gentleman might have stated his case with equal force if he had given us the whole condition of affairs, if he had stated that there were only two countries in the world with which England had greater trade relations than with the French nation alongside of her, and those are India and the United States. India, with its millions of people, must be and naturally will be for a very long time the greatest market that England possesses, and the United States, that Anglo-Saxon country, is the next greatest consumer of her products; but the French nation, alongside of her, was also valuable to her, as $250,000,000 were taken by the French during the year, according to the public records, and, although the hon. gentleman may not think that a very large amount, I consider it sufficient to establish the fact that, but for the immediate proximity of France to England, but for the free trade policy, inaugurated to some extent by Mr. Cobden and subsequently carried out, to a certain extent, introducing better trade relations between those countries, it would not have amounted to the large sum it did. I would like the hon. the Minister of Marine to go along our coast when he visits Halifax next year, instead of allowing his gunboat to go down the shore electioneering in the county of Shelburne, instead of sending her down there to sound along every little harbor in the county of Shelburne, but of course not to make promises. Oh, no; we have the word of the gallant member for Shelburne (Gen. Laurie), that he made no promises; I do not say he did, but I say that, when he went down on board that Dominion gunboat, with the Dominion flag flying over his head, and the so-called engineer going into every port along that coast and sounding, and saying this would be a nice place for a wharf, and that would be a nice place for a breakwater, and you must require a lighthouse here—I do not say he made any promises, but the inference would be natural. If the Minister of Marine, instead of allowing his navy to be employed in that way, would go along our coasts himself and judge of all these questions, I think he would be in a much better position to give an opinion. He would find there one thing. He would find that our hardy fishermen are leaving us and going to the United States, as I am sorry to say. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. McNeill) would say that sentiment should keep them at home and let them starve. Sentiment is very strong, but a man cannot live on sentiment alone, and, when these hardy fishermen go out in one of our own vessels and fish by the side of an American vessel, and the American vessel takes 1,000 quintals of fish, and our vessel takes 1,000 quintals of fish, and our own men are on board that American vessel and go into an American port, and get 50 cents a quintal more than the man who lands his fish in Nova Scotia, I say that sentiment will stand a very short time against such an argument as that. I know, from my own experience, that a large number of vessels last season were prevented from going into the fishery because they could not obtain the crews, because the men had all gone to the United States. Go down to the Island of Cape Breton. My hon. friends from Cape Breton here will bear me out—

Gen. LAURIE. Hear, hear.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). The hon. gentleman confirms my statement, as I knew he would from his frankness. But I say, go down to the Island of Cape Breton, and there you will find that almost all the population, a large number of people there who used to be engaged in our shore fishery, have gone to the United States.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. JONES (Halifax). I know better, for I am engaged in that business myself. Years ago we used to have tens of thousands of valuable shore fish brought to the Halifax market and exported all over the world; that branch of commerce, as far as regards the shore fishery, is a thing of the past. Those men have gone banking, under the new condition of affairs; and when they found that our fishing vessels could not fish on as favorable terms as the Americans, they emigrated to the States and engaged on board American vessels. When they go there they make acquaintances, acquaintance leads to friendship, friendship leads to settlement, and settlement generally leads to marriage, and the United States reaps the advantage we lose from their industry. This operation has been repeated from year to year, as the years roll round. Now, Sir, the National Policy was started, if I remember rightly—I do not wish to misrepresent the Government—with four objects. The first was to encourage manufactures, second to increase our trade with England, third to reduce our trade with the United States, and fourth to secure reciprocity. Now, let us examine for one moment how far these objects have been secured. Take the manufactures first. Certain manufactures, no doubt, have been established in certain parts of the Dominion, and certain manufacturers have made large sums of money. There were large manufactures before the National Policy, which yielded a fair return. Take the city of Halifax, which I represent—what did the National Policy lead to there? I venture to say that, so far as the Province of Nova Scotia is concerned, the operation of the National Policy has been a curse instead of a blessing. What do we see with reference to the Halifax sugar refinery; $400,000 were put in that refinery. It went on for a year or two, but it lost all its capital, and owed the bank $250,000 besides. The bank sold out the property to the present proprietors, minus $100,000 which they lost; therefore there was just half a million dollars lost in the Halifax sugar refinery since it started. What it may do in the future I do not know, I only hope it may have a successful career. Then, again, you take the sugar refinery across the harbor. It was built by English capitalists at a cost of $700,000, and was one of the most thorough refineries in the country. It ran about twelve months and then failed. It was taken over by the bondholders for less than $300,000, and is now starting under their management. Therefore, taking these two operations alone, I show you most conclusively—no man can gainsay it—that in the city of Halifax alone, there has been one million dollars wasted, lost to the capitalists of that country—let alone the cotton factory in Halifax, the stock of which would not bring 50 cents in the market to-day, costing $350,000. That is the beneficent effect of the National Policy so far as we are concerned. Well, Sir, have they increased our trade with England, and diminished it with the United States, as they promised? We find that our exports to England, in 1878, were $45,941,000; in 1887, they amounted to $44,571,000, or $1,369,693 less in 1887 than in 1878. Then, take our exports to the United States. We were not going to do any more business with the United States, remember; we were going to teach them a lesson and build up a Chinese wall. Our exports to the United States in 1878 amounted to $25,244,898; in 1887, to $37,660,199, or an increase of $12,415,000 during that time. Then take the aggregate. In 1878, the aggregate with Great Britain was $83,372,279; in 1887, $89,534,079, or a gain of $6,162,760. Then take the United States. The aggregate trade in 1878 was $73,876,437; in 1887, $82,767,265 or a gain of $8,890,728. Therefore, in this respect you will see that so far from the National Policy increasing our commercial relations with England, it has reduced them; and so far from decreasing our trade with the United States it has increased it; in these two respects it has been a total failure. Now, Sir, what we want below, as I said before, is free access to our customers across the line. We are here 4½ millions of people, speaking the same language, as has often been observed, with the same natural tendencies for trade, with the same industry, I hope, and with the same capability for business, I believe. I say, Sir, that if you can bring these two countries into closer commercial relations, and by some arrangement acceptable to the people of the United States, entered into at this favorable moment, when the people of the United States seem to be considering this question, if the Government can make a proposal to them which will bring about such a change as I have indicated, then I think we shall be fortunate indeed. We want, moreover, in any arrangement made the coasting trade free to us from the Atlantic to San Francisco. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, what effect it would have upon the great ship-building interests of the Lower Provinces, of the Province of Quebec, and, of course, of the western Provinces as well. We are naturally situated for ship-building all along the Atlantic coast. There is not a harbor along that long coast line, there is not a creek on the eastern or western shores but where you will see small vessels, and vessels of very considerable tonnage, being built year by year. They can be built more economically with us than in the United States, because the wood is at our hands, and they are built by our own people largely during the season when there is no other employment or occupation. Imagine, I say, if you throw open to the people of the Maritime Provinces that great boon, the right to buy American ships or to sell our vessels in their market, what an impetus it would give along our sea coast. The Americans cannot compete with us as regards the cost of vessels. I repeat that their wood is more expensive, and there is a difference in values of about twenty-five or thirty per cent. This has always given us a certain advantage in our fishing outfits and enterprises, and if we had access to their markets, from Maine to California, it would open up a wide field for our sailors and fishermen, of which they would immediately take advantage, and we would see hundreds of vessels built along our coast for employment in the coasting trade of the United States. In all this matter there is no one question greater than this: reciprocal coasting trade and reciprocal registration of vessels. I listened the other night, with a good deal of amusement, to a quotation made by the Minister of the Interior from a speech or document purporting to be written or spoken by the late lamented Hon. George Brown. I thought that if dead men's bones could rattle in their graves, or if a voice could come to us from the tombs, what maledictions would we hear from that old Reformer, that any utterance of his should ever be construed into an approval of the monstrous policy under which this country is laboring at the present moment. That old Reformer who devoted his whole life to freeing commerce from its shackles, to securing for us free trade, and to promoting the good of his fellow man, would have been the last man to have countenanced such a policy, and he would have scorned the idea that any sentiment that he ever uttered, or any word he ever wrote, could be brought forward in support of the policy of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House. No, he lived in different times under different circumstances. He lived in times when commerce was free; when it was not necessary for a householder to go hat in hand to ask a "combine" if he might buy so many pounds of sugar. He did not live in a time when a housemaid on going to a grocery store had to ask most humbly from the "ring," "combine," or guild, or whatever they call it, whether she might buy a bottle of pickles. He did not live in a time when a boy on going to a store had humbly to ask permission to buy a box of matches valued at two cents. All these are natural consequences of "combines" and guilds. Does any man suppose the Hon. George Brown would approve any such conditions and the imposition of such burdens on the trade and commerce of the country? No; he lived in different times. He lived in times such as are indicated by Tennyson when describing the glorious reign of her present Majesty; he said:

Mr. JONES (Halifax).

" And statesmen at her council met
Who knew the seasons when to take Occasion by the hand, and make
The bounds of freedom wider yet."

We in this matter are bound to go forward, and this question has come to stay. We are bound to carry it to a successful conclusion. It may not be this year or next year, but within a few years the hon. gentlemen opposite will remember what I am telling them to-night, that public opinion in this country will not sustain the action which they are going to adopt, that public opinion will be in harmony with the sentiments proposed by the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House and the policy embodied in the resolution of the hon. member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). We are going to make this the great question of the country for some time to come. We believe the people will approve our efforts; we believe, when they are educated, they will see the vital importance it is going to be to every industry in which they are concerned, and they will come to our assistance. We are going into the battle, and we are going to inscribe on our banners as the watchword, as the motto, as the text of the Liberal party, these noble sentiments, echoed by the Secretary of State for the American Union, Mr. Bayard, who, when writing to a friend a short time ago, said: "Providence has made us neighbors, let wisdom make us friends." Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I beg to move the following amendment to the amendment:—

That in any arrangement between Canada and the United States providing for the free importation into each country of the natural and manufactured productions of the other, it is highly desirable that it should be provided that, during the continuance of any such arrangement, the coasting trade of Canada and of the United States should be thrown open to vessels of both countries on a footing of complete reciprocal equality, and that vessels of all kinds built in the United States or Canada may be owned and sailed by the citizens of the other and be entitled to registry in either country and to all the benefits thereto appertaining.

Mr. TUPPER (Picton). I was somewhat surprised, Mr. Speaker, this afternoon, after a statement made with such assurance and with such exultation by the hon. gentleman who has led the other side in this debate, that from the Maritime Provinces especially should come a wail for unrestricted reciprocity. I was somewhat surprised, I say, Mr. Speaker, under those circumstances that when a question said to be exciting such an amount of interest among the business people of the Maritime Provinces was brought before us by a gentleman old in politics, a gentleman well acquainted with political strategy, a member representing his party from the Province of Nova Scotia, to see him travelling back to the dusty journals of this House for 1867, in order to attempt to bring arguments to bear against the Liberal-Conservative party on a charge of having been at one time disloyal to the interests of the Empire. It struck me as a curious commentary upon the boasted strength of their principles, initiated in bringing the main resolution before this House, that an hon. gentleman holding the position that the hon. gentleman from Halifax (Mr. Jones) the senior member from his county does, that he thought it necessary, and thought it wise, to labor, and hopelessly labor for some minutes before the Parliament of Canada with an argument so puerile and so weak. The hon. gentleman devoted some time to calling the attention of the House to what his contention actually was, that contention being that the language which he quoted from the mouth of Lord Elgin, representing the Crown in this country, conveyed sentiments traitorous to the Crown and sentiments at variance to the sentiment which brought about the connection of this country with the mother country, and which serves to this day to maintain that connection. It seems strange to me that the hon. gentleman had not read a little more diligently the journals of 1867, since he turned his attention to old and ancient literature, because on page 248 of the same volume he would have found that that Parliament by him thought to be so disloyal, by him thought to be so in favor of sentiments of independence from the mother country, had resolved:
